The third occurred in April 1873, when Purukutu and his supporters of Ngāti Hauā killed Timothy Sullivan as they chased him and two others back across the confiscation line at Pukekura (between Maungatautari and Cambridge).<sup>166</sup> Sullivan's companions, David Jones and Charles Rogers, made it and were not pursued beyond the aukati. Sullivan did not share their luck, and was caught and killed. They had been hired to work on land that had been through the Native Land Court as part of the Maungatautari block claim, and had subsequently been leased to two Europeans. Purukutu and his supporters had refused to take part in the hearing, but continued to regard the land as theirs. There is no evidence that Sullivan was personally warned. However, Kingitanga warnings against such breaches of the aukati had been publicly circulating for years, and – when they went unheeded – Purukutu had taken other action such as killing or driving off stock, and burning a whare on the land. In January, Kingitanga supporters had held a meeting about Pukekura and had resolved to warn Major Mair to remove the cattle (though Mair subsequently denied having received the message). As a final warning, in February 1873 another workman, James Laney, had been seriously injured in a similar incident.<sup>167</sup> Taking responsibility for Sullivan's death, Purukutu explained that it was his 'last resource [sic] . . . to kill any pakeha I found on my land.' Pākehā law did not extend past the confiscation boundary, he said, 'and is not known on this side.'<sup>168</sup>

The fourth and final killing was of William Moffatt in 1880. This killing illustrates how the warning system worked progressively towards the ultimate penalty of death. Moffatt had some history with various Te Rohe Pōtae communities, but

163. Daily Southern Cross, 15 February 1870, p 7; doc A78, p 111.

164. 'The Alleged Waikato Goldfield', Daily Southern Cross, 12 February 1872, p 2; doc A78, pp 111–112.

165. Clarke report, 16 March 1871, AJHR, 1871, F-6, p 10; doc A78, p 111.

166. 'Sullivan's Murder Explained', Daily Southern Cross, 20 May 1873, p 3; doc A78, pp 114–115.

167. 'Report from Mr James Mackay, Jun', 10 July 1873, AJHR, 1873, G-3, pp 3–4; doc A78, pp 272–274.

168. Document A78, p 115.

perhaps over-estimated his popularity among them.<sup>169</sup> In 1872, facing charges of theft and fraud, Moffatt fled into ‘the King’s Country’ with Detective Kell of the armed constabulary in pursuit, bearing a warrant for Moffatt’s arrest.<sup>170</sup> On this occasion, a Kingitanga patrol allowed Kell to capture the fugitive Moffatt. This permission allowed Kell to exercise his authority to arrest Moffatt.<sup>171</sup>

In 1875, having served his jail sentence, Moffatt was reportedly living at Te Kūiti as ‘the King’s pakeha.’<sup>172</sup> But his various dubious dealings, both inside and outside the aukati, soon saw him once again captured inside the aukati, under the authority of chiefs at Tūhua, to face charges brought by colonial authorities outside the aukati. Sentenced in early 1877 to two years’ hard labour, for offences under the 1860 Arms Act, Moffatt headed back to the upper Whanganui area in late 1878. He seemed set on continuing his earlier practices of moving back and forth across the aukati line, dealing with people and communities on each side. However, chiefs within the aukati, particularly those at Tūhua, had little patience with him. A council of chiefs that included Wahanui, Rewi, Taonui, Ngatai Te Mamaku, and Te Pikikōtuku decided Moffatt must leave and not return. Moffatt was personally warned: he would be killed if he ever crossed the aukati again. Initially, he did heed the warning, leaving the district when he heard the council’s decision.<sup>173</sup>

But in 1880, for reasons that remain a mystery, Moffatt pressed his luck one last time, attempting to secretly enter the district accompanied by a man named Henare.<sup>174</sup> Moffatt was intercepted and shot by the chief Ngatai Te Mamaku. (Though it seems that the shot was not fatal – Tame Tūwhangai told us that the death blow was delivered by Pūkawa with a tomahawk.<sup>175</sup>) Sir Archie Tairoa explained this event (at the Taumarunui Kōrero Tuku Iho hui):

Haere atu ana ki roto o Whanganui, anā ten ngā rangatira, anā, e whakarite i tērā wā, tērā wā me kī, te rohe e aukatihia e kī ake kaua e haere mai ngā Pākehā ki roto ki konei, ā, pērā hoki i roto Taumarunui nei ana tō mātou tupuna a Ngātai . . . kī ake kaua e haria mai ngā Pākehā ki konei ka haere mai ka kī atu ahu kaua hoki mai i konei ka haere engari ka hoki mai te wā, ka hoki mai, patua kia mate ana koirā pea te āhuatanga o te aukati e kōrerohia nei, arā, i konei, nō reira e kī ana ngā mea kāore i te whakarongo . . .

169. Ms Marr gave a full account of Moffatt and his eventual demise: doc A78, pp 112–146.

170. Specifically, Moffatt faced charges of horse-stealing and acquiring goods under false pretences: ‘Clever Capture’, Daily Southern Cross, 13 November 1872, p 3; doc A78, p 113.

Ms Marr was not certain that the William Moffatt who Kell arrested (studied in detail by historian David Young) and the William Moffatt later killed as punishment for repeatedly breaching the aukati is one and the same (p 112). However, she did not explain that sliver of doubt, and continued as if she and Young have studied the one person.

171. Document A78, p 114.

172. Thames Star, 7 April 1875, p 2; doc A78, p 122.

173. Document A78, pp 122–124.

174. Document A78, p 124.

175. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 226–227 (Tame Tūwhangai, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 18 May 2010).

As far distant as the Whanganui districts to the south, chiefs enforced the boundaries of Te Rohe Pōtae. Pākehā were forbidden to enter; that was the case in Taumarunui. Our ancestor Ngātai . . . said “Don’t bring Pākehā here”, but they came anyway. He said “Go. Go away and don’t come back”. The Pākehā were sent [away] but they came back, and the Pākehā . . . was killed. That is what an aukati means; no one allowed to come in. That was the mana, that was the strength of the word of the chiefs. They said, “Do not enter. If you do there is a price, you come in and you pay the price . . .”<sup>176</sup>

Ngatai explained to John Bryce at the Kihikihi hui in 1883 how Moffat had ignored repeated warnings to leave:

I sent my man called Te Kati to warn him not to come, but he paid no attention to my message, and persisted in coming on . . . I sent him a letter by my messenger telling him to return from that place as there was trouble in this district . . . he was turned back on one day. He persisted in coming on the next day and was killed.<sup>177</sup>

The responsibility and authority for the killing was signified by a taiaha – ‘Mahuta’ – left in the vicinity of Moffatt’s shooting. The symbolism of ‘Mahuta’ cannot be underestimated. Signifying a kind of sanctioning of the death penalty, Rewi later said it was he who sent the taiaha to Ngatai.<sup>178</sup>

The movement of the taiaha throughout the rohe, handed from chief to chief, is also a reminder that what made the aukati effective was the cohesive and sound organisation of its leadership. In doing so, the Kingitanga leadership worked with the local community leadership, drawing on a mix of historical alliances (such as those displayed much earlier at Mātakitaki and other battles) and practical knowledge of hapū and iwi politics. Ultimately ‘Mahuta’ also became a symbol of peace: its name was changed to ‘Maungarongo’ in recognition of this fact. In 1885, it was handed from Wahanui to government agent George Wilkinson to give to Ballance in a gesture indicating the dissolution of the aukati and the end of violence (see chapter 8).<sup>179</sup>

As far as is known, Moffatt was the last European to be killed in defence of the aukati. Moffatt’s companion, Henare, was let go, so that he could tell the cautionary tale that Moffatt’s death provided to any others who might seek to cross the aukati and enter Te Rohe Pōtae without the appropriate permission. Moffatt experienced both the tolerance that policing of the aukati allowed – living among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori reasonably freely so long as he did not make a nuisance of 176. Transcript 4.1.4, p 263 (Sir Archie Taiaroa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha marae, 27 April 2010).

177. ‘Notes of an Inquiry made by Hon Native Minister at Kihikihi, December 19, 1883’, AJHR, 1886, G–8, p 2; doc A110, p 610.

178. Document A110, p 610; doc A78, p 146.

179. Document A110, p 617.

himself – and the severity – he was stopped, warned both verbally and in writing, and asked to stop breaching the aukati. Although he paid the ultimate price, Moffatt understood that he put his life at risk when he chose not to heed the warnings he received.

Not all killings during this period were connected to breaches of the aukati. The murder of Pākehā farm worker, Edwin Packer, in January 1876 clearly had nothing to do with the aukati and occurred on a farm in Epsom, Auckland. The young man wanted for the murder was Henare Winiata, who had whakapapa links to Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Pare. Winiata fled before Packer's body was discovered, and it was believed that he would run to the King Country, where his father was said to be living.<sup>180</sup> However, Packer's death was certainly exceptional – and led to exceptional treatment of Winiata (see sidebar in section 7.4.4.6.3).

The Kīngitanga implemented the warning system to the best of their ability and only resorted to the death penalty when other options had proved ineffective. They were not necessarily comfortable with implementing the death penalty, even though they consciously chose it. To reduce the number of times this sanction was used, the Kīngitanga reached out to settlers in a series of diplomatic initiatives.<sup>181</sup> In 1881, Tāwhiao visited Alexandra, Mangatāwhiri, and several other Waikato towns, aiming to ease settler fears of the Kīngitanga and build better relations with them. Other strategies that were employed to reduce the risk of conflict included encouraging communities near the aukati to use techniques of passive resistance and encouraging vulnerable communities to move from the northern boundary line to Tāwhiao's settlement at Hikurangi.<sup>182</sup>

Major Mair interpreted the friendship tour as a first step by Tāwhiao towards engagement with the Government. This was reinforced by Tāwhiao's decision at this time to move his own headquarters from Hikurangi to Whatiwhatihoe, on the other side of the Pūniu from Alexandra. For the time being, however, Tāwhiao chose to engage only at a local level and meet no-one more senior than Mair.<sup>183</sup>

In defence of the aukati, the Kīngitanga demonstrated that it was able to effectively govern its territory by controlling who entered and on what terms. Although they sometimes used force to protect the aukati and their mana, the Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori showed restraint when implementing the ultimate penalty. The Kīngitanga preference was a successful district-wide warning system and peaceful diplomacy that both effectively prevented unauthorised entry into the district while simultaneously maintaining a relative peace with Pākehā settlers and authorities.

We now look at how the Crown responded to the enforcement of the aukati.

---

180. Document A78, pp 367–368.

181. Document A78(d), p 4.

182. Document A78(d), p 4. For a full account of these visits, see doc A78, pp 534–535.

183. Document A78, pp 535–536, 543–544.

7.3.4 The formation of Crown policy on the aukati

After enacting the confiscation legislation, the Crown never directly challenged the aukati, but nor did it accept the independence of the people within the aukati. Rather, the Crown regarded Te Rohe Pōtae as an area in which it would one day effectively exercise its sovereignty. From time to time it noted its concern for citizens who ventured across the aukati and issued what might be regarded as the equivalent of modern-day foreign travel warnings against such risky action. It also made several diplomatic overtures towards the Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae leadership, which were attempts to relieve the impasse in which their tense relations existed. Since 1864, the colonial government had complete responsibility for Māori affairs, following the full transfer of responsible government from the imperial authorities. By 1870, it had come to adopt a policy that Te Rohe Pōtae would be treated as an independent territory, until such time that those Māori who resided there could be persuaded (without force) to admit the Crown's authority.

The claimants acknowledged that the Crown initially respected the aukati but maintained that it nonetheless had no intention of sharing any political control, even within a confined area. The Crown, they said, had the opportunity to give effect to the Treaty of Waitangi through section 71 of the 1852 Constitution Act. However, it chose not to do so.<sup>184</sup> They point to the evidence of Crown historian, Dr Donald Loveridge, who noted that the Crown had little or no interest in adopting any scheme which was not clearly under the control of the colonial government.<sup>185</sup>

Crown counsel submitted that the Crown regarded Te Rohe Pōtae as an area 'within which it could not for the time being exercise its authority or enforce colonial law without inviting civil unrest (or worse).'<sup>186</sup> From the 1860s, the Crown sought to establish 'an accommodation' with the Kīngitanga, but it encountered 'stumbling blocks' over the Kīngitanga's claimed sovereign authority over the region, as well as its demand for the return of all confiscated land. 'These were major impediments to both sides settling mutually agreeable terms.'<sup>187</sup> Any serious consideration of establishing Te Rohe Pōtae as a district under section 71 of the Constitution Act was 'quickly superseded by a preference for New Zealand founded institutions.'<sup>188</sup> This was because responsible government was transferred to New Zealand, including formal Ministerial control of Māori policy in 1864. Section 71, the Crown contended, had been intended to 'provide for those Māori outside the effective jurisdiction of provincial and general assemblies to have their own Native districts in which Māori customs and laws were maintained', though only temporarily 'until Māori could take their full place in the political system.'<sup>189</sup>

Crown counsel acknowledged that 'the practical exclusion of most Māori from

---

184. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 6.

185. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 6–7.

186. Submission 3.4.301, p 2.

187. Submission 3.4.301, p 3.

188. Submission 3.4.301, p 19.

189. Submission 3.4.301, p 20.

the settler assemblies had helped contribute to support for the Kīngitanga, which 'wanted a separate government under their own King with nominal supervision of the Crown'. However, in 1868 and 1869, 'the government refused to consider formal recognition of a Kīngitanga district on the basis that the Kīngitanga leaders were facing so many challenges [they] could not exert an authority that could be recognised over the territory'.<sup>190</sup> In practice, Crown counsel said, 'the government followed a policy of not directly challenging the aukati in the period from 1866 to 1883'. Rather, the Crown thought Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would come to see for themselves the benefits of engaging with the government.<sup>191</sup> This view conflicted with the Māori view of Te Rohe Pōtae as an independent territory, unhindered by British law, and subject only to the authority of the Kīngitanga and that of iwi and hapū leaders.

This section examines the formation of Crown policy toward the aukati up to the beginning of sustained negotiations in 1875, but also looks at how the Crown dealt with difficult questions, such as the imposition of death penalties under customary law within the aukati, up to 1882.

7.3.4.1 The Crown's initial response to the aukati

The Crown developed its attitude to the aukati and the territory it defined against a backdrop of changing political circumstances, following the transfer of full authority for Māori affairs to the settler government at the end of 1864. In subsequent years, different Ministers and officials took responsibility for Te Rohe Pōtae, and Native affairs more generally, as ministries were voted into and out of office. War initially continued in other parts of the country. Settlement also expanded in many regions, which assisted in the consolidation of Crown authority.

The Crown came to develop its first understanding of the aukati shortly after the proclamation of the confiscations in Waikato and Taranaki. This was particularly the case in the north of the district, where the confiscation boundary and the aukati coincided along the Pūniu River. In April 1866, Governor Grey travelled to Kāwhia in an effort to meet with Kīngitanga representatives, but accepted it was best not to force a meeting. He later reported to the Secretary of State for the Colonies that 'Rewi had expressed himself as desiring never to see a European face again', noting also that there was a 'line laid down by Rewi', one behind which the Kīngitanga planned to remain in 'complete isolation'.<sup>192</sup> A later report of a hui at Hangatiki in May 1866 confirmed that an aukati had been set in place near Hangatiki 'beyond which no white man is to pass'.<sup>193</sup> Whether or not it was an entirely accurate depiction of how the aukati came to be enforced, the Crown quickly formed an understanding that an aukati had been established, one which would be defended against any further incursions.

---

190. Submission 3.4.301, p 20.

191. Submission 3.4.299, p 18.

192. Grey to Secretary of State for the Colonies, 3 May 1866, GBPP, 1866 [3750], pp 2–3 (IUP, vol 14, pp 758–759); doc A22, pp 211–212, 703.

193. Captain Tisdall to staff adjutant, Waikato force, Hamilton, 21 May 1866; doc A22, p 214.

The Stafford Ministry – which had defeated Weld’s administration in the polls in late 1865 – did not seek to establish a specific response to the aukati, apart from continuing to implement the confiscations that had only recently been enacted. Instead, it developed policies that were generally intended to incorporate Māori into the colonial system of government rather than any specific acknowledgement and provision for Māori authority, particularly for areas such as Te Rohe Pōtae where the Kīngitanga exercised effective control.<sup>194</sup> There was no immediate thought as to whether areas such as Te Rohe Pōtae might receive special consideration – including whether it could be proclaimed as a district under section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852.<sup>195</sup>

Instead, the Government had initiated the revised and expanded Native Land Court under the Native Lands Act 1865. Other Tribunals have consistently found that the court was created primarily with the intention of facilitating the transfer of land to settlers.<sup>196</sup> The Stafford Ministry continued to pass various measures – including the Juries Act 1868, and the Resident Magistrates Act and Native Schools Act in 1867 – that were intended to incorporate Māori within the colonial system.<sup>197</sup> However, in the case of the Juries Act, the Government never implemented the policy.<sup>198</sup>

The Government’s main initiative was to accommodate Māori within the settler Parliament. In 1867, four Māori seats were established – well below the proportion of representation for the Māori population.<sup>199</sup> William Searancke, resident magistrate for the Waikato district, commented in 1868 that Māori in ‘lower’ Waikato were said to have noted their bemusement and indifference to the limited form of representation that had been provided to them.<sup>200</sup> Turning his attention to Te Rohe Pōtae, Searancke observed that the Kīngitanga would eventually ‘tire of their isolated state’ if left alone and seek out communication with the Government.<sup>201</sup> The following year, he claimed to be the first government official to visit Te Rohe Pōtae after the imposition of the aukati, where he attended the Maehe – the annual hui of the Kīngitanga – following the invitation of Tāwhiao’s chief advisor, Tāmaiti

194. Document A78, p 293.

195. Document A78, p 289.

196. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2018), vol 3, p 1009.

197. The Juries Act 1868 allowed Māori ‘whose capability may be certified’ to serve on juries. The Resident Magistrates Act 1867 made it law that summonses and warrants addressed to Māori had to be accompanied with a translation.

198. Document A78, p 294.

199. In 1867, the European population of New Zealand, which was approximately 250,000, had 72 seats – one for every 3,500 people. The Māori population, approximately 50,000, had 4 seats – one for every 12,500 people. Māori would have required 14–16 Māori seats to have the same level of representation: see Rawiri Taonui, ‘Ngā māngai – Māori representation – Effect of Māori seats’, in Te Ara – the Encyclopedia of New Zealand, Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <https://www.teara.govt.nz/en/nga-mangai-maori-representation/page-2>, last updated 15 July 2016.

200. Document A78, p 294.

201. WN Searancke report, 9 March 1868, AJHR 1868 A-4, p 5; doc A78, p 296.

Ngāpora. The latter had by this time changed his name to Manuhiri, to reflect the status of his people now living in exile in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>202</sup>

In June 1868, Governor Bowen (who had recently replaced Grey as governor) set out his preliminary thoughts on the situation to the Colonial Office. He affirmed that the territory would be contained as much as possible, but would otherwise be tolerated – reluctantly – in the hope that it would fail on its own account. War had proved ineffective in achieving the goal of establishing de facto Crown authority throughout the district, but armed force was no longer possible. He noted that there were conflicting views on the appropriate course of action that should now be taken.<sup>203</sup>

Bowen commented on the situation as he understood it in respect of the Kingitanga. Originally, he said, the King movement might have been used as an instrument ‘for elevating the Native race, by the introduction of institutions subordinate to and in harmony with the European Government of the Colony’. One possible view of the situation, he said, was that a ‘Native Province might have been created, to be ruled, like the territories of the semi-independent Rajahs of India, nominally by a great Māori chief, but really by the advice and influence of a British Resident or Commissioner.’<sup>204</sup>

However, Governor Bowen considered that the opportunity for an arrangement of that kind had been lost: Tāwhiao was now ‘surrounded by fierce and bloody fanatics’. In his view, it would be more politic humane to ‘outlive’ the King movement than to ‘suppress’ it by the ‘strong hand’. This was especially so because there were peaceful and civilising influences among the ‘disaffected’ tribes. In addition, Bowen thought it wisest to adopt a defensive position due to the limited number of soldiers then stationed in New Zealand.<sup>205</sup>

Bowen advanced his views further in January 1869. He was now convinced that it was of ‘vital importance’ for the colonial government to ‘come to a peaceful understanding’ with the ‘so-called Māori King’, one that was ‘not inconsistent with the sovereignty of the Queen.’ All opportunities should be taken for opening what may prove a ‘friendly communication with Tāwhiao.’<sup>206</sup>

It was now fully within the realm of the colonial government to decide what course of action to take on the Crown’s behalf. In his response, Native Minister J.C. Richmond assured Bowen that the colonial government would respond ‘in a liberal spirit’ to any offers of peace that Tāwhiao might extend.<sup>207</sup> Bowen also invited Tāwhiao to visit him and Prince Alfred, the Duke of Edinburgh, who was expected in New Zealand in May on New Zealand’s first Royal visit. Bowen

202. Document A78, p 296.

203. Bowen to Duke of Buckingham, 30 June 1868, AJHR, 1868, A-1, pp 76–77; doc A78, pp 297–298.

204. Bowen to Duke of Buckingham, 30 June 1868, AJHR, 1868, A-1, pp 76–77; doc A78, pp 297–298.

205. Bowen to Duke of Buckingham, 30 June 1868, AJHR, 1868, A-1, pp 76–77; doc A78, pp 297–298.

206. ‘Confidential Despatch’, 7 January 1869 referenced in Bowen to Duke of Buckingham, 12 March 1869, AJHR 1869, A-1, p 57.

207. J.C. Richmond to Governor Bowen, 12 March 1869, AJHR, 1869, A-1, p 60; doc A78, p 299.

promised Tāwhiao he would be treated respectfully.<sup>208</sup> Tāwhiao, however, did not meet the Duke as hoped, despite the encouragement of several intermediaries.<sup>209</sup>

It took the new Fox Ministry, formed in June 1869, and in particular the new Native Minister, Donald McLean, to advance matters further. A career public servant, McLean became both Native Minister and Defence Minister. His tenure as Native Minister would have been uninterrupted until his resignation in 1876, were it not for the Fox Ministry losing power for several weeks in September and October 1872. McLean led negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori on behalf of the Crown through much of the 1870s. His preference was not to push Te Rohe Pōtae leaders too aggressively, following the postwar precedent set by both Grey and Bowen. Underlying his approach was a policy of amalgamation by which Māori would be 'fused and blended' into a single general political and legal system.<sup>210</sup>

McLean treated the business of colonisation – which under the Fox Ministry included a massive public works and immigration undertaking – as an opportunity to encourage Māori to participate in the economic prosperity available through the expanded settlement programme. He argued for developing friendlier relations with Māori who were not actively resisting the Crown through greater consultation and inclusion within the machinery of the settler state. By doing so, he hoped to direct Māori energy into the industriousness and progression of the growing nation.<sup>211</sup> McLean theorised that genuine economic and political opportunities, coupled with a measure of coercion and greater provision for Māori needs, would lead to a softening of the attitudes of those who shared the so-called separatist ideals of the Kīngitanga, leaving the Kīngitanga isolated – and weakened – in its political stance.<sup>212</sup> But McLean did not ignore the Kīngitanga or its constituent hapū and iwi. Indeed, he applied his strategy of fostering personal relationships with influential chiefs widely – to chiefs he regarded as friendly, including several Kīngitanga chiefs, Rewi among them.<sup>213</sup>

As Native Minister, McLean sought a cohesive and coordinated approach, managed centrally by his office, in official handling of relations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. In part, that required more careful use of intermediaries, which had previously seemed ad hoc and poorly planned. Some had acted of their own accord, and some with official support (though all appeared to enter the aukati with the appropriate permission). Among those who sought to broker Bowen's invitation to Tāwhiao, for instance, was settler and businessman John Wilson who, under instruction, delivered a letter from Bowen inviting Tāwhiao, Manuhiri, and Rewi to an event at Government House. Another such emissary, Josiah Firth, entered the district without the kind of government official sanction that Wilson had enjoyed. Firth – who later angered Ministers over an agreement to meet Te Kooti

---

208. Document A78, pp 298–299.

209. Document A78, p 300.

210. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 202; doc A78, pp 303–304.

211. Document A78, pp 303–304, 311–313.

212. Document A78, p 311.

213. Document A78, pp 306, 312–313.

– led a small deputation to also persuade Tāwhiao to accept Bowen's invitation.<sup>214</sup> McLean did not completely rule out the go-between role certain individuals could play; indeed, he would employ some of them. But he appreciated the importance of careful management for discussions that, if not handled sensitively, had considerable potential to go quite wrong. Those he took on would have to work to his close instruction.<sup>215</sup>

In August 1869, during a House committee discussion on internal defence, McLean discussed what he described as the 'calamitous state' into which the country had plunged in the previous 12 months. This included the 'great loss of life and property that has taken place', as well as the 'dangerous spirit of fanaticism' which had arisen.<sup>216</sup> He told the committee: 'Notwithstanding many years of Colonial experience, we still seem not to have recognized those national feelings by which the race with whom we have come in contact has been animated'. Commenting on the 1835 declaration of independence, McLean said that a 'race capable of such aspirations was deserving of the highest consideration on the part of any Government'. A fact generally overlooked is that a 'race possessed of such qualities must be naturally jealous of the jurisdiction of a foreign power.'<sup>217</sup>

Echoing Governor Bowen, the Native Minister commented that the combined imperial and colonial forces had failed to establish the Queen's writ 'from end to end of the island'. Despite the troubles that had ensued, McLean said that it was now the 'object of the Government, during the recess, to place itself, as far as possible, in communication with the various tribes through the Northern Island, to see if it is possible to arrive at a settlement of the great leading differences between them and the Europeans.'<sup>218</sup>

McLean noted that it had been suggested that native districts might be formed 'in the government of which the Natives themselves should take a considerable share', adding that the 'Governor has the power to proclaim districts.'<sup>219</sup> McLean (unlike Bowen) made explicit reference to section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act 1852. The section stated:

whereas it may be expedient that the laws, customs, and usages of the aboriginal or Native inhabitants of New Zealand, so far as they are not repugnant to the general principles of humanity, should for the present be maintained for the government of themselves in all relations to and dealings with each other, and that particular districts should be set apart within which such laws, customs, or usages should be so observed.

The power to create such districts resided in 'Her Majesty, by any letters patent to be issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom'.

214. Document A78, pp 301–303.

215. Document A78, pp 295–303.

216. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, pp 202,203; doc A78, p 303.

217. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 202.

218. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 203.

219. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 203; doc A78, p 304.

Dr O'Malley explained that the British Government, which introduced the 1852 legislation, intended the provision for creating native districts to operate in tandem with the provision for offering Māori the franchise in areas where they had become more integrated with the European community. He pointed to the statement of Sir William Molesworth, during the Bill's second reading in the House of Commons, who said that 'New Zealand was to be divided into two parts, an English part, and a native part. Within the English pale, English laws were to be enforced; without the pale, in the native part, native laws and customs were to be maintained by the Governor-in Chief of New Zealand, notwithstanding the repugnancy of any such laws to the laws of England'.<sup>220</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal commented that the power to act under section 71 was officially delegated to the governor in 1858. Governor Browne contemplated its exercise on several occasions in respect of the situation posed by the Kingitanga at that time, but refrained from doing so due to a concern about how finances in those districts might be raised and questions around whether the section allowed Māori in districts to pass new laws.<sup>221</sup> Proposals were made by former chief justice William Martin (who favoured the use of the section) through which additional institutions could be created to give effect to the legislative functions of Māori authorities in Native Districts.<sup>222</sup> Apart from Grey's 'New Institutions', which we discussed in chapter 6, no steps had been taken to implement such potential solutions by the late 1860s. In addition, only a handful of Māori were eligible to vote in general elections. O'Malley commented that 'Māori were thus increasingly subjected to the arbitrary control of a . . . body from which they were excluded'.<sup>223</sup>

In discussing section 71, McLean acknowledged that the governor had the power to proclaim such districts. However, he was of the view that it was now 'too late' to do so.<sup>224</sup> He commented that a major failure of government policy up to that point was the policy of detribalisation, particularly the failure to acknowledge 'that power of chieftainship'. '[O]ur tendency', he said, 'has been too much to break down existing institutions amongst the Natives, instead of aiding and helping those institutions, to the benefit of both races'.<sup>225</sup> He suggested that supporting existing Māori leadership in the future would be a way of overcoming their present difficulties.

The Minister's proposed solution was to support Māori leaders in 'pursuits of industry'. In addition, the Government's policy would be 'non-aggressive'. He explained: 'It is not the intention to advance expeditions into different parts of the country . . . The object is to defend our frontiers – not to recede in the slightest degree'.<sup>226</sup>

---

220. Document A23, p 150.

221. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 227.

222. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 230.

223. Document A23, p 150.

224. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 203; doc A78, p 304.

225. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 204.

226. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, 1869, vol 6, p 205.

7.3.4.2 The opening of dialogue at Te Pahiko, 1869

McLean put these views to the test in meeting with Kingitanga leaders in November 1869 at a hui that was convened inside the aukati, at a small settlement called Te Pahiko.<sup>227</sup> The precipitating subject for the hui was Te Kooti's arrival in the district. The meeting reportedly came about as a result from an invitation from Rewi Maniapoto and Tamati Ngapora. McLean arrived in Alexandra on 4 November, before proceeding on to the residence of Louis Hetet at Ōtorohanga. There, he was met by a Ngāti Maniapoto chief, who escorted him across the aukati line and on to Te Pahiko.<sup>228</sup> Although Tāwhiao was not there, the hui was well attended by many key Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira, including Rewi, Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauauru.<sup>229</sup>

The Government's record of the hui indicates that after the karanga, karakia, and kai, a considerable time elapsed when no words of welcome were offered to McLean. Instead, he moved to the front of the house and said, 'I have for some time been waiting to hear the usual words of salutation to the stranger; but as I am given to understand you wish to depart from your custom, and desire that I should speak first on this occasion, I will do so.' He continued, 'I do not wish to deceive you by talking of peace when we may have discord, but that they had the opportunity to choose between 'good or evil'. McLean acknowledged their effort to remove Te Kooti from the district.<sup>230</sup>

Rewi Maniapoto, who led the negotiations on behalf of the Kingitanga, replied to McLean:

Ko te riri kia mutu . . . ka whitingia te whenua e te ra i runga i ta ratou korero, ka uaina e te ua, a ka tino kaha amuri ake nei te mahana me te maramatanga o te ra.

Mr Meredith provided the following translation:

Anger shall cease. The sun shines over the land with what they have discussed, the rain washes away, and afterwards the sun shall be much more warmer and brighter.<sup>231</sup>

The hui at Te Pahiko continued to hold special importance for Rewi as the occasion when he first promoted the Kingitanga's peace policy directly to the Crown. Later, he recalled that it was at that hui where he first planted a 'tree of peace' – a metaphor of their relationship with the Crown that he returned to in subsequent years.<sup>232</sup> (Grey had in fact introduced a similar metaphor prior to the Waikato war in proposing his 'New Institutions'; it is unclear whether Rewi adopted the 227. According to Donald McLean, Te Pahiko was a small settlement south of Hangatiki, about 7–8 miles from Tokangamutu: AJHR, 1870, A-21, pp 8, 11.

228. 'The Native Minister's Interview with the Leading Waikato Chiefs', AJHR, 1870, A-12, p 1.

229. Document A78, pp 305–306.

230. 'The Native Minister's Interview with the Leading Waikato Chiefs', AJHR, 1870, A-12, p 1.

231. Te Waka Maori, 18 November 1869, p 1; doc A110, p 615.

232. Document A110, p 615.

metaphor in the knowledge that Grey had used it previously, perhaps as a commentary on Grey's decision to go to war.<sup>233</sup>) McLean agreed: there should be peace.

Through the hui, the Kīngitanga leaders agreed terms of conduct for the Crown's pursuit of Te Kooti. Essentially, they pledged neutrality: they would not support Te Kooti and would not act against the Crown. In return, the Crown would respect the aukati and discontinue its pursuit if Te Kooti crossed it. They also agreed that if Te Kooti ceased his military actions, the Crown would stop chasing him.<sup>234</sup> Such an outcome would have made a peaceful retirement for Te Kooti a very real prospect. Although broader issues concerning the relationship between the Crown and the Kīngitanga were left to one side, the hui at least established a platform upon which future negotiations could commence.

McLean's journey to Te Rohe Pōtae, and particularly his meeting with Rewi, had prompted other observations. He noted in his diary the difficulty that Tāwhiao would invariably face in maintaining the support of those hapū and iwi within the aukati. He also recognised Rewi as an influential chief in his own right as well as a Kīngitanga leader. McLean identified Rewi as a potentially 'valuable and powerful ally' of the Government, despite his reputation as having been an instrumental Kīngitanga leader during the Taranaki and Waikato wars.<sup>235</sup> Over coming years, a common theme of official correspondence on Te Rohe Pōtae was that there were increasing divisions within the Kīngitanga, based in part on Rewi's decision to meet with Crown officials separately from Tāwhiao. However, these views tended to obscure the fact that Rewi was representing both the Kīngitanga and the interests of local Māori communities. In doing so, he left broader questions of how the Kīngitanga's authority should be recognised to Tāwhiao to negotiate. This was the case at least until 1882, when renewed Crown efforts to open Te Rohe Pōtae proved more divisive and created a substantial challenge for the Kīngitanga (see section 7.4.4).

7.3.4.3 *The confirmation of Crown policy after Te Pahiko

Following the immediate defusing of the situation with Te Kooti, the Government turned its attention to the policy it intended to adopt in respect of the Kīngitanga. In February 1870, former chief justice Sir William Martin wrote a memorandum to the Government outlining his views on the situation. Martin suggested that there was a significant body of Māori who did not accept colonial rule. If they could be persuaded to accept the Crown's authority, a large step would be taken towards the pacification of the country. He therefore advocated for a 'reasonable arrangement' with Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto, one that would allow them to 'conceive themselves to be acting rather as allies than as subjects.'<sup>236</sup>

Before the Waikato war, Martin had advocated the use of section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act 1852, and for the establishment of additional institutions

233. Document A78, pp 290–291.

234. Document A78, pp 306–307.

235. Document A78, p 222.

236. Martin memorandum, 21 February 1870 (doc A78, pp 308–309).

that would address concerns about the ability of Māori in those districts to pass new laws (see section 7.3.4.1). Now, Martin made a proposal for how Māori in Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could govern themselves without the use of section 71. Instead, he proposed that the Crown, using its legislative powers, provide for the ability of Māori to exercise self-government in the colonial State.

Martin proposed the definition of a district ‘within which the Natives may make rules binding on themselves, for their own Government and good order, to be administered among themselves by such persons and in such way as they may think best.’<sup>237</sup> Provincial council laws would not apply. This would require the leading chiefs of the district and the Government to agree on the territory to which their self-government would apply, which would have the effect of limiting the influence of the Kīngitanga outside of that district. Those chiefs would also need to agree to keep the peace within their district and prevent their people from acting aggressively outside of it. Pākehā could only live among them with their express permission. In addition, Martin suggested that the Government return portions of the confiscated Waikato land. Those who accepted grants for returned confiscated lands would also have to accept that they were to relocate and live under colonial law.

Resistance to Martin’s suggestions was strong. Annotations made on the memorandum show that Ministers viewed the idea of Māori governing themselves in a separate district as ‘pernicious’ and formal recognition of the Kīngitanga as ‘madness.’ They also said that a separate district could not be easily defined, because the territories of Kīngitanga supporters and those of other Māori were intermingled.<sup>238</sup>

The Government’s policy was formalised in a memorandum McLean placed before Cabinet in September 1870.<sup>239</sup> In the memorandum, McLean argued that while a state of peace had largely returned to the North Island, the potential for a resumption of war was ever-present; and, though reconciliation with the Kīngitanga had taken place, it was desirable to achieve a ‘more definite and distinct arrangement.’ Having said this, McLean argued that a ‘policy of non-interference is decidedly the safest.’ Alluding to Martin’s views, McLean discussed the suggestion of defining districts ‘within which the natives can carry out their own laws and usages.’ While he acknowledged this would be the preference for Kīngitanga supporters, the policy of non-interference was the preferable approach. If Kīngitanga supporters maintained ‘a friendly neutrality within certain definite limits, it would be prudent to gratify their desire in this respect’ – that is, to leave them be, but take no action to provide formal recognition.

In coming to this conclusion, McLean referred to the impracticality of the idea that ‘the whole [Māori] race [should] come under the designation of British subjects’ and that, therefore, ‘no exceptional system or laws should prevail under 237. Martin memorandum, 21 February 1870 (doc A78, p 309).

---

238. Document A78, p 309.

239. Document A78, pp 309–310.

the same sovereignty'.<sup>240</sup> This was but 'mere theory', which had two effects, both of which were unhelpful. On the one hand, it had led Europeans 'to expect the enforcement of the Queen's writ throughout the country'; and on the other, it 'exasperat[ed] a large section of the aborigines who emphatically declare national independence'. McLean argued that it was time to acknowledge that while English law prevailed 'within certain settled limits where the large majority are of the European race', the Government was not prepared to 'afford protection to any who may choose to reside beyond the frontiers of territory acquired from the natives'.

Turning to the specific situation presented by the Kingitanga, McLean argued that any terms would need to 'recognise the giving up of offenders guilty of murder'.<sup>241</sup> McLean suggested that it was 'possible by judicious management to glide into a state of peace without any specific terms'. However, he acknowledged the difficulties in determining how to deal with criminals, noting the example of the 'powerful Ngatimaniapoto', who were 'holding aloof until they know the fate of the White Cliff Murderers' (a reference to the killings at Pukearuhe, discussed in section 7.3.3.4). It would be untenable to prolong war for the sake of capturing all criminals, he argued, and 'to forgive them may appear humiliating'. Instead, he suggested that if it were made known that the Government would only pursue the most 'notorious murderers', such as Te Kooti, there would be 'less apprehension' on behalf of Māori who remained 'neutral'.<sup>242</sup>

In any case, he said, tribes who had been in 'hostility' should not be placed in a better position than those who had been 'friendly'. To this end, McLean advocated the importance of holding hui with Māori, and 'instituting a Council of Chiefs, to be elected by the people, who should represent the feelings and wants of their respective tribes'. In addition, he said that '[a] measure providing for local self-Government in certain districts' may be found necessary, but only in districts where Māori 'express a spontaneous desire for it'. Such institutions would be open to Māori and Pākehā and would be of 'an empowering nature', allowing for bylaws to be made for municipal purposes such as roading and fencing.<sup>243</sup> McLean said that Māori should be assured that the Government 'does not propose to revert to a policy of confiscation', though he did not discuss the consequences of previous confiscations, which were obviously going to complicate matters.

Not all his colleagues agreed with McLean, and the Government did not accept his recommendation for the establishment of a council of chiefs. It did, however, accept his proposal to tolerate the aukati, and to foster diplomatic relations with the chiefs of the territory without interfering in their affairs.

---

240. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, McLean papers, MS 32/30, pp 13–16, object #1007778, ATL.

241. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, McLean papers, MS 32/30, pp 16–21, object #1007778, ATL.

242. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, McLean papers, MS 32/30, pp 20–21, object #1007778, ATL.

243. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, McLean papers, MS 32/30, pp 21–23, object #1007778, ATL.

McLean's approach, in short, was to urge incremental steps toward the goal of extending British sovereignty across the Kingitanga territory. This 'gradualism', as Ms Marr called it, fitted well with McLean's focus on tolerating the Kingitanga as an interim measure to maintain peace and avoid war.<sup>244</sup> He reiterated his support for improved consultation with Māori and proposed that no more land confiscations be made. This was consistent with McLean's other proposals. A year earlier, in recommending cooperation with Te Heuheu, McLean had also proposed leniency for Ngāti Tūwharetoa and no confiscation of Taupō lands.<sup>245</sup>

He was also open to doing more to incorporate Māori into the operations of the state at both national and local levels. And though he regarded a degree of local Māori self-government as feasible, any concessions in that direction would be limited and consistent with the overriding policy of amalgamation. Nor would McLean ever formally recognise the aukati as containing an independent territory. Rather, he maintained that what was at issue was less the independence of those who lived beyond the reach of colonisation and more the fact that, in practice, government authority extended only so far. For this reason, he maintained that Pākehā who travelled beyond the limits of government authority did so at their own risk.<sup>246</sup>

7.3.5 The implementation of the Crown's policy, 1870–75

As befitting a 'gradualist' approach, McLean progressively turned to address the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae over the following years, partly in response to events as they arose and partly on his own initiative.

7.3.5.1 The Crown's response to Todd's killing

As McLean acknowledged in his memorandum of September 1870, the Crown would be tested by any killings of Pākehā that occurred inside the aukati. As it turned out, the Crown chose not to pursue the killers. Rather, it prioritised the need to deal with Te Kooti and make sure his activities did not lead to a more general uprising among Kingitanga supporters.<sup>247</sup>

Yet, crime – and murder in particular – that went unpunished by British law would remain a sticking point. McLean wanted an agreement that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would maintain law and order in their district and, specifically, give up anyone who committed murder. He understood, however, that if the Crown was too aggressive in its pursuit of such criminals, or too severe in its punishment, Māori resistance would likely intensify. The policy he came down on in his proposal to cabinet was that the Government should be selective about which offenders it pursued, and how – this would be the best way of gliding into a state of peace without having to offer specific terms.<sup>248</sup>

---

244. Document A78, p 310.

245. Document A78, p 305.

246. Document A78, pp 310–304.

247. Document A78, pp 310–311.

248. Document A78, pp 310–311.

McLean's approach was immediately put to the test when, in November 1870, government surveyor Richard Todd was killed while surveying at Pirongia, having been previously warned off twice (discussed earlier at section 7.3.3.6).<sup>249</sup> The alleged killers, variously named in the press as Tipene and Witiora, and as being of Ngāti Tamainu, sought and were granted sanctuary within the aukati.<sup>250</sup> As at Pukearuhe, the northern confiscation boundary ran through Pirongia, but where exactly was unclear to the locals on the ground. Tākerei Te Rau had warned the Government against surveying in what was considered a sensitive area as early as 1865.<sup>251</sup> The killing of Todd tested that sensitivity.

Kingitanga supporters struggled to balance regret over Todd's death with justification and deep concern for protecting the aukati. Internally, they debated whether or not to give up those responsible to government authorities. Kingitanga leaders also wondered if the Government might respond with military action, utilising the troops that were stationed at Taupō. Both McLean and William Mair – newly appointed as a special agent tasked with addressing issues concerning Te Rohe Pōtae<sup>252</sup> – tried to encourage Rewi to hand over the accused. Rewi had sought a meeting McLean when he visited Alexandra in an attempt to resolve the issue peacefully.<sup>253</sup>

In a confidential memorandum to the premier and Ministers in early March, before he met with Rewi, McLean explained that thought that the Kingitanga would vigorously defend any assertion of colonial government authority over lands within the aukati. He accepted that going after the offenders would seriously risk the already fragile peace, and therefore argued against a military response despite his view that the killing of Todd provided reasonable justification for such action. He also thought friendly and neutral iwi would side with the government if it did come to war. However, he also warned that war would incite a new wave of resistance against the government and stimulate support for the King. An aggressive response might strike a blow against the Kingitanga, but it would also be costly, and 'very much injure' the Government's 'colonizing projects'. He proposed that a strategy of 'judicious management and care' during peace might 'hasten the decay of the King party, more than open hostilities'.<sup>254</sup>

McLean met with Rewi in the hope coming to some 'arrangement', with the goal of encouraging him both to give up the men and to persuade him to abandon the Kingitanga's cause. He told Rewi that the Government was gradually gaining influence over North Island tribes 'and that prolonged isolation on his [Rewi's] part . . .

249. Document A78, pp 111, 314–317.

250. 'Telegraphic: The Waikato Murder', Daily Southern Cross, 30 November 1870, p 2; doc A78, pp 110–111.

251. Document A78, p 315.

252. George Peterson, 'William Gilbert Mair', in An Encyclopaedia of New Zealand, ed AH McLintock, <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/en/1966/mair-william-gilbert>, accessed 5 March 2018.

253. 'McLean report to Premiers and Ministers', 11 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, p 1, object #1008036, ATL; doc A78, p 317.

254. 'McLean to Premier and Ministers', 4 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, pp 3–6, object #1002232, ATL; doc A78, p 320.

was not calculated to add to his own popularity, or advancement'. According to McLean, Rewi wanted peace and was willing to hand over Todd's killers – but he was not willing to break from the Kingitanga or to act without the support of his own people or Tāwhiao. Notwithstanding Rewi's position, McLean's view was that support for the Kingitanga was gradually declining, and that, of its remaining supporters, Rewi had the largest following. With sufficient care, he suggested, 'the alliance of Rewi can be effectually secured; and that thus a powerful supporter would be detached from the King party'.<sup>255</sup> McLean continued:

it is clearly the duty of the Government to use every effort to secure his cooperation. The ice is now broken; and if proper caution be observed, I do not think it will be a difficult matter to gain him over to our side. I would be disposed to treat him liberally; and to confer upon him some authority, within his own district, whenever he openly declares his withdrawal from the Waikatos, and the section of natives antagonistic to Europeans.<sup>256</sup>

While McLean's policy held sway, he was forced to defend it. In Parliament in October 1871, he denied that choosing not to pursue Todd's killers meant that the Government condoned murder. At the 'proper time' and in the right circumstances the colony would be able to seek justice, but in the meantime, he would not agree to any military or police action that might provoke confrontation. Rather, it was important, he argued, that Māori saw the Government would be neither too hasty nor too easily provoked.<sup>257</sup>

7.3.5.2 Parris meets with Wetere, 1871

The Government's non-aggression policy, coupled with an attempt to persuade certain leaders away from the Kingitanga, had been in effect earlier in 1871. This was evident when Taranaki Civil Commissioner Parris visited Wetere in Mōkau on 13 May to discuss peace and partnership between the Crown and the Kingitanga. Wetere had asked Parris to visit on several occasions, in apparent attempts to rehabilitate his reputation after the events at Pukearuhe. Parris had rebuffed these invitations, but now accepted when he heard that Rewi and Tawhana Tikaokao would be there. It was an opportunity to test the Government's strategy: Parris said he would investigate whether a 'large section of the Ngatimaniapoto could be detached from the King party and establish friendly relations with the Government' so that 'a great step would be taken to secure the permanent peace of the North Island'.<sup>258</sup> The Crown viewed this meeting as a 'testing of the waters' to see whether 255. 'McLean to Premier and Ministers', 11 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, pp 2–4, object #1008036, ATL; doc A78, pp 315–318.

256. 'McLean to Premier and Ministers', 11 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, p 4, object #1008036, ATL; doc A78, pp 315–318.

257. McLean, 11 October 1871, NZPD, vol 11, p 225; doc A78, p 321.

258. 'Mr Civil Commissioner Parris' Visit to Mokau', Taranaki Herald, 13 May 1871, p 2; Parris to McLean, 10 May 1871, AJHR, 1871, F-6B, pp 16–17; doc A28, p 173.

progress might be made towards securing a permanent peace.<sup>259</sup> Claimants viewed this as evidence of the Government's 'relentless' pursuit of opportunities to break the aukati and assert its own authority within Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>260</sup>

Parris had an additional interest in visiting at that time, due to the Government's ongoing efforts to re-establish Ngāti Tama on the Poutama lands. Thomas says that in late 1870, after a series of hui with some Ngāti Maniapoto and Kingitanga leaders, a group of Taranaki Māori had received permission to return to Poutama.<sup>261</sup> Though Wetere did not participate in this 'agreement', those Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs who made the arrangement did so on the understanding that they had not given up their ultimate authority over the land. Ngāti Tama, according to Parris, had a different understanding of the arrangement, thinking the territory was restored to them. The proposal, he said, had originated with Wahanui and had received Tāwhiao's support, with no conditions on the return of the land; but Tikaokao had proposed that a condition of their return should be that the people should be 'united as one people'.<sup>262</sup>

Irrespective of the exact arrangement that was envisaged over the land at the time, Parris was concerned that the resettlement would lead to an alliance between Ngāti Tama and the Kingitanga. Parris noted that Ngāti Tama had delayed their return to Poutama because they were wary of the Government's reaction. By February 1871, Thomas says, Parris was concerned that events were moving beyond the Government's control.<sup>263</sup>

In travelling to Mōkau in May 1871, Parris was accompanied by around 30 Taranaki Māori, in the hope that he would be able to settle pro-government groups on the land.<sup>264</sup> Around 60 Mōkau Māori gathered for the hui. Although hospitality ran high, with much ceremony made around Parris' presence, the meeting did not go well. It ended in an abrupt walkout, Parris and his company departing 'without shaking hands or doing anything else which would encourage [Māori] to come in amongst our settlers before the Government has sanctioned such a course.' In response, Mōkau Māori called out 'E horo pea he mataku' ['You have run away because you are afraid'].<sup>265</sup>

The walkout was spurred by several factors. Parris was perturbed by Wetere's 'boasting' manner and his refusal to take responsibility for the Pukearuhe raid. It was not an act of an individual but of the King movement, Wetere claimed. Wetere also made his allegiance to the Kingitanga and the movement's core principles clear. Though Wetere was explicit in his commitment to peace, he also said a lasting peace was dependent on the Crown returning the confiscated lands as had been recently demanded by Rewi and the Kingitanga, and the removal of troops from the area. The conversation was evidently not to Parris' liking, and when Rewi

259. Submission 3.4.296, p 3.

260. Submission 3.4.122, pp 7–8.

261. Document A28, p 177.

262. Document A28, p 178.

263. Document A28, p 178.

264. Document A28, p 173.

265. Document A28, pp 174–175.

and Tikaokao did not arrive, Parris decided that it was not befitting for him to be associating with ‘a lot of the people who committed the massacre at the White Cliffs; and he left.<sup>266</sup>

Oddly, considering the nature and termination of the meeting, Parris reported to the Government that ‘there is a strong desire . . . at present’ among Mōkau Māori to secede from the ‘Tokangamutu league’ [the Kīngitanga]. This, Parris wrote, in addition to the return of Taranaki Māori, would make an ideal buffer between Te Rohe Pōtae and the settled areas of northern Taranaki.<sup>267</sup> While the peace held, Parris was way off the mark: Mōkau Māori made a grand recommitment to the Kīngitanga at the ‘great meeting’ at Tokangamutu in September 1872, and remained important actors in the movement for many years to come. Later, in June 1876, a hui was held at Mōkau River involving between 1,200 and 1,400 Māori, the hosts including Wetere and Te Kooti. The purpose was to strengthen relationships between Ngāti Maniapoto and Taranaki, and to re-establish economic ties (the wheat and pig trade) and personal ties with Pākehā.<sup>268</sup> These were under arrangements authorised by Tāwhiao.

Also during 1871 and 1872, McLean and government agent Samuel Locke met with Ngāti Raukawa leaders on several occasions in the hope of encouraging them to break from the Kīngitanga. Reports from the time suggested that they enjoyed some success among Raukawa communities to the east of the Waikato River, where pressures from settlement were greatest, with some saying they were considering a break from Tāwhiao, and offering their support for a proposed Cambridge–Taupō road. Various factors seem to have influenced these Raukawa decisions, including disputes with Waikato over land and fear that they too might have lands confiscated if they did not accept the Crown’s authority.<sup>269</sup> A settler newspaper, celebrating the apparent success of the Government’s policy, reminded McLean of the proverb ‘Ka mutu te weka i te mahinga e kori hoki atu’ (when the weka has broken loose from the snare, he will not return to it again) – presumably meaning that if groups could be enticed away from the Kīngitanga they would not then return.<sup>270</sup>

7.3.5.3 Attempts to provide measures for tribal self-government

In the meantime, McLean considered how he would implement his approach to the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae alongside broader efforts to engage with Māori elsewhere in the country. His September 1870 memorandum had expressed the view that Māori ought to be provided with limited means of governing their own affairs. Initially, McLean’s intention was to assuage those who were considered neutral or ‘friendly’. However, in late 1871 he had made a similar agreement with Te Urewera leaders: in exchange for peace, he promised that they would be granted measures of self-government.<sup>271</sup> Whether such an approach would apply in Te Rohe Pōtae 266. Parris to McLean, 10 May 1871, AJHR, 1871, F-6B, pp 16–17; doc A28, pp 173–174.

267. Document A28, p 175.

268. Document A26, p 113; doc A28, pp 190–191.

269. Document A12, pp 44–46, 48 (Hearn).

270. Document A12, p 46.

271. Document A78, p 322.

would need to be seen. In early 1872, he said that a settlement with Kīngitanga leaders was imminent – though on what grounds was unclear, given there had been no active engagement with them for some time.<sup>272</sup>

McLean's first attempt at providing Māori with some measures of control was in the Outlying Districts Sale of Spirits Act 1870. McLean said that the Act addressed Māori complaints about the lack of control over the introduction of liquor into their areas, especially where Pākehā settlement was on the increase and public works underway. It was in fact illegal to give or sell liquor to Māori in these districts, but in practice those prohibitions had never been properly enforced. The Act permitted Māori in districts proclaimed by the governor to have some say in the regulation and licensing of liquor for supply to Pākehā. Unsurprisingly, there were limits. No towns or cities could be made subject to the Act, which would only apply in districts where Māori comprised at least two-thirds of the population (such as Raglan, Taupō, and Upper Whanganui, which were districts the governor proclaimed). Furthermore, these liquor control provisions were intended to have a limited life, being available only while the Māori population (in each district) remained high in relation to the settler population.<sup>273</sup> Inside the aukati, neither the Act nor the circumstances that prompted its activation would apply, due to the absence of Pākehā settlement. But concern about liquor control was known to be as much an issue for the Kīngitanga as it was for others.<sup>274</sup>

In early 1872, McLean was prompted to turn his attention to the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae once again. He said he had received a letter from Rewi informing him that Manuhiri and Tāwhiao wanted a meeting with the governor.<sup>275</sup> The Government signalled its opposition to the idea, because the governor (rather than ministers) might be seen as the Government's primary representative for discussions.<sup>276</sup> In a draft memorandum that he planned to send to the governor, McLean explained that visiting the Kīngitanga would be seen as 'an act of humiliation on the part of the Europeans', and that the governor may be met by demands he could not agree to.<sup>277</sup> As it turned out, the governor visited communities on the edges of Te Rohe Pōtae in April and May 1872, but did not meet with Tāwhiao or any other Kīngitanga leaders.<sup>278</sup>

McLean met with unspecified 'Waikato & Maniapoto Chiefs' in mid-June 1872, though it does not seem he met with Tāwhiao. During the meeting, McLean said he acknowledged the Government would not press the construction of roads and other public works, and would consider whether any adjustment could be made to the confiscated lands.<sup>279</sup>

---

272. Document A78, p 322.

273. Document A78, p 313; doc A71, p 202 (Robinson and Christoffel).

274. Document A78, p 313; doc A22, p 195.

275. Document A78, p 322.

276. Document A78, pp 323–324.

277. Draft memorandum, MS-papers-0032-0033, object #1018777, ATL; doc A78, p 325.

278. Document A78, p 323.

279. McLean, telegram to Bowen, 13 June 1872, MS-papers-0032-0075, object #1012695, ATL; doc A78, p 326.

McLean was unable to progress these matters further, however, because – in September 1872 – the Fox ministry was briefly voted out of office. The new Stafford Ministry only held office for a month, but in that time was able to advance considerations for how it would deal with the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae. In October 1872, government agent and land purchase officer James Mackay travelled to a hui at Pekanui near Tokangamutu to conduct discussions with Kingitanga leaders. According to the leaders spoken to by Robert Bush, clerk of the resident magistrate's office at Raglan, Mackay had suggested that a significant portion of the confiscated lands be 'given up to Tawhiao, and that the Government should be asked to recognize his mana over that territory'. The Bay of Plenty civil commissioner, Henry Tacy Clarke, expressed doubt that Mackay had made this proposal, but he reported that it was nonetheless the chiefs' understanding of the discussions that had taken place.<sup>280</sup>

When a new ministry was formed in October 1872 (with George Waterhouse as premier), McLean returned as Native Minister. He continued to advance policies for accommodating Māori into the machinery of state. The Government appointed Mokena Kohere and Wiremu Tako Ngatata as Māori members of the Legislative Council, and Wiremu Katene and Wi Parata, Māori members of the House, were appointed to the Executive Council. Though the extent of the influence of Māori members of the Executive Council is debatable, McLean would have them accompany him on important negotiations with Māori, including the Kingitanga.<sup>281</sup>

Then, in late 1872, McLean first introduced to Parliament his measure for providing Māori with some authority over their own affairs: the Native Councils Bill. The Bill ostensibly set out a framework for implementing several proposals McLean had made since assuming the position of Native Minister. In his September 1870 memorandum, he had suggested neutral and 'friendly' Māori could be further enticed into the ambit of government through the creation of a 'council of chiefs' and by providing for some measure of local self-government over municipal matters such as roading. Then, at the end of 1871, he had made a specific guarantee to Tūhoe that they would be provided measures of authority in their own district. A similar assurance had reportedly been given to Kingitanga leaders by the short-lived Stafford Ministry.<sup>282</sup>

More generally, the Bill was a response to Māori across the North Island who were by that stage advocating for more substantial control of matters affecting their lands. In 1871, the Haultain inquiry had heard evidence from Māori who were dissatisfied with the native land system. They sought a new system in which rūnanga (acting under the supervision of a Māori official) could decide questions of title, to be ratified by the Native Land Court. In 1871 and 1872, officials in a range of districts heard requests from Māori for official recognition of their rūnanga.<sup>283</sup> The question was how far the Bill would go to meet these varied ends.

280. HT Clarke to Native Minister, 30 January 1873, AJHR, 1873, G-1B, p 8; doc A78, p 327.

281. Document A78, pp 328–329.

282. Document A78, p 329.

283. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 309.

When introducing the Bill to Parliament, McLean said that such a measure had been suggested by the governor and was further prompted by the many petitions the Government had received from Māori for 'Committees to manage their own local affairs' (though subject, he claimed, to the direction of resident magistrates).<sup>284</sup> McLean explained that the Bill would only apply in native districts, and only in two or three where requests had been made. Ms Marr said that Wairarapa was one district that was identified as a possible area for establishing a native council, though no other districts were specified.<sup>285</sup>

The Bill provided that Māori, in districts where they were the majority of the population, could apply to the governor for their district to be subject to the Act. A council featuring six to 12 elected members, in conjunction with the resident magistrate, would then be authorised to conduct a range of activities, including passing by-laws on a range of local matters (including, among others, land use, public health, and liquor control<sup>286</sup>), deciding on all applications to the Native Land Court (with their decisions binding on the court by agreement of the parties), and recommending regulations for the future disposition of Māori land.<sup>287</sup>

While the Bill had support from some European members, and strong support from Māori members, others objected on the grounds that it might undermine the work of the Native Land Court and subvert the progress of settlement.<sup>288</sup> McLean insisted that Councils were intended to help the court, 'not to get rid of it'. However, he agreed that the Bill had been introduced too late in the session and it was therefore withdrawn.<sup>289</sup> In anticipation that McLean would press ahead with the Bill in the next parliamentary session, Māori in Tauranga, Rotorua, and Ōpōtiki were reported as having continued to advocate for self-governing institutions throughout 1873.<sup>290</sup>

McLean submitted an amended Native Councils Bill in late 1873. The 1873 version was, however, significantly watered down: it would be more difficult to create a district; councils would lose their jurisdiction once customary title was extinguished; it would no longer be mandatory for title applications to go to the council first; settlers could choose whether they would come under the jurisdiction of council by-laws; and the types of by-law that could be passed were more limited.<sup>291</sup> In introducing the new Bill, McLean insisted that its object was to provide Māori with means to 'govern themselves' in areas such as Te Urewera, the East Coast, and 'some parts of the Waikato'.<sup>292</sup> Much like the previous Bill, the 1873 version was

---

284. McLean, 22 October 1872, NZPD, vol 13, pp 894–895; doc A78, p 329.

285. Document A78, pp 329–330.

286. Native Councils Bill 1872, cl 22; Native Districts Regulation Act 1858.

287. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 310.

288. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 310.

289. McLean, 22 October 1872, NZPD, vol 13, p 899; doc A78, p 331.

290. Document A78, p 331.

291. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 311; doc A78, pp 343–344.

292. McLean, 30 September 1873, NZPD, vol 15, p 1514; doc A78, pp 344–345.

criticised by Pākehā Members of Parliament on the grounds that it moved away from the policy of amalgamation and would undermine the work of the court.<sup>293</sup>

Once again, McLean said he would withdraw the Bill because it was late in the session. Another reason he gave was that the Bill required modifications, given that the new Native Land Act 1873 made some of the provisions in the Bill redundant, though he did not specify which provisions. The Central North Island Tribunal considered it was possibly a reference to the 1873 Act's requirement for district officers to be appointed to do preliminary work for the Native Land Court, which included making preliminary assessments of land interests in areas yet to come before the court.<sup>294</sup> Yet, that Tribunal noted, 'Parliament had enacted the Native Land Act in the knowledge that it was part of a package with the Councils Bill and was still expecting it'.<sup>295</sup>

McLean said he would introduce the Bill again in the next session, but this never happened. Ms Marr considered that reintroducing the Bill in 1874 would have been less 'politically feasible' in the 'cooler political climate towards the Kīngitanga' that ensued in the following months, in the wake of the killing of Timothy Sullivan (see section 7.3.3.6). However, as it was originally conceived, the Bill was intended to provide Māori in other districts with self-government institutions. Some Māori began to express the view that McLean never intended to pass legislation providing them with the ability to control the land titling and alienation process, and only introduced the Native Councils Bills to secure more pernicious land-taking measures.<sup>296</sup>

7.3.5.4 Ongoing attempts to engage with the Kīngitanga

McLean's introduction and withdrawal of successive Native Councils Bills occurred alongside renewed attempts to engage with the Kīngitanga. Late in 1872, McLean had initiated efforts to issue an amnesty, so as to progress a settlement with the Kīngitanga.<sup>297</sup> In March 1873, Governor Bowen, in a farewell speech to Māori at Ngāruawāhia, referred to the anticipated general amnesty for 'past acts of rebellion and other political offences'.<sup>298</sup>

Then, in early 1873, the Luna – carrying McLean, the acting governor, Chief Justice Sir George Arney, and other officials – turned into Kāwhia Harbour to shelter from a storm. On that occasion, local Māori were initially suspicious, but once they realised the visit was unplanned they welcomed those on board and even arranged a meeting at short notice with Arney, McLean, and a party of officials. Among the chiefs present was Tāwhiao's son, Tu Tāwhiao; among the topics discussed, peace and confiscated lands.<sup>299</sup> Towards the end of that year, Tāwhiao

293. Document A78, p 345.

294. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 311.

295. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 312.

296. Document A78, p 345.

297. Document A78, p 333.

298. Bowen, speech in reply to Maori addresses, 11 March 1873, AJHR, 1873, A-1A, p 11.

299. Document A78, p 334.

made his first visit to Alexandra since the war, where he inspected the redoubt and went on the river steamer. The settler press touted the trip as a significant gesture of goodwill, which ‘may be viewed as a burial of the hatchet’. During the following months, it was reported that Tu Tāwhiao continued his father’s peaceful overtures, visiting settlements in southern Waikato.<sup>300</sup>

Any sign of a warming in relationships, however, was put to the test following the killing of Timothy Sullivan (see section 7.3.3.6). According to Ms Marr, McLean’s careful work on amnesties was lost in rising tensions and calls for a return to war. Mackay travelled over the aukati to talk to Rewi and Tāwhiao but was attacked by Waikato Māori. Then, in June 1873, Ngāti Whātua leader Paora Tuhaere travelled to Te Kūiti to discuss Sullivan’s killing with the local leaders, who refused to hand over the main suspect, Purukutu. Arrest warrants were issued for both Purukutu and others thought to share responsibility, but no one was sent over the aukati to pursue them.<sup>301</sup> In July, Chief Justice Arney commented that the Government had done nothing to enforce the warrants that had been issued. Although (as he saw it) Māori in general had come to recognise the colony’s laws, there was ‘one district only in this colony in which a certain section of the natives withdraw themselves from our Courts.’<sup>302</sup>

There was very little engagement between the Government and the Kingitanga in the period immediately following Sullivan’s death. Ms Marr said that public criticism of McLean increased during 1874, following general recognition that the Sullivan killing was not going to result in an arrest.<sup>303</sup> Pressure also came from McLean’s government colleagues, who preferred to strengthen relationships with ‘friendly’ chiefs while sidelining the Kingitanga. No officials attended the Maehe of 1874, and the Government actively discouraged ‘friendly’ Māori from attending.<sup>304</sup>

Ms Marr considered that the cooler political climate of 1874, coupled with the way McLean had attempted to manage the situations that had arisen from the killings of Todd and Sullivan, motivated the Kingitanga leaders to take a different tack. In particular, they saw the need for Tāwhiao to take a more prominent role in the negotiations.<sup>305</sup> As such, preparations began to be made to invite McLean to a hui at Waitomo. This was a significant departure, one that heralded the various rounds of sustained negotiations that were to continue into the mid-1880s.

7.3.6 Treaty analysis and findings: the formation of the aukati and the Crown’s initial response, 1866–74

Here we pause to consider what the various developments up to the commencement of sustained negotiations represent in terms of the claims before us. The Kingitanga’s imposition and early enforcement of the aukati, and the Crown’s

300. Document A78, pp 341–342.

301. Document A78, pp 336–339.

302. Daily Southern Cross, 8 July 1873, p 3; doc A78, p 339.

303. Document A78, p 342.

304. Document A78, pp 342–343.

305. Document A78, pp 346–347.

initial response, set the terms of engagement after the Waikato war. How might we view these engagements as against the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi?

7.3.6.1 *The Treaty of Waitangi and Te Rohe Pōtae after the Waikato war

In chapter 3, we explained our view of the meaning and effect of the Treaty of Waitangi. The essence of the Treaty arises from the reciprocal acknowledgement of Crown and Māori authority: each had their own functions and were to operate together in partnership over matters of intersecting interest. The Crown had a particular obligation to protect the tino rangatiratanga of hapū and iwi in the process of establishing a colony of settlement. This was in effect a guarantee that Māori could maintain their autonomy within the developing colony so long as they chose to do so.

The Treaty was presented to and signed by a number of rangatira from Te Rohe Pōtae as part of the Crown's attempt to gather signatures from hapū and iwi around the country. Through this process, the fact of the Treaty was generally made known to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, even though its terms may not have been well explained, particularly given the differences between the Treaty's two texts.

The Crown in this inquiry maintained that it 'was not legally obliged to seek further consent of the Rohe Pōtae Māori to the exercise of Crown authority in the district after 1840.'<sup>306</sup> However, as we explained in chapter 3, the Treaty required that further agreement be reached about how its terms would be put into practical effect. To this extent, the Crown acknowledged that:

The detail of how [the Crown's] governmental authority was to be exercised, particularly in relation to issues of concern to Māori, was largely left for future debate and discussion. British sovereignty did not preclude all Māori authority or all customary law from having legal status in the new colony. The terms of the Treaty did require the working out of institutional structures and relationships in the new colonial polity.<sup>307</sup>

Counsel did not address to what extent this working out of relationships took place in subsequent years.

In other chapters, we have shown how the Crown did not embark on any substantive discussions with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about how the Treaty would be put into proper effect, but did initiate processes that resulted in land alienation, especially in coastal areas. Often these transactions took place in less than ideal circumstances (see chapters 4 and 5). In response to these and other events, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori put their energies into supporting the Kīngitanga as a means of protecting their land and traditional authority. They were particularly concerned about how Māori in other parts of the country were being denied their rights, particularly in the purchase of land – nothing signalled this to Māori more than the governor's decision to go to war over the disputed Waitara purchase.

---

306. Submission 3.4.312, p 12.

307. Submission 3.4.312, p 1.

As we have found in chapter 6, the Crown's response to the Kīngitanga was to initiate war. The Crown chose not to tolerate a political movement that claimed independence from the colonial State, even though the Kīngitanga professed allegiance to the Queen. The outcome was war, resulting in significant prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, who were among those who had land confiscated. They were forced to host Waikato on their remaining land, placing inevitable strains on relationships as they continued to look to Waikato for leadership of the Kīngitanga. The confiscations also meant that the Crown's territory now demarcated their northern and part of their southern boundaries.

It was in this context that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the Kīngitanga, defined and asserted the aukati.

7.3.6.2 Was the enforcement of the aukati a legitimate action?

The events of the Taranaki and Waikato wars required Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the Kīngitanga, to take the pragmatic step of establishing and defending the aukati to fend off any further incursions into their territory.

In practical terms, the aukati represented an enforcement of mana – absolute rights and authority – that had resided in the hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for many generations. While the aukati that was enforced was reminiscent of other, more traditional aukati, it was undoubtedly unique for the extent of the territory it contained, the circumstances in which it arose, the pressures it was responding to, and the mechanism – the Kīngitanga – by which it was enforced.

We reject the notion that the aukati represented an isolationist policy, in which those in the territory retreated into a sulky disengagement. Rather, as claimant counsel submitted, it was an expression of rangatiratanga.<sup>308</sup> Indeed, it was not long after the end of the Waikato war that the Kīngitanga turned to establish a peaceful relationship with the Crown, while advancing the various policies designed to protect the rights of hapū and iwi.

The long-term viability of the aukati depended on the ability of the Kīngitanga and its constituent communities to maintain it in accordance with tikanga. The Kīngitanga leadership protected the interests of its constituents and maintained a common purpose, through the policy of peace, and the exclusion of unwanted activities in the territory (such as prospecting, mining, surveying, public works, and the leasing and selling of land). These actions were implemented at the annual Maehe, but also through more frequent hui to discuss matters of importance. The Kīngitanga's objectives were maintained by rangatira, who cultivated the active and ongoing support of their communities. Rangatira were also responsible for enforcing the aukati at various points in their respective territories. They successfully restricted the passage of unwanted persons and activities within the bounds of the aukati.

On four occasions, rangatira who were granted authority to manage affairs in their districts determined that maintaining the aukati necessitated the death of those who had transgressed. Lyons, Todd, Sullivan, and Moffatt were all killed for this reason. Previous Tribunals have found that while some killings may be justified in tikanga terms, they were not justified under the Treaty.

---

308. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 2–3.

The Tūranga Tribunal, for example, considered the situation of Te Kooti and the Whakarau, who had attacked the settler community at Matawhero, having been pursued by colonial forces following their return to the mainland from Wharekauri in 1868. In that situation, the Tribunal found that 'the day when tikanga provided a justification for the murder of these innocents had long passed. The Treaty itself signalled an end to these old ways.'<sup>309</sup>

The Ngāti Awa Raupatu Tribunal considered a situation in which Māori had killed several individuals in Ōpōtiki and Whakatāne in 1865. One was alleged to have 'compromised the security of local hapu' and the others to have breached an aukati that had been set in place by Pai Marire adherents. The Tribunal found that the Pai Marire aukati 'had no validity at Maori law', as it was made only at Matata but imposed over a much larger area. Moreover, those who set the aukati did not seek the support of all of those who it covered. Its inclusion of Whakatāne Harbour, for instance, did not have the approval of the Whakatāne people.<sup>310</sup>

In respect of these killings, the Tribunal concluded that because the Treaty allowed the governor to make laws for peace and order for the country as a whole, and because it was necessary there would be a law against murder, those laws necessarily applied to all Māori, 'even in remote places'. It was also known, the Tribunal added, 'that the Governor would take action against the murderers of Europeans no matter where they might be.' Therefore, in the instance they were considering, the Tribunal concluded that the governor was justified in Treaty terms in bringing to trial the perpetrators of the murders, and that he was 'justified in taking action to arrest those suspected of murder whether or not an aukati was in force in accordance with local law'.<sup>311</sup>

We consider that the aukati imposed by the Kingitanga and the way it was enforced present different circumstances. It was not a situation where Māori attacked colonial and Māori communities and Crown officials beyond traditional territory (as in Tūranga); nor was it a situation where individuals had been killed after breaching a broadly defined aukati that lacked local support (as in Ngāti Awa). It was, rather, initiated as a defensive measure in response to the large-scale Crown aggression in the Waikato and Taranaki wars and subsequent confiscations. The only sanctioned violence that occurred was in situations where the aukati had been breached without permission, and then only as the last resort after issuing multiple warnings.

This did not mean the Treaty was suspended. Far from it: the Treaty required both parties to work cooperatively to bring its terms into practical effect. But events had transpired to mean that the discussions required for this to happen had yet to occur, and war and confiscation had now put a functioning Treaty

---

309. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua: The Report on the Turanganui a Kiwa Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), pp 215–216.

310. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngati Awa Raupatu Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1999), p74.

311. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngati Awa Raupatu Report, p127.

relationship far beyond immediate reach. In these circumstances, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were entitled to maintain the aukati, and their tino rangatiratanga, while they sought to establish how the terms of the Treaty could be brought into practical effect in the district through negotiations with the Crown. This is what they attempted to do following the opening of dialogue in 1869 and in response to those killings that did occur after the aukati had been breached.

The attempt by the local leaders to manage the situation with Moffatt suggests that there were opportunities for the Crown and the Kīngitanga to have established means by which such incidents could be handled short of violence. However, the Crown did not seek out a system by which such incidents could be managed while the aukati was enforced. The policy proposed by McLean, and adopted by the Crown, was only to pursue the most 'notorious' killers.<sup>312</sup> The Crown's response to Sullivan's killing in 1873 indicated to the Kīngitanga that its interest was in capturing the killers, rather than discussing what should happen with those who had entered the aukati unauthorised. The Government only went so far as issuing warnings against travel in the region and did not take more active steps to prevent encroachments. Thus, in a period when it was unclear whether or how the Crown was prepared to recognise the Kīngitanga, the Kīngitanga was left to manage the situation as best it could, which required enforcing the aukati in the manner it did – in accordance with tikanga and with the protection of its constituent communities at front of mind.

The clear exception was the Pukearuhe killings. We do not consider the attack on the redoubt, including the killing of civilians, in the same light as the four deaths above. Those involved in the attack may have had legitimate reasons: the redoubt was located on land in which Mōkau Māori considered they had interests, and the redoubt itself symbolised the Crown's taking of the land; more immediately, they had concerns about the return of Ngāti Tama to the north of the redoubt. However, the attack was in breach of the Kīngitanga's own policy that no hostilities would occur outside of the aukati. Māori at the time understood Pukearuhe to lie within Crown territory at the confiscation line. In addition, the regret and remorse shown by Kīngitanga leaders at the time of the Pukearuhe killings indicates that they too did not consider the killings to be a legitimate enforcement of the aukati.

However, by establishing and enforcing the aukati, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were asserting their right of tino rangatiratanga guaranteed to them under article 2 of the Treaty of Waitangi. These were legitimate actions for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Kīngitanga to take to protect their territories and authority. The establishment of the aukati was a response to Crown aggression during the Waikato war, and while the Treaty required a working out of relationships, the defence of Te Rohe Pōtae from uncontrolled encroachment was necessary until circumstances allowed the parties to come together and discuss how the Treaty could be brought into practical effect.

---

312. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, MS papers-0032-0030, pp 16-21, object #1007778, ATL.

The legitimacy of the aukati's enforcement was underscored by the fact that – not long after it was established – the Kīngitanga proclaimed that peace would prevail within Te Rohe Pōtae and that it would not engage in or condone any violent actions outside of the aukati. Although Tāwhiao was initially reluctant to engage directly with the Crown, Kīngitanga leaders sought out and established peace, a matter that was achieved at Te Pahiko in 1869. Thus, in enforcing the aukati while implementing a wide-ranging peace policy, the Kīngitanga created the conditions upon which it could safely negotiate with the Crown, firstly to resolve grievances that had arisen from the Waikato war and, secondly, to bring the Treaty of Waitangi's guarantees into proper effect over the lands that remained in Māori ownership.

7.3.6.3 What did the Crown do to establish a resolution with the Kīngitanga?

This issue raises further questions: did the Crown take sufficient steps to bring about a mutually agreed resolution in the immediate aftermath of the wars, particularly after peaceful relations were established in 1869? Could the Crown have done more in Treaty terms to accommodate the Kīngitanga? Or were the circumstances created by war and confiscation too much for even the Crown to overcome so soon after they had occurred?

7.3.6.3.1 SECTION 71 OF THE NEW ZEALAND CONSTITUTION ACT 1852

The claimants put it to us that the Crown could have established Te Rohe Pōtae as a 'native district' under section 71 of the 1852 Constitution Act, but chose not to do so because it could not contemplate sharing any form of authority with the Kīngitanga.<sup>313</sup>

In the Crown's view, however, these districts, as envisaged under the Act, were only ever intended to be temporary in nature, and until such a time that Māori could 'take their full place in the political system.' According to Crown counsel, section 71 provided for the creation of districts that were 'outside the effective jurisdiction of provincial and general assemblies,' where Māori could maintain their customs and laws. Thus, the Crown submitted, the creation of such a district was not suitable for the circumstances of the Kīngitanga, which wanted 'recognition of its own territory where its own laws and customs could be maintained into the future.' The other obstacle to formal recognition of Te Rohe Pōtae as a district under section 71, the Crown submitted, was that the transfer of responsible government to the colony had nearly been completed by the late 1860s, following an 1857 amendment to the Constitution Act.<sup>314</sup>

Although counsel did not expand on this point, we take the Crown to be saying that the 1857 amendment meant that it was no longer possible to declare districts that would be outside the effective jurisdiction of provincial and general assemblies; and that this was because the imperial authorities had empowered the

---

313. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 6.

314. Submission 3.4.301, pp 20–21.

colonial government to be fully responsible for all affairs conducted throughout all territories, irrespective of whether the Crown exercised substantive control.

It is not clear to us how or why the 1857 amendment or the transfer of responsible government prevented the use of section 71. The main effect of the 1857 amendment was to allow the General Assembly to ‘alter, suspend, or repeal’ all but 21 sections of the Act.<sup>315</sup> Section 71 was among those sections that the General Assembly was expressly forbidden to amend.

Indeed, as the Central North Island Tribunal concluded, though the section was somewhat of an anomaly after the grant of full responsible government, because it provided for Māori to exercise power independently of the New Zealand Parliament, it remained a constitutional possibility:

Until 1892, when the British Parliament amended the Act, the British Government could advise the Queen to issue Letters Patent establishing a Native District, or to delegate such a power to the Governor in New Zealand. After 1892, when the section authorising delegation to the Governor was removed, the New Zealand Government could still recommend the Secretary of State to exercise this power.<sup>316</sup>

The Tribunal noted the view of constitutional lawyer FM Brookfield that responsible government in New Zealand did not end the ability of the British authorities to carry out section 71.<sup>317</sup>

Thus, it remained within the discretion of the governor to create native districts under section 71, and the amendments to the imperial legislation that allowed the transfer of responsibility to the colonial government expressly retained the governor’s ability to do so. McLean certainly thought that the creation of such districts remained a possibility when he commented on the provision in Parliament in 1869.<sup>318</sup> Had the imperial legislature intended to provide the colonial legislature with the ability to amend that part of the constitution, or had it intended to do away with it altogether, it could have done so. Instead, the section remained on the books, available for use should the governor or imperial authorities consider it appropriate. Indeed, the section was not repealed until the Constitution Act 1986, which repealed its 1852 predecessor in full.<sup>319</sup> Nor did the section necessarily prevent the districts from operating on a permanent basis. The Central North Island Tribunal cited Professor Brookfield as saying that the section specified no time restriction.<sup>320</sup> Thus, there was nothing to prevent the Government from using the section for the purposes of allowing the Kingitanga to exercise authority over lands remaining in Māori ownership into the future.

---

315. New Zealand Constitution Amendment Act 1857, s 2.

316. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 334.

317. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 334–335.

318. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, vol 6, p 203.

319. Constitution Act 1986, s 26(1)(a).

320. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 227, 335.

A potentially more limiting factor was whether Māori in such districts could pass new laws. On this point, the Central North Island Tribunal also cited Brookfield to say that there was nothing to prevent this from happening.<sup>321</sup> However, the lack of a legislative function was considered a serious obstacle by the likes of Governor Browne. In response to Browne's concern, former Chief Justice William Martin in 1861 advocated for the addition of special legislative functions, hoping to win support for the idea of creating a native district.<sup>322</sup>

While there had been some limited acceptance among both colonial and imperial authorities about the need to give effect to Māori authority before the war, including the use of section 71, the climate of opinion in government circles did certainly change after the end of the war and the grant of full responsible government. The concern remained that Māori in these districts would be limited in their ability to develop new laws to meet new circumstances. Even Sir William Martin, previously a staunch proponent of implementing section 71, abandoned the idea. Instead, Martin promoted new legislation that provided for the exercise of Māori authority within Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>323</sup> Indeed, as Martin's response indicated, any genuine concerns about how the section could have been implemented after the transfer of responsible government could have been overcome through the colonial government's use of its legislative powers providing other means of recognition.

Both Bowen and McLean were of the view that it was 'too late' to take any action of that kind – the question was whether the Crown could devise a reasonable means by which the Kīngitanga could be accommodated in the new circumstances of the colony; or whether the colonial Ministers should defer any action in the hope that the Kīngitanga would fail.

7.3.6.3.2 OTHER MEANS OF PROVIDING FOR KĪNGITANGA AUTHORITY

Bowen suggested that some form of constructive accommodation with the Kīngitanga could be reached. McLean's view was somewhat different. The key cause of trouble in his view was the failure to acknowledge 'that power of chieftainship'.<sup>324</sup> McLean formalised his policy over the course of a year, in which time the situation with Titokowaru was defused and McLean had established initial peaceful relations with Kīngitanga leaders, in which they agreed on how to approach the situation with Te Kooti.

Crown counsel submitted that the government 'refused to consider formal recognition of a Kīngitanga district on the basis that the Kīngitanga leaders were facing so many challenges [they] could not exert an authority that could be recognised over the territory'.<sup>325</sup> The Crown did not point us to specific instances that would

321. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 227.

322. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 230.

323. Document A78, pp 308–309; Martin memorandum, 21 February 1870, MS-papers-0032–0030, object #1015647, ATL.

324. McLean, 3 August 1869, NZPD, vol 6, p 204.

325. Submission 3.4.301, p 20.

demonstrate this was the case. In our view, the evidence shows that although the aukati was ‘more like zones’ in its eastern areas, and subject to change according to circumstances and changing events, there was a core Kīngitanga territory that was protected by what Ms Marr described as the ‘inner aukati’ (see section 7.3.2.1). Those areas within the ‘inner aukati’ that had seen the most disruption in the late 1860s – at Mōkau and Kāwhia – had by the early 1870s seen attempts at reunification under Kīngitanga authority (see section 7.3.5.2). The challenges that were being faced were in eastern territories as land increasingly came before the newly established Native Land Court. These challenges did not, at least by the mid-1870s, prevent the Kīngitanga from asserting its authority over the core territory.

Certainly, Martin did not see challenges to the Kīngitanga territory as obstacles to making formal provision for the exercise of Māori authority in Te Rohe Pōtae. Martin went even further: the establishment of such a district was both possible and necessary. The Government’s rejection of Martin’s proposal was a significant missed opportunity, given the discussions that later occurred between the Crown and the Kīngitanga, and later still with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

The Crown rejected the claimants’ contention that it maintained a policy of ‘divide and rule’ during this period, seeking to draw Ngāti Maniapoto away from the Kīngitanga. There were, however, clear elements of this thinking in McLean’s policy statements. He hoped to achieve with the Kīngitanga without offering terms or any formal recognition for the King’s authority. Yet he also hoped to persuade ‘friendly’ Māori communities away from the Kīngitanga’s ambit of authority by offering some degree of recognition of their authority through membership of a council of chiefs and provision of a limited measure of local self-government.<sup>326</sup>

In responding to Todd’s death in November 1870, McLean revealed that he regarded Rewi Maniapoto as one of the potentially ‘friendly’ chiefs who could be drawn away from the Kīngitanga if the Government ‘treated him liberally’. This, McLean suggested, would include recognising Rewi’s authority, but only if he split from Tāwhiao. McLean regarded Rewi as the Kīngitanga’s most powerful supporter, and therefore believed his defection would significantly weaken Tāwhiao’s influence.<sup>327</sup> Although McLean’s assessments ultimately proved unfounded, they nonetheless indicate a willingness to take advantage of Rewi’s desire for peace and willingness to negotiate (as discussed in section 7.3.5.1).

Parris reflected the Government’s thinking in his efforts to meet with Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs in the same year, and to resettle Ngāti Tama on the Poutama lands (see section 7.3.5.2). Neither McLean’s nor Parris’s efforts were successful, however, and they were not pursued with any great commitment, the Government instead reverting to maintain McLean’s ‘gradualist approach’.

---

326. McLean to Cabinet, 16 September 1870, McLean papers, MS 32/30, pp 21–23, object #1007778, ATL; McLean to Premier and Ministers, 11 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, pp 2–4, object #1008036, ATL.

327. McLean to Premier and Ministers, 11 March 1871, McLean papers, MS 32/33, pp 2–4, object #1008036, ATL.

Underlying the Government's policies and approaches was the same set of concerns the Crown held before the war: to the Crown, the Kīngitanga represented a challenge to its exercise of sovereignty in the district, and there was a fear that it harboured extremist elements who might prompt a return to war. As much as the discussion at Te Pahiko had helped defuse any immediate doubts the Crown might have had about the Kīngitanga's peaceful intentions, so long as the Kīngitanga continued to assert an authority separate from the colonial government the Crown would always see an obstacle to a durable settlement.

7.3.6.3.3 THE NATIVE COUNCILS BILLS

By 1872, the Crown was facing calls from Māori in many districts for recognition of their rights to self-determination and self-government. McLean responded to these calls by introducing the Native Councils Bills of 1872 and 1873. Although he had previously written of his wish to entice 'friendly' Māori away from the Kīngitanga by offering them a measure of local self-government, the evidence we have seen (discussed in sections 7.3.5.2 and 7.3.5.3) does not indicate that these Bills were specifically designed to achieve that end. Rather, they reflected the broader pressures he faced from Māori leaders to make some provision for tribal self-government.

The Central North Island Tribunal found that the Bill could have been used to establish autonomous tribal councils 'with state-sanctioned powers of self-government', which could have made a significant difference to Māori communities.<sup>328</sup> While we acknowledge that conclusion, we also note that the Crown and the Kīngitanga were only beginning to explore means by which they might secure peace and establish a cooperative relationship. They had not entered meaningful negotiations to determine how Crown and Kīngitanga authority might co-exist. The Native Councils regime was a Crown attempt to respond to Māori calls for greater self-government. It would have been certainly a considerable improvement on existing institutional arrangements, but we cannot know for certain whether the institutional arrangements it envisaged were ones that Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would have regarded as sufficient for their territories. Further negotiation would have been required to determine that. At the very least, McLean's introduction of the Bill demonstrated that the Crown did envisage a need to provide Māori communities with more meaningful measures of self-government.

The Central North Island Tribunal also found that the Bill 'could have empowered tribal communities to avert many of the worst aspects' of the Native Land Court, and the Crown's failure to enact it was a significant missed opportunity to address the reasonably held concerns Māori across New Zealand held about the native land system.<sup>329</sup> We agree with this conclusion. The consequences of this failure had significant ramifications for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Without any institution such as the Native Councils in place, the 1873 version of the Native Land Act operated without any significant protections for Māori. As we will discuss below

---

328. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 312.

329. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 312.

(see section 7.4) and again in chapter 10, Māori in surrounding districts and even within Te Rohe Pōtae were compelled to bring their land to the court to protect their interests. This placed increasing strains on the Kīngitanga alliance.

7.3.6.4 *The need for meaningful negotiation

There were, then, a range of options open to the Crown as it turned its attention to the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae after the Taranaki and Waikato wars. Dialogue had been established in 1869, with further opportunities for discussions. Crown counsel argued that the Crown preferred to establish ‘New Zealand founded institutions’ when considering the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae, rather than pursuing options such as creating a ‘Native District’.<sup>330</sup> However, and despite multiple options being raised and discussed, the Crown chose to adopt none of them.

McLean was willing to entertain a degree of tribal self-government nationwide, and to acknowledge Māori concerns about the Court, but could not win the support of his Government. With respect to the Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae, the Government’s preference was simply to ‘glide into a state of peace’, without taking any specific steps other than choosing not to interfere in the district’s affairs. The Crown’s policy towards this district involved an active decision not to recognise the authority of the Kīngitanga, which the Government continued to see as a threat to its own authority, and which McLean hoped ultimately to undermine by encouraging iwi leaders to split from Tāwhiao. Because it was predicated on the eventual demise of the Kīngitanga, McLean’s policy, adopted by the Crown, was inconsistent with the Treaty principles of partnership and mutual benefit.

Notwithstanding the Crown’s reluctance to recognise the King’s authority, opportunities remained for the Crown and the district’s leaders to work towards mutually acceptable arrangements. While its policy was inconsistent with the Treaty, the Crown had made no final decisions, and, despite the pressures they faced and the Crown’s lack of support, Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders continued to exercise authority within the aukati. In the years immediately after the establishment of peace at Te Pahiko both sides had proceeded carefully in their relations with each other.

Nonetheless, by 1875 it was becoming apparent to both parties that dialogue was needed. The Government recognised that it would need to take active steps to reach an accommodation with the Kīngitanga – it could not simply avoid the issue and wait for the Kīngitanga to fail, as McLean had previously hoped. Similarly, Tāwhiao saw that the situation required his active involvement. Some form of mutual accommodation would be needed to bring the terms of the Treaty of Waitangi into proper effect in Te Rohe Pōtae. As we will see, Tāwhiao and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would seek the return of confiscated lands, and Crown recognition of their mana. How exactly the Kīngitanga might be accommodated, and how it might accommodate the exercise of Crown authority within the aukati, would be matters for discussion. This was what was needed to give proper effect to the terms and guarantees of the Treaty in Te Rohe Pōtae.

---

330. Submission 3.4.301, p 20.

7.4 NEGOTIATIONS, 1875–EARLY 1883

From 1875, the Crown and the Kīngitanga entered into more sustained engagements over how to achieve a way of working together and to resolve the Kīngitanga's grievances that had arisen from the Waikato war. This occurred in three main phases of negotiation, in which a succession of government administrations attempted to engage with the Kīngitanga. From 1875, the first set of negotiations was led by Native Minister Donald McLean; after McLean fell ill and resigned in December 1876, they were briefly taken over by Premier Daniel Pollen. The second phase began after the Pollen administration was voted out of office, when the new Premier Sir George Grey and Native Minister John Sheehan took over. Their negotiations, however, collapsed following a hui at Te Kōpua in May 1879, and they were then voted out of office. Finally, after a period of hiatus, negotiations were resumed by John Bryce, who was to hold the position of Native Minister in a succession of ministries through the early 1880s.

Through these negotiations the parties managed to agree on some issues, but entrenched disagreement on key issues remained. In particular, the Crown did not accept the Kīngitanga's demand for the return of confiscated land or the potential role of King Tāwhiao in the administration of the land that remained in Kīngitanga control. Throughout this period, Rewi Maniapoto and Wahanui Huatare took an increasingly prominent role in the negotiations, where they were able to voice their concerns about Crown activities that increasingly pushed at the aukati, such as land purchasing and public works, as well as the ongoing work of the Native Land Court in surrounding districts.

The claimants maintained that the Crown's primary purpose during this period was to create a divide between Ngāti Maniapoto and the Kīngitanga, so as to undermine the strength and unity of the Kīngitanga alliance.<sup>331</sup> Despite such pressures, they submitted, Ngāti Maniapoto remained supportive of Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga, as indicated by their ongoing protection of them.<sup>332</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa submitted that several opportunities arose for the Crown to recognise the Kīngitanga, particularly in 1882, when Tāwhiao 'appeared willing to compromise in accepting the Crown's sovereignty, provided that Māori tino rangatira-tanga would be provided for in the form of self-governance.'<sup>333</sup>

The Crown submitted that a wide range of engagements with Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders during this period of negotiations 'should not be interpreted as constituting a "divide and rule" policy.'<sup>334</sup> The Crown acknowledged that it 'perceived the Kīngitanga as a challenge to the Queen's sovereignty and it sought to persuade all Rohe Pōtae Māori to place themselves under the authority of the Crown. As such, it did not recognise the Māori King as having any kind of sovereign authority.'<sup>335</sup> However, the Crown also submitted that this 'did not constitute

---

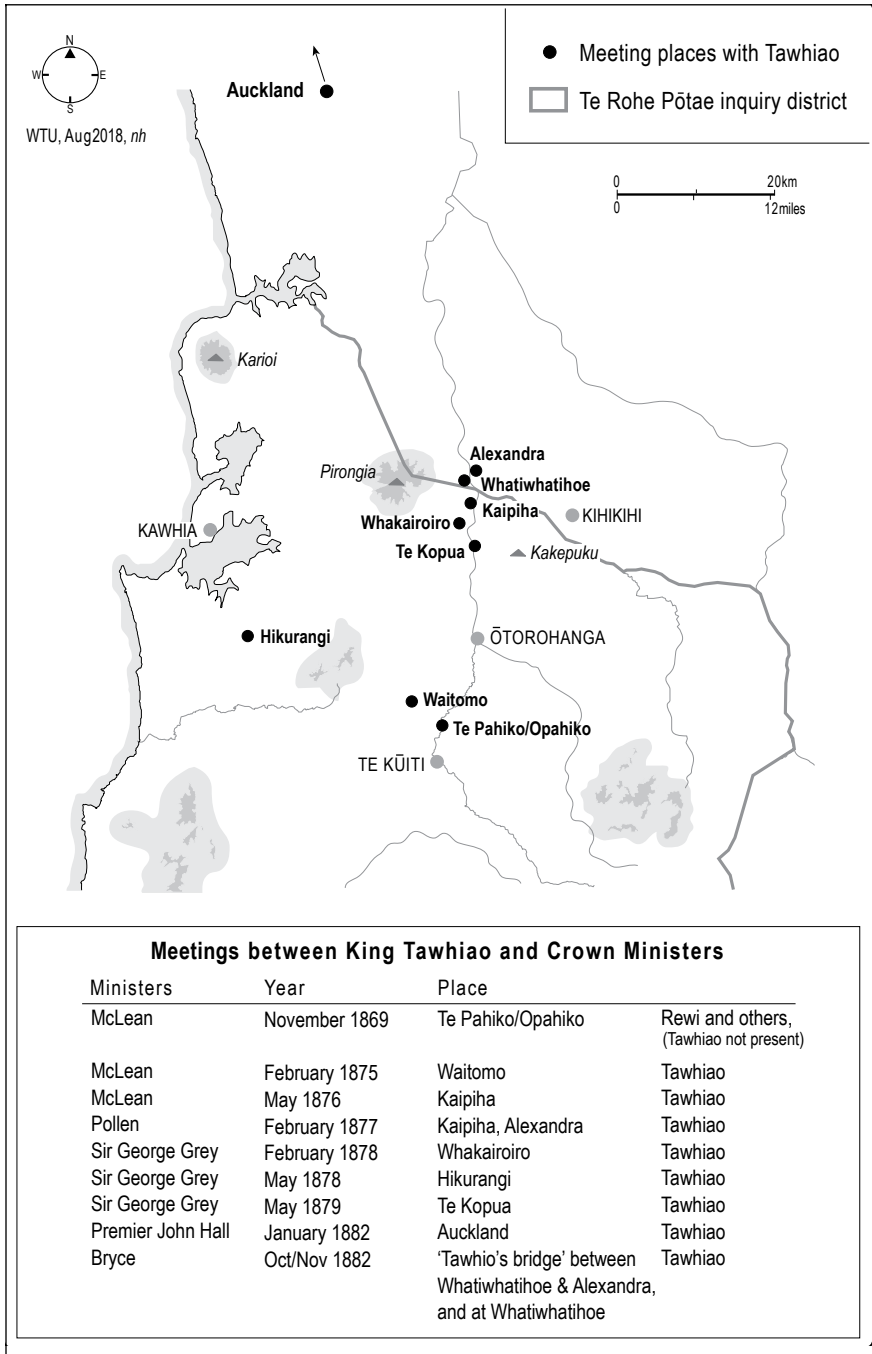

331. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 7; submission 3.4.281, pp 12, 26.

332. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 7.

333. Submission 3.4.281, p 25.

334. Submission 3.4.301, p 9.

335. Submission 3.4.301, p 23.

Map 7.1: Meetings between King Tawhiao and Crown Ministers, 1869–82

the undermining of the traditional authority of Ngāti Maniapoto and Kingitanga leaders', as it sought to recognise 'their authority as influential chiefs'.<sup>336</sup> The Crown considered that Bryce's proposals to the Kingitanga in 1882 were 'made on the essential condition that Tāwhiao and his supporters accept the sovereignty of the Queen and her laws'. The Crown did not accept that Bryce's actions constituted a 'breach of good faith', because they represented the Government's 'serious intentions about asserting the Crown's sovereignty, and to exercise the authority of the Crown and Parliament inside the aukati'.<sup>337</sup>

The issue for us to address in this section, therefore, is whether the Crown took sufficient and appropriate action to bring about a resolution through the negotiations that proceeded from 1875 until early 1883. At that time, Tāwhiao conducted his last negotiation with the Crown, and the Crown issued an amnesty to those who had participated in the war – actions which significantly changed the basis on which subsequent negotiations occurred.

7.4.1 Negotiations with McLean and Pollen

Underlying the Government's approach to the negotiations from 1875 onwards was a renewed focus on opening Te Rohe Pōtae. A significant factor in the Crown's approach was the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.

Julius Vogel, who had been premier since 1873 and colonial treasurer before that, had ushered in a programme of immigration and extensive public works, the latter funded through borrowing, of which the expansion of railways was the centrepiece. Under his scheme, public railways increased dramatically throughout the 1870s from 76 kilometres of open line to 1,828 kilometres by 1880.<sup>338</sup> However, during that decade much of the expansion in public works was focused on the South Island, including more than three-quarters of New Zealand's operational rail. Meanwhile, settler pressure mounted to promote more rail for the North Island, where the European population had practically doubled from just under 100,000 in 1871 to almost 200,000 in 1881.<sup>339</sup> The provinces neighbouring Te Rohe Pōtae reflected that growth: the European population of Taranaki province tripled between 1871 and 1881 (from 4,480 to 14,858), while Auckland's more than doubled (from 62,335 to 99,451, roughly half of the total North Island population).<sup>340</sup> By contrast the national Māori population, which had been overtaken by the settler population in 1858, was declining, both proportionally as a total of New Zealand's and in real terms.<sup>341</sup>

---

336. Submission 3.4.301, pp 23–24.

337. Submission 3.4.301, p 15.

338. Document A20, p 24.

339. Document A20, p 34.

340. Document A20, p 34.

341. Claudia Orange, 'Treaty of Waitangi – Dishonouring the Treaty – 1860 to 1880', Te Ara – the Encyclopedia of New Zealand, <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/en/graph/36364/maori-and-european-population-numbers-1840-1881> (accessed 8 May 2018).

Construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway was central to the post-war push to reboot the economy and restore the confidence of the rapidly increasing settler population. The programme of public works and immigration signalled a recommencement of what Premier Fox described as ‘the great work of colonizing New Zealand’. The ‘object of the government’s proposals’ he said, was ‘if possible, to re-illuminate that sacred fire.’<sup>342</sup> Nor was the relationship between the Government’s colonisation project and its goal of overpowering Māori lost on commentators at the time. The New Zealand Herald put it bluntly:

Our business now is to conquer the native difficulty by the arts of peace; by piercing the interior of the country with roads; by attracting population by liberal land laws, especially suited to the requirements of the North Island, and so securing the utmost facility of locomotion on the one hand, and a large annual increase to the white population on the other. Attention to these two points is the main business of those who seek to end this native difficulty which has been the great curse of the colony.<sup>343</sup>

In 1874, the chief engineer, John Carruthers, set out preliminary route considerations. He reported on four possibilities; three ran west of Lake Taupō and were not in fact accessible at that time because they were well within the ‘King’s Country’, which remained closed to Pākehā. The fourth route ran east of Taupō, but while possible was deemed undesirable because it would require a considerable length of line and complicated engineering in order to cross the eastern central plateau. According to Carruthers, ‘if the country on the West Coast were open to survey’ a western route could be ascertained and would be desirable.<sup>344</sup>

With the most suitable of the proposed routes running through Te Rohe Pōtae, the need for the Crown to negotiate entry into the territory was made clear. Pressure to investigate proposed routes mounted as the railway line drew nearer to the aukati, opening for traffic to Ngāruawāhia in 1877, and to Te Awamutu in May 1880.<sup>345</sup>

7.4.1.1 The Waitomo hui, February 1875

The first sustained discussion for terms of settlement commenced at Waitomo in February 1875, following Tāwhiao’s invitation to McLean earlier in the year.

The Waitomo hui was facilitated by Wiremu Te Wheoro, who arrived as a member of McLean’s party. Te Wheoro had become distant from the Kīngitanga leadership in the lead-up to the Waikato war when he supported the building of a fortified constabulary at Te Kohokohe, near Meremere. During the war, he had been a guide in the employ of General Duncan Cameron. After the war, he had acted as an intermediary between the Kīngitanga and the Crown, including attempting to 342. Fox, 13 July 1870, NZPD, vol 7, p 395; doc A20, p 22.

343. ‘September Agenda’, New Zealand Herald, 27 July 1870, p 3; doc A20, p 22.

344. ‘Public Works Statement, by the Minister for Public Works, the Hon. Edward Richardson’, AJHR, 1874, E-3, pp 58–59.

345. Document A20, pp 36, 44.

arrange a meeting between Tāwhiao and the Duke of Edinburgh in 1869.<sup>346</sup> In 1873, he was appointed a major in the colonial forces, partly in response to settler nervousness in the lower Waikato after Te Kooti's decision to reside at Tokangamutu.<sup>347</sup> At the time of the Waitomo hui, he had become a key agent in the efforts of the Government to re-engage with the Kingitanga.

The hui was the first time since before the Waikato war that Tāwhiao met in person with a government Minister, rather than his usual approach of working through advisors or deputies. The hui – conducted over two days in early February 1875 – offered an opportunity for each party to make their position plain.

Rewi remained absent from the hui, which Ms Marr argued may have been so that McLean was under no illusions that he needed to conduct negotiations with Tāwhiao.<sup>348</sup> Instead, during this period, he visited Māori communities in the Bay of Plenty (see section 7.3.3.3). During that tour, Rewi was reported to have spoken in favour of the return of confiscated lands, about which he was personally concerned, having interests in lands north of Pūniū, including at Kihikihi where he lived. At one of the hui he said:

Ka maha nga Kawana me nga Minita Maori, me etahi Apiha i ki atu ai au, kaore he tangata o te Maungarongo kia au, me hohou e ratou te rongo ki te Whenua, ara, me whakahoki mai.

I told several Governors, Native Ministers, and subordinates that it was useless making peace with me; they must make peace with, the lands, by returning them.<sup>349</sup>

This was a position Tāwhiao was expected to take up on his meeting with McLean.

In the course of the hui, Tāwhiao made the position of the Kingitanga clear: all confiscated Waikato lands as far as Mangatāwhiri were to be returned to them. If that territory was reinstated, he would return to Waikato to live.<sup>350</sup> Ms Marr said that though this statement was referred to as requesting only the confiscated lands, 'the importance for the Kingitanga was also the recognition of their authority to the old boundary at Mangatāwhiri.'<sup>351</sup>

McLean, however, was equally insistent that the Government would not contemplate the return of all the confiscated territory. Instead, he made four proposals for the return of portions of the confiscated land and the recognition of Tāwhiao's authority:

346. Document A78, p 303.

347. Gary Scott, 'Wiremu Te Morehu Maipapa Te Wheoro', in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed WH Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), pp 524–526.

348. Document A78, p 348.

349. Te Wananga, 28 May 1875, p 89; doc A110, p 619.

350. 'The Hon Native Minister's Meeting with Tawhiao; and Rewi Maniapoto's Visit to the Bay of Plenty', AJHR, 1875, G-4, p 10.

351. Document A78, p 351.

1st. Tawhiao to exercise authority over the tribes within the district where he is now recognised as the head.

2nd. A certain number of Chiefs to be selected by him to assist him in maintaining order and repressing crime among his people

3rd. The Government to support him in carrying on the duty which would thus devolve upon him

4th. A suitable house to be built for him at Kawhia and certain portions of land on the Waipa and Waikato rivers to be granted to him.<sup>352</sup>

On the surface, the terms McLean proposed were significant, and reports indicated that Tāwhiao was ‘satisfied’ with them, although they did not meet his demands for the return of all confiscated Waikato land. Tāwhiao proposed that he meet with McLean and the governor to discuss the terms further at another hui, preferably as part of the 1876 Maehe that was scheduled to be held at Te Kūiti. McLean said he preferred to meet at Kāwhia, which would be more accessible for the governor. Although Tāwhiao eventually agreed, and despite reports that he had moved closer to Kāwhia around this time, the meeting did not eventuate.<sup>353</sup> The next meeting – 15 months later – was held at neither Te Kūiti nor Kāwhia, but at Kaipiha near Alexandra. Nor did the governor attend as Tāwhiao hoped.<sup>354</sup>

In the meantime, McLean honed his general proposals into more detailed measures. At the same time, he fended off criticism from political opponents and settlers, who particularly opposed his proposal to acquire land in the Pirongia area, which he intended to grant to Tāwhiao and his people as part of the settlement. Twenty-five settlers and land-owners petitioned Parliament on the matter, registering their objection to the possibility of having Māori live among them, especially ‘so-called King Maoris.’<sup>355</sup> They argued that granting land to Māori in the district was a backward step that would hinder progress for years to come. The presence of resident Māori would cause a decrease in property values and put new settlers off coming to the area. McLean and Premier Pollen defended the Government’s approach, explaining that the intention was to quietly settle Kingitanga Māori, who had no land of their own to speak of, and who wished to live peacefully alongside the Pākehā.<sup>356</sup>

Resolving the debates of settlers and politicians was only one factor affecting the settlement. The Crown and the Kingitanga had yet to reach agreement on the core matters outlined at the Waitomo hui: the extent of the lands that might be returned to Tāwhiao, as well as the nature of the authority he would be granted in remaining Kingitanga territories.

352. McLean to agent general, 16 February 1875, AJHR, 1875, G-4, p 3; doc A78, p 349.

353. Document A78, p 352.

354. Document A78, pp 362, 369.

355. ‘Pirongia, Waikato’, 18 October 1875, NZPD, vol 19, p 506; doc A78, p 365.

356. Document A78, pp 364–366.

7.4.1.2 The Kaipiha hui, May 1876

These matters were further discussed at the next hui, which took place in May 1876 at Kaipiha. The hui was once again facilitated by Te Wheoro.

During the hui, Tāwhiao continued to press for the Mangatāwhiri to be reinstated as the northern boundary of Kingitanga authority, including the return of land within that territory. McLean, however, insisted that it was impossible to return all Waikato lands, and that Tāwhiao's authority would not be acknowledged over the portions that the Government was prepared to return. McLean said that the Government would only acknowledge that Tāwhiao could 'continue to exercise authority over the affairs of your people in your own district'.<sup>357</sup> There was no precise description of the boundaries of this district, but McLean resisted any suggestions that Tāwhiao could exercise his authority north of the Pūniu.<sup>358</sup> McLean did, however, propose that land would be returned to the Kingitanga near Ngāruawāhia so that Tāwhiao could have a property near Te Wherowhero's resting place.<sup>359</sup>

McLean's proposals went some way to acknowledging the continued independence of the peoples living within the aukati. But there were also limits on what the Crown was prepared to offer. Tāwhiao would exercise authority over the tribes within the aukati, but in any returned Waikato lands he would be acknowledged no more or less than any other senior rangatira. Certainly, the Government had no intention of recognising him as King.

McLean also made several specific proposals that he considered would provide Tāwhiao with means to exercise authority over his district. As at the Waitomo hui, he said that Tāwhiao could play a role in maintaining law and order in conjunction with other chiefs, and that the Government would consult him on land matters and matters affecting the welfare of his people. But he also indicated that he was prepared to go further and provide Tāwhiao with a role in managing land matters. On one day of the hui, McLean suggested that the Government would merely 'consult' with Tāwhiao 'before purchasing or leasing lands within your own boundaries'; but on another day, he suggested that the Government would allow Tāwhiao to control the process of sale or leasing of land ('you will use your own discretion; if you object, the Government will not urge it upon you').<sup>360</sup> While these offers suggested that the Government was willing to offer Tāwhiao reasonably broad powers, the exact scope of the authority being offered, and how it would work in practice, was not yet precisely defined.

After the hui was completed, McLean advised the governor (now Lord George Normanby) that terms for a settlement were being finalised and would be concluded at another meeting soon.<sup>361</sup> It is unclear whether the Tāwhiao shared 357. 'Notes of meeting, May 1876', AJHR, 1876, G-4, p 2; doc A78, p 370.

358. Document A78, p 370.

359. 'Notes of meeting, May 1876', AJHR, 1876, G-4, pp 2-5; doc A78, p 371.

360. 'Notes of meeting, May 1876', AJHR, 1876, G-4, p 5; doc A78, p 372.

361. Telegram, McLean to Governor, 29 May 1876, ms 32/104 #1010875, McLean papers, ATL; document A78, p 373.

McLean's optimism. On the one hand, Tāwhiao appeared enthusiastic about the proposed offer of support for his authority within the remaining territories, as well as the offer of a house to be built at Kāwhia, which could be used as a council building and for hosting visiting dignitaries.<sup>362</sup> On the other hand, McLean did not offer to return all confiscated Waikato lands as Tāwhiao had sought, and at no point during this hui or the earlier one at Waitomo did Tāwhiao signal to McLean that he would be prepared to compromise. There was agreement for further discussions and negotiations through which some of these matters could be advanced.<sup>363</sup> The return of confiscated land, and the exact scope of the authority reserved for Tāwhiao, were both matters that would need further discussion.

The very fact of agreement itself was significant. The late Ngāti Maniapoto leader, Tui Adams, recalled that it was at these hui with McLean that a 'covenant' was established between the Kingitanga and the Crown. This covenant involved the Crown's recognition of Tāwhiao's authority within their remaining territories.<sup>364</sup> Wiki Henskes told us about an exchange of gifts that occurred between her tūpuna, Tāneora Wharauora (Ngāti Rākai and Ngāti Waikōrara hapū) and Donald McLean at that time (see sidebar). This suggests there was a degree of optimism that emerged amongst Ngāti Maniapoto, and the Kingitanga in general, from these meetings.

A Gift Exchange

At our Kōrero Tuku Iho hui at Maniaora Marae, in Mōkau, Wiki Henskes told us about a gift exchange between her tūpuna, Tāneora Wharauora, and Donald McLean, and the way Tāneora is depicted on one of the poupou on her people's tūpuna whare:

He is depicted as wearing a tartan shawl, which I am wearing today, a black watch tartan which was received in exchange of gifts between the native minister, Sir Donald McLean and the Maniapoto people.

Today you may see a hat band of black watch tartan in the hats of men and in the shawls and skirts of women at gatherings. This is Maniapoto acknowledging and commemorating the exchange of gifts which took place at the meeting in February 1875. Tāwhiao extended an invitation to the Native Minister McLean to visit at Waitomo about halfway between the European boundary and the principal settlement of Te Kūiti.

362. Document A78, p 383.

363. Document A78, p 383.

364. Adams, Te Uira and Parsonson, 'Behold, A Kite Flies Towards You', p 102.

In the diary of McLean he mentioned such traits in common as the wearing of the kilt and the coronach is a Scottish dirge and the tangi, the chanted eulogies and the war customs.<sup>1</sup>

1. Transcript 4.1.5, p125 (Wiki Henskes, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 17 May 2010).

Before the parties could turn to engage in further discussions, McLean faced a new round of political and public criticism, including an outcry about the Government's inability to bring to justice known criminals living openly within the aukati. He remained confident, but the further hui planned by Tāwhiao and McLean did not proceed, and McLean then fell ill. He resigned before the end of the year and died in early 1877.<sup>365</sup>

7.4.1.3 Pollen meets with Kingitanga leaders, January 1877

Premier Pollen took over the Native Affairs portfolio. By that time, Pollen had overseen a major change in New Zealand's governing arrangements. In 1876, the Abolition of the Provinces Act was passed, which effected the abolition of the provinces on 1 January 1877. Many of their functions were delegated to a range of new territorial authorities. Among them were county councils, which were established under the Counties Act 1876. Under the Act, New Zealand was divided into 63 counties. Historian Jane Luiten explained that each county council was empowered to levy general rates and raise loans for capital works, among other functions.<sup>366</sup>

The councils by and large did not come into effect in Te Rohe Pōtae. Luiten explained that the county councils for Raglan and Waipā declined to implement the full operation of the Act, resolving instead to operate as road boards; whereas the Kawhia and West Taupo counties were suspended – as Pollen told Parliament in October 1876 – because they were 'entirely Native districts'.<sup>367</sup> Of the counties that extended into Te Rohe Pōtae, most did not become operable until the early twentieth century. The exception was the Clifton County, which extended from northern Taranaki to the Mōkau River, which was created in 1885.<sup>368</sup> Thus, while the settler assembly established means by which local government could be administered in districts where Crown authority was in operation, it was essentially out of reach for Māori in Te Rohe Pōtae who sought the local administration of their affairs under the authority of the Kingitanga. (We return to these developments in section 7.4.5, and to the broader issue of local self-government in chapter 8.)

365. Document A78, pp369–373, 377–386.

366. Document A24 (Luiten), p9.

367. Pollen, 11 October 1876, NZPD, vol 23, p200; doc A24, p11.

368. Document A24, pp11–12.

Soon after McLean's passing, Manuhiri invited Pollen to meet with Kingitanga leaders, who were eager to know the status of McLean's proposals. Pollen accepted the invitation, later explaining he deliberately sought to keep the meeting discrete. Unlike the meetings with McLean, Tāwhiao did not attend and instead left it to his advisors – namely, Manuhiri and Tākerei Te Rau (Rewi and Wahanui both being absent) – to handle matters and report back to him and their people afterwards. Opening formalities were held at Kaihiha, inside the aukati, and then the gathering relocated to Alexandra, outside the aukati.<sup>369</sup>

Pollen did not share McLean's diplomacy or patience. Rather than assure the chiefs gathered that the terms McLean had offered still stood, he presented two proposals: first, Tāwhiao had to agree to maintain peace and uphold the law in cooperation with the Government; secondly, if the people wanted, the Government would set aside a district 'for Tawhiao and his people, within which he could administer the affairs of his people subject to the law'.<sup>370</sup>

The chiefs had little, if any, difficulty with the first proposal, which would have been entirely in keeping with Tāwhiao's by now well-established peace policy, and said they would consider the second. But they once again asked whether the Government would be prepared to return the confiscated Waikato lands. Pollen reportedly refused to discuss the matter, saying that the land was all in European hands and the Crown could not return it.<sup>371</sup> However, Pollen ventured, if Tāwhiao agreed to his proposals, the Government would reward him with a 'piece' of Waikato land.<sup>372</sup> McLean had not defined the areas he was prepared to return, except to rule out returning the entire confiscated area. While we cannot be sure, on the face of it Pollen appears to have been offering less.

The Kingitanga leaders also raised concerns with road construction at the boundaries of the aukati, and with lands beyond the aukati that had been pledged to the King which they wished to protect, particularly from the operations of the Native Land Court. Pollen was unmoved, suggesting that those who had disposed of their lands must have changed their mind about their pledge to Tāwhiao. He said that Tāwhiao could make his own decisions about lands within his own district, but in all other areas the court's authority would prevail. At issue, still, was the nature and extent of Tāwhiao's authority – unchallenged within the aukati; unwelcome beyond it.<sup>373</sup>

7.4.1.4 Pollen meets with Rewi and other leaders, February–March 1877

Having met with Tāwhiao's advisors, Pollen then met with Rewi in February and March 1877. During these hui, Rewi defined part of the boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae and set out demands for Māori authority within that boundary.

369. Document A78, pp 388–394.

370. 'Dr Pollen's interview with the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 February 1877, pp 3; doc A78, p 390.

371. Document A78, p 391.

372. 'Dr Pollen's interview', New Zealand Herald, 1 February 1877, pp 3; doc A78, p 392.

373. Document A78, p 393.

As with McLean before him, Pollen hoped to encourage Rewi to act independently of Tāwhiao, an idea that had been bolstered by Rewi's absence from the hui at Waitomo with McLean. However, any suggestion that there was a growing rift between Rewi and other Kīngitanga (specifically Waikato) leaders was more the reflection of the wishful thinking of officials. As it turned out, Pollen's meetings with Rewi failed to confirm a growing division between Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato. Rather, it was his opportunity to raise issues of local importance directly with the premier, particularly in areas where Crown activities were beginning to encroach on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands. Where he did venture into broader issues, he sought to clarify the Crown's approach on Tāwhiao's behalf but did not seek to conduct negotiations himself.

Rewi did not meet with Pollen alone. Rather, at the February 1877 hui he was among a party of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Hauā leaders who met Pollen at Alexandra.<sup>374</sup> Ngāti Raukawa leaders also featured prominently at the March meeting, which took place at the kāinga of Pohipi Tukairangi at Nukuhau (on the northern side of Lake Taupō by the Waikato River).<sup>375</sup> On both occasions, the leaders who spoke brought to Pollen's attention three main areas of concern: the sale of land, made possible – they argued – because of the operations of the Native Land Court; the use of advance payments as a land purchase method; and the ongoing issue of killings, or at least serious violence, when tensions near the aukati borders were allowed to escalate (such as those that had developed over work on the Taupō–Cambridge road). Their approach to the negotiations suggested both allegiance to the Kīngitanga and an expectation that local chiefly authority would be recognised.

Rewi outlined his concerns during the February hui. In Rewi's assessment, the native land laws allowed Māori to sell not only their own land, but also land belonging to others. The focus of Rewi's concerns was on lands on the north-eastern border of the aukati, north of the Pūniu River but outside the confiscated territory. In his view, the Native Land Court allowed people with lesser interests or no interests to claim their land. Once title was granted, those named could then arrange leases or sales without the knowledge, let alone consent, of the rightful owners or even the chiefs. Trouble ensued when Pākehā settlers – lessees and purchasers – attempted to occupy land for which the interests of Kīngitanga peoples had not been accounted.<sup>376</sup> Rewi wanted tensions at the northern and eastern borders peacefully resolved by negotiation between Pollen and the responsible chiefs of the respective areas.<sup>377</sup> Referring to lands in the Patetere district, Rewi said he wanted the Crown to stop paying advances there. He was also concerned that work on the Taupō–Cambridge road was extending into his lands.<sup>378</sup>

---

374. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 27 March 1877, p 79.

375. 'The Native Meeting at Taupō', Star, 27 March 1877, p 3.

376. Document A78, pp 395–400.

377. Document A78, pp 398–404.

378. Document A78, p 404.

Examples Used by Rewi to Illustrate Problems with the Native Land Laws

During his meetings with Pollen, Rewi drew on a range of examples to illustrate his views on the problems with the native land laws. One such example was the situation arising in respect of Ngamoko, near Maungatautari, which he said had been sold by people with no rightful claim to it. Another example concerned the case of the Otautahanga lands, which had been leased to the Tole brothers, who were now trying to occupy them – against the wishes of the Kīngitanga peoples to whom he said the land rightly belonged – increasing the risk for violence.

In 1873, Rewi had successfully seen that the Otautahanga case was withdrawn from the Native Land Court and thought he had reached an agreement with William Mair that the land would be left alone. However, he had since found out about the lease to the Toles. He likened the situation to a storekeeper locking up his shop but being robbed nonetheless during his absence because the thief had the temerity to enter by the chimney. 'Otautahanga was stolen in that way from me', he told Pollen. His point was that just because Ngāti Maniapoto and other Kīngitanga supporters refused to attend the court did not mean they relinquished their rights in lands outside the aukati.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document A78, pp 395–396, 399; Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 27 March 1877, p 82 (doc A78, p 400).

Although he left larger issues for Tāwhiao to settle, Rewi also queried what Pollen had meant when he proposed at Alexandra that Tāwhiao would be required to cooperate on matters of law once his territory and authority was confirmed.<sup>379</sup> Rewi said he had spoken with Tāwhiao and others about the matter, and he now sought further clarification. He was 'vexed' by the problem of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who left the territory and stole from Europeans. He suggested that when European authorities caught such offenders, a message should be sent to Rewi or the offenders' relatives, so that they can 'at once make restitution' and pay a 'heavy fine'. In his view, 'this would be greater punishment than sending them to gaol, which does them no good'. Rewi said he had already recommended this approach to Tāwhiao, and now wanted to know the Government's opinion.<sup>380</sup>

These concerns were driven by one of the foremost issues facing the Kīngitanga: Crown recognition of the aukati, including agreed definition of its boundary. Rewi could see how the business of colonisation – the Native Land Court, private and Crown acquisition of Māori land, and public works – threatened the eastern boundary. He did not want anyone to 'disturb' his 'line', an area which

---

379. Document A78, p 405.

380. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 17 April 1877, p 100; doc A110(a) (Ngāti Maniapoto researchers document bank), p 17; doc A78, p 405.

he reportedly indicated by making an oval shape on the table in front of him.<sup>381</sup> He described his 'line' as running from Mangauika to Tokanui to Taupō and Ruahine near Tongariro. He included Waipā, Mangakaretu to Horohoro, and Niho o te Kiore (a Raukawa pā near Atiamuri). According to Ms Marr, it is not clear 'whether Rewi was encircling his own parts of the boundary or the whole King territory' – the locations he pointed out were in the north-east and east of the remaining Kingitanga lands. Nonetheless, Ms Marr has asserted, Rewi's descriptions provided 'one of the first documentary sources setting out what had become the external boundary', the aukati, marking the territory now known as Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>382</sup>

The existence of this line did not mean, in Rewi's eyes, that he and his people did not have interests beyond it – he had interests in lands north of the Pūniu.<sup>383</sup> Rather, he sought to prevent the activities that stemmed from the Native Land Court, and from settlement activities such as the Crown's land purchasing and road-building, from becoming involved in the lands within it. To this extent, by drawing a line, he seemed to be acknowledging that the way in which the aukati was enforced in the eastern area – as zones – might have to be redrawn as a defined boundary, which would contain those specific, contiguous lands which had yet to be affected. This would leave the Crown with a clearer understanding of the territory in which the Kingitanga authority would have to be recognised. How the Kingitanga would be recognised in the territory was up to Tāwhiao and Pollen to negotiate.<sup>384</sup>

In response to Rewi's concerns about land issues, Pollen said that the Government had no intention of purchasing any more land; it would only complete purchases already begun.<sup>385</sup> And he said that the Taupō–Cambridge road would only go as far as the Crown-granted lands in the area would allow.<sup>386</sup> Pollen also spent some time urging the chiefs to 'have recourse to the Courts', which he said was the only way to ensure that everyone's property rights were given their due protection, and to have wrongs remedied.<sup>387</sup> He said that Rewi could take action in the Supreme Court to try and recover some of his lands.<sup>388</sup> In response to this, Rewi said he would continue to refuse to appear before any court until the agreements reached between Tāwhiao and McLean were settled.<sup>389</sup>

On the question of cooperating over the treatment of Māori suspected of crimes, Pollen said that magistrates already had the discretion to fine rather than

381. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 17 April 1877, p 98; doc A110(a), p 15; doc A78, p 404.

382. Document A78, p 404.

383. Rewi was of Ngāti Paretekawa which was based on both sides of the Pūniu, but particularly at Ōrākau, Kihikihi, Rangiaowhia, and at the fighting pā Mangatoatoa and Haereawatea: doc A110, pp 227, 230.

384. Document A78, pp 403–404.

385. Document A78, p 398.

386. Document A78, p 404.

387. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 27 March 1877, p 81; doc A78, p 399.

388. Document A78, p 400.

389. Document A78, p 401.

imprison Māori, although that discretion was no longer widely exercised, and the current trend was to send Māori convicted of theft to prison. Nonetheless, Pollen's point was that Māori were being treated more leniently than Pākehā, because Māori could be fined or imprisoned, whereas Pākehā could only be imprisoned. He said the option of imposing fines had been tried and found wanting because theft continued; perhaps if the incidence of theft by Māori decreased, the magistrates would return to fines. Pollen did not offer to consider the matter further, or to amend legislation in a way that encouraged the magistrates to use their discretion more often.<sup>390</sup> While Rewi sought to find ways whereby the Crown and the Kingitanga could cooperate in handling specific instances of crime, Pollen put colonial law beyond the reach of negotiations. It seemed that, if he agreed to cooperate under the law, as Pollen's proposal asked, Tāwhiao would in fact be required to submit to British law.

The concerns raised by Rewi regarding lands at the eastern part of the aukati boundary meant that their discussion would continue beyond the February hui. Rewi particularly objected to recent Crown attempts to deal with the lands at Tokoroa, Te Niho o Te Kiore and Te Taetewa, which he considered had been pledged to the King. He wanted Pollen to ensure that the lands in that eastern area were left alone for now, suggesting that he would think about whether he might refer some to 'your law'.<sup>391</sup> In the meantime, he told Pollen: 'Kaua e tukua kia whakararua ahau i runga i tenei whenua e puritia nei a ahau. (Do not allow my possession of this land to be disturbed.)'<sup>392</sup> He wanted to discuss the eastern lands further, with all interested parties present, and proposed a meeting to be held after he finished his harvest at a location closer to the lands in question.<sup>393</sup>

That hui occurred in March 1877, at Nukuhau near Taupō, specifically to make attendance easier for local chiefs, who took the opportunity to further discuss questions surrounding the eastern lands.<sup>394</sup> Arising from these discussions, the settler press appeared hopeful that Ngāti Raukawa would soon become independent from the Kingitanga, because they appeared to be willing to consider using the Native Land Court for lands east of the Waikato River, and to agree to more roads. Ms Marr noted that Raukawa was effectively split at the river, with those in the west continuing to support the King while those in the east had become more willing to listen to the Government. Rewi asked that Ngāti Raukawa refrain from selling any lands in which he had interests, at least until they had reached an agreement with the Crown over the extent of the Kingitanga territory.<sup>395</sup> In addressing this issue, Rewi confirmed that the eastern boundary of the aukati in the Taupō area ran (in Ms Marr's words) 'from Horohoro to Atiamuri and then to Whangamata on Lake Taupō'.<sup>396</sup>

390. Document A78, p 406.

391. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 17 April 1877, p 98; doc A110(a), p 15; doc A78, p 404.

392. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 17 April 1877, p 98; doc A110(a), p 15; doc A110, p 621.

393. Document A78, pp 404–405.

394. Document A78, p 409.

395. Document A78, pp 410–412.

396. Document A78, p 410.

Pollen acknowledged that the aukati was still in place, and admitted that in practice the Government respected it, largely 'for the sake of peace and quietness'. But, in his opinion, it would be better 'blotted out', because it was 'the cause of strife'. And while he insisted the Government would not touch the aukati, he also urged those gathered to think instead in terms of ancestral boundaries, which could 'easily be proved' before the Native Land Court and settled by custom and evidence.<sup>397</sup>

At both the February and March hui, Pollen returned to his refrain of encouraging Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to submit (themselves and their land) to the colonial justice system. Meanwhile, the chiefs continued to hold to the aukati and the exercise of their authority within it, requiring proper Crown recognition of it before they would consider whether or to what extent they might make use of the legal system. This tension had persisted since wartime and would continue, even as Crown negotiators changed.

Whatever had been achieved at the hui, Pollen did little to progress his attempt to reach a settlement, and further planned meetings did not proceed. And, though prominent, Te Rohe Pōtae was not the only challenge facing the Government. For a range of reasons, political support for Pollen's Government continued to weaken in the months leading up to the election in October 1877.

7.4.2 Negotiations with Sheehan and Grey

Following the 1877 election, a new Ministry was formed; former governor Sir George Grey became the new premier. Among the so-called radicals in his cabinet were Robert Stout and John Ballance, who later (in the mid-1880s) took on crucial roles in negotiating with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. However, it was John Sheehan who was appointed Native Minister (and Minister of Justice) in the new Government.<sup>398</sup>

Both Grey and Sheehan were known by Māori of Te Rohe Pōtae. For better or ill, Grey had long-standing ties which dated back to his first term as governor, including with some of the Kīngitanga chiefs. Sheehan had built his reputation among Māori working as a lawyer for the repudiation movement through the 1870s, and earlier as a junior lawyer in the long-running Native Land Court investigation into Ōrākei.

Sheehan and Grey presented themselves as ideally placed to conclude a durable settlement with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. On winning at the polls, they publicised messages of congratulations received from various Kīngitanga chiefs, including Manuhiri, and before the election results were even finalised they telegraphed Rewi to say that they wished to meet with him.<sup>399</sup> But they also had to win the confidence of those settlers who had lost patience with McLean's attempts at reaching a settlement, which they regarded as too soft. Their policy was to rapidly progress towards a resolution with the Kīngitanga and the abolition of the aukati, without provoking another war.

397. 'Great Native Meeting', New Zealand Times, 26 March 1877, p 2; doc A78, p 410.

398. Document A78, pp 414, 770, 1057, 1068–1069, 1293; doc A41, pp 149–150, 165–175, 177–179.

399. Document A78, p 414.

Underlying this objective was the desire to open the district to allow settlement and the construction of the main trunk railway, for which they developed policies as their administration progressed. This included the survey of the Waimate Plains to the south of Te Rohe Pōtae in Taranaki, which very quickly brought into focus the passive resistance movement of Te Whiti o Rongomai and Tohu Kakahi at Parihaka. The Government's policies in this part of the district raised questions for the Kīngitanga leadership, particularly Rewi, as he increasingly sought to secure the borders to the south and the east against the potential incursion into the territory he had identified in discussion with Sheehan in 1877. At the same time, Rewi looked to manage relationships with rangatira who held authority in their local communities, such as Wetere Te Rerenga at Mōkau, who increasingly looked to engage in diversified economic activities in respect of their lands. And Mōkau was one area that had been suggested as a possible route for the railway line to run.<sup>400</sup>

Although settlers expected Grey to do a better job than McLean had done, Grey did have to combat significant opposition, much of it led by Government agent William Mair. In a move designed to put some distance between Grey and McLean's supporters, the long-serving Mair was dismissed from his post and replaced with William Grace. Grace was known locally, largely because of his marriage to Ngāti Maniapoto woman Makereti Hinewai.<sup>401</sup> He would later become entangled in events at Mōkau which saw Joshua Jones turn a private agreement to mine coal into a long-term, Government-backed lease of Māori land (see chapter 11, section 11.6). Mair, meanwhile, remained in the Alexandra area, making known his opposition to Grey and Sheehan's approach to negotiations with the Kīngitanga, often with the support of local Pākehā settlers and land speculators.<sup>402</sup> According to historian Russell Stone, Mair was duly rewarded when he returned to government employment under the Hall administration, which defeated Grey's Government at the polls in 1879.<sup>403</sup>

William Henry Grace (1848–1913)

The eldest son of the Reverend Thomas Grace, William Henry Grace was 16 when the family left Pūkawa. William claimed that he was one of the first licensed interpreters in the colony. In October 1877, he joined the Native Department in Wellington. He was employed first as an additional interpreter to the House of Representatives, and then as private secretary and interpreter to Native Minister Sheehan until the end of August 1878; during that period, he was present at a

400. Document A28, p 202.

401. Document A78, p 415; transcript 4.1.14, p 325 (Wayne Taitoko, hearing week 9, Parawera marae, 10 December 2013).

402. Document A78, p 415.

403. RCJ Stone, 'The Maori Lands Question and the Fall of the Grey Government, 1879', in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 1, no 1 (April 1967), p 55; doc A78, pp 414–415.

number of meetings with Rewi Maniapoto. William was appointed native agent for the Upper Waikato from 1878 until his contract was terminated at the end of 1879. At that time, he became a private agent for land speculators while also advising some Ngāti Maniapoto leaders about land and court processes. He had settled at Kihikihi by this time and remained there for the rest of his life.

William first married Mary Matuku (or Matahua) with whom he had one son. This marriage appears to have been short-lived. He subsequently married Makareti Te Hinewai, said to be a niece of Rewi Maniapoto. In 1883, he was involved in the 1 December 1883 meeting between Bryce and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that led to an agreement for the survey of the external boundary, at which William urged them to place their lands before the court or fall victim to counter-claims. From the beginning of 1886, William was again employed by the Native Department as a land purchase officer, a position he held until the end of March 1888. During this period, he negotiated for the purchase of Taupōnuiātia lands. He was also involved in negotiations for the acquisition of the central North Island mountains. He was later re-employed by the Native Department as an interpreter.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document A78, pp 499, 567, 684, 706, 889, 943, 954; doc A28, pp 235, 243, 260–261, 284–285, 395.

Expecting that Grey would see the negotiations through to an agreeable resolution, Rewi was willing to talk. But following the line he had established with McLean and Pollen, he wanted to also maintain regard for Tāwhiao and to negotiate over local and tribal matters only after government representatives spoke first and foremost with the King. Tāwhiao registered his interest in negotiating when he began preparations for a hui with Grey to be held at Hikurangi in November 1877, just a month after the election.<sup>404</sup>

7.4.2.1 The hui at Whakairoiro, February 1878

For a variety of reasons, that hui did not proceed as planned. Instead, both Grey and Sheehan, accompanied by several officials, attended a hui at Whakairoiro, near Te Kōpua, in February 1878. The hui was the first meeting of Kīngitanga chiefs and Grey since the wars, and it included kawē mate (a mourning ceremony subsequent to a tangihanga) for the rangatira Tākerei Te Rau.<sup>405</sup> Major Te Wheoro facilitated and more than 2,000 people attended.<sup>406</sup>

---

404. Document A78, p 416.

405. Tākerei Te Rau was offered the role of King but proposed Te Wherowhero, and advised both Te Wherowhero and Tāwhiao. Though known more as a mediator than a warrior, he was among those who defended Rangiriri Pa. His daughter Te Paea was shot there and subsequently died from her wounds. For his obituary, see Waikato Times, 26 January 1878, p 2.

406. Document A78, pp 415–417.

Concurrent with the main hui, Grey also had several private conversations with Tāwhiao and senior Kingitanga chiefs. Detailed terms of settlement were not discussed, but the parties agreed to talk. Grey referred to the analogy of planting a tree of peace that he had used when he was governor, and which Rewi revived at the hui at Te Pahiko in 1869.<sup>407</sup> He said that the Government and those gathered would water and grow the tree they had now planted together. Rewi welcomed Grey's goal of improved relations and the idea of sharing responsibility for a tree of peace – which he saw as confirmation of the Kingitanga's peace policy. Rewi said that Grey would need to meet with the people four times to ensure the tree bore fruit – once to plant the tree, once to promote its growth, and twice more so that the tree would flourish.<sup>408</sup>

Immediately after the hui at Whakairoiro concluded, Sheehan met with Rewi. Rewi raised the same local and border issues that he had earlier discussed with Pollen, including lands at Horahora, Otautahanga, and Patetere.<sup>409</sup>

But in a striking variation, Grey and Sheehan also encouraged Wetere Te Rerenga to meet and discuss the issues relating to Mōkau. It was quite a change in attitude for Grey, who had previously criticised McLean's tolerance of wanted fugitives during earlier negotiations. However, Grey had established strong relationships with Wetere's father, Tākerei Waitara, in his first term as governor in the late 1840s (see section 5.3). Remarkably, Wetere – who was still regarded as responsible for attacking Pukearuhe – left the security of the aukati to meet Grey in the settler-dominated town of New Plymouth.

Grey may also have sought out a meeting with Wetere in the hope of resolving tensions that had arisen at Mōkau partly because of increasing Māori engagement with settlers. Wetere had been in contact with New Plymouth-based settlers John Shore and his son George as early as 1876 about opening a store at Mōkau.<sup>410</sup> That year the Shores and recent arrivals from Australia, Robert McMillan and Joshua Jones, visited Mōkau several times. They visited, at the invitation of numerous Mōkau chiefs, to engage in talks about opening the area up to European investment, namely through mining and forestry. In July 1877, the Shore and McMillan families established a settlement on the southern banks of the Mōkau heads.<sup>411</sup> By August, McMillan numbered the settlement at 19.<sup>412</sup> However, the settlement failed to grow, and infighting – including an alleged attempt by McMillan to kill Jones – tore it apart in 1879.<sup>413</sup>

---

407. Te Karere/Maori Messenger, vol 1, no18, 16 December 1861; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 241; 'Report of the Native Minister's Interview with the Leading Waikato Chiefs', AJHR, 1870, A-12, p 5; 'Waikato and Waitara Native Meetings', AJHR, 1878, G-3, p 4; doc A78, pp 290–291, 305, 417.

408. Document A78, p 417.

409. Document A78, pp 417–418.

410. Document A28, p 192.

411. Document A28, pp 194–195.

412. Document A28, p 195.

413. Document A28, p 219.

There were definite limits to this engagement: Europeans could only enter the region with Māori permission and were refused entry if they were considered threatening.<sup>414</sup> The aukati, in other words, remained in place. In August 1876, Weterere met with Tāwhiao, proposing that settlers be allowed to visit (but not occupy or take up land).<sup>415</sup> The settlement established by the Shore and McMillan families survived as long as it did in large part to Weterere's protection.

But it was perhaps foreshortened by events arising from a supposed lease agreement, also in August 1876, between the Shores, McMillan, and Jones, and four Mōkau chiefs, Epiha Karoro, Takirau Watihī, Te Oro, and Taiaroa, relating to the land on the southern bank – which became the subject of ongoing contention spearheaded by Jones, and ultimately resulted in the alienation of the land (see chapter 11). Thomas considered that the chiefs' motivation behind signing the deed was a desire to seek positive relationships with settlers.<sup>416</sup> Weterere took no part in the lease, on the grounds of his opposition to land transactions.

The chiefs who signed, however, disputed Jones' interpretation of both its duration and the amount of land in question. Thomas considers that the supposed lease was intended by the lessees as 'a springboard towards purchase'.<sup>417</sup> But to secure the lease, Jones required a court hearing and pressured local chiefs into applying for one. By July 1877, both Epiha and Pollen had made applications for a court hearing, though it is not clear what exactly motivated them to do so and to what extent Jones was responsible.<sup>418</sup>

These events caused inevitable tensions. In September 1876, Rewi had gone to investigate reports of the lease arrangement.<sup>419</sup> Little appears to have emerged from his investigations immediately. But in July 1877, following news that a court application had been made, Tāwhiao reportedly warned that if the Mōkau settlers 'will not move off at once they will be forcibly expelled by the Ngatimaniapotos, their goods taken, and their houses burned'.<sup>420</sup> The Government issued a warning to the settlers about the possibility of an attack, to which Weterere angrily replied (writing to the Native Minister) that only he, not the Government or anyone else, had the power to 'settle matters regarding the Europeans being at Mōkau' and that the Government should consult only with him regarding the settlers.<sup>421</sup>

The Government, however, decided that it was best not to allow the court to go ahead. Pollen rejected any thought that the court should sit in lands inside the aukati without Rewi's approval, a decision that Sheehan enforced when Jones wrote to the Government in November 1877 suggesting that he had received the approval from Mōkau Māori.<sup>422</sup>

414. Document A28, p 223.

415. 'Rumoured Visit of Tawhiao', Taranaki Herald, 30 August 1876, p 2; doc A28, p 191.

416. Document A28, p 197.

417. Document A28, p 197.

418. Document A28, pp 199–200.

419. Document A28, p 199.

420. Taranaki Herald, 25 July 1877, p 2; doc A28, p 196.

421. Taranaki Herald, 28 Aug 1877, p 2; doc A28, p 196.

422. Document A28, pp 200, 203.

In meeting with Grey, Wetere was accompanied by other Mōkau chiefs, including those who had signed the lease with the settlers. Wetere explained how Rewi had confirmed in writing that local management at Mōkau rested with the chief Epiha Karoro, so long as no land transactions and Native Land Court dealings occurred. These required the consent of Rewi and the wider leadership.<sup>423</sup> Rewi had also given his permission to open the Mōkau River for ‘navigation.’<sup>424</sup> This was because Wetere and Epiha had been insistent on re-establishing the coastal shipping that had brought them some success prior to the wars (see chapter 5). In that vein, Wetere told Grey he could talk about opening the Mōkau River for trading purposes, but no lands could be involved, and any trading would have to be managed closely under Wetere’s authority.<sup>425</sup> Grey inquired as to whether a court hearing was acceptable, but Epiha told him that Rewi had instructed to ‘leave all matters for the present’.<sup>426</sup>

7.4.2.2 The hui at Hikurangi, May 1878

The hui at Whakairoiro was followed by another hui at Hikurangi, at which Grey offered specific terms. Initially planned for March 1878, the hui was delayed until May. It was the first hui to coincide with the Kīngitanga Maehe, something McLean had made sure to avoid.

The Hikurangi hui was more than double the size of the Whakairoiro hui, with an estimated 5,000 in attendance. Rewi did not attend, which no doubt fuelled rumours among settlers of a falling out between him and Tāwhiao. However, he was reportedly willing to attend at short notice if he was called on to do so, and he had requested his usual separate meeting with Grey after the main hui concluded. Further, Ngāti Maniapoto was well represented at the hui, and Tāwhiao specifically acknowledged the unity between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto when he addressed those gathered. Tāwhiao also referred to the guiding Kīngitanga principles of law, love and God.<sup>427</sup>

After the full hui, and to advance discussions, Grey asked to meet separately with Tāwhiao and some of the other chiefs. During this discussion, Tāwhiao told Grey that his authority extended to Mercer and the Mangatāwhiri Creek; the Crown’s authority began on the other side of that boundary. Reporters and officials at the time, and Grey himself, assumed Tāwhiao to be insisting on the return of all the confiscated Waikato lands, although he reportedly referred to authority and management rather than ownership.<sup>428</sup>

In response, Grey presented Tāwhiao with a set of specific terms, which are set out in the sidebar below. With respect to Tāwhiao’s authority, Grey said that 423. ‘Visit of Sir George Grey’, Taranaki Herald, 12 Feb 1878, p 2; doc A28, p 204.

424. Document A28, p 203.

425. Document A78, pp 417–419.

426. Document A28, p 205.

427. Document A78, pp 419–421.

428. Document A78, p 421.

Tāwhiao would be the administrator within his district. In addition, Grey made a range of other offers, including extensive returns of confiscated lands and funding for the administration of the district. Ms Marr summarised the whole offer as follows:

- ▶ Tawhiao would manage affairs ('stand in your authority') in his district;
- ▶ The government would assist Tawhiao and his chiefs to administer affairs in his district so matters could be conducted to ensure peace and goodwill between the races;
- ▶ It would be over to Tawhiao to say whether leases or sales would be allowed in his district;
- ▶ The government would give Tawhiao an allowance of £500 per year as a lump sum for the administration of his district to distribute between the chiefs who assisted his management;
- ▶ The government would give Tawhiao 500 acres near Ngaruawahia near his father's grave;
- ▶ The government would build a house for Tawhiao at Kawhia for holding his council meetings;
- ▶ The government would return lands it had not already disposed of to Europeans, west of the Waipa and Waikato rivers;
- ▶ The government would give selected town acres in each of the township settlements on the Waipa and Waikato rivers in trust to Tawhiao, the money to be appropriated in such a manner as he chose ('for the use of all the people');
- ▶ All roads would be decided between Tawhiao and the government;
- ▶ All surveys would be at the direction of Tawhiao;
- ▶ If the proposals were accepted, the government would assist so the people could occupy the lands returned and live 'comfortably and prosperously' in the homes that would be made.<sup>429</sup>

Grey's May 1878 Proposals to Tāwhiao

The following proposals were made by Sir George Grey to Tawhiao, at a meeting at Hikurangi on 10 May, 1878:

1. E tu na koe i to mana, ka apitiria atu e te Kawanatanga ko koe ano hei Kai-whakahaere mo to takiwa, ka awhinatia koe e te Kawanatanga me nga Rangatira o to takiwa hei whakahaere, kia tau ai te pai me te rangimarie ki nga iwi e rua i te motu nei, ka titiro tonu te Kawanatanga ki a koe, e kore e titiro ki tetehi taha, ki tetehi taha, mau ano te kupu kia reti ka reti, kia hoko ka hoko i roto o to takiwa. Ka hoatu e te Kawanatanga he oranga mou me nga Rangatira ki te whaka-haere i to takiwa. Ka hoatu e te Kawanatanga e rima rau pauna maua ma Tawhiao i te tau, ko nga moni mo te takiwa katoa ka tukua nuitia ki a ia ki a Tawhiao mana te tikanga mo nga rangatira o tona Takiwa.

429. Document A78, pp 421–422.

2. Ka hoatu e te Kawanatanga ki a rima rau eka mou i te takiwa o Ngaruawahia kia tutata ki te Urupa o to Matua. Ma te Kawanatanga e hanga he whare mou ki Kawhia mo to Runanga.
  3. Ko nga wahi i toe i te Kawanatanga te hoko ki te Pakeha i te taha Hauauru o Waikato o Waipa, ko nga wahi era e hoki ki a Tawhiao.
  4. A i tua atu o ena, i te mea ka nui toku hiahia kia whiwhi koutou i te rawa, e mea ana aha me whakaatu e te Kawanatanga etahi wahi i roto o nga taone katoa e tu ana i Waikato i Waipa, me hoatu ki a koe tiaki ai mo te iwi katoa, ko nga moni e puta mai ana, mau ano e whakahaere ki tau ritenga e pai ai. E mea ana hoki au kia hohoro koe te whiwhi i te rawa, no te mea ka hohoro tonu te tupu kia nui te pai o enei wahi.
  5. Mo te taha ki nga rori, ko taku hiahia mau maku e whakahaere te ritenga o ena, kaua te tangata e pokanoa ki te hanga rori i te mea kaore ano kia oti i a koe i te Kawanatanga nga ritenga mo te rori.
  6. Mo nga Ruri, mau ano te kupu kia ruritia ka ruritia.
  7. Kua maharatia e au enei mea, a ko taku hiahia nui, kia kite atu au kua noho pai koutou ki runga i nga whenua ka whakaaturia ki a koe, ki te whakaaetia e koe aku e whakaatu nei, ka mahi tonu au kia wawe te noho pai ki runga i nga wahi mo koutou i roto o aua takiwa ka whakahokia atu nei ki a koutou, a kaore ano kia tukua ki te Pakeha. Mo te taha ki etahi mea, ara parau, rakaraka me etahi atu mea e taea ai te whenua te mahi kia pai, ma te Kawanatanga tetahi ritenga mo tena, kia noho pai ai kia noho ora ai koutou ki runga i o koutou kainga ka hanga na. Heoi ano te mea e taea e au to whakarite atu ki a koe. Mo nga wahi i nga taone, ma maua tonu ko Tawhiao e titiro nga mapi, e kowhiti nga wahi e riro atu mo koutou.
1. You stand in your authority, to which the Government will add that you are to be the Administrator within your district. The Government will assist you and the Chiefs of your district to so administer affairs that peace and quietness will alight on the two races of this Island. The Government will always look to you; they will not look to one side or to the other. It is for you to say lease (land), and it will be leased, sell, and sales will take place within your district. The Government will give you and your Chiefs an allowance for the administration of your district. The Government will give you, Tawhiao, five hundred pounds a year. The moneys to be expended within the district will be given as a whole to him (Tawhiao), for him to distribute as he thinks proper to the Chiefs of his district.
  2. The Government will give you five hundred acres of land in the District of Ngaruawahia, near your father's grave. The Government will build you a house at Kawhia for you to hold your meetings in.

3. The portions of land remaining to the Government which have not yet been sold to Europeans, situate on the western side of the Waikato and Waipa—those are the portions which will be returned to Tawhiao.
4. In addition to this, inasmuch as I am very desirous that you should become wealthy, I consider that the Government should set apart certain town sections within all the townships situate on the Waikato and Waipa, and give them to you in trust for the people, the money arising therefrom to be dealt with as you shall think fit, for I wish that you should speedily become rich, because these are the places which are rapidly increasing in value.
5. With reference to roads, it is my wish that you and I should carry out the arrangements respecting them, and that no person should presume to make roads before it has been settled by you and the Government.
6. With reference to surveys, it is for you to say that surveys are to be made, and surveys will be made.
7. I have thought over these matters, and it is my earnest wish that I may see you living comfortably on the lands which will be set apart for you; should you consent to the proposals which I now make to you, I will give it my special attention, so that you may soon occupy the lands in those places which will now be given back to you, and which have not yet been disposed of to the Europeans. With respect to other matters, that is ploughs, harrows, and other implements, requisite for the proper cultivation of the soil, the Government will make some arrangement for that, so that you may live comfortably and prosperously in the homes that will then be made. These are all the proposals that I am able to make to you. With reference to the pieces in the townships, Tawhiao and yourselves must examine the maps, and select the portions for you.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. 'Waikato and Waitara Native Meetings', AJHR, 1878, C-3, p 71.

To the surprise of many Pākehā, Grey's proposals were almost the same as those McLean had offered in 1875. In fact, Grey later revealed he had always intended to make the same offer that McLean had made. The one variation was the offer of additional allotments in the towns on the Waipā and Waikato Rivers, but what Grey meant exactly was unclear. The Crown had two categories of land it could possibly award Tāwhiao: confiscated lands not yet disposed of; and confiscated lands which had been disposed of but which McLean had repurchased for the specific purpose of returning them to Tāwhiao.<sup>430</sup> In fact, Sheehan later admitted in the House that the Government had no intention of returning any of the second category of land, and he was silent on which of the first category he was willing to return.<sup>431</sup> Nonetheless, the Kingitanga appeared to receive the offer with some enthusiasm. Tāwhiao was eager to settle the issues as soon as possible and set about consulting with the various Kingitanga chiefs.<sup>432</sup>

---

430. Document A78, pp 421–422.

The day after the Hikurangi hui, Grey and Sheehan met with Rewi and eight or so 'principal chiefs' at Pūniu where Rewi now lived.<sup>433</sup> Though Rewi had not attended, he was well informed about proceedings, and was pleased Grey and Tāwhiao had reached an agreement. He explained to Grey that he would do his part to ensure ratification by visiting Kingitanga communities throughout the rohe, including Mōkau according to some reports. Rewi also indicated his intention to visit Waitara, explaining that several chiefs had asked him to hold a peace-making hui there.<sup>434</sup>

Following the hui, Sheehan told Parliament that the Government had earned a 'good reputation' among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Ratification of Grey's proposals was imminent and, Sheehan said, such agreement was as good as submission to colonial authority.<sup>435</sup>

7.4.2.3 The hui at Waitara, June 1878

Rewi's Waitara hui took place in June 1878. Tāwhiao did not attend. He understood his business to have been dealt with at Hikurangi, whereas the Waitara hui was Rewi's business. Rewi had a long-standing goal to conduct a formal peace-making ceremony at Waitara, where the Taranaki war had first begun. Rewi saw the need for displays of peace-making that went beyond what had been achieved at Te Pahiko in 1869, and had previously embarked on peace-making missions outside of Te Rohe Pōtae (see section 7.3.3). Around the time of the Waitara hui, Tāwhiao also began spending time at Kāwhia and Raglan, partly to foster goodwill among settlers where he expected to have land returned and his authority restored.<sup>436</sup>

However, Rewi had additional objectives for the hui, which emerged as the hui progressed, much of which related to the ongoing issue of the confiscated lands at Taranaki. By the time of the hui, the Government had developed plans to survey the Waimate Plains, which was part of its broader ambitions to open the confiscated Taranaki lands for settlement. Later in the year, it announced plans to construct the main trunk railway through the district. As seen from the discussion with Wetere at New Plymouth after the Whakairoiro hui, the Government's plans for the region extended to include the southern part of Ngāti Maniapoto's territory at Mōkau.

The hui began at Waitara on 27 June. The 5,000 or so who attended included some 150 Ngāti Maniapoto, representatives from throughout Te Whanganui-ā-Tara, Manawatū, Whanganui, and Taranaki, Māori members of Parliament, and various reporters. Wiremu Kingi, Titokowaru, Te Whiti, and Tohu were absent,

431. Document A78, p 425.

432. Document A78, pp 422–423.

433. 'Waikato and Waitara Native Meetings', AJHR, 1878, G-3, p 21; doc A78, p 432.

434. Document A78, p 432.

435. 'Native Affairs Statement', NZPD, 1878, vol 29, p 224 (doc A78, p 442).

436. Document A78, p 435.

though a party from Parihaka represented them. Wahanui and Wetere attended with Rewi, apparently undaunted by the prospect of leaving the safety of the aukati.<sup>437</sup>

Although Māori and Pākehā alike appreciated Rewi's desire for peace-making and seemed to understand the symbolism of holding the hui at Waitara, Grey conveyed his reluctance to dwell on the wars. It was time, he said, to accept the change that had occurred since the wars and focus on the future. For Rewi, achieving a durable peace at Waitara in order to reconcile a significant part of the past was no impediment to looking to the future, and he was as keen to do that as he was to affirm peace. Rewi said that Waitara was the most fitting place to plant the tree of peace that had been discussed at the Whakairoiro hui.<sup>438</sup>

During the hui, however, Rewi caused some consternation when he asked Grey to 'give' Waitara to him. There was considerable confusion about what Rewi meant exactly, both then and afterwards. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirene, however, thought that Rewi was being perfectly clear in asking for a portion of the confiscated lands to be returned on behalf of the chiefs, much as what Tāwhiao was seeking in respect of the Waikato lands.<sup>439</sup> Chiefs who spoke in support of Rewi also seemed to want terms of settlement akin to what they understood Tāwhiao had been offered. Referring to Rewi's proposal for Waitara, the Whanganui rangatira Mete Kingi noted that it was right that Rewi and Grey were now the 'protectors of Waitara.'<sup>440</sup> In fact, Mete Kingi's idea was probably a clearer interpretation of what Rewi meant when he asked for Waitara: for he and Grey to work to resolve the confiscation issues that Taranaki faced.

About six weeks after the Waitara hui, Rewi clarified his position in a telegram that expanded his tree of peace metaphor and which was published in several newspapers. He said he had first planted a tree with McLean at Te Pahiko in 1869, for the good of all the people. But that tree was blasted by the wind. When he met with Pollen, they had tried to plant a tree at Alexandra and Taupō, but it was destroyed by the snows (or frosts) of Tongariro. Now, though, the Waitara hui had drawn the sun out from behind the clouds. The tree was planted in June, and it was growing. In summer it would bear fruit, which everyone – Māori and Pākehā – could harvest. Indeed, he proposed the concluding hui to occur at the end of summer, when the negotiations would produce a firm settlement.<sup>441</sup> In a separate piece, Rewi said he had not asked for Waitara 'in the thoughts that Europeans have'. What he wanted was to be given back the 'evil' of Waitara so that he, Sheehan, and Grey could plant the tree of peace there, for the benefit of both Māori and Pākehā.<sup>442</sup>

Grey's response at the time of the hui was measured, if non-committal. In effect, the Government neither rebuffed nor fully supported Rewi's demands. The

437. Document A78, p 436.

438. Document A78, pp 436–437.

439. Te Waka Maori o Niu Tirani, 21 August 1878, pp 5–8; doc A78, p 437.

440. 'Waikato and Waitara Native Meetings', AJHR, 1878, G-3, p 51; doc A78, p 437.

441. Document A78, p 438.

442. 'Rewi on the Waitara Meeting', Taranaki Herald, 15 August 1878, p 2; doc A78, p 438.

low-key response likely contributed to criticisms that described the Waitara hui as ineffective.<sup>443</sup>

Rewi stayed at Waitara, as he said he would, expecting to hear from the Government with some definite proposals for Taranaki. According to Ms Marr, Government correspondence sent to Rewi shortly after the hui had left him confident that the Government was making plans for those who had had lands confiscated on the Waimate Plains south of Taranaki maunga.<sup>444</sup>

However, the Government had also initiated its efforts to take control of the confiscated lands. As the Taranaki Tribunal recorded, on 29 July 1878, the Government began its survey of the Waimate Plains ‘without prior notice to Māori’. Although Māori did not offer any opposition in the first five months of the survey, they began offering resistance in December 1878, when surveyors were turned back from one attempted survey. In February 1879, survey pegs were pulled out, then in March, various groups descended on survey camps, packing up the surveyors’ equipment and evicting them without violence.<sup>445</sup>

Alongside these efforts, in October 1878, the Government passed the Railways Construction Act 1882, which authorised the construction of the main trunk railway line from Te Awamutu to New Plymouth (in addition to a line from Wellington to Foxton). This line was anticipated to run along the West Coast – through Te Rohe Pōtae. In passing the Act, however, members of the House of Representatives pointed out that the feasibility of the proposed construction depended on the success of negotiations with the Kingitanga.<sup>446</sup>

In the meantime, the proposals Rewi had waited for from the Government about the confiscated lands never arrived. Ultimately, Rewi’s people ran out of patience before he did, summoning him to return to the King Country in late 1878.<sup>447</sup>

The Waitara hui did not achieve the goals Rewi had set, and the fate of the tree of peace remained unclear. But Sheehan and Grey did not think their relationship with Rewi had soured; far from it. The Government offered Rewi a seat in the Legislative Council, though it was an offer he never took up.<sup>448</sup> There were some reports suggesting that Sheehan and Rewi were making arrangements in late 1878 to push the railway north through Mōkau.<sup>449</sup> During the hui, Rewi and Wetere had re-emphasised the decision that the Mōkau River ‘was open for European traffic’ and that they sought the Government’s assistance to that end. The Mōkau settlers had proposed the construction of a small steamer, and Rewi and Wetere wanted the Government’s support – the Government agreed and offered payments in

---

443. Document A78, pp 437–438.

444. Document A78, p 439.

445. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 220–221.

446. Document A20, p 37.

447. Document A78, pp 438–439.

448. AJHR 1878, G-3, p 21; doc A78, pp 433, 440.

449. Document A78, pp 441–442.

shares.<sup>450</sup> Rewi, however, had not departed from the policy that land sales and the Native Land Court would not be allowed within the aukati.

In January 1879, Rewi met Sheehan at Kihikihi to discuss his proposed boundary. The hui included representatives of Ngāti Maniapoto (Taonui, Tupotahi, and Weterē), Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa (Te Heuheu Tūkino and Kingi Herekīkie), among others.<sup>451</sup> During the hui, Rewi defined his boundary as running 'from Aotea to Pirongia, then to Waipa, near the junction of the Mangapiko and Waipa rivers, through the Awamutu and Rangiaowhia, over Pukekura ranges, across the Waikato river, through Taupo, across the Ongarue river to the sea at Parininihi (White Cliffs)'.<sup>452</sup> He said that Europeans within these territories would not be turned off, but would have to accept Māori law and authority. For areas outside this boundary, such as Maungatautari and Waotu, Rewi said that he wanted the titles reopened so he could assert his ownership.<sup>453</sup>

In Ms Marr's view, Rewi had come to see the Court as a means of assisting the creation of a legally recognised external boundary, by determining title to immediately adjacent lands.<sup>454</sup> It also appears that he was responding to applications made by others for lands adjacent to the aukati or within border zones, or to specific local pressures in which he judged the Court to be the best option for ensuring the land remained under Māori control (see section 7.4.4).<sup>455</sup>

Other evidence from the time suggests the type of process that the Kīngitanga preferred for resolving tribal boundary issues within their territory. Soon after the Hikurangi hui, in May 1878, Sheehan had been present at a hui where the assembled rangatira sought to inaugurate a process in which they openly debated land issues – in that specific case, a boundary dispute between Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Raukawa, involving some sections that remained committed to Kīngitanga policies and others that had been involved in land transactions in northern Taupō – and agreed a resolution which they asked the Government to endorse. Sheehan refused to entertain the proposal and instead encouraged the chiefs to take their boundary issues to the 'tribunal for the settlement of such matters – the Native Land Court'.<sup>456</sup> In Ms Marr's view: 'All the chiefs wanted at this time was a determination of a tribal boundary based on consideration of evidence from all knowledgeable chiefs including those Kīngitanga chiefs who would not recognise a colonial court. They wanted to reach such an agreement to avoid violence and when this was agreed, they wanted the government to accept this.'<sup>457</sup>

---

450. Document A28, p 207.

451. Document A78, pp 453–454, 459; doc A110, pp 619–660.

452. Te Waka Māori o Niu Tirangi, 8 February 1879, p 287; doc A78, p 459.

453. Document A78, pp 453–454, 459.

454. Document A78, p 457.

455. Document A79, p 52 (Husbands and Mitchell); doc A28, pp 245–7.

456. Document A78, p 456.

457. Document A78, p 457.

7.4.2.4 The hui at Te Kōpua, May 1879

Anticipation of a settlement ran high as the hui to conclude and ratify Grey's proposed terms drew closer. Once again, the hui coincided with the annual Maehe. Estimates of the number of people present varied, but some reports suggest as many as 6,000 attended, including representatives from many of the major tribal groups in both the North and South islands. The venue was Te Kōpua, said to have been agreed to by Tāwhiao because of its proximity to the aukati, making it easier for Pākehā settlers to attend.<sup>458</sup>

In a grand show of the effectiveness of their networks and capacity to mobilise, Kīngitanga communities prepared for the hui for months in advance. Tāwhiao reportedly supervised fishing activities at Kāwhia. More kaimoana arrived from communities as far away as Waiuku and the Firth of Thames; pigs and cattle from Mōkau and upper Waipā; further gifts of food from Tūhua; and thousands of eels from Lake Whangape near Rangiriri. The activity even prompted an extension to the Kāwhia-Hikurangi dray road to assist in transportation of supplies.<sup>459</sup> The hui itself also opened with what the New Zealand Herald described as 'an imposing military parade': 180 young men, their heads dressed in feathers, carrying guns, spears and pistols, marched in slow time, with Te Ngakau at their head and Wahanui and Tāwhiao immediately behind. The men then engaged in prayers before seating themselves around Tāwhiao, who then began to speak.<sup>460</sup>

For reasons that were unclear then and remain unclear now, Tāwhiao began the hui with an expression of his defiance of the colonial government, and a call for all Māori to unite behind him alone. Addressing all the Māori present, from their various tribes throughout the motu, Tāwhiao said:

The word is this: Potatau alone is the ancestor of all people. Potatau alone is the chief of this Island, of you all, and you cannot deny it. . . . There is another one: Rewi is there on that side. On this side, then, be one, and I am another. These are my councillors; for this reason I say the land is mine. I have alone the right to conduct the business of my country . . . I therefore say this: Sir George Grey has no right to conduct matters on this Island, but I have the sole right to conduct matters in my land—from the North Cape to the southern end.<sup>461</sup>

Tāwhiao referred to his father's rejection of the Treaty, saying he did not consent 'to any of the arrangements which prevail on this Island'. Those arrangements, he said, had brought war. He then affirmed his commitment to peace, not war: 'There is not to be any fighting whatever; neither about roads, leases, nor about anything else. Let fighting be kept away to the other side.' At the end of his speech, Rewi stood and moved to Tāwhiao's side.<sup>462</sup>

---

458. Document A78, pp 464–465.

459. Document A78, p 464.

460. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 8 May 1879, p 5.

461. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 8 May 1879, p 5.

462. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 8 May 1879, p 5.

Tāwhiao's speech surprised and disappointed Pākehā observers, who had expected the hui to be a simple ratification of the terms negotiated at Hikurangi. The Herald expressed concern about what it saw as Tāwhiao's appeal to 'a truly national sentiment' among Māori.<sup>463</sup> It worried that if a permanent national Māori movement formed with Tāwhiao at the centre, it would create the strongest possible barrier to opening any remaining Māori territories to Pākehā settlement.<sup>464</sup>

Other reports wondered if Tāwhiao had deliberately set out to cause offence and drive a wedge between Rewi (and Ngāti Maniapoto) and the Government. Some at the hui criticised Rewi over his discussions with Sheehan. Whereas previously Rewi had confined himself to specifically local or tribal matters, he now appeared to be negotiating over the future of the whole district.<sup>465</sup> In our view, Tāwhiao was not seeking to isolate Rewi, but rather inviting him to show his continued support for the Kīngitanga. Rewi himself would explain later that his only purposes in negotiating with the Government had been to secure peace and protect the lands over which Tāwhiao would exercise authority.<sup>466</sup>

Tāwhiao may also have been testing the resolve of the Government and of other iwi. Having won Grey's recognition of his right to exercise authority over the remaining Kīngitanga lands, he sought to determine whether that authority might extend outside those lands – a matter that would depend on the agreement of other iwi as much as it relied on the Government. He may also have been intending to convey that he would not accept an authority beneath that of the colonial government. Whereas the Government saw itself as a superior sovereign power offering to delegate some local authority to Māori under its jurisdiction, Tāwhiao was likely to have seen them as negotiations over the respective spheres of influence of colonial authorities and the Kīngitanga as equals. Immediately after the speech, Te Heuheu offered his support, and Wahanui and Te Ngakau advised that there would be no more discussion that day and that each tribe should take the evening to consider its position.<sup>467</sup>

For Māori in attendance, two days of debate followed, facilitated by Wahanui and Te Wheoro. The extent of Tāwhiao's authority – where it lay on the land – was the central issue. According to Ms Marr, reports of the hui suggested that those involved were 'split between those who supported the King and those who had never followed the King or no longer did'.<sup>468</sup> Those who did not support Tāwhiao (such as rangatira from Ngapuhi and Te Rarawa) expressed a wish to make their own laws in conjunction with the Government, but were not willing to accept a Waikato King.<sup>469</sup> Te Wheoro said he wanted to return to the terms Grey had proposed at the Hikurangi hui in 1879, which involved the recognition of Tāwhiao

---

463. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 9 May 1879, p 5; doc A78, p 467.

464. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 9 May 1879, p 5; doc A78, p 467.

465. Document A78, pp 467–468.

466. Document A78, pp 468–469.

467. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 8 May 1879, p 5.

468. Document A78, p 468.

469. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1879, p 6.

exercising authority in his districts, including in respect of sale, lease, roads and surveys.<sup>470</sup>

Speakers also discussed the establishment of the Kingitanga and the reasons for the wars in the first place. Wahanui argued a king was needed because the Treaty had failed to deliver to them on its promise, but the Kingitanga could continue under the 'shadow' of the Queen. He also asked who had 'severed' Māori from the Queen in the first place, then answered that it was the Government which had breached the Treaty by making war initially against Ngapuhi and then against others.<sup>471</sup> He told those assembled he had chosen the Kingitanga as 'the post to tie my canoe to; just as his forebear Hoturoa had tied Tainui to Te Ahurei.<sup>472</sup>

Rewi returned to his tree of peace metaphor, saying he had gone to Hikurangi to plant this tree and tended it at Waitara, but the tree had failed to flourish. The discussion at Waitara had been 'severed' by the Government's recent survey of the Waimate Plains, which had become a key focus of the Parihaka resistance movement; and the offer at Hikurangi had been destroyed on 'the road', which was probably a reference to the Government's building of the road from Raglan to Waipā. Addressing Grey directly, Rewi said: 'Speak . . . Tell us why the words at Hikurangi have been destroyed and not allowed to mature? Tell us the reason why we have come to talk like this today. I flew to the word that the tree of peace should be planted, and how is it that it has been split?'<sup>473</sup>

This suggests another potential reason for Tāwhiao's defiance: he and his advisors regarded the Government as offering to respect Tāwhiao's authority on the one hand, while pursuing unilateral actions that affected his lands on the other. Both Grey and Te Wheoro tried to guide the meeting back to the Hikurangi proposals.<sup>474</sup>

The hui broke for the weekend and began again on Monday 12 May. Rewi spoke again, saying he would continue to negotiate with Grey, to 'arrange matters, and find a place in which we may dwell in peace . . . I will hold fast to him that he may finish the work'. As noted above, Rewi also said that his purpose had been to protect the lands over which Tāwhiao would have authority. He told Grey that good work had been done in the previous hui at Whakairoiro, Hikurangi, and Waitara, then added: 'I will build up my district, commencing from a certain point and going right round. I will continue building up this land . . . and continue to work for the good of the people.'<sup>475</sup> Ms Marr saw this 'as a clear statement from Rewi that he had not intended to split from Tāwhiao but felt obliged to act urgently to protect the lands that form the district that Tāwhiao would act as political leader

470. Document A78, p 468.

471. Document A78, p 468; 'Te Kopua Meeting', AJHR, 1879, G-2, p 7.

472. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1879, p 6.

473. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1879, p 6.

474. Document A78, p 469.

475. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 13 May 1879, p 6.

for.<sup>476</sup> It was also a clear invitation to continue negotiations; even if an agreement had not yet been reached, Rewi was indicating that it remained possible.

Grey took the floor late in the day. He reminded the hui that his Government had offered terms of settlement, and he had come to the district three times to discuss them. He said he had no power to change or go back on those terms, although he later noted he could discuss amendments 'in minor details' only.<sup>477</sup> Grey identified three matters about which he had heard 'grumblings' and which he said were undermining the agreement: work on the Raglan road, Crown land sales at Harapepe (northeast of Pirongia), and the Government's intention to build a railway to Mōkau.<sup>478</sup>

Māori concerns regarding ongoing work on the Raglan road arose from the expectation that had been in place since the Hikurangi hui that the Kīngitanga would be consulted about roads in the territory over which the king's authority was recognised. In addressing the issue at the Te Kōpua hui, Grey did not mention this. Instead he said the road was laid out over land the Government had acquired by purchasing it fairly. He said that the road would benefit both Māori and Pākehā, and Māori had already benefitted by being employed in the road's construction.<sup>479</sup>

In explaining the sale of land at Harapepe, Grey said the Government regarded it as excluded from the proposal to return Waikato lands to Tāwhiao, even though McLean had included it in his offer of terms. This was, it seems, the first official public admission that not all Crown lands were to be made available to return to the Kīngitanga. In particular, the Grey Government planned to exclude the blocks that McLean had repurchased specifically to include them in the package of lands ringfenced for return, which were mostly in the Harapepe district around Pirongia. But Grey did say that some Harapepe lands would be set aside as an endowment for a school at which Kīngitanga children could be educated. And he said that the town allotments included in his terms would provide Māori with an immediate source of revenue. He did not take the opportunity to clarify exactly what other lands would be returned if the Kīngitanga agreed to his proposed settlement.<sup>480</sup>

As for the railway, Grey did not deny that the Government had arranged funding for a railway to Mōkau, but he assured the hui that there was no intention of building it without the chiefs' agreement. He noted the economic benefits that would enrich the Kīngitanga territory if the railway was allowed through. He said he expected nothing from them in return for the proposals he had made at Hikurangi. But he also criticised the Kīngitanga chiefs, saying that by shutting doctors and medicine out of their district they were letting innocent children die,

---

476. Document A78, p 469.

477. Document A78, p 472.

478. 'Te Kopua Meeting', AJHR, 1879, G-2, p 15 (doc A78, p 472).

479. Document A78, p 470.

480. Document A78, pp 470-471, 477.

and claimed their policies prevented the people from accessing the wealth that would otherwise be available to them.<sup>481</sup>

Grey concluded his speech with an ultimatum: the Kīngitanga needed to accept the Crown's terms, or they would be withdrawn. He waited for an answer from them until 10 o'clock the next morning. His deadline came and went with no reply from the chiefs. He then wrote to Tāwhiao and formally withdrew his offer of terms, adding that the land intended for return would no longer be protected from sale.<sup>482</sup>

Before Grey left Te Kōpua, he reportedly fired one more volley: he left a 'book' with Rewi and Te Rerenga said to contain a list of Waikato chiefs who had leased or sold land outside the aukati in the Waikato and Auckland districts. It is likely the book recorded small allotments within confiscated territory set aside for certain chiefs, a markedly different scenario than dealings with extensive land blocks. Some chiefs explained they had done no more than sell sections the Government had allocated to them and to which they had no traditional claim. Some denied they had anything to do with the lands, and others said confiscated lands were beyond the reach of Tāwhiao's policies and jurisdiction. These arguments were among the several that followed Grey's departure as the various groups admonished each other while trying to make sense of what had happened and understand what lay behind the ultimatum.<sup>483</sup>

7.4.2.5 Outcome of negotiations with Grey

Settler newspapers were quick to blame Tāwhiao for the failure of the Te Kōpua hui, accusing him of refusing the best offer he was ever likely to receive. At the same time, many Pākehā were pleased with Grey's ultimatum. They looked forward to the Government being able to negotiate without having to indulge Tāwhiao. Grey seemed unconcerned. He claimed he had planned all along to offer the same terms as McLean. In Parliament, he explained that he had little choice but to continue the negotiations McLean had begun. Now that they had failed, negotiations could begin afresh.<sup>484</sup>

So far as the Kīngitanga was concerned, however, Grey's ultimatum meant there was no further opportunity over matters that remained of concern to them. Perhaps the major difficulty was the return of confiscated lands: Tāwhiao and other Kīngitanga leaders sought the return of Waikato land as far as the Mangatawhiri and the acknowledgement of Kīngitanga authority in those territories that had been pledged. Grey had offered to recognise Tāwhiao's authority over his territories, but uncertainty remained as to whether that would include authority over returned Waikato lands, and Tāwhiao also appears to have been reluctant to accept an offer that cast his authority as inferior to that of the colonial government. Another issue, alluded to during the hui, was the potential for Crown

---

481. Document A78, p 472.

482. Document A78, p 472.

483. Document A78, p 473.

484. Document A78, p 474.

encroachment into Rohe Pōtae lands, particularly via the Raglan-Waipā road and the Mōkau railway. Both reflected dissatisfaction among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about the way the Government's policies had come to impinge on the aukati.<sup>485</sup>

These were concerns with which the Government ought to have been well acquainted by 1879. However, it was clear that in the year since the hui at Hikurangi, Grey had done very little to identify which lands specifically might be offered to the Kīngitanga. Grey also admitted that the three specific complaints raised by Māori during the hui at Te Kōpua were the result of Government actions that had been taken over the past year. It was eventually revealed that Grey knew of these complaints before the Te Kōpua hui even began: Tāwhiao had personally written to Grey about these issues ahead of the hui, and Rewi had informed Grey that the chiefs' trust in him had wavered because of both the Raglan-Waipā road and the survey of confiscated lands on the Waimate Plains. For these reasons, by August 1879, the New Zealand Herald was beginning to cast doubt over whether Tāwhiao was entirely to blame for the parties failing to arrive at an agreement at the Te Kōpua hui, and suggested that Grey was less surprised at Tāwhiao's anger than he had claimed at the time.<sup>486</sup>

Following Grey's withdrawal of the terms offered, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had to accept that there was no prospect of an immediate resolution. But they were as determined as ever to protect their territory and resist any encroachment on it. Following the Te Kōpua hui, Ngāti Maniapoto (including Wahanui) agreed that Rewi could continue negotiating with the Government to define the boundary of the Rohe Pōtae lands and protect them from the public works, leasing, purchasing and Native Land Court activities that gnawed at its boundaries. The arrangement presented a frustrating public relations problem. As Rewi carried out his task – for example, variously meeting with Sheehan throughout May 1879 – it was easy to claim he was acting independently of Tāwhiao and had effectively split from the Kīngitanga. Yet, there was little indication that the Kīngitanga was breaking up as many commentators suggested.<sup>487</sup>

Immediately following the hui at Te Kōpua, Sheehan met several times with Rewi at Kihikihi. There, he encouraged Rewi and others to define their boundaries, which would become a boundary between their territory and Crown-granted lands. Rangatira from across Te Rohe Pōtae were present, including Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Haua, Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui, all of whom conveyed their boundaries to Sheehan. Rewi conveyed his portion of the boundary 'very minutely', down to creeks. He stopped at the Taupō region, at which point the Ngāti Tūwharetoa chiefs, including Te Heuheu, took over. The boundary extended from Taupō, Ruapehu, and Tongariro, through to Mōkau. The territory it contained was estimated at 'not less' than 4,000,000 acres.<sup>488</sup>

---

485. Document A78, pp 477, 479–481.

486. New Zealand Herald, 14 August 1879, p 4; New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1879, p 6; 'Editorial', New Zealand Herald, 17 May 1879; doc A78, pp 475–477.

487. Document A78, pp 478–480.

488. Document A78, pp 481–483.

Sheehan later reported on these discussions to Parliament. He suggested that so long as certain boundary issues were settled, Rewi and his people would accept ‘the boundary that had been laid down by the Government’. In exchange, he said, ‘if the Government would agree for a reasonable time to protect a certain area of country from occupation by sale or lease, Rewi would do his best to get his people to put their lands – amongst themselves as it were – through the Court, for the purpose of laying down a tribal boundary’. At that point ‘they would throw open the land for settlement’.<sup>489</sup> Regardless of whether Sheehan’s remarks were an entirely faithful account of what took place at the meeting, especially with respect to the opening of the district for settlement, they demonstrated the Government had some appreciation that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought the protection of an external boundary, along with recognition of their right to control the lands within it. However, as Ms Marr noted, in practice, the Native Land Court by this time no longer determined or confirmed tribal boundaries separate from its investigations of title. Any attempt to confirm a boundary would therefore also have resulted in the transformation of customary title.<sup>490</sup>

In May 1879, Sheehan persuaded Rewi to attend a Native Land Court hearing at Cambridge. Sheehan later told Parliament that this was the most ‘extreme step he ever took in his life’ and that the Government would now have in Rewi ‘a right-hand man, and a faithful helper’.<sup>491</sup> However, Rewi’s priority remained the protection of the aukati. Ms Marr says that Rewi’s focus in attending the court was seeking certain cases to be adjourned or struck out. These were cases that either impinged on the boundary or involved the interests of a range of iwi groups.<sup>492</sup>

Late in June, Rewi travelled with Sheehan to Auckland, in response to an invitation to meet Grey and current Governor Hercules Robinson. He was accompanied, as he so often was during this period, by representative Te Rohe Pōtae chiefs, including Wetere Te Rerenga and Hitiri Paerata. It was the first time any senior Kīngitanga chief had visited Auckland since the wars, and they were well received – taken to various colonial Auckland attractions and hosted at a series of civic receptions.<sup>493</sup>

The Auckland Star reported Rewi’s proposal ‘[t]hat a Maori district shall be formed, the boundaries to be pretty well identical with the present King Country—the line to run from some point north of Kawhia along the line of confiscation to Maungatautari, thence to Taupo, thence to the head of the Wanganui river, on to the coast, the sea forming the Eastern boundary’. The Star noted that some of the lands Rewi wanted to include lay east of the Waikato River and were disputed by some Ngāti Raukawa communities, but suggested that Rewi might be persuaded to bring his boundary back to the river.<sup>494</sup>

489. Sheehan, 23 July 1879, NZPD, vol 31, p 183; doc A78, p 484.

490. Document A78, pp 456–457, 484.

491. Sheehan, 23 July 1879, NZPD, vol 31, pp 183–184; doc A78, p 486.

492. Document A78, pp 485–488.

493. Document A78, pp 491–492.

494. ‘Rewi and the Governor’, Auckland Star, 20 June 1879, p 2.

Describing the proposed district as ‘Rewi’s Kingdom of Aotearoa’, the newspaper said it would be ‘governed by native rules’, led by Tāwhiao if he agreed. All residents, Māori or European, would be subject to Māori law and to the jurisdiction of Māori magistrates. All land would be permanently inalienable by sale (though some leasing may be permitted). The first step towards creating this district was to secure agreement on the boundary; from there, other decisions would follow, including the possibility that the district would be traversed by the North Island Main Trunk Railway.<sup>495</sup> Several of these proposals would be repeated four years later in 1883, when Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa and northern Whanganui iwi would petition the Crown seeking statutory recognition of their rights of self-determination (see chapter 8, section 8.4.5).

When Rewi returned to Te Rohe Pōtae he was shown an allotment at Kihikihi which the Government had decided to gift to him and on which a house would be built. It was a welcome gesture. Kihikihi had been Rewi’s home, and it remained important long after the former Ngāti Maniapoto settlement, including the whare rūnanga ‘Hui Te Rangiora’, had been destroyed, the lands confiscated, and the people driven off (see chapter 6). Rewi did not relocate to the house once it was completed as government officials hoped, continuing instead to live inside the aukati, south of the Puniu River from Kihikihi, though he used it when he visited Kihikihi and allowed many others to use it similarly.<sup>496</sup> Later events involving the land granted to Rewi will be discussed in a future chapter of this report.

Instead of providing a new mandate to continue negotiations, the October 1879 election resulted in the end of Grey’s ministry. Arguably, the Kihikihi allotment was the only tangible outcome of the preceding two years of negotiations. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had at least had the opportunity to signal their clear priorities in any future negotiations. As far as they were concerned, any agreement would be conditional upon the Crown’s recognition and protection of the aukati and the exercise of Māori authority within it. Meanwhile, Crown institutions or initiatives – including public works, land sales, leases and surveys, and the Native Land Court – would remain prohibited within the aukati for the time being.<sup>497</sup>

7.4.3 Suspension of negotiations, 1879–81

Following the election, a new Ministry was formed under the leadership of John Hall. It would not be an easy Ministry, with conflicting interests, personalities and policy preferences contained in the single cabinet. It was also a time of growing recession and therefore fiscal restraint. The new Government was elected based on its promises to cut back state spending and debt, while promoting economic development by opening up districts that remained in Māori possession. Initially, the Government also intended to continue construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.<sup>498</sup> However, citing financial pressures, the new Government

---

495. ‘Rewi and the Governor’, Auckland Star, 20 June 1879, p.2.

496. Document A78, pp 493–494, 508; doc A110, pp 231, 560–561, 602.

497. Document A78, pp 494–496.

498. Document A78, p 499.

quickly abandoned its predecessor's decision to complete the railway through Mōkau and Taranaki.<sup>499</sup>

The new Native Minister was John Bryce. Apart from a brief period in 1881 (discussed below), Bryce held the position until August 1884. He was at various times described as strong-willed, stubborn, and narrow-minded, but also exceptionally honest. Like many of his cabinet colleagues, he had a long-standing political career, having first entered local politics twenty years earlier. But in other ways he had quite a different background from most of them. He had grown up with few opportunities for formal education and identified politically most closely with those with small farming interests, whereas the new ministry mainly comprised a mix of experienced politicians who had close associations with wealthy investors and entrepreneurs, and others who identified with more recently arrived settlers.<sup>500</sup>

7.4.3.1 The policies of the Hall Ministry

Bryce's approach – some would say his personal style – towards Māori policy was impatient and forceful. He wanted to end what he described as policies of 'personal government' through which Government Ministers and Premiers had distributed a range of gifts to certain Māori.<sup>501</sup> Yet the new Government did ensure the Kihikihi home that Grey had promised to Rewi was finished to completion, including furnishings. Indeed, Bryce hoped Rewi would spend more time there if not relocate permanently, which would better position him to maintain close contacts with officials while also putting some distance between him and Tāwhiao.<sup>502</sup>

Bryce particularly wanted to revise the Government's land purchasing system and theorised that land speculators delayed the opening up of Māori land for Pākehā settlement because they held on to the lands till they could make a profit, usually from the Government. He also wanted to rid Crown land acquisitions of waste and political abuse, and look for ways that Māori could be encouraged to make more lands available. A review he conducted of Government land purchasing aimed at rationalising the system, including abandoning unrealistic purchases in favour of completing those deemed most important. Throughout the early 1880s he became more and more persuaded that a return to Crown pre-emption – first proposed by Julius Vogel in the mid-1870s (see also chapters 8 and 11) – was the most effective means of extending Pākehā settlement in line with Government policy. Bryce argued against special consideration for Māori who resisted surveying, public works, or purchasing, and in favour of enforcing assimilation, even by coercive means. His colleagues had little difficulty accepting the principles of assimilation, but there was still a strong vein of support for the gradualist approach

499. Document A20, p 44.

500. Document A78, pp 497–499; Hazel Riseborough, 'John Bryce', in 1870–1900, vol 2 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, pp 61–62; WJ Gardner, 'John Hall', in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, pp 172–174.

501. AJHR, 1879, G-1, p 2; doc A78, p 500.

502. Document A78, p 508.

first introduced by McLean, with few prepared to risk the kinds of hostilities likely to result from taking a more aggressive stance.<sup>503</sup>

One of the main ways Bryce implemented his assimilationist approach to Māori policy was to wind down what was regarded as the separate administration of Native Affairs. For example, oversight of Māori schools transferred from the Native Department to the Education Department, and Public Works took more and more responsibility for public works in Māori districts. The resident magistrates system was down-sized, as were options for official mediation of legal disputes between Māori and Pākehā. During an age when all-Pākehā juries were the norm, and settler authority was expanding into new forms of local government, Māori were left to foot it with their Pākehā counterparts in the mainstream colonial system.<sup>504</sup>

One of the obvious exceptions to Bryce's assimilation and recession-driven rationalisation of Māori affairs was the Native Land Court, the institution that was so integral to the transfer of Māori property to the Crown and Pākehā settlers. Indeed, Bryce significantly strengthened the Court's administration and bolstered its resources. Another exception was Māori parliamentary representation, which the Hall Government resisted changing even when the opportunity to do so presented itself.<sup>505</sup> The subject was thoroughly debated in the House in 1881, and while no change followed, the debate did highlight the reality of a Kīngitanga territory in which the 'Queen's writ' did not and could not run.<sup>506</sup>

The Hall Ministry continued Grey and Sheehan's policy of refusing to deal with Tāwhiao. Nor would it acknowledge the Kīngitanga territory, undertaking just a few low-key interactions with Rewi and Ngāti Maniapoto. For his part, Rewi remained open-minded about engaging with the Government. He and other Kīngitanga chiefs sought to re-establish an amicable relationship with William Mair, who had been dismissed by Grey's administration in 1877, but was re-appointed at the beginning of 1880 as the government agent tasked with reporting on the Kīngitanga.<sup>507</sup>

From late 1879, the ministry also tried to encourage Kīngitanga groups to accept Crown grants of land for 'landless rebels' available beyond the aukati. However, most Kīngitanga communities continued to refuse these and other offers for the piecemeal return of confiscated lands, preferring to wait for an agreement to return all confiscated lands (see chapter 6, section 6.9.6). Mostly, the Hall Government paid very little attention to the Kīngitanga or Te Rohe Pōtae during its first two years.<sup>508</sup>

During that period, the Government's primary focus was in dealing with the Parihaka resistance movement, which had mobilised against the Government's

503. Document A78, pp 500–502.

504. Alan Ward, A Show of Justice: Racial 'Amalgamation' in Nineteenth Century New Zealand (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1995), pp 281–283; doc A78, pp 502–503, 825.

505. Document A78, pp 503–506.

506. 'Representation Bill', 17 August 1881, NZPD, vol 39, pp 591–592, 597; doc A78, pp 506–507.

507. Document A78, pp 508, 514–515.

508. Document A78, pp 508–509.

attempted implementation of the Taranaki confiscation through the survey of the Waimate Plains. Bryce displayed his hard-line style in relation to Taranaki, introducing the contentious legislation that allowed Parihaka activists to be imprisoned without trial for up to two years. He often urged a more heavy-handed approach than his colleagues preferred. He understood that he might provoke Māori but was frustrated by what he regarded as a lack of Government action at a time when it really ought to have been asserting its authority. He particularly wanted to make an example of important chiefs like Te Whiti and Tohu, and to bring in Hiroki, who was wanted for murder but living openly at Parihaka.<sup>509</sup>

In late 1880, after considerable debate about how to deal with the situation in Taranaki and feeling that he had little if any support in Cabinet, Bryce tendered his resignation, which he withdrew after further discussions. But his dissatisfaction continued, and in January 1881 he followed through with his resignation. William Rolleston took over as Native Minister. The Parihaka activists were not deterred, and in October the Government returned Bryce to cabinet. Within weeks of his re-appointment as Native Minister, Bryce led the Government's invasion of Parihaka.<sup>510</sup>

The Crown's treatment of the community at Parihaka was one that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori followed closely, as they considered whether or how they might support the resistance there. Undoubtedly some of their people went to Parihaka – notably, Te Mahuki and his people, who were living there by late 1879 (see sidebar). Rewi's long-held interest in the Taranaki confiscations was well known. Tāwhiao had a strong relationship with Te Whiti and Tohu, and large numbers of Ngāti Maniapoto supported the Parihaka people. But at a hui held at Te Kōpua in February 1880 (prior to the Crown's invasion of Parihaka), the Kīngitanga policy of refraining from joining conflicts outside the aukati was reaffirmed. While the aukati would be defended, even more strictly than previously, the keepers of the aukati would not send support to assist Te Whiti.<sup>511</sup>

Te Mahuki Manukura (1840s–99)

Te Mahuki was born into Ngāti Kinohaku, a hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto, at Te Kumi in the 1840s. Little is known of his early life, but by the mid-1870s he and much of his hapū lived at Parihaka as followers of the peace prophets Te Whiti o Rongomai and Tohu Kākahi. Te Mahuki played a prominent role in the passive resistance orchestrated by the prophets and in 1879 he was arrested and imprisoned without trial

509. Document A78, pp 510–511.

510. Document A78, pp 511–512.

511. Document A78, pp 513–514.

for his involvement in the land ploughing campaign. He was released two years later and returned to Parihaka shortly before the Crown's November 1881 invasion. During the Crown's occupation of the settlement Te Mahuki was arrested and was again incarcerated without trial.

Upon his release Te Mahuki was forbidden from returning to Parihaka. Instead, he returned to Te Kumi where he established a settlement that imitated Parihaka's layout, social life, customs and rituals. From this base in the heart of Te Rohe Pōtae he came to represent a thorn in the side of Pākehā officialdom. Te Mahuki became a prophet in his own right and alongside his followers – the Tekau-ma-rua – he orchestrated active unarmed resistance against the Crown. In late March 1883, following the agreement that permitted Crown officials to venture beyond the aukati, Te Mahuki intercepted and captured Charles Hursthouse, the Crown surveyor. This action reflected Te Mahuki's opposition to the Crown's presence in the region, as well as his resentment of Hursthouse, who had played a role in the invasion of Parihaka. Hursthouse was held prisoner for two days until a party of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori arrived to free him. A hui was then held at Tokanganui-a-noho to discuss the incident, though Te Mahuki was unrepentant. He accused Te Kooti of being 'humbugged' by a false government pardon and on 26 March he marched to Alexandra to confront the Native Minister, John Bryce. This action was motivated by the same factors that had prompted Hursthouse's abduction, though Te Mahuki was arrested before he had the chance to follow it through.

After serving a sentence of 12 months hard labour, Te Mahuki returned to Te Rohe Pōtae. There, he attracted the support of Rewi Maniapoto and adopted the title Manukura. Although he was a staunch opponent of the Crown, Te Mahuki did not oppose the presence of Pākehā in Te Rohe Pōtae. Indeed, he leased some of his own tribal lands to Pākehā settlers. Rather, his opposition was directed at the Crown, and land speculators specifically, a position informed by his belief that land loss would precipitate the demise of Māori. Te Mahuki continued to act on this belief when, in 1890, he ejected Pākehā shopkeepers from their Te Kūiti stores, citing their lack of land leases. In 1897, meanwhile, he smashed the windows of Green and Colebrooke's general store in Te Kūiti and attempted to burn it down. At his trial for this offence Te Mahuki's defence rested on the storeowner's involvement in land transactions. This latter offence proved to be Te Mahuki's last. After serving 18 months in Mt Eden Prison he was transferred to the Avondale Mental Hospital where he died of pulmonary tuberculosis in August 1899.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. New Zealand Herald, 25 November 1897, p 6; Binney, Redemption Songs, pp 312–313; Mark Derby, 'Mahuki of the Red Plume: The Intersection of Labour and Race Politics in 1890', in Brief, 44–45 (2012), pp 137–147; Chris Koroheke, 'Te Mahuki', in 1870–1900, vol 2 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, pp 518–519; doc A110, pp 625, 643; doc A78, pp 182, 407.

7.4.3.2 Areas of concern on the border, 1880–81

Despite the Government's lack of interest in resuming negotiations, the Kingitanga continued to meet throughout 1880 and 1881 to discuss matters of concern. Wahanui facilitated many of these meetings and during this time became known as Tāwhiao's principal advisor. Their discussions continued to concentrate on the prohibition of surveys, sales, leases, public works, and the Native Land Court. Tensions in border areas, where Pākehā settlement was expanding, remained a concern. The Kingitanga undertook to continue to protest public works in these areas, but it would do so without arms. Tāwhiao also began to encourage Kingitanga Māori who were living in border areas where tensions ran high to relocate to the Hikurangi area, specifically Whatiwhatihoe.

A key area of concern was the fate of lands in the Mōkau district, where the rangatira Wetere Te Rerenga had begun to look to the Native Land Court for confirmation of title to his people's lands. The question of whether Mōkau might become the subject of a Native Land Court hearing had been present since 1877 (see section 7.4.2.1). At that time, Wetere and Rewi had resisted the efforts of local settler Joshua Jones and the chief Epiha to take the land to the court. Jones and Epiha continued to press the issue, however. To this extent, Thomas says, 'Rewi and Wetere saw the survey as a necessary concession to demands from local chiefs, while continuing to preserve unchallenged Māori authority over Mōkau.'<sup>512</sup> This dovetailed into Rewi's broader interest in obtaining a survey of the external boundary, which Thomas says Rewi had under active consideration by May 1879. The Government despatched a surveyor, WH Skinner, to Mōkau. Though the size of Jones's claimed lease was disputed, Skinner was eventually able to survey a small area of land. But by the time the survey had been completed, Grey's Government had been defeated, and the new Government had little appetite to pursue the matter further.<sup>513</sup> Unperturbed by the setback, Jones set out to promote a joint coal extraction arrangement, following new reports of coal deposits in the Mōkau River. However, in September 1880 Rewi ordered them to cease any activity.<sup>514</sup> There the matter rested until 1881, when a number of new factors emerged which compelled Wetere to consider seeking to acquire title through the court once again.

The first cause for concern was Pākehā trespassing into Mōkau territory and claiming rights derived from Crown lands purchased in the 1850s that had never been taken up.<sup>515</sup> In February 1881, a group of Europeans entered the region, without permission, to prospect for gold and coal. Māori mistakenly believed that the group had Government backing. As well as protesting directly to the Government, Māori also asked the group to leave. The prospectors refused to do so, claiming

---

512. Document A28, p 212.

513. Document A28, pp 215–216.

514. Document A28, p 220.

515. Document A28, p 223.

that they were 'on Government land' (though it is not clear from the newspaper reports exactly where they were). Wetere Te Rerenga, worried about the potential for violence, told his people that they were 'not to strike or ill-treat the Europeans who persist in prospecting . . . but to take their food away: and then they will be compelled to return for want of sustenance'.<sup>516</sup> The prospectors were undeterred and remained in Mōkau for several more months. Rewi and others chose not to resort to physical force and instead asked the Government to act to remove the intruders.<sup>517</sup> The Government refused to act, and in March 1881, Rewi renewed his call that all prospecting activity in Mōkau cease.<sup>518</sup>

An additional cause for concern soon arose when information suddenly emerged in June 1881 that the northern boundary of the Taranaki confiscation area was much further to the north than previously understood. Mōkau Māori had long considered the Waipingao Stream (just north of the Pukearuhe redoubt) to be the approximate location of the confiscation boundary line. A little further south, very close to the redoubt, the Waikāramuramu Stream was the border established with Ngāti Tama when they returned to the area in the 1840s. However, the Crown had in fact set the boundary as commencing at Parininihi then proceeding in a straight line 20 miles inland. Parininihi was three miles north of the Pukearuhe redoubt.<sup>519</sup>

Wetere had hoped for the confiscation to be reversed and to be granted title for Waipingao, but his hopes would go unanswered.<sup>520</sup> At a meeting between Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs and Robert Parris (on behalf of Native Minister Rolleston) in June 1881, the assembled Māori expressed their opposition to the confiscation. They referred to the setting of the boundary as a theft and called for the Crown to fix the law. Parris, however, said that the Crown could not reconsider the confiscation line.<sup>521</sup>

A third factor soon emerged when it became apparent that Ngāti Tama and other Taranaki chiefs were attempting to initiate dealings with the Crown for Mōkau lands. During 1881, Ngāti Tama chiefs Taringakuri Te Kaeaea Te Reweti and Paiuru Te Rangikatatu contacted the Government, calling for advance payments and hasty settlement of Pākehā on the land. In September 1881, the chiefs wrote to the Government: 'Make haste and contract a marriage with one woman that there may be born unto us a male child. The woman we refer to is land, and the child the Poutama territory. The courting days are over and something definite should be arrived at.'<sup>522</sup>

516. 'Native Meeting at White Cliffs', Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2; doc A28, pp 223–224.

517. Document A28, p 223.

518. Document A28, p 220.

519. Document A28, p 224.

520. Document A28, p 233.

521. 'Native Meeting at White Cliffs', Taranaki Herald, 25 Jun 1881, p 2; doc A28, pp 225–226.

522. 'A New Goldfield', Wanganui Herald, 15 Sep 1881, p 3; doc A28, p 228.

There is little evidence of the motivations of the Ngāti Tama chiefs. Dr Thomas considers that in seeking to gain initial payments, ongoing revenue, and joint control over the land, they were attempting to stop Ngāti Maniapoto from doing the same; some also had close ties with European prospectors, who may have been encouraging the dealing.<sup>523</sup> The offer may also have been caught up with Ngāti Tama efforts to engage in land transactions in Taranaki, including for land already confiscated. It is unclear, however, whether any negotiations took place.<sup>524</sup> Either way, Wetere immediately travelled to Wellington in September 1881 to protest the 'sale' to Native Minister Rolleston.<sup>525</sup> Rolleston agreed not to make an advance payment to Ngāti Tama for Poutama, but advised Wetere that if he wanted to secure his lands, he should seek the legal title through the Native Land Court.<sup>526</sup> Wetere made an application to the Court soon after, in November of that year.<sup>527</sup>

In calling for a court sitting, Wetere was clear that he regarded the activities of Europeans, rather than Ngāti Tama, as the main problem. He stated that '[i]t was not to end our dispute [with Ngāti Tama] that I sent in a claim to this Court'.<sup>528</sup> While disputes between Māori could be resolved using traditional forums, the intervention of Europeans complicated the situation. Māori could not control the activities of the Crown, the Native Land Court, or European prospectors. As Dr Thomas put it, '[o]nly the Court had the legal power to say who could, and equally as important, who could not deal with Pakeha over land matters'. Some Māori therefore came to view the court as the forum to resolve what was at heart 'a legal and Pakeha problem'.<sup>529</sup>

Wetere, however, still saw the need to get Rewi's and the King's consent before he could proceed with a court hearing. In September 1881, he wrote to Rewi and Tāwhiao seeking written permission for a Court hearing. Rewi, however, refused to commit himself.<sup>530</sup> This was despite the fact that he had earlier demonstrated his willingness to participate in Court processes over lands in the northeast, in attempts to define the external boundary of land remaining in Māori ownership in areas where the interests of his people interacted with others.<sup>531</sup> Mōkau may have presented as a different case.

7.4.3.3 Tāwhiao's friendship campaign

With concerns at the border only increasing, the 1881 Maehe – held at Hikurangi – was an opportunity for the Kingitanga to seek a reconfirmation of its existing policies, including a commitment to opposing land transactions. The Maehe also discussed the territories that committed to the Kingitanga when it first formed

---

523. Document A28, p 227.

524. Submission 3.4.305, pp 13–14.

525. Document A28, p 233.

526. Document A28, p 233.

527. Document A28, p 233.

528. Mokau-Waitara Native Land Court, minute book 1, 8 June 1882, p 30; doc A28, pp 232–233.

529. Document A28, p 233.

530. Document A28, p 238.

531. Document A79, pp 50–52.

– Karioi, Taranaki, Tongariro, Whanganui, Titiokura (between Taupō and Napier), Piako, Te Aroha and Thames. This was an important reaffirmation of the political and territorial pledges originally made to the first King, Te Wherowhero.<sup>532</sup>

The Maehe was also an opportunity for the Kīngitanga to approve its centre-piece strategy from this time – Tāwhiao's friendship campaign, through which it was hoped better relations would be fostered with the settlers who now lived on lands originally pledged to the King but now under government authority. The goal was to encourage settlers to accept Tāwhiao's underlying authority and see that in doing so the Kīngitanga could be relied on for peaceful dispute resolution. Central to the strategy was a series of visits to Waikato townships beyond the aukati.<sup>533</sup> Ahead of an initial visit to Alexandra, he sent Mair '150 head of Native game' (native birds) he and a party had shot near Harapepe in the confiscated district, which Mair distributed among the Alexandra townspeople.<sup>534</sup> In early June, Tāwhiao – with an entourage that peaked in number at 150 – visited Alexandra, entertaining the settlers just as the settlers entertained them, and taking in the best sights of the town (including the telephone and the train from Auckland), guided by locals. Reported as a successful visit, and a demonstration of friendship and goodwill on both sides, Tāwhiao and his group returned to Hikurangi after three days.<sup>535</sup>

Tāwhiao followed that preliminary visit with a multi-town tour, planned for July and August 1881. He began with an important show of peaceful intent. Accompanied by Wahanui, Manuhiri, other chiefs, and a large party of supporters, he met Mair on 11 July 1881 at the Puniu River bridge. Mair escorted the party to the hotel at Alexandra. There, outside on the road, Tāwhiao laid his gun down in front of Mair. His people followed suit and, according to some reports, laid down a further eighty guns and a revolver. Wahanui interpreted the action for Mair: 'This means peace,' he said. 'There would not be any more trouble.'<sup>536</sup>

The travelling party of about 450 Kīngitanga members visited several towns as far north as Mercer, and east to Cambridge. At Ngaruawahia, Tāwhiao visited the grave of his father, Potatau Te Wherowhero. They returned to Hikurangi via Alexandra, where Mair met them again. This time it was Mair who initiated a peace-making gesture, which he reported on at the end of August 1881.<sup>537</sup> Having first sought Native Minister Rolleston's permission, Mair reciprocated Tāwhiao's earlier laying down of arms, taking the same guns and arranging them on the road

532. Document A78, pp 524, 526, 534.

533. Document A78, p 534.

534. 'Tawhiao's Visit to the Waikato Settlements', AJHR, 1881, G-9, p1; doc A78, p 535. Harapepe was one of the areas McLean had offered for return to Tāwhiao, but which Grey later excluded. Tāwhiao let Mair know he was going to shoot pigeons there. Mair's response, if there was one, is unknown, and nor is it known if there was any special significance attached to pigeon-hunting at Harapepe.

535. Document A78, pp 534–536.

536. Document A78, pp 538–539; doc A110, p 617.

537. 'Tawhiao's Visit to the Waikato Settlements', AJHR, 1881 G-9, pp 3–4; document A78, pp 540–2.

at Alexandra to offer back to Tāwhiao. Mair explained that he had accepted the guns on the Government's behalf and had held onto them so that 'our old people and children should look upon them and be gladdened'. Now he wished to return the guns, keeping only Tāwhiao's, in exchange for which he would give his own gun.<sup>538</sup>

The exchange of his gun for Tāwhiao's was a 'token', Mair said, 'that my side – the Government – also wish that there should not be any more trouble . . . that all fighting should be put away'. He proposed that Tāwhiao take the guns 'to shoot birds for us in the future'. At that point, Tāwhiao conferred with Wahanui, after which Wahanui picked up Mair's gun saying he would only take that one. The rest of the guns, given as evidence of Kingitanga 'sincerity', had to 'follow their head' (that is Tāwhiao's gun). 'It is an offering which you must retain', Wahanui told Mair. Mair agreed and returned the Kingitanga guns 'to the barracks'.<sup>539</sup>

The Significance of the Laying Down of Guns

The meaning and import of these ceremonial exchanges has endured among claimants and their communities, who shared kōrero tuku iho with the Tribunal that acknowledge several symbolic acts of gifting and of offering peace. In his kōrero, Tohe Rauputu directly associated Tāwhiao's laying down of guns with the birds he presented to Mair, both symbols of peace, conveyed to Mair together. The 'Native game' presented to Mair included kākā, kereru, and kokako, also tui. But in giving the birds to Mair, Tāwhiao kept the pirairaka, the fantail, claiming it for himself and saying:

ko tēnei manu, māku ko te pirairaka, e tuku ana hoki ngā tapū i ahau ki runga i tēnei manu, me te kōrero e muri ake nei, e kore te pakanga i haere mai ki tēnei mōtu . . .

this bird, this fantail, is [here] for me to send the sacredness from myself in to it, with the foretelling that afterwards war will not come here to this land . . .

Though there are slight distinctions in the various tellings of these events, the central image of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori having sought reconciliation, and having committed to a permanent peace, has persisted over time. Indeed, Mair's gun – offered to Tāwhiao and picked up by Wahanui – remains conscientiously cared for 538. 'Tāwhiao's Visit to the Waikato Settlements', AJHR, 1881 G-9, pp 3-4; document A78, p 542.

539. 'Tāwhiao's Visit to the Waikato Settlements', AJHR, 1881 G-9, p 4; document A78, p 542.

among Ngāti Maniapoto, a symbol of Tāwhiao's goodwill and the events of 1881, displayed for the Tribunal at Mōkau.<sup>1</sup>

1. Transcript 4.1.5, p 170 (Tohe Rauputu, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Ihu hui, Maniaroa marae, 18 May 2010), translation by Waitangi Tribunal; see also doc A78, p 542.

Despite their symbolic importance, peace-making gestures could not on their own resolve the outstanding issues between the Kīngitanga and the Crown. Mair acknowledged Tāwhiao's goodwill tour as a show of reconciliation and also observed that Tāwhiao was keen to 'come to terms with the Government'. Mair thought that Wahanui similarly desired terms. He said that at one point he 'hinted to Tāwhiao that if he had any request to make he had better do so frankly'.<sup>540</sup> Mair's apparent openness with Tāwhiao, and his engagement on the Government's behalf, complicated the Hall Government's policy of ignoring Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga.

In the meantime, Tāwhiao and his people relocated to a new settlement, Whatiwhatihoe, where new buildings were constructed. The settlement was just a mile across the Waipā river from Alexandra, the local site of Crown authority. The relocation was significant because it was a move out of core Ngāti Maniapoto territory onto land that straddled the confiscation line. Part of the settlement was within the aukati and part was on confiscated Ngāti Hikairo land that had been returned to the Hikairo rangatira Hone Te One. Te One and his people offered this area of ancestral land to Tāwhiao as an assurance that Ngāti Hikairo would provide their full support and allegiance to the Kīngitanga.<sup>541</sup> This event is remembered by Ngāti Hikairo, Frank Thorne told us, with the whakatauakī: "ka ora, ka mate ā Ngāti Hikairo i raro i te Kīngitanga [Ngāti Hikairo will live and die under the king movement]".<sup>542</sup> Tāwhiao was also soon reported to be supportive of a project to construct a bridge across the river to Alexandra, a project which the Crown soon commenced.<sup>543</sup>

540. 'Tawhiao's Visit to the Waikato Settlements', AJHR, 1881, G-9, p 4.

541. Document K32, p 28 (Thorne).

542. Document K32, p 28; transcript 4.1.2, p 245 (Frank Thorne, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Ihu hui, Waipapa marae, March 2010).

543. Document A78, p 544.

Ngāti Hikairo and Whatiwhatihoe

At our Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Frank Thorne said the following about Ngāti Hikairo's gift of land at Whatiwhatihoe:

Whatiwhatihoe was our land, Ngāti Hikairo land. Half is as Crown Grant and half is in the block of Manguika and that was our lands at the time that they went, taken through the Māori Land Court, the decision was it belonged to Ngāti Puhiawe, Ngāti Te Rahopūwai and Ngāti Purapura. Ngāti Purapura is Hōne Te One's hapū, and these are hapū of Ngāti Hikairo, Whatiwhatihoe. That area was used by the government as a neutral zone, so Tāwhiao was placed, stayed there in order to encourage dialogue and so that the government would not encroach into te Rohe Pōtae because the Pākehā was still apprehensive that they would be killed because just beyond Waipā was the Redoubt. There was a great big cannon aimed, trained directly on our pa night and day and we were scared that we would be killed in time. That is the reason why Ngāti Hikairo wanted to work with the government, lest they be invaded again.

Our ancestor, Hōne Te One, in 1860s and 70s, he was accused of being a kūpapa because he was a staunch supporter of the queen. But in 1870, and Miki has already spoken, it was him who built Mōtakotako Pā. At the time he was a refugee at Mōtakotako. It was because of the sympathy of the local people that they assisted him and the house was built there, Te Tokanganui. Tāwhiao was welcome there but he did not come. He sent his party of women. On arrival Hōne Te One said to them, Hōne Wetere and others, Pikia, they all said Ngāti Hikairo will live and die under the king movement. They will finish being kūpapa. From that time forth they agreed that the king movement stand on Whatiwhatihoe.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 244–245 (Frank Thorne, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Waipapa Marae, 30 March 2010.)

Tāwhiao extended his goodwill mission with a visit to Auckland in January 1882, attracting Government attention that suggested official engagement with Tāwhiao might be more likely than initially suggested.<sup>544</sup> Tāwhiao's visit occurred only months after the Crown's invasion of Parihaka and exhibited the determination of the Kingitanga to adhere to its policies of peace and goodwill notwithstanding the disquiet of Kingitanga leaders over the events at Parihaka.<sup>545</sup> Tāwhiao arrived in Auckland on 16 January 1882, accompanied by a party of about 40 senior chiefs. They had travelled not only beyond the aukati as it stood in 1882, but also beyond the former Kingitanga border at Mangatawhiri. Part of their journey had been by train and, after spending their first night with Ngāti Whātua rangatira Paora Tuhaere at Ōrākei, they travelled by steamer back to Auckland, where they arrived at the wharf to the cheers of a gathering crowd. They reportedly remained in the city until 1 February 1882. During that time, they enjoyed the hospitality of Auckland businessmen, civic leaders and other dignitaries, and accepted invitations to a variety of civic receptions, banquets, luncheons, and garden parties, as well as tours of public buildings, water works, gas works, and factories.<sup>546</sup>

---

544. Document A78, pp 550–552.

545. Document A110, p 625.

While the invitations and public appreciation of Tāwhiao flowed, some sectors of Pākehā society balked at his enthusiastic treatment. Disapproving newspaper coverage regarded the recognition of the Kingitanga and Tāwhiao's leadership as problematic and warned against accepting Tāwhiao's offers of peace without first of all securing his submission to colonial law and the authority of the Queen. However, other accounts argued that peaceful cooperation – accommodating Tāwhiao and his territory if need be – was the best method of progressing towards an arrangement that would open the King Country to Pākehā settlement.<sup>547</sup>

This division of opinion was reflected in the Hall ministry. Ms Marr describes Bryce as 'coldly angry' about the welcome Tāwhiao received in Auckland.<sup>548</sup> Hall was wary. In a letter to Attorney-General Frederick Whitaker, Bryce expressed concern that public celebration of Tāwhiao might inflate his sense of self-importance and make him more difficult to deal with. Hall hoped to visit Auckland himself before too long but explained that he was reluctant to do so while Tāwhiao was still there. Whitaker had a more relaxed attitude than his colleagues. He had no difficulty joining the entertainments laid on for Tāwhiao and responded positively to a message that Tāwhiao wanted to meet. In informing Hall of his plans to invite Tāwhiao to his office, Whitaker said that any discussions would focus on friendship and goodwill. Political matters were best deferred, and Whitaker suggested he invite Tāwhiao to drive the first pile at the bridge planned to be built at Alexandra. This event would present an opportunity for discussions of a political nature with Bryce and Rolleston present.<sup>549</sup>

Whitaker's ability to steer clear of any public political conversations was unexpectedly tested at a banquet held in Tāwhiao's honour. During a series of toasts that emphasised setting aside the disputes of the past in favour of friendlier relations, Paora Tuhaere proposed a toast to Whitaker. Tuhaere credited Whitaker with making Tāwhiao's visit possible, and praised the hospitality extended to him. He said there was 'no greater peacemaking' than Tāwhiao's visit to Auckland.<sup>550</sup> Whitaker was surprised to be toasted but responded by picking up on the theme of peace and reconciliation. With some pleasure, he also announced that he had

---

546. Document A78, pp 551–552, 558.

547. Document A78, pp 556–557.

548. Document A78, p 552.

549. Document A78, pp 553–554.

550. 'King Tawhiao's Visit to Auckland', Nelson Evening Mail, 27 January 1882, p 3; doc A78, p 555.

accepted a tender for the building of a bridge that would link Whatiwahitioe and Alexandra, and that Tāwhiao had agreed to drive the first pile.<sup>551</sup>

Whitaker described the bridge as a hopeful symbol that would unite Māori and Pākehā ‘hand in hand in a common prosperity’.<sup>552</sup> Other speakers then made toasts to the new acts of peacemaking. In his toast, Patara Te Tuhi, one of Tāwhiao’s advisers, noted that Whitaker and Tāwhiao now sat side by side. Te Wheoro, who had also come to Auckland with Tāwhiao, paid special tribute to Mair for his work in promoting peace. He acknowledged both the Government and the people of Auckland, and urged that all Members of Parliament demonstrate the same attitudes as Whitaker. Tāwhiao similarly asked that ‘those responsible for making laws should also be of one mind’.<sup>553</sup> Wahanui also spoke, giving a toast to Tāwhiao. A few weeks before, he had told a newspaper reporter that he strongly condemned Bryce’s actions at Parihaka.<sup>554</sup> and now he took the opportunity to contrast those events with Tāwhiao’s offer of friendship (see sidebar).

Wahanui’s Toast to Tāwhiao

Tāwhiao’s visit to Auckland took place less than two months after the Government’s invasion of Parihaka. At a banquet in Tāwhiao’s honour on 19 January 1882, Wahanui gave a toast highlighting the contrast between the Government’s actions and Tāwhiao’s acts of goodwill:

You have heard what Tawhiao has said; in the first instance his reference to love, and secondly the tramping down of evils (that is, the wars between the races). My question regarding these two points is this – where are they to be recorded; and who shall bring to a conclusion our differences; and who is to carry out the friendly relations referred to? Perhaps it will be Tawhiao alone who will abide in respect to the friendly relations he has spoken of, for in the first place Tawhiao came to Pirongia, in the second place he travelled through the Waikato, and in the third place he has come to Auckland. The basis of these three journeys is of a friendly character – to enable us to meet one another in the broad day-light, the sun shining upon us, dispersing all the evils that came up heretofore. Therefore I consider it is well that Tawhiao’s health should be drunk to-night. He is entitled to praise, on account of these three attempts to bring about kindly relations between the Europeans and Maoris. I look upon you all this night with complacency, and I

551. Document A78, pp 554–555, 587.

552. ‘King Tawhiao’s Visit to Auckland’, Nelson Evening Mail, 27 January 1882, p 3; doc A78, p 555.

553. Document A78, p 556.

554. ‘Tawhiao at Orakei – A Council To-Day’, Auckland Star, 17 January 1882, p 3; doc A110, p 625.

now say to you, do not permit any evils to arise hereafter, but endeavour to administer affairs rightly, for the benefit of all concerned. I greet you all. I have ended.<sup>1</sup>

1. 'Visit of Tawhiao and His Chiefs', Auckland Star, 20 January 1882, p 3.

Whitaker appears to have kept his word to Hall and did not venture into political discussions with Tāwhiao. Nonetheless, Kingitanga leaders appeared to come out of these engagements with the understanding that the Government's representatives – Whitaker and Mair specifically – had accepted Tāwhiao's peacemaking policy, including the possibility of cooperating on certain projects (such as the bridge) in the future.<sup>555</sup>

Premier Hall visited Auckland in late January and early February, arriving while Tāwhiao was still there. The two men met briefly.<sup>556</sup> As earlier proposed, Hall wanted to focus on the goodwill element of Tāwhiao's trip, leaving political discussions for another time. He explained that the economic progress Tāwhiao had witnessed in Auckland was occurring in other parts of the country and could be replicated in Te Rohe Pōtae if circumstances changed. 'Ministers', he was reported as saying, 'wished to live on most friendly terms with the Maoris, and to work with Tāwhiao in promoting the welfare of his followers.'<sup>557</sup> Hall insisted that New Zealand could have only one sovereign and that Māori and Pākehā must live under the law. But he also confirmed the Government's desire to be on friendly terms with Tāwhiao. Tāwhiao did not disagree with anything Hall had to say, but he did maintain his right to decide matters for himself on behalf of his people.<sup>558</sup>

While Hall steered clear of discussing the opening of the King Country for Pākehā settlement with Tāwhiao, he was later drawn into the topic when he met with the Auckland Chamber of Commerce. Pressed on the matter of surveying for the best railway route through the King Country, Hall assured the chamber of the Government's commitment to completing the railway as soon as practicable. But Hall also made clear the need to proceed with care: there were 'other difficulties', he said, which needed to be 'treated with very great caution and judgment'; the Government had to act 'prudently'.<sup>559</sup>

Despite avoiding specific issues relating to the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae, Hall and Tāwhiao made general commitments to meeting on future occasions to advance the discussions. Hall noted that Native Minister Bryce was expected to make a visit to the north, and assured Tāwhiao that that would present an

555. Document A78, pp 555–556.

556. Document A78, pp 557–558; doc A41, pp 19–20.

557. 'Tawhiao and the Premier', Hawkes Bay Herald, 2 February 1882, p 3; doc A78, p 557.

558. 'Tawhiao and the Premier', Hawkes Bay Herald, 2 February 1882, p 3; doc A78, p 558.

559. 'Deputation to Ministers', New Zealand Herald, 3 February 1882; doc A41, pp 20–21.

opportunity for them to progress discussions. Tāwhiao extended an invitation to Hall, members of his Government, and all Pākehā, to attend the next Maehe, where he would clearly articulate what he sought from the Government.<sup>560</sup>

As it turned out, however, Bryce did not meet with Tāwhiao during his visit to the Waikato region later in February 1882. He did, however, meet with Rewi. The Maehe went ahead as planned in May, immediately preceded by the pile-driving ceremony for the Whatiwhatihoe-Alexandra bridge, but no Ministers of the Crown attended either event.<sup>561</sup> Nevertheless, there were signs that the Crown and the Kingitanga might be ready to restart negotiations.

7.4.4 Negotiations with Bryce, 1882

From early 1882, the Crown increasingly sought to end the stalemate that had developed with the Kingitanga. It did so through Bryce increasingly focusing on the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leadership. The Crown eyed a significant opportunity to escalate what it saw as increasing divisions between Rewi Maniapoto and Tāwhiao.

These perceptions had only been exacerbated by Weterere's desire to seek the Native Land Court to determine title for the Mōkau lands. In January 1882, following Weterere's letter to Rewi and Tāwhiao seeking permission for the hearing, Tāwhiao sent a letter to Robert Parris expressing his opposition. Weterere responded to Tāwhiao's opposition by stating that 'the work is for us to carry out, that is to say, to bring it before the Court. No one has a right to say leave it alone. Tāwhiao has nothing to do with us – his village is at Waikato, ours is at Mōkau.'<sup>562</sup> These tensions grew further as Weterere continued to vocally pursue a court hearing for Mōkau lands.

The Government was under considerable pressure to accept Weterere's application for a court hearing from politicians, businessmen and the wider settler community. However, Rewi had remained neutral, and now Tāwhiao was expressing his active opposition. Without the support of the Kingitanga and wider Ngāti Maniapoto, the Crown proved reluctant to allow a court hearing to proceed. Bryce did not think that a court hearing would be productive. His goal was to convince Māori to allow the railway through their rohe, and to avoid violence while doing so.<sup>563</sup> By February 1882, the Government had informed Ngāti Maniapoto that a hearing would not go ahead at Mōkau due to Tāwhiao's opposition (which it was authorised to do under section 38 of the Native Land Court Act 1880).<sup>564</sup>

In the meantime, the Kingitanga remained determined to impress its issues upon the Crown, which forced Bryce to once again engage the Kingitanga directly and to make offers addressing their concerns. The Kingitanga, for its part, was insistent that it would settle for nothing less than the settlement of grievances from

560. Document A78, pp 557–558.

561. Document A78, pp 559, 587–588.

562. 'Native Land Court at Mokau', Taranaki Herald, 27 January 1882, p 2; doc A28, pp 239–240.

563. Document A28, p 235.

564. Document A28, p 240.

the Waikato war and the guarantee of its authority. The question was how Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would position themselves in these negotiations, given the increasing pressures placed upon their lands at the border, and the Crown's increasing insistence on opening the territory, particularly to allow the construction of a railway.

7.4.4.1 Bryce meets Rewi at Kihikihi, February 1882

Bryce met Rewi at Kihikihi on 22 February, with other chiefs and officials in attendance. Press coverage of the meeting indicates that the two men were civil but direct.<sup>565</sup>

Prior to the hui, Bryce had written to Rewi, referring to the 'tree of peace' planted by Rewi and Grey. According to newspaper reports, Bryce had said that the tree 'had been scorched by fire, and a grub had been at its roots', and Bryce had therefore offered to 'water the roots of the tree, and by that means save it'.<sup>566</sup> During the hui, Bryce also invoked his own metaphor, which he would return to in later engagements: colonisation was a flood that Māori could not control, all they could do was steer their canoe on it. The Government was available to assist, but there was a bottom line: there could be 'only one sovereign and one set of laws . . . to apply to both races'.<sup>567</sup>

Rewi informed Bryce that the one thing preventing him and his people from being subject to the law was the security of their territory. If their remaining lands were secured to them, Rewi said, then 'both races' could 'live under one law'.<sup>568</sup> This was a significant statement, given the previous stance adopted by the Kīngitanga in respect of the application of colonial law to Te Rohe Pōtae. Now Rewi was suggesting that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would be willing to consider the application of colonial law so long as it was used to secure their existing rights, rather than to undermine those rights. As noted in section 7.4.2.5, he intended that the lands secured to Māori would remain self-governing, but was now suggesting that colonial law might guarantee that right.

Rewi also described the district he wanted 'secured': all the lands contained within the boundaries formed by Pirongia, Kakepuku, Puniu River, Tongariro and Parininihi ('White Cliffs'). These boundaries approximated those of the aukati. Rewi clarified that he was referring only to the lands which had not yet been dealt with by Pākehā and predicted that once Te Rohe Pōtae lands were secured it would take no longer than two years before Māori and Pākehā were 'under one law'. He said there was no obstacle to this course of action ('the people are with me') unless it came from 'Government natives' and he was not yet aware of it.<sup>569</sup>

However, Rewi also raised his long-held concern that in hearing the claims of neighbouring iwi, the Native Land Court had eroded the interests of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in lands adjoining the aukati (and within the former northeastern

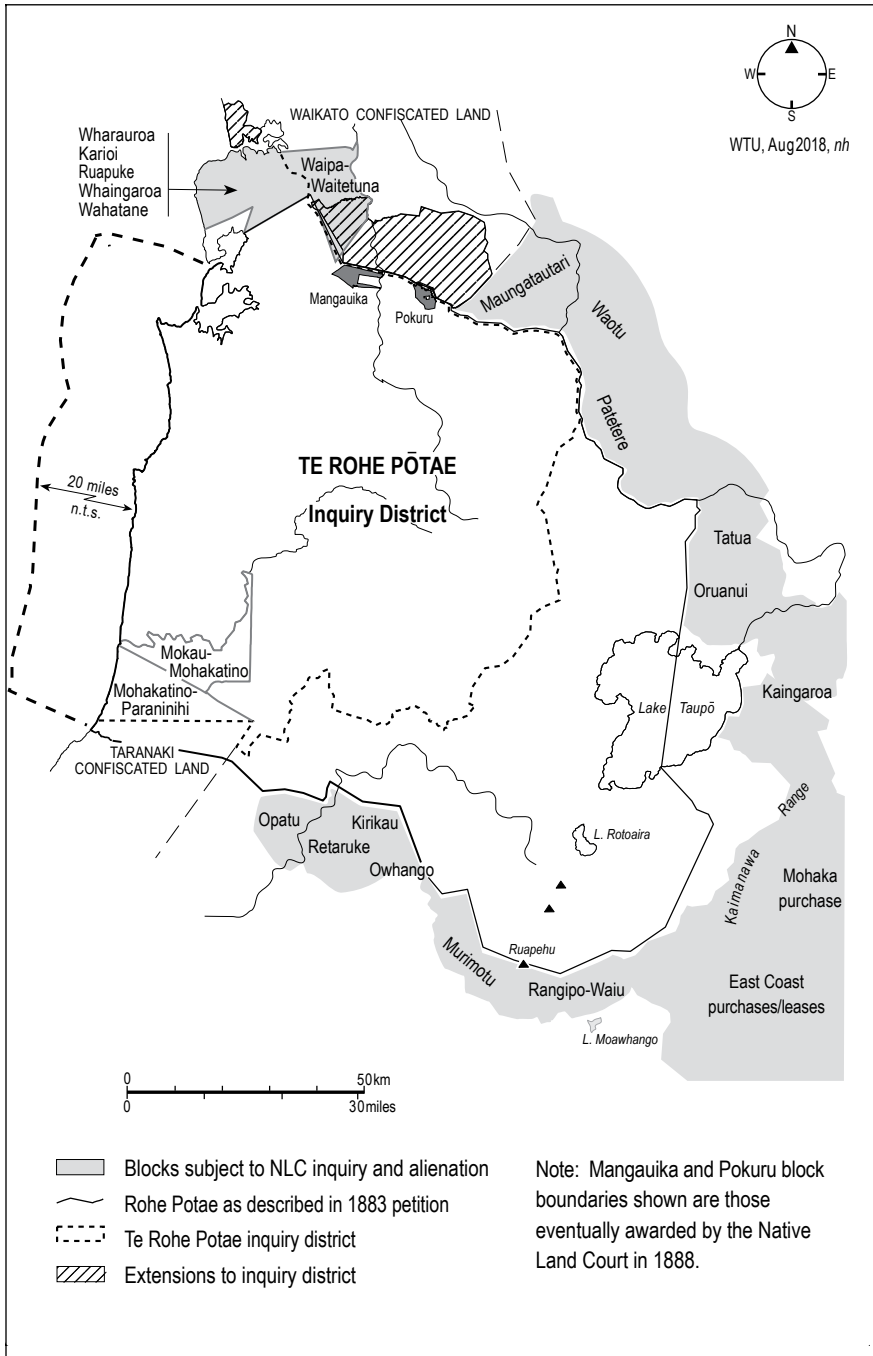

565. Document A41, pp 22–23; doc A78, pp 559, 561–564.

566. These words are Rewi's explanation of what Bryce had told him in the letter: 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 2.

567. 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 2; doc A41, p 22.

568. 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 2; doc A41, p 22.

569. 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 2; doc A41, p 22.

Map 7.2: Leases, purchases and Native Land Court activity encircling the aukati aukati zones), such as those in the Tokoroa area. He said that Māori who were friendly to the Government had sold their own lands and now wanted to sell his. He had tried to persuade Grey to save Tokoroa as ‘a dwelling place for the natives’, but had now let that go.<sup>570</sup>

Bryce responded that the problem had been caused by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori abstaining from the Native Land Court’s investigations of title (and had therefore not had their names included in the titles). He proposed that there was only one way to avoid similar problems arising in the future: ‘to ascertain the title to the land, and have it fixed by the Native Land Court’. He emphasised that the purpose of utilizing the Court was to determine ownership of the land and ‘not for purposes of sale necessarily.’<sup>571</sup> Bryce further reassured Rewi, saying that there was no danger of losing land later and that Māori could lease their lands rather than selling. The Government, he said, ‘will not be the cause of your disposing of your land.’<sup>572</sup>

Rewi’s response to Bryce confirmed that he was prepared to go the Court ‘in respect of lands adjacent to his boundary’. He would attend ‘to have the boundary of his country fixed.’<sup>573</sup> This was another significant statement on Rewi’s part. Although he continued to oppose the operation of the court in his own territory, he increasingly looked for ways of reinforcing protection for the aukati as he now defined it, and began contemplating how this might be achieved through the use of the court.<sup>574</sup> By this time, Thomas says, the court and land agents were ‘encircling the aukati from Waikato in the north, to Taupō in the east, and to Whanganui and Mōkau-Taranaki in the south.’<sup>575</sup> Up until that time, Rewi had refused to make a decision on whether Wetere could proceed with a court hearing for the Mōkau lands. Now he appeared to be signalling that he would be prepared to allow the court to proceed.

Bryce asserted that once the Court issued title, the problems Rewi outlined would cease to exist, and assured Rewi ‘you need never fear’: no Māori would be ‘compelled to part with their land’. If they parted with their land it would be ‘at their own instance, and not from any pressure from the Government’. Bryce went on to recommend that once titles had been settled, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori should look to lease, rather than sell, their land ‘under proper conditions’. He again emphasised that such an undertaking would come, ‘if it comes at all’, from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori themselves, and that the Government would not urge them to either lease or sell.<sup>576</sup> Rewi concluded by returning to his favoured tree of peace 570. ‘The Native Minister at Kihikihi’, Waikato Times, 25 February 1882, p 3; doc A41, pp 22–23; doc A78, p 561.

571. ‘The Native Minister in Waikato’, New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 2; doc A41, p 23.

572. Document A41, p 23.

573. Document A78, p 563.

574. Document A78, pp 562–563.

575. Document A28, p 243.

576. ‘The Native Minister in Waikato’, New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 5; doc A41, p 23.

metaphor, noting his hope that ‘we will be successful in nourishing the tree, so that it may flourish.’<sup>577</sup>

The day after the meeting, Bryce took Rewi to meet Premier Hall in Hamilton. Ms Marr suggests that Bryce wanted to show Hall that negotiations were operating through Rewi and not Tāwhiao.<sup>578</sup> Certainly Bryce was pleased with Rewi’s decision to utilise the Native Land Court, and negotiating with Rewi did seem to be preferable to him than negotiating with Tāwhiao.<sup>579</sup> Whatever the case, clearly the three men agreed it was time to progress matters.

While Rewi’s announcement took on some significance at the time, it was no great departure from the position he and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had held in previous negotiations with the Crown. It seems clear that agreeing to go to the court was a defensive measure to protect the land at Mōkau as well as the aukati. He also ‘seems to have seen this as a method . . . to help mark out clearly in practice and in law the boundaries of Te Rohe Pōtae as a whole, which would remain under Māori authority.’<sup>580</sup> Securing his territory had consistently been foundational to Rewi’s proposals. However, Rewi’s decision was significant in that it represented the first occasion where the Ngāti Maniapoto leadership had decided to take a different position from that publicly announced by Tāwhiao. The significance of this was not lost on the Crown.

7.4.4.2 Rewi advances plans for making use of the Native Land Court

After meeting with Bryce in February 1882, Rewi moved to secure a court hearing for the Mōkau-Mōhakatino and Mōhakatino-Parininihi blocks, which were collectively referred to as the Poutama blocks. Following a further meeting with Wetere and William Grace, Rewi wrote to Bryce on 14 March concerning Mōkau. He claimed authority over the land, which was directly controlled by Wetere, and urged the Government to stop negotiating with Ngāti Tama. Instead, the Government should ‘support and further the work of Wetere.’ Although it was not explicitly stated, Wetere and the Crown interpreted his comments as meaning that he would not prevent a court sitting from going ahead.<sup>581</sup>

Wetere then wrote to Bryce renewing his call for a court hearing. He noted Rewi’s request ‘to consent to my work, my work about Mōkau’ as well as Rewi’s opinions on the Native Land Court. He asked the Government to ‘not disappoint our tribes at Mōkau about the Native Land Court, but rather, friend, consent to our requests often made about lands at Mōkau, that it may be adjudicated upon.’<sup>582</sup>

Bryce responded to Rewi’s letter within a week. He promised that the Government would not make advances on Mōkau land, nor would it ‘take a course underg[roun]d but above ground where everyone can see’. In addition, the

---

577. ‘The Native Minister in Waikato’, New Zealand Herald, 23 February 1882, p 5; doc A41, p 24.

578. Document A78, p 564.

579. Document A41, pp 24–25; doc A78, p 560.

580. Document A28, p 246.

581. ‘Rewi and the Opening of Mokau’, Taranaki Herald, 25 April 1882, p 2; doc A28, p 247.

582. ‘Rewi and the Opening of Mokau’, Taranaki Herald, 25 April 1882, p 2; doc A28, p 248.

Government would not prevent a court sitting.<sup>583</sup> Assured by Bryce that it would be ‘improbable in a high degree’ for the Government to stop a hearing, the chief judge announced that the court would sit ‘shortly’ and called for further applications.<sup>584</sup> The hearing was set down for June at Waitara.<sup>585</sup>

The Government saw a Native Land Court hearing as an opportunity to weaken the influence of the Kingitanga and sow divisions between the Kingitanga and Ngāti Maniapoto. A cabinet minute from the time called the hearing of Mōkau a chance to ‘break up Tāwhiao’s power in the future and assert rights of other Natives to deal with their lands.’<sup>586</sup> The settler press echoed this view: the New Zealand Herald described the hearing as ‘a matter of great importance, as breaking up the King’s authority within the district which he has hitherto regarded as particularly his own.’<sup>587</sup>

Following the February 1882 meetings, the relationship between Tāwhiao and Rewi – and the Kingitanga and Ngāti Maniapoto – came under further public scrutiny. While it is unclear whether a rift was developing, it is certain that internal tensions arose as Te Rohe Pōtae leaders debated turning to the court to resolve disputes over lands adjacent to or even inside the aukati.

Speculation of a rift within the Kingitanga was nothing new, as already described. In this instance, it was probably fuelled by the fact that Bryce had chosen to meet with Rewi but not Tāwhiao. Privately, Hall said he was confident that he and Bryce had further encouraged the rift between Rewi and Tāwhiao, and he expected that before long a row would develop between the King and the chief.<sup>588</sup> Meanwhile, Bryce seemed unfazed by criticisms that he had intentionally snubbed Tāwhiao and likely created a problem for the Government. According to the Crown’s historian, Dr Loveridge, Bryce did not visit Tāwhiao because he was not invited to do so. That was not the case: during his visit to Auckland, Tāwhiao had invited Hall and other members of his Government, and indeed all Pākehā, to attend the forthcoming Maehe, where he would set out what he wanted from the Government.<sup>589</sup> Hall had indicated to Tāwhiao when they met in Auckland that Bryce would soon seek out a meeting. Ms Marr noted that during his visit to Kihikihi Bryce had made no attempt visit Tāwhiao.<sup>590</sup>

Addressing questions about the supposed rift between Rewi and Tāwhiao, which the Government was keen to encourage, the New Zealand Herald in April reminded readers of Tāwhiao’s descent from Maniapoto and therefore of the intricate connections between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto peoples. Rewi, answering the newspaper’s questions, denied that there was any rift. He said that Kingitanga Māori, himself included, were spending the month determining what Tāwhiao 583. Grace to J Jones, Kihikihi, 20 March 1882 (doc A28, p 248).

584. Document A28, p 250.

585. Document A28, p 251.

586. Document A28, p 249.

587. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 28 March 1882, p 4; doc A41, p 27.

588. Document A78, p 565.

589. Document A78, pp 557–558.

590. Document A41, p 24; doc A78, pp 576, 586, 589–590.

would announce at the Maehe, but he continued to hold to ‘the old Maori policy’ of the Kingitanga. He was ‘an elder’, he said, who had ‘adhered continuously’ to the cause of Te Wherowhero during his lifetime, ‘and I do not intend now to change my thoughts by forsaking Potatau’s son’. If he had any intention of doing that, he said, ‘you would hear of my advocating the selling of land, which, of course, would mean the breaking up of the old compact, and the dismemberment of our present association’. But no-one could accuse him of that:

who will say that I have any other idea in my mind than that of preserving the whole territory of the Maori Kingship—of making the whole of the territory a reserve under my own, that is, the Maori mana: and your English laws, I expect, will aid me in carrying out this long-wished-for project.

Rewi said he had discussed this subject with Bryce at Kihikihi (section 7.4.4.1), ‘when I mentioned certain boundaries as those of the proposed Maori reserve’. During his lifetime, Rewi said, nothing would move him from the policy ‘enunciated at the beginning, which means my holding intact all our Maori territory’.<sup>591</sup>

Two days later, the Herald reported Rewi explaining how Kingitanga decisions were made. Tāwhiao had a Council of rangatira, he said, and could not act independently of it. For that reason, he acted with great caution: ‘[W]hen his advisers act independently of him they are censured . . . Tawhiao does not act without first consulting his Council, nor the members of his Council without consulting him.’<sup>592</sup>

7.4.4.3 The pile-driving ceremony and the fall of the Hall Ministry

The idea that Bryce had deliberately avoided the King might have passed if not for the absence of the Crown’s Ministers from both the pile-driving ceremony (for the new bridge that was to cross the Puniu between Alexandra and Whatiwhatiho) in April 1882, and the annual Maehe in May.

At the pile-driving ceremony, Tāwhiao named the bridge Tawhara Kai Atua. He explained that the name – ‘the first fruits’ – was a symbol of the fruits of his new policy of goodwill and improved relations with Pākehā and the Crown. About 300 Māori attended the ceremony, alongside a group of civic leaders, local Pākehā, and some government officials, but no Ministers.<sup>593</sup> Nor did any Government Ministers attend the eight-day Maehe which began at Whatiwhatiho on 11 May, though clearly both they and the general Pākehā public had been invited. Resident Magistrate Bush was among the few government officials who attended; he reported to the Government on proceedings but otherwise kept a low profile.<sup>594</sup>

It appears that the Government was preoccupied by a period of political instability within the Hall ministry. This ‘crisis’, as Ms Marr describes it, featured several

---

591. ‘The Present Position of the King Party’, New Zealand Herald, 8 April 1882, p 5.

592. ‘The Position of the King Party’, New Zealand Herald, 10 April 1882, p 5.

593. ‘The Native Minister’s visit to Tawhiao’, Waikato Times, 31 October 1882, p 2; doc A78, pp 587–589.

594. Document A78, pp 589–590.

different points of conflict, of which the situation with the Kingitanga was one. Bryce was a central figure – Hall regarded him as abrasive and difficult, but there were also various policy differences. With respect to Tāwhiao, some Ministers were willing to negotiate, but Bryce was opposed to any Government recognition of or publicity for Tāwhiao.<sup>595</sup> By this time the Government – responding to pressure from settlers – was determined not only to open Te Rohe Pōtae, but also to resume efforts to complete the North Island Main Trunk Railway through the district. This was a course of action that would only be possible with the consent of Tāwhiao and tribal leaders.<sup>596</sup> One report went so far as to suggest that Bryce wanted to deal with the Kingitanga as he had Parihaka, which, in the newspaper's view, would lead to 'simply the most serious struggle the colony has yet seen'.<sup>597</sup> Newspapers predicted that Bryce would force a crisis in the Ministry by threatening to resign his portfolio, and in April he did resign following a personal insult from Hall. Hall, who was suffering from ill health, took the opportunity to quit as Premier, but stayed on as a member of the House of Representatives until the next parliamentary session. Whitaker became Premier in Hall's place, while keeping his position as Attorney-General and his membership of the Legislative Council. Bryce stayed on as Native Minister.<sup>598</sup>

By the time of the pile-driving ceremony, the post-crisis Government was in place, including Whitaker in his new role as Premier. Whereas just a few months earlier he had encouraged Tāwhiao's role in the ceremony and had promoted the bridge as a beacon of Māori-Pākehā unity, Whitaker did not attend. The Waikato Times gave the Ministerial crisis as the reason for his absence, but it appears Whitaker gave no explanation to Tāwhiao at the time. As for Bryce, he was busy with matters at Parihaka, where some 500 Māori continued to live while the trials of Te Whiti and Tohu were still pending. However, the Native Minister did take the time to send messages to armed constabulary in the area, noting his concern that Māori should not be allowed to abuse liquor at the ceremony.<sup>599</sup> By the time of the Whatiwhatihoe Maehe, it appears that Bryce's opinion prevailed – neither the Governor nor any Government Ministers would attend, and Tāwhiao would be told they were unavailable due to other business.<sup>600</sup>

7.4.4.4 The Whatiwhatihoe Maehe, 11–17 May 1882, and Tāwhiao's proposals

Fewer people – Māori and Pākehā – attended the Whatiwhatihoe Maehe than in previous years, which the media presented as evidence that support for Tāwhiao was waning.<sup>601</sup> Certainly Pākehā attendance was noticeably lower, even though Tāwhiao had extended an open invitation to the settler public. But other factors

595. Document A78, pp 589–590.

596. Document A41, pp 20–21; doc A78, p 582.

597. 'Another Sensational Canard', Evening Post, 20 March 1882, p 2; doc A78, p 580.

598. Document A78, pp 582–585.

599. Document A78, pp 588–589.

600. Document A78, p 590.

601. Marr pointed to the following examples: Waikato Times, 6, 11, and 13 May 1882; and Evening Post, 6 May 1882, p 2; doc A78, p 592.

also accounted for the decline in attendance, such as inclement weather, which in turn delayed the beginning of the hui. The number of Māori in attendance may have also been lower, with Bush reporting an estimate of 3000.<sup>602</sup> Turnout from Kīngitanga communities was strong. Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato were well represented. Large numbers of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa were said to have travelled to the hui, as did members of Muaupoko, Ngāti Apa, and Rangitane, and people from the Hawke's Bay and Whanganui. There were fewer than usual, according to Bush, from the Thames, East Coast, Rotorua, and the north. Among those named as being present were Paora Tuhaere, Te Heuheu, Te Ngakau, Hitiri Te Paerata, Wahanui, Rewi, Wetere, and Te Wheoro.<sup>603</sup>

Central to the Maehe was a set of proposals that the Kīngitanga intended to submit to the Government. Tāwhiao put the proposals to those who had assembled at the hui for their confirmation. The proposals included a reconfirmation of the existing Kīngitanga policy that there should be no sales, leases, surveys or road-building; gold-prospecting would be considered on request. Tāwhiao spoke about the challenges confronting these policies. Kāwhia (where a request had come from a Pākehā to occupy an area for which he said he had acquired a lease<sup>604</sup>) and Mōkau, where the Native Land Court was about to commence its hearing. He said that no claims should be made to Kāwhia, and no one should interfere in Mōkau, where matters were to be managed by Wetere. This was an important compromise by Tāwhiao, apparently in recognition of the view of Wetere and Rewi that the Court could be used to protect the borders of the Kīngitanga territory but should not be used within it. Tāwhiao also said that the settler parliament should sit at Auckland so that he could attend. He charged Major Te Wheoro, who had been MHR for Western Māori since 1879, with the task of presenting his proposals to Parliament.<sup>605</sup> Te Wheoro expressed his support for Tāwhiao and urged everyone to refrain from all land activities; to continue would render his forthcoming presentation to Parliament pointless.<sup>606</sup>

When his turn came to speak, Rewi maintained that there was a crucial difference between the surveys he wanted to commission at the borders and those Tāwhiao wanted to stop.<sup>607</sup> His goal was to protect his 'porotaka', his core lands, which he wanted to reserve. He regarded the Mōkau application as fitting that category of action, a strategic part of his plan to protect Te Rohe Pōtae. Like the others gathered, he was opposed to surveys for sale and lease. Protecting his boundary was his well-known and long-established objective, from which he had never wavered. He understood that some at the hui wanted him to hold out for a return of the confiscated territory even as far north as Manukau. But in his view,

---

602. In private correspondence, Hall claimed Māori in attendance numbered no more than 1,500, half the number Bush had estimated: doc A78, p 592.

603. Document A78, p 592.

604. Document A78, p 596.

605. 'Letter from Major Te Wheoro, MHR, to the Speaker, forwarding proposals from Tawhiao', AJHR, 1882, G-4, pp 1, 7; doc A78, pp 592-593.

606. Document A78, p 595.

607. Document A78, p 595.

that could be settled later. His focus was now on ‘this boundary line of mine that I have been trying to carry out for so long.’<sup>608</sup> As he had in his interview with the New Zealand Herald (section 7.4.4.2), Rewi here appeared to be using ‘mine’ to refer to all the people of the Kingitanga.

In response to Tāwhiao’s proposals and the debates at the hui, Wetere agreed to seek a deferral of the court hearing at Mōkau. But both Rewi and Wetere argued that the Mōkau investigation could not be abandoned completely. Wetere explained that the situation remained urgent because of the range of pressures they faced, including the possibility that land might be sold without their permission. He also had to deal with the complication of not knowing which lands north of Mōkau had been dealt with already and were subject to claims by the Crown or settlers. The situation was compounded by gold prospecting and other activities, which Wetere was struggling to control. Prospectors claimed they had a right because they were on government land or they had permission from Ngāti Tama.<sup>609</sup>

The suggested solution was for immediate engagement with the Government on the issues that were under discussion. Wahanui proposed that they request the Government to agree to having one representative lead them all in negotiating and managing their engagements with Government. That person, Wahanui proposed, should be Tāwhiao.<sup>610</sup> This provoked much debate, some of it heated and some of it critical of Tāwhiao. But Wahanui, playing the role of peacemaker, insisted the hui consider the proposals Tāwhiao had put to them. He suggested that they introduce a system of appointing small groups of chiefs among the various iwi to consult each other and raise points of discussion with Tāwhiao, who should lead consultations with the Government. Wahanui also suggested that the Kingitanga establish a Māori-owned and operated printing press for the publication of their own ideas, information, and views.<sup>611</sup> He also expanded on the proposals of Tāwhiao by specifically ruling out any prospect of the construction of the railway until the Crown took formal action to offer them the protection they sought. He was reported as saying that ‘no railway via Mokau or elsewhere through the Ngatimaniapoto country will be allowed during his life-time or until Parliament, sitting at Auckland, shall have passed laws to ensure the maintenance of the Maori authority over the King Country.’<sup>612</sup>

Ultimately a consensus was reached agreeing that any actions involving land that would potentially breach Kingitanga policies would be postponed. This included Wetere’s plan to pursue a court hearing in Mōkau. Te Wheoro could therefore proceed to Parliament with Tāwhiao’s proposals having been approved.

The reports of the hui showed that the Kingitanga, and especially Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, faced challenges that were increasingly coming to bear on the borders of

---

608. AJHR, 1882, G-4A, p 10; doc A78, pp 596–599.

609. Document A78, pp 595–596.

610. Document A78, p 596.

611. Document A78, p 596.

612. ‘The Trunk Railway’, Waikato Times, 29 June 1882, p 3; doc A78, p 604.

the territory. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori now had to face the serious prospect that the strict maintenance of Kīngitanga policies might endanger their land further. Rewi's strategy was to engage with the Crown to the extent that was required to protect their remaining territories. While there were clearly differences of approach, they ultimately shared the same policies in respect of their core lands. Where at all possible, the hapū and iwi that had committed to the Kīngitanga would seek that their policies be represented through the leadership of Tāwhiao.

Nevertheless, the hui demonstrated that there was an increasing focus on how the customary land owners of Te Rohe Pōtae might look to protect their land, especially as the Native Land Court increasingly came to advance on those lands. As such, one of the critical side discussions at the Maehe concerned the boundaries of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and the people of Tūhua-Upper Whanganui. Although the report of the hui says that representatives focused on the boundaries between the iwi, Ms Marr suggests they may have also been discussing their external boundary, much as they had done at the Government's insistence following the hui at Te Kōpua in 1879.<sup>613</sup> This was a crucial development, one that likely fed into later discussions among these iwi about how best to represent their issues to the Government. Wahanui was now also signalling that his people required the Government to pass a law that ensured the maintenance of Māori authority.

Te Wheoro presented the written form of 'Tawhiao's Proposals' – 'Nga Kupu a Tawhiao' – on 26 May 1882, just nine days after the Maehe ended.<sup>614</sup> The proposals reiterated Tāwhiao's call for all surveys, leasing, land sales, road-making and the Native Land Court to cease ('taihoa ano e mahi'). While there was no specific reference to Kāwhia and Mōkau, the proposals stated that those activities could resume when Parliament and the Kīngitanga chiefs had reached some agreement on 'some mutual basis of settlement' ('etahi tikanga hei whakahaere'). There was also to be a special sitting of Parliament in Auckland closer to the Kīngitanga, so that they could discuss their differences. In conclusion, the proposal noted that Tāwhiao's words were agreed to by the chiefs and everyone at the Maehe ('nga Rangatira me te Hui katoa').<sup>615</sup>

Accompanying the proposals was a covering letter from Te Wheoro in which he urged Parliament against dismissing them too lightly.

Kaua e taimaha rawa te peehi i a Tawhiao me tona iwi no te mea kua rite noa atu i o ratou whenua te utu to ratou hara. Mehemea e haere ana te tika me te aroha i roto i nga whakahaere e whakahaerea atu ana mo te taha ki a ia katahi ka taea te mutunga pai e whai katoa nei tatou.

613. Document A78, p 599.

614. 'Letter from Major Te Wheoro', AJHR, 1882, G-4; doc A78, pp 592–593.

615. 'Letter from Major Te Wheoro', AJHR, 1882, G-4, p 2.

Do not press too heavily upon Tawhiao and his people. Their land long ago paid the penalty for their sin. By meeting him frankly and in a generous spirit the good work for which we are all striving will be accomplished.<sup>616</sup>

Tāwhiao's proposals were not well received in Wellington.<sup>617</sup> In mid-June, when Te Wheoro asked what consideration the Government had given them, Bryce said that Tāwhiao had not made any proposals: he had merely asked for certain activities to stop while his proposals were considered or some arrangement was reached. Tāwhiao was 'careful', Bryce argued, 'to conceal what those propositions were'. Bryce could only say that it was 'impossible' to suspend 'surveys and road-making' until further notice, and that the Government would now devise its own offer.<sup>618</sup>

7.4.4.5 The Mōkau Native Land Court hearing, June 1882

In June 1882, the Native Land Court commenced a sitting in Waitara to determine title to two blocks – Mōkau-Mōhakatino and Mōhakatino-Parininihi – located to the south of the Mōkau River.

Only weeks earlier at the Maehe, Wetere had agreed to Tāwhiao's pleas to postpone the court application, though he had noted the urgency with which the Mōkau lands and boundaries needed securing. As it turned out, Chief Judge Fenton, realising the chiefs would be attending the hui in May, had already adjourned the hearings until June.<sup>619</sup> Following the Maehe, Rewi had decided to act in accord with Tāwhiao's urging to postpone court applications, and, along with other rangatira, wrote to Fenton seeking further adjournments. However, Rewi's position on the court hearing at this point is somewhat unclear: he also appears to have sought the withdrawal of his requests for adjournments in May and early June, and yet in late May he apparently instructed Mōkau Māori to attend court to 'fight Ngāti Tama to the end.'<sup>620</sup> In the event, no response from the Court to these requests has been found. With Fenton evidently reluctant to grant further adjournments, the Land Court hearing went ahead.

The court sitting at Waitara began in early June 1882 and was largely complete by the end of the month. The hearing was eventually confined, after the withdrawal of some applications, to the area that was of most concern to Wetere – the Poutama area, later divided by the court into the Mōkau Mōhakatino and Mōhakatino Parininihi blocks. This indicated the determination of the tribal leadership to limit their engagement with the court.

Ngāti Tama were also wary of the court. Though some prominent chiefs attended, there were notable Ngāti Tama absences from the court process. As

---

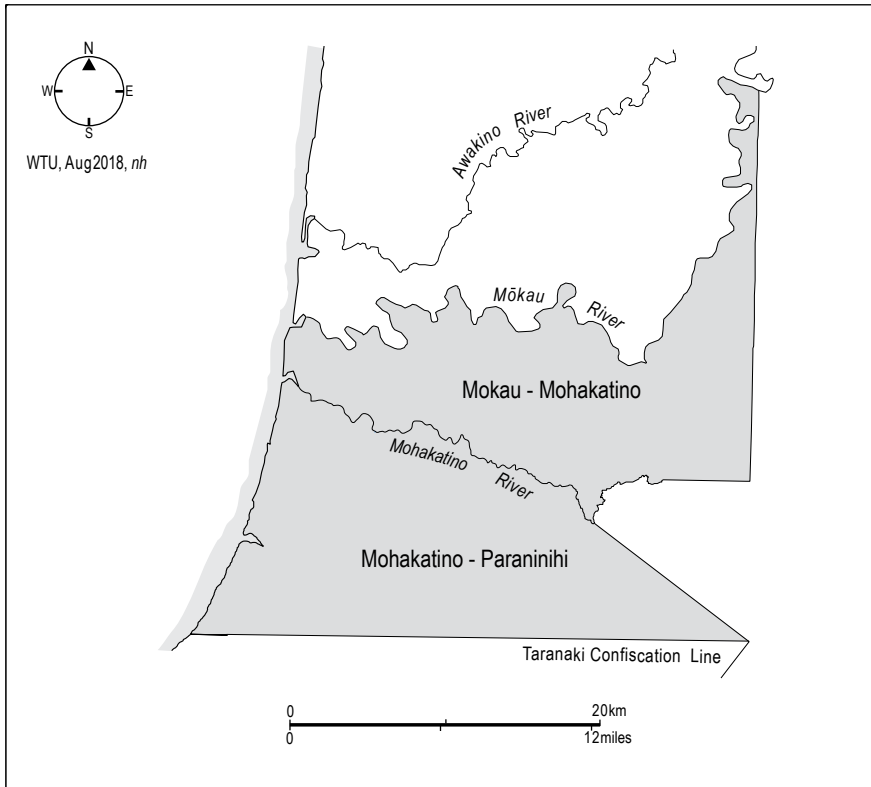

616. 'Letter from Major Te Wheoro', AJHR, 1882, G-4, p 1.

617. Document A41, p 42.

618. NZPD, 1882, vol 41, p 645; doc A41, p 42.

619. Document A78, p 608.

620. Document A78, p 608; doc A28, p 256.

Map 7.3: The Mōkau blocks

Thomas points out, many Ngāti Tama lived at Parihaka and therefore, as a matter of policy, did not attend the Court.<sup>621</sup> The absences may have been the result of a general hostility toward the Crown after the 1881 invasion.<sup>622</sup> One leader, Tupoki Te Herewini Ngapiko, had to be subpoenaed to give evidence. After asserting Ngāti Tama's connections to Poutama, he told the judges 'I will have nothing more to do with you.'<sup>623</sup>

Though the case was not without nuance and complexity, Thomas summarised the general arguments presented at the hearings:

Ngāti Maniapoto claimants tended to emphasise that they had conquered and utterly defeated Ngāti Tama by the 1830s, and had occupied and controlled Poutama since. There had been, they generally argued, no subsequent agreement allowing Ngāti Tama to return to Poutama. The few who did reside in Poutama had less than

621. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 224.

622. Document A28, p 258.

623. Document A28, p 258.

full rights, and had come without permission from the local Ngāti Maniapoto people who quickly forced them out. The Ngāti Tama claimants, in turn, emphasised that they were the undoubted 'original' owners of the land, denied the claimed extent of their military defeat and its consequences, and emphasised that they returned in some numbers and with their full rights restored and acknowledged.<sup>624</sup>

The court ultimately upheld the claims of Wetere and Ngāti Maniapoto to the Poutama lands, which held off their immediate concerns – the potential sale of the land by other parties, and other potential encroachments. In respect of this decision, the Taranaki Tribunal commented that the Native Land Court judges were also the judges of the Compensation Court, and had earlier excluded absentees (that is, Ngāti Tama) from compensation for Taranaki confiscations. To find Ngāti Tama had interests north of the confiscation line would have contradicted their Compensation Court settlement.<sup>625</sup> Yet, in the view of the Taranaki Tribunal, '[t]hese were Ngāti Tama lands. They had been their lands for centuries, and by Māori custom, the Ngāti Tama ancestral interests were not so readily extinguishable.'<sup>626</sup>

In many respects, the nature of the court process constrained the extent of control Māori could exert. Notably, Pākehā agents played a prominent role in the proceedings, with William Grace presenting the case for Ngāti Maniapoto, and HR Richmond and Major Charles Brown representing Ngāti Tama. These men had their own ambitions for Mōkau that were at odds with those of Māori.<sup>627</sup> Grace, for example, acquired the 682-acre Mohakatino Parininihi 2 as payment for debts incurred during the hearings. After survey and title problems, he sold the land to a European in 1889.<sup>628</sup>

As Dr Thomas described, the consequences of the hearing were 'far-reaching and generally disastrous.'<sup>629</sup> Despite the hopes of Wetere and other Māori, their interactions with the Crown and Europeans did not ultimately prove to their benefit. In particular, an agreement was reached with Joshua Jones shortly after the court's hearing to lease a large part of Mokau Mohakatino 1. As we discuss in chapter 11, this quickly fell apart. Understood by Māori to be a joint venture, the Government eventually stepped in to give Jones legal tenure over the land concerned, resulting in a significant land loss for Mōkau Māori.<sup>630</sup>

The hearing at Mōkau was significant for reasons beyond being the first time the Native Land Court sat to determine title for land behind the aukati: the lease of Joshua Jones, a drawn-out saga involving multiple inquiries and special legislation, and ultimately the alienation of a significant part of the land in question (see chapter 11). The experience of Mōkau Māori starkly illustrated the dangers that could accompany the court, particularly once title had been awarded and the

---

624. Document A28, p 263.

625. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 281.

626. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 281.

627. Document A28, pp 259–261.

628. Document A28, pp 284–285.

629. Document A28, pp 285–286.

630. Document A78, p 609; doc A28, pp 287–288.

land was exposed to alienation. Furthermore, many of the same pressures that had driven Mōkau Māori to apply for a court hearing would soon be repeated in other parts of Te Rohe Pōtae.

7.4.4.6 The Government's legislative measures, 1882

During the winter and spring of 1882, the Government enacted a series of measures that were designed either in part or in whole to address the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae. These included the Native Reserves Act 1882, the Amnesty Act 1882, and legislation allocating funding for the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway through the district. In addition, to these matters, the Government extended efforts to entice former 'rebels' to give up their affiliation to the Kingitanga and take up land in the confiscation area. While this was targeted more at Waikato than Maniapoto (partly because it was presumed that no Maniapoto interests had been confiscated), it also affected Ngāti Apakura and the Ngāti Paretekawa hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto (as discussed in chapter 6).

While engaged in these efforts, however, Bryce also sought to oppose the Native Committees Empowering Bill – a piece of legislation introduced to Parliament by Henare Tomoana, member for Eastern Māori. The purpose of the Bill was to enable Māori committees to resolve any differences concerning applications for title determination before bringing the matter before the Native Land Court. The draft legislation was reminiscent of Donald McLean's bills of the early 1870s, which McLean himself had withdrawn from Parliament before they could be fully tested. It was also reminiscent of the calls Māori had made during the 1871 Haultain inquiry for their rūnanga to be empowered to determine title subject to ratification by the Native Land Court (as discussed in section 7.3.5.2).

Similar Bills had been put up by Māori members in 1880 and 1881 but had been defeated. Hone Mohi Tawhai, the member for Northern Māori, wrote in respect of the 1880 Bill that the committees were 'to have authority to enquire into disputes arising in the district in connection with the surveying of land, application for the investigation of title to lands, and the sale of lands upon the application of the persons interested in the land under dispute.'<sup>631</sup> Bryce had promised to have the Bill translated and printed by the time of the next session, but by then Bryce had resigned as Native Minister, and the printed version of the legislation that came before the House that year had removed the committees' ability to have control over surveys and sales. In addition, the Native Land Court would first have to be satisfied that the parties agreed to the committee's jurisdiction, though the court had to take 'judicial notice' of any decision arising.<sup>632</sup> Tomoana put the revised Bill before the house in July 1881, but again it appeared too late in the session.<sup>633</sup>

---

631. Enclosure in Tawhai to Native Under-Secretary, 21 January 1881 (Vincent O'Malley, Agents of Autonomy: Maori Committees in the Nineteenth Century (Wellington: Huia Publishers, 1998), pp137–138).

632. O'Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p138.

633. O'Malley, Agents of Autonomy, pp138–139.

When Bryce resumed the office of Native Minister in October 1881, he indicated he would be prepared to consider the measure. But by May 1882, he had change his mind. During the Bill's second reading, Bryce advised members against voting for it, particularly because of the 'most inadvisable' clause which required the Native Land Court to take judicial notice of a committee's decision.<sup>634</sup> However, the Bill received a significant amount of support from Pākehā members because such committees would help facilitate the work of the court. Bryce opposed the Bill because he considered that Māori should be assimilated into the European population and should not be provided with separate institutions. Those who supported the Bill pointed out that the committees would in fact assist the process of breaking down differences between Māori and Pākehā, by incorporating Māori institutions into the machinery of the State. In the end, the Bill was defeated, but only very narrowly; indeed, it almost passed, despite the opposition of the Native Minister.<sup>635</sup>

Three other pieces of legislation, however, were passed in September 1882 that laid the groundwork for fulfilling Bryce's suggestion that he would soon return to Te Rohe Pōtae with his own proposal.

7.4.4.6.1 THE NATIVE RESERVES ACT 1882

The Native Reserves Act 1882 introduced provisions for Māori to apply to the Court to ascertain title with a view to reserving their land subject to specific conditions. For land over which customary title had not yet been extinguished, Māori could apply to the Court to transfer 'all their estate and interest' to the Public Trustee in trust and for purposes declared to the Court. In theory, these provisions meant customary land could be protected from sale by reserving it immediately after the Court investigated it, without being exposed to alienation in the process. Bryce considered the proposed legislation to be an encouraging response to the kind of requests both Rewi and Tāwhiao had made for the protection of their territory, and said that 'it was hoped that it might lead to a considerable portion of the Waikato, known as the King Country, being converted into reserves.'<sup>636</sup>

Te Wheoro criticised the Bill because it did not leave the 'full control' of the reserved land in the hands of Māori, which was key to the terms Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had so far attempted to negotiate.<sup>637</sup> Nonetheless, it seemed at this stage that the Government was prepared to consider a measure by which 'the King Country' could be made inalienable and reserved for its owners. Leaving aside the measure's limitations, it was still a promising sign.

Following protest about the Bill from Māori members of Parliament, the Native Reserves Act (as it was passed) included provisions for Māori representation on the board of management of the Public Trust. However, the representation was

---

634. O'Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p 139.

635. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 312–316

636. Bryce, 6 June 1882, NZPD, vol 41, p 306.

637. Te Wheoro, 16 June 1882, NZPD, vol 41, p 526; doc A41, pp 38–39.

essentially token and Māori were not included in the board after 1894.<sup>638</sup> (In 1913 a commission of inquiry described the board as ‘a farce’.) The Te Tau Ihu Tribunal, echoing Te Wheoro’s criticism, called the legislation ‘no real substitute for committees of owners managing their own inalienable estate, and distributing the income as they saw fit.’<sup>639</sup>

7.4.4.6.2 THE NORTH ISLAND MAIN TRUNK RAILWAY LOAN ACT 1882

The second legislative measure was the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act 1882. This Act authorised the Government to raise a loan of a million pounds for construction of a North Island main trunk railway.<sup>640</sup> Plans to extend the railway, which had reached Te Awamutu in 1880, seemed to be underway.

7.4.4.6.3 THE AMNESTY ACT 1882

The third piece of legislation was the Amnesty Act 1882.<sup>641</sup> The Act allowed the governor, on the advice of the Executive Council, to declare an amnesty for offences ‘more or less of a political character’ that were in connection with insurrections or had occurred subsequent to them. These declarations of amnesty could be made in respect of individuals or groups of Māori as the Government wished.<sup>642</sup>

The prospect of the Government introducing some form of amnesty had been raised on a number of occasions during negotiations in the 1870s and had been contemplated by McLean as far back as 1872.<sup>643</sup> More recently the issue had been raised by Te Wheoro, who in May 1882 asked Bryce whether he intended to pardon Te Kooti and Purukutu (who killed Sullivan). At the time, Bryce appeared reluctant to be drawn on the issue but admitted that some form of amnesty was possible.<sup>644</sup>

The immediate catalyst for the Act, however, was an incident involving Weterer, who in the winter of 1882, visited Wellington seeking the return of confiscated lands south of Parininihi and to build a relationship with the Government.<sup>645</sup> His visit was curtailed when a nephew of Reverend Whiteley – Whiteley King – attempted to have Weterer placed under private arrest for his uncle’s 1869 murder.<sup>646</sup> Assisted by Government officials, Weterer hurried home to Mōkau. Hoax telegrams claimed Weterer had confessed to the crime, and many of Weterer’s people were furious about rumours he had been arrested.<sup>647</sup> Government officials were also displeased, as Thomas states, because Weterer’s support was now viewed as an essential part of

---

638. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Ika a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 2, p 819.

639. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Ika a Maui, vol 2, p 819.

640. Document A41, pp 40–41.

641. Document A41, pp 39–40.

642. Document A78, p 641.

643. Document A78, pp 333–334.

644. Document A78, p 625.

645. Document A28, p 303.

646. Document A78, pp 636–639.

647. Document A28, pp 303–305.

the plan to construct the railway through to Mōkau. However, newspaper reporters reprinted earlier reports identifying Wetere as one of Whiteley's murderers.<sup>648</sup>

Dr Thomas also argues that Pākehā calls to punish Māori for 'crimes' committed inside the aukati and during the wars were heightened during the 1880s, particularly in the wake of the Government's invasion of Parihaka.<sup>649</sup> However, the Government saw the need to find a resolution and increasingly turned to the idea of offering an amnesty to those it perceived had committed crimes of a political nature during the wars, including Te Kooti.<sup>650</sup> Wetere was another who could benefit from the amnesty; he had never been found guilty of the killing of Reverend Whiteley, although he did not deny that he led the attack.<sup>651</sup> At this stage, the Government had not yet indicated whether it was to offer a partial or full amnesty but the event prompted several members of the Legislative Council to call for an amnesty for all Māori accused of war 'crimes'.<sup>652</sup> This situation highlighted the difference in opinion between the Government and the Pākehā public about whether the Māori 'crimes' should be punished. As Ms Marr notes, some sections of the Pākehā community were so aghast at Te Kooti's inclusion in the amnesty that there were reports of Bryce being burned in effigy.<sup>653</sup>

Bryce introduced the legislation relatively late in the session on 28 August 1882. In doing so, he said that it was targeted at addressing the situation in Te Rohe Pōtae, commenting that it would facilitate negotiations there. However, Bryce was also insistent that members avoid asking about how the Act might be applied in practice.<sup>654</sup> As it turned out, the Government made no immediate declarations of amnesty under the Act. Bryce had only just demonstrated that he would show no leniency for crimes that were not considered of a political nature with the capture, trial and execution of Winiata, who had been suspected of killing Edwin Packer (see sidebar).

The Capture of Winiata

Winiata was suspected of killing Edwin Packer in 1876. It was not until 1882 that the Government came to pursue Winiata's arrest seriously. Grey had earlier offered a reward of £100 for Winiata's capture, but he had avoided arrest and found his way to safety behind the aukati. Reports at the time suggested that had Winiata been caught, the Kingitanga would have left the matter to be managed by the colonial justice system. On the other hand, once inside the aukati any prospect of handing

648. Document A28, p 163.

649. Document A28, p 303.

650. Document A78, p 722.

651. Document A28, p 163.

652. Document A78, pp 638–640.

653. Document A78, pp 736–737.

654. Document A78, p 641.

him over would be negotiable. Bryce, by contrast, managed to pursue and capture Winiata without the constabulary having to cross the aukati line. He did so by persuading Robert Barlow – son of a Ngāti Apakura woman and Pākehā storekeeper, then living at Mohaonui near Ōtorohanga – to essentially dupe Winiata on the pretence of buying pigs and corn. Barlow invited Winiata into his home and, after a few failed attempts, managed to manhandle him to Te Awamutu, where the local constabulary effected the arrest.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document A78, pp 626–628.

Winiata was found guilty of wilful murder, despite several Pākehā supporters arguing the evidence was too weak to convict. The governor declined his prerogative to allow a pardon, and Winiata was hanged on 4 August 1882, still protesting his innocence.<sup>655</sup> Bryce achieved this outcome without violating the aukati, but unlike McLean's gentler approach, he risked raising tensions with the Kīngitanga, whose members were concerned at the nature of Winiata's capture and arrest, particularly the treachery of Barlow in conspiring with the constabulary. Bryce, on the other hand, was demonstrating that he could respond to public demand to have wanted criminals caught while also drawing a distinction between criminal acts and offences of a political nature to which amnesties might apply.

7.4.4.6.4 THE 1882 LEGISLATION AS A FOUNDATION FOR RENEWED NEGOTIATIONS

Dr Loveridge described these three pieces of legislation as 'anticipatory', noting that 'they did not create reserves in the King Country, or declare an amnesty for the people there, or initiate the construction of a railway through it'. Rather, they 'provided a mechanism' for those things to happen if needed.<sup>656</sup>

In early September 1882, Bryce prepared a memo to the Governor in which he claimed that the long-standing isolation of the King Country had completely broken down, and the 'prospect of a final settlement' seemed likely during the next summer, particularly given the Amnesty Act, which Bryce considered would 'conduce to this end.'<sup>657</sup> Bryce was so confident that he reportedly expected surveyors to begin work on the railway route south of Te Awamutu during the summer. Little else was known about Bryce's specific intentions. In early August, Bryce had informed Tāwhiao that he would 'come to Waikato soon after Parliament has

---

655. Document A78, p 631.

656. Document A41, p 41.

657. Bryce to governor, 9 September 1882, BPP, 1883, vol 47 [3689], pp 19–20 (IUP, vol 17, pp 33–34; doc A41, p 41.

risen, which may perhaps be in one month or two months.’<sup>658</sup> This was the first indication that Bryce would break with his policy of no engagement.

7.4.4.7 Bryce’s meeting with Tāwhiao at Whatiwhatihoe, October–November 1882

The Crown’s final attempt to negotiate a settlement with Tāwhiao took place over the course of a week at the Kingitanga’s main place of residence, Whatiwhatihoe. Bryce arrived there on 30 October 1882, though he announced he would not stay for long. Four hundred Māori were in attendance, including Wahanui, Rewi, Te Ngakau, and Te Wheoro, as well as visiting Pākehā.<sup>659</sup>

Tāwhiao commenced proceedings, addressing Bryce by referring to McLean’s earlier proposals, and restating the position of the Kingitanga: he sought a guarantee from the Crown that the administration of his land and people would be left to him, and that this would extend as far as the Mangatawhiri.<sup>660</sup>

Bryce, however, told Tāwhiao that the Government would never meet these terms, and that the offers of previous governments had been withdrawn. He was willing to outline the Government’s position, but details would need to be worked out with Kingitanga leaders in private. He returned to the metaphor of a flood to illustrate the choice he considered confronted Tāwhiao. ‘The flood of European civilisation and occupation’ had been ‘rising’, he said, adding: ‘There is no use in saying that the flood is bitter, roll back its waters. Bitter or sweet, the waters are not waters that will roll back.’<sup>661</sup> Turning to the question of sovereignty, Bryce said that the land was not ‘large enough for two separate independent authorities’. He explained: ‘Chiefs may have authority in their tribe, and may still remain great chiefs, but the sovereignty of the Queen must prevail over this island from end to end. . . . it cannot be helped.’ He said that while the law might be bad in some respects, the chiefs should work to amend it, not resist it.<sup>662</sup>

In a new development, Bryce now also pressed Ngāti Maniapoto specifically to assist Waikato, because Ngāti Maniapoto had joined the cause which had brought such great trouble to Waikato – Tāwhiao and his people therefore had claims against them.<sup>663</sup> This suggested, initially, that the Government was not prepared to return any of the confiscated land and would instead look to Ngāti Maniapoto to provide for Waikato on a permanent basis. However, it soon became apparent that the Government was willing to return some confiscated land, though how much remained unclear.

The assembled leaders then entered discussions about the general terms outlined by Bryce. Meanwhile, officials formulated Bryce’s terms into a series of written points, which were given to Tāwhiao on 31 October 1882, with Te Wheoro acting 658. ‘Mr Bryce’s Reply to Tawhiao’, NZ Herald, 4 August 1882, p 5; doc A78, pp 645–646.

659. Document A78, p 652.

660. Document A78, p 653.

661. ‘The Kingite Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 31 October 1882, p 5.

662. ‘The Kingite Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 31 October 1882, p 5; doc A78, pp 654–655.

663. Document A78, p 655.

as an intermediary.<sup>664</sup> What appears as the finalised terms were dated 4 November, the day they were due to be publicly discussed. They contained a description that they were proposals from Bryce to Tāwhiao ‘to settle and put an end to the trouble which has existed between certain native tribes and the European Government’. The terms were:

1. The Government will return to Tawhiao and his tribe the bulk of the unsold confiscated land west of the Waipa and Waikato formerly belonging to them, and returned rebels of other tribes will also receive portions of land west of the Waikato under the Waikato Confiscated Lands Act.
2. Will give him the section of land at Kaipara<sup>665</sup> which he asked Sir John Hall for.
3. Will urge Ngāti Maniapoto to give Tawhiao and his people a piece of their country.
4. Government will build and furnish a house for Tawhiao.
5. Will give him a pension of £400 a year.
6. Will make him an assessor of the Resident Magistrates Court.
7. An assessor of the Native Lands Court.
8. A Justice of the Peace.
9. Will advise His Excellency to call him to the Legislative Council.

These proposals now made are contingent on Tawhiao accepting the sovereignty of the Queen and her laws and signifying such acceptance immediately, and are not to be considered as remaining over.<sup>666</sup>

A space was then indicated for Bryce’s signature, and for Tāwhiao’s, underneath the statement: ‘And I Tawhiao accept them on behalf of myself and my people.’

While the offer of the ‘bulk’ of unsold confiscated lands appeared substantial, it was not precise about how much land was being offered. The offer of the return of land under the Waikato Confiscated Lands legislation also required compromises: grantees would need to accept they had acted in rebellion, and as individuals rather than communities, both of which would have been unacceptable to the Kīngitanga.<sup>667</sup> And though Ngāti Maniapoto would not be required to surrender some of their land to Waikato, the suggestion that they would be urged to do so would have only raised questions. No mention was made of any authority Tāwhiao and the chiefs might have over a recognised territory – in this respect Bryce was offering considerably less than McLean or Grey had. Instead, Bryce offered Tāwhiao several official positions, including a seat on the Legislative Council, a position also offered to Rewi in earlier negotiations but never accepted.

---

664. Document A78, p 658; ‘The Kingite Meeting, New Zealand Herald, 31 October 1882, p 5.

665. According to Ms Marr, during his visit to Auckland, Tāwhiao had told Premier Hall ‘that he used to live at Kaipara for a while as a boy, and he had fond memories of it and would like to live there occasionally again’. Hall undertook to find ‘an acre or two of Crown land there’ where a house could be built for Tāwhiao: doc A78, p 558.

666. Document A78, p 659; doc A78(a) (Marr document bank), vol 1, pp 365–367, 457–460.

667. Document A78, p 659.

Instead, Tāwhiao was asked to accept the sovereignty of the Queen and her laws, upon which all the offers were conditional.<sup>668</sup>

Bryce and Tāwhiao met for discussions on 2 November. Tāwhiao said he was willing to accept those parts of the proposals that appeared to be for him personally, but that the decision in respect of broader issues lay with all of the Kingitanga tribes.<sup>669</sup> In response, Bryce said that he was willing to discuss the offers in more detail, but not until the question of sovereignty was settled – ‘a divided sovereignty in this Island was not possible.’<sup>670</sup> The offers had to be accepted or declined as a whole – nothing could be left for future discussion.<sup>671</sup> The parties agreed that they would return on 4 November, when Tāwhiao would give his response.<sup>672</sup>

Tāwhiao began proceedings on the appointed day by reaffirming the fundamental position of the Kingitanga: while he accepted the Government’s right to administer affairs in other parts of the country, he intended to maintain the authority of the Kingitanga. Frustrated, Bryce insisted on ‘a plain answer – yes or no.’<sup>673</sup> The Native Minister also asked whether there was another leader present who might advise Tāwhiao to accept the proposals; if not, Bryce would leave.<sup>674</sup>

At that point, Tāwhiao (according to the account in the New Zealand Herald) went over to Wahanui and spoke to him quietly. Exactly what they discussed is unclear and was the subject of conjecture at the time. After conferring with Tāwhiao, Wahanui rose and spoke. Rather than accepting Bryce’s proposals, however, Wahanui essentially rejected them. He said that the ‘eye’ of the problem was how the Kingitanga’s authority was to be respected: ‘What you want to do is to take the authority from your friend Tawhiao.’<sup>675</sup>

Bryce agreed that the main point at issue was ‘the question of mana or sovereignty’. Only the Queen, he said, held sovereignty in New Zealand; the most he would concede was that Māori held a ‘shadow of an authority’, which was gradually falling away, though it would be appropriate for the Government to recognise the position of chiefs. Bryce informed Wahanui that it was now his responsibility to complete the negotiations.<sup>676</sup>

More exchanges followed in which Wahanui continued to press the case of the Kingitanga. Referring to Bryce’s flood metaphor, Wahanui said that there was always a fixed place where the tide ceased to flow: tides have peaks, they reach a

668. Document A41, p 48; doc A78, pp 659, 664, 667.

669. Document A78, p 663.

670. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 3 November 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 664.

671. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 3 November 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 664.

672. Document A78, p 665.

673. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 6 November 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 667.

674. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, p 5; doc A78, pp 666–667.

675. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 6 November 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 668.

676. ‘Conclusion of the Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, p 5; doc A78, pp 668–669; doc A41, p 50.

high mark and recede. As he understood it, the tide could not continue beyond the aukati. He maintained that the Kingitanga had never been opposed to the Queen and asked why there could only be one head in the potae.<sup>677</sup>

When Bryce continued to press for a decision, Wahanui reportedly said that Bryce's words were 'angry-angry-angry' and that he was 'unable to bear' the burden that had been placed on him. Bryce asked Tāwhiao if there was any further reply, but Tāwhiao said that 'Wahanui has taken it out of my hands, and it now rests with him.'<sup>678</sup>

The hui ended with Bryce leaving abruptly. It was to be the last time the Government would negotiate with Tāwhiao.

On 15 November 1882, 11 days after leaving the hui, Bryce wrote to Wahanui, advising he would 'do well' to regard the letter 'as one of great importance'. Taking the view that it was Wahanui, 'speaking for Ngatimaniapoto', who prevented Tāwhiao from accepting the terms offered, Bryce said 'the responsibility of that now rests with you, and whatever the consequences may be, you will have to bear them.'<sup>679</sup> The Evening Post described the letter as Bryce 'very clearly and forcibly' placing the responsibility of the negotiations on Wahanui's shoulders, to the complete exclusion of Tāwhiao.<sup>680</sup> Mr Meredith suggested that Bryce's letter was threatening.<sup>681</sup>

Bryce noted the passage of legislation to proclaim amnesties for the 'criminals in your district' but asked how such a proclamation could be made while Tāwhiao claimed sovereignty, 'setting himself outside the Queen's law'. Furthermore, Bryce assured Wahanui that if 'the hand of the law descends upon the culprits . . . They will blame you'. He also argued that Ngāti Maniapoto had been 'as deep' in the Waikato War as the Waikato people, but had not received the same punishment. Though willing to talk about the wars, it was not a discussion Bryce would commence. Rather it was up to Wahanui 'to say whether these things are to be dragged back from the darkness where they are now hidden.'<sup>682</sup>

Bryce then gave Wahanui three reasons why Te Rohe Pōtae could not remain closed to 'travellers', and 'should be opened by roads and railways':

First, all the rest of New Zealand is open to the public by roads and railways. Your conduct in keeping this part of the country closed is a sign of enmity to the colony. If, indeed, you and your people were enemies of the Government and the colony it might be right, but if we are to continue friends as we are now, what reason can you give for it? That is one strong reason.

---

677. Document A78, p 669.

678. 'Conclusion of the Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 6 November 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 671.

679. 'Mr Bryce and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 2 December 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 700.

680. 'Mr Bryce's Letter to Wahanui', Evening Post, 5 December 1882, p 2; doc A78, p 702.

681. Document A110, p 626.

682. 'Mr Bryce and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 2 December 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 700.

Another is that the Government own large blocks of land near Mokau, and it is unreasonable to suppose that they will consent to being denied access to their own lands.

The third reason is that the construction of such public works will greatly enhance the value of everybody's land through which they pass, as well as benefit others, both Maori and Europeans.<sup>683</sup>

While pitching his reasons as 'strong', Bryce warned Wahanui that his current course of action was 'injurious alike to others and yourself'. He urged Wahanui to reflect on matters and reiterated his willingness to work towards 'making proper arrangements'. Bryce finished his letter to Wahanui by saying he wanted its contents to 'be communicated to the people, so that they may know with whom the fault lies if troubles hereafter come upon us'.<sup>684</sup>

Commentary at the time reflected considerable support for Bryce's clear and forceful approach. Newspapers, briefed by Whitaker, took Bryce's letter as a much-needed warning to Wahanui and others. The Crown would grant an amnesty for political offences and protect land interests. However, King Country Māori would need to stop harbouring those wanted for criminal offences and stop hampering the advancement of the railway. Bryce's letter generated a confidence among the settler public that Ngāti Maniapoto had little choice but to see the sense of what he had said and break away from the Kingitanga.<sup>685</sup>

Not everyone agreed with what Bryce had done. William Grace, the government agent living at Alexandra, described Bryce's letter as 'not worthy of a man who calls himself Native Minister'.<sup>686</sup> He worried that the chiefs would now be less rather than more inclined to cooperate. The Evening Star asserted that Bryce's demand for an immediate answer from those gathered at the hui was 'neither judicious nor fair'.<sup>687</sup> Having 'got their backs up', Bryce would then have to deal with the refusal of his terms. In that context, the Evening Star suggested, Bryce's letter to Wahanui 'may be regarded as a masterly retreat from a difficult position'.<sup>688</sup> Possibly Bryce was angry because he had expected that Tāwhiao would accept the terms he offered.<sup>689</sup> Newspapers at the time similarly reported the likelihood of Tāwhiao accepting terms, although it is difficult to determine the basis of those expectations.<sup>690</sup>

Although it was not apparent to everyone at the time, this was the last occasion Tāwhiao engaged in sustained negotiations with the Crown. Future negotiations

683. 'Mr Bryce and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 2 December 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 701.

684. 'Mr Bryce and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 2 December 1882, p 5; doc A78, p 701.

685. See, for example, 'The Maori Difficulty', Grey River Argus, 25 November 1882, p 2; 'Mr Bryce's Letter to Wahanui', Evening Post, 5 December 1882, p 2; doc A78, pp 702–703.

686. W H Grace to Joshua Jones, 10 December 1882 (doc A78, p 703).

687. Evening Star, 5 December 1882, p 2; doc A78, p 703.

688. Evening Star, 5 December 1882, p 2; doc A78, p 703.

689. Document A78, pp 670–671.

690. Document A78, pp 665–666.

would be conducted with Wahanui and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, as discussed in the next chapter.

7.4.5 Treaty analysis and findings: negotiations, 1875–82

Bryce's ultimatum to Tāwhiao, and his subsequent letter to Wahanui, were major developments in the negotiations between the Kīngitanga and the Crown that had stopped and started again from 1875. We pause here to consider what these developments represent in terms of the Treaty. We consider, in particular, the questions put to us by the claimants about whether the Crown could have done more to recognise and provide for the Kīngitanga's authority and resolve its grievances arising from the Waikato war; and whether, in its efforts to resolve the situation, it placed undue pressure on those Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who had committed to the Kīngitanga and its cause.

7.4.5.1 *The approach of the parties to the negotiations

The negotiations that began in 1875 constituted a significant development from the previous state of affairs. Prior to that time, the Crown had hoped (as McLean put it) to 'glide into a state of peace' without offering specific terms.<sup>691</sup> But following Tāwhiao's approach to meet with him directly in early 1875, McLean recognised that the stalemate that had emerged would only be overcome through direct negotiations with the Kīngitanga leadership. To successfully resolve the stalemate, an arrangement with King Tāwhiao would be required. As this was the very issue over which the Crown and the Kīngitanga had become divided in the lead-up to the Waikato war, any resolution would require considerable effort. Not only had there been war in the intervening period, but the Crown had also confiscated the bulk of the Waikato lands, as well as some Ngāti Maniapoto lands north of the Puniu, leaving the Waikato people essentially landless and reliant on their Ngāti Maniapoto hosts.

The sticking points in the negotiations were how the Crown might accommodate the authority of the Kīngitanga and whether it would be prepared to return all of the confiscated lands. Ultimately, each phase of the negotiations from 1875 to the hui at Whatiwhatihoe in November 1882 came unstuck on these points. The question for us to consider is whether the Crown approached the negotiations in good faith, and whether it could have done more to overcome the obstacles that prevented a settlement from being achieved at that juncture.

The Crown considers that it did approach the negotiations in good faith: the proposals that were made were genuine and reflective of the Crown's intent to exercise sovereignty within the district.<sup>692</sup> In particular, the Crown submitted, the decisions of Grey and Bryce to withdraw the terms on offer to the Kīngitanga at the Te Kōpua and Whatiwhatihoe hui respectively were practical responses to the position adopted by the Kīngitanga.<sup>693</sup> Ultimately, the Crown considers, it

---

691. McLean memorandum, MS Papers-0032-0030, pp 16–21, object #1007778, ATL.

692. Submission 3.4.301, pp 8, 15–16.

693. Submission 3.4.301, pp 6, 15.

was Tāwhiao who chose not to compromise, which led the Crown to adopt the approach that it did.<sup>694</sup> The Crown also denies that it sought to undertake a ‘divide and conquer’ approach to the negotiations.<sup>695</sup>

The Crown’s submission invites us to consider what would have been an appropriate compromise for the Kīngitanga to have contemplated in the circumstances it faced after the war and confiscation. Essentially, the dialogue that commenced from 1875 was the first attempt to work out how the terms and guarantees of the Treaty would be brought into practical effect in the district. As we discussed earlier (see section 7.3.6.1), the Crown acknowledged in our inquiry that further discussions and negotiations were needed to establish the necessary institutional structures. Although – at the time – the Crown may not have viewed the discussions as means by which the terms of the Treaty could be given proper effect, this was the first opportunity where the Crown and the Kīngitanga discussed face to face how their respective authorities might work together in any detailed way. Whether they proceeded in a manner that was consistent with the principles of the Treaty is a matter we will consider below.

The position maintained by the Kīngitanga and its constituent iwi, including those of Te Rohe Pōtae, had not changed in the ten years since the end of the Waikato war. By 1875, the Kīngitanga had amply demonstrated that it was determined to maintain tino rangatiratanga within remaining territories: even though the aukati was increasingly subject to adjustment at the edges, it remained an enforced boundary. The question was whether the Crown, in its engagements with the Kīngitanga and in the content of its offers, provided enough of a guarantee that the Kīngitanga’s authority would be recognised while also remedying the worst of the effects of the Waikato war. So long as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to support the Kīngitanga, this was what was required to bring the Treaty relationship into practical effect in Te Rohe Pōtae.

7.4.5.2 *Did the Crown place undue pressure on Ngāti Maniapoto to separate from the Kīngitanga?

A key claimant contention was that the Crown placed considerable pressure on Ngāti Maniapoto lands and leadership to undermine their authority and separate them from the Kīngitanga. Claimant counsel depicted this as the Crown’s ‘relentless’ interest in breaking the aukati.<sup>696</sup> The Crown disagreed, submitting that its concurrent discussions with Tāwhiao and Ngāti Maniapoto leaders, particularly Rewi, were done at the initiation of the leaders themselves and not in the hope of forcing Ngāti Maniapoto apart from the Kīngitanga.<sup>697</sup> Further, the Crown submitted that it maintained a policy of non-interference by not directly challenging the aukati.<sup>698</sup>

---

694. Submission 3.4.301, pp 7, 15.

695. Submission 3.4.301, p 9.

696. Submission 3.4.122, p 7.

697. Submission 3.4.301, p 9.

698. Submission 3.4.299, p 18.

7.4.5.2.1 THE CROWN'S POLICY OF NON-INTERFERENCE

We agree with the Crown's contention that in many respects there were no direct attempts to challenge the aukati during this period. Evidence of the Crown's 'non-interference' policy can be seen in several of its responses to issues raised by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori throughout the negotiations. When concerns were raised about the construction of roads with Pollen and Grey, for example, the response was that roads would not be constructed through Kīngitanga territories. Instead, the roads would stop at the end of lands owned by the Crown. Premier Grey emphasised that the road would be built on land the Government had already acquired by fair means and would benefit Māori and Pākehā alike. In addition, as Crown counsel observed, in response to concerns about whether the main trunk railway might be forced through the district, Grey assured Māori that the Crown would not push the railway through their territory and would not proceed without the chiefs' agreement.<sup>699</sup> Finally, when an application was put in for title determination of Mōkau lands in the early 1880s, the Crown agreed to utilise its powers under legislation to withhold a court hearing – no hearing would be granted until Rewi had consented.<sup>700</sup>

We also agree with the Crown that for the most part it was Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders who sought out discussions with the Government from the mid-1870s, not vice versa. But we note that they generally did this to raise concerns about matters over which the Crown had control, including the incursions of the Court and land agents into Kīngitanga territories. More generally, Māori leaders also sought to secure peace by establishing improved relationships with communities beyond the aukati. Mōkau was one place where a renewed sense of openness was present, after the damage caused by the Pukearuhe attack in 1869. Local Māori communities hoped to put to rest any preconceptions about them by welcoming back Ngāti Tama to settle in their midst, and to re-establish trading relationships that had been so successful prior to the war. This included approaches to the Government for support. From the perspective of the Kīngitanga leadership, especially Rewi, such openness was possible – and in fact desirable – so long as core Kīngitanga policies were maintained and Māori communities were in control.

Such openness and optimism was perhaps prompted by the fact that by 1875 the Crown had come around to the idea that it needed to engage in negotiations and to recognise Kīngitanga authority in some form. McLean had previously supported a policy that looked to provide for the authority of chiefs, even though it was not adopted; but now the Government had acknowledged the need to negotiate directly with the Kīngitanga. Ngāti Maniapoto traditions of a 'covenant' being established suggest that the beginning of negotiations with McLean were seen by Māori as being of some significance.

---

699. Submission 3.4.301, p 25.

700. Native Land Act 1873, s 20; Native Land Court Act 1880, s 38.

7.4.5.2.2 THE EFFECT OF THE NATIVE LAND SYSTEM AND REWI'S RESPONSE

Underlying the Crown's non-interference policy, however, was the operation of a native land system that gradually came to threaten the viability of the aukati. Although the Crown had the power to withhold applications from the court<sup>701</sup>, it used this power selectively. When the prospect was raised of lands in the border zones of the Kingitanga territories coming before the court, the Crown offered no such protections. The encroachment of the Court in the northeast of the district caused Rewi especial concern, and he sought out engagement with the Crown to find a solution that would ensure that the Kingitanga territory could be protected. Rewi presented the key issues in his discussions with Crown representatives, first with McLean and Pollen, then with Grey and Sheehan.

Representing the interests of owners in certain areas, Rewi took issue with the operation of the Native Land Court, Crown and private land purchasing, and the initiation of public works. Rewi repeatedly explained how and why those activities prevented Te Rohe Pōtae Māori from protecting their land interests outside the aukati, which had only served to put pressure on the aukati and increase tensions in border areas. This was the case in respect of lands to the north and east, in which Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa held interests, among others. In those areas, Rewi observed what could happen when hapū and iwi with different layers of interest had not had the opportunity to make joint decisions about how those interests could be recognised, as well as who would be able to make decisions about the land in the future, including whether to allow settlement or other activities. As early as 1876, not long after the negotiations with McLean began, this same set of circumstances began to present itself in Mōkau, within the core Ngāti Maniapoto territory.

The range of issues that were arising in these areas was perhaps unsurprising, given the extent of colonising activity promoted by successive ministries following the initiation of Vogel's public works policy, and as the central government increasingly took control of public works and settlement following the abolition of the provinces. The Crown's policies and legislation in respect of Māori land supported this renewed focus on colonisation, particularly the Native Land Act 1873 and Native Land Court Act 1880, under which there were few mechanisms to prevent land going before the Court. This meant that more land could be converted into individualised titles and, in turn, rendered vulnerable to private or Crown purchasing.

One of the key issues was that the Native Land Court did not enable the determination of tribal boundaries. Hapū and iwi who had committed to the Kingitanga demanded the right that they be able to settle their boundaries by their own methods, rather than having them be determined piecemeal, in blocks that were not of their choosing. Previously their boundaries had been more fluid and were subject to change over time and according to circumstance. But increasingly they recognised that they would need to decide on hard, formalised boundaries to accommodate the new order. They were prepared to do this, so long as they retained control of the process. In 1879, Rewi orchestrated an occasion to demonstrate to the Native Minister, John Sheehan, how Māori control of the title determination process could work. He and other rangatira from Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa set out their joint boundaries around the entire rohe (see section 7.4.2.5). Rewi's purpose in bringing these boundaries to the attention of Sheehan was to demonstrate that they had the capacity to work in concert to decide on matters of importance to themselves. It also indicated the extent of the territory that he expected to be protected from the native land system.

---

701. Native Land Act 1873, s37.

Rewi's focus was increasingly on securing the integrity of the aukati in the face of uncontrolled settlement. In the absence of specific action by the Crown, Rewi recognised that the only mechanism available was to use the Crown's own institution: the Native Land Court. He acknowledged the Native Land Court as a reality on the ground and was willing to attend its proceedings (first in 1879) and to seek adjournments or rehearings of cases. However, this would only be for land outside of the aukati. In this way, as Ms Marr described, he looked to use the court for the purposes of defining a boundary that the Crown had to recognise through its own system.<sup>702</sup> Once this boundary was defined, Rewi's hope was that the Crown would recognise Tāwhiao's authority within the territories it enclosed.

7.4.5.2.3 THE GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSE TO REWI'S CONCERNS

The Crown gave few assurances to Rewi that his concerns would not eventuate in the long term. Although the Crown agreed not to allow certain activities in the district for the time being, there was an underlying assumption that this position could only be maintained for so long. Pollen responded to Rewi's criticisms of the native land system by urging the chiefs to use the colonial courts to address their issues, which he believed was the best means of protecting their property rights. He assured them, when he met Rewi in 1877, that the Government would not purchase any more land, but only complete purchases that had already begun, and that road-building would only go as far as the aukati. However, Pollen maintained that it could or would not hold back the Native Land Court forever, which meant that land could continue to be brought before the court so long as there were some applicants willing to do so. Sheehan, equally encouraged Rewi to make use of the court.

And while Grey's responses to the issues raised at the hui at Te Kōpua may have gone some way towards assuaging their immediate concerns, the general problem remained. That is, the Crown had created a native land system which was now pressing up against the borders of Te Rohe Pōtae and threatening to penetrate the aukati. Groups inside the aukati faced the extremely difficult choice of recognising and participating in the court to secure their interests in land adjacent to the district, or foregoing those interests forever. But acceptance and use of the court posed its own dangers for the lands still withheld from the native land system. All this meant that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori faced a situation that increasingly differed from what it had been at the end of the wars, which created new risks and, in turn, had a significant effect on the negotiations.

---

702. Document A78, pp 454, 496.

The fact that the Crown appeared willing to withhold its authority from the district only temporarily was underlined by the Crown's invasion of Parihaka in November 1881. Although the circumstances differed, in that the Crown recognised the right of customary ownership that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori held in respect of their lands, it was a show of force that loomed in the background when the Government came to re-engage in direct negotiations the following year.

It was in this context that Rewi accepted Bryce's invitation to use the land court in March 1882. On the face of it, Rewi's announcement that he would use the court was to fulfil the various purposes he had been outlining to the Government's representatives during negotiations over the preceding years: to define the external boundary of the core Kīngitanga territory, so that the Kīngitanga could exercise authority within the remaining lands.

7.4.5.2.4 THE DECISION TO ALLOW THE NATIVE LAND COURT AT MŌKAU

The decision to allow the Court at Mōkau in 1882 was in a different category, however, because it was land that was both within the aukati and part of the core lands of Ngāti Maniapoto. For this reason, it was a decision that had significant ramifications for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Kīngitanga more broadly.

Mōkau had been a site of both productive engagement and tension since 1840, led by a range of leaders who had spearheaded efforts from the local hapū to engage in trade and seek settlement. Mōkau Māori had looked to both re-establish their standing in the wider Pākehā community and re-engage in the coastal shipping trade that had been so successful prior to the war, while also incorporating the returning Ngāti Tama into their midst. While the support of Mōkau Māori for the Kīngitanga had been hesitant prior to the war, they now looked to the Kīngitanga for protection, so long as it was able to deliver them substantive control over their affairs. This job mainly fell to Rewi, who maintained the relationship between the local leaders and the King.

This attempt by the Mōkau people at a degree of openness, including with the Government, gave rise to some immediate tensions – the local settlers had become insistent that a lease had been established, which they then sought to have transformed into a Crown title through the Native Land Court. This initiative came to be supported by the local chiefs, including Epiha and Wetere. The Government initially acknowledged that the decision as to whether the court should proceed lay with Rewi. So too did Wetere Te Rerenga, who at first acknowledged that the agreement of both Rewi and the King was necessary. Their response was to refuse entrance to the court.

Three factors emerged during 1881, however, that prompted Wetere once again to seek a court hearing: the arrival of prospectors who breached the aukati without permission; the sudden revelation that the boundary of the confiscated lands was further north than they had thought; and reports that Ngāti Tama were seeking to sell portions of the Poutama land to the Crown.

On the first issue, the Crown submitted that Rewi's effort to seek cooperation with the Crown was a sign that 'Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were starting to seek formal recognition by the Government of their district in collaboration in stopping lawbreakers'. The Crown also considered that Rewi's approach 'corresponds with the proposals of a number of Ministers, particularly McLean, during attempts to achieve a formal establishment of peace during the previous decade'.<sup>703</sup> However, there is a considerable difference between McLean's approach, who was only interested in bringing Māori offenders to justice, and what Rewi had been trying to achieve. Rewi's interest was in seeking cooperation with the Crown over settlers who had breached the aukati without permission, before resorting to violence. The Crown showed that it was in no mood to cooperate or assist in any way.

On the second issue, we agree with the Crown that there is no evidence to support the suggestion that it was engaged with Ngāti Tama over a sale – the only evidence we received concerns a Ngāti Tama offer to sell.<sup>704</sup> The Crown also said that it is unclear what land within the inquiry district might have been involved. On this point, the evidence would seem to suggest that Ngāti Tama were attempting to engage in Poutama lands, which Mōkau Māori understood and reacted to strongly. The point was not that the Crown was in fact in negotiations, but that – at least initially – Mōkau Māori thought that this was what was happening, which posed a threat to their interests.

The greater fact was that this threat coincided with the sudden revelation that the Taranaki confiscation boundary was much further to the north than they previously anticipated, including some of the lands that Ngāti Tama were supposedly offering to the Crown. Thus, it appeared to Mōkau Māori that the Crown had suddenly taken on the appearance of seeking to take control of Poutama, and potentially further to the north. The Crown refused to consider changing the boundary or returning any of the confiscated land. Wetere met with Rolleston to raise his concerns. Crucially, Rolleston said that the Government would refrain from purchasing, but that the only way to guarantee their rights was to go to the court. This was in keeping with the way other Ministers presented the Crown's non-interference policy in this period: while it committed to the idea that it would not purchase the land, there was an implied threat that the situation could not last forever, and the only solution was to go to the court to secure their interests.

From this point on, Wetere was set on a court hearing. He had been opposed to the return of Ngāti Tama to the region earlier in the 1870s; now he was going to oppose them in the court.

Rewi, looking at the situation across the territory, and the circumstances that had suddenly presented themselves in Mōkau, agreed to allow Wetere to pursue this course. In doing so, he appeared compelled by the same motivation to preserve the core territory, by defining an external boundary, though he also knew that it meant that the court would enter that territory and transform the basis of tenure. This revealed the difficult balancing act of respecting the right of chiefs in communities to decide on the fate of their lands, while maintaining Kīngitanga policies.

---

703. Submission 3.4.299, p10.

704. Submission 3.4.305, p14.

However, there remained some uncertainty about whether permission was granted for the hearing to proceed. A request was made for an adjournment of the hearing at the annual Maehe in May 1882. But Rewi also subsequently sought to withdraw some of his requested adjournments, and advised Mōkau Māori to ‘fight Ngati Tama to the end’ in court.<sup>705</sup> Either way, the Judge granted no further adjournments for the hearing, and it went ahead in June 1882. As time went on, it appeared that Ngāti Maniapoto continued to consider that the Poutama lands remained inside the ‘external boundary’ of Te Rohe Pōtae, as it came to be defined in 1883. This itself became a source of contention when the external boundary came to be surveyed in 1884 (see chapter 8).

For these reasons, we disagree with the Crown’s submission that:

Rewi’s involvement with Wetere in going to the Native Land Court, and arranging a lease at Mokau indicate that senior leaders of the Kīngitanga were taking steps to use the Native Land Court to protect their lands, and seeking more lucrative joint ventures with settlers to pay for that process, and raise funds.<sup>706</sup>

Ultimately, what compelled Māori to go to the court in Mōkau were factors caused by uncertainty of ownership, and the fact that the only way they could secure immediate guarantee of their title was through the Native Land Court, even if they might have disagreed with the process.

7.4.5.2.5 FINDING ON CROWN PRESSURES

The Crown submitted that the ‘desire of many Rohe Pōtae Māori to open up the district in the early 1880s strongly suggests that they thought they could do better by improving access to the rest of the colony.’<sup>707</sup> The Crown further submitted that ‘[t]ensions did emerge as the different groups adopted different policies in respect of their territories.’<sup>708</sup>

Rewi’s actions, as we have seen, were often interpreted at the time by the media and even the Crown as signalling a departure from the Kīngitanga. However, Rewi never confirmed what many suspected – that there was a growing divide between Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato. Rather, on every occasion where people thought he was departing from Tāwhiao, Rewi reaffirmed his commitment – as symbolised at the hui at Te Kōpua in 1879, when Rewi moved to sit next to Tāwhiao having initially sat next to Grey. Expecting some truth in the rumours of Rewi breaking from Tāwhiao, the Crown hoped that Rewi would relocate to Kihikihiki after Bryce finished the house that Grey had promised him. Rewi did use the house,

---

705. Document A78, p 608; doc A28, p 256.

706. Submission 3.4.299, p 30.

707. Submission 3.4.299, pp 28–29.

708. Submission 3.4.299, p 29.

and allowed others to use it too, but he did not relocate to Kihikihi as officials hoped, choosing instead to maintain his permanent residence inside the aukati.

However, a new dynamic within the Kīngitanga emerged in 1881 and 1882, when the concerns that had been expressed by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about activities affecting the encircling lands suddenly became apparent in their core territory. This meant that in addition to trying to negotiate for the recognition of the Kīngitanga and the return of the confiscated lands, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also soon had to seek to protect their remaining lands. This placed Te Rohe Pōtae hapū and iwi in a difficult bind. If the Kīngitanga was unable to act to protect their lands at the borders, then Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would need to seek other avenues, including direct engagement with the Crown. However, to do so would risk giving the appearance that they were acting separately from the Kīngitanga.

Separate meetings, internal debates, and occasional tense moments were not a measure of division within the Kīngitanga. Differences were an inevitable reality among such diverse groups of people who – though sharing common ancestral origins and a common purpose – were autonomous peoples with their own mana to uphold. More importantly, Kīngitanga leaders demonstrated their cooperation by upholding the aukati, despite external pressures and internal debates, for some years. But it is also the case that the decision to allow the Native Land Court to determine title in Te Rohe Pōtae at Mōkau had a substantial effect on the Kīngitanga alliance, which in turn influenced the outcome of the discussions with Bryce in November 1882.

In short, during the period of the negotiations through the late 1870s, the Crown did little to ease the concerns of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in respect of the potential effect of the native land system on their interests. This continued to be the case into the period of the Hall and Whitaker ministries, and Bryce's tenure as Native Minister. Although the new Government promised a retrenchment of Crown purchasing, little was offered to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to assuage their concerns about their ability to protect their lands and the potential effects of the Native Land Court. Rather, in the early 1880s, the Government – and Bryce in particular – acted to block legislative measures such as the native committees Bills proposed by the Māori MHRs, which could have gone some way to providing Māori generally with greater control over the titling process. At the same time, the Government moved to pass measures such as the Railway Act, which indicated that the Government's primary motivation was the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae. Although the extent of the Government's settlement intentions may have remained unclear, there was little in the Government's legislative programme that suggested to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that their land would remain under Te Rohe Pōtae Māori's absolute control.

For these reasons, we find that the Crown's failure to address the specific concerns they raised in respect of their lands were in breach of the Treaty principle of partnership and the duty of active protection. This was not simply the ongoing prejudice these groups continued to suffer from the Crown's acts in the Waikato war and confiscation, but fresh sources of grievance. This resulted in increasing pressure on Te Rohe Pōtae lands and leaders, which was most keenly felt in the decision to allow the Native Land Court into Te Rohe Pōtae for the first time in 1882.

7.4.5.3 *Did the Crown make sufficient efforts to accommodate the Kingitanga

It is in this context that we seek to understand the offers that the Crown made to the Kingitanga in the period of negotiations. We begin by reiterating that this Tribunal did not hear evidence or submissions from Waikato Tainui and that our analysis and findings about the Kingitanga apply only to the claims made in this inquiry by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, who were members of (and leaders in) the Kingitanga and profoundly affected by the events which occurred.

In our inquiry, the Crown gave two key reasons for the failure of the negotiations. First, the Crown considered that any recognition of the Kingitanga was made ‘more difficult’ by the abandonment of the provincial system in the mid-1870s, because ‘there was considerably less scope for institutions that held some measure of independent authority within the New Zealand Constitution.’<sup>709</sup> Secondly, it considered that it was Tāwhiao who chose not to compromise, which led the Crown to adopt the approach that it did.<sup>710</sup> The offers the Crown made were made in good faith, because they represented the Government’s ‘serious intentions about asserting the Crown’s sovereignty, and to exercise the authority of the Crown and Parliament inside the aukati.’<sup>711</sup>

This approach, of course, assumes that the Crown had the right to exercise unfettered and unconditional sovereignty, which this Tribunal has noted in many reports, was not the case. As discussed in chapter 3, the Crown through the Treaty acquired a right to exercise kāwanatanga which was conditional on its recognition of tino rangatiratanga. That was the essential exchange in the Treaty. The right to govern and make law at a local level already existed in New Zealand prior to the Treaty, and was affirmed by it. It was not a constitutional challenge to the rights acquired by the Crown – in practical terms, we see no reason why the two could not co-exist, with negotiation and goodwill on both sides.

Nor was the abolition of the provinces necessarily any impediment to the Crown putting in place measures to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori self-government under the King. Section 71 was still available to the Crown, and if not that, the colonial Government could have found an alternative legislative method. If the Crown could put a new system of local government in place of the provincial system, it was also capable of providing for the self-government Treaty rights of the Kingitanga and its constituent tribes. As Crown counsel acknowledged, ‘legislation was the likely mechanism used to implement any negotiated agreement.’<sup>712</sup> Instead, the county councils scheme that was established in 1876 was suspended in Te Rohe Pōtae, and the Crown was not prepared to put in a Māori equivalent that

---

709. Submission 3.4.301, p 21.

710. Submission 3.4.301, pp 7, 15.

711. Submission 3.4.301, p 15.

712. Submission 3.4.301, p 16.

recognised and provided for the authority of King Tāwhiao and the rangatira of Te Rohe Pōtae.

This was because, as Crown counsel acknowledged, the Crown ‘perceived the Kingitanga as a challenge to the Queen’s sovereignty and it sought to persuade all Rohe Pōtae Māori to place themselves under the authority of the Crown. As such, it did not recognise the Māori King as having any kind of sovereign authority.’<sup>713</sup> However, the Crown also submitted that this ‘did not constitute the undermining of the traditional authority of Ngāti Maniapoto and Kingitanga leaders’, as it sought to recognise ‘their authority as influential chiefs.’<sup>714</sup> The question in Treaty terms is not whether the Kingitanga was a challenge to the Queen’s sovereignty, if sovereignty is understood as the supreme and unfettered right to govern, since that is not what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consented to through the Treaty. The question is whether it was possible for the King’s authority to coexist with the Crown’s power to govern and make law, which had been granted for the purposes of controlling settlers and settlement and protecting Māori rights and interests. As discussed above, we see no reason why such an accommodation could not have been reached.

Indeed, the offers made by McLean and Grey showed that this was the case. The Crown’s initial position, as set out in the respective proposals of McLean and Grey in 1876 and 1878, went a considerable distance towards recognising the role and status of King Tāwhiao and Te Rohe Pōtae chiefs – and, it seems, further than McLean had been prepared to acknowledge in his 1870 proposal to cabinet.

McLean’s offer in 1876 was that Tāwhiao could continue to exercise his authority within the lands remaining in Māori ownership. In addition, he and chiefs of his choosing would be responsible for maintaining law and order, for which the Government said it would provide appropriate support. In 1878, Grey essentially repeated McLean’s offer: Tāwhiao would manage affairs in his district, and the Government would assist in the administration of affairs. We acknowledge that these were significant offers and potentially Treaty compliant, although that would have depended on the negotiation of the detail and its acceptability to Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. The negotiations never got that far. To a significant extent, that was due to the question of confiscated lands.

McLean offered the return of certain lands about the Waipā and Waikato Rivers (which later included land at Ngaruawahia near Te Wherowhero’s resting place). Grey’s terms were similar: the Government would return lands it had not already disposed of to Europeans, west of the Waipā and Waikato rivers, and promised to return other lands repurchased by McLean for the purpose (though Sheehan later revealed the Government did not in fact intend to return these lands); and the Government would also give Tāwhiao land at Ngaruawahia, as well as a house at Kāwhia.

Under these offers, there was no guarantee of a restoration of the Kingitanga’s authority over the original boundary line at the Mangatawhiri Stream. Tāwhiao

---

713. Submission 3.4.301, p 23.

714. Submission 3.4.301, pp 23–24.

did not resile from this position, which McLean equally insisted was impossible. Tāwhiao's position was understandable, given that Waikato held the burden of the grievance for the land that had been taken.

Questions of relative authority may also have been a factor in Tāwhiao's decision not to take up Grey's offer – as discussed in section 7.4.2.4, he may have been reluctant to accept an offer that placed him in an inferior position to the colonial government. And he and other leaders may also have been frustrated by the continued activities of the Native Land Court and Crown purchasing agents in the border zones of the Kīngitanga territories. Nonetheless, the offers made by McLean and Grey were promising and, with further negotiation, might have been brought to a mutually satisfactory conclusion. Rewi indicated as much in his response to Grey's proposal. But further negotiation was precluded by McLean's death and by Grey's ultimatum to take or leave his offer without further discussion.

Bryce's offer – though perhaps more specific in its terms – represented a backwards step and did little to overcome the concerns held by the Kīngitanga. There was no longer any offer to recognise and provide for the authority of the Kīngitanga and rangatira over their own people and affairs in their district. Instead, Bryce proposed to provide for the exercise of Tāwhiao's authority in a series of roles: an assessor of the Resident Magistrates Court, an assessor of the Native Lands Court, a Justice of the Peace, and with advice to the governor to call him to the Legislative Council. The legislative reforms made in 1882 did little to assuage Māori concerns: they still required the Native Land Court to determine title to their land first, and once title was issued they would not be in full control of that land. The inalienability offered by the Native Reserves Act came with serious strings attached. Although Bryce envisaged much of the 'King Country' becoming inalienable reserves under the Public Trustee, the discussions never got that far. In short, Bryce's offer fell far short of what the Kīngitanga was willing to contemplate in exchange for the opening of their territory. There was no longer an offer to recognise Māori authority in the district. In return for posts in the Government, Tāwhiao was required to recognise Crown sovereignty and full authority over the lands and people. As Mr Meredith put it, 'Tāwhiao would have been a mere officer of the Queen's Government and as an assessor, sanction the activity of the Native Land Court.'<sup>715</sup>

In addition, while Bryce offered to return the 'bulk' of unused confiscated in the land, he also sought to impose on Ngāti Maniapoto to provide for Waikato on a more permanent basis. Meanwhile, the Government was offering land to former rebels in the confiscation district to persuade them away from the Kīngitanga. While this aspect of the offer to the Kīngitanga was not stipulated as an explicit requirement of the terms, it represented a potential additional barrier to the Kīngitanga ever accepting the terms offered – and only highlighted the existing pressures the Crown was placing on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

Ngāti Tūwharetoa claimants put it to us that the Crown's failure to recognise or provide for the authority of the Kīngitanga during this period was a breach of 'the

---

715. Document A110, p 624.

Treaty's guarantee of Māori authority', one which they felt as an iwi that had committed to its cause. Counsel submitted that the Crown missed a significant opportunity in 1882, when Tāwhiao 'appeared willing to compromise in accepting the Crown's sovereignty, provided that Māori tino rangatiratanga would be provided for in the form of self-governance.'<sup>716</sup>

The Crown's refusal – in Bryce's 1882 offer – to recognise or provide for Kingitanga authority, through a freely negotiated mechanism (such as section 71 of the 1852 Constitution Act), constituted a breach of the principle of autonomy and the duty to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of the hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae.

The Crown's recognition of and provision for Kingitanga authority at this point would have gone much of the way towards overcoming the issues confronting the iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae in this period. They would have been able to decide their tribal boundaries. And they would have been able to seek out ways of working with the Crown on issues of concern, such as controlling trade and settlement, as well as issues of justice.

Insofar as the Crown refused to consider the return of the land confiscated from Ngāti Maniapoto, particularly the lands north of the Pūniu in which Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Paretekawa claimed interests, the Crown breached the Treaty principle of redress, which required the Crown to remedy Treaty breaches in a timely and appropriate fashion. We make no finding, however, on the question of restoring Kingitanga authority as far as the Mangatawhiri, as that was not a matter with which Te Rohe Pōtae peoples were primarily concerned.

The Crown's failure to recognise or provide for the authority of the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae hapū and iwi in any significant way, including the return of confiscated lands, had a significant effect on the claimants in our inquiry. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had committed to the Kingitanga and its cause. Through the 1870s and into the early 1880s, they were increasingly required to navigate between this commitment and the protection of their customary lands, due to increasing pressures at the borders which resulted from the activities of the Native Land Court and purchasing. It was considered merely a matter of time before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would no longer be able to resist these pressures, as Bryce suggested in offering his metaphor of the unstoppable flood of colonisation.

We will consider the prejudice arising from the Crown's Treaty breaches in respect of the issues considered in this chapter in detail in chapter 8.

7.4.5.4 Outcome of negotiations to 1882

The immediate outcome of the negotiations was that Tāwhiao would no longer be directly involved, as symbolised when Tāwhiao turned to Wahanui to seek a response to Bryce's invocations to break the deadlock that had emerged. This was different in order from previous breakdowns in negotiations, as Bryce's letter to Wahanui later indicated.

---

716. Submission 3.4.281, p 25.

We do not consider that Wahanui's response represented a severing of relationships between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto, or a complete breakdown in the Kīngitanga alliance. It was not, as Dr Loveridge suggested, a decision on the part of 'former King supporters who chose to break away from Tāwhiao . . . in order to negotiate directly with the Crown.'<sup>717</sup> As Wahanui himself explained, in his response to Bryce, the circumstances that now presented themselves – including their refusal to accept Bryce's offer – were not of their doing:

Mo to kupu kii nei naku na Maniapoto i kore ai a Tawhiao e whakaae ki o hamumu, ko taku kupu whakahoki tenei. E hara i ahau. E hara i a Ngati Maniapoto i kore ai a Tawhiao e whakapai ki o kii. Mo etahi o o kupu, waiho kia kororerotia e matou ko te iwi nui.

Concerning your words when you say it was because of I, because of Maniapoto that Tawhiao did not agree to your proposals, my reply is this. It was not because of me. It was not because of Ngati Maniapoto that Tawhiao did not approve of what you suggested. As to your other matters, leave these until myself and the tribe have discussed them.<sup>718</sup>

We note that Wahanui's statement to Bryce was vehemently pro-Kīngitanga – the problem with Bryce's offer, Wahanui said, was that it took away Tāwhiao's authority. This would have been unacceptable to the Kīngitanga under any circumstances, but – because it represented a withdrawal of previous offers to recognise Tāwhiao's authority – was also provocative.

While we cannot tell from the evidence exactly what was occurring within the Kīngitanga at the time, the events indicate that Wahanui and Tāwhiao reached a mutually agreed decision that it was no longer viable for Tāwhiao to head the negotiations – a decision that was forced upon them by Bryce's approach to the negotiations. In coming to that view, we note Rewi's previous insistence that Tāwhiao did not act without consulting his Council and that his Councillors did not act without consulting him.<sup>719</sup>

Following this decision, Te Rohe Pōtae iwi leaders continued to engage in active discussions with Tāwhiao, which was in keeping with their common concerns and the ongoing commitment of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the Kīngitanga cause. But Wahanui's decision to rise in response to Tāwhiao's request, along with his subsequent actions, marked a notable change from the previous negotiating position. It meant that Tāwhiao would no longer be regarded as taking the lead in negotiating on behalf of the tribes that had committed to the Kīngitanga. With Tāwhiao no longer directly participating in the negotiations, the Crown and the iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae could negotiate directly on terms that were removed from the debates of the preceding twenty-five years since the Kīngitanga had formed. Although the

---

717. Document A41, p 65.

718. Document A110, p 627.

719. 'The Position of the King Party', New Zealand Herald, 10 April 1882, p 5.

Crown would still have to deal with the issue of self-government for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over their territory, it was no longer compelled to make offers in respect of the confiscated Waikato land, and Tāwhiao was able to pursue other avenues of obtaining recognition of his authority.

Perhaps the overriding feature of the negotiations to the end of 1882 was that, despite the foundations for the peace that had been established first at Te Pahiko in 1869, there was little in the circumstances that allowed either party to see eye to eye. Although there was occasional goodwill and meeting of minds, there remained an absence of a mutually agreed platform from which negotiations could proceed. The Crown remained intent on operating as if sovereignty was a fait accompli – the Kīngitanga, which included Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, remained staunch in defending their tino rangatiratanga. In short, there was little in these discussions that signified a properly functioning Treaty partnership in which a mutual working out of relationships could take place.

In any case, the Crown would need to find a way of engaging with those iwi on terms that were satisfactory to them, and properly address their concerns. An opening for this kind of dialogue was soon to emerge in 1883, which we turn to next.

7.5 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Our key conclusions and findings in this chapter have been:

- ▶ Te Rohe Pōtae Māori enforced and upheld the aukati for a period of nearly twenty years (1866–85) after the end of the Waikato war as a legitimate assertion of their right to the exercise of tino rangatiratanga, until such a time they could safely engage with the Crown about how to bring the Treaty into effect;
- ▶ The increasing pressure the Crown placed on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the period of negotiations from 1875–82, and its failure to address the specific concerns they raised, were in breach of the Treaty principle of partnership and its duty of active protection;
- ▶ The Crown's failure during the 1882 negotiations to recognise the authority and right to self-government of the Kīngitanga and North Island tribes, in so far as it affected Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, including over the return of confiscated land, was a breach of the Treaty principles of partnership, autonomy and redress, and its duty of active protection;
- ▶ These actions and omissions caused serious prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, in damage to relationships and to autonomy, which we consider in detail in chapter 8.

CHAPTER 8

TE PŪTAKE O TE ŌHĀKĪ TAPU

We are very desirous of obtaining self government. You are anxious for railways; give us what we desire and we will give you what you want.

—Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>1</sup>

8.1 INTRODUCTION

With the breakdown of negotiations between the Kingitanga and the Crown in November 1882, a new phase began in the relationship between the Crown and Māori of this district. The Native Minister, John Bryce, determined that from that point on he would deal only with tribal leaders, and in particular with Wahanui. He immediately pressed Wahanui to open the district to the Crown's laws and public works. In response, Wahanui and other Ngāti Maniapoto leaders developed a plan for their future engagement with the Crown. First, in consultation with neighbouring iwi, they would define the boundary of the territories that remained under Māori control. Secondly, they would petition Parliament seeking laws which recognised and protected their authority and their lands.

Between March 1883 and December 1885, they engaged in a series of negotiations with the Crown concerning land, land laws, the railway, and the respective spheres of Crown and Māori authority within this district. During these negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders recognised the Crown's right to make laws and govern, and in turn sought Crown recognition of, and statutory provision for, their rights of self-determination and self-government – particularly with respect to land – in accordance with the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. The Crown, for its part, continued to press for the opening of the district so as to allow the introduction of Crown institutions and authority, construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway, and settlement by European farmers.

The negotiations took place in several stages and formed part of an evolving relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown during this period. As part of that relationship, significant agreements were reached in March 1883, December 1883, and February 1885, under which Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the Crown taking steps to progress its railway plans in return for law changes to protect their lands and preserve their autonomy. In March 1883, they consented to the Crown undertaking an exploratory survey to determine the best railway route, and agreeing to consult and obtain their consent before taking any further steps on the railway – the leaders also signalled their intention to submit a petition about the laws they would seek in exchange for allowing the railway and settlement to go ahead. In June 1883, they submitted their petition, which the Crown responded to in terms that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori considered insufficient to meet their demands. In December 1883, they reached agreement with the Crown for a survey of the external boundary, which they saw as a first step towards recognition of their authority within the boundary. In February 1885, the Crown agreed to several of the demands made by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, including law changes to give Māori communities greater powers of self-determination with respect to land title determination and land administration. On the basis of these promises, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the construction of the railway. In December of that year, they lifted the aukati.

---

1. Copy of letter (in English only) from Rewi Maniapoto, 26 January 1884 (doc A78, p 1018).

Between these negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders continued to engage with the Crown, pressing it to respect their autonomy and to honour the agreements it had entered. In particular, they sought Crown recognition of their rights to determine ownership of their own lands, and to possess, manage, and use those lands as they wished. As the negotiations evolved, they also sought Crown recognition of their rights to manage social issues for the benefit of their people. Despite their frustrations, they continued to negotiate, and to honour their side of each agreement, in the hope of persuading the Crown to use its powers of kāwanatanga to recognise and protect their rights and authority, especially with regard to land.

The Crown, having won consent for the railway in 1885, then sought to increase pressure on the district's leaders to bring their lands before the Native Land Court. As a result, divisions emerged among the iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae. By the end of the year, the Crown had succeeded in encouraging Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui iwi to place their lands before the court, partly due to fears that Ngāti Maniapoto intended to claim their land, which the Crown did nothing to dispel. In the face of competing claims, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders lifted the aukati and made their own claims to the court, effectively ending their quest for Crown recognition of their right of self-government. Ultimately, the Crown won all that it had sought from the negotiations. It was able to assert the authority of its law and institutions, begin construction of the railway, and begin the process of opening Te Rohe Pōtae for European settlement. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, on the other hand, ultimately won very little in the way of statutory protection for their Treaty rights.

We heard from many claimants about these events, and their evidence informs much of this chapter. The chapter also relies heavily on the research reports prepared by Cathy Marr, Donald Loveridge, and Paul Thomas, as well as the traditional history report prepared by Ngāti Maniapoto researchers.<sup>2</sup>

---

2. Marr, 'Te Rohe Pōtae Political Engagement 1864–1886' (doc A78); Loveridge, 'The Crown and the Opening of the King Country, 1882–1885' (doc A41); Thomas, 'The Crown and Maori in Mokau 1840–1911' (doc A28); Ngāti Maniapoto researchers, 'Ngāti Maniapoto Mana Motuhake: Report for Ngāti Maniapoto Claimants and the Waitangi Tribunal' (doc A110).

8.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The 1883–85 negotiations, and the agreements that emerged from them, have come to be known by claimants as ‘Te Ōhākī Tapu’. The term Te Ōhākī Tapu is derived from ‘Te Kī Tapu’, or ‘the sacred word’, a phrase used by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders in the 1880s to describe the utmost importance of their negotiations with the Crown. Claimants told us that the word ‘ōhākī’ carries a meaning of a last request or testament that survives long after death.<sup>3</sup> On this basis, we understand Te Ōhākī Tapu to mean a sacred word or utterance – one that is imbued with tapu, and therefore must be honoured and put into effect.

The claimants noted that, for more than four decades after the Treaty, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had retained their tino rangatiratanga while the Crown exercised no practical authority within the district. Through Te Ōhākī Tapu, the claimants said, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders allowed Crown authority to be exercised in their district for the first time, but they did so in return for Crown recognition and protection of their tino rangatiratanga, in accordance with article 2 of the Treaty.

Therefore, the claimants saw Te Ōhākī Tapu as establishing the basis for an enduring Treaty relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. They argued that it should not be understood narrowly as a series of specific agreements or contracts, but rather as a broader agreement or ‘compact’<sup>4</sup> between the Treaty partners, which therefore carried constitutional significance and was a matter of honour for both parties. They argued that it established the basis for a Treaty partnership in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori recognised the Crown’s right of kāwanatanga and the Crown in turn recognised and protected Te Rohe Pōtae mana and tino rangatiratanga.

But the claimants also argued that the Crown viewed the negotiations solely as a means to assert its authority and open the district for settlement. They said it had not negotiated in good faith, having never intended to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae self-government. They alleged that the Crown misled Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over its intentions, pressured them into accepting compromises, and broke many of the specific promises it had made. The effect, they said, was that by the end of 1885 the district’s autonomy had been compromised and the ‘flood gates had been opened’<sup>5</sup> for the Crown to assert its authority over Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and begin the process of obtaining Te Rohe Pōtae land for European settlement.

The Crown viewed these events quite differently. From its point of view, the negotiations were limited to particular matters, primarily concerning the construction of the railway. They were of constitutional significance only to the extent that they were negotiations between Treaty partners. The Crown told us that it negotiated with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in good faith and fulfilled most aspects of the agreements that were made, apart from a handful of promises that the Crown departed from. Yet, the Crown only acknowledged Te Ōhākī Tapu as a matter of importance to the claimants. The Crown conceded that its failure to re-engage

---

3. Document H9(c), para 5 (Roā); H17(e), p 12 (Maniapoto); doc 112, p 15 (Te Hiko).

4. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

5. Submission 3.4.128, p 4.

with Māori before breaking promises was a breach of Treaty principles. Despite its acknowledged Treaty breaches, the Crown considered that it came to exercise its authority in the district in a manner that was consistent with the Treaty.

However we might interpret them, the negotiations and agreements of 1883–85 were of great significance to the history of Te Rohe Pōtae, and to the Treaty relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. They were therefore of central significance to our inquiry. Through these events, the Crown began to exercise its authority within Te Rohe Pōtae, a territory that had previously remained independent, governed according to its own tikanga. In turn, the exercise of Crown authority resulted in the rapid and dramatic transformation of the district's political, economic, and social landscape, with profoundly adverse consequences for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

We will begin to see some of these consequences in this chapter, as we consider the unravelling of the 1883–85 agreements after construction of the railway began. And we will continue to examine the consequences in the remaining chapters of our report.

8.1.2 How the chapter is structured

We begin this chapter by identifying the issues for our determination. We then address these issues by looking at the key developments that occurred, including our assessment of these developments in light of the Treaty of Waitangi. We will first consider the series of negotiations and agreements between Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and the Crown during 1883–85, culminating in the decisions by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to allow the railway and lift the aukati. We will then consider the immediate aftermath of the lifting of the aukati, as Te Rohe Pōtae iwi began to face the reality that the Crown would not protect their autonomy as they had wished, and as the district's iwi then began to turn their attention to protecting ancestral lands through the Native Land Court.

The chapter is structured as follows:

- ▶ the March 1883 agreement;
- ▶ the June 1883 petition of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui iwi, and the Government's response;
- ▶ the December 1883 external boundary agreement;
- ▶ the implementation of the 1883 agreements to mid-1884;
- ▶ the first land reforms of the Stout–Vogel Government in 1884;
- ▶ the railway agreement of February–April 1885; and
- ▶ land settlement and the end of the aukati in 1885–86.

Finally, we set out our conclusions on the issues, including our conclusions about Te Ōhāki Tapu and what it means in the context of our jurisdiction to make findings on claims of Treaty breach.

8.2 ISSUES

The principal question at issue in this chapter is whether the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae, as expressed through the lifting of the aukati at the end of 1885, occurred in a manner that was consistent with the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi. We must therefore consider the claimants' arguments that, through this period, the Crown failed to take reasonable steps to provide for the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, failed to honour the undertakings it made to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and failed to negotiate in good faith, giving undertakings that it did not intend to deliver on. We must also consider the claimants' contention that, through this period's negotiations and agreements, the Crown entered into a political and constitutional compact with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, which has come to be known as Te Ōhāki Tapu, under which the Crown agreed to recognise and protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights to self-government. These are issues that have been considered by a number of other Tribunals, and were the focus of submissions by parties in our inquiry.

8.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

Tribunals in four other inquiry districts have considered aspects of the 1883–85 Te Rohe Pōtae negotiations and agreements: Pouakani, National Park, Central North Island, and Whanganui. Those Tribunals primarily considered the claims of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Raukawa, and Whanganui iwi in their respective districts, which required some discussion of the events that are the focus of this chapter. The Central North Island and National Park Tribunals made preliminary findings about the negotiations, while noting that they had not heard evidence from Ngāti Maniapoto and other parties to the 1883–85 negotiations.<sup>6</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal made the preliminary finding that the commencement of 'an ongoing dialogue . . . to arrange controlled settlement in Taupo and the King Country, on terms satisfactory to both Maori and the Crown' was consistent with the Treaty of Waitangi.<sup>7</sup> However, the Tribunal found that the Crown breached the Treaty 'when it failed to keep either the spirit or the letter of its undertakings'.<sup>8</sup> The Crown failed to provide for the meaningful self-government that Te Rohe Pōtae communities sought in their negotiations, despite the opportunities that existed at the time to do so. This failure, the Central North Island Tribunal found, 'was a serious breach of Treaty principles'.<sup>9</sup> More particularly, the Tribunal found that the Crown could have met the 'reasonable demands' of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leadership for a survey of the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae, followed by the enactment of legal powers for the tribes to decide their own land titles.<sup>10</sup>

The Pouakani and National Park Tribunals found that legislation the Crown enacted in response to its negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders failed to provide

---

6. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993 (Wellington: Brooker's Ltd, 1993), p 111; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 1, p 248.

7. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims Stage One, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 332.

8. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 332.

9. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 318–319.

10. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 333.

adequately for their self-determination and was not Treaty compliant. Specifically, the Pouakani Tribunal found that the Native Committees Act 1883 (under which district native committees were established) ‘did not provide any real measure of self determination for the tribes’, and provided for committees with ‘no power’ in districts ‘that were too large to be workable.’<sup>11</sup> The National Park Tribunal accepted the finding of the 1891 Native Land Laws Commission that the Native Committees Act 1883 was a ‘hollow shell’ that ‘mocked and still mocks the Natives with a semblance of authority.’<sup>12</sup>

Similarly, the Native Lands Administration Act 1886 did not provide Māori with the level of control over their land that they had demanded. According to the Central North Island Tribunal, the Act was ‘more consistent with the Treaty than anything that had gone before’, but nonetheless fell short of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought. It concluded that the ‘whole concept of the Act was defeated by not giving proper effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Maori communities.’<sup>13</sup> It found that the Crown had breached the Treaty by failing to enact the laws that Māori had sought.<sup>14</sup>

The Pouakani, Central North Island, and National Park Tribunals all found that the Crown had influenced the 1885 decision by Ngāti Tūwharetoa to apply to the Native Land Court for title to the Taupōnuitia block, by failing to dispel fears that Ngāti Maniapoto intended to claim their lands. As we will see in section 8.11, the Ngāti Tūwharetoa application traversed the 1883 boundary and forced the other Te Rohe Pōtae iwi to engage with the Court despite their long-held opposition.<sup>15</sup>

8.2.2 Crown concessions

The Crown made multiple concessions relating to the actions it took after Native Minister John Ballance’s meeting with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at Kihikihi in February 1885, and after the agreement to construct the railway was concluded in March of that year:

The Crown concedes that it failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it departed from representations it had made in February 1885 (in negotiations to obtain their consent to construct the North Island Main Trunk Railway through Te Rohe Pōtae) that:

---

11. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 316–318; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 111.

12. ‘Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws’, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p xvi (Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 230).

13. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 354–356. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 232–233.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 354–356. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 2, pp 760–761; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 232–233; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006: Report on the Post-Raupatu Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, p 38; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 2, p 475.

15. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 206, 225, 233–236, 240, 287, 289, 340; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 330, vol 2, p 476; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, s 8.2.

- (a) It was planning to provide for Māori District Committees to have a greater role in Native Land Court processes [when Te Rohe Pōtae land came before the court] and to provide a mechanism for a measure of self-government;
- (b) It was planning a new system for the alienation of Māori land with committees of owners controlling alienation, and using boards, or a similar type of agency, to manage alienations; and
- (c) If Māori subsequently decided to sell or lease land they would be able to do so in a competitive market.

The Crown failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it did not fulfil these representations, and thereby breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles by not acting in good faith and by failing to respect their rangātiratanga.<sup>16</sup>

However, the Crown made several qualifications to these concessions, which we discuss further in the next section.

8.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

Numerous claims in this inquiry contain grievances related to Te Ōhākī Tapu.<sup>17</sup> The parties agreed that the 1883–85 negotiations and their outcomes were central to many of the claims in this inquiry. They also agreed that from 1883, there was a series of agreements between Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and the Crown which led to the opening up of the territory in 1885. The parties differed over the nature and extent of the agreements reached during the course of the 1880s negotiations, and over the extent to which the Crown put those agreements into effect.

8.2.3.1 Te Ōhākī Tapu as a sacred compact for Te Rohe Pōtae self-government

The claimants' main contention was that during the period from 1883 to 1885, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders 'entered into a series of agreements with the Crown which together comprised what has come to be known as Te Ohaki Tapu'.<sup>18</sup> Of particular significance were agreements in March 1883, December 1883, and February 1885. The agreements led to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consenting to the railway in March

---

16. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

17. Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 443 (submission 3.4.158); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 784 (submission 3.4.147); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 972 (submission 3.4.134); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 1099, Wai 1100, Wai 1132, Wai 1133, Wai 1136; Wai 1137, Wai 1138, Wai 1139, Wai 1798 (submission 3.4.189); Wai 1818 (submission 3.4.213); Wai 1428 (submission 3.4.154(a)); Wai 587, Wai 1606 (submission 3.4.169(a)); Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 290 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1823 (submission 3.4.178); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 762 (submission 3.4.170(a)); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175(b)); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 1480 (submission 3.4.176); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 366, Wai 1064 (submission 3.4.205); Wai 555; Wai 1224 (submission 3.4.163(a)); Wai 575 (submission 3.4.281); Wai 833; Wai 965; Wai 1044; Wai 1605 (submission 3.4.227); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1147; Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 1197; Wai 1388 (submission 3.4.209); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168(a)); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1594 (submission 3.4.164(a)).

18. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

1885 and lifting the aukati in December of that year. Counsel for the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board said that Te Ōhākī Tapu ‘sits at the heart of their claims against the Crown.’<sup>19</sup>

In the view of the claimants, the 1883–85 agreements collectively amounted to a ‘compact’ between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, under which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori recognised the Crown’s right to govern and make laws, and in turn sought and received Crown recognition of their rights to autonomy and self-government within their territories.<sup>20</sup> Te Ōhākī Tapu was both ‘a declaration of ongoing autonomy . . . and an assertion of the right to govern within the Rohe Pōtae, and ‘a promise by the Crown that this governing autonomy would be recognised and respected in all respects, including within laws passed by Parliament.’<sup>21</sup> Counsel identified five core elements of Te Ōhākī Tapu:

- ▶ Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would ‘retain full autonomy within their rohe over their own lands, resources and people, including the ability to make their own laws’;
- ▶ the Crown would give effect to this by ‘providing a mechanism through legislation to give effect to that authority’;
- ▶ the district would be kept ‘dry’, with sales of alcohol prohibited;
- ▶ anyone (Māori or European) in the district would be there by permission of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and subject to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori law and authority;
- ▶ the Crown could conduct an external boundary survey and build a railway through the territory, with land to be gifted comprising one chain along the railway line.<sup>22</sup>

Counsel said that Te Ōhākī Tapu should be seen as part of a long tradition of treaty making and alliance building among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, aimed at sustaining the communal authority – the mana motuhake or (in Ngāti Maniapoto terms) ‘mana whatu ahuru’<sup>23</sup> of the district’s people.<sup>24</sup> The agreements were reached ‘mana to mana, rangatira to rangatira.’<sup>25</sup> Some claimants argued that because the Treaty ‘guaranteed Maori the right to continue to organise themselves politically’, the Crown was ‘bound to uphold’ Te Ōhākī Tapu.<sup>26</sup>

The claimant Harold Maniapoto (Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Maniapoto) said Te Ōhākī Tapu had arisen through ‘a series of Crown-Chief hui and inter and intra-iwi/hapū hui’ held during 1883–85, which forged the founding principles for the opening of the district. The agreements were formed on the basis that the word of a chief was binding, and the agreements were therefore ‘couched in the sacredness of . . . tikanga principles.’ Mr Maniapoto described the

---

19. Submission 3.4.1, para 5.

20. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

21. Submission 3.4.1, para 5.

22. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

23. Document H9(c), paras 7–8, 13–15; doc s19(a) (Te Kanawa), pp 37–39, 48.

24. Submission 3.4.128, p 4.

25. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 2.

26. Submission 3.4.130(e), p 21.

agreements collectively as ‘Te Ohaki Tapu o Te Kīngi Kanatere’, which he translated as ‘The sacred pact of the King’s Country’. The agreements had also been referred to as the ‘Rohe Pōtae Compact’, the ‘King Country Compact’, the ‘Sacred Pact’ or the ‘Sacred Compact’, and possibly also by other names.<sup>27</sup>

Another Ngāti Maniapoto claimant, Tom Roa, preferred the term ‘Te Kī Tapu’ to describe the agreements that were entered into during this period. Te Kī Tapu, he said, was based in the mana whatu ahuru of Ngāti Maniapoto. This was an authority ‘specific to Ngāti Maniapoto’, handed down through generations ‘from Io-the-Parentless . . . to Hoturoa . . . to Maniapoto and his siblings’, and representing Maniapoto’s status as an ariki.<sup>28</sup> Mr Roa translated ‘Te Kī Tapu’ as ‘the word is sacred.’<sup>29</sup> It represented the expectation of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that they and the Crown would be bound by the agreements they entered. This was because the word of a rangatira was sacrosanct, binding not only the leader but his family and his people. In accordance with tikanga, any breach of a kī tapu would have consequences, which could include redress being sought and blood being spilt.<sup>30</sup> Mr Roa noted that the term ‘Te Kī Tapu’ was used by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders at the time the agreements were being negotiated. The term Te Ōhāki Tapu, he said, emerged later and was more associated with attempts to get the Crown to uphold certain agreements concerning the prohibition of alcohol within Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>31</sup>

The Ngāti Raukawa claimant Nigel Te Hiko described Te Ōhāki Tapu in this way:

Our people considered that as long-term kaitiaki over several areas within the 1883 petition boundary, their interests would be upheld and respected by the Crown in the wake of this “ki Tapu”. Above all, our people expected that following the lifting of the aukati, and the re-emergence of the Crown in the rohe, the Crown would engage with and treat different people groups in an even-handed manner.<sup>32</sup>

He said the word Ōhāki brought together three concepts – belonging to (ō), breath (hā), which signifies life, and to speak or bequeath (kī) – which together could be understood as referring to a ‘last request’ in which the final breath is instilled into the words ‘giving life to the kupu so that those words survive long after death’. The Ōhāki was ‘significantly enhanced’ when it was tapu:

Tapu is restrictive in nature and distends from the Atua. Consequently, Māori guard jealously their tapu. To offend against tapu would have significant consequences as well as the reduction of personal tapu.

---

27. Document A42 (Maniapoto), pp 7–8.

28. Document H9(c), paras 10, 14–15; see also doc 14, para 3.

29. Document H9(c), para 5.

30. Document H9(c), paras 6–7, 89; see also doc 14, para 7.

31. Document H9(c), paras 4–5.

32. Document 17 (Te Hiko), p 3.

As a consequence, when our tūpuna entered into this arrangement they applied their breath and tapu into the agreements. This bound them completely to the agreement (more so, in my view, than the Crown).<sup>33</sup>

Claimant counsel cautioned against the Tribunal approaching Te Ōhāki Tapu as if it were a contract, submitting that it was important to pay attention to Māori objectives, as well as Crown understandings of those objectives.<sup>34</sup> Counsel quoted Tauī Wetere, who said in 1946:

We have never heard it said by our elders that the Pact was written on paper. It was written in the uttered words of men of whom it was said “Their word is their bond.” The fact and substance of the Pact has come down to us through hundreds of channels in oral tradition and their words recorded in Government records about that time speaking of the fact of the Pact.<sup>35</sup>

Counsel also brought to our attention the evidence of the Crown’s historian, Dr Donald Loveridge, who had commented on an earlier assessment by the former parliamentary historian, A H McLintock, concerning whether a ‘sacred pact’ had been entered into in this period. McLintock’s conclusion was that there was no such pact. Loveridge commented:

Yet if there was no single ‘sacred pact’ between the Governments of the day and the Maori concerned, it is abundantly clear that there were a series of agreements and understandings (and disagreements) between the different parties which contributed to and shaped this momentous development. Conspicuous by its absence from McLintock’s discussion is any reference to the Treaty of Waitangi, and the implications of the Crown’s Treaty obligations with respect to the series of events which led to the opening of the King Country. The agreements in question need to be re-evaluated in this light, and to do so it is necessary to have a clear understanding of what the key agreements were – and were not – and of the circumstances in which they were reached.<sup>36</sup>

Counsel emphasised that it was important to focus not just on the content of individual agreements, but also on the relationship between them and their collective effect. This was because each of the individual agreements ‘were regarded by the iwi of the Rohe Potae as reflecting a broader compact with the Crown to recognise and respect their autonomy within the Rohe Potae.’<sup>37</sup>

The Crown had a very different view of the 1883–85 negotiations. It acknowledged and agreed with the claimants that, through these negotiations, Te Rohe

33. Document 112, p 15.

34. Submission 3.4.128, p 8.

35. Submission 3.4.1, para 20.

36. Document A41 (Loveridge), pp 13–14.

37. Submission 3.4.1, para 11.

Pōtae leaders and the Crown ‘shaped an extraordinary set of understandings and agreements.’<sup>38</sup> These involved an attempt to ‘reach agreement’ about how Te Rohe Pōtae Māori demands for recognition of their autonomy ‘could be accommodated within the political and social structures that had developed in New Zealand since the Treaty of Waitangi was signed in 1840.’<sup>39</sup> The Crown’s position was that, through the negotiations, the parties achieved a ‘compromise’, which involved ‘an acceptance by the Rohe Pōtae leadership that, in order to allow their people full access to the colonial economy, some measure of the political autonomy they previously enjoyed had to be sacrificed.’<sup>40</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that the claimants ‘wrap these agreements . . . in the concept [of] Te Ohaki Tapu’, a term that ‘carries with it a sense of looking back to an important series of events in history and symbolises the importance of events and agreements to Rohe Pōtae Māori.’ The Crown did not regard the concept of Te Ōhākī Tapu as having any weight for its own understanding of the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements.<sup>41</sup>

8.2.3.2 Te Ōhākī Tapu as a constitutional agreement

Counsel for the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board and other claimants submitted that Te Ōhākī Tapu amounted to ‘a constitutional agreement between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown’, under which the Crown was able to gain entry to a district where it had formerly had no access and exercised no practical authority.<sup>42</sup> Counsel said the agreement was ‘aimed at retaining and exercising the mana, rangatiratanga, and authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.’<sup>43</sup> It was a constitutional agreement because both parties were exercising sovereign authority at the time it was entered into, and because the Crown recognised that it required the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in order to gain entry to Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>44</sup>

The Crown did not regard the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements as being of constitutional significance, except in the sense that they were between Treaty partners.<sup>45</sup> Its view of the constitutional position was that it had acquired de jure sovereignty over the entirety of New Zealand in 1840, and therefore was ‘not legally obliged to seek further consent of the Rohe Pōtae Māori to the exercise of Crown authority’ after that time. It acknowledged, however, that the practical details of how Crown authority should be exercised, including any institutional arrangements, was a matter ‘for debate and discussion’ between Treaty partners, and that in Te Rohe Pōtae the Crown did not begin to exercise that practical authority until the aukati was lifted at the end of 1885.<sup>46</sup>

---

38. Submission 3.4.301, p 1.

39. Submission 3.4.301, p 1.

40. Submission 3.4.301, p 1.

41. Submission 3.4.301, p 1.

42. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 2; submission 3.4.128, pp 2–3.

43. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 2; submission 3.4.128, pp 2–3.

44. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 10.

45. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 12.

46. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 12.

8.2.3.3 The 16 March 1883 agreement

The claimants told us that in March 1883 Te Rohe Pōtae leaders agreed that the Crown could proceed with an exploratory survey for the railway, in exchange for the Crown supporting and recognising the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within their territory. Claimants said it was agreed that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would send a petition detailing their expectations, which the Crown was to support.<sup>47</sup>

The Crown submitted that the March 1883 agreement was specific to questions concerning the railway, rather than to more general questions of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori authority. The Crown submitted that it was ‘implicit that further discussions between the Government and the chiefs would be necessary after the exploration survey was completed and before any railway line was built’.<sup>48</sup> The Crown submitted that it upheld all aspects of the agreement, ‘based on its understanding of what they involved’.<sup>49</sup>

8.2.3.4 The June 1883 petition and the Government’s response

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sent the petition to Parliament in June 1883. The Crown responded by enacting two laws, the Native Committees Act 1883 and the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883.

Claimants told us that these responses did not give effect to the main elements of the petition and were therefore inadequate. More specifically, claimants said the Crown did not explicitly recognise the boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae, did not protect its land from sale, did not empower Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to determine iwi and hapū land titles among themselves, and did not protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori from the Native Land Court.<sup>50</sup> The native committees provided for under the Native Committees Act were ‘toothless’ and ‘a sop with no real powers’.<sup>51</sup>

The Crown’s position was that the June 1883 petition of the ‘four tribes’ (Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui iwi) was ‘an initial step in their approach to an accommodation with the Crown’.<sup>52</sup> Counsel submitted that the Acts that were passed in response to the petition – the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 and the Native Committees Act 1883 – ‘were considered by the Government to be appropriate responses to the requests made in the petition’.<sup>53</sup>

8.2.3.5 The December 1883 external boundary survey agreement

In December 1883, following further negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders filed an application to the Native Land Court. Claimants told us that they made the application for the purpose of confirming and obtaining Crown recognition for the external boundary of their territories, in order to confirm the area over which

47. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 9–10.

48. Submission 3.4.301, p 27.

49. Submission 3.4.301, p 24.

50. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 15–16.

51. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 16.

52. Submission 3.4.301, p 38.

53. Submission 3.4.301, p 44.

their mana and rangatiratanga would be exercised. Their expectation was that they would then determine iwi and hapū boundaries among themselves.<sup>54</sup>

Claimant counsel submitted that the Crown misled Te Rohe Pōtae leaders into making the application. The Native Minister, John Bryce, had told them that an application to the Court was the only means by which their external boundary could be secured. He did not inform them of the full effects of applying to the Court for title. And he convinced them to apply on the basis that the Crown would hold back other applications to the Court, but the Crown then went on to promote other Court applications such as those in respect of the Taupouiatia and Waimarino blocks.<sup>55</sup> Despite what Bryce led Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to believe, the Court had no legal power to fix a true tribal boundary, and nor was the Native Land Court able to confirm decisions of native committees as to internal subdivisions.<sup>56</sup>

The Crown, in contrast, considered that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made the application to the Native Land Court in the hope that ‘the Court would recognise their title.’<sup>57</sup> Crown counsel submitted that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori ‘knew they were taking risks with the application for a survey and title investigation’, but that this was the only way to ‘take control of the title determination process and extract concessions from the government.’<sup>58</sup>

8.2.3.6 The 1885 railway agreement

Many of the claimants’ submissions on Te Ōhākī Tapu related to the outcome of the agreement that was reached at Kihikihi in February 1885. The agreement reached at that hui was the culmination of a period of negotiations in which, claimants submitted, the Crown agreed to ‘recognise the authority of the Rohe Pōtae leadership, including providing a mechanism through legislation to give effect to that authority.’<sup>59</sup> In exchange, claimants submitted, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed that the Crown could build a railway through the territory, for which they would gift land comprising one chain for the width of the railway line.<sup>60</sup>

The Crown, as we saw in section 8.2.2, acknowledged that the Crown made ‘representations’ in February 1885 that it was planning to ‘provide for Māori District Committees to have a greater role in Native Land Court processes when Te Rohe Pōtae land came before the Court and to provide a mechanism for a measure of self-government’. It also acknowledged that it made representations that it was ‘planning a new system for the alienation of Māori land’ under which owner committees would control alienation, and that it promised that Māori who sold or leased land would do so in a competitive market.<sup>61</sup>

---

54. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 17, 18.

55. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 18, 20.

56. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 21.

57. Submission 3.4.301, p 55.

58. Submission 3.4.301, p 61.

59. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

60. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

61. Submission 3.4.307, para 66.

8.2.3.7 *The Crown's responses to the 1883–85 agreements

Claimants submitted that, to meet its obligations under the Treaty, the Crown was required to fulfil the specific commitments it made during the 1883–85 negotiations, and to 'respect the broader desire of Rohe Potae Māori to retain mana and rangatiratanga over their lands and people.'<sup>62</sup> Both were important to the Treaty relationship. Fulfilling the specific commitments was necessary in order to give Te Rohe Pōtae Māori confidence that the Crown would act justly and with integrity. Recognising the broader desire for tino rangatiratanga was important because this was the overarching objective for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in treating with the Crown.<sup>63</sup>

The claimants submitted that the Crown failed to implement the agreed outcomes, or took actions that were contrary to those outcomes, and that it also failed to give effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae people.<sup>64</sup> They also submitted that the Crown 'led the Rohe Potae leadership to believe that their right to self government within the Rohe Potae would be respected,'<sup>65</sup> but never intended to honour that commitment.<sup>66</sup> Rather, claimant counsel submitted, the Crown viewed the 1883–85 negotiations solely as a means to assert its authority and open the district for settlement.<sup>67</sup> 'Ultimately,' counsel submitted, 'the agreements served the Crown's purpose.' By the end of 1885, the Native Land Court had entered the district (through the Taupouiatia application) and 'the flood gates had been opened.'<sup>68</sup>

Counsel therefore submitted that the Crown had not negotiated in good faith, had misled Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over its true intentions, had pressured Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into accepting compromises, and had broken many of the specific promises it had made.<sup>69</sup> Counsel submitted that the claimants continued to believe that their 'right to govern their territories arose out of a sacred compact that their tupuna understood had been reached with the Crown . . . [U]ltimately, their tupuna's trust in the Crown was breached – not because there was never such a compact, but because the Crown never intended to honour the promises it had made.'<sup>70</sup>

The Crown, on the other hand, submitted that it upheld all of the agreements that were made with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the period in question, 'based on its understanding of what they involved.'<sup>71</sup> It also submitted that it could not have kept the Native Land Court out of the district as Te Rohe Pōtae leaders demanded, because Māori communities had chosen to engage with the Court in

---

62. Submission 3.4.128, pp 8–9.

63. Submission 3.4.128, pp 8–9.

64. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 14, 17; submission 3.4.128, p 9.

65. Submission 3.4.1, para 18.

66. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 14, 17; submission 3.4.128, p 9.

67. Submission 3.4.1, para 18.

68. Submission 3.4.128, pp 2–3.

69. Submission 3.4.1, para 18.

70. Submission 3.4.1, para 19.

71. Submission 3.4.301, p 24.

order to protect their lands and allow them to engage with the colonial economy.<sup>72</sup> Yet, as we saw in section 8.2.2, the Crown also acknowledged that it had made a series of promises in its February 1885 negotiations, and that it had subsequently failed to keep some of those promises. It conceded that, where it failed to consult Te Rohe Pōtae Māori before breaching a promise, it had breached the Treaty and its principles.

8.2.4 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry and briefly summarised the parties' arguments, we now identify the issues for us to determine.<sup>73</sup> The differences between the parties are significant, particularly in relation to the nature of the negotiations that took place between 1883 and 1885, and the circumstances in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lifted the aukati. In this chapter, we address the following questions:

- ▶ What was the constitutional significance of the negotiations entered into in March 1883, and what effect did those negotiations have on the Treaty relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?
- ▶ What did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori seek from the Crown in exchange for opening their territory to Crown institutions, including the North Island Main Trunk Railway, and were those conditions consistent with the Treaty of Waitangi?
- ▶ What agreements were reached between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori between 1883 and 1885, and to what extent were those agreements consistent with the Treaty of Waitangi?
- ▶ To what extent did the Crown put into effect the agreements that were reached?
- ▶ Did an arrangement known as Te Ōhākī Tapu come into effect through these negotiations, and if so, what was it, and what was its effect in terms of the Treaty of Waitangi?

We will therefore consider each of these issues in the context of the specific negotiations and agreements between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown during the years 1883–85, and the Crown and Māori responses to those agreements during 1886.

8.3 THE MARCH 1883 AGREEMENT

As discussed in chapter 7, Bryce responded to Tāwhiao's rejection of his terms by blaming Wahanui. He wrote to Wahanui on 15 November 1882 saying that, from then on, the Crown would negotiate with him, rather than with Tāwhiao, and he urged Wahanui to accept the colony's laws and open the district for roads and railways. Bryce's letter was a mixture of admonition and enticement. Keeping Europeans out of the district was a sign of 'enmity to the colony', Bryce wrote,

---

72. Submission 3.4.301, p 70.

73. Statement 1.4.3, pp 29–34.

which could not continue if the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were to be friends. Furthermore, the Crown owned land in Mōkau – the Mokau-Awakino blocks, which it had purchased in the 1850s against the wishes of some customary owners (see chapter 5) – and it was ‘unreasonable’ for its access to be limited. And the colony could not grant amnesty to Māori living in Te Rohe Pōtae if they would not accept the colony’s laws. On the other hand, accepting roads and railways would enhance the value of the district’s lands and therefore benefit Māori owners.<sup>74</sup>

Wahanui did not immediately reply to Bryce; he was away at his sister’s tangi in Mōkau when the letter arrived and needed to consult with at least the senior chiefs of Ngāti Maniapoto before replying.<sup>75</sup> He responded on 9 December 1882, denying Bryce’s allegation that he (on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto) had prevented Tāwhiao from accepting Bryce’s terms. Several other chiefs supported him in that denial.<sup>76</sup> As had been made clear to Bryce at the time, the offers were rejected because the Government refused to acknowledge Tāwhiao’s authority. Regarding Bryce’s points on the amnesty and the opening of the district, Wahanui asked for time to discuss matters among his people: ‘waiho kia kororerotia e matou ko te iwi nui’ (‘leave it until I and the wider people have discussed them’).<sup>77</sup> This exchange of letters began a new phase in negotiations over the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae. From this time on, the Crown would negotiate with tribal leaders, and in particular Wahanui, not with the King.

At about this time, Tāwhiao and a group of 60 followers left Whatiwhatihoe on a ‘peace and goodwill’ trip which would encircle much of the lower and central North Island, taking several months. His absence would leave Wahanui and other tribal leaders to deal with Bryce.<sup>78</sup> Wahanui followed his letter by convening a series of hui in which Bryce’s demands were discussed. In these hui, the rangatira had two principal concerns. First, they were concerned with Bryce’s view that no amnesty would be possible unless they recognised the colony’s laws. For both the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, amnesty for the likes of Wetere and Te Kooti was an essential precondition to further engagement about opening the territory. Secondly, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were aware of the loss of land that had occurred in other districts as a result of engagement with the Crown and the Native Land Court; if they were to open their district, they wanted to do so in a manner that protected their lands from this fate.

Therefore, as a first step towards further negotiation, they decided to define an external boundary encompassing Ngāti Maniapoto territories and the territories of neighbouring iwi (notably Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui) which remained under Māori authority, and whose people were prepared to jointly 74. ‘Mr Bryce and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 2 December 1882, p 4 (doc A78 (Marr), pp 700–701).

75. Document A78, pp 703–704.

76. Document A78, pp 704–705.

77. Te Korimako, 15 January 1883, p 3 (doc A110 (Meredith), p 627); doc A78, pp 704–705.

78. Document A78, p 687.

petition Parliament for laws that would guarantee their tino rangatiratanga.<sup>79</sup> While this work was carried out, Bryce sought to push ahead with the opening of the district – in particular, the Kāwhia and Mōkau lands in which the Crown had already made purchases.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders planned a major hui in late February 1883, where they intended to discuss proposals to put to Bryce. It was cancelled due to flooding, and before it could be reconvened, Bryce – treating the district as if it had been opened – pushed ahead with a survey of the proposed railway route.<sup>80</sup> When Te Rohe Pōtae communities resisted, Bryce threatened to ‘clear my own path’.<sup>81</sup> Although they wanted more time, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were effectively forced into negotiations.

On 16 March 1883, an agreement was struck between certain Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders and the Native Minister, John Bryce. Under that agreement, the leaders consented to the Crown conducting an exploratory survey to determine the best route for the North Island Main Trunk Railway through Te Rohe Pōtae lands. They also made it clear that no further work could be undertaken until satisfactory laws were put in place to protect their authority and their lands. They told Bryce they would send a petition setting out the conditions on which they would agree to construction of the railway, and they expected the Crown to respond favourably.<sup>82</sup>

What the Crown promised in response was a matter of intense debate at our hearings, both in terms of the detail and nature of the Crown’s promises and their significance for later events. The claimants saw the March 1883 agreement as the foundation of Te Ōhāki Tapu. Counsel for the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board and other claimants submitted that, under the agreement, in return for the right to conduct an exploratory survey, the Crown would ‘support and recognise Te Rohe Pōtae territory and the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within the territory’.<sup>83</sup> Claimants also saw the March 1883 agreement as being of particular constitutional significance, since it involved Crown acknowledgement that it would be ‘necessary to treat with, and obtain the agreement of, Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira’ in order to open Te Rohe Pōtae for the railway and settlement.<sup>84</sup>

In contrast, the Crown considered that the March 1883 agreement was specific to questions concerning the railway, and that it was ‘implicit that further discussions between the Government and the chiefs would be necessary after the exploration survey was completed and before any railway line was built’.<sup>85</sup> Crown counsel submitted that ‘both parties recognised this was a very significant step to take, and both parties had wider objectives they hoped to achieve in the course

---

79. Document A110, p 627.

80. Document A110, pp 629–630.

81. Bryce to Wahanui, 14 March 1883 (doc A110, p 630).

82. Document A78, pp 759–765.

83. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 9.

84. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 10.

85. Submission 3.4.301, p 27.

of ongoing engagement on other issues.’<sup>86</sup> However, counsel submitted, Bryce and his colleagues did not view the March 1883 agreement as a ‘constitutional arrangement’; nor, counsel submitted, was it viewed in that light by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders.<sup>87</sup> The only constitutional aspect was ‘the fact that the Treaty partners were negotiating an agreement, one that allowed a railway exploration survey through the Rohe Pōtae to occur.’<sup>88</sup>

Crown counsel submitted that the permission Te Rohe Pōtae Māori gave for an exploratory railway survey did ‘denote an alteration in the relationship between Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown with regard to Rohe Pōtae Māori de facto self-government’, because they had acknowledged that a railway might be constructed in the future.<sup>89</sup> The Crown did not place ‘undue pressure’ on Te Rohe Pōtae leaders; the Government, rather, was ‘under considerable pressure from voters’ to advance the construction of the North Island Main Trunk railway.<sup>90</sup>

In this section we will consider the key events leading to the March 1883 agreement, and the agreement itself. In particular, we are concerned with the question of whether the agreement had constitutional implications in the sense that it provided a basis on which the Crown’s authority might extend into Te Rohe Pōtae for the first time.

8.3.1 Amnesty and the external boundary

Following Bryce’s letter to Wahanui in November 1882, and Wahanui’s reply, Wahanui and other leaders spent time considering their response. One of their main concerns was Bryce’s suggestion that he would not proceed to issue an amnesty, or that he would do so with specific exclusions for the likes of Wetere and Te Kooti, should they continue to require the Crown to acknowledge Tāwhiao’s separate sovereign authority. Their other main concern was Bryce’s advocacy for them to open their district to the colony’s laws and public works.

8.3.1.1 Discussions about amnesty, December 1882 to January 1883

The prospect of an amnesty was a matter of concern among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the period leading up to the hui with Bryce. It had been a matter of deep concern to Wetere, who in August 1882 had rushed back to Mōkau from Wellington upon threat of public arrest (section 7.4.4.6). Rewi was another who paid close attention to the amnesty issue.<sup>91</sup> In his negotiations with colonial secretary Daniel Pollen in 1877, Rewi had suggested that an amnesty was one possible avenue by which the Kīngitanga and the Crown could cooperate on criminal matters, such as theft.<sup>92</sup> In the intervening years, Rewi’s firm priority became protecting Te Rohe Pōtae lands, but in the wake of Bryce’s letter he lent his leadership skills to

---

86. Submission 3.4.301, p 29.

87. Submission 3.4.301, p 29.

88. Submission 3.4.301, p 30.

89. Submission 3.4.301, p 30.

90. Submission 3.4.301, p 35.

91. Document A78, pp 636, 733.

92. Document A78, pp 405–409.

the amnesty issue, particularly the question of amnesty for Te Kooti. There was a strong public opinion against Te Kooti receiving an amnesty, despite the fact that he had lived peacefully among his Kingitanga hosts for nearly 10 years. However, to grant amnesties with exceptions might generate a new hostility against the Crown, even more so if Te Kooti were singled out.<sup>93</sup> It probably did not help matters that newspapers reported that Te Kooti responded negatively to the arrest of Winiata, and that he did not want to be taken the way that Winiata had.<sup>94</sup>

The question of how Ngāti Maniapoto would respond to Bryce's letter was discussed at a series of hui held in various locations throughout the district during December 1882 and January 1883. Newspaper accounts from the period suggested that Wahanui, Rewi, Wetere, and Taonui Hikaka II were the principal leaders in determining the Maniapoto response.<sup>95</sup> At one hui, on 2 January 1883, the kōrero included discussion of the amnesty. According to the Waikato Times, it was determined that Bryce should be asked to proclaim the amnesties without delay.<sup>96</sup> Another hui took place shortly after this at Rewi's settlement on the Pūniu River. By the time the hui ended on 10 January, the rangatira who had gathered had reached two significant decisions. The first was that they decided that Rewi would send a letter to Mr Bryce indicating that Ngāti Maniapoto would seek the proclamation of an amnesty. The second decision was that they would mark the external boundary of their remaining territories, as a first step towards determining the conditions on which those territories might be opened to public works or settlement.<sup>97</sup> This was a highly significant undertaking, which we will discuss in depth in section 8.3.1.4.

On 11 January, Bryce was reported to have replied to the chiefs, saying that unless he was sure that those involved truly repented they could not be forgiven. He apparently referred to recent threats made by Te Kooti toward Pākehā and half castes after the arrest of Winiata.<sup>98</sup> However, as the Bay of Plenty Times reported, Wetere was one of the rangatira seeking amnesty, and given his influence among Ngāti Maniapoto, the granting of amnesty to him could be a fruitful move for Bryce and the Government.<sup>99</sup>

On 18 January, the Taranaki Herald published a report by land agent Francis Peacock Corkill, written at Wahanui's request, on a large hui at Te Kūiti held the week beforehand.<sup>100</sup> According to Corkill, Wahanui convened the hui to discuss the 'opening' of the Māori districts, though Marr noted it was likely that it was to discuss the issues raised in Bryce's letter.<sup>101</sup> It soon became evident that this

---

93. Document A41, p 62; doc A78, pp 733–735.

94. Document A78, pp 707, 714, 734–735.

95. Document A78, p 707; 'Important Meeting of Ngatimaniapotos', Waikato Times, 4 January 1883, p 2; 'Important Meeting of Natives in the King Country', Waikato Times, 8 February 1883, p 2.

96. Document A78, p 707.

97. Document A78, pp 709–710.

98. Document A78, p 713.

99. 'The Kingites and Mr Bryce', Bay of Plenty Times, 17 January 1883, p 2.

100. Document A78, p 707.

101. Document A78, p 708.

meeting discussed how to better define and strengthen the aukati and protect the external boundary, quite the opposite of what Corkill had reported.<sup>102</sup> Wetere wrote to the Taranaki Herald, urging that Europeans coming to Mōkau to seek employment should wait quietly ‘till I have finished my great work for peace; then let them come’; in other words, there could be no settlement until amnesty was declared.<sup>103</sup> The hui did not come to any definitive conclusion, with some debating the level to which they should cooperate with Bryce. The hui was considered to stand adjourned, and it was expected that a further hui would take place in February, to which Bryce would be invited.<sup>104</sup>

Following these hui, on 27 January, Rewi sent a letter to Bryce requesting the proclamation of the amnesty over their district: ‘Ko nga tangata hara kia tino murua’ (Let the wrongdoers be absolutely forgiven).<sup>105</sup> Rewi asked if Bryce meant to single out Te Kooti, and asked that Bryce pardon Wetere and others, because it was unfair that they should suffer on account of Te Kooti. As far as Rewi was concerned, Wetere in particular had truly repented. Rewi said that he wanted the two races to live harmoniously together and a pardon would show Māori that no malice continued from the days of misunderstanding.<sup>106</sup> Referring back to his ‘tree of peace’ metaphor (section 7.3.3.3), Rewi asked for the proclamation to be no longer delayed: ‘Friend, let not this be left as earth to rot the root of the tree you and I have planted, lest this should become a grub and enter into its roots, the result of which the tree will fall down.’<sup>107</sup> For his part, Bryce determined that to proceed with the amnesties he would need Te Kooti to give an assurance of future good conduct.<sup>108</sup>

8.3.1.2 Bryce’s arrival in Kāwhia, February 1883

Bryce, by this time, had returned to Te Rohe Pōtae in a further attempt to open its borders. He had sailed from Wellington via New Plymouth aboard the Government steamer Stella, anchoring in Kāwhia Harbour on 2 February 1883.<sup>109</sup> Accompanying him were the Minister of Lands William Rolleston, some of Rolleston’s family, a range of officials, a few members of the armed constabulary, and at least four surveyors: Stephenson Percy Smith, Francis Edgecumbe (accompanied by an un-named ‘native assistant’), Laurence Cussen, and Charles Hursthouse.<sup>110</sup>

Bryce’s immediate goal was to assert Crown authority over Pouewe, the 44-acre block that the Crown had acquired from the settler Ann Charleton in 1880. As discussed in chapter 4, the block had been subject to a pre-Treaty transaction

102. Document A78, p708.

103. ‘Te Wetere and Mr Bryce’, Taranaki Herald, 19 January 1883, p2; doc A78, p708.

104. Document A78, p628.

105. Document A110, p628.

106. Document A78, p713.

107. ‘Rewi and the Native Amnesty Act’, Waikato Times, 30 January 1883, p2.

108. See, for example, doc A78, pp713–715.

109. Document A78, p723.

110. Document A78, pp723–724.

between the trader John Cowell and Kiwi of Ngāti Mahuta, and had since been passed down from settler to settler. We found in chapter 4 that the Old Land Claims commission had failed to examine whether native title had been extinguished, and breached the principles of the Treaty by validating the claim. Bryce was now attempting to benefit from that original Treaty breach.

He was also defying Tāwhiao, who had asked that control of Kāwhia be left to him. Other Māori at Kāwhia had discouraged Bryce's visit, reinforcing the message that the 'regulation of affairs for Kawhia' resided properly with Tāwhiao and that Bryce should at least wait until Tāwhiao returned (he was on a goodwill tour to districts east and south of the aukati).<sup>111</sup> In discussing Bryce's visit to Kāwhia, claimant John Kaati reminded the Tribunal that Kāwhia was 'dearest to the King's heart'; it was where the Tainui anchored 'and where it rested'. 'Kāwhia lands were his own and were not only his kingly mana, but his own chiefly authority'. Bryce's dropping anchor there would have been 'an intrusion', one Tāwhiao would have 'never imagined'.<sup>112</sup>

The Māori response to Bryce's arrival was reportedly 'lukewarm' at best. A few local chiefs, together with others from Whāingaroa and Aotea, undertook to ensure the visitors received the appropriate hospitality.<sup>113</sup> On the first morning, when the official party went ashore to inspect the Government's block, they were met by Werawera, one of Tāwhiao's wives, who greeted Bryce and his party, saying she hoped their visit would encourage peace.<sup>114</sup> But, in general, few Māori turned out for the visit,<sup>115</sup> and some were clearly suspicious of his intentions. The wheel and all the machinery of the new flour mill belonging to the Kāwhia chief Hone Wetere (not Wetere Te Rerenga of Mōkau) were hurriedly removed from the Pouewe block, for fear that Bryce would confiscate it.<sup>116</sup>

The day after anchoring, Bryce and the surveyors began the work of laying off the township, and the Government steamer's captain began positioning buoys in the harbour.<sup>117</sup> The next day Bryce and Rolleston rode to Aotea to assess the country there; they were reportedly pleased with what they saw and interested in where a ferry might be established.<sup>118</sup>

In his telegrams to the governor, Bryce sought to present the visit as a great triumph, claiming that Kāwhia 'has been opened' – a township laid out, the channel buoyed, and local Māori acquiescing 'cheerfully'.<sup>119</sup> Pouewe, Bryce claimed, was the 'best place for a town . . . on the whole harbour',<sup>120</sup> and there would be no difficulty

111. 'A Visit to Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 3 January 1883, p 4 (doc A41, p 60).

112. Transcript 4.1.7, p [275]

113. 'The Opening of Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 9 February 1883, p 5 (doc A78, pp 726–727); doc A41, p 60.

114. Document A78, pp 727–728.

115. Document A78, pp 725–729.

116. Document A78, p 726.

117. Document A78, p 728.

118. Document A78, p 729.

119. Bryce to Governor, 13 February 1883, AJHR, 1883, A-8, p 3 (doc A78, p 722).

120. Bryce, telegram, 6 February 1883 (doc A78(a)), vol 1, p 475); doc A78, p 729.

surveying, selling, or occupying the township.<sup>121</sup> A New Zealand Herald reporter accompanying Bryce's party was far less enthusiastic, regarding the town's location as 'not the best'<sup>122</sup> and remarking on Bryce's failure to engage with the rangatira Hone Wetere and Te Ngākau (a Treaty signatory), who had been 'anxious' to hold discussions. The reporter summed up the so-called 'opening of Kawhia' as really having 'nothing official about the whole thing'.<sup>123</sup>

Although there are some differences between surviving written descriptions of the visit, it does seem to have been too low-key to be regarded as an act of aggression at the time. However, Bryce did know it was a bold move. He had arrived on Tāwhiao's doorstep while Tāwhiao was absent, to undertake an activity that Tāwhiao had asked him to delay. And the visit followed on from the failed negotiations at Whatiwhatihoe and Bryce's letter to Wahanui effectively laying the blame for that failure at Wahanui's feet. But neither local Māori nor Māori from throughout the district rose to any provocation on this occasion, even though they regarded Bryce as a tough man and eyed him warily.

8.3.1.3 Declaration of the amnesty, February 1883

On 5 February 1883, Bryce and his party travelled overland to Alexandra, guided by local Māori. While the Rollestons continued north, Bryce and the surveyors remained at Alexandra for several days, taking advantage of the opportunity to assess the surrounding territories for potential future settlement. Bryce's main concern, however, was to arrange a meeting with Te Kooti and conclude the amnesty.<sup>124</sup>

This meeting – brokered by Rewi – took place on 12 February 1883 at Mangaorongo, east of Ōtorohanga, so Te Kooti would not have to cross the aukati. Rewi himself also attended. The main participants were accompanied by their various parties, as was usual on such occasions. Kingitanga chiefs in Rewi's ope gathered at the Pūniu before joining Bryce's party of officials and local Pākehā and taking them to Mangaorongo. Te Kooti arrived with a party of about 30.<sup>125</sup> It is unclear whether Wahanui was present, but newspaper reports at the time suggested he did not want to see Bryce until Tāwhiao returned from his goodwill trip, which would be in time for the annual Maehe to be held once more at Whatiwhatihoe.<sup>126</sup>

Central to the hui was the exchange between Bryce and Te Kooti, in which Bryce explained that a proclamation under the Amnesty Act could pardon all crimes or pardon some crimes. He said that there was a will among Pākehā (and hopefully Māori also) to bury the troubles of the past. However, some concerns had been raised about Te Kooti specifically, and Bryce was there to ask Te Kooti face to face if he would refrain from committing the crimes of his past. In reply,

121. Document A78, p723.

122. 'The Arrival of Ministers at Alexandra', New Zealand Herald, 6 February 1883, p5 (doc A78, p727).

123. 'The Opening of Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 9 February 1883, p5 (doc A78, p728).

124. Document A78, pp730–732.

125. Document A78, p734.

126. Document A78, p733.

Te Kooti was unequivocal. He had been living in peace since he first agreed to live under Tāwhiao's authority in 1874. He had no intention of returning to his former ways.<sup>127</sup>

When Bryce asked to hear from Rewi, Rewi said Te Kooti's word was reliable and that he himself was on good terms with the Government. Satisfied, Bryce undertook to arrange the proclamation immediately, which he said would be a general proclamation, allowing them to go freely anywhere. The discussions concluded with Bryce and Te Kooti shaking hands. Te Kooti sang a waiata before shaking hands with all the officials present and saying that Bryce could arrest him if ever he was caught raising a hand against another person.<sup>128</sup>

The amnesty was proclaimed the very next day, 13 February 1883, by Governor Jervois and published in English and te reo Māori in an extraordinary issue of the Gazette that evening. It covered offences 'more or less of a political character' committed during the wars or which arose from the wars. As Bryce had explained, it was a general amnesty.<sup>129</sup>

There was some positive newspaper coverage of the hui and its outcome, including some overstatement of the situation in the interior, which the New Zealand Herald described as peaceful and submissive and falling more and more into the grasp of Europeans.<sup>130</sup> However, there was also a significant backlash among some Pākehā. Bryce was reportedly burned in effigy at Napier,<sup>131</sup> and in Parliament he was later condemned for extending his hand to 'the foulest murderer that ever stood on the face of the earth.'<sup>132</sup>

Despite the fact that it was a general amnesty, there was a degree of uncertainty about how it applied and to whom. It was clear that Te Kooti and Wetere were covered (although there had never been an official investigation into the attack on Pukearuhe). It was equally clear that Winiata and Hiroki would not have been included, had they survived their arrests. What was less clear was whether the amnesty applied to those who 'committed crimes' in defence of the aukati, during peace time, such as Purukutu in 1873 and Ngatai Te Mamaku in 1880 (discussed in chapter 7). One clue that those who defended the aukati during peacetime were amnestied was the release from Mount Eden prison of the Kingitanga chief Epiha from Ngāti Hako in the Ohinemuri–Thames district on 14 February. Epiha had been found guilty of wounding with intent for the 1879 shooting of a government surveyor at Te Aroha. After not being pursued for the crime (under Sheehan), his arrest had been ordered by Bryce in 1882, and now Bryce had ordered his release under the amnesty proclamation.<sup>133</sup>

127. Document A78, pp 734–735.

128. Document A41, pp 61–62; doc A78, pp 733–736.

129. Document A78, pp 736–738.

130. Document A78, p 737.

131. Document A78, pp 736–737; doc A41, p 62.

132. McDonald, 9 August 1883, NZPD, vol 45, p 477 (doc A41, p 62).

133. Document A78 (pp 447–450, 624–625) describes the 1879 shooting incident and the arrest of Epiha while he was returning home from the 1882 Maehe.

Although it became generally understood that the amnesty indeed applied to Purukutu, no official written confirmation was discovered by the researchers for this inquiry. However, Kingitanga kōrero tuku iho record that Tāwhiao escorted Purukutu and Wetera to Cambridge and had their amnesties formally recognised by the magistrate there.<sup>134</sup> The same could not be said for Ngatai, whose killing of Moffatt continued to be considered by the Government as a political act. His status was not resolved until negotiations with Bryce in December 1883 (discussed below in section 8.5). Tāwhiao commemorated the amnesty in a line in one of his pepeha:

*Ko Arekehānara tōku hāona kaha
Ko Kēmureti te oko horoi, Ko Ngāruawāhia te tūrangawaewae.*

*Alexandra is my source of strength;
Cambridge is my washbowl of sorrows;
Ngāruawāhia is my footstool.*<sup>135</sup>

The ‘washbowl’ metaphor acknowledges the importance of the amnesty to Kingitanga Māori, while also referencing Tāwhiao’s well-known sadness at the tensions that prevailed in the aftermath of war and confiscation, and the weight of the deaths that occurred in defence of the aukati.<sup>136</sup>

Piripi Crown also referred to Tāwhiao’s pātere, ‘E noho ana au’ (see sidebar), which refers to Tāwhiao instructing Wahanui, Taonui, and Manga ‘to seek a pardon for Te Kooti and uphold our ways.’ According to Mr Crown, the pātere described those rangatira looking back from Wellington at Tāwhara-kai-Atua, ‘which was a term used by King Tāwhiao depicting the first ripe fruits reserved for the Gods in one context and at a human level, for someone held in high esteem.’ In this case, Mr Crown said, Tāwhara-kai-atua denoted ‘the first Poukai held at Whatiwhati-hoe pā.’<sup>137</sup>

---

134. Tui Adams, Ngahinaturae Te Uira, and Ann Parsonson, “Behold, A Kite Flies Towards You”: The Kingitanga and the “Opening” of the King Country, in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 31, no 1, 1997, p 111; doc A78, p 738.

135. Adams, Te Uira, and Parsonson, “Behold, A Kite Flies Towards You”, p 111; doc A78, p 738.

136. Adams, Te Uira, and Parsonson, “Behold, A Kite Flies Towards You”, pp 111–112; doc A78, pp 738–739.

137. Document 12 (Crown), p 7.

‘E Noho Ana Au’

*E noho ana i tōkū kainga ki Wai-hāhā Whakarongo rua aku taringa ki te rongō rā o Hurakia e hau mai nei.
Tēnā ra e pa ka tae koe ki te Pane-o-te-lka
Ka tāmau i te titiro ki
Tāwhara-kai-Atua
Ka tū mai rā i te muri.
Tēnā rā, e Waha-nui, e Tao-nui e te iwi o Mania-poto!
Hāpainga ake te tikanga ki a tārewa ki runga;
Kei hoki te pōuri ki te aroaro!*

*I sit here at my home in Waihāhā
By my ears twice heard
Is the fame of Hurakia
Greetings o Sir, when you arrive at the head of the fish (Wellington), gaze at Tāwhara-kai-Atua
established in the northern parts.
Greetings o Waha-nui, o Tao-nui, and the Tribe of Mania-poto Uplifted was the cause and set on high
That grief may not beset us again!<sup>1</sup>*

---

1. Document 12, p 7.

8.3.1.4 The marking of the external boundary, January to April 1883

Buoyed by what he took as an easing of tensions following the amnesty, Bryce determined to proceed with exploratory surveys for roads, railway and ‘the profitable occupation of the land.’<sup>138</sup> However, this was not what the Ngāti Maniapoto leaders had offered. From their point of view, proclaiming the amnesties and accepting Te Kooti’s assurance of good conduct did not mean the aukati had been lifted, nor that Bryce or other Crown agents could now range freely through the territory. An amnesty was a desirable negotiated outcome, but it was distinct from other activities over which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown had yet to reach agreement.<sup>139</sup>

As discussed in section 8.3.1.1, during December 1882 and January 1883, Ngāti Maniapoto leaders had held discussions about defining and securing the boundary of their remaining lands, and those of neighbouring iwi which remained under Māori authority. At the 10 January 1883 hui at Rewi’s settlement at Pūniu, they had decided to proceed. It is not clear who was present at the hui. However, Robert Ormsby junior (of Ngāti Maniapoto and brother of the future leader John Ormsby) later described the decision that was reached:

A resolution was proposed and accepted unanimously, that a certain number of reliable men should be sent to define the boundary, and report upon the extent of the

---

138. Bryce to Governor, 13 February 1883, AJHR, 1883, A-8, p 3 (doc A41, p 63).

139. Document A41, pp 63–64.

remaining portion of what was termed [the] King country, upon which Europeans had no claim.<sup>140</sup>

Later that year, the petition submitted on behalf of the territory's leaders explained that 'certain persons were selected by the hapus to define the boundaries of our lands'.<sup>141</sup> These people were instructed to mark out the territory with 'pou roherohe'.<sup>142</sup>

The idea of marking the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae was not a new one. Rewi had set out the boundaries in response to a request from Pollen in 1877. Then, during the Maehe in May 1882, Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa had spent some time together 'laying down their intertribal boundaries'.<sup>143</sup> The decision taken in January 1883 took this a step further: the external boundaries of their territory would now be physically marked with pou.

The rangatira assigned to lead this process was Taonui Hikaka II, who had assumed leadership of Ngāti Rōrā since his father's death in the 1860s. Taonui was somewhat younger than Wahanui and Rewi, but was nonetheless an important and influential leader. Ormsby reported that Taonui 'and a number of others' began immediately after the 10 January hui, starting at Kihikihi, travelling along the eastern boundary to Taupō, then along the southern boundary to Mōkau, then up to the coast to Kāwhia, and from there back to the Pūniu.<sup>144</sup>

There was more to the task than simply traversing the boundary and conducting hui with the relevant local communities. The innovative but complicated plan sought an appraisal of lands remaining under the authority of Ngāti Maniapoto and neighbouring iwi – notably Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, hapū and iwi of northern Whanganui, and Ngāti Hikairo – which lay within the so-called 'King country', and on which the Crown and settlers as yet had no claim. A complicating factor was that the boundary did not encompass all of the territories in which these iwi had interests. Even Ngāti Maniapoto claimed lands to the north of the Pūniu, beyond the Waikato confiscation line. The plan required the consent of the people at hapū level within the communities who were willing to agree to the kaupapa. Wahanui later explained that the pou were erected 'with the full consent of the people residing at different places where such posts were erected' ('i whakaae nga hapu i noho tata ki aua wahi i tu ai aua pou').<sup>145</sup>

Settler newspapers interpreted the decision to define the boundary as evidence that Ngāti Maniapoto was breaking from the Kingitanga.<sup>146</sup> The Waikato Times

140. 'The Natives and their Lands', New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 65).

141. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

142. 'Nga Whakaaro a Wahanui ma mo nga Whenua', Te Korimako, 15 August 1883, p 6 (doc A110, p 627).

143. 'Tawhiao's Meeting at Whatiwhatihoe in May, 1882', AJHR, 1882, G-4A, p 11.

144. 'The Natives and Their Lands', New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1883, p 6; doc A41, pp 65–66; doc A78, p 711; doc A110, pp 627–628.

145. 'Nga Whakaaro a Wahanui ma mo nga Whenua', Te Korimako, 15 August 1883, p 6; translation from New Zealand Herald, 23 July 1883, p 5 (doc A110, p 627).

146. Document A41, p 65.

reported that the tribe had ‘determined to take an independent course of their own’, having become discontented under Tāwhiao’s mana, which they no longer recognised any more than Europeans did.<sup>147</sup> Dr Loveridge echoed this view in his evidence, characterising Ngāti Maniapoto and the other tribes involved in determining the boundary as having broken away from the Kingitanga ‘in order to negotiate directly with the Crown concerning the future of the King Country’.<sup>148</sup>

Certainly, Tāwhiao was no longer at the forefront of negotiations – but, as discussed in section 7.4.4.7, that was a result of Bryce’s refusal to recognise the legitimacy of the Kingitanga, and of his determination to deal only with Wahanui and other tribal leaders after November 1883, while also placing pressure on them to open their lands. Had the Crown taken a different approach, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would have had no reason to waver from their role within the Kingitanga.

The decision to define the external boundary was also significant for other reasons. It set the direction that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would take under Wahanui’s leadership in respect of their future negotiations with the Crown. As we will see, from this point on their first demand of the Crown was that it recognise and respect the boundary, as a step towards recognising the rights of Māori within that boundary. The decision also marked the beginning of a period in which Ngāti Maniapoto and key rangatira from neighbouring iwi would act together to protect and maintain their traditional lands and authority. To this extent their goals were similar to those of the Kingitanga, though they would differ from the Kingitanga in their willingness to recognise Parliament’s role in protecting and providing for their authority.

Throughout, Wahanui insisted on a policy that all decisions made by the rangatira required discussion and consent from the people, and therefore could not be rushed. At the conclusion of the 10 January hui he told William Grace to tell the ‘pakeha side . . . to give us a little time to breathe and settle matters amongst us’.<sup>149</sup> Wetere expressed similar sentiments soon afterwards (see section 8.3.1.1).<sup>150</sup> In order for the initiative to work, the Ngāti Maniapoto leaders who were instrumental in driving it would have to discuss it widely with all affected hapū and iwi. More particularly, they would have to overcome any impression that it was designed to protect the interests of Ngāti Maniapoto alone, and instead convey that it was designed to protect the interests of all groups with interests in Te Rohe Pōtae. It was a complex and ambitious arrangement that would require judicious management, as all involved would soon discover. While Te Rohe Pōtae leaders needed to proceed slowly and carefully, the Crown wanted to press ahead without delay, as we will see in the next section.

---

147. ‘Important Meeting of Natives in the King Country’, Waikato Times, 8 February 1883 (doc A41, p 67).

148. Document A41, p 65.

149. ‘The Kingites and Mr Bryce’, Auckland Star, 10 January 1883, p 3 (doc A110, p 628).

150. ‘Te Wetere and Mr Bryce’, Taranaki Herald, 19 January 1883, p 2 (doc A110, p 629).

8.3.2 The exploratory railway survey, February–March 1883

Shortly after proclaiming the general amnesty on 13 February 1883, Bryce decided to proceed with plans to open Te Rohe Pōtae for settlement. He wrote to the governor explaining that exploratory surveys for ‘roads and railways, and surveys for the profitable occupation of the land’ could be ‘safely undertaken at a very early period.’<sup>151</sup>

From the Crown’s point of view, there was a degree of urgency attached to this work. The line south from Auckland had reached as far as Te Awamutu and had opened in May 1880. Following the passing of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act in August 1882, the Government was authorised to raise a loan to complete construction from Te Awamutu south. The Act’s preamble anticipated that ‘the obstacles in the way of carrying on the extension from Awamutu may be shortly removed’ and that funds were being provided so that construction could begin ‘as soon as circumstances will permit.’<sup>152</sup> Completion of the railway and opening of the King Country would help, it was hoped, to alleviate the effects of recession which had now begun to hit even Auckland’s previously more robust economy.<sup>153</sup>

Before construction could begin, however, the railway route needed to be explored and surveyed. In 1878, Parliament had authorised a line from Te Awamutu via Mōkau to New Plymouth, and then to continue down the west coast to Wellington. But the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act 1882 had not specified a route, and Bryce appeared at that time to have been considering alternatives. His intention to explore more routes seem to have firmed up after his arrival in Kāwhia. By late January, settler newspapers were discussing the need to send out more than one survey party to determine which of the ‘different routes’ would be best for the railway.<sup>154</sup>

The Government also considered that it was necessary to conduct triangulation (trig) surveys in the district, to set the framework for all other surveys both within the King Country and adjoining the district’s boundaries. Bryce’s goal was to complete these preliminary surveys by the next parliamentary session in June, and he dispatched George Wilkinson to Te Kōpua in the hope of organising a meeting with Wahanui to advance the negotiations.<sup>155</sup>

Bryce was eager to begin this work, and telegraphed Wetere immediately after the amnesty was issued announcing his intention to travel from the Waikato to Mōkau, presumably with surveyors in attendance. But the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto and other tribes in Te Rohe Pōtae wanted more time for discussion among themselves. A major hui was planned for Totoro on the Mōkau River in late February, where the leaders intended to determine their response to Bryce’s letter

151. Bryce to Governor, 13 February 1883, AJHR, 1883, A-8, p 3 (doc A90 (Loveridge), p 9).

152. Document A20 (Cleaver), pp 44, 50.

153. Document A78, p 742.

154. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 26 January 1883, p 4 (doc A41, p 61); doc A41, pp 41–42, 60–61, 63–64; doc A20, pp 37, 76; doc A78, p 855.

155. Document A41, pp 63–64; doc A78, p 746.

asking them to open the district. Bryce left Alexandra and went to Whāingaroa and then Auckland.<sup>156</sup>

When the Totoro hui was postponed because of flooding, Bryce asked the Crown agent George Wilkinson to arrange a meeting with Wahanui.<sup>157</sup> Again, Wahanui emphasised that more time was needed for discussion among the district's hapū and iwi. He agreed to hold a meeting with Bryce on 3 March, in condition that (in Wilkinson's words) the meeting would be 'considered a friendly & not a business one as the time has not yet arrived for him to talk business or disclose his policy'. Wilkinson added that he did not think Wahanui would be prepared to 'commit himself to anything in the absence of Taonui & one or two others.'<sup>158</sup>

Bryce travelled to Alexandra on 7 March and met with Wahanui. There is no direct record of what was discussed. Nonetheless, Loveridge considered that, at this meeting, Wahanui agreed to the Government commencing an exploratory railway survey.<sup>159</sup> Marr disagreed, suggesting that the evidence of events surrounding the meeting shows that Wahanui could not have given Bryce such an assurance.<sup>160</sup> Indeed, while it is unclear what Bryce said at the meeting about the prospect of possible survey activity, Wahanui later reminded Bryce that he told him that the matter 'rested with the whole of the people' and that he should not 'hurry matters as the tribe have not yet discussed this.'<sup>161</sup> Wahanui's position on this was consistent with what he had told Wilkinson prior to the meeting – he was not yet prepared to discuss 'business.'<sup>162</sup>

Despite Wahanui's desire to allow time for Māori to develop their response, Bryce proceeded to issue instructions to Charles Hursthouse the following day (8 March). The instructions stated that Hursthouse was to 'proceed from this place through the Mokau Country to Taranaki and explore the country with a view to ascertain whether it is suitable for a railway'. These instructions were translated into te reo Māori, presumably so that Hursthouse could demonstrate to local communities that he was entering the district on Bryce's instructions. Bryce also added a note to the instructions, saying he hoped that 'the Maoris will assist you in this work if you require assistance.'<sup>163</sup> Bryce also instructed Laurence Cussen to commence work on the trig survey.<sup>164</sup> Bryce then returned to Auckland, announcing that the trig survey had begun and that he hoped to have 'preliminary explorations made of the three proposed routes' before Parliament resumed in June. Bryce 156. Document A110, p 629; doc A41, pp 67–68; doc A78, pp 744–745; 'Mr Bryce's movements', Waikato Times, 15 February 1883, p 2.

157. Document A110, p 629; doc A78, p 746.

158. Wilkinson telegram to Bryce, 3 March 1883 (doc A78(a) (Marr document bank), vol 2, pp 487–488); doc A78, p 746.

159. Document A90, p 10.

160. Document A78(i) (Marr), pp 22–29.

161. Wahanui response as reported in Wilkinson telegram, 15 March 1883 (doc A78(i), p 25).

162. Document A78(a) (Marr document bank), vol 2, pp 487–488; doc A78, p 746.

163. Bryce to Hursthouse, 8 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 492).

164. Document A90, p 11; doc A41, p 64. Also see 'The Native Minister', New Zealand Herald, 12 March 1883, p 2.

also announced that he intended to travel back to Wellington via Alexandra and Mōkau.<sup>165</sup>

Bryce's precise motivation for ordering the surveys is unclear. On the one hand, he may have been optimistic about the prospect of pressing ahead with the survey work in the wake of the amnesty proclamation. However, he was aware that the aukati remained in place, and had been told by Wahanui that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori needed more time to discuss their position. Bryce may have been acting on the assumption that he could provoke the district's Māori into accepting the Crown's authority in the district, or at least be seen to be acting decisively, and hoping that he could create the impression that Māori agreed with the work that would now be undertaken.

On the other hand, he may have hoped that Hursthouse could slip into the district and carry out the work unnoticed. In any case, it was a provocative act – one that only increased the challenges confronting Wahanui – and he was placing Hursthouse at considerable risk. Bryce soon discovered that the position of Wahanui and other leaders remained unchanged: the aukati had not been lifted, and neither Bryce nor those acting on his instructions could range freely through the district.

8.3.2.1 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori stop the attempted exploratory railway survey

Having been delayed by two days due to rain, Hursthouse set out from Alexandra on 12 March 1883. He had been unable to obtain the support of Māori guides, but was accompanied by a survey assistant. Having set out, he returned to Alexandra the same day: in Marr's view, the most likely explanation was that he was stopped and turned back at Tāwhiao's bridge or at Whatiwhatihoe. Having discovered the object of Hursthouse's mission, local Māori at Whatiwhatihoe agreed that he should not go on.<sup>166</sup>

The next day, Hursthouse set out again, this time with the guidance of Wilkinson and a Mrs Morgan, who lived in the Pirongia area. Marr argued that they accompanied Hursthouse on the pretext that they were guiding him to visit Te Kōpua, where he could visit Wahanui. By doing so, she suggested, they would be able to bypass Whatiwhatihoe, at which point Hursthouse might be able to slip into the district unnoticed.<sup>167</sup>

At Tāwhiao's bridge, the group was stopped by a party of about 12 Ngāti Maniapoto, who insisted they should not make their trip while the King was still absent. Wilkinson noted that they were not armed, and that their 'show of obstruction' was 'merely part of their tikanga.'<sup>168</sup> The survey party was allowed to proceed on the grounds that Hursthouse would only travel as far as Te Kōpua

165. 'Movements of the Hon Mr Bryce', Waikato Times, 13 March 1883, p 2 (doc A41, pp 63–64).

166. Document A78(i), pp 30–31; doc A78, p 748.

167. Document A78(i), p 31.

168. Wilkinson and Hursthouse telegrams to Bryce, 13 March 1883 doc A78, pp 748–750; doc A78(a), vol 2, p 496; doc A110, p 630.

to see Wahanui.<sup>169</sup> However, having arrived at Te Kōpua, Wilkinson and Mrs Morgan turned back, leaving Hursthouse and his assistant to continue on into the territory.<sup>170</sup>

Hursthouse and his assistant made it to Ōtorohanga, where they were stopped again, this time by a much larger party of about 50 Ngāti Maniapoto, among them the chiefs Aporo Taratutu, Te Naunau, Awa, and Rawiri Hauparoa. After identifying Hursthouse as Bryce's surveyor, the group insisted he had to go back to Alexandra. Hursthouse refused, saying he was under orders to continue. They offered him the usual manaakitanga of a meal and a bed for the night, while they continued to debate the situation.<sup>171</sup>

The next morning, Aporo proposed taking Hursthouse to Wahanui to seek permission for the survey work. Hursthouse refused and went to mount his horse to leave. Rawiri then moved in to stop Hursthouse, forcing the horse around by grabbing its bridle. Hursthouse did not run, but instead agreed to be escorted to see Wahanui, who was by then at Whatiwhatihoe.<sup>172</sup> However, Wahanui did not in fact want to speak with Hursthouse privately, instead preferring his usual approach of speaking in a public hui. Once again, their Ngāti Maniapoto hosts treated Hursthouse and his assistant well, but Wahanui continued to refuse Hursthouse's request for a private meeting.<sup>173</sup>

What Hursthouse was experiencing was the aukati in action: a warning, and a forcible removal, without the use of violence but with the very distinct possibility of violence should he persist. Faced with this possibility, Hursthouse relented. He sought further instructions from Bryce and returned to Alexandra.<sup>174</sup>

Upon hearing what had happened, Bryce sent separate telegraphs to Wahanui and Rewi, both containing the same message.<sup>175</sup> Bryce told them firmly: 'He [Hursthouse] went with my full authority and in accordance with law.' In a translation sent with Bryce's original, this was rendered as: 'I haere ia i runga taku tino kupu whakamana i a ia a i runga hoki i te ture.' Bryce expressed his displeasure that Hursthouse had been turned away by members of the Ngāti Maniapoto tribe.<sup>176</sup>

He now called upon Wahanui and Rewi to see to it that Hursthouse could have a clear passage through the territory without being stopped by any of their people. Refusing Hursthouse was 'foolish' and 'likely to lead to confusion and trouble.' It

169. Document A78(i), p 32.

170. Document A78, p 749.

171. Document A78, p 750; doc A110, p 630.

172. Document A78, pp 750–751.

173. Document A78, p 751.

174. Marr set out these events in some detail: doc A78, pp 748–752; see also doc A110, pp 629–630.

175. In evidence presented to us, the version of the message sent to Wahanui is in te reo Māori, and the version sent to Rewi is in English. It is unclear whether these were the only versions sent to the respective chiefs, or whether English and te reo versions were sent to both. Nevertheless, both appear to be faithful translations of each, the only change being the names of Rewi and Wahanui in the respective messages.

176. Bryce telegram to Wahanui, 14 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 512); see also doc A110, p 630; doc A78, pp 753–754.

would be best, he said, for Rewi and Wahanui to remove any resistance and allow Hursthouse a clear path through. He warned that '[i]t is correct that I can clear my own path' ('He tika ka taea e ahau ano te whakawatea toku huarahi (sic)').<sup>177</sup> Bryce apparently hoped this would be enough to force a resolution, without having to leave Auckland again. The claimants pointed to this statement of Bryce as evidence of the pressure he, on behalf of the Crown, was prepared to apply to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The significance of this statement, counsel submitted, would not have been lost on Wahanui and other Ngāti Maniapoto, coming from the man who had invaded Parihaka some 16 months earlier.<sup>178</sup>

Wahanui's reply to Bryce the following day (15 March) was measured, however, and reminded Bryce that it was for the people to decide what would happen. Were Bryce to persist, Wahanui said, the people's views might change. This message was sent to Bryce from Wilkinson, who had met Wahanui earlier that day.<sup>179</sup> In his message, Wahanui reminded Bryce of their discussion at Alexandra on 7 March:

I ki atu ahau ki a koe i Areka, kei te iwi nui tonu te tikanga, na i ki atu ano ahau ki a koe, kua e takohetia, kaore ano te iwi kia ata korero e te Paraihe. Waiho ra kia taka hoki te ahuru kei he manawa te iwi.<sup>180</sup>

The Ngāti Maniapoto researcher Paul Meredith translated this as:

I told you at Alexandra, the right is with the wider people, and I also said to you, don't rush as the people have not discussed this, Mr Bryce. Let it be for now lest you upset the people.<sup>181</sup>

Wilkinson sent another message to Bryce saying: 'I understand you want it to be settled if possible without your having to come here but my own opinion is that nothing will be done unless you do come.'<sup>182</sup> In a separate telegram, Hursthouse repeated the same message.<sup>183</sup>

8.3.2.2 The hui at Taonui's house, 15 March 1883

That same day (15 March), various Ngāti Maniapoto leaders gathered at Taonui's house – named Taupiri – at Te Kūiti to discuss the situation that was now confronting them.<sup>184</sup> Written notes of the meeting were later provided to the Government 177. Bryce telegram to Wahanui, 14 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 518). Translation by Waitangi Tribunal. See also doc A78, pp 753–754; doc A110, p 630.

178. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 12.

179. Document A110, pp 630–631.

180. Wahanui to Bryce, enclosed in Wilkinson to Bryce, 15 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 522–523); see also doc A110, pp 630–631.

181. Document A110, pp 630–631. Wilkinson, in the original letter, translated the phrase 'kia taka hoki te ahuru kei he manawa te iwi' as 'lest the people should be out of breath (or driven to desperation) by your eagerness': Wilkinson to Bryce, 15 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 522–523).

182. Wilkinson to Bryce, 15 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 524–525); doc A78(i), p 35.

183. Hursthouse to Bryce, 15 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 526–527).

184. Document A78, pp 755–757; doc A110, p 631.

by a chief named Te Reti, who the Ngāti Maniapoto researchers say was possibly Te Reti Ngataki of Waikato.<sup>185</sup>

By this time, it appears that Bryce was proposing to travel through the district himself, accompanied by two others – presumably Hursthouse and his assistant.<sup>186</sup> The first speaker, the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Te Wharo (also known as Te Whaaro<sup>187</sup>), introduced the purpose of the hui: ‘Ko te puru i a Paraihe, ko te tuku ranei i te rori.’ (‘To stop Bryce or allow the road to proceed.’) Te Wharo then read out Bryce’s telegrams to Wahanui and Rewi.<sup>188</sup> A number of speakers returned to the question of Bryce’s ‘road’. This appears to have been a reference to the railway: Wahanui later used the term ‘rori’ with this exact meaning when he consented to the railway in 1885.<sup>189</sup>

Te Winitana Tupotahi, of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Maniapoto, expressed the quandary in which they found themselves. The Ōrākau veteran was recorded as saying:

Taku me puru te rori, me puru te pakeha. Otira kua purua te puru i mua ko Mangatawhiri he puru tera, ka mate Waikato, he puru i Waitara ka mate te tangata. Ka mate te whenua he puru i te Rawhiti, ka mate te tangata te whenua. Ngati Maniapoto, titiro ki enei take, tukua te rori a te Paraihe, engari me te ata whakahaere ano e pai ana hoki tenei.<sup>190</sup>

This was translated at the time (possibly by George Wilkinson) as:

Mine is, the road should be stopped, and the Pakeha should be stopped. But stoppages have been attempted before, a stoppage was attempted at Mangatawhiri, and Waikato suffered. A stoppage was also attempted and people were killed and land suffered. A stoppage was attempted on the East Coast, people were killed there and the land suffered. Ngati Maniapoto consider these things and allow Mr Bryce’s road to go on, but let it be carried out properly.<sup>191</sup>

Tupotahi’s comment suggests that he was genuinely concerned about the possibility of conflict – and even confiscation – if Bryce’s request was refused. Bryce’s threat to clear his own path suggested as much, as did Bryce’s actions at Parihaka sixteen months earlier.

Wahanui then spoke. He agreed with Tupotahi that previous attempts to stand up to the colonial Government had led to suffering. Therefore: ‘waiho a te

185. Document A110, p 631.

186. Document A78(a), vol 2, p 530.

187. Document A28 (Thomas), pp 309, 310, 312; doc A78, p 757.

188. Te Reti, notes, 15 March 1883 (doc A110, p 631; doc A78(a), vol 2, p 534). Also see doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 534–540. The translation is Paul Meredith’s. A contemporary translation, possibly by the Crown’s agent George Wilkinson, can be found in doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 530–533.

189. Document A91 (Archives NZ, document bank), vol 1, pp 9–12.

190. Te Reti, notes, 15 March 1883 (doc A110, p 632; doc A78(a), vol 2, p 535).

191. Document A78(a), vol 2, pp 530–531.

Paraihe kia haere ana' ('allow Mr Bryce to go on') and 'waiho kia haere ana te rori' ('allow the road to go on'). Wahanui appears, here, to have used 'road' to refer to Hursthouse's journey through the district. Once that was completed, Wahanui said, Ngāti Maniapoto should send a petition to Parliament: '[M]a te Paremata e titiro a tatou pitihana kei reira ka mohio tatou ki te ora matou ki te mate ranei otira ki taku ka ora tatou.' ('The Parliament will deal with our petition and then we shall know whether we shall benefit or suffer, but I think we shall benefit.') Here, Wahanui was suggesting that any further opening of Te Rohe Pōtae beyond the initial survey would depend on Parliament making laws that benefited Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>192</sup>

Wahanui then discussed what he considered should be set out in the petition. There were two key elements – definition and recognition of the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae; and recognition of the right of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to administer their own lands and make laws relating to those lands. Specifically, Wahanui said:

Ko tenei ki taku me tuku te rori ko nga tangata me tuku pitihana ki te Paremata, ka oti tera me kahi etehi tangata hei whiriwhiri ma ratou e whakahaere nga tikanga mo te whenua ka whakamana e te iwi aua tangata ma ratou e tiaki te whenua me nga ture hoki mo te whenua. Ma tenei tatou ka ora ai tetei o aku kupu ko te ruri mo te tatou whenua porotaka ka oti te ruri me tu ano te kairuri, e tatou katahi tatou ka ora ki te korero whakariterite tatou ka mate engari tenei taku me tuku nga pakeha kia haere ana, me tahuri tatou ki te tuku pitihana . . .<sup>193</sup>

I think the road should be allowed to go on and we should petition Parliament, and after that is done, we should select a certain number of people to administer the land, those people should be authorised by the tribes, they to have charge of the land and laws relating to it. By this means we shall derive benefit. Some more of my words concern the survey of our land block; when the survey is finished we should pay the surveyor at once ourselves; then we shall be safe; we will suffer with other arrangements. But I also say, let the Pākeha go [through]; that is, we must turn to [the matter of] sending our petition.<sup>194</sup>

While no final resolution was reached, the hui established general agreement about what they would seek from Bryce when he came to meet with them. Many of the ideas presented were not new. The external boundary of the territory had been discussed on many occasions, and those discussions had included the possibility of obtaining a survey of the boundary. Wahanui had also proposed that the Crown pass legislation providing for the exercise of Māori authority within Te Rohe Pōtae. Petitioning Parliament was a substantial project. The petition he

192. Te Reti, notes, 15 March 1883 (doc A110, pp 632–633; doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 531, 536–537).

193. Te Reti, notes, 15 March 1883 (doc A110, pp 632–633; doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 537–538).

194. Document A78(a), vol 2, p 532 (up to 'derive benefit'). From 'Some more', the translation was by the Waitangi Tribunal.

proposed would not only articulate Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns and what they wanted to happen, it would also test the Government's willingness to support their aspirations.

8.3.3 The 16 March 1883 agreement

Bryce had returned to Alexandra by early afternoon on 16 March 1883, and proceeded immediately with his officials to Whatiwhatihoe. There, he met with Wahanui, Rewi, and several other rangatira (Tāwhiao was still away on his goodwill tour).<sup>195</sup> There are differing accounts of how the meeting unfolded. Some suggested the discussion was cordial. One account, attributed to the Tūhua rangatira Hataraka,<sup>196</sup> who was present at the meeting, suggested that the encounter was more confrontational before an agreement was achieved.<sup>197</sup> The evidence suggests it was constructive (if firm), but it is possible there were heated moments.

According to Hataraka's account, Bryce signed a document acknowledging that he could not enter Te Rohe Pōtae or carry out any public works there without the consent of the district's leaders. Following the meeting there was an exchange of letters, through which Bryce and the assembled Ngāti Maniapoto leaders made commitments on the course of action to be taken from that point. Bryce's letter contained commitments that the survey would be exploratory only, that some Native Land Court applications would be held back, and that he would consider a petition from Ngāti Maniapoto leaders. It did not contain an explicit commitment to seek their consent for public works, though that was implicit in the circumstances.

The claimants – based largely on Hataraka's account – understood the 16 March 1883 agreement as a 'compact', in which the Crown undertook to respect the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over their territories.<sup>198</sup> The Crown saw the agreement as being specific to the railway survey.<sup>199</sup>

8.3.3.1 The meeting with Bryce

According to an account in the Waikato Times, the 16 March 1883 hui began with Bryce explaining to the chiefs that Hursthouse was not surveying the railway line itself, but simply undertaking 'a work of exploration before actual survey or the laying off of the railway was commenced'. Bryce gave an assurance that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders 'would have plenty of time' to discuss matters further before any actual survey of the railway route or construction of the railway could begin.<sup>200</sup>

The rangatira then asked Bryce to withdraw for a period while they discussed the issues further. They debated for about half an hour before calling Bryce back and informing him that they had agreed to allow Hursthouse to travel through the 195. Document A41, pp 68–71; doc A78, pp 759–781; doc A110, pp 634–640.

196. Document A78, pp 755–756; doc A110, p 634.

197. Document A41, p 70 n; doc A78, pp 759–760; doc A110, pp 634–635.

198. Submission 3.4.128, p 2.

199. Submission 3.4.301, p 27.

200. 'Mr Bryce and Wahanui', Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2; doc A41, pp 68–69; doc A110, pp 637–638.

district ‘between Alexandra and Mokau’ but only ‘so as to judge of the suitability of the country for a railway.’<sup>201</sup> Wahanui also asked Bryce not to send Hursthouse ‘until he had sent a messenger to all the up-country settlements to inform them of his (Wahanui’s) consent’. According to the Times, ‘Wahanui’s agreement with Mr Bryce was put in writing, and signed by the chiefs present.’ Several rangatira offered to accompany the ‘exploring party.’<sup>202</sup>

Other newspapers also gave accounts of the meeting, but also with very scant details of what was discussed. Typically, they emphasised the agreement for the survey to proceed. The New Zealand Herald, for example, reported on 17 March 1883 that Rewi, Wahanui, and other rangatira had ‘signed an agreement to allow the exploration and survey of the railway route to proceed’, and that the exploration would proceed the following week (the meeting had occurred on a Friday), allowing ‘a few days’ for Wahanui to inform those in the interior of Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>203</sup> Subsequently, the newspaper reported that, in return for consent to the survey, Bryce had ‘agreed to defer some minor claims Wahanui and Rewi are interested in being investigated for the present’. This was apparently a reference to Native Land Court claims to lands within the district.<sup>204</sup> The newspaper described the survey agreement as a ‘written pledge’ by Wahanui and other rangatira.<sup>205</sup>

A much fuller account was published in July in the Wanganui Herald. According to the newspaper, it was ‘very carefully interpreted’ from an account given by Hataraka, who ‘bears a high character, both for intelligence and veracity.’<sup>206</sup> Marr identified Hataraka as Hataraka Te Whetū of Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Te Ika, who also had links with Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>207</sup> The key part of Hataraka’s account recorded an exchange between Bryce and Wahanui:

Mr Bryce: Are you, Wahanui, willing that the road shall go by way of Mokau?

Wahanui: No.

Mr Bryce: Why won’t you let it go by that route?

Wahanui: Because I do not wish it. This land has not been bought with your money. You can go on with your roads until you come to the boundary of my lands, but you must not come any further: that must be left with me. I am to decide whether these roads shall be made on my land or not; and I wish you to assent to this word of mine.

Mr Bryce: Yes, I assent. If you will allow this road to run, it shall be well; and if you don’t allow it to run, it shall be as you say, and it is well.

Wahanui: Now, I have written that down in writing, and (handing the pen to Mr Bryce) now you, Bryce, sign your name—

201. ‘Mr Bryce and Wahanui’, Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2.

202. ‘Mr Bryce and Wahanui’, Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2.

203. ‘Mr Bryce in the Waikato’, New Zealand Herald, 17 March 1883, p 5.

204. ‘The Native Minister and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 19 March 1883, p 5; doc A41, p 69.

205. New Zealand Herald, 22 March 1883, p 4; doc A41, p 69.

206. ‘Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact’, Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

207. Document A78, p 756; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 39, vol 2, p 458; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauonoka: The Whanganui Land Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2015), vol 1, p 503.

Mr Bryce wrote his name, and then Wahanui wrote his name too.<sup>208</sup>

Bryce then asked whether Wahanui was not willing to have Europeans pass through the district from Alexandra to Mōkau and on into Taranaki. Wahanui asked Bryce to leave the room so that he and other rangatira ('my seven men') could discuss the matter. According to Hataraka, the rangatira present then discussed the matter, forming the view that the survey party should be allowed to travel through the district so long as they confined their activities to the exploratory survey; they could 'simply pass through, and the way close up behind them'. When Bryce returned, there was a further exchange, in which the chiefs gave permission for the survey on certain conditions:

Wahanui: Bryce, I consent that your Europeans go through to Mokau and Taranaki, but let the feet only go along the road, and go neither to one side or the other; keep straight on to the end, and look not to the right or to the left.<sup>209</sup>

The exchange then continued:

Mr Bryce: Very well; it shall be as you say. My people shall abide by what you have said. I will start them off tomorrow.

Wahanui: Stop; I don't assent to that. Wait for two weeks.

Bryce: Why?

Wahanui: The tribe is absent. I alone am here, and they must assemble and hear what has been said by me, so that it may be understood.

Mr Bryce: Very good – let it be so.<sup>210</sup>

As well as offering considerably more detail about what was said, Hataraka's account differed from others on certain key points. First, Hataraka's account referred to Bryce signing an agreement, whereas others suggested that only the rangatira signed (or, in the case of the Waikato Times, were ambiguous about whether Bryce also signed<sup>211</sup>). Secondly, Hataraka's account referred to the agreement being signed before Bryce left the room. Thirdly, and most crucially, Hataraka's account suggested that the written agreement did not concern the survey, but rather Bryce's agreement that the Government could not enter Te Rohe Pōtae without the consent of its leaders.

The Wanganui Herald described the agreement between Bryce and Wahanui as a 'curious compact', and so far as we are aware this was the first time the term 'compact' was used in a documented source to describe any of the 1883–85 agreements.<sup>212</sup> We have not seen any written agreement signed by both Bryce and 208. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2; doc A78, pp 764–765.

209. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

210. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

211. 'Mr Bryce and Wahanui', Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2.

212. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

the rangatira. Settler media (including the Wanganui Herald itself) questioned whether any such agreement existed, and also suggested it was implausible that Bryce would have agreed that Wahanui would decide whether 'roads' would run through Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>213</sup>

In the view of the Wanganui Herald there was 'presumptive evidence' against Bryce having made such a commitment. According to the newspaper, such a commitment would serve no purpose for the colonial Government other than to increase Wahanui's power, since it 'absolutely binds the colony to waive its prerogative of making roads (or railways) . . . under the Public Works Act'. If it had been made, this was an 'outrageous' commitment which tamely surrendered the colony's 'dignity and rights'.<sup>214</sup> Likewise, the requirement that the survey party go 'neither to one side nor the other' further added to the Crown's 'humiliation':

if the impression left on the minds of the Waikato Natives is such as has been conveyed by Hataraka, not only has no progress been made, but the King country is as completely sealed against road-making as at any time since the commencement of the King movement.<sup>215</sup>

While the Wanganui Herald doubted that Bryce had made such a commitment, it noted that all other newspaper accounts had come from Bryce and his staff (and therefore, by inference, revealed only what Bryce wanted his parliamentary colleagues and settler constituents to know). Hataraka's was the only account that explained how Māori had understood the meeting. The proof, the newspaper suggested, would be known only if the written agreement was uncovered.<sup>216</sup> In the absence of that agreement, the Herald sent its report of Hataraka's account to Wahanui, who confirmed that it was accurate. According to Wahanui:

The words said to Mr Bryce are true (as reported), but no assent was given that the roads should be opened up at present, but perhaps that may be in the future; that is, when we know for truth that the Europeans have really good intentions to the Maoris of this Island, and also towards my own tribe.<sup>217</sup>

---

213. 'Opening the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 3; 'The King Country', Hawke's Bay Herald, 19 May 1883, p 2; 'Opening the King Country: Another Version', Auckland Star, 18 May 1883, p 3.

214. 'Opening the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 3. Marr discussed this editorial in her evidence: doc A78, pp 771–772.

215. 'Opening the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 3.

216. 'Opening the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 3. Some other newspapers also acknowledged that Hataraka's account reflected Māori understanding of the meeting. See: 'The King Country', Hawke's Bay Herald, 19 May 1883, p 2; 'Opening the King Country: Another Version', Auckland Star, 18 May 1883, p 3.

217. 'Wahanui and the Native Minister', Wanganui Herald, 11 July 1883, p 2; doc A78, p 770.

8.3.3.2 The letters between Bryce and the rangatira

Further details of what was discussed and agreed on 16 March were contained in letters that were exchanged on that day between Bryce and the rangatira. The letters were never released to the public or settler media.<sup>218</sup> The first letter was from Wahanui, Manga (Rewi), Ngatapa, Hari, Tupotahi, and Te Oro – all of Ngāti Maniapoto – to Bryce (‘E hoa E Hone Paraihe’). It read:

Kua tukua e matou to tangata engari kei rara nga ringaringa o to tangata. Kia tika tonu ki te haere i tonoa nei e koe.

He tono hoki tenei na matou ki a koe, kia kaua e whakamana e koe nga tono ruri i roto i ta matou takiwa; waiho kia oti rano te korero a te iwi nui tonu o Ngāti Maniapoto.

Tuarua, ki te oti te korero a Ngāti Maniapoto, tera e tukua atu tetahi pitihana ki a koe mo tetahi ture pai kia whakamana mai e koutou ko to runanga mo te whenua o Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>219</sup>

We have agreed to allow your man to go, but let not the hands of your man be spread out. Let him proceed on the duty that you have sent him upon.

We request also that you will not grant applications for surveys within our district, defer them until the question has been discussed by the whole tribe of Ngatimaniapoto.

Secondly, when the talk of the Ngatimaniapoto is over, a petition will be addressed to you praying you and your Parliament to pass a satisfactory law for the lands of the Ngatimaniapoto.<sup>220</sup>

Bryce’s letter, written from ‘Areka’ (Alexandra) and addressed to ‘Wahanui, Manga and others’ read:

Friends your words are good both on account of the work to be done and because they show the friendly relations now established between your tribe and me. Listen, my man is only going on one duty, namely the exploration of railway routes. Enough of that. As to surveys, it will be well for the principal men and the Ngatimaniapoto generally to apply to the Court for surveys and determination of title to land; this is the only way to avoid confusion. In the hope that this will be done shortly, I will keep back minor surveys for a time. This does not refer to trig surveys and stations which have nothing to do with title.

---

218. Document A78, p 772.

219. Wahanui and others to Bryce, 16 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 543; doc A110, p 635). The versions of the letters that remain on file are regarded as drafts. Bryce instructed his officials to make a copy of the letter from Wahanui and others, in Māori and English, to give to Wahanui; see doc A78, p 773 for an explanation.

220. Document A78(a), vol 2, p 542; see also doc A110, p 636.

8.3.3.3

I shall look forward with interest to your petition. Let it state clearly the alteration you want. If it is an improvement in the law I will carefully consider it in your interests.<sup>221</sup>

Bryce signed the Māori language version of the letter ‘Na to koutou hoa aroha, Hone Paraihe’.<sup>222</sup>

8.3.3.3 What did the Crown and the chiefs agree to?

The nature and extent of the agreement that was reached at this time was heavily disputed between the parties. The historians Marr and Loveridge disagreed in particular over the weight that could be accorded to Hataraka’s account and the conclusions that could be drawn. In essence, they differed over the extent to which Bryce acknowledged the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and their ongoing right to make decisions about public works within the territory.

8.3.3.3.1 THE VIEWS OF MARR, LOVERIDGE, AND MEREDITH

Marr’s interpretation emphasised Hataraka’s account. She argued that the 16 March agreement involved ‘a much wider and [more] significant understanding than simply obtaining written permission for the railway’. It also covered the railway and ‘the proposed strategy of seeking peaceful recognition of the external boundary and the territory and continued management of its lands through petitioning parliament’.<sup>223</sup> In her view, the rangatira ‘saw the agreement in the nature of a “compact” between themselves and Bryce rather than as a straight one-way agreement to give permission for a trip’.<sup>224</sup> She based this view, in particular, on Bryce’s assurance (as given in Hataraka’s account) that Wahanui would decide whether roads could enter Te Rohe Pōtae or not.<sup>225</sup>

Marr gave several reasons for accepting the veracity of Hataraka’s account, including his presence at the 15 and 16 March meetings, his reputation (according to the Wanganui Herald) for truthfulness, and the fact that Wahanui had later confirmed the accuracy of the account. She also referred to a later statement made by Wahanui to then Native Minister John Ballance in February 1885:

When Mr Bryce took office he made a compact with me, which was signed, that a search for the railway was to be made, and, if a suitable line were found, he was to return and let me know. . . .

221. Bryce to Wahanui, Manga, and others, 16 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 544; doc A110, pp 636–637).

222. Wahanui, Manga, and others, 16 March 1883 (doc A78, pp 775–776).

223. Document A78, p 765.

224. Document A78, p 767. For the Wanganui Herald’s interpretation of Hataraka’s account, see ‘Opening the King Country’, Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 3.

225. Document A78, pp 764–765.

Mr Bryce asked me, 'What do you want?' I then said, 'I am going to send a petition to the House, and I want you and your Cabinet to back it up'. I went on with the petition at once, but you know yourselves what it is.<sup>226</sup>

Marr took from this that Ngāti Maniapoto understood themselves to have formed a 'compact' with the Crown through this 16 March 1883 agreement, and that the compact was based on Crown recognition of their external boundary and the authority of Māori within the boundary.<sup>227</sup> The term 'compact', she noted, had come into use among settler media within weeks of the 16 March 1883 agreement, had subsequently been used by Wahanui, and had been 'maintained in Rohe Potae oral traditions to this day'.<sup>228</sup>

The Crown relied on the evidence of Loveridge, who dismissed the idea that the March 1883 hui had resulted in a compact between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. Loveridge argued that there was nothing in the letters or the surrounding circumstances to suggest that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and Bryce had agreed to anything substantive beyond the exploratory railway survey.<sup>229</sup> In particular, Loveridge disputed the reliability of Hataraka's account. He said there was no single written document signed by all parties that was similar to the 'written pledge' described by Hataraka; instead, there were two letters setting out both parties' understanding of the agreements.<sup>230</sup>

Loveridge also argued that the letters between the chiefs and Bryce disproved much of Hataraka's account and the inferences Marr drew from them. He said that the chiefs merely requested that the Native Land Court and associated surveys be withheld from the territory, a condition he said was already being met. He also noted that Bryce's letter did not say anything about agreeing to permanently withhold future surveys unless specific agreement was given.<sup>231</sup> Loveridge also noted that the letter sent by Wahanui and other rangatira did not ask anything specific of Bryce in respect of the petition. According to Loveridge, Bryce's letter to the rangatira 'promised to give careful consideration to its proposals if he considered them to involve "an improvement in the law"'. He could hardly have said more without first seeing the document itself.<sup>232</sup> Loveridge also discussed the statement Wahanui made to Ballance about his exchange with Bryce, where Wahanui said that he wanted Bryce and his Cabinet to back up their petition. In that exchange, Loveridge noted, 'Wahanui did not say what answer, if any, Bryce made to this request'.<sup>233</sup>

---

226. 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February, 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 13-14; doc A50 (Marr), p 170.

227. Document A78, pp 769-770.

228. Document A78, pp 769-770.

229. Document A90, pp 5-41; doc A41, pp 68-71.

230. Document A90, pp 31-32.

231. Document A90, pp 24-25.

232. Document A90, p 26.

233. Document A90, p 26.

In reply to Loveridge, Marr emphasised the context in which the letters were made and the conclusions that the chiefs were able to draw from their engagement with Bryce. The real issue, she said, was the extent to which Bryce encouraged the rangatira in their understanding of the agreement, without intending to honour that understanding.<sup>234</sup> She said the evidence showed that Bryce acknowledged he needed chiefly permission for the survey and public works, which the chiefs viewed as an important concession.<sup>235</sup> The newspaper accounts from the time, for example, emphasised that Bryce did discuss the construction of the railway and assured the chiefs there would be more time to discuss it before construction took place. ‘They understood this meant the government would only make a survey and come back to them before any construction went ahead.’<sup>236</sup>

Paul Meredith, in ‘Ngāti Maniapoto Mana Motuhake’, did not accept that Hataraka’s account referred to a single written agreement signed by Bryce and the rangatira. In his view, when Hataraka referred to a written agreement he ‘was most likely referring . . . to [the] reciprocal exchange of letters between Wahanui and the other chiefs and Bryce’, which took place on the same day as the meeting.<sup>237</sup> Meredith noted that Hataraka’s account was consistent with other evidence in key respects. First, the letters specified that the surveyors should confine themselves to their business and not ‘spread out’, and Hataraka’s account had also emphasised this point. Secondly, Hataraka noted that Wahanui asked for two weeks to inform his people of the agreement, and (as we will discuss in section 8.4.1) Wahanui later became angry when Bryce failed to comply with this condition. Meredith noted that both Hataraka’s account and the letters were consistent with the matters that Wahanui and other rangatira had discussed on 15 March and suggested that Hataraka’s account reflected Māori understanding of the outcome of the meeting with Bryce.<sup>238</sup> Meredith summarised that understanding as follows: ‘Wahanui asserted his mana over his lands seeking recognition for the boundary and the authority of chiefs within it to manage the lands.’<sup>239</sup>

8.3.3.3.2 OUR CONCLUSIONS

Before considering the substance of the agreement between Bryce and the rangatira, we must first consider its form. We know that an agreement was reached between Bryce and the rangatira on 16 March, and that it was reached through discussion. Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira had long traditions of oral agreements over questions of mana and regarded the word of a chief as his bond.<sup>240</sup> From their perspective, the agreement would have been enshrined in what was discussed between the parties, and would not have been confined to what was subsequently recorded in

---

234. Document A78(i), p 40.

235. Document A78(i), p 41.

236. Document A78(i), p 43.

237. Document A110, p 635.

238. Document A110, pp 635–636, 641.

239. Document A110(b) (Meredith), p 10.

240. Document A42, p 7; doc H9(c), para 9; doc I4, paras 6–8, 10.

writing.<sup>241</sup> In this case, according to Hataraka's account, it was Wahanui who asked for the agreement to be recorded in writing.<sup>242</sup> He may have seen this as a necessary precaution, because the agreement was with Bryce, whom Te Rohe Pōtae leaders did not fully trust.

Hataraka's translated account referred to Wahanui asking Bryce to sign a document, and Bryce complying. In Loveridge's view, Hataraka was saying that there was a single agreement signed by both parties – but Hataraka did not specify that. As we know, Bryce did sign something – a letter. On balance, we agree with Meredith that Hataraka was most likely referring to the letters that were exchanged. Loveridge invited us to dismiss Hataraka's entire account on the basis of this point. We see no reason to do so. If (in translation and as reported by a settler newspaper) Hataraka's account was not absolutely precise on the written form by which key elements the 16 March 1883 agreement were recorded, we do not see this as meaning that the entire account can be dismissed.

On the contrary, there are several reasons to take it seriously. It was the only detailed account of the exchanges between Wahanui and Bryce; according to the Wanganui Herald, Hataraka was an intelligent and truthful man and therefore a reliable source; he clearly had the confidence of Wahanui and other rangatira, as reflected in his presence at the 15 March hui; Wahanui later confirmed that his account was correct on the details of the exchanges between himself and Bryce; and some of the details of Hataraka's account are clearly supported by other reports from the time (for example, Bryce being asked to leave the room before the rangatira considered his request for a survey, which was consistent with other newspaper accounts; and the surveyors being asked to look neither left nor right, which was confirmed by the letter to Bryce). For these reasons, we see Hataraka's account as important evidence of what was discussed at the 16 March meeting and of how the rangatira present understood their agreement with Bryce.

We do agree with Loveridge that the 16 March 1883 letters themselves are crucial evidence of what was agreed – and no one in our inquiry disputed this. But they are not the only evidence. While they record specific outcomes of the meeting, they provide very limited information about what was discussed. In our view, the agreement can be understood only by taking account of all the evidence presented to us. This includes the circumstances in which the hui occurred, the parties' motivations and objectives leading into the hui, and the parties' understandings of the outcomes of the hui, which can be found in various sources including the newspaper accounts of the hui by Hataraka and others, in the letters, and in the subsequent explanations by rangatira as to what they had agreed to, and in the parties' actions following the hui.

The circumstances were these. The Crown believed it had a legal right to assert its authority within Te Rohe Pōtae, in particular by requiring Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to submit to its institutions (in particular the Native Land Court) and by building public works in accordance with its economic development goals. However,

241. Submission 3.4.1, para 20.

242. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

it had no practical authority within the district. Practical authority remained with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and communities, as it had since the Treaty was signed and for many centuries before. Māori continued to exercise practical authority in the district, irrespective of the Crown's ambitions and beliefs about its legal rights.

As discussed in chapter 7, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were aware of the Crown's ambitions and were debating among themselves how to respond to growing pressures at the borders of their lands. One of their responses was to send Taonui and others to hold negotiations with border hapū and iwi, and to lay out the external boundary of the lands that remained in Māori possession, in an attempt to protect those lands from the Native Land Court and more generally to define the area in which they retained authority. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders asked the Crown to give them time to complete this work and determine their responses to the pressures they faced.

The Crown instead sought to test its authority by sending surveyors into the district without first consulting or obtaining consent from Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. Ngāti Maniapoto responded by turning the survey party back and insisting that Bryce come and discuss their concerns directly. Bryce, in response, warned that he was prepared to take forcible action, to 'clear' his 'own path'. But he was well aware of all of the attendant costs, risks, and harmful impacts that would arise from such a course, and so took up the invitation to seek a peaceful resolution through dialogue.<sup>243</sup>

By entering the district without consent and then (after Hursthouse had been removed from the district) by threatening to press ahead without that consent, the Crown effectively forced the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto to the negotiating table before they were fully prepared, and before they had completed their consultations with other iwi or engaged in any detailed discussions with Tāwhiao who was still away on tour. The meeting therefore was not the result of parties coming together to set out their objectives in neutral circumstances; rather, it was the result of Bryce's attempt to advance the Crown's agenda through unilateral action. Bryce's actions meant that those Ngāti Maniapoto leaders who were on the spot had to come to some agreement among themselves about what it was they would seek from the Crown. This required them to consider not only the immediate circumstances that were presented to them – the Crown's insistence on conducting an exploratory survey – but also the Crown's long-term objectives to open the district and construct the railway.

At the hui at Taonui's house at Whatiwhatihoe on 15 March they came to a preliminary agreement on a range of ideas for how they might engage with the Crown:

- ▶ that they would allow the Crown to continue with an exploratory survey for the railway line while they advanced further discussions with the Crown on the particular forms of protection and recognition they would seek for their rights and authority;

---

243. Bryce telegram to Rewi Maniapoto, 14 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 518).

- ▶ that a survey of the external boundary of their territories should be made, which they would pay for themselves, in order to protect their lands from the Native Land Court and purchasing, and in order to define the area in which their authority would apply;
- ▶ that a petition should be sent to Parliament outlining the conditions they required to be met or the actions they required from the Crown before they would contemplate authorising construction of the railway;
- ▶ that the district's Māori would select their own people to exercise authority over the land and to make and administer laws over their territory.<sup>244</sup>

The evidence – both newspaper accounts and the letters – shows that the leaders put most or all of these ideas to Bryce the next day. In their letter to Bryce, the rangatira said they would agree to allow the exploratory survey on condition that the surveyors confine themselves to that work, while emphasising that their consent was conditional upon obtaining consent from their people. Bryce, in response, acknowledged their consent and the conditions placed upon it.

There is conflicting evidence about whether the rangatira saw themselves as consenting only to Hursthouse's journey to Mōkau, or more generally to railway surveys. The Waikato Times reported that the discussion specifically concerned Hursthouse and that the rangatira consented to 'exploration of the country between Alexandra and Mokau'.<sup>245</sup> Hataraka's account was that the rangatira agreed to a single journey through to Mōkau, with the surveyors looking 'not to the right or to the left'.<sup>246</sup> The letter from the rangatira to Bryce was not specific on this point, but referred to 'te tangata', suggesting that only one surveyor was to go.<sup>247</sup>

On the other hand, settler media had been reporting for several weeks that Bryce intended to consider more than one route. Bryce's letter referred to only one man being sent, with 'one duty . . . the exploration of railway routes'.<sup>248</sup> This, however, could have meant routes through the Mōkau Valley, rather than routes throughout Te Rohe Pōtae. On balance, it seems to us that the rangatira understood the agreement as being confined to exploration of a single route from Te Awamutu to Mōkau, but that Bryce interpreted it differently, and seems to have assumed it gave him a broader right to conduct railway surveys throughout the district. This distinction would become important in a few months, as we will see in section 8.5.2.

As well as consenting to Hursthouse travelling through the district to determine the best route for the railway, the rangatira also asked that the Government refrain from allowing 'surveys' in the district. By this they appear to have meant that they wanted the Government to hold back Native Land Court applications within their territories, and on all survey activity other than the railway exploration through

244. Document A110, pp 632–633.

245. 'Mr Bryce and Wahanui', Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2 (doc A41, p 69).

246. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country: A Curious Compact', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

247. Document A110, pp 635–636.

248. Bryce to Wahanui, Manga, and others, 16 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 544; doc A110, pp 636–637).

to Mōkau. Bryce, in response, promised to ‘keep back minor surveys for a time’ (Under section 38 of the Native Land Court Act 1880, the governor could direct the chief judge of the Native Land Court that a case should not be heard, or that any existing hearing should cease.). But Bryce said this promise did not apply to trig surveys, ‘which have nothing to do with title’. He also urged the rangatira to place their lands before the court, saying that a determination of title by the court was the ‘only way to avoid confusion’.<sup>249</sup>

The rangatira also informed Bryce that, once they had completed discussions among themselves, they intended to submit a petition to Parliament. They would ask for ‘tetahi ture pai’ (a good law) ‘kia whaka mana mai . . . mo te whenua o Ngāti Maniapoto’ (providing Ngāti Maniapoto with authority over their land). In the petition, they would set out in detail what they wanted from Parliament. Once they had seen how Parliament responded, they would decide their next steps. Bryce responded that he would look forward to the petition and give it careful consideration.

Much of the disagreement between the historians turns on the extent to which Bryce committed to implement the content of the petition, or more generally committed to support the continued exercise of Māori authority within Te Rohe Pōtae. Hataraka’s account suggested that Bryce acknowledged the boundary between Crown and Māori spheres of authority, and also acknowledged the Crown’s need to obtain the consent of the district’s leaders for any surveys or public works. We see no reason to doubt that Bryce made these statements. After all, they were no more than statements of fact – as a matter of practical reality, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori exercised authority over the district, and he could not pursue public works without the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders; the ejection of Hursthouse had shown that clearly.

Indeed, even if we were to set aside Hataraka’s account, the remaining evidence makes it quite clear that Bryce acknowledged the need to obtain the chiefs’ consent before proceeding with the exploratory survey. In the Waikato Times’ account of the meeting, Bryce specifically acknowledged that the chiefs would have ample opportunities to discuss the railway before any substantive work could begin.<sup>250</sup> And, as Marr noted, Bryce had come to Whatiwhatihoe to obtain consent for the survey because he realised he could not proceed without it.<sup>251</sup> Crown counsel also acknowledged that it was ‘implicit that further discussions between the Government and the chiefs would be necessary after the exploration survey was completed and before any railway line was built’.<sup>252</sup>

If Bryce’s letter did not specifically acknowledge that he required the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for the survey, that was because that requirement was obvious from the context. The letters did not record the status quo, which was that Te

---

249. Bryce to Wahanui, Manga, and others, 16 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 544; doc A110, pp 636–637).

250. ‘Mr Bryce and Wahanui’, Waikato Times, 17 March 1883, p 2; doc A41, pp 68–69; doc A110, pp 637–638.

251. Document A78, p 760.

252. Submission 3.4.301, p 27.

Rohe Pōtae Māori possessed the practical authority to determine what was done in their district (including turning away surveyors); the letters recorded what was to change, which was that the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto would give a very narrow and conditional approval for a railway exploration to proceed. In claiming that Bryce did not acknowledge the authority of the district's leaders, Loveridge, in our view, was dismissing the clear and obvious fact that the aukati remained in force.

There is, furthermore, very clear evidence that the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira who negotiated this arrangement understood Bryce as having acknowledged their authority within the aukati, at least to the extent that he agreed the Crown could take no action in their rohe without their consent. As noted in section 8.3.3, Wahanui recalled in 1885 that Bryce had agreed to consult before committing to any public works. He also made a similar statement in 1888, recalling that Bryce had promised to 'give due respect to our land'.<sup>253</sup> Taonui, in December 1884, said that Māori agreed only to the 'preliminary survey' and understood that Bryce would then visit again to confer with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about whether or not the railway would proceed (see section 8.10.1.2).<sup>254</sup> Also in 1884, Whiti Patato of Ngāti Raukawa expressed his understanding that 'Bryce's word at the beginning' was that 'we should have the control over our lands'.<sup>255</sup>

In saying that he would build no roads without Wahanui's consent, Bryce very likely saw himself as doing no more than acknowledging the immediate, practical reality that the survey could not proceed without cooperation from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and nor, ultimately, could the railway or the opening of the district. In this sense, he would have seen himself as committing to keep returning to negotiations until his goals had been achieved – that is, until the district had been opened and the Crown could assert its authority without needing consent from Māori leaders. We do not think that he saw himself as binding the Crown for all time to recognise and protect the authority of the district's rangatira and Māori communities. Nonetheless, he would have known that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were seeking an assurance of that nature, both because his previous discussions with Kingitanga leaders had broken down on this very point, and because Wahanui was now insisting on his right to make decisions about public works in the district. By acknowledging that it was for Wahanui to make such decisions, he created the impression that he would honour the right of the district's Māori to make decisions about their own lands. It is clear from their later comments that Wahanui and other rangatira believed they had won a significant concession which would remain binding in

---

253. Document A50, p170; doc A71 (Robinson and Christoffel), p12. In 1888, when discussing the decision by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to apply to the Native Land Court for title to their lands, Wahanui said they had done so because they 'placed absolute reliance on that word of Mr Bryce, for he personally told us that he would give due respect to our land, and that he would prevent all evil practices from being done in our district': 'Letter from Wahanui', Wanganui Herald, 11 June 1888, p2.

254. Taonui to Ballance, 3 December 1884 (doc A20(a) (Clever document bank), pp 49–50). While Taonui was not at the 16 March 1883 meeting, given he was away marking the external boundary at the time, he was briefed on the outcome when he returned.

255. 'The Natives and Mr Bryce's Promises', Waikato Times, 10 June 1884, p2.

future. As the claimant Harold Maniapoto put it, that concession meant that ‘any proposed activity by the Crown in Te Rohe Pōtae had to be agreed in advance.’<sup>256</sup> If Bryce did not intend to make this commitment, and therefore to respect the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders on an ongoing basis, he should have said so clearly and forthrightly, both in his discussions with Wahanui and in his letter.

What, then, of the petition? Did Bryce commit to implementing its contents or merely to considering it? In discussing the idea of the petition at the 15 March hui, Wahanui had said that the Government’s intentions towards Te Rohe Pōtae remained unclear, and he had suggested the petition as a means by which the leaders could test those intentions. This would suggest that Wahanui understood that Bryce was limited in the extent to which he could (or would) commit the Government at that point. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were still developing their ideas about what they would seek from the Government, and this required consultation with the people. As such, the letter from the rangatira was carefully worded to indicate the general direction of what they would seek from Parliament, without giving details. Under those circumstances, we do not think that Bryce could have given a clear commitment to implementing the terms of the petition: neither he nor Te Rohe Pōtae leaders knew in detail what the petition would contain. Indeed, the parties’ stances on the petition were quite clearly spelled out in the letters: rangatira would send the petition asking that Parliament enact satisfactory laws, and the Crown would then consider it. The stance taken by the rangatira in future negotiations would depend on whether satisfactory laws were indeed enacted.

This interpretation is supported by the events of subsequent months, which are discussed in section 8.4. In April 1883, Wahanui made reference to the possibility of the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori being joined together in ‘te piringa pono’ (which was translated at the time as ‘a bond of faith’, but could also be understood as a close and honest relationship or partnership), but only if the Crown acted in good faith and did not push ahead with public works and settlement plans without the necessary consent.<sup>257</sup> When Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sent the petition in June 1883, they made no reference to any specific promise by Bryce to implement it. Rather, they presented it as an appeal to the Crown to honour its obligations under articles 2 and 3 of the Treaty. And when the Crown responded to the petition by passing the Native Committees Act 1883 in September, Wahanui objected on the grounds that it did not fulfil the petition’s terms, not on the basis of any specific promise that Bryce had made at the 16 March meeting.

We therefore agree with Loveridge that Bryce did not make any promise at the March 1883 meeting to implement the specific terms of the petition. Indeed, he could not have, since neither he nor Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at that time knew what those terms would be. But this does not negate Bryce’s broader acknowledgement of the boundary between Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori spheres of authority at that time, or of the Crown’s need to obtain the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for surveys or public works within that boundary.

---

256. Document A42, p 9.

257. Document A41, pp 72–73; doc A78, pp 826–829; doc A110, pp 643–645.

Another very significant part of the agreement was that it established broad parameters by which further negotiations might proceed from that time onwards. That is, while the parties reached specific agreement on the immediate issue before them (the exploratory railway survey), they did so in a way that identified how that particular agreement might contribute towards fulfilling the ultimate objectives they sought. Bryce's position, while focused on the immediate objective of seeking agreement to initiate the exploratory survey, also referred to the Government's ultimate objective: the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae to Crown institutions, public works, and settlement. Similarly, the chiefs set out their ultimate objective: to retain control of their land, which could happen through the Crown's provision of a 'good law'.

As well as setting out their broad objectives, through the 16 March hui the parties established a process through which further negotiations could occur. Under that process, in order for matters to progress the parties would need to agree on some matters while leaving others for further negotiation. This approach was made necessary by the cultural and political context in which the leaders of the respective parties operated. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were guided by tikanga. Their leaders could only advance negotiations with the Crown on important proposals such as this if they returned to the people on regular occasions to obtain their agreement. This was the proper – tika – way in which such matters of importance were treated in Te Ao Māori, and it was reflected in Wahanui's request for Bryce to give him time to engage in discussions. Similarly, Bryce needed to obtain agreement from ministerial colleagues and (ultimately) the majority of Parliament in order to secure any necessary legislative reforms.

Above all, the agreement signalled that the relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had been put on a new footing. Bryce's letter to the rangatira emphasised that they had now established 'friendly relations.' This was a very significant step, after decades in which the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had either remained aloof from each other or had been at war. It signalled that the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown had entered a new and potentially much more productive phase. The exchange of letters gave the negotiations an added air of formality, providing written confirmation of this new and important stage in the relationship. To this extent, we agree with the Crown that 'both parties recognised this was a very significant step to take, and both parties had wider objectives they hoped to achieve in the course of ongoing engagement on other issues.'<sup>258</sup>

This is not to say that all matters had been resolved. Bryce was clearly of the view that the agreement allowed him to proceed with trig surveys, though he was soon to back down on this. As discussed above, he also appears to have understood the agreement as giving him broad rights to conduct exploratory surveys throughout the district, whereas the rangatira saw it as granting a specific authorisation for Hursthouse to travel to Mōkau. A third area of ambiguity concerned the timing of the exploratory survey. While it is clear that Bryce agreed to delay

---

258. Submission 3.4.301, p 29.

Hursthouse's departure so Wahanui could inform Te Rohe Pōtae communities, the evidence is unclear about how long that delay was to be for. Hataraka's account suggested Bryce had agreed to wait two weeks; Bryce's telegram to the Native Department immediately after the hui suggested the survey would be delayed 'for [a] few days';<sup>259</sup> and newspaper accounts reflected that, suggesting that the survey would go ahead the following week, after a delay of 'a few days' to allow consultation.<sup>260</sup> The letters were silent on this matter. Notwithstanding these points, agreement had been achieved on the substantive matters, which would allow negotiations to progress further.

The March 1883 agreement was not simply confined to the matter of the railway, as Dr Loveridge suggested, and to the extent argued by the Crown.<sup>261</sup> It also involved Bryce's implicit acknowledgement of the practical authority that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders continued to exercise. And, as Marr noted, it was the first step in a series of negotiations and agreements, which were 'linked by a number of understood objectives and by a sense that both parties were conducting them within the sense of a solemn, honour-bound, high-level relationship binding (in some respects) both parties.'<sup>262</sup>

In sum, the 16 March 1883 agreement between Bryce and Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira had the following essential features:

- ▶ Bryce acknowledged that, unless it was prepared to use force, the Crown could not proceed with surveys or public works within the aukati unless it had the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. Whereas Bryce appears to have seen this as a temporary acknowledgement of practical reality, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders understood it as meaning that Bryce acknowledged the aukati and their authority within it, and as an assurance that the Crown would take no future action in their rohe without their consent.
- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto leaders consented to the exploratory railway survey from Alexandra to Mōkau, provided the surveyors did not attempt to carry out any other work, and subject to a delay to allow them to inform and consult their people. They appear to have understood that the delay would be for two weeks or more following the 16 March 1883 hui, whereas Bryce seems to have believed that the survey could proceed within days. Bryce seems to have interpreted their consent as allowing the Crown to conduct exploratory surveys on more than one route, but there is no evidence that he explained this to the rangatira. He also seems to have interpreted the agreement as allowing trig surveys to continue; again, there is no evidence that he put this to the rangatira, let alone that they consented.
- ▶ The Crown agreed to hold back survey or Native Land Court applications within Te Rohe Pōtae until further discussions had been held.

---

259. Bryce to Lewis, 16 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 547).

260. 'Mr Bryce in the Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 17 March 1883, p 5. Two days later, the New Zealand Herald reported that the survey would proceed in 'a day or two': 'Latest Wellington News', New Zealand Herald, 19 March 1883, p 5; doc A78, p 782.

261. Document A90, pp 40–41; submission 3.4.301, pp 27–29.

262. Document A78(i), p 38.

- ▶ Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would send a petition to Parliament setting out improvements they would seek to Māori land laws, and the Government would give that petition careful consideration.

The agreement was made between the Crown and Ngāti Maniapoto leaders, who had not yet had the opportunity to complete consultations with neighbouring iwi and hapū. Bryce's decision to order the survey had effectively forced them into negotiations before they were ready and in spite of their requests for more time.

In addition to its specific terms, the 16 March 1883 agreement was significant because it established the parameters for future negotiations. Both sides set out their objectives: for the Crown this was to open Te Rohe Pōtae for the railway, the Native Land Court, and European settlement; and for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori it was for the Crown to recognise and protect the aukati and their authority within it. The talks also established a negotiating process under which some matters would be agreed, while others would be deferred so that the proper mandate could be obtained – from Māori communities in the case of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and from the Government and Parliament in the case of Bryce. In these ways, the agreement placed relations between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori on a new and more positive footing, in which both would have opportunities to pursue their goals in a mutually beneficial manner.

8.3.4 Treaty analysis and findings

In the claimants' view, the 16 March 1883 agreement had constitutional significance. In their view, because Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at the time were continuing to exercise practical authority over the district, kāwanatanga had no practical effect. The Crown therefore recognised that in order to open the district for settlement 'it would first be necessary to treat with, and obtain the agreement of, Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira'.<sup>263</sup> Crown counsel, on the other hand, submitted that the only 'constitutional element of the 16 March 1883 agreements was the fact that the Treaty partners were negotiating an agreement, one that allowed a railway exploration survey through the Rohe Pōtae to occur'.<sup>264</sup>

In our view, the March 1883 agreement undoubtedly had constitutional significance, not only because it was between Treaty partners but because it established, for the first time, a process through which those Treaty partners would be able to negotiate to bring the terms of the Treaty into practical effect in this district. As we explained in chapters 3 and 7, the Treaty required a working out of how kāwanatanga and rangatiratanga would interact in practical terms. The Crown acknowledged that, following the signing of the Treaty, further discussions would be required to determine how the Crown's 'governmental authority was to be exercised, particularly in relation to issues of concern to Māori'. The Treaty therefore required 'the working out of institutional structures and relationships in the new colonial polity'.<sup>265</sup>

---

263. Submission 3.4.128(b), p10.

264. Submission 3.4.301, pp 29–30.

265. Submission 3.4.312, p1.

Prior to the 1870s, no attempt had been made by either side to work out how Crown and Māori authority might relate to each in a manner that was consistent with the Treaty. In chapter 7 we showed how and why the negotiations that occurred between 1875 and the end of 1882 failed to establish a basis upon which these relationships could be worked out. This was because of the ongoing effects of war and the Government's refusal to recognise the legitimacy of the Kīngitanga, as well as the failure to reach agreement about the return of the confiscated land. Following the breakdown of the Crown's negotiations with the Kīngitanga, a new phase began in which the Crown negotiated directly with tribal leaders, in particular Wahanui. The amnesties, declared in February 1883, allowed the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to put the past to one side. They created an opportunity for forgiveness and atonement in relation to the war, and potentially the blossoming, at last, of Rewi's tree of peace. At a more pragmatic level, they provided a legal resolution, which allowed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to progress negotiations without any apprehension that previous actions might be treated as criminal.

Yet Te Rohe Pōtae leaders continued to proceed cautiously. While the Crown continued to place pressure on them to open their territory to settlement and public works, they were concerned to protect their lands and territorial rights. The decision to define an external boundary marked a significant step towards that end – one that would soon bring Ngāti Maniapoto together with other iwi occupying the district's borders (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Whanganui, and Ngāti Hikairo) in a manner that sought to call on the same collective strength that the Kīngitanga had offered them.

The exchanges entered into in March 1883 were the first time Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown were able to engage with each other in any meaningful way on the question of what would be necessary to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty. For the first time they directly addressed questions of how the Crown's power of kāwanatanga (as expressed in particular through courts, surveys, and public works) might interact with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights of tino rangatiratanga (as expressed through the desire of Ngāti Maniapoto leaders for Crown recognition of the district's boundary and continued Māori authority within that boundary, and more specifically through their request that the Crown enact a satisfactory law for their lands).

The agreement established a process by which the parties could negotiate to bring the terms of the Treaty into practical effect. And it also marked a significant step by both parties towards acceptance of the other's rights under the Treaty. Bryce conceded the reality that he required Māori consent before he could take actions that affected the district. This was an implicit recognition of the existing mana and rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and of the practical authority they continued to exercise through their enforcement of the aukati.

From a Treaty perspective, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had a right to maintain their existing law and authority until they freely consented to change. They were also entitled to resist the Crown's efforts to construct the railway through their land for as long as they wished, because the Treaty had entitled them to deal with their lands as they pleased. They had enforced and maintained the aukati for this very reason. Bryce may have believed and initially acted as if the Crown had legal authority to do as it pleased, but he also acknowledged the reality that he could not do so without potentially provoking a forceful response.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, in their turn, signalled their intention to engage with the Crown's power of kāwanatanga, and in particular Parliament's lawmaking function, by asking for new and better laws for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands. The record of their discussions on 15 March suggested they would look to the Crown to use its lawmaking power to recognise and protect their tino rangatiratanga, including the external boundary of their territory. As noted, exactly what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would seek from Parliament remained a matter for further discussion. The mere fact of asking Parliament marked a significant departure from previous approaches by Kingitanga Māori to the protection of lands and tino rangatiratanga.

For all of these reasons, we characterise the March 1883 agreement as the first step toward a relationship that respected the dual spheres of kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga – it was an opportunity to demonstrate how these Treaty principles might be given practical effect in this district. Although neither party might have declared it as such at the time, in constitutional terms this is what the agreement entailed. It marked a new beginning in the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. The specific agreement was that the Crown's exploratory survey could continue, but both parties acknowledged this was a first step only: the Crown could not go further without returning to negotiations, and the outcome of those negotiations would depend on its willingness to recognise and protect the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Exactly what Ngāti Maniapoto and other Te Rohe Pōtae iwi would seek would be set out in their petition to Parliament later in the year.

8.4 THE JUNE 1883 PETITION AND THE GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSE

In the months following the March 1883 agreement, the parties moved to put their understanding of the agreement into effect. Two actions were significant. In June 1883, four iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae – Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and hapū and iwi of northern Whanganui – submitted a petition to the Crown setting out what they sought from the Crown in return for their consent to the railway. The essence of their petition was that they wanted the Crown to honour their Treaty rights, in particular their rights to possess and exercise authority over land. To this end, they asked the Government to keep the Native Land Court and its associated 'evils' out of their district, and they asked Parliament to enact new land laws under which they could determine land ownership among themselves, and owners could lease land in an open market, while sales would be prohibited. These were very significant requests. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were presenting the Crown with the opportunity to use its lawmaking powers in a manner that recognised and gave practical effect to their Treaty rights, most particularly their rights to self-determination with respect to land.

The Crown was already considering proposals to establish native committees and introduce modest reforms to the Native Land Court. It decided that these were a sufficient response to the petition.<sup>266</sup> The reforms in question were the Native Committees Act 1883, which provided for the establishment of district native committees with limited powers to consider land title issues and adjudicate civil disputes; and the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883, which made some modifications to the operation of the Native Land Court. From the claimants' perspective, the Crown's response failed to meet the demands set out in the June 1883 petition.<sup>267</sup> Neither Act effectively empowered Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine title to their own lands or to administer their lands and territories as they wished.<sup>268</sup>

The Crown regarded the petition, and the Crown's response, as initial steps on which further negotiation would be needed. Crown counsel submitted that the Government in 1883 considered the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 and the Native Committees Act 1883 to be 'appropriate responses to the requests made in the petition.'<sup>269</sup> The Native Committees Act in particular was an 'adequate initial step', which 'reflected some of the requests of the petition', achieving 'what was practicable in the circumstances.'<sup>270</sup> Crown counsel also submitted that Te Rohe Pōtae acknowledged these Acts as 'steps towards' meeting their objectives, which they accepted as a sufficient basis for future discussion.<sup>271</sup>

8.4.1 The railway survey begins and Hursthouse is stopped, March 1883

In the immediate period following the 16 March 1883 agreement, the parties moved to put their understandings of it into action. Bryce returned to Auckland, leaving final arrangements to be negotiated between the Crown's agent in the district, George Wilkinson, and the rangatira. The newspapers had reported that the survey would go ahead during the week beginning 18 March 1883, and this is what occurred.

On 18 March, according to the New Zealand Herald, Wahanui sent 'a messenger forward to Mokau' to inform Māori along the route that they should 'allow the survey to proceed through to Taranaki.'<sup>272</sup> On the same day, Wetere visited Wilkinson, saying he would be leaving for Mōkau within two days and proposed to take Hursthouse with him.<sup>273</sup> Wetere returned to Wilkinson's home the following evening (19 March) confirming that he would be leaving early in the morning

---

266. The Native Affairs Committee, in considering the petition, recommended that it be given favourable consideration during consideration of these Bills (AJHR, 1883, 1-2, p 9). Subsequently, Bryce argued that the enactment of these measures had addressed all of the concerns set out in the petition: 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

267. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 15.

268. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 16.

269. Submission 3.4.301, p 44.

270. Submission 3.4.301, p 47.

271. Submission 3.4.301, p 50.

272. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 19 March 1883, p 2; doc A78, p 781. Hataraka later reported that Wahanui had messaged his brother, Te Taratu, who lived at Ōtorohanga, telling him not to interfere with Hursthouse: 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

273. Document A78(a), vol 2, p 550.

from Wahanui's home in Te Kōpua, and expected Hursthouse to travel with him. Weterere told Wilkinson that Wahanui agreed with this arrangement. Wilkinson reported that he would accompany Hursthouse as far as Te Kōpua to 'satisfy myself that Wahanui is willing for them to start tomorrow and that there is no soreness through change of . . . arrangement'. He also reported that he would take along another surveyor, Laurence Cussen, in the hope of persuading Wahanui to allow the erection of trig stations on Kakepuku and adjacent hills.<sup>274</sup>

Wilkinson's memorandum suggests that Bryce was pushing ahead earlier than Wahanui and the other rangatira had previously anticipated. As noted in section 8.3.3, Hataraka's account was that Wahanui asked Bryce to wait two weeks after the 16 March hui, so that communities could be informed and consulted, whereas Bryce interpreted the agreement as allowing the survey to proceed within days.<sup>275</sup> The decision to go ahead in this way placed Wahanui in a difficult position. He and other Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira had not yet had the opportunity to fully consult their people, and both Tāwhiao and Taonui were absent (Tāwhiao was visiting Napier as part of his goodwill tour and was expected back in early April, while Taonui was still away marking the boundary).<sup>276</sup> But, notwithstanding the Government's wish to press ahead more quickly than had been agreed, Wahanui and Weterere showed they were willing to honour their side of the agreement. There is no conclusive evidence of them objecting to the railway survey beginning earlier than they had previously anticipated; indeed, arrangements between Wilkinson and the rangatira seem to have proceeded relatively smoothly, as shown by Weterere's offer to escort Hursthouse.<sup>277</sup>

On 20 March, Wilkinson set out from Alexandra for Wahanui's house at Te Kōpua, accompanied by Hursthouse, Newsham, and Cussen. Hursthouse and Newsham then set off with Weterere and about 20 other Māori.<sup>278</sup> Wilkinson and Cussen remained behind to speak with Wahanui about the trig stations.<sup>279</sup> The fact that the Government was seeking Wahanui's consent suggests that Bryce and Wilkinson knew the 16 March 1883 agreement did not include trig surveys, regardless of what Bryce had put in his letter.

Prior to this meeting, Wilkinson had warned Bryce that trig surveys would most likely be 'objected to for a short time', and that 'letting Mr Hursthouse thro[ugh] is as much as Wahanui will take upon himself', especially in the absence of Taonui, who was 'acknowledged to be the largest landowner in the Dist[ri]ct'.<sup>280</sup>

---

274. Wilkinson to Bryce, 20 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 555–556). The word between 'change of' and 'arrangement' is illegible.

275. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2.

276. Document A78, p 784.

277. Hataraka suggested that Wahanui had been unhappy at the departure date being brought forward, and so had refused to provide an escort: Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2. But this is not consistent with the other evidence, which shows that Weterere proceeded to escort Hursthouse into the district, and that (as Hataraka acknowledged) Weterere and Wahanui assisted Hursthouse when he was stopped at Te Uira.

278. Document A78(a), vol 2, p 560.

279. Document A78, p 783.

280. Wilkinson to Bryce, 20 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 556–557).

Nonetheless, Wilkinson tried, and Wahanui told him in clear terms that no survey would be permitted except for the railway exploration until Taonui and his party had returned and matters had been discussed among the people. According to Wilkinson, Wahanui ‘almost guarantee[d]’ that once the party had resumed and a hui had been held, ‘everything will be settled and there will be no need for further delay’. Wahanui was ‘quite clear about the surveys himself but wishes his people to have a voice in settling the matter.’<sup>281</sup>

8.4.1.1 Te Mahuki and his seizure of Hursthouse

The first few hours of Hursthouse’s journey with Wetere were uneventful. The group stopped for lunch at Ōtorohanga, meeting the same group that had stopped Hursthouse less than a week earlier.<sup>282</sup> They were glad the matter was resolved, but rather ominously, the chief Aporo said that though Ōtorohanga was one ‘parlour’, Te Uira (where the path branched off to Mōkau, near Te Kumi, north of Te Kūiti) was another.<sup>283</sup>

Later that afternoon, Hursthouse and the entire party accompanying him were stopped at Te Uira by the spiritual leader Te Mahuki of Ngāti Kinohaku and Ngāti Maniapoto and members of his movement, Tekau-ma-rua (see sidebar, section 7.4.3.1). Te Mahuki knew Hursthouse from Parihaka, where he and others of Ngāti Kinohaku had lived during the 1870s. Hursthouse had had a variety of roles in the Taranaki region, including surveyor, interpreter, and roading engineer. In November 1881, when Bryce led the invasion of Parihaka, Hursthouse had been involved in dispersing people from the village. He was subsequently a prosecution witness against Te Whiti, Tohu, and other Parihaka leaders.<sup>284</sup> Te Mahuki had returned to Te Kumi and established his Tekau-ma-rua community there after serving a prison sentence in Dunedin for his part, alongside many other Parihaka residents, in ploughing and fencing the Waimate Plains in defiance of the government survey.<sup>285</sup>

When they came upon Te Mahuki’s group, Wetere attempted to protect Hursthouse and Newsham as a heated argument broke out. This became a violent scuffle during which Wetere, his brother Te Rangī, and a third person from Wetere’s party, Te Haere, were all forced from their horses. Wetere determined it would be best to submit.<sup>286</sup> Te Mahuki’s people took Hursthouse and Newsham prisoner and led them back to Te Kumi. Wetere and his men followed, though one was sent to report to Wahanui, and Wetere himself followed the next day.<sup>287</sup>

281. Wilkinson to Bryce, 20 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 560–561).

282. Document A78, pp 782–783; doc A110, p 641.

283. ‘The Outbreak in King Country’, New Zealand Herald, 28 March 1883, p 5 (doc A78, p 783).

284. Document A78, pp 548–549; doc A110, p 625.

285. Document A110, p 641.

286. Document A78, p 785; doc A110, pp 641–642.

287. Marr thoroughly describes events, from Hursthouse setting off on 20 March, through to Te Mahuki and others being tried and jailed: doc A78, pp 781–821; see also doc A110, pp 641–643; doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 558–559, 564.

Hursthouse and Newsham were held for two days. Their outer clothes and boots were removed, leaving them in their shirts and trousers. Their feet were chained, and their hands tied behind their backs. They were not fed on the first night, and when they were offered food the next day their hands remained tied behind their backs despite requests to have them tied in front so they could feed themselves. They were locked in an old cookhouse, together with Te Haere, who had been injured in the previous day's scuffle. In effect, Te Mahuki was treating them as he and other Parihaka prisoners had been treated, although Te Haere did not have his hands or feet bound.<sup>288</sup>

When Wahanui learned of the situation, he contacted Wilkinson telling the Government to take no action and leave matters to him.<sup>289</sup> Wilkinson contacted Bryce (who was in Auckland), and Bryce agreed. Wahanui and Weterere then set about resolving the situation. Weterere sent messages to settlements along the Mōkau River calling for men to assemble at Te Uira, and Wahanui, meanwhile, sent messages to Waikato, asking that they withdraw anyone who was supporting Te Mahuki, and not send anyone in. The plan was for Weterere to return to Te Uira to secure the release of Hursthouse and Newsham, while Wahanui would go only as far as Ōtorohanga and monitor events from there, intervening only if needed.<sup>290</sup> This, according to Marr, was '[i]n deference to Weterere's status in the locality, and his leadership of the group taking the surveyors'. Weterere and Wahanui both assured Wilkinson that Hursthouse and Newsham would be safe.<sup>291</sup>

The reinforcements – who numbered about 150 and included Aporo from Ōtorohanga and Te Kooti and some of his men – arrived at Te Kumi on 22 March, two days after Hursthouse and Newsham had been taken. Upon arriving, Weterere's force tied up some of the Tekau-ma-rua people in the way their prisoners had been, but reports from the time suggest there was no bloodshed. Hursthouse and Newsham were taken to Te Kūiti and looked after there.<sup>292</sup> According to Hataraka's account, Wahanui's brother, Te Taratu from Ōtorohanga, was also present and was responsible for liberating Hursthouse.<sup>293</sup>

8.4.1.2 The hui to decide Te Mahuki's fate

On 24 March, a large hui to decide what to do about Te Mahuki was hosted at Te Kooti's carved house in Te Kūiti, Tokanganui-a-noho. Te Mahuki attended with about 100 of his followers (men, women, and children), as well as Weterere, Taonui (who had now returned from marking the external boundary), and government agent Wilkinson.<sup>294</sup> Wahanui, as noted above, had chosen not to attend unless needed.

288. Document A78, pp 785–786, 790.

289. Document A78(a), vol 2, pp 558–559.

290. Document A78(a), vol 2, pp 564–567; doc A78, pp 786–787.

291. Document A78, p 787.

292. Document A78, pp 788–789, 792.

293. 'Opening the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 14 May 1883, p 2.

294. Document A78, pp 795–796.

The hui began with much discussion, led by Taonui, of his work marking out the boundaries of lands remaining under Māori authority. The only surviving account was made by Wilkinson, who found it ‘rather annoying’ that Taonui was delaying the discussion about Te Mahuki. He recorded no detail about the boundaries, and at one point attempted to interrupt Taonui and move the discussion on, before Weterere stopped him. In taking this approach, he seems to have grasped nothing of the importance of Taonui’s mission, being either unaware or uninterested in the significance of the boundary.<sup>295</sup>

When the hui eventually turned to the business of Hursthouse’s seizure, Te Mahuki gave an angry and critical speech that slated Hursthouse, Wilkinson, Bryce, the Government, Pākehā in general, the rangatira who had cooperated with Bryce, and even Te Kooti for taking what he called a ‘false pardon’.<sup>296</sup> Te Mahuki was especially furious that Bryce, under the West Coast Peace Preservation Act 1882, had prohibited him from returning to Parihaka. However, Te Mahuki also wanted to make amends. He was willing to submit to the Ngāti Maniapoto leaders and would not offer any further opposition to Hursthouse continuing his journey.<sup>297</sup>

The various leaders at the hui agreed that they would take no further action against Te Mahuki: he had already been sufficiently punished; his offence had been satisfied when the captives were rescued and some of the Tekau-ma-rua were treated the way the surveyors had been. The hui also accepted that Te Mahuki would offer no further opposition to the survey, and the matter was considered closed. This was not a unanimous decision: some present, including Weterere, wanted Te Mahuki and others handed over to government authorities, to be dealt with by Pākehā law. But the majority, influenced by Te Wharo, preferred to deal with Te Mahuki under their own laws.<sup>298</sup>

This was not what the Government wanted. Bryce had telegraphed Wilkinson the day before the hui demanding that the chiefs hand Te Mahuki and the others who had captured Hursthouse over to him. He would not tolerate leniency. Bryce noted he was thankful to the rangatira – Wahanui, Te Rerenga, and Te Kooti – for rescuing Hursthouse and Newsham. However, he said that though he had ‘stood aside’ while Wahanui took action, he had never agreed that Ngāti Maniapoto would determine ‘whether the law should be vindicated or not’. He could not ignore Te Mahuki’s ‘gross and flagrant outrage’. If Te Mahuki was not handed over he would prepare to ‘act for myself’. He argued that it would be easier for Ngāti Maniapoto to satisfy him now, by bringing in some of the culprits, than leaving it to him to ‘take action myself’; and he went further, saying a surrender would be

295. Wilkinson to Bryce, 24 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 600–601); also see doc A78, pp 796–797.

296. Wilkinson to Bryce, 25 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, p 624).

297. Document A78, p 798.

298. Document A78, p 799.

better for ‘the Maori people’ and for the Government, ‘otherwise complications may arise.’<sup>299</sup>

Unmoved by Bryce’s threats, the rangatira stayed the course they had chosen. In coming to this decision, they were once again demonstrating their authority within the district. While they could debate about whether Pākehā law might apply in this case, the choice was theirs, and the decision, ultimately, was that their own laws would apply with no involvement from the Government. The Government, in turn, was powerless to act, unless it was prepared to risk armed intervention in the district. Wahanui reinforced this message by sending Bryce a telegram on 24 March telling him not to worry about Tekau-ma-rua – he (Wahanui) was working to bring about a satisfactory conclusion.<sup>300</sup>

Nevertheless, very soon afterwards Bryce was able to capture Te Mahuki and others from Tekau-ma-rua. Te Mahuki had made it known at the Te Kūiti hui that he would be crossing the aukati and going to Alexandra, apparently in an attempt to signal his defiance of colonial authority. Bryce, on hearing of these plans, had sent the Te Awamutu cavalry to join the Alexandra armed constabulary, creating a force of nearly 100 men.<sup>301</sup> On 26 March, Te Mahuki and some of his people rode into Alexandra. The group was unarmed but confrontational.<sup>302</sup> Twenty-seven Tekau-ma-rua protestors were arrested, including four boys who were eventually let go. The party offered no resistance. The 23 who remained (who included five more boys and two elderly men) seemed similarly unconcerned when they were tried in the Supreme Court on 5 and 6 April, where they variously faced assault-related charges – some related to the Hursthouse incident, and some to the Alexandra confrontation – and ‘creating a riot, rout and tumult.’<sup>303</sup>

The 23 defendants were found guilty and received sentences ranging from six to 12 months, some with hard labour.<sup>304</sup> Bryce got the outcome he sought, but without Wahanui’s direct support. Just as Bryce had understood that he could not arrest Te Mahuki within the aukati without risking a return to violence, Wahanui understood he could not have protected Te Mahuki beyond the aukati without taking the same risk.<sup>305</sup> Nor did Te Mahuki’s imprisonment signal the end of his influence: he continued to rail against the forces of colonisation until his death in 1899.<sup>306</sup>

8.4.2 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agree to petition the Government, April 1883

On the basis of Wahanui’s handling of the Hursthouse incident it was hoped that the interrupted exploratory survey would now be able to continue unimpeded.

299. Bryce to Wilkinson, 23 March 1883 (doc A78(a), vol 2, pp 595–597); doc A78, pp 788, 794, 800.

300. Document A78(a), vol 2, pp 613–614.

301. Document A78, pp 799, 801–803.

302. Document A78, pp 803–804.

303. Document A78, pp 805–806, 808, 811.

304. Document A78, pp 808–813.

305. Document A78, p 806.

306. Document A78, pp 813–815.

However, the support of all communities throughout Te Rohe Pōtae could not be taken for granted. The next large hui was planned for Te Kūiti, to begin on 10 April, at which Wahanui and other chiefs were expected to seek agreement to the proposals that were set out in their 16 March 1883 letter to Bryce. Before the hui, Wahanui sought to soothe the concerns of Kīngitanga supporters from the Waikato and elsewhere, who regarded the 16 March agreement as breaching the aukati and who were unhappy at the arrest of Te Mahuki.<sup>307</sup>

Bryce indicated his intention to resume the exploratory survey in late March. He sought visits with Te Kooti, Rewi, Taonui, and Wahanui to discuss the survey, as well as matters related to the trials of Te Mahuki and his Tekau-ma-rua followers. By this time, he had decided that the completion of the exploratory survey should be more akin to a ministerial visit. He would accompany Hursthouse, thereby completing his long-planned trip across the territory to Mōkau.<sup>308</sup> The trip would be undertaken by a substantially expanded group, including a variety of officials, surveyors, and newspaper correspondents.<sup>309</sup>

Taonui – who had by then been updated about what had happened while he was away – had asked Bryce to wait a while for his response. He wrote to Bryce on 9 April giving his support for the railway survey, but by this time Bryce was already on his way to Alexandra with the surveyors to prepare for the journey to Mōkau.<sup>310</sup> In his response to Taonui, Bryce described his proposed trip as an act of friendship:

Taku haere i to whenua ki Taranaki . . . hei tohu aroha moku kia koutou ko to iwi. E watea ana nga wahi pakeha o Niu Tireni hei Haerenga mo koutou ko o hoa, a kia pena ano te watea o to whenua hei Haeranga moku me oku hoa . . . mau ma Ngatimaniapoto te tikanga kia pai toku haere kia kua hoki ahau e whakaraaurau.

My journey through your land to Taranaki . . . is intended to be a mark of friendship to you and your tribe. The European portion of New Zealand is open for you and your friends to travel in and with your part of the country should in like manner be open for me and my friends . . . It is for you and the Ngāti Maniapoto tribe to see that my way is peaceful.<sup>311</sup>

Bryce said nothing about his plans to open Mōkau lands for settlement. Wahanui's response to the proposed journey was somewhat muted. According to the New Zealand Herald, Wahanui was 'in a sense favourable': though he had not 'formally invited' Bryce to travel the territory, he would 'offer no objection'.

307. Document A78, pp 822–826, 829.

308. Document A78, pp 826–829, 831, 836–837.

309. Document A78, pp 836–837, 839.

310. Document A78, pp 836–840.

311. Letters, draft and te reo copies, Bryce to Taonui, not dated (doc A110, p 643; doc A78, pp 838–839).

According to the Herald's correspondent, Wetere was the only one of the chiefs consulted who directly invited Bryce to make the trip.<sup>312</sup>

8.4.2.1 Wahanui's 'manifesto'

About this time, newspapers began publishing what was described as Wahanui's 'manifesto' – a letter submitted via a third party and dated 5 April 1883.<sup>313</sup> While doubt was cast on its authenticity by an unidentified Auckland source, it seems that the letter was indeed penned by Wahanui.

Wahanui's 'Manifesto', April 1883

Te reo Māori text

Te Waonui-a-Tane, Aperira, 1883. E to motu nei! E te ao nei! Titiro kattooa [sic] mai! Na te manu aute e rere atu na, kite kawē atu i enei mahi e rua, he Minita he Roia; he akiaki ta teteahi, he rai tangata ta tetetu, tene e te iwi he aha ra ta koutou? he akiaki mai i enei e rua kia raru ai te tangata raua ko te whenua mete kuku, ne? Ka pai to mahi ete Paraihe ne? E nga hoa kati, e tau ki raru, waiho ra kia taka te ahuru, a ka taka ano Tera pea koutou e mea mai he mea wha ka aro kau naku enei mamae tanga kao, rere; i kite ite paoa ote kawa e kake ana ite haitetanga ote hara. No konei ahau i mea atu ai, kaati koa, hanga paitia tatou kia piri ai kite piringa pono, haunga nga piringa raweke ma konei tatou karanga ai, e hoa, e hoa, tena koe, tena koe, nga hua tenei o te mahi pai. E rua enei he raumati he ahu, he hotoke, nga hua ote raumati he aha, he aha, e mau ana tona tangata ko uruao, koti hotoke tenei tona tukunga iho, he whare ri tona tangata ko Takurua hupenui tena e koro ma ko tewheo o enei hei tohunga ma koutou? Ko Uruao ranei? Ko takurua ranei? Kite tohu koutou ita koutou e tohu ai, me tuku mai e koutou kia au i te Waonui-a-Tane kia karangatia ai koutou e apa e pa. Na koti toru tenei o aku marama i mahara ai toku wairua kia whiti tera i tona koko uri tanga, kite rore e mahia paitia, tena to mahi e Takurua hupe nui. He whare ri, he whare ri. E hoa ma kei potatu te Mahi Rawanatanga [sic], otiia kia marama te whaka haere kei koro, e ai tate ki tapu. – Heoti ano na to kouto hoa hei kona ra.

The New Zealand Herald's translation

Te Waonui-a-Tane, April 5, 1883 – Oh, people of this Island! Oh, people of this world! All of you look this way. Behold a kite (made of aute bark) flies towards you, bearing you these two things – the Government for one and the lawyers for another. The 312. 'The Journey of Mr Bryce through the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 14 April 1883. This was the first in a series of detailed articles, written by a 'special correspondent', probably one of the journalists who accompanied Bryce's party.

313. Document A41, pp 72–73; doc A78, pp 826–829; doc A110, pp 643–645.

first goads, and the latter devours men. Now, I ask the public what is yours? Is it backing these two up so that evil should happen to men, to the land, and also to the world? You have done a grand thing, Mr Bryce; have you not? Oh, my friend, cease, cease! Settle yourself down, and let us have time so that our minds may be settled, and it will be settled. Perhaps you will think that these grievances are all imaginings of mine? No; because I saw the smoke of bitterness rising as the evils went forth, therefore I say to you, Cease, try and conduct us in a proper way, so that we may be bound together, not by a treacherous bond but by a bond of faith. By doing this we shall be able to say to each other, Friend, friend, greetings to you, greetings to you, as these are the fruits of good works. Take summer and winter for example. The fruits of summer are numerous, and particularly you have sweet and pleasant weather; but in winter, when you see the skies overcast, you will say it is going to be stormy weather; for in winter the weather is cold and stormy. Now, I ask you, elders, which of these will you choose? Will it be the sweet and pleasant weather of summer, or the cold and stormy weather of winter? When you have chosen, let me know at the Waonui-a-Tane, so that we may be able to call you, Aba, Father. Now, I have been three months considering within me, so that the sun may shine forth from its obscurity; but if we do not conduct things in a proper way, the winter weather will set in; it will be stormy weather – stormy. Oh, my friends, do not be too hasty in your work of government; but be judicious in your management, lest we fail, for such is the sacred word. – That is all from your friend. – Farewell.<sup>1</sup>

The Tribunal's translation of key passages

You are doing good work Bryce, are you? Friends, that is enough, wait until there is peace and it will come. Perhaps you are thinking that I have just thought about these pains [alternatively: difficulties, or painful difficulties], now, as time went on I saw the smoke of bitterness rising, when the sins went away. That is why I am saying do things right, so we are brought together in a faithful partnership [alternatively: a close and truthful relationship – piringa meaning 'close relationship' and pono meaning 'truthful'], leave aside partnerships built on bad faith. By following this idea – oh friend, oh friend, greetings to you, greetings to you – these will be the fruits of good intentions. . . .

Now, this is the third occasion that I have thought about the sun rising and moving towards darkness if matters are not handled well, and then a winter of running noses will prevail. A protected house, a protected house. ['Takurua hupe nui', winter of running noses, refers to the bleakness of winter as a time for taking shelter indoors, of sickness and shortage or scarcity] . . .

Oh my friends, do not be too hasty in your work of government, but be judicious in your management, lest we fail, in accordance with the sacred word.

---

1. Te reo Māori and translation taken from the New Zealand Herald, 11 April 1883, p6 (doc A110, pp 644–645).

The rather metaphorical letter (dated 5 April) began with a critique of the harm that had befallen the people and the land as a result of the Government and the law, which he described as a 'kite' flying towards the North Island, and Te Rohe Pōtae in particular.

A significant portion of the letter appealed to Bryce to slow the pace of proceedings. Wahanui issued a challenge to Bryce: 'Ka pai to mahi e te Paraihe ne?' ('You are doing good work Bryce, are you?'). He asked Bryce to 'waiho ra kia taka te ahuru, a ka taka ano' ('wait until there is peace and it will come'). Most importantly, Wahanui's challenge to Bryce was to conduct matters in a way that is 'right' ('No konei ahau i mea atu ai, kaati koa'). If he were to do this, they would be brought together in 'te piringa pono' (a faithful partnership, which the New Zealand Herald translated as 'a bond of faith'). Wahanui added: 'haunga nga piringa raweke' ('they should leave aside partnerships based on bad faith, or 'treacherous bonds' in the Herald's translation). Wahanui's statements would tend to indicate that it was a partnership that had yet to be established: only through good works could they be brought together in that way.

Wahanui considered that if they did not conduct their work 'in a proper way', trouble would ensue, and called for the Government to be 'judicious' in its management. He added that the Government needed to conduct its business in accordance with 'te kī tapu' – the sacred word. Wahanui did not explain what he meant by this phrase, though a letter Rewi sent to the Government later in April revealed further clues as to its meaning (see section 8.4.3), as did the petition the tribes would send in June (section 8.4.5).

The New Zealand Herald agreed with Wahanui's call for proper conduct from the Government, stating that it was 'part of the duty of the Native Minister to take account of this feeling and to show the natives that their interests and welfare will be thoroughly secured.'<sup>314</sup>

8.4.2.2 The decision to send a petition

Meanwhile, the chiefs continued to meet and organise. The large hui set for Te Kūiti began on 10 April 1883 as planned and ran throughout the week.<sup>315</sup> The hui confirmed their support for Wahanui's strategy of conditional engagement with the Crown, including a petition seeking laws that would recognise and protect their lands and authority.

Reports at the time tended to describe the hui as a meeting of 'Ngatimaniapoto', and Ngāti Maniapoto leaders certainly set the agenda. We cannot be certain about attendance from other Te Rohe Pōtae tribes, because the remaining records reveal little about attendance. At the time, Ngāti Raukawa had Native Land Court business in Cambridge for lands beyond the aukati, and communities of both Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa had been hosting Tāwhiao on his goodwill tour. Short notice and severe flooding may also have affected people's ability to attend. It is known that at least two Tūhua chiefs were present – Hataraka (Ngāti Tama, 314. 'The King Country', New Zealand Herald, 11 April 1883, p 6 (doc A78, p 828).

315. Document A41, pp 72–76; doc A78, pp 840–847.

Ngāti Te Ika), and Ngatai Te Mamaku (Ngāti Hāua, Ngāti Hekeāwai).<sup>316</sup> We cannot be certain of attendance by rangatira from other tribes, but nor can we conclusively rule it out. Whether or not they attended, rangatira from Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa did sign the petition that eventuated.<sup>317</sup>

One of the specific issues that required the attention of those assembled for the hui was Bryce's proposed travel across the territory to Mōkau, which was presented as a resumption of the Hursthouse exploratory survey. There seems to have been some frustration at the pressure to provide an answer to Bryce who – by the time the meeting began – was already at Alexandra preparing to depart.<sup>318</sup> Nonetheless, the hui passed a resolution in favour of allowing Bryce to make his journey. According to the New Zealand Herald, he 'was not to be hindered or obstructed', but 'was not to be allowed to make any survey' until the district's leaders had decided how they wanted their lands to be dealt with.<sup>319</sup>

This was the broader question facing the hui: if Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were to open their district, as Bryce had asked, how could they protect their lands from the wholesale alienation and destruction of communal authority that had afflicted other districts. At the 10 January hui at Rewi's settlement, they had discussed the prospect of petitioning Parliament seeking better laws for their lands, and the Te Kūiti hui sought to flesh out the details of that petition, including questions about what laws they might regard as acceptable.<sup>320</sup>

Those who spoke at the hui were concerned with avoiding the expense and difficulty associated with the Native Land Court, and therefore with coming to some arrangement which would allow tribes and hapū to determine ownership among themselves.<sup>321</sup> The New Zealand Herald reported that they were 'afraid of the state of things which they have seen before their eyes in the proceedings of the . . . Court.'<sup>322</sup> Soon afterwards, in an editorial, the Herald said that they were 'willing to open the country' but wanted to do it 'in such a way as will be most beneficial to themselves': 'They do not want everything to be thrown into turmoil, and themselves all set by the ears, and engaged in a series of struggles in the Land Court.'<sup>323</sup>

Nor was the hui satisfied with any of the other options that were open to them under existing law. They 'would have nothing to do with' the Native Reserves Act 1882.<sup>324</sup> That Act provided for Māori to vest lands in the Crown, to be managed on their behalf by the Public Trustee, who was empowered to rent the lands for farming, mining, or building, and to manage the proceeds for the benefit of the owners. This was an early precursor to the system of Māori land councils and Māori land boards which would be set up after 1900 (which will be discussed in later chap-

316. Document H10 (Hikaia), p 6; submission 3.4.211, p 13.

317. Document A78, pp 840–841; doc A41, pp 73–75.

318. Document A78, pp 840–841; doc A41, pp 73–75.

319. 'The Native Meeting at Te Kuiti', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1883, p 5 (doc A41, pp 73–74).

320. Document A78, pp 840–841; doc A41, pp 73–75.

321. Document A41, p 74; doc A78, pp 843–844.

322. 'The Kingite Meeting at Te Kuiti', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1883 (doc A41, p 73).

323. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 17 April 1883, p 4 (doc A41, p 73).

324. 'The Native Meeting at Te Kuiti', New Zealand Herald, 19 April 1883, p 5.

ters). The Herald reported that Bryce hoped to bring the Act into operation in the King Country. Those at the hui were reportedly concerned that ‘if they gave a piece to the Government to deal with, that Ministers would issue a proclamation tying up a large district.’<sup>325</sup> They were also concerned with ensuring that land remained under communal control, and that there was no encroachment from settlers before satisfactory laws were in place, and before they had been able to determine ownership among themselves.<sup>326</sup> According to Robert Ormsby junior, who sent an account to the New Zealand Herald:

[I]t was decided to send a petition praying Government to pass an Act preventing unprincipled persons selling land, prohibiting surveys and prospecting for minerals within the defined boundary, until such times as they shall have settled their landed tribal claims.<sup>327</sup>

If the Government granted what the petitioners wanted, Ormsby said, the rangatira at the hui would be ‘willing to allow the necessary public works to proceed at once, such as trig survey, constructing railway line, and main road only’. Those leaders were ‘struggling between doubts and suspicions at the present mode of securing titles’:

The encroaching tide of immigration and land speculation, the protracted and tire-some hearing of cases in Court, have induced the natives to adopt the plan they have done. Ought they be discouraged from forming a plan by which they could settle their disputes before applying to the Native Land Court for titles?<sup>328</sup>

The rangatira were ‘doing their utmost . . . to bring about an amicable settlement between the two races, and impress the different tribes with the necessity of preserving their lands, so that in future they may not become landless and paupers.’<sup>329</sup>

Soon afterwards, the surveyor Laurence Cussen reported to his superiors that ‘the four tribes that own the land in the “King Country” had agreed to united action, under which they would defer all surveys until they had found a way to avoid the court and associated land losses. Wahanui, Cussen said, had made clear that the trig survey could proceed only once Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had settled matters among themselves. Wilkinson reported to his superiors along similar lines, but described these decisions as representing Ngāti Maniapoto views.’<sup>330</sup>

Some reports suggested that Tāwhiao intended to attend the hui. However, although he was reportedly on his way home from Taupō on 9 April, he did not make it. Rather, he stopped at Oruanui for several days, then went on to the Ngāti Raukawa settlement at Waotu on 17 April. The people of Waotu were then 325. ‘The Native Meeting at Te Kuiti’, New Zealand Herald, 19 April 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 73).

326. Document A41, pp 72–74; doc A78, pp 843–834.

327. ‘The Natives and their Lands’, New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1883, p 6 (doc A41, p 74).

328. ‘The Natives and their Lands’, New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1883, p 6.

329. ‘The Natives and their Lands’, New Zealand Herald, 12 May 1883, p 6.

330. Cussen to assistant surveyor-general, 5 May 1883 (doc A41, pp 74–75); doc A41, p 76.

entangled in various Native Land Court proceedings at Cambridge, which is where Tāwhiao went next, spending a few days before finally heading to Whatiwhatihoe from Cambridge on 20 April, by which time the Te Kūiti hui was over.<sup>331</sup>

It is not clear why Tāwhiao stayed away. Weather, including flooding, may have played its part. It is also possible that, having stepped back from negotiations with the Government, he was giving Wahanui, Taonui, and other traditional land-owners the space to make suitable arrangements to protect their land. We do know that after he reached Whatiwhatihoe he was briefed about the events that had occurred during his absence, including Te Mahuki's actions, by Te Wheoro and other rangatira.<sup>332</sup> But we do not know whether he met with Wahanui, Rewi, or any of the other Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira after his tour. Tāwhiao did not stop for long at Whatiwhatihoe, leaving for Kāwhia by 25 April, where he was briefed about Bryce's February visit. Within weeks of arriving at Kāwhia, Tāwhiao left again, this time to tour Thames and the Bay of Plenty. He did not return until mid-June, just as Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira were preparing to submit their petition.<sup>333</sup>

8.4.3 Bryce's journey to Mōkau, April–May 1883

While the Te Kūiti hui progressed from 10–17 April 1883, Bryce and his party remained in Alexandra, hampered by weather that caused flooding and poor travelling conditions. The party that had gathered to accompany Bryce somewhat resembled the group that had travelled with him from Kāwhia to Alexandra two months earlier: his private secretary, Butler; under-secretary of the Native Department, T W Lewis; the government agent Wilkinson; the three surveyors Hursthouse, Newsham, and Cussen, assisted by a chainman; two armed troopers (or 'orderlies'); and two or three newspaper reporters.<sup>334</sup>

8.4.3.1 Bryce meets Wahanui and Taonui

Bryce did not wait for word from the hui as to whether or not he should continue. He simply left Alexandra on the morning of 16 April 1883, while the hui was continuing, and before the resolution was passed authorising his journey. The party reached Ōtorohanga in the afternoon and stopped there for the night. On their way, near Te Kōpua, they were stopped by two chiefs who questioned their intentions before allowing them to continue. That evening, a small deputation from the Te Kūiti hui arrived at Ōtorohanga, bringing news that Bryce's group could proceed. The next day, Bryce and his party left Ōtorohanga and were met at Te Uira by Wetere. Informing them that he would escort them to Mōkau, Wetere took the party to Te Kūiti to spend the night.<sup>335</sup>

It is unclear whether the end of the hui at Te Kūiti and Bryce's arrival there were coincidental, or if in fact Bryce's arrival forced the hui to a close. Nevertheless,

331. Document A78, pp 829–833.

332. 'Native News', Waikato Times, 24 April 1883, p 2.

333. Document A78, pp 833–836.

334. Document A78, pp 847–848.

335. Document A78, pp 848–849; 'The Native Meeting at Te Kuiti', New Zealand Herald, 19 April 1883, p 5.

the assembled leaders now turned their attention to greeting Bryce. Taonui was the first to address the party when they were welcomed to the marae. He assured them that their trip to Mōkau would be safe and also reminded Bryce of the conditions imposed on 16 March: the surveyors could explore a possible railway route but 'looking neither to the right, left, or behind'.<sup>336</sup> By using this language, Taonui reminded Bryce of his own commitment to do nothing else towards construction of the railway without first returning to seek consent. Bryce replied that his journey was a 'friendly one', assuring Taonui that he had 'nothing in my heart that is hidden from you'.<sup>337</sup>

During the evening, and the next morning, Wahanui and Taonui reportedly had several conversations with Bryce. Most reports give little or no detail of what they talked about, or of who else may have been present, though the Wanganui Herald did provide some detail, reporting that Wahanui was concerned that other Europeans – in particular prospectors – might follow Bryce into the district.<sup>338</sup> According to Marr, some rangatira present were also concerned that the amnesty had only limited effect; in particular, Ngatai Te Mamaku was concerned about whether he would be protected over his role in the killing of Moffatt (section 7.3.3.6). This may have been because of the capture of Te Mahuki after Ngāti Maniapoto had decided not to turn him over. Bryce reportedly gave no assurances on this point.<sup>339</sup>

Hataraka, in his comments to the Wanganui Herald about the 16 April agreement, also described this hui. His account implied that Wahanui had been angered by Bryce's insistence on pushing ahead with the railway exploration in a premature manner. Bryce had now done this three times – first, on 8 March 1883 when he ordered Hursthouse into the district without first seeking permission; secondly, when he asked Hursthouse to return to the district within days of the 16 March agreement, when Wahanui and others believed they had longer to complete their negotiations; and, thirdly, when Bryce himself entered the district on 16 April without waiting for permission from the Te Kūiti hui.

Marr suggested that Wahanui had been angered not by the railway survey, but by renewed attempts by Bryce to restart the trig survey.<sup>340</sup> The surveyor general's annual report to Parliament reported that some trig surveys had been completed early in 1883, but only around Kāwhia.<sup>341</sup> But Bryce, in December 1883, said he had 'ordered a trig survey to be made' while he was at Te Kūiti, and that Wahanui and Taonui had objected because they 'did not understand it'. Bryce said he had refused to give them any assurances at the time, because he did not want it thought that he had given in only because he was in Māori territory, but 'when I reached Waitara, I ordered it to stop until I came here again'.<sup>342</sup>

336. New Zealand Times, 21 April 1883 (doc A78, p 849).

337. New Zealand Herald, 23 April 1883 (doc A41, p 73).

338. 'Progress of Mr Bryce', Wanganui Herald, 21 April 1883, p 3; doc A78, p 850.

339. Document A78, pp 849–850.

340. Document A78, p 852.

341. 'Surveys of New Zealand: Report for 1882–83', AJHR, 1883, C-2, p 12.

342. 'The Native Minister in the Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

The fullest account of the meeting was by Hataraka. In his version of events, there was considerable tension, with Wahanui threatening to ruin Bryce's career by keeping him out of the district, and Bryce acknowledging – once again – that he had no practical power in the district, being unable to enforce law or build roads, or even enter the district, without Wahanui's consent. Hataraka recorded the following exchange:

Wahanui said: 'Do not think I will open my mouth to speak words to you, Mr Bryce. All I have to say is, you can go your way now, but do not think I have given you the road or right of way. No, that I keep for myself, and the right to act as I judge best. But now (here Wahanui held up the forefingers of each of his hands), look here: see here are two kings, which of the two is yours?'

Mr Bryce remained silent, and spoke not one word.

Wahanui: 'You, Mr Bryce, are a Minister. I want to know a Minister of what or for what?'

Mr Bryce: 'A Native Minister for the Natives.'

Wahanui: 'You are wrong, for your laws are hard all over the island; therefore it is I say that the only chance you see of being saved is to come here to me. You are in fear of your position, and you come to me to protect yourself, and to be saved from the Parliament. Now if I choose to throw you down I could do so now; but I will not, as you are here residing with me. But I will take you to your Parliament at Wellington, and throw you, Bryce, down there before all people, the white as well as the dark, so that all men may judge between us.'

Mr Bryce remained silent.<sup>343</sup>

Later, when Bryce was ready to leave for Mōkau, Hataraka recalled him saying:

Wahanui, all our talk is ended, and if any other European comes after me on this road, he does so of his own accord. I have nothing to do with it, and if anyone says after me that he is coming to catch murderers, I have no part in that, the responsibility is not mine.<sup>344</sup>

Wahanui responded, somewhat enigmatically: 'I will break your head with my fist.' Marr took this as a warning to Bryce to honour what he had agreed, or face consequences. Bryce, according to Hataraka, left in haste, making no reply.<sup>345</sup>

8.4.3.2 Bryce at Mōkau

On 18 April 1883, Bryce's party left Te Kūiti and arrived at the upper Mōkau settlement of Totoro late that afternoon. They were hosted by the chiefs Te Aria and Te Wharo and declined an invitation to stay an extra day to try the tuna for which the area was famed. Instead, the next morning, Wilkinson parted company with the 343. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2 (doc A78, p 851).

---

344. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2; (doc A78, p 851).

345. 'Mr Bryce in the King Country', Wanganui Herald, 12 May 1883, p 2; (doc A78, p 851).

main group and returned to Alexandra. While the others were preparing to leave, Māori from throughout the district arrived to welcome the official party. Bryce's journey was momentous, being the first time any Cabinet Minister had travelled the route to Mōkau since the wars.<sup>346</sup>

The exploratory party (which now consisted of eight Pākehā and 17 Māori) soon left Totoro, and headed down the Mōkau River aboard two canoes, in what was described as a 'very pleasant but occasionally perilous passage'.<sup>347</sup> At the Mōkau Heads, they were challenged by the chief Takirau, who questioned Wetere about breaching the aukati. Wetere replied that the trip had been approved, and Takirau seemed satisfied with a letter from Wahanui that Wetere gave him. The officials stayed the night at Wetere's settlement and departed the next morning (20 April 1883) for Waitara, where they arrived that evening and received something of a hero's welcome.<sup>348</sup>

The public welcome at Waitara presented the first of several opportunities associated with the Mōkau trip at which Bryce could publicly acclaim his policy of 'firmness, justice and fair dealing with the natives' while also deflecting his critics.<sup>349</sup> Bryce portrayed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as cordial and conciliatory, and the exploratory survey as bold, but said little about the conditional nature of his journey. This likely contributed to reports that the King Country could now be considered opened.<sup>350</sup> For example, reporting on a banquet at New Plymouth in Bryce's honour, the Waikato Times recorded that Bryce declared 'the King country was now opened to Europeans, and there would be no further obstruction to surveys, roads, or railways.'<sup>351</sup>

To his credit, Bryce soon corrected what he described as a 'mistake' made by the telegrapher, when he addressed a gathering of Opunake residents a few days after the banquet. According to the Herald, Bryce was 'careful to make the distinction' that 'the King country might be considered open for surveys for road and railway purposes; but with regard to other surveys he anticipated considerable delay'.<sup>352</sup> Even then, Bryce was overreaching – the 16 March 1883 agreement had been for a single exploratory survey, after which the way was to close up behind him. Nonetheless, a general assumption developed in the settler press in the wake of Bryce's journey through the King Country that he had both won the cooperation of the chiefs and opened the territory for public works at least. Wahanui's 'manifesto' and his call for caution gained no such traction or attention, even though the Wanganui Chronicle reprinted and reconsidered them around this time.<sup>353</sup>

---

346. Document A78, pp 853–854.

347. 'Arrival of the Hon. John Bryce at Waitara', Taranaki Herald, 21 April 1883, p 2 (doc A78, p 854).

348. Document A78, pp 854–855.

349. 'Arrival of the Hon. John Bryce at Waitara', Taranaki Herald, 21 April 1883, p 2 (doc A78, p 856).

350. Document A78, pp 856, 866.

351. 'Mr Bryce Banquetted – He Declares the King Country to be Open', Waikato Times, 26 April 1883, p 2 (doc A41, p 70).

352. 'Mr Bryce and the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 28 April 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 70).

353. Document A41, p 71; see Editorial, Wanganui Chronicle, 24 April 1883, p 2.

8.4.4 Petition preparations continue

Following the Te Kūiti hui and Bryce's trip to Mōkau, the rangatira continued to prepare their petition, drawing George Grey, Wi Pere, and William Rees into their discussions.<sup>354</sup> Rewi added his support to developments in a letter he and two others wrote to Grey on 23 April 1883, in which they sought support for Parliament's authorisation of the external boundary of the Te Rohe Pōtae lands of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui. They wrote:

E hoa, he kupu atu tenei naku kia koe mo te takiwa whenua e rahuitia ana e te iwi nui tonu, e Maniapoto, e Raukawa, e Tuwharetoa, e Whanganui, e tino whakatuturu ana hei nohonga mo nga tane mo nga wahine mo nga tamariki me nga uri whakatupu o tua atu . . . me tuku ki te Paremata mana e whakamana tenei rahui.

Friend, respecting the land which is kept by the great bulk of the people by Maniapoto, by Raukawa, by Tuwharetoa, by Whanganui. It is completely being kept sacred for an abiding place for the men, the women, the children and for future descendants . . . Give it to Parliament, it is for them to authorise this reserve.<sup>355</sup>

They continued by noting the pou that had been erected to define the boundary: 'Kua tu nga pou o tenei porotaka kua huaina te ingoa ko te Ki Tapu a te Iwi kia kaua e poka te Maori te Pakeha.'

In the original document, the translation reads: 'All the boundary marks of this surround are erected. It is called the sacred word of the people. Let it not be broken by Māori or Pākehā.'<sup>356</sup> However, Ngāti Maniapoto researcher, Paul Meredith, proposed another translation. Rather than having named their boundary the 'Sacred Word of the People', he wrote, a more appropriate translation would be that 'Rewi and his friends were possibly saying "the sacred word of the people is let it not be broken by Māori or Pākehā"'.<sup>357</sup> Whichever translation is preferred, the authors were conveying the idea that the pou roherohe represented the sacred word of the people, and neither the people's word nor the boundary itself was to be broken. This helps explain what Wahanui had meant when he asked the Government earlier in April (section 8.4.2.1) to be careful in its approach to its negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and that it act in accordance with 'te kī tapu'.

Tāwhiao, who was still on his tour of Thames and the Bay of Plenty, does not appear to have been part of these deliberations. He returned to Whatiwhatihoe in mid-June. Again, it is not clear that Wahanui and Tāwhiao took the opportunity to meet to discuss the petition or other related matters. Some newspapers suggested Tāwhiao rejected overtures from Wahanui to meet, but official sources are silent on the matter. As it was, Tāwhiao did not stop at Whatiwhatihoe for long before

354. Document A78, pp 867–869.

355. Letter, Rewi, Te Ni, and Te Kohika to Grey, 23 April 1883 (doc A110, p 645).

356. Document A110, p 646.

357. Document A110, p 646.

setting off for another visit to Kāwhia, to tend to growing concerns about government and Pākehā activity there.<sup>358</sup>

The survey of Kāwhia township in February 1883 had been followed by the construction of a public road from Raglan to Kāwhia. While local Māori had tolerated the survey, as well as a handful of Pākehā settlers who had since established themselves at Kāwhia (even though the Government had yet to sell any sections there), they were far less forgiving about the prospect of a government road that would both breach the aukati and require land. They opposed the survey by regularly removing survey pegs and cautioning surveyors to leave Māori land.<sup>359</sup> With hindsight, surveying the Pouewe block proved to be the thin edge of the wedge: Bryce returned in October that year, this time with an armed constabulary (discussed in section 8.5.1 below).

For his part, Wahanui left with a large party for Mōkau, to discuss both the petition and local concerns about the Joshua Jones lease (section 8.9.1.6). Indeed, local tensions would continue as a dynamic feature of Te Rohe Pōtae politics while the petition made its way through the parliamentary process.<sup>360</sup>

8.4.5 The petition of the ‘four tribes’, June 1883

The petition from the rangatira of the ‘four tribes’ of Te Rohe Pōtae was sent to Parliament in late June 1883, soon after the parliamentary session began. We set out the petition in full in appendix 8.1.

8.4.5.1 The content of the petition

The petition was addressed to all arms of the colonial Parliament – the governor and both Houses of Parliament – and was presented to the House of Representatives by Bryce on 26 June 1883. The original petition was not located by research for this inquiry, and it is likely that various versions printed at the time, in newspapers and official publications, are all that survive. Unfortunately, that means that there is no full list of signatories to the petition, as the published versions only reproduced the text. What we do know is that the petition was signed by Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi Maniapoto, and 412 others. It was introduced as a petition of ‘nga Iwi o Maniapoto, o Raukawa, o Tuwharetoa, o Whanganui’. In the English translation, they were described as the ‘four tribes’ of Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>361</sup> Bryce told the House that the petitioners included ‘all of the principal chiefs in that part of the country’.<sup>362</sup>

The official abstract gave a perfunctory description of the petition as asking for a ‘less expensive mode of investigating title and otherwise dealing with land.’<sup>363</sup> The New Zealand Herald noted the significance of the event – that Kīngitanga Māori

358. Document A78, pp 833, 835–836.

359. Document A78, pp 898–899.

360. Document A78, p 875.

361. ‘Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes’, AJHR, 1883, J-1, p 2 (doc A78, pp 868–869).

362. ‘Petition from King Natives’, New Zealand Times, 27 June 1883, p 2.

363. Journal of the House of Representatives, 1883, p xviii (doc A78, p 870).

were petitioning Parliament for better laws and asking the Native Minister to present the petition on their behalf, when such a move would have been extremely unlikely a year or two before.<sup>364</sup> The Herald also reported that members of the House 'listened to the words of the petition with profound attention.'<sup>365</sup>

The petition began by setting out the concerns which led to the petition being drawn up and took particular aim at the law. The petitioners said they had studied Parliament's laws 'from the beginning up to the present day' and deduced a number of things about what effect these laws had on the rights guaranteed to them under the Treaty of Waitangi. They said:

e ahu katoa ana te aronga o aua ture ki te tango i nga painga i whakataturutia kia matou e nga wahi tuarua tuatoru o te Tiriti o Waitangi, i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga, me te kore ano hoki e whakararurua ta matou noho i runga i o matou whenua.<sup>366</sup>

This was translated as 'they all tend to deprive us of the privileges secured to us by the second and third articles of the Treaty of Waitangi, which confirmed to us the exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands.' However, a more literal translation of the second half of this statement was that their full chieftainship ('te tino rangatiratanga') had been fully guaranteed to them ('i tino whakapumautia'), and that there would be absolutely no disturbance to their ability to retain possession of their lands.

The petitioners said they saw no good in the laws affecting their lands, in particular the Native Land Court: '[K]ua waiho aua tikanga e mahia nei ki nga Kooti Whenua hei tikanga whakapouri hei pikaunga taimaha ano hoki ki runga kia matou' ('[T]he practices carried on at the Land Courts have become a source of anxiety to us and a burden upon us').

They asked who 'became possessed' of their lands once they had been adjudicated upon. While certificates of title proved their right to the lands, they were lured into debt by proceedings that were deliberately prolonged by lawyers who did not act in their interests but instead delivered their land to the land speculators. The result was that 'mau ana ko te wairua i nga Maori, ko te whatu, riro ke ana i nga Horo Whenua' ('we secure the shadow [of the land] and the speculators (land-swallowers) the substance'). They continued:

I runga i te nui rawa o to matou raruraru ki te kimi i etahi tikanga hei wawao i o matou whenua, i nga mate kua oti nei te whakatakoto, ka ui matou mehemea kaore he ture hei peehi mo enei mahi kino, ka utua mai kahore, heoiano tona tikanga me haere tahi ki te Kooti.

364. 'Parliamentary News and Gossip', New Zealand Herald, 25 June 1883, p 5.

365. 'The Petition of the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 27 June 1883, p 4.

366. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, 1-1, pp1-4.

In our perplexity to devise some means by which we could extricate our lands from the disasters pointed out, we ask, is there not a law by which we could suppress these evils? and we are told that the only remedy is to go to the Court ourselves.

Now, the petitioners protested, while they were striving to keep their lands, the Government was trying to open their country by surveying, and building roads and the railway, 'koia ka whakawatea i te ara hei mahinga mo enei mahi kino ki runga ki o matou whenua i te mea kaore ano i hanga paitia nga tikanga mo nga ra e takoto mai nei' ('thereby clearing the way for all these evils to be practised in connection with our lands before we have made satisfactory arrangements for the future').

They said it would not be right to subject their lands to such an objectionable system:

He aha te pai kia matou o nga Rori, o nga Rerewe o nga Kooti Whenua, mehemea ka waiho enei hei ara rironga mo o matou whenua, ka ora noa atu hoki matou ki te noho penei, kaula he Rori, kaula he Rerewe kaula he Kooti, otia, e kore matou e ora mehemea ki te kahore atu o matou whenua ia matou.

What possible benefit would we derive from roads, railways, and Land Courts if they became the means of depriving us of our lands? We can live as we are situated at present, without roads, railways, or Courts, but we could not live without our lands.

Though they were fully aware of the potential advantages of roads and railways, 'ko o matou whenua te mea pai ake i enei katoa' ('our lands are preferable to them all').

The petitioners went on to say that the four iwi had carefully defined the land over which their authority prevailed. The hapū had selected representatives to define the boundaries of their lands, erecting 'tohu' (posts) to mark out the lands still remaining to them over which Pākehā had no legal authority ('kaore nei te Pakeha ki ta matou mohio iho e whai paanga ana ki te whenua i runga i te ritenga o te ture').

The petitioners asked Parliament to 'kia whakamana mai' ('give effect to') five requests regarding their lands and authority:

1. E hiahia ana matou kia kore matou e mate i te nui rawa o nga rorerore o te whakamahinga o te Kooti Whenua Maori i te whakamahinga i o matou take whenua; kia wehe atu ano koki nga tikanga tahae, nga mahi haurangi, nga mahi whakatutua tangata, me nga mahi whakarihariha katoa e aru nei i muri i nga nohoanga o nga Kooti.
2. Me hanga mai ano hoki e te Paremete, tetehi ture hei whakapumau, i o matou whenua kia matou, me o matou uri, mo ake tonu atu, kia kore rawa e taea te hoko.
3. Kia waiho ma matou ano e whiriwhiri nga rohe o nga Iwi e wha kua whakahuaina ake nei, me nga rohe o nga hapu o roto o aua Iwi, me te aronga o te nui o te paanga o ia tangata ki nga whenua o roto o te whakahaerenga rohe ka tuhia iho nei ki tenei Petihana.

4. A te wa e rite ai enei whakaritenga mo te aronga ki te whenua, me whakatu mai e te Kawanatanga etehi tangata whaimana, hei whakapumau i a matou whiriwhiringa me a matou whakaaetanga ki runga i te ritenga o te ture.
5. A te wa e oti ai te whakatau o te nui o te paanga o ia tangata o ia tangata ki te whenua, ka hiahia te tangata ki te reti, e kore o mana te reti e whakaritea e tona kotahi, e ngari me panui marire ki roto ki nga-nupepa kua oti te whakarite mo taua mahi, hei whakaatu i te takiwa e hokona ai te riihi o aua whenua e hiahiatia ana kia retia, kia ahei ai te katoa te haere mai ki te hokonga o aua riihi.

1. It is our wish that we may be relieved from the entanglements incidental to employing the Land Court to determine our titles to the land, also to prevent fraud, drunkenness, demoralization, and all other objectionable results attending sittings of the Land Court.
2. That Parliament will pass a law to secure our lands to us and our descendants for ever, making them absolutely inalienable by sale.
3. That we may ourselves be allowed to fix the boundaries of the four tribes before mentioned, the hapu boundaries in each tribe, and the proportionate claim of each individual within the boundaries set forth in this petition. [The petition then went on to describe the boundaries: see map 8.1].
4. When these arrangements relating to land claims are completed, let the Government appoint some persons vested with power to confirm our arrangements and decisions in accordance with law.
5. If, after any individual shall have had the extent of his claim ascertained, he should desire to lease, it should not be legal for him to do so privately, but an advertisement should be duly inserted in any newspaper that has been authorized for the purpose, notifying time and place where the sale of the lease of such land will be held, in order that the public may attend the sale of such lease.

The petitioners concluded by emphasising that they had no desire to keep the lands within the boundaries locked up from European settlement, nor to prevent leasing of land, or roads or other public works – but they did want the practices associated with the Native Land Court abolished. If their petition were granted, ‘ka tino awhina matou ki nga ritenga e nui haere ai nga ara, e puta mai ai nga painga ki tenei motu’ (‘we will strenuously endeavour to follow such a course as will conduce to the welfare of this Island’).

As shown in map 8.1, the petition boundary encompassed all of this inquiry district other than the area between Aotea and Raglan Harbours, along with a considerable area to the south and east of this district. In the east, the petition area bisected Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa territories, and in the south it encompassed lands of northern Whanganui hapū and iwi, and the Poutama lands in which Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Tama both had interests. The Ngāti Tūwharetoa claimant Napa Ōtimi said the petition boundary was based on the Kingitanga boundaries which ‘served both to mark a line that the Government could not cross, and also to symbolise the connection between the tribes and the Kīngitanga. Some of the pou along the boundary marked ancient tribal boundaries, while others were more recent. They linked Whanganui, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Maniapoto, Raukawa, and Waikato boundaries, demonstrating 'that the tribes had come together to support the Kīngitanga'.<sup>367</sup>

The petition envisaged a process by which iwi rohe (territories) would first be determined, and then hapū rohe, before 'te aronga o te nui o te paanga o ia tangata' ('the proportionate claim of each individual') was then recognised. It is not clear from the petition how the process of determining individual interests was to work in practice. The law at the time required title to be awarded to individuals in the form of tradeable shares in collectively owned land, but we think it unlikely that the petitioners envisaged this form of title. It seems more likely that they intended individual interests to be recognised in a manner that was contingent on the underlying title of the blocks sitting with hapū, creating a balance of community and individual interests. Certainly, in subsequent negotiations they made it known that their preference was for hapū to continue as the principal right holders in land.

Claimants told us that the petition cannot be understood solely in terms of the specific law changes that were sought. Those changes all concerned the administration of land, but the underlying purpose, claimants said, was to preserve the mana and tino rangatiratanga of their people. Mr Maniapoto said the petition was 'about the autonomy and authority of the collective tribes over their tribal domains', in accordance with the principles that had guided the Kīngitanga for the previous 20 years.<sup>368</sup> John Kaati told us that this petition 'represented a unified voice among iwi of the Te Rohe Pōtae in wanting to prohibit the Crown's acquirement of their lands', and that '[t]he rangatira also wanted to reassert their mana more so the mana motuhake of their people to ensure that nothing would happen until discussions had taken place with them first'.<sup>369</sup>

Mr Roa regarded the petition as an expression of the mana whatu ahuru of his Ngāti Maniapoto people. It was an attempt to negotiate an agreement under which peace would reign, balance would be maintained, and 'the way of life and lands occupied by each hapū' would be 'established and upheld'.<sup>370</sup> In this way, Mr Roa drew the link between retention and administration of land, which the petition was primarily concerned with, and the broader sphere of authority derived from ancestral relationships with that land. As he put it, '[u]nderpinning the Kī Tapu was the key concept that land was everything to our people'.<sup>371</sup>

The petitioners' expectation was that the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae would occur 'in accordance with our tikanga, at a pace we were comfortable with and in a way that we controlled the outcomes'.<sup>372</sup> These goals were clear, he said, from the

---

367. Document J22, paras 51–57, 90.

368. Document A42, pp 6, 8–9.

369. Document H15, paras 144–145.

370. Document H9(c), paras 15, 24–25; see also paras 12–14.

371. Document 14, para 15.

372. Document 14, para 14.

petition. Mr Roa also referred to the petitioners' statement that their lands were preferable to all of the possible benefits of settlement:

These words are from our rangatira, to the rangatira of the Crown. They are consistent with the promises confirmed in Te Tiriti, as identified in the petition. Our clear expectation was explicit: we would retain the mana, the rangatiratanga, the whaka-haere i.e. the autonomous authority and the management of our lands.<sup>373</sup>

At the time, the New Zealand Herald described the questions raised in the petition as 'the most important, which could at the present moment be placed before the country'. It proposed that there was no hiding the fact that the 'system of conversion of title through the Native Land Court' had 'broken down'.<sup>374</sup> While the Herald expected the petition to be the cause of 'much discussion', it thought the Government's 'general disposition will be to yield to the desires expressed as far as possible'. It suggested that 'a Court composed of skilled and trustworthy persons' could determine the boundaries of the 'great tribes' and then the 'hapu or family boundaries'. The wishes of the 'individuals' could then be 'consulted without the present cost and waste before the Land Court'.<sup>375</sup> In another report, the Herald said that Bryce regarded the requests made in the petition as 'very reasonable and proper'. And it remarked on the significance of the petitioners' decision to petition Parliament for satisfactory laws, instead of rejecting Parliament's authority outright as supporters of the Kingitanga had previously done.<sup>376</sup>

In short, the petition signalled that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori wanted means by which they could manage their lands. They signalled that, above all else, they wanted to retain their land. They could live without roads and railways; they could not live without their land. They wanted to be freed from the unduly demoralising and destructive influences of the Court. They wanted to determine both the external boundary of their territory and the iwi and hapū subdivisions within it, and the rights of individuals within those subdivisions. Once that work was completed, they wanted the Government to appoint people furnished with the appropriate authority to give effect to their plans in accordance with the law. They wanted an Act of Parliament that would secure their lands to them and their descendants for ever, with no provision to sell it. If individuals with confirmed land interests wanted to lease their land, they should be allowed to do that so long as the leasing process was conducted in public, to ensure it was transparent and competitive. Notably, the petitioners made their declaration in terms of the rights that were guaranteed to them under the Treaty of Waitangi.

---

373. Document 14, para 16.

374. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 27 June 1883, p 4.

375. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 27 June 1883, p 4.

376. 'Parliamentary News and Gossip', New Zealand Herald, 25 June 1883, p 5.

8.4.5.2 Challenges to the petition

Before long, the petition was challenged by questions about what groups it represented. This reflected the fact that the petition did not include only Ngāti Maniapoto lands, but also those in which neighbouring iwi had interests. As well as Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and northern Whanganui iwi, the boundary also included lands in the north (in Kāwhia and in the northeast around Wharepūhunga) in which Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Mahuta, and Ngāti Hauā claimed interests. Reports in the settler press described the petition as being on behalf of Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi, and 412 others – naming only the Ngāti Maniapoto signatories and thereby creating the impression that it represented solely or mainly Ngāti Maniapoto views.<sup>377</sup>

Although Taonui had followed a careful process, spending three months traversing the border territories and speaking with communities who lived there,<sup>378</sup> concerns nonetheless inevitably arose among communities along or outside those borders. Some were concerned that the petition represented an attempt by Ngāti Maniapoto to secure interests in their territories. This reflected the atmosphere of suspicion that had been created by the Native Land Court with its mandate to convert complex and overlapping Māori land interests into defined blocks with named owners. These concerns were encouraged by private land agents and speculators, including William Grace, who wrote to Wetere suggesting that the petition was an attempt by Wahanui to claim all authority within the boundary.<sup>379</sup>

Some Māori were also concerned that the petition made no mention of Tāwhiao's authority, and instead placed trust in Parliament and the Government to protect the boundary and Māori authority within it. Whereas Wahanui and other rangatira clearly believed that engagement was necessary in order to secure peace and protect against the border pressures they faced, others in the Kingitanga movement believed it would be possible to hold out for longer.<sup>380</sup>

In its coverage of the petition's submission, the Herald had suggested that Parliament might come up with a 'plan to ascertain if the petition really expresses the wishes of the Kingites', before proceeding to consider its proposals.<sup>381</sup> Wahanui responded to the comment in a letter to the newspaper, making clear that, in his view, the petition had unanimous support from all who lived in the affected lands. He said he had noticed in the Herald's coverage 'a feeling of doubt whether our petition expressed the desire of the majority of the King natives', and he drew readers' attention to the part of the petition which described how 'deputies were chosen by the hapus to define the boundaries of the lands still remaining to us':

377. Document A78, p 873. Regarding Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Hāua, and Ngāti Mahuta interests within the boundary, also see AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9; doc A85, p 274.

378. 'The Desires of the Kingites on the Land Question', New Zealand Herald, 23 July 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 88).

379. Document A78, pp 873–875.

380. Document A78, pp 873–874.

381. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 27 June 1883, p 4.

This shows plainly that it is our express wish and desire. Those men who were selected by the hapus went round our boundaries and erected posts, with the full consent of the people residing at different places where such posts were erected. We therefore desire the public to disregard any insinuations that may be made to the contrary.<sup>382</sup>

It is significant, here, that Wahanui referred to consent being given by hapū who lived in the lands along the boundary. In Māori tradition, it was hapū that held rights in land and managed its use. Wahanui was claiming the consent of traditional rights holders of all of the lands included in the boundary. He was not, however, explicitly claiming the unanimous support of all iwi to which those hapū might be affiliated. As noted, some iwi had lands within the boundary and lands outside it; consent had been sought only from those with lands within.

It is also significant that Wahanui referred to the petition as reflecting the wishes of ‘the majority of the King natives.’ The petition certainly used new tactics – declaring to Parliament the petitioners’ desire for it to make laws to protect their authority – but Wahanui does not seem to have seen it as representing a break from the Kingitanga itself, as some newspaper commentators suggested at the time. Rather, it was an attempt to secure Crown consent for what were Kingitanga goals: rejecting the Native Land Court and leaving Māori to administer their lands as they wished.

Wahanui noted that Parliament and the Government were also under pressure from land companies. He emphasised the conciliatory nature of the proposal – the petitioners were trying to establish a basis on which all New Zealanders could move forward together. But he also emphasised that such an outcome was only possible if Europeans stopped interfering with Māori land. From his point of view, this was not negotiable:

We particularly wish to save the people and to preserve our lands. If fresh water is mixed with salt it would be bitter to the taste, so will Europeans cause dissatisfaction if they persist in interfering with the management of our lands. Therefore we request the pakehas to cease causing trouble, and allow the fair day to arrive.

If Europeans ceased to be ‘selfish,’ then it would be possible to ‘permanently lay . . . down a course that will forward the welfare of the colony, so that men, women, and children of both races may rejoice’:

Pakehas and the King Maoris have been estranged from one another for a period of nearly twenty years, and our present aim is to bring about a reunion between the two races, and settle, once for ever, the estrangement that exists between the two peoples.<sup>383</sup>

---

382. ‘The Desires of the Kingites on the Land Question,’ New Zealand Herald, 23 July 1883, p 5.

383. ‘The Desires of the Kingites on the Land Question,’ New Zealand Herald, 23 July 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 88).

In a letter to Te Korimako, Wahanui also asserted that wide consultation had occurred around the petition. He explained said that it was the great desire of the petitioners that the 'Māori people would survive and that their land be returned'<sup>384</sup> ('He nui ta matou hiahia kia ora te iwi Maori, a kia tae mai hoki nga whenua kia matou').<sup>385</sup> However, Wahanui's responses were not sufficient to put to rest the question of representation. When it reported on the petition on 3 August, the Native Affairs select committee said it could not 'pronounce upon the allegations respecting boundaries or tribal rights'.<sup>386</sup>

Before the end of the month, the committee considered two related petitions which did not dispute the 'four tribes' petition on questions of policy – rejection of existing Māori land laws and the Native Land Court, and retention of Māori authority over land – but did dispute the boundaries Taonui had laid down. One of those petitions was signed by 489 'Ngatimaniapoto' and 'Waikato', including Manuhiri, Tūkōrehu, Ngatapa, Paku, Te Ngakau, Tana Te Waharoa, Tati Wharekawa, Hatara, and Nuimoa Te Paewaka. It had arisen from a hui called by Tāwhiao on 10 August 1883.<sup>387</sup>

The petitioners said they had not consented to the inclusion of 'ancestral lands of Potatau and Tawhiao' in the 'four tribes' petition area and had not consented to those lands being included in the four tribes' proposed title determination process. Most of the named petitioners appear to have been of Waikato descent. By referring to 'ancestral lands', the petition may have been concerned with protecting lands in Kāwhia, and in Wharepūhanga and Maungatautari (which lay just outside the petition area: see map 8.1 and appendix 1 to this chapter). Waikato iwi claimed these lands by take raupatu (see chapter 2). It may also have been concerned with lands at Whatiwhatihoe and nearby which Tāwhiao claimed through ancestry and occupation. Wilkinson, commenting on the petition in an official report, noted that Ngāti Maniapoto acknowledged the interests of Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui within the petition area. Waikato and Ngāti Hauā, on the other hand, were 'not admitted by Ngatimaniapoto to be [the] owners'.<sup>388</sup>

The other petition was in the name of Horonuku Te Heuheu, 'te tino Rangatira o Ngatituwharetoa i Taupo' (the 'head chief of Ngatituwharetoa, Taupo') and 21 others. The original petition seems to have been lost, but the Native Affairs Committee reported that Te Heuheu referred 'to the petition of Ngatimaniapoto, in which is made a claim for the lands of his tribe'. This claim, Te Heuheu said, did not have his consent. Te Heuheu gave the boundary of Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands, though the committee did not include that detail. Te Heuheu also complained 'of

384. Document A110, p 651.

385. 'Nga Whakaaro a Wahanui ma mo nga Whenua', Te Korimako, 15 August 1883, p 6 (doc A110, p 651).

386. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 9 (doc A41, p 88).

387. AJHR, 1883, J-1A; AJHR 1883, I-2, p 24; doc A41, pp 89–90; doc A78, p 878. For details of the lands claimed by Waikato iwi within the petition area, see doc A85, p 274; doc A60, pp 69, 73–75, 82; AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9.

388. AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9.

the excessive fees allowed to lawyers in the Land’, and of the ‘practice of holding Courts at places distant from the lands adjudicated upon’. He asked for redress on these issues.<sup>389</sup>

The ‘four tribes’ petition did divide Ngāti Tūwharetoa territory. The boundary described in the petition ran down the middle of Lake Taupō, and on the south side of the lake from the mouth of Tauranga River to Ruapehu, before heading westwards towards the Waipingao Stream. This line effectively severed Ngāti Tūwharetoa territory in two by cutting through the lake. As shown by the words of their counter-petition, the Ngāti Tūwharetoa counter-petitioners were quite clearly acting under the impression that the boundary represented a territorial claim by Ngāti Maniapoto. This was not Wahanui’s intention. Rather, as discussed in section 8.4, the boundary had been drawn to represent lands belonging to all Te Rohe Pōtae tribes on which Europeans had no claim, and on which Māori authority therefore remained uncontested.<sup>390</sup> As the petition made clear, his intention was for the tribes within these lands to determine boundaries among themselves, rather than involving the court; the petition cannot therefore have been intended to represent only Ngāti Maniapoto territories.

The counter-petitions nonetheless raise questions about the extent to which Ngāti Tūwharetoa and other tribes along the boundary did in fact consent to the petition’s kaupapa. As described above, Wahanui’s position was that all hapū along the boundary had consented. But it appears that Te Heuheu was not involved, and it also appears that some communities along the boundary became concerned after the petition was sent, very likely as a response to agents such as Grace and to settler newspapers, which described the petition as dividing Ngāti Maniapoto lands from those of other tribes, and as dividing ‘Kingite’ tribes from those who wanted to submit to the colony’s laws and bring their lands before the Court. According to newspaper reports during August, some communities pulled out the pou whenua that Taonui had put in place. In August, Wahanui called hui in attempts to smooth things over, but – according to newspaper reports – they were not well attended.<sup>391</sup> According to one report, Rewi was sufficiently concerned about this opposition from Waikato leaders who claimed interests in the district that he asked Wahanui to move the boundary south from the Pūniu River to the Waipā.<sup>392</sup>

In this inquiry, Mr Maniapoto told us that Ngāti Maniapoto traditions emphasised the inter-tribal nature of the petition, which was sent not on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto but on behalf of tribes who ‘supported the tikanga principles of the Kingitanga’ and were now bringing those principles forward into Te Ōhākī Tapu. The petition was ‘about the autonomy and authority of the collective tribes’ (our emphasis) and was ‘never just about the rohe of Ngāti Maniapoto nor a purely Maniapoto matter’:

389. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 20 (doc A41, pp 89–90).

390. Te Korimako, 15 August 1883, p 6; translation from New Zealand Herald, 23 July 1883, p 5 (doc A110, p 627).

391. ‘Important Native Meeting in the King Country’, Waikato Times, 7 August 1883, p 2; ‘Native Affairs’, Auckland Star, 6 August 1883, p 2; doc A78, pp 881–882;.

392. ‘Wahanui’s Proposals’, Waikato Times, 21 August 1883, p 2.

It was about the five iwi and the kaupapa of tino rangatiratanga and the Kīngitanga. The principles that underpinned the establishment of the Kīngitanga would in the end become the founding cornerstones that would unite the chiefs and tribes of Te Rohe Pōtae. The whole process was underpinned by the authority of the chiefs and was marked by a continuing requirement that any proposed activity by the Crown in Te Rohe Pōtae had to be agreed in advance.<sup>393</sup>

Although Te Heuheu is on record as contesting the petition, there is clear evidence that several other senior Ngāti Tūwharetoa leaders supported and at times played crucial roles in Wahanui's negotiations with the Government.<sup>394</sup> As we will see later in this chapter, those rangatira appear to have represented the communities with lands inside the border, as counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa acknowledged.<sup>395</sup> They may well have signed the petition, though we cannot know. It may be that Taonui, in his marking of the external boundary, had not sought to meet and confer with Te Heuheu, regarding it as sufficient to meet the rangatira who lived along or within the boundary. In addition, as we have seen, events moved at a pace from March 1883, and Wahanui and other leaders had a great deal to contend with, including Bryce's attempts to move ahead with the exploratory survey, and the need to develop the petition itself. In doing so, they may have relied on rangatira along the boundaries to maintain support among their communities, and to develop support among their wider iwi, in particular those who lived outside the boundary but had interests overlapping it. In adopting this approach, they did not win Te Heuheu's support or explain to him the purpose of the petition. It is possible that they did not see the need to do so immediately, because the petition was designed to support the authority of those tribes, not undermine them, and to establish a process by which they could decide on their tribal boundary together.

It also appears that the differences among Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira reflected the different tactical approaches that Kīngitanga leaders in general were now considering in response to the pressures they faced from the Government, the Court, and settlement at their borders. As we will see, two key questions emerged in the period after Bryce called off negotiations with the Kīngitanga: first, should Māori engage with and make concessions to the colonial government in the hope that it might recognise their authority in return, or should they remain aloof? Secondly, if they engaged, should they do so in unison, either through the Kīngitanga or as part of the 'four tribes', or should they act independently in order to preserve their own tribal lands?

Ngāti Tūwharetoa claimants, and other Tribunals, have concluded that Te Heuheu rejected Wahanui's boundary because it divided Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands,

393. Document A42, pp 8–9.

394. Document J22, para 88, names Te Herekikie, Matuahū Te Wharerangi, Hitiri Te Paerata, and Te Papanui as Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira who took part in or supported the negotiations with the Government over the railway and economic development. Other sources also named Ngahuru Te Rangikaiwhiria and Te Pikikōtuku (doc A78, p 981). Also see Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 221–222; submission 3.4.8, p 2; submission 3.4.281, pp 37, 39.

395. Submission 3.4.8, p 2.

but he was nonetheless supportive of the petition's underlying kaupapa, which was to preserve Māori land and authority.<sup>396</sup> The claimant Napa Ōtimi referred to differences over how to pursue that goal, Wahanui having chosen to engage with the Government while Te Heuheu and Tāwhiao did not. Mr Ōtimi said Ngāti Tūwharetoa tradition was that Kīngitanga leaders had become divided because of the Crown's decision to negotiate only with Wahanui and ignore not only Tāwhiao but also Te Heuheu.<sup>397</sup> The Central North Island Tribunal found that Wahanui and others behind the petition could have done more to communicate with all leaders of Ngāti Tūwharetoa to ensure they understood the true purposes of the petition: that it was intended to establish a rohe in which Māori authority would be preserved for all tribes, and was not intended as a claim on Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands.<sup>398</sup>

Just as we cannot know who from Ngāti Tūwharetoa signed the petition, we also cannot know who from Ngāti Raukawa and northern Whanganui iwi (Ngāti Hāua, Ngāti Hekeāwai, and Ngāti Hikairo ki Tongariro) signed. Again, however, there is clear evidence that senior rangatira from those tribes either had already supported<sup>399</sup> or later supported Wahanui in his negotiations with the Government, and on that basis may well have also signed the petition.<sup>400</sup> The Whanganui Whenua Tribunal concluded that the 'four tribes', including northern Whanganui iwi, had been involved in the petition, coming together to 'develop their own strategy for dealing with the Crown' and 'establish . . . a zone that included all customary Māori land under the Kīngitanga', though some Whanganui hapū subsequently fell away.<sup>401</sup> And the claimant Kevin Amohia told us that, although there was no record of who if anyone from Ngāti Hāua signed the petition, 'our traditions are that Ngāti Hāua were a party to it'.<sup>402</sup> As with Ngāti Tūwharetoa, divisions would emerge between those within the aukati who sought to act collectively with other tribes, and those outside it who sought to act independently in the hope of preserving the tribal estate.

The Native Affairs Committee made no recommendation on the Te Heuheu petition, noting that Parliament was already discussing the 'subject-matter of the petition', vis-à-vis the Native Land Laws Amendment Bill (discussed below

396. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 222–226; submission 3.4.8, p 3; doc J22, para 91.

397. Document J22, paras 86–89.

398. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 327–329, 332–333.

399. The Tūhua rangatira Hataraka (Ngāti Tama, Ngāti Te Ika), and Ngatai Te Mamaku (Ngāti Hāua, Ngāti Hekeāwai) had been involved in the April 1883 hui which made decisions about the petition: doc A78, pp 840–841; doc A41, pp 73–75.

400. For Ngāti Raukawa, Hitiri Te Paerata (also affiliated to Ngāti Tūwharetoa) was involved in negotiations with the Crown and signed the December 1883 application for the external boundary survey doc A78, pp 958, 981, while Te Papanui Takahiki (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa) was also recalled as supporting the negotiations (transcript 4.1.9, pp 387–388; doc J22, paras 88–89; see doc A41, p 132 for Ngāti Raukawa affiliation). Among northern Whanganui rangatira, Te Pikikōtuku, Ngatai Te Rangikaiwhiria, and Matuahu Te Wharerangi were all named as taking part in negotiations: doc J22, paras 88–89. These three were also regarded as Ngāti Tūwharetoa.

401. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauonoka, vol 2, p 557.

402. Document H10, p 7.

in section 8.4.5).<sup>403</sup> With regard to the Waikato petition, the committee recommended that the House ‘take this and other similar petitions into consideration when dealing with Native questions’. However, as with Wahanui’s petition, the committee reported that it could not ‘enter into the question of tribal title or boundaries . . . or express an opinion thereon.’<sup>404</sup>

The committee considered a further related petition in August 1883, signed by Hone Wetere (a Kāwhia chief, not Wetere Te Rerenga of Mōkau) and others, all of Kāwhia. This petition sought an arrangement similar to that which Wahanui and his fellow petitioners requested: ‘protection in dealing with their own lands, with the assistance and advice of the Government’. In return, the Kāwhia petitioners would ‘assist in carrying out public works, such as roads, railways, and telegraphs’. In fact, as will be described in section 8.5, Ngāti Hikairo later joined their concerns with those of the June 1883 petitioners, effectively becoming the fifth iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae to have representatives supporting the petition. During the same period, tensions would flare up at Kāwhia over further government attempts to open the harbour and adjacent land for Pākehā settlement. For now, however, the Native Committee referred the Kāwhia petition to government for ‘consideration’ and once more gave ‘no opinion upon the question of ownership’.<sup>405</sup>

The counter-petitions and other opposition to the June 1883 petition serve to highlight just how complex an endeavour Wahanui, Taonui, and other petitioners were undertaking. Their goal was to secure Māori authority by appealing to the Crown, in accordance with the Crown’s duties under the Treaty. They were pursuing that goal in an environment of growing pressure at the district’s borders from land speculators and the Court – an environment in which tribes’ shared policy ambitions could easily be subsumed by their obligations to protect their own lands. It is important to recognise that the counter-petitions related only to Ngāti Tūwharetoa territories and to contested territories close to the Pūniu. For most of the 1883 petition area, and for almost the entirety of this inquiry district, support for the petition appears to have been unanimous or close to it. Indeed, there is some evidence that the counter-petitions brought Ngāti Maniapoto communities more strongly behind their leaders.<sup>406</sup>

Nonetheless, the unease felt by some along the boundary meant that Wahanui had to put additional time into shoring up support. He had intended to travel to Wellington to speak in support of the petition,<sup>407</sup> but instead remained in Te Rohe Pōtae during August and September of 1883, calling hui to confirm support for the petition.<sup>408</sup>

403. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 20.

404. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 24.

405. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 24.

406. ‘The Mokau Lands’, Auckland Star, 27 September 1883, p 2.

407. Document A78, p 869; ‘Latest Native News’, Waikato Times, 12 June 1883, p 2.

408. ‘Native Affairs’, Auckland Star, 6 August 1883, p 2; ‘The Mokau Lands’, Auckland Star, 27 September 1883, p 2.

8.4.6 The Government's response to the petition, July–September 1883

The Government's response to the June 1883 petition came in the form of two pieces of legislation: the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 and the Native Committees Act 1883. Both were intended as general measures and were not specifically tailored to the issues raised in the petition.<sup>409</sup> Nevertheless, the Government treated the legislation as its primary response to the petition. This view was encapsulated in the report of the Native Affairs select committee, which considered the petition and reported in early August 1883, shortly after the Bills were introduced to Parliament. The committee included Bryce, the four Māori members of the House of Representatives, and nine other members of the House of Representatives.<sup>410</sup> It was empowered to call evidence, including hearing from the petitioners, but chose not to. Its report noted that the committee had not thought it necessary to summon any of the petitioners to give evidence on this petition; but a considerable amount of evidence has been given on other petitions bearing incidentally upon its allegations. After careful consideration the Committee has arrived at an opinion that the complaints and fears expressed are too well-founded, and that the apparent desires of the petitioners are reasonable. The Committee therefore recommends the petition to the favourable consideration of the House when the Native Committees Bill and the Native Land Sales Bill [sic] are before it.<sup>411</sup>

8.4.6.1 The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883

The Native Land Laws Amendment Act was introduced to the House by Bryce as the Native Land Bill on 26 July 1883 and received its final reading on 4 September. The Act set out to conduct minor reforms to the Native Land Court's processes.

These reforms followed a review of the court's process, which began April 1883, when the Government announced its intention to establish a commission of inquiry that would look at the 'whole working of the Native Lands Court'.<sup>412</sup> In the end, the Government did not establish a commission of inquiry. Instead, Bryce asked the chief judge of the Native Land Court, JE Macdonald, who had replaced Fenton in November 1882, to report on the need for 'some improvement' in the court's constitution and practice and to suggest remedies.<sup>413</sup> Macdonald was known to be in favour of reform, and had complained publicly about some matters related to the court, primarily the 'avidity' of the various groups of people surrounding it.<sup>414</sup> He was instructed in particular to focus on the expenses involved

---

409. Document A78, pp 883, 889–890; doc A41, pp 96–101.

410. Document A78, p 877.

411. AJHR, 1883, I-2, p 9.

412. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 23 April 1883, p 4.

413. Under-Secretary, Native Department, to chief judge, 26 May 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-5, p 1; 'Judge Macdonald on the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 July 1883, p 5.

414. Chief judge to Native Minister, 22 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-5, p 3; 'Judge Macdonald on the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 July 1883, p 5.

in determining titles, including allegations that they ‘entirely swallowed up’ Māori ‘estates’.<sup>415</sup>

He reported within a month, writing from Cambridge where the court was sitting at the time. He concluded that lawyers should not be banned from the court. Nor was he swayed by the argument that court costs drained Māori communities of their resources, arguing that expenses were paid by the ‘real client’ – the European purchaser – who, he claimed, was so often waiting in the wings of Māori land title investigations. Macdonald considered that the many ‘evils’ complained of were not part of the court’s essential make up, but rather were a consequence of particular circumstances. In the Cambridge district, for example, Macdonald acknowledged that the extent and value of the lands coming before the court had intensified settler competition, leading to some objectionable practices. At issue, then, was not the court, but the various parties – such as land speculators, their lawyers and agents – who relied on court decisions to facilitate access to Māori land. Macdonald zeroed in on the widespread practice of prospective would-be purchasers negotiating land transactions with Māori before the court determined title to the lands concerned. In his view, prohibiting the practice – indeed, making it a criminal offence – would avert the problems raised.<sup>416</sup> None of this, of course, addressed the question of the Crown’s role in the purchasing process, nor the type of title the court produced.

The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 effectively incorporated Macdonald’s suggestion for penalising anyone who attempted to negotiate any kind of interest in Māori land – including arrangements for purchase, lease, occupation, or exchange – prior to the Native Land Court establishing the title to the land. No such negotiations could take place until 40 days after the title was ascertained (with ascertainment including the time it took to deal with applications for rehearing). Agreements reached prior to ascertainment of title could not be legally enforced, and fines of up to £500 could be imposed on anyone who participated in such agreements (sections 7–10, and 12–13). As many Māori wanted, the Act provided that lawyers and agents would be excluded from appearing in court, although the court retained some discretion to determine particular circumstances in which legal representation was warranted (sections 3 and 4). The Act also gave the court greater flexibility in regulating its approach to hearings (section 6).<sup>417</sup>

Both Marr and Loveridge described the reforms in the Act as ‘minimalist’.<sup>418</sup> The legislation addressed some of the criticisms levelled at the court, but in a manner that would not disrupt the goal of making Māori land available for Pākehā settlement. When Bryce introduced the Bill to the House, he noted its object of improving ‘the present mode of dealing with Native Lands’, while explaining that it

---

415. Under-secretary, Native Department, to chief judge, 26 May 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-5, p 1; doc A41, pp 76–78.

416. Chief judge to Native Minister, 22 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-5, pp 1–3; doc A41, pp 76–79; doc A78, pp 883–887.

417. Document A78, pp 887–888; doc A41, pp 92–93; doc A50, p 119.

418. Document A41, pp 92–93; doc A78, p 887.

was ‘highly desirable – indeed almost necessary’ to bring the ‘large tracts of unoccupied [Māori] land in the North Island’ into ‘profitable occupation’. This, Bryce said, would be ‘in the interests of the colony and in the interests of the Natives.’<sup>419</sup>

If the reforms did not work, Bryce foresaw ‘a return to the pre-emptive right of the Crown’<sup>420</sup> – the right, established under article 2 of the Treaty of Waitangi, for the Crown to be the sole purchaser of Māori land. Even without pre-emption, the Act gave the Government a clear advantage over private land purchasers: nothing in the Act applied to the Crown (section 13), which could continue to not only negotiate for Māori land before the court investigated its title, but also be represented by lawyers in court. The provisions to exclude lawyers, and prohibit land dealings prior to title being determined, easily found support, including among the Māori members of the House of Representatives. However, Te Wheoro, speaking in the House of Representatives, doubted the Act would sufficiently change the court’s processes.<sup>421</sup>

8.4.6.2 The Native Committees Act 1883

The second piece of legislation – the Native Committees Act – provided the legal framework for the establishment and work of ‘native committees’, which were to comprise at least six and no more than 12 members, elected in districts constituted under the Act. The Bill was introduced to the house by Bryce on 24 July 1883 and received its final reading on 29 August.

Prior to its introduction, two of the Māori members of the House of Representatives – Tawhai and Taiaroa – said that all of the Māori members supported the Bill and encouraged its introduction in order to gauge views of members.<sup>422</sup> In July, the four members had sent an appeal to the secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society, setting out how the Crown had broken the ‘bond of Waitangi’, ‘which being a party to a suit in the question of lands, acts also as its judge’. They stated on behalf of Māori: ‘We merely desire to get the control of our lands into the hands of an elective body of Maoris.’<sup>423</sup> Possibly on the basis of previous native committee proposals (section 7.4.4.6), or on the basis of Government explanations of the Bill (discussed below), the Māori members appear to have hoped that Bryce’s native committees would have substantial powers. As we will see, that would not be the case. The historian Vincent O’Malley, writing about the Māori members’ views, said it was doubtful that they knew of Bryce’s plans to make the committees essentially powerless.<sup>424</sup>

The Bill passed through the House without debate. On introducing its second reading, Bryce briefly commented that its ‘object was to supply a means to enable the Maoris to discuss matters of interest connected with their land, and to report

419. ‘Native Land Laws Bill’, NZPD, 9 August 1883, vol 45, p 456 (doc A41, p94).

420. ‘Native Land Laws Bill’, NZPD, 10 August 1883, vol 45, p 534 (doc A41, p98).

421. Document A78, p 888; doc A41, p 99.

422. Vincent O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy: Maori Committees in the Nineteenth Century (Wellington: Huia Publishers, 1998), p 151.

423. O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy, pp 145–146.

424. O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p 151.

the decisions they might arrive at to the Native Land Court, for the information of the Court'. He added: 'The establishment of these Committees was a thing that had long been desired by the Native population in some form; and he might say that so long ago as 1880 certain Native members of the House and himself prepared clauses which they thought might be embodied in a Bill.'<sup>425</sup>

Bryce distanced himself from the Native Committees Empowering Bill, which had been introduced by Tomoana the previous year. He said that he had felt 'bound to oppose' that Bill, because he 'thought it went too far by giving the Committees a jurisdiction and power which were likely to cause disputes and conflicts between the races'. 'However, the present Bill was based upon the clauses which were prepared by the Native members and himself in 1880, and he thought the Native members were themselves perfectly satisfied with this Bill, of which he now moved the second reading.'<sup>426</sup>

O'Malley notes that there is no evidence that Bryce had been involved in drafting Tawhai's Bill of 1880, which went even further than those presented to Parliament in 1881 and 1882 in providing for real powers to be given to the proposed committees, and to which his own Bill bore few similarities. A telling change from Tomoana's Bill of the previous year was that the term 'empowering' had been dropped from its title.<sup>427</sup>

The Bill received some debate in the Legislative Council. There, the Premier, Frederick Whitaker introduced the legislation, saying that he was 'sure nothing but good would come out of it, as it would be a step towards giving the Natives a little more power in the management of their own affairs.'<sup>428</sup> Colonel Whitmore thought otherwise, saying that it was 'one of the most childish Bills ever introduced to Parliament . . . It could have no possible effect for good, and it must do an immense amount of harm.' Henare Tomoana's Bill would have been of 'unmixed advantage to the colony'. The committees established under that Bill, he said, 'would have taken the place . . . of the Native Land Court, and that would have been a very good thing to do'. By contrast, the committees introduced in Bryce's Bill 'had no power whatever. They could do nothing, whatever, but they might express an opinion to the Land Court, which the Court might accept or reject as it thought fit'. The result, he thought, would be 'a succession of quarrels from end to end of the districts'. He added that Māori needed to be given 'a more potent voice in declaring who were the actual proprietors and successors in the case of Native land. At present they could do nothing.'<sup>429</sup>

An alternative view was put by Henry Williams, who thought that the Bill was a move in the right direction. 'We had deprived the Natives of the mana of their chiefs', he said, including taking away the machinery that had been provided,

---

425. Bryce, 22 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p153.

426. Bryce, 22 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p154.

427. O'Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p152.

428. Whitaker, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p341.

429. Whitmore, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, pp341-342.

including native assessors and policemen. ‘The consequence was that Māori had invented their own machinery of government, and it was almost exactly the same as that set forth in this Bill.’ He said that he knew a judge of the Native Land Court who, on a case coming before the court, simply said to the Natives, ‘Now, first go out and settle these differences amongst yourselves. When you have agreed, then come in, and I will clinch your decision.’ While the machinery in the Bill ‘might not be so complete as could be desired’, it was still ‘a move in the right direction, and for these reasons he would support the measure’.<sup>430</sup>

Whitaker responded by saying that Whitmore was mistaken: the present Bill was a copy of Tomoana’s.<sup>431</sup> However, as O’Malley noted, the similarities were only those about procedure; the rest of the Bill bore little resemblance to its predecessor.<sup>432</sup> Whitaker thought that very little might come of the Bill, because Parliament had ‘tried before to give the Natives the power of dealing with questions of this kind, but they had not availed themselves of this privilege’. He did not say what ‘powers of this kind’ meant, nor did he say when Parliament had previously sought to empower Māori in a manner similar to this Bill. He also acknowledged that Wahanui and the Kingitanga were ‘dissatisfied with some portion of the Bill’. Nonetheless, he hoped that Māori in some parts of the country would take it up. He said that he could not say whether Wahanui and Ngāti Maniapoto would take it up – in any case, he said, it had not been passed specially for them, but for all Māori.<sup>433</sup>

The Act, as it was passed,<sup>434</sup> tended to bear out Whitmore’s assessment of the powers of the prospective committees rather than that of Bryce: in short, they had few resources to draw on, and even fewer powers to exert. The Act set out the rules and requirements for members, elections, and conducting meetings, but there was no indication as to how committees might be resourced, including the payment for members. Committee members could not sit without first swearing an oath of allegiance to the Queen.<sup>435</sup>

The rules for conducting elections required the resident magistrate to notify elections 21 days in advance in ‘populated parts of the district, by advertisement, placard, notice or otherwise’ (section 4). Nominations would then be received at a single place of the resident magistrates’ choosing, following which voting would commence (section 5). The 12 people with the most votes would be elected to the committee (section 6). There was no requirement for hapū and iwi within the specified district to have guaranteed representation. The process relied on the fact that 430. Williams, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p 344.

---

431. Whitaker, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p 345.

432. O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p 154.

433. Whitaker, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p 345.

434. O’Malley commented that only one part of the Bill was amended during its progress through the House: clause 14, dealing with the power of the committees with respect to title investigations. However, he noted that the records give ‘no indication of the nature of this amendment’: O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy, p 282.

435. Document A78, pp 891–892.

all those who might have interests in the committee would be present at the place chosen by the resident magistrate on the day the election was called. This process had significant ramifications when it came time for the Crown to call an election for the new committee that was to be established in Te Rohe Pōtae (discussed in section 8.6.4.1).

The committees were provided power to arbitrate over minor disputes, not exceeding £20 in value, provided that both parties agreed. Apart from that, there was no provision for the committees to levy fines, nor to pass local by-laws. In other words, they were to have no powers of self-government. The most telling provisions were in the powers granted to the committee in relation to the Native Land Court. The committees could make inquiries into Native Land Court cases where owners or successors were to be determined, or where boundaries were in dispute, and they could report their decisions in writing to the Chief Judge, for the information of the Court.<sup>436</sup>

The Crown submitted that the Act provided Māori committees with ‘a power to fix boundaries’, which could be used in conjunction with the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883, which (under section 6) provided the court with ‘the flexibility to use “the best ways and means, without reference to legal formalities, to ascertain and determine the ownership of land held by Natives under their customs and usages”’.<sup>437</sup> However, the court was under no obligation to take notice of any reports submitted by the committees. Section 14(3) did not (as the Crown suggested) give the committees a power to ‘fix’ boundaries. Rather it provided that – in the event of disputes arising – committees could ‘make such inquiries as it shall think fit, and may report their decision thereon, certified in writing in the Maori language under the hand of the Chairman of the Committee, to the Chief Judge of the said Court for the information of the Court.’ All decision-making powers would continue to reside in the court.

Nor did the Act offer Māori an alternative to the court. Under the Native Reserves Act, they could apply to the court for reserve status for qualifying lands; and under the Native Committees Act they might be able to have a stronger say over land titles. However, they would still have to do those things through the Native Land Court; no other choice was offered to them.

8.4.6.3 *The response of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the Government's reforms, August–September 1883

Even while the Bills were making their way through Parliament, Wahanui made his views known through a letter to various newspapers. During the debate in the Legislative Council, Pollen commented that he had understood the Bill had been introduced at the request of Wahanui, but the chief ‘had since expressed his dissatisfaction with the provisions of the Bill’.<sup>438</sup>

---

436. Document A41, pp93–94; doc A78, p889.

437. Submission 3.4.301, p59.

438. Pollen, 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p342.

Wahanui, in letters to Te Korimako (in te reo Māori) and the New Zealand Herald (in English), noted the petitioners' approval of that part of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act that implemented the exclusion of lawyers and land agents from the Court:<sup>439</sup>

E whakapai ana ano matou ki etahi wahi o te 'Pire Whakatika i nga Ture Whenua Māori', ta matou e whakapai ana ko te arainga atu i nga roia ratou ko era atu tangata kia kaua e uru ki roto ki te whakahaerenga o matou take whenua . . . ko te whakahaeranga o nga tangata e tahuri ana ki te hoko, ki te reti whenua ki etahi o matou i te mea kaore ano i oti te whakahaerenga take whenua.<sup>440</sup>

We approve of part of the Native Land Laws Amendment Bill. The part we approve of most is the exclusion of lawyers and other land agents from having anything to do with the settlement of our land claims, also the [indictability of] persons that try to buy or lease land from any of our people before the settlement of land claims.<sup>441</sup>

However, the legislation failed to address a central tenet of the petition: the demarcation of the boundary, in order to cloak it with legal protection:

A, he mea ake tenei, he mea hoki i meatia tenei Pire hei whakarite mo ta matou pitihana. I tino whai matou kia kite iho i te whakaurunga o etahi kupu ki roto hei whakamana i ta matou whakahaerenga rohe i tukua atu nei i roto i ta matou pitihana. Na te mea, ko tenei te mea e tino hiahia ana matou kia tino whakamana i naianei.<sup>442</sup>

And, as this Bill is intended to carry out our petition, we would like to have seen a clause inserted that would have given effect to the delineated boundary set forth in our petition, as this is the principal thing at present we wish confirmed.<sup>443</sup>

Wahanui also explained the petitioners' dissatisfaction with the native committees legislation:

Ko te 'Pire Komiti Maori' e rere rawaho ana tera i ta matou pitihana, nate (sic) mea e ki ana te pitihana kia matou ano te ritenga, mo a matou whakahaere hei muri rano i te otinga o nga take whenua katahi a te Kawanatanga ka tonoa atu kia tukua mai etahi

439. Document A41, pp 100–101; doc A78, pp 895–896; doc A110, pp 652–653; 'Na Wahanui: He Kimi', Te Korimako, 15 September 1883, p 5. (Translation in New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5).

440. 'Na Wahanui: He Kimi', Te Korimako, 15 September 1883, p 5 (doc A110, pp 652–653).

441. 'The Native Land Laws Amendment Bill: Letter from Wahanui', New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5 (doc A110, pp 652–653). Minor translation amendment by the Waitangi Tribunal.

442. 'Na Wahanui: He Kimi', Te Korimako, 15 September 1883, p 5.

443. 'The Native Land Laws Amendment Bill: Letter from Wahanui', New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5.

tangata whaimana hei aki mo a matou whakaritenga a ki reira ra ano. Tetehi e tango rawa ana i to matou mana.<sup>444</sup>

The Native Committees Bill is not in accordance with our petition, because the petition states that we are to manage our own affairs, and after we have settled land claims, then the Government will be asked to send some person vested with power to give effect to our arrangements, and not till then. Further, this Bill takes altogether from us our authority.<sup>445</sup>

Wahanui once again emphasised the customary, self-governing nature of the territory:

ko ta matou kupu tenei e papatupu tonu ana enei whenua waihoki me nga tangata. No konei matou i mea ai kia matou ano te ritenga o matou whenua kia whakakorea rawatia atu ano hoki nga Kooti Whenua.<sup>446</sup>

Our lands are still under our customs, and so are the people; therefore we say, leave the management of our lands to us, and abolish the Land Court altogether.<sup>447</sup>

8.4.7 Treaty analysis and findings

We pause here to consider whether the Crown's response to the June 1883 petition was adequate in terms of the Treaty of Waitangi. In order to do so, we must first assess the petition and establish whether the demands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were consistent with the Treaty, and – more particularly in respect of the terms of negotiation that had been established in March 1883 – whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori clearly set out reasonable and practicable measures by which the Treaty could be brought into proper effect.

8.4.7.1 Were the demands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consistent with the Treaty?

The petition was, without a doubt, a remarkable initiative on the part of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. It was the result of a period of sustained co-ordination on the part of the district's iwi in response to the pressures they had faced from the Crown in preceding years. The petition's full purpose and effect can only be understood in the context in which it was made – particularly the marking of the external boundary, and how Te Rohe Pōtae Māori came to associate it and its protection with their rights and authority.

Arising from these acts, the petition is best understood as a declaration on the part of the petitioners – and therefore of the vast majority of Māori communities

---

444. 'Na Wahanui: He Kimi', Te Korimako, 15 September 1883, p 5.

445. 'The Native Land Laws Amendment Bill: Letter from Wahanui', New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5.

446. 'Na Wahanui: He Kimi', Te Korimako, 15 September 1883, p 5.

447. 'The Native Land Laws Amendment Bill: Letter from Wahanui', New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5.

throughout this inquiry district – of the tino rangatiratanga that had been exercised by their communities for generations: a declaration that tino rangatiratanga was both a form of authority that was in existence and a right that had been guaranteed to them by the Treaty of Waitangi. It represented an opportunity for the Crown, as a Treaty partner, to use its lawmaking powers to provide them with the protection of their tino rangatiratanga that had been promised to them by the Treaty.

The declaratory aspect of the petition can be seen in the context in which it was drawn, as Taonui proceeded to mark the boundaries with pou roherohe, consulting with communities as he went as to the initiative they were about to embark on. The letter of Rewi and others to Grey indicates the importance that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had come to attach to the idea of securing their external boundary. They came to see it as a marker of the rights and authority held by the peoples of the territory. The ‘sacred word’ (‘Te Kī Tapu’) – as represented in the pou that had come to be erected on the encircling boundary – was the people’s declaration that their rights and authority were in existence and had to be respected.

Rewi signalled that in order for their people to agree to the opening of the territory for the railway, the Crown would need to guarantee that their rights and authority would be protected. This would require Māori and the Crown to work in partnership, with the Crown using its legislative powers to recognise, protect, and give practical effect to Treaty rights. Wahanui’s ‘manifesto’ indicated that the Government would have to proceed judiciously by respecting the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori – in order for the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to enter into a faithful partnership (‘te piringa pono’).

These statements illustrate how the rangatira who signed the petition associated ‘Te Kī Tapu’ – the people’s declaration of their rights and authority – with the requirement that the Crown recognise their external boundary. Having formalised a relationship with the Crown, they were now in a position to have their pre-existing rights and authority recognised by Parliament. This is what they sought from the negotiations in exchange for allowing the railway to run through their territory. It was in this context that the petitioners set out how the Crown should provide for the legislative recognition of their rights within their territory, and in doing so reverse the trend of legislation that undermined the Treaty’s guarantees. They described these guarantees as they were set out in the te reo Māori version of the Treaty: ‘nga wahi tuarua tuatoru o te Tiriti o Waitangi, i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga, me te kore ano hoki e whakararurua ta matou noho i runga i o matou whenua.’

This was much stronger language than the English text of the Treaty, which was faithfully reproduced in the translation of the petition as: ‘privileges secured to us by the second and third articles of the Treaty of Waitangi which confirmed to us the exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands’.

The petitioners, however, understood that the Treaty had provided them with much more than the ‘exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands’. Not only would they be able to retain their lands for as long as they wished (or, more literally, that they would not be disturbed in the occupation of their lands – ‘e whakararurua ta matou noho i runga i o matou whenua’), they would also fully retain their absolute chieftainship in relation to those lands (‘i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga’).

In chapter 3, we explained how and why the Treaty guaranteed the right of tino rangatiratanga, which entailed not just the undisturbed possession of certain properties and treasures, whether tangible or intangible, but also the exercise of absolute chieftainship or self-government in relation to those things. As part of the Treaty relationship, the Crown was obliged to use its powers of kāwanatanga to protect and give effect to these rights so far as was practicable under the circumstances. To this extent, the petitioners’ view of their Treaty rights accords with our determination of the meaning and effect of the Treaty, arising from its two texts and reconciling the differences between them.

The petitioners also made clear that they were entirely unwilling to sacrifice any of those rights in exchange for the supposed benefits of the railway and European settlement. Those benefits would be worth nothing, they said, if they resulted in Te Rohe Pōtae Māori losing their land. Their intention was not to lock up the territory from European settlement, or to prevent leasing, but to prevent the wholesale land alienation and other harmful practices they associated with the Court. This was their right, guaranteed to them by the Treaty of Waitangi.

The petitioners asked the Crown to take five actions:

- ▶ To relieve them from the ‘entanglements incidental to employing the Native Land Court’, including fraud, drunkenness, and demoralisation;
- ▶ To enact a law to ‘secure our lands to us and our descendants for ever, making them absolutely inalienable by sale’;
- ▶ To recognise their authority to determine iwi and hapū rohe (territories) within Te Rohe Pōtae, and to determine the proportionate interest of each individual within those territories;
- ▶ To appoint people who could confirm these arrangements for iwi and hapū rohe and individual interests so they would have a legal effect that was recognised by the colony’s laws; and
- ▶ To provide that any individual who had established rights to land and who wished to lease that land could do so, so long as the sale of the lease was publicly advertised.

In this way, the petitioners set out in specific terms what they expected to be provided to them in the course of future engagements with the Crown, before they would be willing to contemplate giving consent for the construction of the railway. They did not wish to lock up their territory against European settlement and public works, but were clear that retaining their lands was their priority. They signalled that they would only agree to what the Crown was seeking if the rights and authority guaranteed to them under the Treaty of Waitangi – including the right to determine their own titles and manage the future disposition of lands – were firmly secured by a new act of Parliament. And they signalled clearly that they were willing to contemplate the leasing of land, but not sales.

The petition represented a declaration to the Government to formally provide for Māori authority within the machinery of the colonial state. For the first time since 1840, they were accepting that the Crown's lawmaking powers could apply to their territories, while also calling the Crown's attention to the reciprocal obligations enshrined in the Treaty. In this manner, their approach appears to have been deliberately designed to overcome the Crown's previous concerns that the Kingitanga had sought an authority separate from the Crown or from colonial institutions. The petitioners seemed confident that what they were seeking both fitted with the Treaty and could be achieved with the support of enabling legislation. Their petition was an opportunity for the Government to provide statutory recognition for the petitioners' tino rangatiratanga.

8.4.7.2 Was the Government's response adequate?

The parties differed over the adequacy of the Crown's immediate response to the petition, which came in the form of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 and the Native Committees Act 1883. The claimants considered that the Native Committees Act, in particular, did not provide Te Rohe Pōtae Māori with 'real power and therefore was not able to deliver on what was promised'.<sup>448</sup>

The Crown's view was that its response was considered by the Government at the time to be an appropriate response to the petition.<sup>449</sup> Crown counsel summarised the two Acts as having 'met Rohe Pōtae Māori part way, made changes to the existing system, . . . reflected some of the requests of the petition, achieved what was practicable in the circumstances, and incorporated beneficial features for Rohe Pōtae Māori'.<sup>450</sup> Yet counsel also submitted that the adequacy of the response could be assessed by the response of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and acknowledged that they were not satisfied over matters such as recognition of the boundary, and recognition of the right of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to manage their own affairs within their territories.<sup>451</sup> Counsel nonetheless submitted that 'despite the limitations of the Native Committees legislation, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made effective use of its provisions by establishing and operating a district committee (known as the 'Kawhia Native Committee', discussed below in section 8.6.2) under the Act'.<sup>452</sup>

In response to the suggestion by claimants that the Crown could have put in place legislation similar to that for Te Urewera in 1896 (which granted the people of Te Urewera powers of self-government and tribal control over lands), the Crown submitted that that legislation had been enacted in a very different parliamentary environment. In 1883, the Government did not have control of Parliament, and those seeking greater powers for Māori could not win parliamentary support. On the one hand, counsel submitted that there was 'substantial opposition to elements

---

448. Submission 3.4.128, p 9.

449. Submission 3.4.301, pp 44, 47.

450. Submission 3.4.301, p 47.

451. Submission 3.4.301, pp 47–48.

452. Submission 3.4.301, p 48.

of the new legislation'; on the other hand, counsel also acknowledged the passage of the Native Committees Act was 'fairly smooth', aside from 'some scepticism about the title ascertainment provision, and the novelty of some of the provisions'.<sup>453</sup> The Crown also submitted that it had never accepted 'the proposition that the Native Land Court system should not apply to the Rohe Pōtae'. Nor, at that time, did it accept 'the proposition of a district overlapping several tribal territories being subject to separate legislation allowing for local self-government'.<sup>454</sup>

In sum, the Crown's position was that the legislation it enacted was an adequate first step towards meeting the demands set out in the petition, although it did not satisfy Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and did not deliver the powers of tino rangatiratanga or self-government the petitioners demanded. On the one hand, the Crown said its failure to deliver what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought was a reflection of parliamentary opposition to empowerment of Māori, but on the other hand the Crown acknowledged that the Government was itself unwilling to deliver what the petition sought.

If we are to accept that the Crown's response was an adequate first step, we would need to see evidence, first, that delivering what the petitioners sought was impracticable at that time, and, secondly, that the Crown genuinely intended to take further steps to meet the terms of the petition once they became practicable. We have seen no such evidence.

In respect of what was possible at the time, there is no evidence that the Crown even considered granting the petitioners the rights and powers they sought. Rather, the decision was made – as reflected in the report of the Native Affairs Committee – that the Government's response would be in the form of the Native Committees Act and the Native Land Laws Amendment Act, both of which were already before the House. Neither was a specific response to the petition, and neither was intended to deliver the powers that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought. As Whitaker said in Parliament, they were intended for all Māori, not just Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

More importantly, there is no clear evidence to suggest that a Bill giving substantial powers to Māori within districts would have been defeated. As discussed in chapter 7, both McLean and Premier Grey had been prepared to offer self-government arrangements of some kind for the whole district in the late 1870s, so it was clearly not inconceivable by the standards of the time. An 1882 Bill providing meaningful powers for district native committees (including powers to make by-laws, adjudicate in some civil disputes, conduct assault and larceny trials, and conduct preliminary land title determinations which the Native Land Court would then have to take account of<sup>455</sup>) had been only narrowly defeated in Parliament, and might have passed had it received the Government's support. Bryce was one of those who strongly opposed the measure, and he did so for the specific reason that he opposed the proposal that the Court would have to take cognisance of

---

453. Submission 3.4.301, p 46.

454. Submission 3.4.301, p 49.

455. Native Committees Empowering Bill 1882, ss 9–11, 16.

native committee decisions on land title (see section 7.4.4.6).<sup>456</sup> Bryce was simply unwilling, in 1882 or 1883, to provide for self-government arrangements even when others in Parliament were.

In debating the 1883 native committees legislation, some members of the House clearly favoured giving Māori greater powers to determine land titles, but the Government did not favour such measures. In the Legislative Councillor Sir George Whitmore's view, the similar titles of the Native Committees Empowering Bill 1882 and the Native Committees Act 1883 had deceived Māori members into believing they were similar measures. In his view, the Native Committees Act gave Māori 'nothing but a sort of a sop to keep their mouths shut'. Māori leaders, he added, 'are not pleased with it'.<sup>457</sup>

The Government was on other occasions quite willing to make special provision for Te Rohe Pōtae. It had done so in respect of the Railway Authorisation Act 1882. The Amnesty Act 1882, though applying generally, was almost entirely designed to address the situation there. In 1884, legislation would be passed enabling the construction of the railway by prohibiting private purchasing within Te Rohe Pōtae and surrounding districts (section 8.7.2), and this would be followed by several other Acts aimed specifically at protecting the Crown's land purchasing position in Te Rohe Pōtae and other areas of Māori land served by the railway. Special legislation was also passed in 1885 enabling the settler Joshua Jones to complete a lease of land at Mōkau (section 8.9.1).

But the Government was not willing to empower native committees to determine title to Māori land, especially in a district with more than one iwi who might have competing claims. Nor was it willing to grant Māori communities meaningful powers of self-government. As Bryce acknowledged in 1884, his intention was that Native Land Court would be 'assisted' by native committees; the idea of Māori determining title among themselves was 'utterly impracticable',<sup>458</sup> and the idea of Māori self-government was an 'absurdity'.<sup>459</sup>

Was this a reasonable position? The June 1883 petition was contested by iwi whose interests straddled the boundary. The Waikato–Maniapoto petition aimed to protect what the petitioners regarded as Tāwhiao's ancestral lands and rejected the land title process described in the four tribes' petition (under which the four tribes asked to determine land title among themselves). The petition of Te Heuheu and Ngāti Tūwharetoa also rejected the petition area boundary, which split Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands. There is no evidence that these tribes were opposed to the petition's underlying principle – that Māori should determine land ownership among themselves and should then be free to administer lands as they wished. Their concern was with the boundary, and with the potential implications of that boundary. For Waikato iwi, the concern may have been that the 'four tribes' would shut them out of any title determination process. Among Ngāti Tūwharetoa, the concern

456. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 217, 229.

457. 'Native Committees Bill', 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, 1883, p 342 (doc A67 (Boulton), p 56).

458. Bryce to governor, 11 January 1884, AJHR, 1884, A-1, p 12.

459. Document A78, p 1025.

was that the tribal rohe would be split (and the petitioners may also have been concerned that different systems of authority would operate in each part). These concerns, in turn, reflected the pressures that Te Rohe Pōtae iwi faced due to the encroachment of the Native Land Court on the borders of their territories.

Had the Government seriously interrogated the motivations behind the Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Waikato–Maniapoto petitions, it would have understood that the petitioners' concerns were mainly over boundaries and protection of tribal land interests, not over the underlying kaupapa. The Native Committees Act 1883 did not determine boundaries, it concerned the powers that native committees might exercise within the areas they were established to serve. But the Government appeared only to be prepared to use the counter-petitions to lend weight to its view that Māori could not be given authority over their own lands in respect of either title determination or administration.

The tribes of Te Rohe Pōtae had long experience of resolving rights issues among themselves and had debated tribal rohe as recently as 1882 (chapter 7). The National Park and Central North Island Tribunals, when considering these issues, found that the various tribes of Te Rohe Pōtae should have been given the opportunity to resolve boundary issues among themselves, but the Government never considered this option. If it had explored this possibility, it might also have considered whether it was possible to define tribal boundaries for native committees – an outcome that may well have won support from the tribes involved. But this was an option that would have taken time and negotiation, which the Government, impatient to press on with the railway, was not prepared to offer.

Instead, the Government advanced native committees legislation that gave very few powers to native committees and delivered almost nothing of what the petitioners had sought. This, along with the Native Lands Amendment Act 1883, were the Crown's only responses to the petition, in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had called for the Crown to recognise and give effect to their tino rangatiratanga over their lands. The committees manifestly did not give effect to tino rangatiratanga, which involved a right of Māori communities to exercise absolute chieftainship or self-government over their lands and territories, including a right to manage those lands as they wished. The Central North Island Tribunal described the Native Committees Act 1883 as a 'very serious missed opportunity' to provide meaningful powers for district Māori committees, both in terms of determining land titles and in terms of self-government more generally.<sup>460</sup> And the National Park Tribunal endorsed the finding of the 1891 Native Land Laws Commission that the Act was a 'hollow shell' that 'mocked and still mocks the Natives with a semblance of authority.'<sup>461</sup> We agree.

If the Crown was unwilling to contemplate providing for Māori to determine land titles among themselves, and to have full authority to administer their own lands, it should have told them so in plain terms. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had clearly

---

460. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 318.

461. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 230; see also p 217.

articulated to the Crown their view of the Treaty of Waitangi, and how its terms might be put into practical effect by the Crown. The response they received was only partial and did not fully reveal the Crown's position on the Treaty, nor the full extent of the rights it was willing to accord to Māori under the Treaty.

In sum, we could only accept that the Native Committees Act 1883 was an initial response if we were satisfied that a more expansive measure could not have received the approval of Parliament at that time, and if the Act had been a genuine attempt to establish institutions that might be expanded further in the future. We are not satisfied on either count; rather, the Act was the Crown's response.

Under the Act, the court could still be placed in the position of authority in determining title over Māori lands within the petition area, and land could still be alienated. Wahanui's response reminded the Government that it had not given effect to the petition's key demands: the recognition of the external boundary and the management of their own affairs. The petitioners' position was that after they had determined tribal and hapū rohe, certain persons identified by Māori could be given powers to confirm their arrangements. Wahanui was clear that the Native Committees Act did not allow for this to happen, and denied the many communities who had supported the petition their rightful authority: 'What we have to say is this[:] our lands are still under our customs, and so are the people; therefore, we say, leave the management of our lands to us, and abolish the Land Courts altogether.'<sup>462</sup> This was a kaupapa that the petitioners clearly supported (and once again we emphasise that the petitioners represented the vast majority of communities in this inquiry district). From the available evidence, it was a kaupapa that Te Heuheu and those supporting Tāwhiao's land interests in the north of the district would also have supported.

We therefore find that the Crown's refusal to contemplate and put into effect a meaningful measure in response to the petition of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori constitutes a breach of the Treaty principles of autonomy and partnership, and the Crown's obligation to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

8.4.7.3 *The effect of the Crown's response on the negotiations

While the Crown did not meet the demands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as set out in the petition, and therefore breached its Treaty duties, was this critical to the success of the negotiations at that point? The petitioners had not won what they sought – Crown recognition of their authority within their rohe. But the Crown's failure at this point did not alter the reality that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to exercise that authority on the ground, and the Crown still could not achieve what it wanted (the railway, the court, and settlement) without their consent. Clearly, further negotiation would be required.

---

462. 'The Native Land Laws Amendment Bill: Letter from Wahanui', New Zealand Herald, 28 August 1883, p 5.

Wahanui had set out the expectations of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in his response to the native committees legislation. He had once again made clear that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori expected nothing less than Crown recognition, in an Act of Parliament, of their Treaty right 'to manage our own affairs', including with respect to land. Without that, there would be no consent for further progress on the railway or surveys.

Bryce may have had little sympathy for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' demands, but he had been forced to negotiate before, and in order for the exploratory survey work to proceed peacefully, he needed to maintain the goodwill of the communities. Thus, even though the Crown had failed this initial test, it still had the opportunity to mitigate the prejudice Te Rohe Pōtae Māori might suffer, and put matters back on track, by arriving at further agreements. How far the Crown would be willing to go would be tested as the negotiations proceeded.

8.5 THE DECEMBER 1883 EXTERNAL BOUNDARY AGREEMENT

Further tests soon appeared as Bryce returned to Kāwhia with the intention of establishing Crown authority there. By then, Bryce had decided it was time for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to submit an application to the Native Land Court. However, Wahanui was determined to demonstrate the support of his people for the initiatives set out in the June 1883 petition.

The opportunity for all these matters to be put to test occurred at the next major hui, when Bryce returned to Kihikihi in November–December 1883. A significant new agreement emerged under which the Crown would survey the external boundary of the 1883 petition area, and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would make an application to the Native Land Court. Claimant counsel submitted that the sole purpose of that application was to seek Crown recognition of the external boundary, in order to define the area over which the mana and rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would continue to be exercised. Counsel submitted that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had no interest in having iwi, hapū, and individual land titles determined by the Court.<sup>463</sup>

The Crown, however, considered that the application was made in the hope that 'the Court would recognise their title.'<sup>464</sup> Ultimately, the Crown submitted, 'the Rohe Pōtae leadership knew they were taking risks with the application for a survey and title investigation', as this was the only way to 'take control of the title determination process and extract concessions from the government.'<sup>465</sup> We consider these positions below.

8.5.1 Further steps to open Kāwhia, September–October 1883

Soon after the Native Committees Act 1883 and the Native Lands Amendment Act 1883 were enacted, the premier, Frederick Whitaker, resigned, saying he had

---

463. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 17, 21.

464. Submission 3.4.301, p 55.

465. Submission 3.4.301, p 61.

private business to attend to. His replacement was the former premier, Harry Atkinson.<sup>466</sup> Bryce remained as Native Minister, and the change did not immediately herald any significant changes in policy on Te Rohe Pōtae or Māori more generally (though changes would come the following year, as we will see in section 8.6.6).

In the months following the new legislation, there was a degree of public optimism that Wahanui and other June 1883 petitioners might come to accept the legislation, even if some remained opposed to the opening of their district. The Herald proposed that the issues at hand were 'merely a question of arrangement'. It predicted that 'the Ngatimaniapotos' would 'demand large reserves' and 'oppose any survey or any railway' if they were not made. 'But reserves the Government can easily make', the Herald editorialised, and the public would likely be supportive. The Government needed to act with some urgency, particularly in selecting a route for the main trunk railway, which the Herald forecast would otherwise become an election issue in 1884.<sup>467</sup> However, Wahanui's letter indicated that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would not so easily agree.

8.5.1.1 The opening of Kāwhia Harbour and preparations for land sales, September 1883

While Wahanui had been attempting to persuade the Crown to go further, Bryce's attention was drawn back to Kāwhia. As discussed in section 8.3.1, Bryce had claimed in January to have opened Kāwhia, and the Government had surveyed the Pouewe sections and had begun to construct a road from Raglan. With settler newspapers supporting the view that the town had been opened, settlers began to drift in. By May a boarding house and other businesses were reported to be operating on the as yet unsold land.<sup>468</sup>

While Kāwhia Māori had initially tolerated the surveyors who laid out the township, they eventually began to question the Government's intentions, especially as it prepared to expand its surveying work by bringing the road into the district and selling the township sections. Tensions developed, and Tāwhiao returned from his Bay of Plenty tour to check on matters in person. There, a spokesman for Tāwhiao (who was not named in reports) declared that Kāwhia township and harbour belonged to Māori and that Europeans would have to leave if asked. Several chiefs called for a stricter approach to the aukati. In July, a party of more than sixty Māori disrupted the survey of the Government's road from Raglan to Kāwhia, pulling up about a mile of survey pegs in the Kāwhia-Aotea section as a warning not to cross into Māori territory. There were also reports of Māori threatening to forcibly remove the surveyors and to destroy their property. However,

---

466. 'The Premier Resigns', New Zealand Herald, 24 September 1883, p 5.

467. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 29 September 1883, p 4 (doc A41, p 101).

468. Document A78, p 899.

the situation settled down when work on the road stopped due (Bryce insisted) to funds running out, not because of tangata whenua policing of the aukati.<sup>469</sup>

Tensions rose again from September 1883 as the Government prepared to accelerate its opening of the township. On 8 September, Parliament passed the Kawhia Township Sale Act 1883, which enabled the Crown to legally proceed with selling the township sections by public auction. Two days later, the Government began work to open the harbour. A government steamer under Captain Fairchild arrived during the week beginning 10 September 1883 and began to mark the harbour entrance with buoys and beacons, as they had previously begun to do in February. Apparently, no notice or courtesy of any kind was offered to any of the local rangatira, including Tāwhiao. Even chiefs who were well-disposed towards the Crown, such as Hone Wetere (who had led the Kāwhia petition just months earlier), were irritated with the Government's lack of etiquette.<sup>470</sup>

Within a few days of the steamer's arrival, local Māori expressed their anger. What exactly happened is unclear. Reports suggested that Ngāti Mahuta chiefs Te Ao and Tihirahi went around removing and destroying the beacons. They were also reported as threatening local Pākehā and looting. However, later suggestions claimed only one beacon was pulled up, and that settlers were warned but not attacked. It does appear that the chiefs were very angry and repeated earlier claims that the township land had never been properly transacted. Initial suspicions that Te Ngakau and Tāwhiao were behind the protests were later addressed by Wilkinson. Wilkinson acknowledged that Tāwhiao had actually denounced and not authorised the action, but he expressed support for the suspicion that Te Ngakau was involved and that this was part of a more defiant Māori strategy against the Government's activities in the township.<sup>471</sup>

Bryce sent his private secretary, Butler, to investigate the situation in Kāwhia. Butler was made aware that Te Ao and Tihirahi did not enjoy the universal support of the Kāwhia leaders. He warned the two rangatira that Bryce was very angry about what had happened; they had broken the law and were technically liable for prosecution. On considering Butler's report, Cabinet agreed to send an armed constabulary to Kāwhia – a military outpost would be established, the beacons replaced, and Tāwhiao and his people warned against any further acts of resistance.<sup>472</sup>

8.5.1.2 The arrival of Bryce and the armed constabulary, October 1883

The armed constabulary force numbered 112 men. They landed at Kāwhia aboard the steamer Hinemoa on 3 October, accompanied by Bryce himself, and set up their camp on a hill above the township. Hearing of Bryce's arrival, Tāwhiao

---

469. Document A78, pp 899–900; see also 'Native Obstruction at Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 6 July 1883, p 5; 'Tawhiao's Obstruction', Waikato Times, 5 July 1883, p 2; 'The Native Obstruction at Aotea', Waikato Times, 21 July 1883, p 2.

470. Document A78, pp 901, 909–911.

471. Document A78, pp 901–902.

472. Document A78, p 902.

arrived to meet with him, and the two men met in person for the first time since the failed negotiations at Whatiwhatihoe almost a year earlier.

According to Bryce's own account of the visit, Tāwhiao took responsibility for the damage done to the beacons. He 'correctly assumed' that the Government's actions were a direct challenge to his authority and an assertion of Crown sovereignty. Tāwhiao told Bryce that he wanted to know what the beacons represented and asked if they meant the Government was taking possession of the land around Kāwhia. He said he wanted Kāwhia Harbour left to him, and he also opposed the Government building roads in the district. He had not been consulted about either the roads or the 'opening of Kāwhia' (that is, opening the harbour to Europeans and establishing Kāwhia township for European settlers). Yet in Bryce's words, Tāwhiao was 'content with the letter of the Queen sent to him (the Treaty of Waitangi)'.<sup>473</sup> If Tāwhiao did indeed use these words, we consider it likely that he intended them to suggest that he was content with the Treaty guarantee of Māori rights to their lands and fisheries. The description of the Treaty as a 'letter sent to him' was presumably intended metaphorically, to refer to the Queen's words to all rangatira who signed, or were offered opportunities to sign, the Treaty.

Bryce replied that the Treaty had 'two sides.' While the Queen had undertaken to respect Māori rights to their lands, Māori had agreed to accept her sovereignty. He pointed out that no lands had been taken from Māori without payment, 'except where tribes had first violated their part of the treaty'. In other words, Bryce was justifying the post-war confiscation of Waikato and Taranaki lands, and – contrary to what Tāwhiao had implied – was also reading the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga as a guarantee of mere possession. Bryce denied that the beacons denoted possession of the land, they were merely for the purpose of guiding vessels. He denied any intention to seize land, either in February when he had first visited, or now. He did not even intend to claim the land on which the constabulary was camped; when the constabulary decamped, the land would belong to 'whoever were proved to be the lawful owners of it.' As for constructing roads over Māori land, that was both a 'lawful act' and a 'valuable present' to whoever owned the adjacent land. The destruction of the beacons, on the other hand, was 'wrong – very wrong – and a repetition of it could not be tolerated'. Bryce said it was not he, but those who destroyed the beacons, who had brought the constabulary to Kāwhia. However, he would not take any further action about it. For his part, Tāwhiao offered to re-erect the beacons himself, but the work was already taken care of, completed by Captain Fairchild, under the guard of 20 armed constabulary in case of any obstruction.<sup>474</sup>

On the evening of their meeting, Tāwhiao and two other (unnamed) chiefs dined with Bryce aboard the Hinemoa. Afterwards, according to the Herald:

---

473. 'The Opening of the Kawhia Harbour (Memorandum by the Native Minister), 16 October 1883, AJHR, 1884, G-1, pp 1–2 (doc A78, pp 903–905).

474. 'The Opening of the Kawhia Harbour (Memorandum by the Native Minister), 16 October 1883, AJHR, 1884 G-1, pp 1–2; 'The Expedition to Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 8 October 1883, p 5.

the party on board, while promenading on deck, noticed a large number of natives on the beach driving cattle, which they brought up opposite the vessel. Tawhiao then, addressing Mr Bryce, said the cattle were a present for the use of the constabulary, and asked the Native Minister to accept them. They numbered fifteen head. Mr Bryce formally accepted the cattle and then returned them to the natives, making Tawhiao a present of twelve bags of seed potatoes.<sup>475</sup>

Bryce also met leaders of Ngāti Hikairo during the visit and took the opportunity to encourage them to place their lands before the Court – a course of action they had already been considering. As noted earlier, their August 1883 petition had indicated that they were willing to consider public works in the township, in return for protection of their lands. Bryce may have indicated that protection would be offered, because soon after his visit the Ngāti Hikairo rangatira Hone Te One attended a hui where he argued that Kāwhia should be opened for roads and other works.<sup>476</sup> According to a later report from the Government's agent, Wilkinson, Ngāti Hikairo did decide to make an application to the Court, which led to tensions with Ngāti Mahuta, who also claimed interests in northern Kāwhia.<sup>477</sup>

The Hinemoa left Kāwhia to return to Wellington on 5 October, with Bryce onboard, 'everything being in perfect order.'<sup>478</sup> In his account of the visit, which he penned on 16 October, Bryce portrayed the Government's programme of work at Kāwhia as amounting to a clear assertion of Crown sovereignty, and also as a rejection of the claims of Tawhiao and other Māori to have authority over the area. He described the township as having been 'quietly taken possession of' in February 1882 and explained his actions in October as a further 'assertion of the Sovereign rights of the Queen without any recognition of the pretensions of the Maori potentate'. He dismissed the recent protests as little more than an attempt to test the Government's intentions and resolve, and claimed that Māori at Kāwhia were divided over the protest actions that had occurred, with the majority in fact pleased to see the constabulary established.<sup>479</sup>

Bryce spoke in rather general terms, and the newspapers tended to oversimplify internal tensions among Māori, so it is difficult to know for sure just how divided the Kāwhia communities were at the time, or the ways that any divisions impacted on the complex inter- and intra-tribal relations at Kāwhia. Bryce's comments, and his actions, suggest that he was not above taking advantage of such divisions, and perhaps encouraging them where that aided his goals. By asserting sovereignty over Kāwhia, he was taking direct aim at the Kīngitanga, but he was also sending a message to signatories of the June 1883 petition. The petition

---

475. 'Mr Bryce and Tawhiao', New Zealand Herald, 9 October 1883, p 5.

476. Document A78, pp 907–909.

477. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9.

478. 'The Expedition to Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 8 October 1883, p 5.

479. 'The Opening of the Kawhia Harbour (Memorandum by the Native Minister)', 16 October 1883, AJHR, 1884 G-1, pp 1–2.

area had included Kāwhia and Pirongia lands up to the confiscation line (see map 8.1). Here, Bryce was showing his willingness to ignore the petition area boundary if he felt the circumstances warranted it. More particularly, he was crossing the boundary with armed force. Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Mahuta, the principal iwi of northern Kāwhia, would be left to consider their options.<sup>480</sup>

The arrival of the constabulary would also become significant for other reasons. Very soon, alcohol would be flowing into Kāwhia Māori communities via the constabulary camp's canteen. Canteens that sold liquor were a typical feature of constabulary facilities at the time, and Wilkinson was aware that the enhanced access to liquor at Kāwhia, and the drunkenness it entailed, compared poorly with the relative sobriety of communities like Whatiwhatihoe and others within the aukati.<sup>481</sup> The June 1883 petitioners had already signalled that they wished to avoid the social effects of drunkenness that were associated with the Native Land Court. Very soon, Māori communities within Te Rohe Pōtae would begin to seek other ways to control liquor in the territory.

8.5.2 Ongoing issues with the exploratory surveys, March-June 1883

In the months before the constabulary arrived at Kāwhia, government surveyors had resumed their railway exploration surveys. Whereas Ngāti Maniapoto leaders had understood the 16 March 1883 agreement as being for a single journey through to Mōkau, the Government in June 1883 pushed ahead with surveys of three other routes from Te Awamutu – a western route to Marton via Stratford, a central route to Marton via Taumarunui, and an eastern route to Napier. All three routes required exploration within the aukati (the eastern route included some lands in northeast Te Rohe Pōtae, and the other routes passed through the centre of the district). On several occasions, the surveyors met with opposition from local communities, who were unwilling to let them cross the aukati.<sup>482</sup>

8.5.2.1 Opposition and stoppages

The Government assigned four surveyors to complete the exploratory work. George Williams was assigned to the eastern route. John Rochfort was assigned to the central route, starting his work at Marton and working his way north towards Tūhua. And Robert Holmes and Morgan Carkeek were assigned to the western route, starting at Stratford and also working their way north towards Tūhua.<sup>483</sup> In addition to gathering information about possible routes for the railway, the surveyors were also gathering information about the quality of the land. For example,

480. Document A78, pp 907–909.

481. Document A78, pp 908, 1027, 1029.

482. Marr describes these events in detail in doc A78, pp 909–925. The routes are mapped in doc A119, plate 30. Reports from the surveyors' are in AJHR, 1884, 1-6, pt 5, and in AJHR, 1884, D-5.

483. 'Reports on Main Trunk Line, Auckland to Wellington', AJHR, 1884, 1-6, pt 5, pp 87, 89, 95, 98–99; Carkeek to chief surveyor, Taranaki, 27 July 1884, AJHR, 1884, 1-6A. Other surveyors later contributed to explorations for the western route (Laurence Cussen, HM Skeet, and Arthur Rawson).

in the various places where he surveyed, Rochfort noted soil quality, locations and types of timbers, details of ancient battle sites, and other items.<sup>484</sup>

In time, those employed on the exploratory railway routes encountered opposition which – though described by Loveridge as ‘sporadic’ – became more intense the closer they got to the aukati.<sup>485</sup> Holmes and Carkeek (western route) worked for some months without incident, only being warned off by local Māori when they approached Tūhua in November 1883.<sup>486</sup> Rochfort (central) and Williams (eastern) both found they could muster support in some quarters by consulting influential chiefs, but likewise encountered difficulties as they neared the aukati.<sup>487</sup>

Williams was first obstructed as he passed through lands to the north-west of Lake Taupō in July 1883. He initially carried on, paying no heed to warnings to turn back. He also admitted to using the Ngāti Raukawa chief Hitiri Te Paerata’s absence at the Native Land Court in Cambridge as an opportunity to examine some of the northern Taupō land (Te Paerata, a close relative of Rewi, was one of the rangatira responsible for enforcing the aukati<sup>488</sup>). Local Māori were not happy, but Williams was soon able to report that he had a letter from Te Paerata giving him permission to explore. He nonetheless continued to meet opposition, which increased in intensity as he travelled.<sup>489</sup>

John Rochfort observed a similar pattern in the opposition he encountered, which varied in degrees as his proximity to the aukati changed. Rochfort pushed past objectors, who he determined would not hold their ground if challenged. However, as was the case with Williams on the eastern line, and Holmes on the western, that strategy was rendered less and less effective the closer Rochfort got to upper Whanganui communities. In effect, the patterns of refusal the surveyors experienced through the last quarter of 1883 signalled that the aukati was still in place and Te Rohe Pōtae communities continued to regulate it.<sup>490</sup>

In September, Bryce prepared a circular letter addressed to ‘The Chiefs of the Maori people’. He wanted to address a perception that the resistance the surveyors encountered was caused by a lack of information among Māori about the true nature of the survey (that is, nothing more than exploratory). Although the final version has not survived, a draft of the letter indicates Bryce noting that the Government was proceeding with the railway so that ‘the fruits of the earth may pass to and fro’, for the ‘great advantage’ of ‘both races’. His advice was that Māori should ‘assist me in this great work’. He asked that the chiefs make the way for the surveyors ‘smooth’, and to have ‘obstacles . . . quietly removed.’<sup>491</sup> Overall, Bryce’s letter was insufficient to quell resistance to the surveyors. By early November, the

484. Document A78, p 922.

485. Document A41, p 102.

486. Document A78, pp 913–914.

487. Document A78, pp 910–924; doc A41, p 102.

488. Document A78, pp 30, 81, 83.

489. Document A78, pp 911–912.

490. Document A78, pp 913–922.

491. Bryce, draft letter, not dated [ca September 1883] (doc A41, p 102; doc A78, pp 914–915).

Government had been forced to instruct Holmes and Carkeek to refrain from pushing across the aukati boundary for fear of further opposition, while Williams was instructed to suspend work on the eastern line, and to take the leave he had owing.<sup>492</sup>

8.5.2.2 Obstacles to Rochfort's survey

Meanwhile, Rochfort had continued on the central line, in increasingly tense circumstances. Rochfort carried supplementary letters of support from influential Pākehā like Resident Magistrate William Woon and the Reverend Thomas Grace. And he had the backing of particular chiefs, such as the prominent Whanganui leader Te Keepa Te Rangihiwini. Yet, local Māori opposition continued to impede his progress. In September, he was delayed for days at a time at Karioi near Ruapehu, where the people disputed the Crown's earlier acquisition of interests in the Rangataua block. As shown in map 8.1, Ruapehu marked the southernmost point in the June 1883 petition. Rochfort was delayed again at Ruakaka, near the Manganui o te Ao tributary of Whanganui, and for several more days as he travelled in the company of seven chiefs chosen to see him back down the river. It was not a direct trip, but rather one that stopped and started along the river as the chiefs paused at various communities to debate Rochfort's survey.<sup>493</sup>

Overall, there was a mix of opposition and support, and Māori communities proposed a range of conditions under which Rochfort might be allowed to proceed. These included requiring him to produce evidence of Tāwhiao or Wahanui's authority, waiting for general political circumstances between Māori and the Crown to improve, and waiting for the next Maehe (in 1884). In other words, they continued to rely on the inter-tribal governance structure that had served Te Rohe Pōtae communities for many years under the Kīngitanga.<sup>494</sup> At one point, in early October, Rochfort suggested Bryce send some armed forces. However, Bryce reportedly regarded it 'unwise to force our way'.<sup>495</sup>

Rochfort reached the Waimarino plains in mid-November, where he sought the support of Pehi Tūroa, and at Taupō he gained further support from Topia Tūroa. He and his party were allowed to proceed to Taumarunui – also part of the 1883 petition boundary – though it was not to be a straightforward exercise.<sup>496</sup> Two men assigned to guide Rochfort 'retreated' and returned home (to Taupō and Rotoaira) as the party neared Taumarunui.<sup>497</sup> Then, with about 30 miles of their journey remaining, Rochfort and his party were stopped and had their pack-horses and some of their gear confiscated.<sup>498</sup>

---

492. Document A78, p 913.

493. Document A78, pp 913–916.

494. Document A78, pp 915–918.

495. Appendix to Rochfort report, AJHR, 1884, D-5, p 5 (doc A78, p 921).

496. Document A78, pp 922–923.

497. Rochfort to Blackett, 14 December 1883 (doc A78, p 923).

498. Document A78, p 923.

Allowed to continue on, Rochfort finally reached the pā at Taumarunui in late November, where he was met, he said, ‘sullenly[,] without a word of welcome.’<sup>499</sup> It soon became clear that he would get no further than Taumarunui, which Ngatai Te Mamaku confirmed when he arrived. Ngatai, who was still waiting for confirmation that he would be included in the amnesty, told Rochfort he could protect him, but only on his own land. He could not protect him beyond Taumarunui, and it would be pointless to carry on because the aukati was firm. No one could pass through while Bryce and Wahanui still had unresolved matters to address. This was confirmed by the arrival of men responsible for enforcing the aukati, who similarly refused Rochfort permission to go further. They also refused to let him send a messenger through and noted that Wahanui had ‘stopped the country’ for a long time, and that some of them had been patrolling the district for the last six months.<sup>500</sup>

Thus, by December 1883, the third of the three exploratory surveys was over, at least for now. Rochfort went back to Tokaanu and from there made his way around the eastern boundary of the aukati to Kihikihi, where he arrived on 14 December.<sup>501</sup> There Rewi and Wahanui told him to wait until 17 December – Bryce was expected that week, and everything would then be ‘settled satisfactorily.’<sup>502</sup>

8.5.3 The hui at Kihikihi, November-December 1883

Following his visit to Kāwhia, Bryce returned to Wellington. Having already tried to persuade Ngāti Hikairo to place their lands before the Native Land Court, he turned his attention to persuading Ngāti Maniapoto. He wrote to Wahanui, suggesting it was time for a decision about matters they had previously discussed.<sup>503</sup> We do not know if Wahanui responded, but he had previously expressed his dissatisfaction with Bryce’s response to the petition, and clearly wanted more substantial law reforms. Bryce, as well as wanting to bring Te Rohe Pōtae lands to court, also had to deal with continued opposition to trig surveys and to the additional railway surveys. Both sides clearly had much to discuss before Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would consider opening their district to the railway or the court. In mid-November, Bryce travelled to Auckland, and then to Te Awamutu, where he met Rewi. Arrangements were made for a hui to be held at Kihikihi, between Bryce and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders.<sup>504</sup>

Wahanui, Rewi, Taonui, and other leaders gathered at Alexandra on 28 November for preliminary discussions. Topics covered included the railway – in particular, the question of whether to allow the central exploratory survey to continue and which route they might prefer – and questions of land, in particular the

---

499. Appendix to Rochfort report, AJHR, 1884, D-5, p 5 (doc A78, p 924).

500. Document A78, p 924.

501. Document A78, p 924.

502. Rochfort to Blackett, 14 December 1883 (doc A78, p 925).

503. Note on coversheet of Bryce to Wahanui, 10 October 1883 (doc A41, p 103); doc A78, p 934.

504. These events, and preparations for the hui, are discussed in doc A41, pp 103–105 and doc A78, pp 930–938.

question of whether to place their lands before the court.<sup>505</sup> The party then left for Kihikihi, where they met Bryce on 30 November and 1 December, at the house the Government had built for Rewi.<sup>506</sup>

Some newspaper accounts described it as a meeting between Bryce and ‘the Maniapotos’, and named Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi, Hopa Te Rangianini, Taromoa, Hitiri Te Paerata, John Ormsby, Te Wharo, and Aporo as either speaking or taking some other part in the proceedings. Te Paerata was a leader of Ngāti Raukawa and of northern sections of Ngāti Tūwharetoa;<sup>507</sup> all others were of Ngāti Maniapoto, though Taromoa was also affiliated to Ngāti Hikairo, and Te Rangianini to Ngāti Matakore.<sup>508</sup> Of the most senior Ngāti Maniapoto leaders, only Wetere Te Rerenga was absent.<sup>509</sup> The Crown’s agent George Wilkinson later acknowledged that representatives from Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Ngāti Hikairo had all been present and taken active part in the proceedings.<sup>510</sup>

The outcome of the hui was an application on behalf of the ‘four tribes’ – Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui – to the Native Land Court, for the purpose of having the external boundary of the 1883 petition area surveyed.<sup>511</sup>

8.5.3.1 Bryce’s address to the rangatira

The formal proceedings began on 30 November with a speech from Bryce to the assembled rangatira.<sup>512</sup> Bryce addressed the Government’s response to the June 1883 petition. He acknowledged that the ‘complaints’ in the petition had ‘something in them’ and said he had initiated legislative reforms that had removed all of the petitioners’ objections: the court had been improved and simplified; lawyers and agents were now excluded from proceedings; means had been ‘arranged for committees to inquire into titles’; the Government now provided funds for surveys; and the law prohibited land purchases before title had been determined. ‘[S]o far as possible,’ he said, ‘the wishes of the petitioners have been carried out.’ He added that he had said ‘that I was willing to help you, and I have kept my word.’<sup>513</sup> Bryce made no mention of the ways in the Native Committees Act had fallen short of what the petitioners had sought in return for their agreement to open the district; on the contrary, he implied that the committees would have real power in determining title when the legislation did not provide for that, and his clear intention was to persuade the assembled leaders that no further reform was needed before they opened their district.

505. ‘Wahanui and the Railway’, New Zealand Herald, 30 November 1883, p 5.

506. Document A78, p 939.

507. Submission 3.4.8, para 10; doc A83, p 18.

508. Document A78, p 939.

509. Editorial, Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2.

510. Document A78, p 959; see also p 958.

511. Document A41, p 105; doc A78, p 938.

512. Marr (doc A78, pp 940–943) and Loveridge (doc A41, pp 106–107) described Bryce’s speech based on accounts from the New Zealand Herald and other newspapers.

513. ‘The Native Minister and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

Having dispensed with the petition, Bryce then turned to what he regarded as the core business for the meeting, which he described as ‘the subject on which everything turns’: his proposal that Ngāti Maniapoto apply to the Native Land Court for an investigation of title to the territory. Bryce said the hui was ‘a representative meeting of the Ngāti Maniapotos’ and maintained that what was now required was for Ngāti Maniapoto to bring their land before the court. ‘There could be no better time for sending applications for hearing for the whole of your territory’, he said. Although Bryce said there were other matters to attend to, such as the completion of the halted railway exploratory surveys and recommencement of the trig survey, he insisted that everything ‘comes back to what I said at first – investigation of title’: ‘Therefore, I advise you, the Ngātimaniapotos, to have your titles investigated. That action will be followed by the appointment of a committee to assist the Court.’ He also undertook to ‘send two Judges to this district, to remain two years if necessary’.<sup>514</sup>

Prior to the hui, Bryce had sought advice from officials about applications that had been made to the Native Land Court. In all, he was aware of 15 applications since 1881 for surveys for court purposes.<sup>515</sup> In the 16 March 1883 agreement, Bryce had made a commitment to hold back survey and court applications within Te Rohe Pōtae until further discussions had been held. Now, he reminded Te Rohe Pōtae leaders of these applications. It was his ‘duty’, he said, to inform the rangatira that if they made their own application to the court, ‘well’, but if they did not, ‘I cannot hold back the Court any longer.’ He concluded by noting that he had ‘spoken plainly . . . as I always do.’<sup>516</sup> In fact, Bryce had withheld salient details about the 15 applications. None were within the inner aukati. One concerned part of Kāwhia, which had been heavily contested for many generations; the other 14 all concerned the narrow area of land in the north-east of the district which was contested by Ngāti Hauā of Waikato, Ngāti Matakore, Ngāti Maniapoto, and other groups.<sup>517</sup> In essence, these cases appear to have been the spillover from southern Waikato Native Land Court cases, in particular the Maungatautari case which caused bitter rivalry between Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Raukawa.<sup>518</sup>

---

514. ‘The Native Minister and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p.6.

515. Document A41, p.104; doc A78, pp.942–943.

516. ‘The Native Minister and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p.6.

517. Document A79, p.56.

518. Document A12, pp.219–224. According to the Ngāti Raukawa deed of settlement, Ngāti Raukawa remained aloof from the original Maungatautari case in the 1870s, partly because of the Kingitanga prohibition on engaging with the court and partly because many of the rangatira with knowledge of the relevant history and whakapapa had been killed during the Waikato war. The court awarded the block to Ngāti Hauā, who claimed it by virtue of military defeats of Ngāti Raukawa during the early nineteenth century in which other iwi had also taken part. Subsequent rehearings also found against Ngāti Raukawa, denying them holdings in ancestral lands. According to the deed, this has continued to be a source of grievance for Ngāti Raukawa right up to the present: Raukawa and Raukawa Settlement Trust and the Crown, ‘Deed of Settlement of Historical Claims’, 2012, paras 2.53–2.56.

8.5.3.2 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders propose an external boundary survey

Wahanui's response was brief.<sup>519</sup> Bryce's words were 'clear', he said, and he 'agreed' with them. However, Wahanui also proposed a course of action that was entirely different from what Bryce had put to them: 'Let there be only one survey. When that is finished make the subdivision surveys, so that each one may know his place. Let the survey be an external one.'<sup>520</sup>

Wahanui said nothing about the court and title determination, and nothing about the railway: everything returned to the need to define the external boundary, which had been a core demand they had set out in the June petition, which Wahanui had repeated when he signalled his objection to the Native Committees Bill in August.

Rewi then spoke in support of Wahanui's proposal. He too said that the first course of action would be for Wahanui to fix the external boundary. This was an important step, he later explained, because it was only through this that 'the minds of people will be known'. Once the boundary had been properly agreed to by all the people, the survey of it could proceed. 'When that is done then a day can be fixed further to discuss the matter.' This indicated that, from Rewi's point of view, precisely how title would be determined (and the further surveys associated with it) would be a matter for further negotiation, and only after the external boundary was confirmed. 'After the tribal boundary is determined subdivision surveys can go on afterwards.'<sup>521</sup>

In response, Bryce indicated his satisfaction that he had obtained their 'agreement'. But he was also coming to terms with the proposal that was now being put to him: 'I understand what you want is that the tribal boundary should first be fixed, after that the subdivisions. I see nothing to object to in the proposal, nor need there be much delay in completing that work.'<sup>522</sup>

Evidently, at this stage, Bryce did not appreciate – or deliberately ignored – the fact that the proposal being put forward by Wahanui and Rewi was on behalf of the four tribes, not just Ngāti Maniapoto; and in respect of the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae, not the 'tribal' boundaries between the iwi. In short, the chiefs were indicating to Bryce the extent of their commitment to the objectives set out in the June petition. This point came to the forefront during the speech of the Ngāti Maniapoto chief Hopa Te Rangianini. Earlier in 1883, Te Rangianini had been associated with a possible application for title determination to land south of Kihikihi.<sup>523</sup> He appeared to reference this in speaking first to Wahanui. Te Rangianini said that if Wahanui had taken a different position 'I would have carried out my intentions' to have his land surveyed. However, Te Rangianini went on to say, because they all agreed on the survey of the external boundary, they could

---

519. Marr (doc A78, pp948–950) and Loveridge (doc A41, pp107–108) described the responses of Wahanui and other rangatira, relying on accounts from the New Zealand Herald and other newspapers.

520. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p6.

521. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p6.

522. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p6.

523. Document A78, p745.

now all work together. Te Rangianini then turned to Bryce and reminded him of their rights: 'We can refer back to the terms of the Queen's treaty of Waitangi. Be merciful to the Maoris; maintain the principles of the treaty.' Wahanui reaffirmed Te Rangianini's words by saying that 'we are one'; he asked that no separate survey be allowed at Kāwhia.<sup>524</sup>

Bryce, however, insisted that Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hikairo make separate applications. He noted that Ngāti Hikairo land 'encroaches on your claim' and said it was for the court to determine who held rights in which areas. 'The evidence of Wahanui and friends will be heard as well as others. Boundaries in that way will be fixed, but I do not understand he or others should prevent them having their claims decided by the Court. . . . The applications of the Ngatimaniapotos will be simultaneous with the Ngatihikairo's.'<sup>525</sup>

Rewi countered Bryce by insisting that it was the collective tribes – including Ngāti Hikairo – that now sought the survey of the external boundary, and that this was needed so they could determine their interests amongst themselves: 'The Ngatimaniapotos and Ngatihikairo's are one people. Their interests should not clash. Let the matter between them be deferred, and one survey made of the whole country.'<sup>526</sup>

Taromoa said that although Ngāti Hikairo had submitted an application to the court, they would 'agree when they hear to-day's proceedings'. This suggests that, although Taromoa was of Ngāti Hikairo, the tribe was not sufficiently well represented at the hui to make a decision there. Taonui also affirmed the position that there should be one survey encompassing the boundary: 'Let there be only one survey; the subdivisions to stand back; tribal boundaries to be arranged first; no other survey to take place till authorised by the natives. A committee will arrange all these matters.'<sup>527</sup>

While Bryce then acknowledged that 'the matter before us is external surveys', he seems to have understood that as meaning surveys of tribal boundaries, not surveys of the external boundary as the rangatira intended. In Marr's view, it is likely that they used the term 'rohe porotaka' to describe the external boundary, but it is not known how this was translated.<sup>528</sup> Bryce insisted that the only way forward was for a formal application to be submitted to the court by Ngāti Maniapoto alone: 'Never mind about Ngatihikairo's and other matters.' He emphasised that the hui represented the most influential Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira and recommended that 'a few' of them sign an application then and there. Blank application forms could then be sent to the other tribes in the district so they, too, could apply to the court. In urging Ngāti Maniapoto to make an application, he was supported by William Grace, who had been presenting himself to the Government as a person with influence over the rangatira. Grace told the leaders that they should act

524. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

525. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

526. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

527. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

528. Document A78, pp 946–947.

immediately to secure their lands; otherwise they would be leaving their children 'as a carcass' to be preyed on by hawks.<sup>529</sup>

According to the New Zealand Herald's report, Rewi appeared to be swayed towards Bryce's position at about this point of the hui: 'If it is decided that we sign an application for a portion of the land about here, and there is no dispute among ourselves as to the ownership; it is good.' Bryce recommended that Wahanui, Rewi, Taonui, Te Wharo and Hopa Te Ranganini be the chiefs whose names would be affixed to the application. Wahanui then asked for the collected leaders to be given the night to consider the matters discussed.<sup>530</sup>

8.5.3.3 Outcome of discussions

Discussions resumed between Bryce and the principal rangatira in a private meeting the next morning (1 December). There are no minutes of what was discussed at this meeting. Marr considered that the 'lengthy private discussions indicate that it took considerable effort and persuasion to overcome chiefly reluctance to make a Court application, even for only an exterior boundary survey'.<sup>531</sup> However, given what subsequently ensued, it is equally possible that the discussion focused on who would be included in the application, and what its purpose would be.

The decision that was made during these discussions was revealed during the course of the public hui, which resumed on the afternoon of 1 December. The New Zealand Herald summarised the outcome in a 3 December report, which was headlined: 'The Natives Accept Mr Bryce's Proposals: The Application to the Land Court Signed'.<sup>532</sup> The following day, the Herald provided further details. It reported that John Ormsby – a relatively young Ngāti Maniapoto leader who took on a greater leadership role in coming years – had managed the public announcement, reading out a document which reportedly set out the reasons why the tribes had agreed to sign the application:

When copies of the new Land Act [i.e. the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 which introduced modest reforms to the Native Land Court] were circulated among the natives they held a meeting at Kuiti to consider its provisions. At this meeting various tribes were represented, and being satisfied with the Act, they were now prepared to agree to Mr Bryce's proposals, re surveying and adjudication of the land.<sup>533</sup>

According to the New Zealand Herald, William Grace then:

Read the application for survey, and read out the boundaries which the natives propose to have, also the names of thirty chiefs which were inserted in the body of the

---

529. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

530. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

531. Document A78, p 955.

532. 'The Natives Accept Mr Bryce's Proposals', New Zealand Herald, 3 December 1883, p 5.

533. 'The Opening of the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 4 December 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p 110).

document, and who represent four tribes, namely, Ngatimaniapoto, Ngatiraukawa, Ngatituwharetoa and Ngatihikairo.<sup>534</sup>

The Waikato Times similarly reported that after a ‘rather lengthened private interview’ between Bryce and the chiefs ‘an application was signed to have the land surveyed and passed through the court’:

Thirty leading chiefs representing the Ngatimaniapoto, Ngatiraukawa, Ngatihikairo and Ngatituwharetoa tribes allowed their names to be inserted in the body of the form, signifying that on behalf of these tribes they were willing that the survey should be proceeded with, and which will be done without delay.<sup>535</sup>

As these and other reports made clear, the purpose of the application was to request a survey of the external boundary of the ‘four tribes’ – though Ngāti Hikairo was now included in place of Whanganui. The reports also indicated that the boundaries of the area to be surveyed were the same as those set out in the June 1883 petition – some 3.5 million acres. The bottom of the application was signed by five principal chiefs – Rewi, Hitiri Te Paerata, Taonui, Wahanui, and Hopa Te Rangianini. A further 30 chiefs signed in the body of the application form, in a place for those endorsing the application.<sup>536</sup> Marr reported that no 1883 application from the four tribes to the court had been found, in spite of ‘extensive searches of official government files and Land Court records.’ The identity of the 30 chiefs therefore remains unknown.<sup>537</sup>

The Crown, in this inquiry, contended that the application was not only for a boundary survey, but also for title to the land. The comment made by Ormsby (as quoted in the New Zealand Herald above) might be interpreted as supporting such a view, but we do not know whether Ormsby himself used the word ‘adjudication’ or that was the newspaper’s interpretation, or indeed that of the newspaper’s source, which is reasonably likely to have been Bryce or William Grace. Loveridge also noted comments made in 1889 by Pepene Eketone – another emerging Ngāti Maniapoto leader – that the survey was to be followed by an ‘investigation of the title to the land . . . in full at one Court.’<sup>538</sup> But Marr pointed out that these comments were made much later, after title had been determined and the Crown was preparing to purchase the land: Eketone’s focus was on protecting the land under those circumstances, not on the nuances of a decision made six years earlier.<sup>539</sup>

In our view, there is little in the events prior to the hui, the reports of the meeting with Bryce, or the reports about the application itself to suggest that rangatira signed it with the intention of commencing title determination proceedings

---

534. ‘The Opening of the King Country’, New Zealand Herald, 4 December 1883, p 5 (doc A41, p110).

535. ‘Mr Bryce’s Mission Successful’, Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2 (doc A41, p 111).

536. Document A78, p957.

537. Document A78, pp 957–958, 959.

538. Taupouuiatia commission, minute book, 29 July 1889, fols 38–39 (doc A90, pp 37–38).

539. Taupouuiatia commission, minute book, p 41 (doc A90, p 39).

over the petition area. Aside from the comments made by Ormsby and Eketone, all other evidence points to a view that the rangatira signed the application on the express understanding that they were only allowing the survey of the external boundary, and that this would be a further step towards achieving what they had set out in their petition. Although they might have approved of aspects of reforms to the court's procedure that had recently occurred, Wahanui's prior and ongoing objections to the extent of those reforms indicated that they remained unsatisfied.

Of the principal leaders who signed, four were of Ngāti Maniapoto, one of whom was also affiliated to Ngāti Hikairo. But the application was not solely on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto. The inclusion of Hitiri Te Paerata (in place of Te Wharo, whom Bryce had suggested) provided representation from Ngāti Raukawa and from northern hapū of Ngāti Tūwharetoa. Wilkinson acknowledged that rangatira from all four tribes named in the application (Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tūwharetoa, and Hikairo) had been at the meeting and had signed.<sup>540</sup> The Waikato Times also reported that the 'thirty leading chiefs' who signed were representative of the 'four tribes' whose interests were implicated by the application.<sup>541</sup>

Notably, the 'four tribes' named in the application included Ngāti Hikairo, but did not mention Whanganui iwi with interests in the petition area (prominent Whanganui leaders would soon afterwards offer their support, as we will see in section 8.5.4). Nor is there specific evidence of broad representation among Ngāti Tūwharetoa hapū with interests in the area. Rewi and Wahanui acknowledged that there was work to do to ensure that all communities along the border supported the application, and continued to support the broader agenda set out in the June petition. Rewi suggest that Wahanui would proceed around the rohe 'fixing' the boundary: only through this process could the people's minds be known.<sup>542</sup>

In sum, the intention of the chiefs in signing the application differed markedly from what Bryce had set out to achieve. Rather than an application by Ngāti Maniapoto for the title determination of their territory, it was an application from representatives of the four named tribes for the survey of the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae – the entire territory that had been set out in the petition. In the chiefs' view, they had obtained the Government's agreement that the application would only involve the survey of the external boundary – any questions about what would happen after this would be for later discussion, with Taonui preferring a Māori 'committee' to take over from there.<sup>543</sup> Bryce appeared to emphasise this understanding by saying that a surveyor would be sent immediately. According to the Waikato Times, he also insisted that the boundary survey could only be completed if a trig survey was also conducted.<sup>544</sup>

In official terms, however, the document signed by the rangatira was an application to the court for title determination. As Marr explained, there was no process

540. Wilkinson report, 14 May 1884, AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9 (doc A78, p 959).

541. 'Mr Bryce's Mission Successful', Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2 (doc A78, p 958).

542. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

543. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

544. 'Mr Bryce's Mission Successful', Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2 (doc A41, p 112); 'The Natives Accept Mr Bryce's Proposals', New Zealand Herald, 3 December 1883, p 5.

in place by which the Crown could formally achieve what had been discussed and agreed to at the hui. The Native Land Act 1873 provided for the court to determine ownership of any land placed before it and provided furthermore that the land could be awarded only to named individuals.<sup>545</sup> Chief Judge Macdonald later explained that the court only had powers to determine tribal boundaries after investigating title. While the Native Land Act 1873 had anticipated that tribal boundaries might be fixed outside the court through a process of prior investigation by specially designated district officers, these had been barely implemented and had quickly fallen into abeyance.<sup>546</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had gone to considerable lengths to explain to Bryce what they wanted – a survey of the external boundary. As the petition and other correspondence had made clear, they regarded this as a first step towards securing Crown recognition of their authority over their land. It would have been entirely possible for Bryce, or the rangatira themselves, to arrange for the boundary to be surveyed, without any application to the court; the law required a survey before title could be awarded, but it did not require a title application before there could be a survey.<sup>547</sup> Yet Bryce repeatedly insisted that that was the case – the only option available to the rangatira, if they wanted the external boundary surveyed, was to make an application to the court.

Furthermore, and contrary to what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had made clear in their discussions with Bryce, he subsequently portrayed their request to confirm the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae as an application for both survey and title determination by Ngāti Maniapoto alone. Bryce immediately sent a telegram to William Rolleston, Minister of Lands, to say that he had met with ‘nearly all the principal men of the Ngatimaniapoto tribe’, who had submitted an application for a ‘survey and investigation of title for the bulk of the land known as the King Country.’<sup>548</sup>

Bryce was reportedly very pleased and ‘somewhat proud’ of the result.<sup>549</sup> Initial newspaper reports characterised the application in various ways. The New Zealand Herald ran two reports on December 3, one characterising the application as being ‘for determination of title,’<sup>550</sup> and the other describing it more accurately as an application by the four tribes (Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tūwharetoa, and Hikairo) ‘for external survey of the whole of what has been known as the King Country.’<sup>551</sup> The Waikato Times described it as an application to ‘have the land surveyed and passed through the court.’<sup>552</sup>

Very soon, commentators were turning their attention to the implications of the agreement. The Waikato Times opined that the external survey would soon be

545. Native Land Act 1873, s 47.

546. Document A78, p 946.

547. Native Land Act 1873, s 33.

548. Bryce, telegram to Rolleston, 1 December 1883 (doc A78, pp 962–963).

549. Editorial, Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2.

550. Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 3 December 1883, p 4.

551. ‘The Natives Accept Mr Bryce’s Proposals’, New Zealand Herald, 3 December 1883, p 5.

552. ‘Mr Bryce’s Mission Successful’, Waikato Times, 4 December 1884, p 2.

followed by internal subdivision, upon which the district would be ‘thrown open for settlement, with convenient roads and, let us hope, a railway.’<sup>553</sup> It also claimed that “‘Kingism’ [was] now a thing of the past and [could not] in any shape be again revived.”<sup>554</sup> Bryce himself was reported as saying that the agreement represented ‘the final settlement of the native difficulty’, which would render the office of Native Minister unnecessary, presumably on the basis that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were now expected to assimilate.<sup>555</sup>

8.5.3.4 Further discussions among the iwi

Following the hui, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders returned to their communities to consult on their decisions and gain agreement to the external boundary survey. One of the key meetings was at Kāwhia. Bryce had left Kihikihi immediately upon conclusion of the hui, arriving in Kāwhia on 4 December. The following day he attended a hui with some 150 people, including the rangatira of Ngāti Hikairo, who appeared to have been informed of the outcomes of the hui at Kihikihi. Although they expressed support for the idea of the external boundary survey, they were also concerned at the speed of the process underway, and Tāwhiao’s lack of involvement.<sup>556</sup>

Bryce was placed in the position of having to encourage their involvement in the application for the external boundary survey, while also promoting the idea that this would allow Ngāti Hikairo to pursue their own, independent claims to land in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>557</sup> Here, Bryce acknowledged the true nature of the application. According to the New Zealand Herald’s report:

Mr Bryce said the Ngatimaniapotos would get the most of the land when the survey for the tribal ownership was completed, but he was sorry to find a wrong impression about the survey. This was not for fixing the title. The real survey would follow the Land Court.<sup>558</sup>

This appears to suggest that Bryce understood the agreement as being for a boundary survey followed by a process in which iwi territories would be defined. This seems to be consistent with his words at the Kihikihi hui. It is possible that he assumed that the court would define the iwi rohe, whereas rangatira had made no commitment about what would happen after the boundary survey was completed and seem to have intended that Māori would determine the rohe among themselves, either through a committee they would appoint (as Taonui had said) or by some other means that remained to be determined (as Rewi had suggested). Bryce’s comments suggest that, from his point of view, the boundary survey would have no practical effect, at least in terms of land ownership; it would soon be

---

553. Editorial, Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2.

554. ‘The Natives Change of Policy’, Waikato Times, 4 December 1883, p 2.

555. ‘Mr Bryce on the Native Question’, Waikato Times, 5 December 1883, p 5.

556. Document A78, pp 968–969.

557. Document A78, pp 968–969.

558. ‘Mr Bryce at Kawhia’, New Zealand Herald, 14 December 1883, p 6.

subsumed by the court process. Bryce also maintained that the Ngāti Hikairo part of the boundary would be separate from, but eventually join, 'Wahanui's boundary'. Reports of the hui indicate that the chiefs then signed an 'agreement', which also does not appear to have survived.<sup>559</sup> According to Marr, newspaper reports characterised it as an application from Ngāti Hikairo to extend the boundary survey a little further north, to accommodate their interests.<sup>560</sup>

A similar hui took place on 8 December at the Ngāti Raukawa settlement, Aotearoa, reportedly for those who were concerned about the potential meaning and effect of the application. Hitiri Te Paerata was among those who spoke in favour of the application. After it had been explained, those chiefs present are said to have agreed to support the application.<sup>561</sup>

Some communities continued to express concern about the survey, with newspaper reports suggesting they saw it as a threat to their own land and also to the Kingitanga policy of not engaging with Crown institutions. At Tokanui on 6 December, Te Rangianini sought to persuade his Ngāti Matakore people to support the survey. The Waikato Times reported on the hui, attributing its account to William Grace, who had attended the 1 December hui in support of Bryce. A minority of Ngāti Matakore people were opposed to the survey, but most, according to the report, supported it. One of those present was Hauāuru, who was affiliated to Ngāti Matakore (of Ngāti Maniapoto) and Ngāti Hauā of Waikato. He reportedly supported the survey, promising to visit Tāwhiao and 'say farewell' to the King's laws. But a few days later, he and his Ngāti Hauā kin were reported to have changed their minds and decided to obstruct the survey. The Times's correspondent was not sure about the reason for this,<sup>562</sup> but soon afterwards Hauāuru explained that he feared the land would be lost if he followed Wahanui's policy.<sup>563</sup> In this, he was possibly influenced by the newspaper reports suggesting that the land would soon be divided up and opened for settlement. Indeed, Bryce himself would very soon afterwards be emphasising that the application would determine tribal boundaries and ownership of the land, as we will see in the next section.

8.5.4 Confirmation of the agreement to survey the external boundary, December 1883

Bryce returned to Kihikihi on 18 December 1883, around the time Rochfort also arrived at the settlement, his survey having been stopped a few weeks before. He had two main orders of business: determining whether the amnesty would apply to Ngatai Te Mamaku; and making final arrangements for the boundary survey and other surveys that he wanted to complete. Wahanui and other senior leaders

---

559. 'Mr Bryce at Kawhia', New Zealand Herald, 14 December 1883, p 6; doc A78, pp 968–970. It is possible the 'agreement' signed at Kāwhia was recorded on the same document as the original boundary application. Neither has been located.

560. Document A78, p 970.

561. Document A78, p 967.

562. 'Kihikihi', Waikato Times, 6 December 1883, p 2; 'The Opening of the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 10 December 1883, p 2; 'Te Awamutu', Waikato Times, 11 December 1883, p 2.

563. 'Tawhiao and the Natives', Waikato Times, 22 December 1883, p 2.

also sought to confirm the support of the district's people for the boundary survey, and the broader kaupapa of the 1883 petition.

Several hundred Māori converged on Kihikihi for the meeting. They included representatives of Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Mahuta who were opposed to the survey, and senior leaders from what had now become the 'five tribes' – Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and northern Whanganui iwi such as Ngāti Hāua – who supported the survey on the basis that it would define all of their collective territories. On the morning of 18 December Bryce met privately with Wahanui and other senior leaders, while opponents of the survey held their own hui outside. The following morning he met Wahanui and other leaders to discuss Ngatai, and in the afternoon the agenda moved on to survey arrangements. By the end of the hui, Bryce had gathered the information he needed to justify a pardon for Ngatai, and final arrangements had been made for the boundary survey, and also for the resumption of railway exploration.<sup>564</sup> These arrangements were confirmed in letters which were exchanged at the close of the hui, setting out the parties' shared understandings: the Government would carry out an accurate survey of the boundary for the purpose of issuing a Crown grant to the tribes and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae; and the survey would cost no more than £1,600, which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would pay.<sup>565</sup>

8.5.4.1 The confirmation of Ngatai's inclusion in the amnesty

The settler press in 1880 had treated the murder of William Moffatt as a common crime by a 'mere handful of savages' bent on 'cool, deliberate murder.'<sup>566</sup> This type of response was common for the time, as was the reluctance of the Government to pursue the perpetrators beyond the aukati, for fear of angering the Kīngitanga.<sup>567</sup> However, in February 1883 when the general amnesty was issued it was unclear whether amnesty should be extended to Ngatai.

As discussed in section 8.5.2, it was Ngatai who had stopped Rochfort from crossing the aukati at Taumarunui. From Bryce's point of view, including him in the general amnesty could help to secure his support for a resumption of the survey – but Bryce nonetheless had to confirm that Ngatai's killing of Moffatt had been of a political nature; otherwise it would not meet the criteria set out in the Amnesty Act 1882.<sup>568</sup> Because Moffatt had been known to Ngatai and other members of Ngāti Hāua prior to his murder, there were questions surrounding the circumstances of his death. Ministers sought clarification as to whether the murder had been personally or politically motivated, as Moffatt had once lived within the very same boundaries for which he had been killed for stepping upon.<sup>569</sup>

---

564. Document A78, pp 971–972, 981.

565. Document A78, pp 981–983.

566. Editorial, Taranaki Herald, 17 November 1880, p 2 (doc A78, p 124).

567. Document A78, pp 124–125.

568. Document A78, p 125.

569. 'Inquiry by Hon Native Minister at Kihikihi', AJHR, 1886, G-8, p 2.

On the morning of 19 December 1883, Bryce questioned Ngatai over his relationship with Moffatt, the nature of the murder, and the politics of the aukati.<sup>570</sup> Bryce then verified Ngatai's story with Wahanui and Rewi. Later, once Bryce had returned to Wellington, he and his fellow ministers unanimously agreed that Ngatai was included in the amnesty, as the crime had been committed in protection of the aukati and was in fact of a political nature.<sup>571</sup>

8.5.4.2 Confirmation of the survey arrangements

The various groups came together on the afternoon of 19 December. Rewi, Wahanui, and Taonui were reported to have spoken first in favour of conducting a boundary survey, as a first step towards Crown recognition of the boundary and the five tribes' authority over lands within the boundary. Wahanui said that he had started the 'vessel (the survey) on its course. All sail had been set, and he was not going to take in a reef'.<sup>572</sup> However, a number of other leaders then spoke in opposition to the survey, most of whom were identified as having associations with Waikato, though Hauāuru was also affiliated to Ngāti Matakore, who in turn were closely connected to both Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa. Hauāuru and other people maintained support for Tāwhiao and opposed the taking of any action to survey their lands.<sup>573</sup>

Bryce replied to these statements by reiterating his opposition to Tāwhiao. 'New Zealand is too small for two sovereignties, and I will never recognize your authority except over your own tribe.' He emphasised that they would be able to manage their own lands and also encouraged them not to fear the boundary application. 'An application to the Court does not settle the ownership. It is an application to the Court to settle who has the right in the land. If you have real claims, you will not fear to have them investigated.' The purpose of this particular application, he said, was 'to determine boundaries as between tribe and tribe.' Afterwards would come 'subdivisions between hapu and hapu, and possibly after that for settlement of individual claims'.<sup>574</sup> As already noted, this was not how those who had signed the application saw it. Nor was it consistent with how Bryce had explained the application to Ngāti Hikairo on 4 December (section 8.5.3.4), except to the extent that Bryce appeared to believe that court-led definition of tribal boundaries would follow the boundary survey. This explanation cannot have helped to smooth over the differences between the four tribes and those of Waikato.

One chief, Haimona, reportedly told Bryce at this point that the reason they objected was because 'we do not want to be counter-claimants, because we have seen in the Native Lands Courts people putting in applications for land who have small interest become strong because they are the first claimants'.<sup>575</sup> Bryce responded by saying that the current proposals 'will remove the evils he complains 570. Document A78, p 125; 'Inquiry by Hon Native Minister at Kihikihi', AJHR, 1886, G-8, pp 1-3.

571. 'Inquiry by Hon Native Minister at Kihikihi', AJHR, 1886, G-8, p 3.

572. 'The Kingites and the Native Minister', New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1883, p 6.

573. Document A78, pp 972-973.

574. 'The Kingites and the Native Minister', New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1883, p 6.

575. 'The Kingites and the Native Minister', New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1883, p 6.

of'. The 'large tribal boundaries', he said, should be 'settled as a first step'; it was for this reason, he said, that he had 'acquiesced in the proposal for this large survey'. Bryce explained further that the 'names of the tribes and individuals will be admitted, but the survey and the final division will be made without claims and counter-claims. Understand that the applications will not confine the rights to the applicants, or to the names only of those contained in them.'<sup>576</sup>

According to Marr, Bryce's speech suggested that he envisaged there would be a stage prior to any investigation of title that would be 'confined to a boundary determination only', a stage which was not provided for in the native land legislation.<sup>577</sup> However, it was unclear exactly what process he envisaged, except that the court would be involved. In this, he differed from what Wahanui and the other chiefs had set out at the previous hui. There, they had insisted that any action that would be taken initially would be confined to a survey of the external boundary. Though they referred to the process by which they envisaged titles to be determined as set out in the petition – the establishment first of iwi boundaries, then hapū boundaries, then individual interests – they explicitly ruled out any decisions on how this would work until the external boundary survey had been completed.

Bryce attempted to reassure those who objected that the application did not prejudice their interests to land. In doing so, he suggested that the establishment of tribal boundaries would occur without claims or counter-claims, perhaps a reference to the proposal he made at the previous hui to give the prospective native committee a role in the process. While this may have gone some way to assuaging the concerns of those present, it was a proposal that went beyond what the chiefs had agreed to at the previous hui, where they had confined matters solely to the survey of the external boundary, leaving how the title to the land would be confirmed to later discussions.<sup>578</sup>

Wahanui and the other chiefs were not given the opportunity to respond to Bryce, who announced at the end of his speech that he saw no point in further discussions and appears to have departed immediately. This only caused further debate among those present, though newspaper reports suggested that the majority supported the external boundary survey, with only a minority still opposed.<sup>579</sup>

8.5.4.3 Exchange of letters

On the following day (19 December), the chiefs met with assistant surveyor-general Stephenson Percy Smith, who was accompanied by various surveyors who were to conduct the work. Bryce refrained from attending this part of the proceedings, instead conducting his inquiry into whether the chief Ngatai should be included in the amnesty. The chiefs (Rewi, Wetere, and John Ormsby were named in reports<sup>580</sup>) agreed that the Government would conduct the work at the 576. 'The Kingites and the Native Minister', New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1883, p 6.

577. Document A78, p 976.

578. 'The Native Minister in Waikato', Waikato Times, 20 December 1883, p 2 (doc A78, pp 974–977).

579. Document A78, p 977.

580. 'The Survey of the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 20 December 1883, p 5.

cost of £1,600 (Wilkinson later reported that they had previously negotiated with private surveyors who intended to charge over £20,000 for the same work). They were also reported to have obtained an agreement that if trig surveys were necessary, Māori would not be charged.<sup>581</sup> Subsequently, newspapers reported that the leaders had agreed to the trig survey being conducted and to railway surveys also resuming. Reports also suggested that the rangatira regarded the trig survey as Government work, but saw the boundary ‘as a private survey’ which they had contracted the Government to complete for them.<sup>582</sup> Wahanui later (in 1885) said he had not been consulted about trig surveys,<sup>583</sup> but Rewi (in a letter to Bryce) confirmed that the rangatira had consented to them.<sup>584</sup> It is possible that consent was given in principle, but that Māori were not made aware of the scale of work involved: trig surveys required extensive survey work throughout the district, not just along the boundary.

Smith recorded that the meeting was pan-tribal, including representatives of the ‘four tribes’. Among the chiefs who were present were Te Herekieke, Ngahuru Te Rangikaiwhiria, Te Pikikōtuku, and Hitiri Te Paerata – all of whom Smith identified as having associations with Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>585</sup> As noted earlier, Te Paerata was an influential Ngāti Raukawa leader who was also affiliated to Tūwharetoa. Ngahuru Te Rangikaiwhiri (Ngāti Manunui, Ngāti Parekawa, Ngāti Hāua) of western Taupō was among the most senior Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira.<sup>586</sup> So, too, was Te Herekieke (Ngāti Aho) of southern Taupō.<sup>587</sup> Te Pikikōtuku (Ngāti Hāua, Ngāti Hekeāwai, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa) was a very senior rangatira of Taumarunui and northern Whanganui.<sup>588</sup> Together, these four possessed mana over large areas of Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui lands from the north-west to the south-west of Lake Taupō, making it clear that the survey application had broad support from those Ngāti Tūwharetoa people whose lands were directly affected.

Claimants also recorded another Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Ngāti Raukawa rangatira, Te Papanui Tamahiki, as supporting Wahanui’s negotiations with the Crown, though we do not have specific evidence of his attendance at this hui.<sup>589</sup> The

581. Document A78, pp 979–980, 984.

582. ‘The Survey of the King Country’, New Zealand Herald, 20 December 1883, p 5; ‘Waikato District News’, New Zealand Herald, 31 December 1883, p 6; ‘The Survey of the King Country’, New Zealand Herald, 22 December 1883, p 6; ‘The Survey of the Railway Line’, New Zealand Herald, 21 December 1883, p 5.

583. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 14.

584. Document A41, p 127.

585. Document A78, p 981.

586. He could also claim affiliation to Ngāti Parekawa, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Hāua: doc J22, p [26] n; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 67, 222, 296; doc A50, pp 142–143; doc A60, pp 487–488, 1220.

587. Transcript 4.1.9, pp 354, 553; doc A50, pp 75, 140, 152–153.

588. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 191, 221; doc A50, pp 75, 140–142; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, p 87.

589. Transcript 4.1.9, pp 387–388; doc J22, paras 88–89.

Whanganui whenua Tribunal identified three principal rangatira of northern Whanganui at this time: one was Te Pikikōtuku, and the others were Ngatai Te Mamaku (Ngāti Hāua, Ngāti Hekeāwai<sup>590</sup>) and Matuaahu Te Wharerangi (Ngāti Hikairo ki Tongariro; Ngāti Tūwharetoa);<sup>591</sup> claimants recorded all three as having supported Wahanui's negotiations with the Crown, though, again, we do not have specific evidence of Matuaahu being present at this hui.<sup>592</sup> In sum, the survey agreement represented all who claimed interests in the land, with the exceptions of Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Mahuta. Settler media later emphasised this point, presenting it as representing a fracturing of the Kingitanga and a transfer of power from Tāwhiao to Wahanui.<sup>593</sup> Other observers (including Wilkinson) presented it as a split between the territory's traditional rights-holders and the more recent (and disputed) land claims of the King and his closest kin.<sup>594</sup> According to one report, Tāwhiao visited Wahanui late in December, reversing his opposition to the survey.<sup>595</sup>

As with the March 1883 agreement, the December 1883 survey agreement was secured with an exchange of letters. The letter from the chiefs, dated 19 December, said:

Kua whakaae matou ma to Kawanatanga e whakaoti pai nga ruritanga tika o te rohe porotaka o to matou poraka e taea ai te whakaputa mai te Karauna Karaati ki a matou me o matou iwi me o matou hapu hoki, mo te utu kua whakaritea mai nei e koe e kore e neke atu i te kotahi mano i te ono rau pauna £1,600 hei utunga atu ma matou. Na ko ta matou kupu tuturu tenei katia rawa tenei whakaritenga e whakarereketia e tetahi atu tikanga, e tetahi atu Kawanatanga ranei a muri ake nei.

We consent that the Government should make an accurate survey of the external boundary of our block in order that a Crown grant may issue to us, our tribes, and our hapus for the price as arranged by you, namely, that the cost to us should not exceed £1,600. Now, this is our decided word: this agreement must not be altered by any other arrangement or by any future Government.<sup>596</sup>

The letter was signed by Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi, Ngahuru Te Rangikaiwhiria, Te Herekieke, and Te Pikikōtuku.<sup>597</sup> We note that the signatories expected a Crown

590. Document H10, p 6; submission 3.4.211, p 13.

591. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, p 100.

592. Document J22, paras 88–89.

593. 'The Position of Tawhiao', Waikato Times, 27 December 1883, p 2.

594. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 9; editorial, New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1883, p 4; 'The Native Minister in Waikato', Waikato Times, 20 December 1883, p 2.

595. 'Kihikihi', Waikato Times, 29 December 1883, p 2.

596. 'Wahanui and Others to Smith', 19 December 1883, AJHR, 1885, G-9, p 2 (doc A41, pp 122–123; doc A78, p 982).

597. 'Wahanui and Others to Smith', 19 December 1883, AJHR, 1885, G-9, p 2 (doc A41, pp 122–123; doc A78, p 982).

grant to follow the survey – that is, the Crown would provide a warrant or deed acknowledging the five tribes' ownership of the land inside the boundary, without any investigation of title. Smith appeared to confirm this impression, reportedly telling Rewi and others 'that the total cost of the survey, £1600, would entitle the owners to a certificate of title'.<sup>598</sup>

The letter from Smith faithfully repeated the arrangements set out in the letter from the rangatira, except for a final additional comment that the 'terms of this document apply to the external boundaries only'.<sup>599</sup> This addition came from Bryce, who noted to Smith that 'I am content you should bind the government present and future in the manner and to the terms proposed. It is of course the external boundary that is intended and not future subdivisions'.<sup>600</sup>

Bryce's comment on the agreement supports the chiefs' understanding that it was limited to the survey of the external boundary. Nothing in their letter, or in Smith's response, indicated that a title investigation by the court would follow on from the survey; on the contrary, Smith had given an assurance that a Crown grant would be issued to the applicants on completion of the survey, without mention of any other formality being necessary. Perhaps the only concession the chiefs made, and the only difference from their June petition, was to allow for their customary lands to be converted into a Crown grant to all of the tribes and hapū. Nothing was said about any court involvement in determining title or subdividing the land into iwi or hapū blocks. During the speeches at the previous hui, Taonui had hinted that any future subdivision should be conducted by a committee that Māori would appoint, and Bryce had responded that native committees could inquire into titles. But how exactly this would happen was a matter for future discussion. Rewi had suggested as much during the first hui at Kihikihi in March 1883: first, the external boundary would need to be finalised, then another day could be fixed for discussing matters further.

Six years later, Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauāuru wrote to the Native Minister explaining their understanding of the agreement. According to Marr:

They explained (in translation) that in 1883 they had held a large meeting at Kihikihi with Bryce and there agreed to fix the outside boundary of the land known as the 'Rohe Potae' of the five tribes (the application of 1 December 1883). These five tribes were Ngati Maniapoto, Ngati Raukawa, Ngati Hikairo, Whanganui and Tuwharetoa. An agreement was drawn up regarding the survey and the price for it (19 December 1883). Under this agreement they understood the whole block was 'as one' with one survey and one Court investigation (to confirm it). They explained that in their view, the 'weight and authority of this agreement was exactly similar to that of the treaty between ourselves and the Government'.<sup>601</sup>

---

598. 'Yesterday's Proceedings', Waikato Times, 20 December 1883, p 2.

599. Smith to Wahanui and others, 19 December 1883, AJHR, 1885, G-9, p 2, (also reproduced in doc A41, pp 122–123 and doc A78, p 982).

600. Bryce, note on survey agreement, 19 December 1883 (doc A78, p 983).

601. Document A78, p 984.

While Bryce may have taken a different view, the two written documents affirmed the understanding of the chiefs: they had submitted an application on behalf of the five tribes to the whole of Te Rohe Pōtae and had entered into an agreement by which the government would survey the external boundary and then acknowledge their ownership. In the meantime, Bryce had promised that all other applications to the court relating to this area would be held back while this process was completed. Once this was done, they could turn their minds to what was next.

8.5.5 Treaty analysis and findings

Here we pause to consider the nature and significance of the December 1883 external boundary survey agreement in terms of the Treaty, and in terms of the negotiations as they stood at that time. As we have seen, there was considerable difference between the parties on these issues: the claimants considered that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made the application solely for the purposes of confirming the external boundary and therefore the territory in which Māori authority would endure.<sup>602</sup> The claimants also believed that Bryce misled the applicants into believing ‘that their desires would be met’ – in other words, that an application could lead directly to a Crown grant in the name of all five tribes, with no further involvement from the court in iwi or hapū subdivision – when the law did not provide for that.<sup>603</sup> The Crown considered that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made the application in an attempt to take control of the title determination process through the Native Land Court and extract further concessions from the Government.<sup>604</sup>

8.5.5.1 What did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori seek in making the application?

The intentions of the five tribes in making the application were signalled in the events leading to the hui with Bryce in November and December 1883. In the June petition, they had clearly stated their opposition to the Native Land Court’s involvement in determining title to their land. The Crown’s response, in the Native Committees Act 1883, was forcefully opposed by Wahanui on the grounds that the committees did not replace the court as the deciding body; Te Rohe Pōtae Māori then stopped the railway surveys on the grounds that they went beyond what had been agreed to in March 1883. Wahanui looked to another meeting with Bryce through which he could demonstrate his people’s support for the petition and attempt to gain Crown agreement to its terms. Nothing in these circumstances suggest that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were about to make an application to the court to seek title determination at iwi or hapū level. Rather, their desire was to have the boundary surveyed, as a step towards having their authority over the land within the boundary recognised.

Notwithstanding Wahanui’s objections to the Native Committees Act, Bryce sought to persuade Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that he had met their legislative

---

602. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 17, 21.

603. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 18.

604. Submission 3.4.301, p 61.

demands as far 'as possible', and that he had therefore 'kept my word' to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. In this, he was acknowledging the reciprocal nature of the March 1883 agreement, and the reasonable expectation of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that he would make meaningful concessions in return for their consent to further surveys. But he was also claiming that the Crown had done what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought, when quite plainly it had not, as Wahanui had already told Bryce.<sup>605</sup>

Bryce also sought to test the resolve of Ngāti Maniapoto leaders in particular, by presenting them with various court applications that had been made to Te Rohe Pōtae lands, in the hope of persuading them that they now had to apply to the Native Land Court to have the title to their land confirmed. If they did, Bryce promised that a committee would be appointed to assist the court, and two judges would be sent for that purpose. But if they did not apply, he said, he would not be able to hold back the competing claims for much longer.

Wahanui's proposal to Bryce at the hui was unambiguous: the Crown should proceed to survey the external boundary that had been set out in the June petition. As he had earlier informed the Government in response to the legislative reforms, the external boundary survey was the first matter he and the other leaders wished to have confirmed. Once that had been completed, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could turn to the work of defining interests, as set out in their petition: first, the rohe of each tribe; then the rohe of hapū; then finally the definition of the relative interests of each individual in communal rohe. As Taonui had explained, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders saw this as work they could complete themselves; indeed, the Kingitanga tribes had held previous discussions about inter-tribal boundaries in 1879 and 1882.<sup>606</sup>

Nothing in Wahanui's proposal suggested that the Native Land Court would have any role in determining title to the lands; instead, Wahanui wanted the Crown to provide for formal recognition of the external boundary. This was but one of the demands they had set out in the June petition. All other demands concerned the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within the boundary and were therefore contingent on its confirmation. None of those demands contemplated the court being involved to any extent.

Wahanui was supported by other leaders who spoke, including those of Ngāti Hikairo, who appeared eager to join the initiative that was being proposed. All insisted that whatever agreement they reached at that time, the leaders would need to return to their communities to gain their consent.

8.5.5.2 What did the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agree to?

In response to Wahanui's proposal, Bryce – in the 1 December 1883 hui – agreed that the external boundary could be surveyed, but said that this could only be achieved through an application to the court. He suggested that Ngāti Maniapoto alone make such an application. In the debate that followed, Bryce continued to

---

605. 'The Native Minister and the Kingites', New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6 (doc A41, p106; doc A78, pp 940–941).

606. Transcript 4.1.8, p 119; doc A78, pp 454–456, 496.

insist that the Native Land Court would need to have a role in whatever process ensued. To this extent, the Crown is correct in submitting that Bryce ‘explained that there would need to be an investigation into their title in order for a Crown grant to issue’, and that, as a matter of law at that time, ‘final boundaries and ownership would necessarily have to be established by the Court.’<sup>607</sup>

But Bryce got only part of what he wanted. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders agreed to take his advice, and make an application to the court, in order to have their external boundary confirmed. But Bryce did not succeed in persuading Ngāti Maniapoto to make that application alone, and nor did he succeed in persuading them to allow the court to determine title to their land. Rather, the application was from a range of chiefs representing Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui, who signed (with support from Ngāti Hikairo) on the understanding that they were only agreeing to an external boundary survey, which would be followed immediately by the issue of a Crown grant without any title investigation. Bryce may have initially believed he had obtained a different outcome under which they had applied for title determination, but there is little to indicate that the chiefs agreed. The suggestion, reported in settler media, that Ormsby read out a document supporting the Native Lands Amendment Act 1883 and the Native Committees Act 1883 appears inconsistent with the understandings the chiefs took from the meeting.

The outcome of this meeting was confirmed when the assistant surveyor-general, Stephenson Percy Smith, returned two weeks later. The exchange of letters between Smith and the rangatira set out in more precise terms what had been agreed between the chiefs and Bryce: the Government would carry out an accurate survey of the external boundary of the tribes’ rohe in order that a Crown grant could be issued to them, including their iwi and their hapū (‘ki a matou iwi me o matou hapu hoki’). There was an agreement to allow the exploratory railway survey to continue, and contingent agreement on the part of some (but not all) Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to allow the trig surveys to resume.

Bryce considered that the letters confirmed a victory for his position, because he had secured what was for all intents and purposes an application from the tribes to commence the court’s proceedings in Te Rohe Pōtae, in addition to the continuation of the railway and trig surveys. But despite Bryce’s assertions, what was in fact achieved through these discussions was a compromise. Bryce agreed that the Crown would carry out a survey of the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae and that no other proceedings in the Native Land Court would occur while that work was carried out. And he had no choice but to accept that the application would be made collectively by the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and northern Whanganui iwi, rather than by Ngāti Maniapoto alone; and that the survey would contain the lands of those tribes that fell within the aukati, and not just those of Ngāti Maniapoto alone. The determination of ‘tribal’ boundaries, and the means by which that would occur, would not be considered until after the external boundary survey had been completed.

---

607. Submission 3.4.301, pp 56, 57.

The evidence, then, does not support the Crown's contention that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made the application in the hope that 'the Court would recognise their title';<sup>608</sup> or that 'the Rohe Pōtae leadership knew they were taking risks with the application for a survey and title investigation,' as this was the only way to 'take control of the title determination process and extract concessions from the government'.<sup>609</sup> On the contrary, they proceeded on the basis of clear assurances that the agreement was for an external boundary survey, after which a Crown grant would be issued to all of the applicants. Had Bryce been successful in persuading them to take their land to the court for iwi and hapū titles to be determined, there would have been little need to survey the external boundary; the proceedings of the Native Land Court would have followed almost immediately, such had been Bryce's prior insistence on pushing the work through.

Rather, the chiefs submitted an application to the court for the survey of their external boundary. They did so because Bryce had led them to believe that submitting an application was the only way to trigger the process for obtaining such a survey. This arrangement was confirmed in the exchange of letters between the chiefs and Smith, which constituted an agreement between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown on the process that would be entered into from that point. The Government would undertake the survey work, to be paid for by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori; in the meantime, the Crown would hold back any further applications to lands inside the boundary. How title determination would proceed would await further discussions once the external boundary survey had been completed.

8.5.5.3 *Did Bryce knowingly mislead Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?

There is a genuine question as to whether Bryce acted in good faith during these negotiations, and whether he ever intended to put in place changes necessary to bring the agreed process into effect. The claimants believe that the Crown, and Bryce in particular, misled them.

They submitted that Bryce led Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to believe that the Crown would recognise their external boundary and their authority within it, and encouraged them to apply to the court on that basis, when the court had no power to fix an external boundary as they intended. They also submitted that Bryce led Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to believe that native committees would play a significant role in determining iwi and hapū titles when the government law did not provide for that. And they also submitted that Bryce promised to withhold Native Land Court applications within their territory, but later accepted competing applications.<sup>610</sup>

The Crown submitted that the issue was whether there was 'machinery to make all the land within the area delineated within the survey inalienable, and to provide for governance within that area'.<sup>611</sup> It submitted that Bryce considered the legislation he promoted 'could be used together to approximate the result that was

---

608. Submission 3.4.301, p 55.

609. Submission 3.4.301, p 61.

610. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 18, 21; submission 3.4.128, p 10.

611. Submission 3.4.301, p 57.

sought by the Four Tribes'. Yet, the Crown also acknowledged that 'the law in place at the time would need further amendment to support the whole package Rohe Pōtae Māori envisioned'.<sup>612</sup> The 'only available step' to Māori, in order to achieve the change they desired, 'was to continue putting forward what they wanted to the government'.<sup>613</sup>

We will consider the claimant arguments in turn. On the first point, Bryce actively and repeatedly encouraged Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to place their lands before the court, on the basis that this was the only way for them to obtain an external boundary survey. In fact, as he knew, application to the court was the beginning of a process of title determination, and therefore – under the law at the time – the beginning of a process of breaking down Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land interests into tradeable shares. It was entirely possible for the Crown to survey the boundary without the court's involvement, and to then return to negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about how to proceed from there. This is what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders said they wanted. Bryce withheld information about the mechanism needed to advance negotiations towards their ultimate goal – Crown recognition of their authority. On this basis, he misled Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. As a result, they made an application they might not otherwise have made. He subsequently presented the tribes' Native Land Court application as something they quite clearly did not intend it to be: an application for the court to determine title to their lands.

The immediate effect of the application was to increase tensions among the tribes that bordered Te Rohe Pōtae. As we saw earlier, other tribes – Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Mahuta of Waikato in particular – feared the application was an attempt by Ngāti Maniapoto to assert control over contested lands. As we will see, concerns about Ngāti Maniapoto motivations would continue to cause concerns for Waikato and some elements of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and would eventually contribute to the decision by Tūwharetoa to make its own application to the court.

Regarding the claimants' second point, Bryce responded to Taonui's suggestion that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could appoint a representative committee from among themselves to determine iwi and hapū titles, by telling those assembled that native committees could inquire into titles. On this point, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were aware that the current law did not provide such powers: Wahanui had protested that the Native Committees Act failed to provide the powers that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought. For Bryce's assurance to have been made in good faith, he must have had some intention to bring it to fruition. Yet the evidence is that he did not. As we noted in section 8.3.4 and will discuss in more detail in section 8.7), Bryce subsequently argued that native committees were never intended to be a forum for Māori to determine title, and allowing them to do so would be a disaster. He was similarly dismissive of the notion that native committees could or should be used as a basis for Māori self-government.

Regarding the claimants' third point, Bryce did give an assurance that he would hold back Native Land Court applications within the boundary (as the

---

612. Submission 3.4.301, pp 57, 58.

613. Submission 3.4.301, p 58.

Government was empowered to do under section 38 of the Native Land Court Act 1880), and the evidence is that he did so during his remaining term of office. He did tell Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that he could not hold back Native Land Court applications permanently, and this was a transparent attempt to increase the pressure on them to make an application to the court. The Crown did subsequently accept applications for the Taupouiatia and Waimarino blocks, which had substantial areas of land within the boundary. We will discuss those applications in section 8.9.4.

Bryce's actions were in keeping with the way he had approached the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae in preceding months, most recently illustrated through his attempt to establish Kāwhia township as an outpost of Crown control on the edges of Te Rohe Pōtae. While he negotiated with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, he also took every opportunity available to him to increase pressure on them to accept the Crown's laws, institutions, and public works. In taking this approach, Bryce maintained that the Government would not act in a manner that was contrary to law; in particular, it would not seize any land. But it would assert the Crown's authority where it could practically do so. He described his actions publicly as 'an assertion of the Sovereign rights of the Queen without any recognition of the pretensions of the Maori potentate' – that is, the Kīngitanga. This was a stark assessment given his main point of interaction at that time was with the Te Rohe Pōtae leadership, who were asserting the need to have their rights and authority properly recognised by the Crown.

The view of the colonial Government at the time – as expressed by Bryce during the negotiations – was based on their understanding of the legal rights and authority that the Crown had acquired upon its assertion of sovereignty in 1840. This view was echoed by the Crown in this inquiry: the Crown had acquired sovereignty, by which it meant the paramount civil authority, including the authority to determine which institutions would be needed to exercise government in any particular territory. The Crown submitted that the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori was not legally required in order for the Crown to exercise authority in the district after 1840 – only the likelihood of civil unrest stood in the way.

Bryce talked, and sometimes acted (as in Kāwhia), in a way that reflected these views. He continued to view the opening of the district as he had previously: Te Rohe Pōtae would be broken down, and Crown institutions would prevail, and he therefore did as much as possible to limit the terms of the negotiations to the specifics of the railway while also maintaining pressure on them. But, despite continued talk of asserting the Crown's authority, Bryce had limited options. Unless he was prepared to use force to open the district, with the associated costs and risks (which were likely to have been much greater than they had been at Parihaka), he had no choice but to continue to acknowledge the reality that he needed to engage with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders through dialogue, and to secure their consent for any particular course of action the Crown wanted to take in their rohe. It was only through ongoing discussion that the negotiations could peacefully advance towards the Crown's desired outcome. If nothing else, the exploratory railway surveys indicated that the Government continued to rely on Te Rohe Pōtae leadership to expedite the work by keeping their communities on side.

As Rewi also indicated at the hui, exactly how questions over the railway and land would play out would need to wait for further discussions during and after the external boundary survey. The various leaders first had to gain agreement to the survey from their people, and the survey would need to be completed before any process of title determination took place.

In sum, Bryce did mislead Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the December 1883 negotiations, both with respect to the steps that were necessary to obtain a survey of their external boundary and with respect to his intentions regarding the empowerment of native committees to play a significant role in determining iwi and hapū titles. He also sought to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to make an application for title, by telling them he could not hold back competing applications, and that they therefore risked being relegated to the status of counter-claimants if they did not take the initiative themselves; in this, he sought to encourage divisions among tribes that had hitherto worked together. In these respects, the Crown breached its Treaty obligation to negotiate honestly and in good faith, and therefore breached the principle of partnership. Although these breaches had immediate effects – leading Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to apply to the court when that was not what they had wanted, and increasing tensions between the tribes – those effects were not irreversible, as we will discuss below.

8.5.5.4 *What was the effect of the agreement?

Notwithstanding Bryce's failure to negotiate in good faith, the December 1883 survey agreement was another important step in advancing the parties' relationship that had been established in March 1883. It helped to advance the objectives of both parties, within the negotiating parameters that had been set down in March, and it therefore represented a further step towards both parties working out how the Treaty would be brought into effect in the district.

In the months that had followed, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had set out what they sought in exchange for the opening of their territory: the Government's recognition and provision for the exercise of their authority. This was not a compromise of their existing rights, but rather the application of those rights in the new circumstances of the colony. They saw that they could achieve their goal by reaching agreement with the Crown for its recognition of their authority – specifically by enacting laws that would recognise their authority to determine the rohe of the various iwi and hapu within their delineated external boundary, and give Māori communities control and authority over the management and future disposition of their lands. They also wanted to be given the authority to prevent certain social ills – such as drunkenness – which at that stage they associated with Native Land Court hearings.

While the Crown's initial legislative response to the petition was in breach of the Treaty, and while the Crown failed to negotiate openly and in good faith, there was still the possibility that matters could be put right through further negotiations.

The December 1883 survey agreement saw Te Rohe Pōtae Māori allow the Crown to continue its exploratory survey in exchange for having their external boundary surveyed, and contingent agreement on the part of some to allow the continuation of trig surveys. Thus, while there was some distance before the ultimate objectives of either side could be reached, the positions of both sides had advanced.

By December 1883, therefore, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown had established a process by which they could continue to work together, albeit with conflicting goals. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori believed they had won agreement for the conduct of an external boundary survey, which would be followed by a Crown grant, with further discussions to follow. Their ability to take further steps would depend on the Government completing the boundary survey, and Bryce also being willing to amend the Native Committees Act or provide some other means by which they could decide iwi and hapū rohe among themselves. The Government, meanwhile, believed it had taken a significant step towards the opening of the district to the railway and settlement. And both parties knew they would need to keep negotiating if they were to achieve their goals.

In reality, Bryce was willing to hold back court application for a time, but he did not intend to increase the powers of native committees or otherwise providing for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to manage tribal divisions among themselves; nor is there any evidence that he intended to amend the law to provide for a Crown grant to the five tribes on completion of the survey, though that is what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were led to believe. Bryce appears to have hoped that the court process would ultimately take its course and that the district's lands would be divided up without the Crown conceding any more authority to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. So long as the boundary survey was completed and the boundary was not compromised, it remained possible for the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to come to some mutually acceptable arrangement over the district's lands and governance. But such an arrangement would require compromise, and in particular it would require the Crown to be willing to accept Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' demands for self-determination in respect of land. Whether that would occur would depend on subsequent events.

8.6 THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE 1883 AGREEMENTS TO MID-1884

Following the December 1883 agreement, the Crown began to advance the boundary, trig, and exploratory railway surveys, and also took steps to resume the Kāwhia–Raglan road and explore a route for a road from Kāwhia to Alexandra. The boundary survey was expected to take over a year, while the trig survey was expected to take 18 months, which likely meant that both would be completed in 1885.<sup>614</sup>

Wahanui and Taonui supported the Crown in these endeavours, amid increasing concern from Māori communities along the border about where this work was leading. Many Māori became concerned about the Government's intentions and feared that the surveys were intended to open the district for settlement. Some also came to fear that the boundary survey was intended to define Ngāti Maniapoto lands to the exclusion of other tribes. These concerns were not confined to Māori who had not been involved in the negotiations – Rewi Maniapoto would soon withdraw his name from the December 1883 external boundary survey application and join Tāwhiao in renewing calls for the Crown to accept Māori self-government. Rewi and others who had been involved in the December 1883 agreement also took action to stop the trig surveys.

---

614. 'The Survey of the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 20 December 1883, p 5.

Wahanui sought to soothe the concerns of Māori communities, while also explaining the true purpose of the boundary survey. A district native committee, known as the Kawhia Native Committee, was established, and began to prepare for its anticipated role in determining land titles. Neither the committee nor Wahanui was helped by the Government, which encouraged Māori to resolve their differences in court, took no steps to empower the committee to inquire into titles as anything other than an advisor to the court, and, in April 1884, adopted a new Māori land policy aimed at supporting Crown purchasing along the railway area.

As we will see, all of these events combined to create real strain on relationships among Te Rohe Pōtae iwi, and to call into question whether the Crown–Māori relationship could progress beyond the agreement of December 1883 towards a more substantive arrangement in which kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga would both have a place within the district.

8.6.1 Implementation of survey work, late 1883 to early 1884

Work on the various surveys commenced almost immediately after the external boundary agreement was reached. Six additional surveyors were put to work: three on the external boundary, and three on the trig survey.<sup>615</sup> Rochfort, who was already in Kihikihi, was able to continue with the exploratory railway survey, which had been completed as far as Taumarunui and was finished by early February 1884. In the meantime, supplies began to be transported to the various parts of the rohe where the other surveys would begin.<sup>616</sup>

Laurence Cussen was responsible for the trig survey, which was to involve extensive work across the whole territory, including the erection of various trig stations. He began work in late December 1883 at Mount Kakepuku, near Kihikihi. There, he encountered opposition even before a single station had been erected. When crossing to the north side of the Pūniu River, a group of Māori women took the surveyors' gear. When the first station was erected on Mt Kakepuku, it was pulled down by the chief Pahe, who was identified as being of 'Ngawairoa' (possibly Ngāti Ngāwaero of Ngāti Maniapoto). Crown agent George Wilkinson wrote to Bryce on 4 January to inform him of the situation, and Taonui and other Ngāti Maniapoto leaders telegraphed Bryce saying they had gone to Kakepuku to calm

---

615. Document A78, p985.

616. Document A78, p990.

the situation and would assist with the various surveys in train. Bryce nonetheless rebuked Wilkinson for not having taken immediate action.<sup>617</sup>

Wilkinson speculated that the opposition may have been on account of rumours circulating about government and survey activities, including speculation that the Government intended to tie up Te Rohe Pōtae land under the Native Reserves Act. There was also speculation that the Government had paid Wahanui for his work in reaching the agreement, though there is no evidence for this.<sup>618</sup> These actions signalled that there was ongoing dissatisfaction with the decisions that had been reached at Kihikihi among some communities, particularly Waikato and Ngāti Hauā groups who had not been involved in the application.

Similar concerns also began to be expressed by leaders who were directly involved in the application. On 4 January, Hitiri Te Paerata and two other chiefs of Ngāti Raukawa wrote to the Government asking whether they could apply to the Native Land Court to 'define the boundary between us and Ngatimaniapoto'.<sup>619</sup> Te Paerata had been one of the principal signatories to the application and had then spoken in support of it in the subsequent meeting with Bryce on 19 December. Marr argued that Te Paerata's letter reflected the influence of William Grace, the private land agent (and former government agent: see section 7.4.2) living at Kihikihi, who had opposed the 1883 petition and was motivated to break up the external boundary and bring the land to the court.<sup>620</sup> But it could have equally been an attempt on Te Paerata's behalf to test the Government's understanding of the recent agreement, much like Rewi was about to do.

8.6.2 Rewi withdraws from the application, January 1884

Following the December agreement, some leaders communicated directly with the Government to indicate their willingness to help the surveyors in their work. In January, Paiaka, a rangatira of the Tūhua region in Upper Whanganui, wrote to Bryce to say that the Tūhua chiefs had now agreed to the railway survey being carried through and were working with Ngāti Maniapoto to help with the survey of the line (though they continued to oppose gold prospecting).<sup>621</sup> Similarly, on 7 January Rewi Maniapoto wrote to Bryce encouraging the completion of the exploratory railway survey, in the hope that he might ride on the railway before he died.<sup>622</sup>

Rewi's support did not, however, last long. On 14 January, he wrote to Bryce asking about rumours that the Government was encouraging applications for land within the external boundary. He said he had heard from Hopa Te Rangianini that the Government had agreed to Hauāuru making an application to the court for lands within the boundary: 'is this true or false because it does not agree with your word to me that we two should water the tree so that it would grow well'. Rewi

---

617. Document A78, pp 993–997.

618. Document A78, p 995.

619. Wilkinson to Native Office, 4 January 1884 (doc A41, p127).

620. Document A78, p 1007.

621. Document A78, p 1003.

622. Document A78, p 990.

reminded Bryce that all they had agreed to were the various surveys currently being undertaken – the trig surveys, and the exploratory survey for the railway line, and that for the external boundary.<sup>623</sup>

Bryce replied on 20 January, telling Rewi that he should ‘not listen to reports’ and that instead he would ‘find my word will remain unbroken’. ‘What was said at the meeting in your house was right[:] first the external boundary[,], second Hapu boundaries[,], last Individual boundaries’.<sup>624</sup> As explained in section 8.6, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had only agreed to the survey of the external boundary, which had been confirmed in the exchange of letters with Smith. As he had done during the hui itself, Bryce continued to maintain that the agreement was more far-reaching than this.

Bryce’s minimal attempts to reassure Rewi contrasted with the extensive views on the situation he had only just provided to the governor. On 11 January, he had responded to a request from the British Government to provide a response to a letter that had been written on behalf of the four Māori members of the House of Representatives criticising the native land legislation and seeking imperial intervention to provide Māori with greater means of self-government, particularly in areas such as Te Rohe Pōtae. In refuting these claims, Bryce argued that Māori in areas such as Te Rohe Pōtae were sick of isolation and were eager to engage with the wider colony. He maintained that the idea that Māori could determine title was ‘utterly impracticable’: ‘decisions would be very rarely arrived at and scarcely ever accepted’, due to ‘suspected partiality’. The court had, he said, been reformed at the insistence of critics and would ‘in future be assisted by Native Committees, elected for the purpose by the Maoris’. The idea of providing Māori with ‘separate legislation’, he said, ‘scarcely requires comment’. Due to the increasing numbers of Pākehā, he said, it was ‘self-evident that the Maoris must cast in their lot with the Europeans, accepting their institutions and laws’.<sup>625</sup>

He had said none of this to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders during the two December 1883 hui; on the contrary, he had told Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at Kihikihi that arrangements had been made for native committees to ‘inquire into titles’. There is no evidence of him qualifying this statement in any way. This statement was inaccurate in terms of the powers actually granted to the committees under the Native Committees Act 1883, as Wahanui had pointed out in his response to that Act. But it nonetheless suggested that Bryce supported native committees playing the type of role that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought. The idea that it was ‘utterly impracticable’ for Māori to determine their own titles would have met with strong opposition from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. As it was, his response was not forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Colonies until 1 March and did not become public until much later.<sup>626</sup>

623. Rewi Maniapoto to Bryce, 14 January 1884 (doc A41, p127).

624. Bryce to Rewi Maniapoto, 20 January 1884 (doc A41, p127).

625. Bryce to Governor, 11 January 1884, AJHR, 1883, A-1, p12.

626. Document A78, p1023.

Bryce's response to Rewi – if it reached him in time – appears to have done little to assuage Rewi's growing concerns. A large hui was held at Whatiwhatihoe on 25 and 26 January, which Rewi attended, along with Tāwhiao, Te Wheoro, Hauāuru, and other leaders. Also in attendance were Hirini Taiwhanga, a Ngāpuhi leader and campaigner for Māori rights under the Treaty (and future member of the House of Representatives), and J R McBeth, a Pākehā affiliated to the Aborigines Protection Society.<sup>627</sup>

Rewi was said to have been angered by reports that Bryce was gloating about how the Government would use the Te Rohe Pōtae application to the Native Land Court to pursue the opening of the district. Rewi was reported to have said that he would no longer cause trouble for his 'child', Tāwhiao, and henceforth would be 'one with Tawhiao and the Waikato'. He planned to send Bryce a telegram setting out his objections to the Government's position and requesting that his name be withdrawn from the application.<sup>628</sup> Marr suggested that Rewi was less intimately involved in negotiations with the Government and therefore had 'more freedom to publicly record his anger with the government' than other rangatira such as Hitiri and Wahanui, who in her view had similar feelings.<sup>629</sup> While the Government determined its response to Rewi, Tāwhiao began to make preparations to travel to England, so he could appeal directly to the Crown to encourage the colonial government to honour the Treaty.

8.6.3 Rewi and Tāwhiao assert right of self-government, January–February 1884

Rewi's letter, dated 26 January, was sent to Bryce with an accompanying telegram in which Rewi stated that the letter 'explain[s] the cause of my anger.'<sup>630</sup> Tāwhiao sent his letter at the same time, and it was virtually identical to Rewi's. Both emphasised the nature of the exchange that was currently being negotiated: the Government was seeking the construction of the main trunk railway through the territory; Māori sought powers of self-government. While the original te ro Māori version does not appear to have survived, the translation of Rewi's letter read:

Friend, in consequence of misrepresentations published by the newspapers regarding the application made by the Maoris for the exterior boundary of the King Country, I, Rewi Maniapoto, make known that I withdraw my name from the application for the survey. I also wish to make known that the application made by the Maoris referred to the exterior boundary only, we did not intend that the King Country should be put through the Native Land Court as stated in the newspapers. I will also inform you that I object altogether to railways being made through our lands and townships established upon them until we have obtained self government. I am

---

627. Document A41, p 129.

628. 'Important Native Meeting at Whatiwhatihoe', Waikato Times, 29 January 1884, p 2 (doc A78, pp 1016–1017).

629. Document A78, p 1016.

630. Rewi to Bryce, telegram, 29 January 1884 (doc A78, p 1018).

quite certain that all the Maori tribes agree to my 'tikanga'. We are very desirous of obtaining self government. You are anxious for railways; give us what we desire and we will give you what you want. If my name is signed to any other document let it be struck out. From Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>631</sup>

A few days later, the newspapers began publishing slightly varying translations of these letters. Each version, however, emphasised the same message: Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would only agree to the construction of the railway if the Government provided them with meaningful measures of self-government. While the essential exchange that was under negotiation had never been put so clearly, the principle was consistent with the June 1883 petition, in which Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought recognition of the external boundary and statutory protection for their rights of self-government within that boundary, particularly with respect to land.

No other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders chose to follow Rewi's course of action in withdrawing their names from the application, even though they supported his message about self-government. One report suggested that a 'form of withdrawal' had been circulated among the chiefs, but none had chosen to sign it.<sup>632</sup> Their focus remained on ensuring the Government upheld its side of the agreement and completed the external boundary survey. Hopa Te Rangianini wrote to Bryce on 28 January to say that the Government still had the support of Ngāti Maniapoto and asked that the external boundary survey be expedited.<sup>633</sup>

Wahanui similarly wrote to Wilkinson on 30 January, assuring the Government that they continued to support the agreement for the boundary survey. He pointed out that Rewi had been the first to sign the December 1883 agreement, and had done so out of friendship for the Government. The Government might want to consider this, he said. Marr suggested this 'barbed' remark was intended to make the Government consider how it had lost Rewi's support so quickly.<sup>634</sup>

Wilkinson later claimed that Rewi's actions ought to be put down to being 'an old man and very impressionable', and that Rewi had told him he did not know his own mind and should be called 'kopikopiko noa' (wandering backwards and forwards).<sup>635</sup> Settler newspapers also echoed these views. The Evening Post, for example, dismissed Rewi as 'weak and silly' and 'old' (though he had not been too old to convene the hui at which the survey agreement was reached), and called for Bryce to show his displeasure at Rewi's 'bad faith and treachery'.<sup>636</sup> In fact, Rewi had been responding to what he saw as Bryce's bad faith. And in so doing, he had publicly reinforced the message that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had only agreed to the survey of the external boundary and had not made an application for title determination by the court – how title would be determined was for further discussion once the boundary was confirmed.

---

631. Rewi Maniapoto, letter, 26 January 1884 (doc A78, p 1018).

632. Document A41, p 130.

633. Document A41, p 130.

634. Document A78, p 1019.

635. Document A78, p 1020.

636. 'Native Affairs', Evening Post, 30 January 1884, p 2.

Rewi's letter had the desired effect. In early February 1884, the Native Under-Secretary T W Lewis asked Bryce what action should be taken in respect of Te Paerata's letter of 4 January 1884, which had asked for Ngāti Raukawa tribal boundaries to be confirmed. Lewis commented that it appeared to represent an application for a division of land between the tribes and to 'portions of the large block'. Bryce decided that it was not advisable to take any action 'at present' because of a 'recent event' – Rewi's decision to withdraw from the survey application.<sup>637</sup> Bryce's response to Rewi on 11 February was brief and dismissive. He questioned why Rewi had taken this course of action, given he had only recently asked Bryce to expedite the railway survey. He asked whether Rewi did not have the strength to 'brush off the flies' that were settling on his body, and why he mistook the buzzing of those flies 'for the whispering of the Gods'.<sup>638</sup> By this time, however, Rewi was preoccupied with other matters. On 13 February, he accompanied Tāwhiao to Auckland in preparation for Tāwhiao's visit to England.

8.6.4 The implementation of the native committees regime, March 1884

Bryce soon set about putting the native committees regime into action. On 24 January 1884, a notice (dated 16 January) was published in the New Zealand Gazette setting out the native committee districts and returning officers for the elections of members. The boundaries of the new district roughly followed those of the June 1883 petition (map 8.1), except that the committee district included an area north of the Pūniu bounded by the confiscation line and the Waikato River.<sup>639</sup> Marr explained that it began at Aotea Harbour in the north-west, then followed along the northern confiscation line to Maungatautari in the east, then went south, via the Waikato River and Lake Taupō, to Ruapehu, before turning west to White Cliffs.<sup>640</sup> As Marr noted, this area covered some 3.5 million acres, and included the lands of multiple tribal groups, who were to be represented by 12 members. Though the name 'Kawhia Native Committee' was clearly not representative of the district as a whole, Marr recorded that there was no opposition from Māori.<sup>641</sup>

8.6.4.1 The election of the Kawhia Native Committee

The Native Committees Act contained no provision for ensuring that committees represented all of the iwi and hapū of their districts. Nor did it provide for elections to be held by popular vote among all of the people. Rather, the Native Committees Act provided for 'elections' to be held in a single place. Once a native district was proclaimed, a returning officer or government agent was required to place notices around the district giving at least 21 days' notice that an election would be held. The notices were to set out the date of and venue for the election. On election day, the returning officer would remain at the venue from 10am to

---

637. Document A78, pp 1013, 1017–1018; doc A41, p 127.

638. Document A78, p 1018.

639. 'Native District Committees Proclaimed', 24 January 1884, New Zealand Gazette, no 8, p 111.

640. Document A78, pp 1040–1041.

641. Document A78, pp 1040–1041.

4pm and receive nominations. There would be no vote; the 12 people who received the most nominations would be elected.<sup>642</sup> When these provisions were debated in the Legislative Council, one member claimed that the regulations for the election of committees were much more detailed than the regulations for the election of members of Parliament.<sup>643</sup>

Elections for the Kawhia Native Committee were held at Alexandra<sup>644</sup> on 3 March 1884, with the Government agent George Wilkinson serving as returning officer. He called for nominations in the morning. The Waikato Times named 15 people as being nominated<sup>645</sup>, though it later revised this upwards to 19.<sup>646</sup> After the close of the poll, Wilkinson declared the 12 candidates with most nominations to be elected.<sup>647</sup> Those elected were listed in the minutes of the committee's first meeting as: Hone (John) Ormsby, Hone Te One, Whaaro, Karaka Tarawhiti, Hone Wetera, Te Aroa, Ngakuru, Te Para, Kiekie, Matakītaki, Te Paitai, and Taniora.<sup>648</sup>

None of the historians provided detailed evidence about the whakapapa of committee members. From what we can determine from claimant evidence, it seems likely that at least four were of Ngāti Maniapoto (Ormsby, Whaaro (Te Wharo), Te Aroa, and Taniora);<sup>649</sup> three were of Ngāti Tūwharetoa and/or northern Whanganui iwi (Kiekie, better known as Te Herekīkie; Ngakuru, also known as Ngahuru Te Rangikāiwhiria; and Matakītaki);<sup>650</sup> two were of Ngāti Hikairo (Hōne Wetera and Hone Te One);<sup>651</sup> and one was of Ngāti Korokī (Karaka Tarawhiti).<sup>652</sup> We cannot determine the origins of Te Para and Te Paitai. The Waikato Times later reported that one of the committee's members was a young man of Ngāti Raukawa, though we cannot be sure who.<sup>653</sup> Among those who were nominated

642. Native Committees Act 1883, ss 4–6.

643. 'Native Committees Bill', 29 August 1883, NZPD, vol 46, p 343.

644. 'Alexandra', Waikato Times, 4 March 1884, p 2.

645. 'Kawhia Maori Licensing Committee', Waikato Times, 4 March 1884, p 1. The Times listed those nominated as: Hone Te One, Hone Punii, Karaka Tarawhiti, Te Paitai, Whaaro, Taniora Te Aroa, Ngakuru, Herikīkie, Matakītaki, Te Para, Hone Wetera, Te Ranginui Paunini, Hopere Te Potou, Te Pihua, Hetera Paerata. 'Hone Punii' appears to be John Ormsby.

646. 'Alexandra', Waikato Times, 8 March 1884, p 1.

647. 'Alexandra', Waikato Times, 8 March 1884, p 1.

648. Document A78, p 1042.

649. John Ormsby was the son of a European schoolmaster and a Ngāti Maniapoto woman. Te Wharo (aka Te Whaaro) was a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira of the upper Mōkau River who had been involved in the March and December 1883 hui (doc A28, p 309; doc A78, pp 757, 939, 953; see also p 967). Te Aroa is likely to be Te Aroa Haereiti of Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Peehi and Ngāti Kinohaku, who lived at Marokopa and Hangatiki: doc s3, pp [3]-[4]; doc M32, p 96; doc 111, p 10. Taniora may have been the prominent Mōkau rangatira Taniora Whararua: doc F9, pp 8–9; doc A28, pp 62, 177.

650. Kiekie was Te Herekīkie (his full name was used in the Waikato Times list of nominees ('Kawhia Maori Licensing Committee', Waikato Times, 4 March 1884, p 1). Matakītaki is likely to be Matakītaki Te Ngārupiki (Ngāti Hāua) of northern Whanganui: transcript 4.1.7, pp 31, 58, 65–66; doc A108(b), p 8.

651. Document 111, p 20.

652. Document M18(a), p 40; see also transcript 4.1.5, p 247.

653. 'The Natives and Mr Bryce's Promises', Waikato Times, 10 June 1884, p 1.

but not elected was the senior Ngāti Raukawa rangatira Hitiri Te Paerata.<sup>654</sup> At the committee's first meeting, Ormsby was designated as chair.<sup>655</sup>

The Waikato Times reported on election day that Māori were taking little interest, though Wahanui had brought a group of people from Mōkau to take part.<sup>656</sup> A few days later, the Times' correspondent heavily criticised the conduct of the election, describing it as 'simply a farce':

The district itself is a very large one, and the election was, or is rather supposed to give the various tribes residing in it, to a great extent, local self-government, but as the election was conducted, the whole was simply a farce, comparatively few of the natives interested knowing anything of the matter, through the insufficient notice and publicity not having been made. The idea of one polling place only, the nomination and election of the candidates the same day, held at one end of the district, was an absurdity, and so the natives regard it.<sup>657</sup>

The correspondent criticised Wilkinson for 'alone conducting the election, acting as returning officer, poll clerk, and scrutineer all in one'. As a result, 'those opposed to the measure (Tawhiao's party)' regarded the Committee 'as having been nominated by the Government'.<sup>658</sup>

In his report to the Government in May, Wilkinson observed (contrary to what the Waikato Times had reported) that Ngāti Hauā and other Waikato iwi had refused to take part, whereas Ngāti Maniapoto took 'a great interest' in the elections, nominating nearly all of the committee's members, who were chosen carefully to represent 'different districts within the boundaries'. In his view, 'the fact that the Waikatos neither nominated, voted, nor in any way took part in the election will, I think, militate against its being a success at present'. Due to this limitation, Wilkinson predicted that the committee would ultimately prove to be a failure:

Their great wish is to be allowed to decide upon, or rather hold, a preliminary investigation of their own claims to the large block that is now being surveyed, upon which they would make a recommendation to the Native Land Court; but I am very dubious as to their being the proper tribunal to adjudicate, even in a preliminary form, on that block, especially as their opponents and counter-claimants, Waikato and Ngatihaua, would not be represented on the Committee.<sup>659</sup>

It is not clear whether Wilkinson intended his reference to 'Ngāti Maniapoto' to mean only that tribe, or to refer more generally to those who had supported the survey. As noted above, the committee also included members from Ngāti

654. 'Kawhia Maori Licensing Committee', Waikato Times, 4 March 1884, p 1.

655. Document A110 (Joseph), p 404.

656. 'Alexandra', Waikato Times, 4 March 1883, p 2.

657. 'Alexandra', Waikato Times, 8 March 1884, p 1.

658. Document A41, p 139.

659. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 11.

Hikairo, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui. It also included a mix of younger and more senior leaders, and can therefore be seen as reasonably representative of those who supported the survey and engagement with the Government – and also of those with interests in the vast majority of the district's lands, the contested area in the north representing only a small part of the district.<sup>660</sup> The refusal of Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Hāua to take part, and the non-election of Hitiri Te Paerata of Ngāti Raukawa, undermined any hope that it represented all iwi with interests in the district.<sup>661</sup>

Wilkinson attributed the result to a combination of factors. On the one hand, he said, 'I found a great deal of ignorance existing in the minds of the Natives regarding the principles under which the elections had to be conducted.' But he also acknowledged that the election process laid down in law was scarcely satisfactory, with a single polling place in a district of 3.5 million acres. He suggested that, in future, 'should it be necessary to hold any more elections for a similar purpose, more facilities be given for recording votes by fixing more polling-places within the different districts.'<sup>662</sup>

8.6.4.2 Bryce's views on title determination

While the Government was willing to point to the committee's establishment as evidence that it had begun reforming the Native Land Court to be more responsive to Māori needs, it had little interest in making the committee regime work in a meaningful way. As noted, Bryce had told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at the December 1883 Kihikihi hui that the Native Committees Act had given native committees the means to 'inquire into titles', and that a committee would be appointed to assist the court. Exactly how that would work in practice was unclear, however, as the 1883 Act only made provision for the committees to make recommendations to the court. The court was under no obligation to act on the recommendations or even take them into account, and it could continue to hear cases in the absence of a committee altogether.

Bryce's 11 January 1884 memorandum to the governor (section 8.6.2) revealed more of his thinking in this regard. While he promoted the Native Committees Act as a Government initiative in response to criticisms of the court, he also dismissed the idea that Māori could or should be given powers to determine their own titles, or that they should have more general powers of self-government. On 11 February, Bryce wrote another (private) memorandum to Jervis setting out his views on the Kīngitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae. He again claimed that providing Māori with powers to determine title would 'simply result in hopeless confusion', under which title would never be determined. The idea was promoted by those who 'had a confused desire to revert to Maori customs', or by those who had no title themselves and therefore wanted to delay title determination indefinitely.

---

660. Document A78, p1042.

661. Document A78, pp1042–1043. Ngāti Mahuta claimed interests in northern Kāwhia, and Ngāti Hāua claimed interests in the north-east of the district: see AJHR, 1884, G-1, pp 9, 11.

662. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, p11.

Bryce was similarly dismissive about providing Māori with a system of local self-government, describing it as an 'absurdity'. He said it assumed that Māori were gathered in one part of the country, whereas in fact they were scattered all through it. The part of the country being spoken of as a 'retreat' for Māori was owned by a relatively small number, who would not allow others to settle there and share ownership in the land. He repeated the advice that the best hope for Māori was to 'frankly accept European institutions and laws'.<sup>663</sup>

On 1 March, Jervois forwarded Bryce's first memorandum to the British Government and repeated the advice that the request for Māori to be empowered to determine their own titles was 'absolutely impracticable' and 'highly undesirable'. Under the native land system, he said, ownership of land remained essentially as it had been before the Treaty of Waitangi, and legislation had put in place a range of protections for Māori. He noted that the Native Committees Act 1883, in particular, 'provided that in certain districts the title to Native land may be investigated by an elective committee of Natives'. Much like Bryce, the governor did little to explain what function the committees could have in investigating titles when all powers of decision-making resided in the court.<sup>664</sup>

Jervois also reflected the views Bryce put to him in the February memorandum in rejecting the idea that Māori could be empowered to 'make laws for Māori guidance'. 'It would be impossible to give effect to such a proposal', he said, because it 'rests on the assumption that the Maoris have retired into the interior and aggregated themselves in one particular part of the country'.<sup>665</sup> In effect, the argument was that areas such as Te Rohe Pōtae, which essentially remained in Māori control, could not be granted powers of self-government because of the extent of Pākehā population that had already been established elsewhere in New Zealand, and that Māori in less populous areas would not be willing to accommodate Māori from locations where Pākehā were in the majority, as if these were the only options. The governor said nothing about whether or how Māori in places such as Te Rohe Pōtae could exercise self-government over their own lands and people while making provision for any settlers who might settle on terms suitable to them.

In keeping with this view of the situation, the Government turned its attention to promoting the foothold it had obtained in Te Rohe Pōtae at Kāwhia, and did so by arranging for Governor Jervois to visit there. Jervois arrived there on 15 March and was greeted by a number of Ngāti Hikairo chiefs, who put forward a range of issues that concerned them, including their desire to lease land rather than sell it, and the control of liquor. The governor's visit was received positively by the Kingitanga, as it presented Māori with an opportunity to discuss their issues directly with the Queen's representative. Kingitanga leaders had long sought such

---

663. Document A78, p1025.

664. Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State, 1 March 1884, AJHR, 1884 I, A-1, p 10.

665. Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State, 1 March 1884, AJHR, 1884 I, A-1, p 11.

a meeting – as discussed, Tāwhiao and McLean had agreed for the governor to visit Kāwhia at their 1875 Waitomo hui, but this never eventuated.<sup>666</sup>

8.6.4.3 Tāwhiao's preparations for travelling to England

Meanwhile, the final details of Tāwhiao's visit to England were confirmed at the annual Maehe. Tāwhiao's travelling party included Wiremu Te Wheoro, the Whanganui rangatira Topia Tūroa, Patara Te Tuhi (known as Tāwhiao's secretary), and Hori Ropia, with a Mr Skidmore acting as interpreter. On 17 March, they arrived in Auckland. There they visited former governor and premier, George Grey, who was willing to give letters of introduction, but warned the party that their efforts would be futile.<sup>667</sup>

As part of their preparations, the party had produced a petition that they planned to give to the British Government. The petition began by setting out the petitioners' understandings of the Treaty's guarantees and outlined the various actions they considered the colonial government had taken in breach of those guarantees, including the Taranaki and Waikato wars, and the confiscation of land. The petitioners went on to describe the introduction of the Native Land Court as a measure designed to 'destroy the rights of the Maoris over their own land', through which 'the Maoris were denied all authority'. They objected to the limited number of Māori representatives in Parliament, and the fact that the position of Minister of Native Affairs was filled by a Pākehā (noting that when Te Wheoro raised the issue in Parliament, Bryce said that 'the office should never belong to the Maoris'). They asked the Queen to grant five requests:

- ▶ The establishment of 'a Government to your Māori subjects' so that 'within the limits of Maori territory . . . they may have power to make laws regarding their own lands';
- ▶ That there be appointed a Māori commissioner who 'shall act as mediator between the Maori and European races' on matters such as leasing of land and to provide advice to the governor in the event of a conflict between laws passed by the Māori and colonial governments;
- ▶ That the 'greater portion of taxes levied on your Maori subjects be returned to them, to enable them to carry on their government';
- ▶ That Māori be 'permitted to direct their own affairs' in respect of land matters;
- ▶ And that 'lands wrongly obtained by the Government be returned to us'.<sup>668</sup>

With final preparations complete, the party departed Auckland on 1 April, arriving in Britain in mid-May.

---

666. Document A78, p1028.

667. Document A78, pp1035–1036.

668. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp3–5.

8.6.4.4 Wilkinson's views on Tāwhiao's petition

In his annual report to the House of Representatives, Wilkinson commented at some length on Tāwhiao's plans, advising the Government to give no support to Tāwhiao or his petition. In Wilkinson view, Māori had established the Kingitanga with the aim of 'preserving themselves as a race, and retaining a certain territory intact for the benefit of all, over which our laws, which they thought were detrimental to them, should not have effect . . . It was more a progressive measure for themselves than an aggressive one against us.' But a combination of the Government's aggressive reaction and lawlessness among some Kingitanga supporters had led to conflict, which Tāwhiao and his supporters regretted. Tāwhiao nonetheless remained committed to the original position that Māori should have their own King and make laws for themselves: 'They really want to be left alone, and to manage their own affairs without any assistance from us.' In recent years, Wilkinson said, Kingitanga leaders had believed that such an outcome might be possible through their negotiations with the Government. More specifically, they had believed that the Government was 'anxious to make terms with them', and 'in return for their allowing us to put roads and railroads through their territory, we would grant them an independent authority.'<sup>669</sup>

It was 'only quite recently' that the Kingitanga leaders had 'given up all hope' of obtaining this outcome from the New Zealand Government, and had decided instead to appeal directly to the Queen, not understanding the constitutional position under which the colonial Parliament made laws for the colony without interference from either the governor or the Queen. Wilkinson estimated that 'no more than one thousand' out of New Zealand's 40,000 Māori would support having Tāwhiao as their King in preference to their own rangatira. Ngāti Maniapoto, Wilkinson said, would now have nothing to do with him. The Government should therefore 'refuse to give the King party what they want, and put up with their opposition and reproaches', rather than giving in and causing 'a multitude of troubles'. As we will see, the Government would follow this advice.<sup>670</sup>

8.6.5 Wahanui's ongoing efforts to implement the 1883 agreements, March–May 1884

Through the early part of 1884, Wahanui and other leaders continued to assist the work of the surveyors by visiting groups in the border regions. By mid-March 1884, however, the strain caused by ongoing uncertainty about the purpose of the various surveys and the Government's intentions was beginning to tell. On 16 March, the Kāwhia leader Hōne Wetere obtained a letter from a chief called Pikia. Pikia had received a letter from another leader, Rau Taramoa, who said that Wahanui was beginning to face difficulties over the various surveys underway. There were concerns that large amounts of money were being spent on trig surveys and roads, and that the survey of the external boundary was not being completed. Bryce asked that Wetere be informed that the external boundary survey was close to completion.<sup>671</sup> During March and April, several communities would express their opposition to the surveys and their uncertainty about the intentions of the 1883 petitioners and of the Government. Wahanui and Taonui faced a significant challenge smoothing over concerns and keeping the December 1883 agreement on track, especially as communities responded to fears that their lands might come under threat.

---

669. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, pp 11–12.

670. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1884, G-1, pp 11–12.

8.6.5.1 Further opposition to Cussen's trig surveys, March–April 1884

Meanwhile, Cussen shifted his trig survey operations from the north-east of the rohe to the Taupō region, on account of expected opposition from Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Hauā over the trig surveys. He arrived in Taupō on 21 March 1883. The assembled Ngāti Tūwharetoa leaders, including Te Heuheu and Matuaahu Te Wharerangi, did not initially allow him to proceed with the survey, but were persuaded to do so when a letter from Bryce was presented to them.<sup>672</sup>

Cussen received what he described as ‘more serious and troublesome opposition’ when he moved into the Tūhua district. He reported that the local people there had heard the ‘Government would take large areas of land from them to pay for the trig. survey’, the maps would be used for determining title, land would be rated, and that the Government would ‘lock up’ the land until it had acquired it for itself. A local committee had been formed to manage their particular issues. ‘They decided to prevent us from putting any more stations on their land; they would allow none of their people to accompany me or assist in any way, and no information, such as names of rivers, hills, &c., was to be afforded us.’ Cussen reported that they were advised on this course of action by Te Herekiekeie of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, who worked with the chairman of the local committee, Te Hiahia.<sup>673</sup> Te Herekiekeie had been one of the signatories of the December 1883 letter to Smith authorising the boundary survey; his involvement is another example of growing concern among Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about the Government’s intentions, coupled with what Marr described as ‘confusion and concern’ over the trig surveys. These involved extensive work throughout the territory, not just along the boundary, the scale of the work taking even Wahanui by surprise.<sup>674</sup>

In another example of the concerns that Māori communities were feeling, the Government on 6 April received an undated letter from Toakohuru Tāwhirimatea and 101 others from Whanganui, asserting a separate Whanganui tribal boundary which extended into the territory contained by the external boundary described in the 1883 petition and survey agreement. Tāwhirimatea was of the Ngāti Rangitauwhata and Ngāti Reremai hapū of Ngāti Hāua, and had interests in the Waimarino and south-west of Taumarunui which appear to have overlapped the petition area boundary.<sup>675</sup> These petitioners claimed to repudiate the ‘tribal

671. Document A78, pp 997–998.

672. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the Years 1883–1884,’ AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

673. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the Years 1883–1884,’ AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

674. Document A78, pp 985, 992, 1001.

675. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauonoka, vol 2, pp 558, 562.

boundary made by Wahanui and Manga (Rewi)'. As Marr said, this letter, with its reference to a 'tribal boundary' appears to have reflected a belief that the application for the external boundary survey on behalf of all groups with interests was in fact intended as a survey on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto alone.<sup>676</sup> Bryce annotated the letter from Tāwhirimatea and others by directing that the authors be 'informed that their proper course is to prefer whatever claims they may have to the Native Land Court when it sits to determine the title to the block.'<sup>677</sup>

8.6.5.2 Wahanui and Taonui attempt to assuage concerns, March–April 1884

But it was clear that the Government still needed the support of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders in order to complete the surveys. Facing opposition from the local Tūhua committee, Cussen wrote to Wahanui and Taonui 'informing them of the state of affairs'. Wahanui very quickly arrived in Tūhua, where he discussed the various issues raised by the committee. Cussen reported that Wahanui 'succeeded in arranging matters, and the work was allowed to go on again, after a fortnight's delay'.<sup>678</sup> This was confirmed in a letter sent by three Tūhua rangatira to Bryce on 20 April. They were named as Kiekie (presumably Te Herekiele), Himona, and Ngaparu (possibly Ngahuru te Rangikaiwhiria). They said that they no longer had opposition to the Government and that they would assist in work on the 'powhita' (possibly an abbreviation or misspelling of 'porowhita', or circle, in reference to the external boundary), which was described in the translation as 'land comprised in the outside boundary'.<sup>679</sup>

Wahanui had written to Governor Jervois on 9 April asking him to visit Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in Alexandra. His request was perhaps prompted by the governor's recent visit to Kāwhia. He may have also wanted to promote another initiative that had recently been set in train: a petition to control the distribution of liquor in Te Rohe Pōtae, which had been put together on 1 April and was beginning to be circulated throughout the region for signatures. But Bryce asked the governor not to go, expressing his concerns that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would discuss 'political business', and that Bryce himself was unable to attend. The governor replied to Wahanui on 12 April outlining the reasons put forward by Bryce for declining the invitation.<sup>680</sup>

Wahanui remained mindful of the range of pressures that continued to bear upon communities in various parts of the rohe. On 26 April he wrote to the Government asking for it to stop gold prospectors from going to the Tūhua region. He said he planned to call a general meeting, including the people of the upper Whanganui, to discuss matters of concern to them. There is no evidence of a Government response.<sup>681</sup>

676. Document A78, pp1010–1011.

677. Document A78, p1012.

678. 'Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the Years 1883–1884', AJHR, 1884, C-1, p30.

679. Document A78, pp1001, 1046.

680. Document A78, p1032.

681. Document A78, pp1004, 1043.

As noted in section 8.6.2, the Government had earlier been put on notice about the issue of gold prospecting by Paiaka's letter of January 1884. Paiaka had said the people of Tūhua had agreed to the railway survey, but that one surveyor was found looking for gold and was also suspected of investigating the territory for a possible roadway. Paiaka asked the Government to prevent such people from entering their territory. Bryce annotated the letter dismissing these concerns: government surveyors were not asked to look for gold, and in any case it was unlikely that gold would be found.<sup>682</sup> Again it is not clear whether Bryce's response was communicated to Paiaka. However, the issue did not let up, and in mid-May Wilkinson reported that two men had been caught prospecting for gold in the Tūhua ranges and had been brought out to Alexandra.<sup>683</sup> This was another example of the aukati remaining in force for all except the government surveyors who were authorised to be in the area.

8.6.5.3 The 'blue ribbon' petition, April 1884

While the surveying work continued, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori advanced their other initiative of the period – the 'Blue Ribbon' petition seeking control of alcohol distribution in Te Rohe Pōtae. It was named 'Blue Ribbon' on account of the support and promotion it received from leading members of the Gospel Temperance Mission, also known as the 'Blue Ribbon' movement. The petition was strongly supported by the senior Ngāti Maniapoto leaders. By May 1884, the petition had been signed by the key rangatira: Wahanui had signed at Alexandra; Rewi at Kihikihi; and Taonui at Mohaonui, near Ōtorohanga. In the June 1883 petition, they had signalled their opposition to the consumption of alcohol as one of the social ills they had come to associate with the Native Land Court. Having Te Rohe Pōtae declared as a 'dry' zone under the Act was also another means by which their external boundary could be recognised, as it would involve official recognition of their territory for the specific purpose of preventing the sale of alcohol.<sup>684</sup>

The petition (dated 1 April 1884) was presented to Governor Jervois in Auckland on 15 May, mainly by Pākehā members of the Temperance Mission. By that time it had been signed by 1,500 Māori of Te Rohe Pōtae. In it, the petitioners asked the governor to invoke section 25 of the 1881 Licensing Act, which would have the effect of prohibiting publicans' licences in the district. This area was described as 'extending to Waipa, Kawhia, Mokau and all its boundaries.' According to Marr, Wahanui asked that the boundary be the same as the petition area, and Bryce agreed, meaning that from this time the control of alcohol distribution and the external boundary became closely linked.<sup>685</sup>

---

682. Document A78, p1003.

683. Document A78, p1004.

684. Document A78, pp1029–1030.

685. Document A78, pp1029–1030.

8.6.5.4 Ongoing opposition to the surveys, May 1884

Meanwhile, communities along the boundary continued to express their concerns about the boundary survey. In particular, the idea that external boundary survey was intended for all Te Rohe Pōtae tribes was increasingly challenged by Māori who rejected the external boundary, presumably out of concern that it divided their territories and that they might be excluded from any Crown grant or title award that followed the boundary survey. On 2 May, Tāwhirimatea of upper Whanganui wrote a second letter to the Government saying that his people were willing to take their land inside 'Wahanui's boundary' ('te rohe potae a Wahanui') to the court. They asked to be informed when a court sitting would take place. Native Affairs Under-Secretary T W Lewis advised that the writers should be informed they would receive notice in the event that the court would sit, and that they should be placed on the list to be notified. Bryce approved this on 7 May.<sup>686</sup>

At about this time, the Waikato Times reported a rumour that Wahanui was planning to place the entire area enclosed by the petition area boundary under the Native Reserves Act.<sup>687</sup> It appears this rumour was circulated by the private land agent William Grace, who wrote to the chief judge of the Native Land Court shortly before the newspaper report expressing concern that such a measure would lock up the land against settlement.<sup>688</sup> On 20 May, the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Te Rangituatea and others wrote to the Government concerning land in the Waipā Valley east of Ōtorohanga which was 'within the external boundary that is now being surveyed and which will shortly be adjudicated upon.' Responding to the rumour, they said they objected to having their lands placed under the Native Reserves Act. Rather, they wanted to have 'control of our lands so that we can have them reserved[,] lease them or do whatever we like with them[,] not leaving it for you or your office to deal with them.'<sup>689</sup> The letter is an indication of the degree of speculation and confusion that was emerging about the intentions of Wahanui and others involved in the June 1883 petition. It is unclear what response, if any, Te Rangituatea had from the Government at this time. Bryce's approach on similar occasions had been to suggest that the court would resolve all disputes, even though this was clearly not the petitioners' intention.

On 28 May, Te Papanui Tamahiki and others of Ngaitaraakiahi hapū of Ngāti Raukawa wrote to Bryce saying that they 'stood aloof from the Petition of Wahanui and the four tribes.' They said that 'our district is for us alone to administer':

We do not approve of any one man administering our land; and the law provides that it is not allowable for any man to assume control over the district of any other person or hapu. Moreover the external boundary would be of no advantage and we definitely withdraw the land we are interested in from that block.<sup>690</sup>

---

686. Document A78, p1012.

687. 'Te Awamutu', Waikato Times, 12 April 1884, p2 (doc A41, p140).

688. Document A78, p1000.

689. Document A41, p140.

690. Document A41, p132.

Again, this suggested that the purpose of the 1883 petition was not understood. In commenting on the letter, Lewis suggested that Tamahiki's concern was all the more reason to put their claims before the court: 'they are quite right in supposing that no one can assume control over their lands without their consent'. However, it would be another 21 months before Lewis' recommendation was approved and the Native Land Court began hearings on northern Whanganui lands.<sup>691</sup> By that time Bryce was no longer the Native Minister.<sup>692</sup>

8.6.6 The Government's new land policy and Māori responses, April–June 1884

While some Te Rohe Pōtae communities were showing their concern about the Government's activities in the district, and some were expressing fears that the boundary survey might harm their land rights, the Government pushed ahead with its plans to proceed with the railway and open the district for settlement. The Government announced that its plan was not only to open the district, but to do so through a programme of large-scale Crown purchasing. It intended to support this by restoring a form of 'pre-emption', under which direct private purchasing of Māori land would be prohibited; all transactions in Māori land would be made either directly with the Crown or through Crown-controlled boards. This would allow the Government to control the timing and manner of settlement, and also to profit from purchase and onsale of Māori land, and use that profit to fund the railway. In the Government's view, since it was investing in the railway it, and not the traditional landowners, should retain the profit.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had not been consulted about any of these policies. They had been led to believe that the Government's principal concern was to secure their agreement to the railway, not to push ahead with opening the district through Crown purchasing of Māori lands; indeed, they had made their opposition to land sales very plain in their June 1883 petition. Not only was the Government pressing ahead with a new land-buying policy, it was doing so without having implemented the reforms they had sought with respect to title determination and land administration. They responded to the Government's new policy with considerable frustration and some anger. Wahanui travelled to Wellington, where he forcefully objected to what he characterised as duplicitous behaviour by Bryce, and Rewi and Ngāti Raukawa expressed their dissatisfaction by opposing the trig surveys.

8.6.6.1 The Government's land buying policy, April–May 1884

In April 1884, the Government announced its intention to restore the Crown's right of pre-emption over Māori lands throughout New Zealand. This right, set out in article 2 of the English version of the Treaty, had provided that the Crown

---

691. The Native Land Court began hearings for the Waimarino block on 22 February 1886: doc A50, pp 261–262, 266.

692. Document A41, p 132.

would be the sole purchaser of Māori lands in the colony.<sup>693</sup> Pre-emption had been abandoned in the 1860s in favour of a policy of free trade in Māori lands once title had been determined.<sup>694</sup> The Government initially did little to explain the reasons for its policy. The New Zealand Herald suggested it would win public favour if it was accompanied by plans (and funds) for extensive Crown purchasing in the district.<sup>695</sup> Reflecting this new approach, the premier, Harry Atkinson, said (in early May) that ‘the only legitimate way of dealing with the matter’ of unoccupied Māori lands was the restoration of pre-emption.<sup>696</sup>

The Government did not consult Wahanui over the implications of this new policy for the district. It did, however, send Edwin Mitchelson – the new Minister of Lands – on a tour of the district. Prior to the trip, Bryce sent letters introducing Mitchelson to the district’s rangatira.<sup>697</sup> Mitchelson arrived in Te Rohe Pōtae in early May. From Kihikihī he travelled to Mōkau, where he was met by Wetere Te Rerenga. Mitchelson then travelled to Waitara, took a train to Stratford, and walked to a trig station outside of the township. From there he could see part of the southern boundary line of the aukati.<sup>698</sup>

Mitchelson used the trip and the presence of a reporter to publicise the Government’s policy of pressing ahead with the main trunk railway and opening the district to settlement. In early June, it was reported that he would propose to Parliament that two of the routes that had been explored were feasible: the central route through Taumarunui to Marton, and the western route through Ōhura to Stratford. Mitchelson said he would advocate for both lines, though if Parliament was not willing to support that he would prefer the ‘Stratford line.’<sup>699</sup>

While the estimated cost of these projects would be huge, the New Zealand Herald reported that Mitchelson regarded it as ‘amply justifiable’ by the resources and lands the lines would open up. The newspaper also reported that Mitchelson would urge the Government to secure land on both sides of the railway ‘so as to receive the increment of value that the railway would give them, instead of the natives or speculators getting an immense unearned increment.’<sup>700</sup> The policy, in

---

693. The legal theory behind pre-emption was that only the Crown had the right to convert customary title to freehold title. This was intended to protect indigenous people, and also to allow the Crown to fund settlement through the purchase and on-sale of land: Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Waiheke Island Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1989), pp 35–36; Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Orakei Claim (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1987), p 204; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, p 24; Rose Daamen, Rangahau Whanui National Theme D: The Crown’s Right of Pre-emption and Fitzroy’s Waiver Purchases, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahau Whanui Series (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1998), pp 1–14; Richard Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land: Governments and Maori Land in the North Island 1865–1921 (Wellington: Victoria University Press), 2008, chapter 1.

694. Native Lands Act 1862, ss 2–7, 17; see also Native Lands Act 1865, ss 21–29.

695. Document A41, pp 132–133.

696. Document A41, p 133.

697. Document A78, p 1046.

698. Document A78, pp 987, 1046–1047.

699. ‘The Railway Routes’, New Zealand Herald, 9 June 1884, p 2; doc A78, pp 1047–1048.

700. ‘The Railway Routes’, New Zealand Herald, 9 June 1884, p 2; doc A78, pp 1047–1048.

other words, was to open up as much land as possible through Crown purchasing, a proposition that had not been previously explained to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. Furthermore, the policy involved the Crown buying that land and on-selling it at sufficient profit to fund the railway. This, too, had never been put to the district's rangatira.<sup>701</sup>

One reason for this new focus on profiting from the railway was the deteriorating economic situation. By April 1884, according to one historian, the Atkinson ministry was beginning to be 'tainted by the deepening depression', which in turn had a significant impact on public finances. The Government responded by increasing taxes and reducing public spending, a combination that 'alienated many of its supporters'.<sup>702</sup> Although historians continue to debate the extent of the economic crisis New Zealand faced at the time, it was certainly a period of economic stagnation, and was perceived by all in dire terms.<sup>703</sup> The railway was seen as a means of stimulating the stagnant economy, but it was an enormously costly one. At a time of retrenchment in other public services, the Government therefore sought to justify this major investment by transferring the costs onto Māori.<sup>704</sup>

In late May, the Government had announced further details about the land policy. Speaking at a rally in Auckland, Atkinson said that 'the question of how the Māori lands are to be dealt with, how the Māori lands are to be obtained for settlement' was one of 'equal, if not of greater, importance' than the construction of the main trunk railway.<sup>705</sup> He said it was impossible for the present arrangement to continue if this trunk line is to be made through native country, because it is quite certain that if it were open to everybody, that many would go and buy up the land through which the railway will run or adjacent to it. It would necessarily fall into the hands of speculators, and so instead of the country obtaining the advantage which they ought to obtain . . . it would come into the pockets of private individuals.<sup>706</sup>

The Government's new Māori land policy had four main elements. Private individuals would be prevented from being able to purchase or lease Māori land directly; the Crown would retain a right of purchase land directly from Māori; Māori would also be able to place land with Crown land boards, which would conduct any negotiations on their behalf; and for any lands sold, reserves would

701. Document A78, pp1047–1048.

702. Timothy McIvor, The Rainmaker: A Biography of John Ballance, Journalist and Politician, 1839–1893

(Auckland: Heinemann Reid Ltd, 1989), p 119 (doc A41, p 132).

703. See Jim McAloon, 'The New Zealand Economy, 1792–1864', in Giselle Byrnes (ed), The New Oxford History of New Zealand (Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 2009), p 213; WJ Gardiner, 'A Colonial Economy', in WH Oliver (ed), The Oxford History of New Zealand (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981), pp 57–86.

704. Document A78, pp1047–1048.

705. 'Address by the Premier', New Zealand Herald, 20 May 1884, p 5; doc A41, p 133.

706. Document A41, p 134.

be provided for Māori. Atkinson said that such changes were necessary for the benefit of the country as a whole, so as to 'open up these waste lands' in the central North Island and 'for the settlement of a thriving population.'<sup>707</sup> Whereas Bryce's 1883 reforms to Native Land Court processes had stopped private interests making advances on Māori lands before the court's title investigation (section 8.4.6), the Government's new policy meant that the Crown was to be provided with a distinct advantage in purchasing land direct from Māori.<sup>708</sup>

These policies were put forward in the governor's speech to the opening of the new session of Parliament in early June. The governor said that the time had come when a 'very material change' in dealing with Māori lands was needed. The governor noted that new legislation would be introduced which acknowledged that the abandonment of Crown pre-emption had not worked as hoped – direct dealing in Māori land had resulted in injustices.<sup>709</sup> Despite the governor's speech, the New Zealand Herald also reported that the Government had decided not to put the Bill forward before that year's general election.<sup>710</sup>

8.6.6.2 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori respond to the new policies, May–June 1884

Given the Government's lack of response to Wahanui on issues that were concerning him, and the Government's new policy on land issues, it is perhaps not surprising that Wahanui decided he needed to take action to engage the Government directly. In late May, he wrote to Bryce to say he would travel to Wellington in order to attend the new session of Parliament. On the way south he stopped at Wanganui, where he met with the former member of the House of Representatives John Ballance (who would soon be re-elected and replace Bryce as Native Minister), as well as Bryce's private secretary. He arrived in Wellington on 9 June, shortly after the opening of Parliament, accompanied by Māori member of Parliament Wi Parata. Wahanui soon began meetings with various officials and politicians. When he met with Governor Jervois later in June, Wahanui noted that he had read his speech regarding the Government's new land policy. He said that though he enjoyed meeting and speaking with the governor, the Government's intentions for Māori land 'fall like lead upon my heart' – 'your written words are not like your spoken ones.'<sup>711</sup>

Wahanui's sentiments were soon echoed by a series of petitions sent by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori objecting to the Government's new land policy: one from Wetere Te Rerenga and others, one from Rewi Maniapoto and others, and one from Mohi Te Rangitautia and others.<sup>712</sup> Although the original does not appear to have survived, Rewi's petition was reported to contain strong objections to the Government's plans to control the sale of Māori lands, and asked to be given the opportunity to

707. Document A41, pp 133–134.

708. Document A78, p 1049.

709. Document A78, p 1051.

710. 'Political News – The Native Land Bill', New Zealand Herald, 29 May 1884, p 5; doc A41, p 136.

711. Document A78, p 1053.

712. Document A78, p 1053.

express the views of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori on the proposed Bill before it became law.<sup>713</sup>

8.6.6.3 The early work of the Kawhia Native Committee, May–June 1884

The Kawhia Native Committee held its first meeting on 10 June 1884 and immediately turned its attention to questions of how land titles would be determined once the external boundary survey was completed.<sup>714</sup> As discussed previously, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders understood that a Crown grant would follow the boundary survey, and Bryce had said that native committees would be able to ‘inquire into titles’, leading Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to understand that iwi and hapū subdivisions would be left to them to work out with the committee.<sup>715</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and committee members, were aware that the Native Committees Act provided the committees with very limited powers. They could hold investigations to identify the rightful owners of land and could put that information before the court, but the court was not obliged to take it into consideration. Ultimately, the court, not the committees, would make all decisions.<sup>716</sup> According to Husbands and Mitchell, ‘The Committee’s first resolution was to ask the Government for greater powers especially that the Committee should manage the Rohe Pōtae block and that all land claims should come to the Committee before going to the Court.’ At the committee’s second meeting, ‘it called for its decisions to be the equivalent of those of a judge (Kaiwhakawa Tuturu) and not to be able to be overturned by judges.’ Members of the Committee also objected to the Crown’s plan to restore pre-emption and to the fact that ‘a few owners had the power to deal with a block of land without broader consent.’<sup>717</sup>

In keeping with his understanding of the December 1883 agreement, Wahanui and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders began to make arrangements for hapū with land claims before the Court to withdraw them and instead place their lands before the Kawhia Native Committee for investigation.<sup>718</sup> Some Māori (presumably from Ngāti Raukawa) attempted to have a rehearing of the Maungatautari block transferred from the court to the Kawhia Native Committee, but the court refused, causing ‘[g]reat dissatisfaction.’<sup>719</sup> As noted in section 8.5.3, the Maungatautari case provided one explanation for the divisions that had emerged between Kīngitanga iwi during this period. It was Rewi who had made the rehearing application in March 1883 on behalf of Ngāti Raukawa (from whom he could claim senior descent). This was an extension of his ongoing concerns with securing Ngāti Raukawa interests

---

713. ‘Maori Petition Against the Native Lands Bill’, Bay of Plenty Times, 12 June 1884, p 1; doc A78, p1054.

714. Document A79, p 66; doc A78, p1043.

715. ‘The Native Minister and the Kingites’, New Zealand Herald, 1 December 1883, p 6.

716. Document A78, p1043.

717. Document A79, p 66.

718. Document A78, p1043.

719. ‘The Liquor Traffic in the King Country’, New Zealand Herald, 2 May 1884, p 5 (doc A78, p1044).

in those lands, and with shoring up Te Rohe Pōtae Māori control of lands immediately outside the district (see chapter 7). Once the Kawhia Native Committee had been established, he and others may have preferred it to consider the block.<sup>720</sup>

Wahanui also held a meeting with northern Whanganui iwi to persuade them to withdraw all existing applications to the court, while Ngāti Maniapoto held a hui at Te Kūiti in early June.<sup>721</sup> There, according to Wilkinson, ‘it was decided that the applications previously sent in for hearing of the Ngatimaniapoto country in the Land Court should be withdrawn, in order that it might be dealt with by the Native Committee first.’<sup>722</sup> Loveridge interpreted this to mean that Ngāti Maniapoto had ‘abandoned’ the December 1883 agreement, which he regarded as an application for title. On the basis of his evidence, the Crown submitted that ‘the Four Tribes’ had decided ‘not to apply to the Native Land Court for an external boundary survey, contrary to the undertaking it made in December 1883.’<sup>723</sup>

Husbands and Mitchell, on the other hand, concluded that Ngāti Maniapoto had merely withdrawn the handful of Native Land Court applications that they had filed before the December 1883 negotiations.<sup>724</sup> Bryce had mentioned these applications at the December 1883 hui (section 8.5.3) and had agreed to hold them back in return for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders filing an application for the entirety of their lands. He had also said that native committees would be able to inquire into titles. By withdrawing applications from the court, Ngāti Maniapoto were acting entirely in accordance with what Bryce had told them in December 1883. Their understanding of the December 1883 agreement was that the external boundary would be surveyed and a Crown grant would then be issued to all of the five tribes. They had deliberately left open the question of how iwi and hapū titles should be determined, but Bryce had indicated that the native committees would be the proper forum for such inquiries. John Ormsby would later explain to Bryce’s successor, John Ballance, that this was exactly the reason for Ngāti Maniapoto withdrawing applications from the court. Prior to the establishment of the Kawhia Native Committee, Ormsby said, ‘some chiefs, owners of the land, had already sent applications in to the Native Land Court for hearing’. ‘The reason those applications were sent in at that time was that there was no other course open to them; but, after the Native Committees were elected, then it was considered that those applications should be recalled, and the matters left to the Native Committees to deal with.’<sup>725</sup>

This is not to say that there was unanimous support for the Kawhia Native Committee among all Te Rohe Pōtae communities. As Wilkinson had observed, Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Mahuta had refused to take part in committee elections. Also, in early June, the Waikato Times reported objections concerning the extent

720. Document A12, pp 218–224.

721. Document A78, p1043.

722. Wilkinson to Bryce, 4 June 1884 (doc A41, p 140; doc A90, p 46).

723. Submission 3.4.6, p 14.

724. Document A79, p 77.

725. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 18 (doc A79, p 77).

to which the Kawhia Native Committee was appropriately representative of all groups in the rohe. The newspaper noted that ‘no less than eight’ of the committee were ‘of Wahanui’s party, whereas there is only one person representing Ngatiraukawa. The representative of the Ngatiraukawa interest is a young man, upon whom his people do not care entirely to depend.’<sup>726</sup>

The Times was responding to a letter from Whiti Patato (and ‘Ngatiraukawa katoa’). Patato was an elderly Ngāti Raukawa rangatira with interests in Wharepūhunga.<sup>727</sup> He appears to have feared the supposed advantage that claimants related to Ngāti Maniapoto would obtain when the land came before the court, and also to have been concerned about the Government’s new land policy:

[K]aore au i pai kia uru taku takiwa ki a te Wahanui whakahaere me ahau me taku iwi kaore i uru ki tana pitihana. He ahakoa i rongono ano matou i te korero a te Paraihe i te timatanga ki a matou ano te mana o matou whenua a rite tonu te ture mo o matou mo nga Pakeha hoki, i naianei e hanga ana te ture hou e te kawanatanga mo matou nei whenua e tango ana ki (sic) a ia anake te mana, ma tana ringaringa anake e raweke a matou nei whenua. Kaore rawa e marama tenei tikanga a te kawanatanga.

I am not happy that my district should come under Wahanui’s management; neither I nor my people took part in his petition. Although we all heard Bryce’s word at the beginning, to the effect that we should have the control over our lands, and that the law for us should be the same as for the Europeans, the Government are now making a new law about our lands, and are taking the sole control and sole disposal into their own hands. We cannot understand this action of the Government.

Patato noted that he had written to Bryce, but had received no response. As a consequence, he and his people had now taken to ‘stopping the trig survey of the Government in my district.’<sup>728</sup>

8.6.6.4 Ngāti Raukawa oppose surveys, June 1884

Patato kept his word. At the beginning of June, Cussen moved back to the north of the district to resume the trig survey. He reported that he sent a party of surveyors to Wharepūhunga, in the Wharepapa district, about 30 kilometres from Kihikihi: ‘they were met by sixteen of the Ngatiraukawa [Ngāti Raukawa], who were camped on the ground to obstruct the survey they ordered my party off at once.’<sup>729</sup> Cussen then went there himself with five Māori ‘who were interested in the land’. They said they had been sent there by Whiti Patato and would take the surveyors off the land if they refused to leave; they also said that Rewi and Hitiri Te Paerata had written to the tribes telling them to stop the survey.<sup>730</sup>

726. ‘The Natives and Mr Bryce’s Promises’, Waikato Times, 10 June 1884, p 2.

727. Document A60, pp 1214–1216.

728. ‘The Natives and Mr Bryce’s Promises’, Waikato Times, 10 June 1884, p 2.

729. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the years 1883–84’, AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

730. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the years 1883–84’, AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

Cussen then met with Ngāti Raukawa at Kihikihi, with both Rewi and Te Paerata in attendance. Rewi reportedly denied that he had sent a letter encouraging opposition to the surveys, but Te Paerata admitted that he had. His reason for doing so was that ‘as the Government intended to lock up their land under the pre-emption right, he wished all surveys to cease until the intentions of the Government were made known to Maoris’. Cussen said that as a result of the meeting, opposition was removed and the surveys were allowed to continue.<sup>731</sup> Wilkinson said that rumours continued to circulate that Wahanui would receive considerable advantage over other leaders as a claimant in the event that Te Rohe Pōtae lands came before the court; he added that Te Paerata’s letters appeared to be in William Grace’s handwriting.<sup>732</sup>

According to Marr, [t]he fact of Grace writing the letter for them meant little by itself, as the chiefs often asked Grace to act as a scribe for them. However, in this case, Wilkinson thought Grace had gone further, promoting the complaints himself and encouraging the chiefs to sign. Marr speculated that it was in Grace’s interests, as a private land agent, to encourage internal dissent among Te Rohe Pōtae tribes, thereby increasing the likelihood that each would take its own case to the court.<sup>733</sup>

Whether or not Grace was involved, Te Paerata’s concerns (as recorded by Cussen) aligned closely with those set out by Whiti Patato in his letter to the Waikato Times. Both emphasised the uncertainty created by the Government’s proposed new land policies. Patato’s opposition stemmed from ongoing misunderstandings of the December 1883 external boundary survey agreement. This was a misunderstanding that Bryce failed to correct when given the opportunity; as we have seen, his approach, when Māori wrote to him expressing concerns about the boundary survey, was to tell them that land disputes could be resolved in court. In fact, Patato’s concerns were closely aligned with Wahanui’s: the purpose of surveying the external boundary was to allow Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine their interests to land inside. Yet, from Patato’s perspective, Wahanui (along with Taonui) were supporting the Government (and by inference its land purchasing policies), as shown by Wahanui’s support for the various surveys underway throughout the rohe. Indeed, Cussen noted that ‘Wahanui and Taonui have consistently helped on the work throughout. Taonui himself accompanied me to Te Kuiti, and there appointed men to take us over the Tuhua country. He told me to send for him at any time he could be of service to us.’<sup>734</sup>

While the trig surveys had proceeded with some difficulty, the boundary survey was advanced in fairly quick time. That work, which had begun on 8 January, was largely completed by 30 July.<sup>735</sup> There were, however, some significant gaps. Surveyors refused to include the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi

731. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the years 1883–84’, AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

732. Document A78, p1002.

733. Document A78, pp1002–1003.

734. ‘Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the years 1883–84’, AJHR, 1884, C-1, p 30.

735. ‘Survey of Maori Land in the King Country: Reports from the Chief Surveyor, Auckland, Relative to’, AJHR, 1885, G-9, pp1–3.

land blocks which had been before the Native Land Court in 1882 (as discussed in section 7.4.4.5). Those blocks were clearly included within the 1883 petition area (see map 8.1), but were excluded from the area surveyed. From the surveyors' point of view, they were not defining an area in which Māori would retain their autonomy and authority; they were preparing a land block for court.<sup>736</sup> Wahanui and other Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira do not appear to have become aware of the omissions until late in 1885; as discussed in section 8.9.2.1, they then expressed considerable frustration.<sup>737</sup> By this stage, however, Bryce and his ministerial colleagues faced more immediate problems. A series of no-confidence votes resulted in a decision (by 17 June) to dissolve Parliament and go to the electorate.<sup>738</sup> The election was held on 21 and 22 July.

8.6.7 Treaty analysis and findings

Under the December 1883 agreement, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to a survey of the external boundary of their combined territory, on the expectation that the Crown would then confirm their ownership. This was confirmed in an exchange of letters between them and the Government. They also appear to have agreed to the trig survey and to a resumption of railway exploration. They did not consent to the Crown taking any other action in the district. Their clear expectation was that further negotiations would follow on from completion of the boundary survey. Those discussions would concern the means by which iwi and hapū boundaries would be determined. As they had signalled in the June 1883 petition, they expected that Te Rohe Pōtae iwi would be left to manage this process themselves and would then be left to control their own lands. This was the price they would ask for their consent to the railway.

In section 8.5.5, we found that Bryce had misled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during negotiations over the December 1883 agreement, by telling them that a Native Land Court application was the only means by which they could have the boundary surveyed. We also found that he had told them that native committees could inquire into land title, when in fact they could not. But, notwithstanding these actions, we found that it was still possible for the negotiations to get back on track towards a mutually acceptable outcome if the Crown completed the boundary survey and then was willing to re-engage over the question of how land titles could be determined in a manner that was consistent with the right of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to manage their own lands.

Almost immediately after the December 1883 agreement had been reached, the Government took steps to begin the external boundary survey and also to start the trig survey and resume the exploratory railway surveys. These events caused considerable concern for Te Rohe Pōtae communities, particularly those along the boundary, who expressed concern that the boundary overlapped their tribal or hapū rohe and appear to have feared that the survey would lead to title being

---

736. Document A78, p989.

737. Document A78, pp989–990, 1212.

738. Document A78, p1055.

awarded to Ngāti Maniapoto or other iwi or hapū that were party to the petition. Some responded by obstructing the surveys.

Bryce contributed to those communities' fears by presenting the December 1883 agreement, on some occasions at least, as an application for the court to begin a title determination process, instead of being for the boundary survey only (as clearly set out in the letters between Smith and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders). When groups who had concerns about the application raised them with Bryce, he told them that the best way to secure their rights would be through an application to the Native Land Court, but only when the time was right. In this way, he encouraged communities with interests in Te Rohe Pōtae to compete in court, instead of resolving their differences through dialogue. In both respects, Bryce's actions contributed to tensions between the June 1883 petitioners and other communities with interests in Te Rohe Pōtae, and by so doing made it more difficult for the petitioners to achieve their ultimate goals, many of which were shared with those outside the boundary.

It is not clear to us, however, that Bryce deliberately set out to misrepresent the nature of the December 1883 agreement. As we mentioned in section 8.5.3.4, on one occasion he publicly said that he was sorry that people did not understand the nature of the agreement and made clear that the application had been for a boundary survey. It appears that confusion emerged at least in part because Bryce and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had conflicting expectations about the process that would follow the boundary survey. They agreed that iwi and hapū rohe would be defined, along with individual interests. Bryce appears to have assumed that the court would conduct this process, but this is not in fact what was agreed. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had deliberately left open the question of how titles were to be determined, while indicating that it was a process that they expected to manage themselves.

Although they faced considerable challenges during this period, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders – in particular Wahanui and Taonui – continued to uphold their side of the agreement. They visited communities who were concerned about the surveys, persuading them not to obstruct the surveyors. But the district's leaders also continued to make clear that they expected more from the Government if negotiations were to progress. Rewi put this in plain terms, telling the Government that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would not agree to the construction of a railway through their territory until their self-government had been guaranteed.

Although Te Rohe Pōtae leaders regarded the Native Committees Act 1883 as deficient, they nonetheless accepted Bryce's assurances that native committees were able to inquire into land titles and took this as meaning that the next step after the boundary survey would be determination of iwi and hapū titles by the committee. When the Kawhia Native Committee first met, it began to take steps in this direction, which included calling for more suitable powers. Te Rohe Pōtae communities also took steps to support this goal by withdrawing their existing Native Land Court claims, on the basis that the committee, not the court, would inquire into title.

But, having said that native committees could inquire into titles, Bryce did nothing to ensure that they could. He made no effort to increase the powers of native committees as Wahanui had asked and the Kawhia Native Committee also sought. On the contrary, he dismissed the possibility that committees could play any such role, except as an advisor to the court. Addressing the British government, Bryce was dismissive of the idea that Māori could or should be able to have control over the process by which their land interests would be decided, and instead insisted that they would need to come under the authority of the institutions of the colony. This contrasted starkly with the messages he had given at the Kihikihi hui in December 1883.

While the election of the Kawhia Native Committee highlighted some of the challenges that might be involved in having Te Rohe Pōtae Māori determine land ownership among themselves, these were not insurmountable. They at least partly reflected the flawed process by which the Government conducted the elections, which had been set out in statute and followed by Wilkinson, and which led to a result that some saw as unrepresentative. More broadly, they reflected the divisions that could arise among Māori communities whenever there was a possibility of land being placed before the court. The decade-long dispute over Maungatautari had done harm to relations between Waikato tribes and their Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa Kīngitanga allies. We have already found that Bryce misled Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in December 1883 over his intentions with respect to land title determination. During the first half of 1884, he continued to conceal his real intentions on this matter, thereby reducing the prospect of any agreement ultimately being reached under which the Government would recognise the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over their lands, as required under the Treaty.

Instead of making an effort to accommodate Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' demands, the Government moved in the opposite direction. In April 1884, it decided to adopt a new policy under which all transactions in Māori land would be controlled by the Crown. This policy was to apply nationwide, but it was explicitly intended to support a programme of land purchasing which focused on areas surrounding the proposed railway routes, including Te Rohe Pōtae. The Government's goal was to buy Māori land and onsell it at sufficient profit to fund the railway. It reasoned that since it was funding the railway, which would increase land prices, it and not Māori landowners deserved the profit.

It adopted this policy without consulting Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, either about the detail or about the underlying purposes. At the time, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had consented only to surveys, not to the railway or to settlement. They had indicated they would not give their consent if the Crown did not recognise their authority over land, and they had also indicated they were not averse to settlement so long as they could control its manner and timing. The Government, nonetheless, pushed ahead with development of a policy that was aimed at allowing it to control the manner and timing of settlement, and to ensure that settlement happened on a large scale, and that the Crown profited from it. Wahanui travelled to Wellington to protest at what he saw as the Government's duplicity. The policy was so at odds with what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought, and so far removed from what had previously been agreed, that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would have legitimately expected to be consulted before the Government began to make public announcements to its settler constituents. In the event, the Government lost office before it could bring the policy into effect.

By June 1884, the relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori was looking increasingly tenuous. For the most part, the Crown was carrying out the specific terms of the December 1883 agreement – it was completing the boundary, though even on this point it wavered by leaving Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi out and failing to inform Wahanui of this fact. Wahanui and most other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were (despite some misgivings) supporting the surveys that were under way, though Rewi and Ngāti Raukawa were not.

In sum, the distance between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Government grew following the December 1883 agreement. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had agreed to the survey on the expectation that it would become a first step towards Crown recognition of their authority, as they had sought in the June 1883 petition. Instead, the Crown made decisions that suggested it had no intention of providing that recognition. Bryce made clear that he had no intention of empowering the Kawhia Native Committee to fulfil the role that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders expected of it, those expectations being based at least in part on his December 1883 comments. He contributed to tensions among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by continuing to advise them to take their land claims to court, even after the district's leaders had made clear that they wished to have such disputes resolved among themselves and without the court's involvement. Without consulting, his Government adopted a land purchasing policy which assumed it had a right to retain any growth in value that the railway brought to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands. And, without informing Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, the Crown's surveyors chose to exclude Mōkau lands from the boundary, and therefore to dishonour the plain terms of the December 1883 agreement. This last action was a direct breach of the Crown's duty to act in good faith, and of the principle of partnership. Overall, the Crown's Māori land policies as they applied to Te Rohe Pōtae were aimed at serving the interests of settlement in a manner that did not give due regard to the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and were therefore a breach of the principle of equal treatment.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had set themselves a goal of defining their territorial boundary and achieving statutory protection for their authority within that boundary. As discussed in section 8.4, that goal was consistent with their rights under article two of the Treaty. Whether it remained achievable would depend in part on how they managed relationships among themselves, and more particularly on their ability and willingness to hold a unified line against allowing the court into their lands. But it depended to a greater degree on the Crown's willingness to support their goals both by enacting appropriate laws and through its approach to settlement of the district. For any final agreement to be reached over the railway and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori authority, the Government's policy direction would have to change. In the event, the Government was unable to implement its policies before an election was called and it lost office, creating new opportunities for the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to negotiate.

8.7 THE FIRST LAND REFORMS OF THE STOUT–VOGEL GOVERNMENT, JULY–DECEMBER 1884

Following an unclear election result in late July, control of the House changed hands several times before a new ministry was sworn in on August 16, with Robert Stout as premier, Julius Vogel as treasurer, and the Wanganui member of the House of Representatives. John Ballance as Native Minister. Like its predecessor, the Stout–Vogel Government (as it is generally known) wanted to press ahead with construction of the railway, with the extension of Crown institutions (particularly the court) into Te Rohe Pōtae, and with the opening of the district for European settlement. The railway and settlement were seen as being urgently needed responses to the recession that had gripped the colony.<sup>739</sup>

While the new ministry shared the same broad objectives for Te Rohe Pōtae as its predecessor, its tactical emphasis was different and was not always clear due to differences among Ministers. As discussed in the previous section, the Atkinson Government had adopted a policy of opening the district for settlement by buying significant areas of land along the railway line. It also hoped to use profits from purchase and onsale of Māori land to fund the railway. This policy took it for granted that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would consent to the railway line, or that the Government would press ahead anyway. Ballance also seems to have assumed that consent for the railway had been obtained even though it had not. But he took a different approach to the promotion of settlement along the railway line. Instead of opening those lands through Crown purchasing, his initial view was that, in the right conditions, Māori would voluntarily open their lands for private settlement. This would reduce the need for the Crown to raise funds for investment in land. It would also mean that Māori, not the Crown, would profit from land sales, thereby increasing the likelihood that Māori would see the policy as fair.<sup>740</sup> This, in Ballance's view, was crucial. If Māori saw the Crown as treating them unfairly, they would be unlikely to subdivide their land and make it available for settlement, and the Government's settlement goals would therefore be delayed, possibly by years. In coming to this view, Ballance appears to have been informed by the more aggressive approach Bryce had taken, which had caused considerable frustration and suspicion among Te Rohe Pōtae and other Māori.<sup>741</sup>

Ballance's approach created new opportunities for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to influence the Crown's legislative plans. Wahanui travelled to Wellington and met

739. Document A41, p147; doc A78, p1055.

740. Document A41, pp147–149. For discussions of Ballance's more conciliatory approach, see Editorial, Marlborough Express, 15 September 1884, p2; 'On Native Affairs', Wanganui Herald, 27 September 1884, p2; 'On Native Affairs', Wanganui Herald, 27 September 1884, p2; 'Native Affairs', Marlborough Express, 15 September 1884, p2.

741. Document A41, pp147–149.

Ballance, once again setting out the conditions on which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would consent to the railway. He was also granted leave to address the House of Representatives and the Legislative Council – an unprecedented event for someone who was not a member of either House. His speeches (set out in full in appendix 8.2) explained the continued desire of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to reach agreement with the Crown on arrangements that would recognise their boundary and protect their authority within it. He said that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought an end to the Native Land Court, for hapū and iwi to be left with authority to determine land titles and administer their own lands, and for land to be alienated only by lease. Until satisfactory laws were passed, they would not consent to any land transactions, or to the railway. In his speech to the Legislative Council, Wahanui introduced the term ‘mana whakahaere’ (translated at the time as ‘full control and power’) to describe the authority he sought for his people with respect to their lands. In essence, Wahanui’s speeches were a reiteration of their demands to the Crown to honour the terms of the June 1883 petition and, by so doing, to give effect to the right of tino rangatiratanga enshrined in article 2 of the Treaty.

Wahanui, along with other Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, also brought a new issue to the table: control of liquor. The arrival of the armed constabulary in Kāwhia in October 1883 (and, in particular, the opening of an armed constabulary canteen) had increased access to alcohol in the town and surrounding areas, and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were concerned about the potential for harm to their own people.<sup>742</sup> They therefore asked the Government to prohibit all sales of alcohol within their boundary.

As we will see, Ballance and his Government colleagues were willing to negotiate, but only up to a point. When Ballance brought new Māori land legislation to the House, it did nothing to address Māori concerns about the Court and provided only limited support for collective decision-making by owners. It prohibited private alienation of land, but allowed for continued Crown purchasing. In the face of opposition from Wahanui and other Māori leaders, the Crown deferred much of this planned legislation so it could consult further. But it was not willing to delay its railway plans, even though Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had yet to consent. Nor – in spite of clear opposition from Māori – was it willing to give up its own right to purchase Māori land.

8.7.1 The Stout–Vogel Government’s land settlement objectives, August–November 1884

8.7.1.1 *The governor’s speech about the railway, August 1884

The Stout–Vogel Government’s railway and land purchasing intentions were set out in a speech to Parliament by Governor Jervois on 19 August. The North Island Main Trunk Railway, the governor said, would be a ‘colonial work of vast importance, which must be hastened to a conclusion with the utmost possible expedition.<sup>743</sup> This, he made clear, was not simply a question of completing the rail connection between Auckland and Wellington, but of settling the lands along the line, including this district. The Government's view, he said, was that lands adjacent to the railway should be set aside for settlement by European families 'upon conditions calculated to ensure their prosperity, the area for each family being limited', and that North Island Māori lands 'should be put to productive use as rapidly as possible'.<sup>744</sup>

---

<sup>742</sup> Wilkinson had discussed this in his mid-year report to the House of Representatives: ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts,’ AJHR, 1884, G-1, p 6.

The governor gave two means by which the Government hoped to achieve its settlement ambitions. On the one hand, he said that the Government would seek authority 'to acquire extensive blocks of [Māori] land' along the line of the railway.<sup>745</sup> But, on the other hand, he also said that the Government was willing to see Māori offer land for settlement. It was therefore 'very desirable' that the Government adopt 'the best means of enabling the Natives to dispose of their lands, when they desire to do so', and correspondingly 'useless' to implement laws that Māori would refuse to use.<sup>746</sup>

Though the Government opposed much existing Māori land law, it proposed to defer any substantive consideration of Māori land laws until 1885, so it could consult and reach agreement on proposals that would satisfy Māori while also serving the colony's settlement goals. Nonetheless, the Government was determined to press ahead with the railway as quickly as possible, and therefore, the governor said, a temporary law might therefore be necessary for the railway route.<sup>747</sup> One of the assumptions implicit in the Government's argument was that Māori could be satisfied with laws that also served the Crown's settlement goals. As discussed in previous sections, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were willing to see settlement occur, but only if laws were in place to protect their collective authority in respect of both title determination and land administration, and then only by leasing. As we will see, the Crown was willing to make only small concessions towards these objectives.

In this speech, expert witnesses saw a significant change in the Government's approach to Māori land. According to Marr, whereas Bryce had taken an 'abrasive' approach and had negotiated only when absolutely necessary, the new Government was signalling a more consultative approach, in which Māori could expect a meaningful say on matters affecting them.<sup>748</sup>

8.7.1.2 Determining the railway route, August–September 1884

At the time of the governor's speech, the Crown had obtained the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to conduct surveys and do no more. It had not delivered on any of the policies they had sought in the 1883 petition as preconditions for their

---

743. 'Governor's Speech', 19 August 1884, NZPD, 1884, vol 48, pp 5–7; doc 125, part 3, pp 142–243; see also doc A41, p 147; doc A67, pp 63, 108; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, pp 376–377.

744. 'Governor's Speech', 19 August 1884, NZPD, 1884, vol 48, pp 5–7.

745. 'Governor's Speech', 19 August 1884, NZPD, 1884, vol 48, pp 5–7.

746. 'Governor's Speech', 19 August 1884, NZPD, 1884, vol 48, pp 5–7.

747. 'Governor's Speech', 19 August 1884, NZPD, 1884, vol 48, pp 5–7.

748. Document A78, p 1060.

consent to the railway. Nonetheless, the Government pressed on with its railway and settlement plans. On 12 September, a select committee was established to determine the best route. The committee considered four routes, all with Te Awamutu as their northern starting point. Three traversed Te Rohe Pōtae, linking Te Awamutu to Te Kūiti: the central route then continued south through the Tūhua lands, joining the existing railway at Marton; and the western and coastal routes linked to Stratford, via Ōhura and Awakino respectively. The remaining (eastern) route largely bypassed Te Rohe Pōtae, linking to Napier. Whereas the Crown had already acquired Awakino land some decades earlier, the central and western routes were entirely on Māori land, at least in this district.<sup>749</sup> The committee applied four main criteria. First, the route should open up as much land as possible for settlement by smallholding farmers. Secondly, it should be as direct as possible. Thirdly, in order that trains be able to maintain reasonable speeds, it should not be too steep. Fourthly, it should so far as possible accommodate any existing settlements.<sup>750</sup>

8.7.1.3 Wahanui's negotiations with Balance, August–September 1884

Wahanui had responded to the defeat of Atkinson's Government by returning to Wellington, arriving in late August. He met the opposition member of the House of Representatives Sir George Grey before the end of the month, and spent some time familiarising himself with Government policies and legislative proposals.<sup>751</sup> On 17 September, he appeared before the select committee that had been appointed to determine the railway route. There, he emphasised that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not asked for the railway and had agreed only to the Crown exploring options for the railway route. Once the Crown had decided which route it wanted to pursue, he reminded members of the House of Representatives, it would then have to seek the consent of affected Māori. This was consistent with the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori understanding of the March and December 1883 agreements and with the undertaking given by Bryce in March 1883 that he would not build roads or other public works without seeking consent. Wahanui furthermore explained that consent for the railway would be given only once the Crown had put in place satisfactory laws for the protection of Māori lands. This, too, was consistent with the stance taken by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in previous negotiations and in the June 1883 petition. Even if satisfactory laws were put in place, Wahanui continued, consent could only be given after he had consulted with his people and obtained their agreement. As he put it:

The little matters that I brought down in my calabash to have put right have not been attended to; and before replying to your question [about the best route] I would

---

749. 'Report of the Select Committee for the North Island Main Trunk Railway: Together with Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence and Appendix', 9 October 1884, AJHR, 1884, 1-6, p vi, appendix.

750. 'North Island Trunk Railway, 22 October 1884, NZPD, vol 49, p 596.

751. Document A78, pp 1061-1062.

like to have my own matters put right. It will not do for me to give way all at once without some concessions on the other side.<sup>752</sup>

If the Government would assist Wahanui to achieve his goals, he said he would do all in his power to help it to bring the railway to fruition.<sup>753</sup>

Wahanui also met Ballance (possibly on several occasions) during September, to negotiate the terms on which consent for the railway might be given. There is no detailed record of these negotiations. However, Wahanui later said that he and Ballance had discussed the railway, the court, the powers of native committees, gold mining, and liquor licensing.<sup>754</sup> On 26 September, Wahanui wrote to Ballance. Without giving details on what had been agreed, Wahanui indicated that Ballance's answers had been satisfactory and asked that the Government set out its intentions in writing in order to avoid any future misunderstandings. Wahanui reiterated: 'the Native Land Court should not deal with any lands within the exterior of the territory owned by me and my four tribes, so that we may have time to frame a law satisfactory to both races and to secure the repeal of the bad laws that are now in force.'<sup>755</sup>

It is not clear from the very limited evidence available whether Ballance and Wahanui discussed the Crown's land settlement goals or the prospect of Crown purchasing of land surrounding the railway line. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had already made clear that they would contemplate settlement of their lands if (and only if) their conditions were met. In effect, their stance was that hapū and iwi should control any settlement process. Although the governor had spoken of extensive Crown purchasing along the railway line, there is no evidence that Ballance put this prospect directly to Wahanui or other Māori leaders. Rather, his subsequent statements indicated that he had led them to believe that they would retain control of the pace and manner of settlement (see section 8.8.2.2).

Wahanui's negotiations with Ballance occurred against a backdrop of continuing concern among Te Rohe Pōtae tribes, and in particular those that occupied the borders of the 1883 petition area, about conflicting claims to land. Whereas iwi and hapū were united by their opposition to the court and their desire to retain authority over their own lands, they were also facing the reality that anyone could make a claim, justified or not, which could then force them into court to defend their land interests.

In mid-September 1884, shortly before Wahanui appeared before the select committee, Te Heuheu Tūkino and 21 others of Ngāti Tūwharetoa wrote to the premier (Stout) expressing concern that 'te rohe potae a Wahanui' (Wahanui's external boundary) encroached upon land belonging to Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>756</sup> Te 752. 'Report of the Select Committee for the North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1884, 1-6, p16; doc A78, p1069; doc A41, p149.

753. 'Report of the Select Committee for the North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1884, 1-6, p16; doc A78, p1069; doc A41, p149.

754. Latest Parliamentary, Auckland Star, 22 September 1884, p2; doc A78, pp1068-1069.

755. Wahanui to Native Minister, 26 September 1884 (doc A78, p1064).

756. Document A78, p1063.

Heuheu had raised similar concerns in August 1883 and March 1884, as we have noted, and some Whanganui groups had also raised similar concerns in May 1884. As discussed previously, these petitions were based on a view that ‘te rohe potae a Wahanui’ was intended to define Ngāti Maniapoto lands for purposes of seeking title – a view that reflected Bryce’s public comments as reported in settler newspapers. Wahanui had always taken care to explain that the external boundary was intended to define an area in which Māori authority would endure for all tribes, and had sought and obtained consent from leaders whose communities lived along the boundary, including those of northern Whanganui and Ngāti Tūwharetoa. The Native Minister responded to Te Heuheu’s letter with an assurance that the survey of ‘Wahanui’s boundary’ had no effect on the title to the land, which would be determined by the court.<sup>757</sup> This would have done little to soothe Te Heuheu’s concerns or to correct false impressions about the purpose of the boundary.

Kāwhia leaders were also becoming anxious to resolve their differences about land. At a public meeting in early October, Hōne Wetere of Ngāti Hikairo (a member of the Kawhia Native Committee) sought feedback on a proposal to hold a Native Land Court hearing in Kāwhia to finally resolve land troubles that were causing ‘jealousy’ in the area. These presumably referred to the long-standing dispute between Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Mahuta over areas of northern Kāwhia. Wetere told the meeting that he and another Ngāti Hikairo rangatira, Hōne Te One (also a Kawhia Native Committee member), had received a letter from Wahanui that urged Kāwhia Māori to avoid the court and all land transactions, at least until new laws could be put in place:

Be strong and carry out the wishes of all Maoris with regard to the manner of settling land disputes. A new Government has just been formed. I have only lately been permitted to have a say on the subject. Fighting, as we generally do about land divisions, only help, to bring on a land court. This we should struggle against.<sup>758</sup>

Wahanui said he had sought the Government’s assurance that it would accept land claims only from those with mana, not from ‘outsiders’, and ‘[t]o the best of my belief the Government have already taken notice of this objection’:

They, however, say that they cannot do away altogether with the system of Land Courts, but have promised to allow us to decide some land cases among ourselves, and if we fail to do so they must. In the meantime do not let or lease any land. Government says that after the [parliamentary] session is over they will go into particulars and see what can be done to please the Maoris.<sup>759</sup>

---

757. Document A78, pp1063–1064.

758. ‘Native Wants in Kawhia: Public Meeting’, Waikato Times, 7 October 1884, p3; doc A78, pp1067–1068.

759. ‘Native Wants in Kawhia: Public Meeting’, Waikato Times, 7 October 1884, p3; doc A78, pp1067–1068.

Wahanui added that, from what he could see, the Government was committed to making good laws. It appears, therefore, that Wahanui and Ballance discussed the prospect of iwi determining land titles among themselves, with the Native Land Court acting as an appeal body only. Wahanui may have believed that, by this means, the court could be kept out of Te Rohe Pōtae altogether, since the court would enter only if iwi and hapū failed to resolve their issues among themselves.

Wahanui did not explicitly refer to the Kawhia Native Committee filling this land title determination role. However, Bryce had promised that native committees would be able to inquire into (if not determine) titles, and the Kawhia Native Committee had sought additional powers to allow it to effectively conduct this role (see sections 8.5.3 and 8.6.4.1). As we will discuss in section 8.8.2, empowerment of the Kawhia Native Committee to determine land titles as a court of first instance would become a significant part of the subsequent agreement between Ballance and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over the railway.

In response to Wahanui's letter, Wetere told the meeting that he favoured having rangatira committees adjudicate and settle land claims, with the Native Land Court playing a role only if the committee could not come to a decision. Hone Kaora (John Cowell) also supported this approach, saying that committees were 'far more competent' to adjudicate on title than European judges, who inevitably favoured claimants with 'most assurance and least honour'. A committee of rangatira would have personal knowledge of ancestral and tribal connections, and would not be misled as the court could be.<sup>760</sup> The meeting resolved to take steps to have Kāwhia land claims adjudicated as soon as possible, through the Kawhia Native Committee.<sup>761</sup>

Wahanui, meanwhile, remained in Wellington. He does not appear to have regarded his discussions with Ballance as final. In October, he reported to the Kawhia Native Committee that he had not yet reached agreement with the Government, but hoped to do before leaving Wellington. Even then, he had made clear that no agreement could be final until his people had been consulted – as would occur in 1885.<sup>762</sup>

8.7.1.4 Proposal to provide for Māori authority, September 1884

As Wahanui was negotiating with the Government, some members of the House of Representatives were turning their attention to questions of how Māori concerns could be addressed. During September, a paper by the former member William Rees was tabled in the House. It described the current state of Māori land law as a 'scandal' which had arisen because Parliament and the courts insisted on treating Māori tribal land as if it were owned by individuals, instead of 'the heritage of the

---

760. 'Native Wants in Kawhia: Public Meeting', Waikato Times, 7 October 1884, p3; doc A78, pp1067–1068.

761. 'Native Wants in Kawhia: Public Meeting', Waikato Times, 7 October 1884, p3; doc A78, pp1067–1068.

762. Document A78, p1065.

tribe or hapū.<sup>763</sup> The Treaty of Waitangi, he said, assured Māori of their right to possess and use land as a tribe. He proposed that Māori be empowered to manage their own lands through tribal committees, in a manner similar to boards of directors acting on behalf of corporate shareholders – who, like Māori, owned assets collectively but not as individuals.

If the law enabled them to deal with their lands after the ownership has been determined, regarding the tribe as one person; if they were assured by law that no dealings with individual Natives would be henceforward allowed; if they were, also, assured that full power to deal with their lands would be given to the whole people, speaking and acting by their chosen representatives, and that full power would be granted to them thus to do what they chose with their own as long as they injured no other persons, the Maori question and the Maori difficulty would be at once a thing of the past.<sup>764</sup>

Rees said he had consulted extensively with Wahanui and numerous other leading rangatira and was convinced that Māori lands would be opened for settlement if Māori were genuinely empowered to manage land collectively, perhaps acting with advice from the Native Land Court or Public Trustee. He warned, however, against any proposal that required Māori to give the Crown power to administer sales or leases. He suggested that a hui be called at the borders of Te Rohe Pōtae, at which his proposal could be discussed by all of the country's leading rangatira and, if approved, brought into law.<sup>765</sup>

There is no evidence of the Government taking any action on Rees' proposal. Nor did it offer support when the Eastern Maori member of the House of Representatives, Wi Pere, proposed legislation in late September to provide for hapū and iwi to manage land collectively. Pere's Native Lands Act Amendment Bill 1884 provided for a panel comprising a judge and three Māori assessors to make the initial title determination for each district. Once owners were named, they would select a committee to act on their behalf, determining hapū, whānau, and individual interests, and overseeing all land administration and alienation functions including sale, lease, raising mortgages, making reserves, and farming the land. No individual would be able to alienate land.<sup>766</sup> The Government offered no support for these measures, and instead proceeded with Ballance's Bill, which provided for minimal iwi and hapū influence, and instead provided for Crown control of all land alienation.<sup>767</sup>

---

763. 'Native Land Laws: Memorandum on, by WL Rees', AJHR, 1884, G-2, p1. Also see 'Political Gossip', Auckland Star, 19 September 1884, p 2; doc A78, pp1062–1063.

764. 'Native Land Laws: Memorandum on, by WL Rees', AJHR, 1884, G-2, pp 4–5.

765. 'Native Land Laws: Memorandum on, by WL Rees', AJHR, 1884, G-2, p 5.

766. Native Lands Act Amendment Bill 1884; doc A78, pp1062–1063.

767. Document A78, pp1062–1063.

8.7.1.5 The railway route and new land policy, October–November 1884

The Government offered no support for Pere's Bill. Instead, it proceeded with its plan for further consultation, with temporary legislation covering the railway area. On October 9, the railway select committee recommended that the Government build the North Island Main Trunk Railway along the central route, from Te Awamutu to Marton. The committee had been chaired by the Minister for Public Works, Edward Richardson. He summarised the committee's reasoning in the House, stressing that this route had the best balance of all the criteria taken into account. It was the most direct route, had fewer engineering difficulties, would result in the opening of more land for settlement than any other line, and had potential for branch lines, all at reasonable cost.<sup>768</sup>

On the same day, Ballance introduced the Native Land Settlement Bill to the House of Representatives. During September, Ballance had told the House that the Government planned to prohibit land dealings in an area 10 miles on either side of the railway line.<sup>769</sup> But the Bill, as introduced, applied to a far larger area, of some 4.5 million acres, encompassing the 1883 petition area and a considerable amount of land to the south.<sup>770</sup> The Bill's purpose, as set out in the preamble, was to temporarily prevent private purchasing of Māori land in the railway area (and any other area proclaimed by the governor), while nonetheless promoting settlement.<sup>771</sup>

The Bill prohibited all private land transactions within the affected area, and instead established a process by which Māori landowners could apply to the Crown to sell, lease, or reserve land on their behalf. The transactions would be managed by a commissioner assisted by two Māori 'assessors'. All would be appointed by the Crown. In effect, Ballance's intention was that the Crown would act as agent for the owners in any private sales or leases.<sup>772</sup> The Crown was to be exempt from this purchasing system, and instead was able to purchase directly from owners, either individually or collectively.<sup>773</sup>

If the land had been through the court, the owners were those named on the title, and any individual owner could offer land for sale or lease. If the land had not been through the court, the owners were defined as the 'leading chiefs of the tribe or hapu . . . but not to the exclusion of any individuals jointly interested' in the land. If title had not already been determined, any application for the land to be dealt with under the Act would also be treated as an application for the court to investigate title.<sup>774</sup> In effect, then, rangatira or hapū acting collectively could 768. 'North Island Trunk Railway, 22 October 1884, NZPD, vol 49, pp 596–598.

769. 'Parliamentary News', New Zealand Herald, 19 September 1884, p 5.

770. Native Land Settlement Bill 1884, cl 5–7, sch; Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, schedule; doc A78(a), vol 4, pp 1729–1735; doc A78, p 1091; doc A90, p 43.

771. Document A78, p 1073.

772. Native Land Settlement Bill 1884, cl 8, 10–13; doc A78, pp 1078, 1091; doc A78(a), vol 4, pp 1729–1735.

773. Native Land Settlement Bill 1884, cl 28; see also doc A78, pp 1073–1076, 1079–1080; doc A41, pp 152–153; doc A67, pp 63–65.

774. Native Land Settlement Bill 1884, clauses 10, 13.

Map 8.2: 1883 petition area, 1884 restriction area, and Te Rohe Pōtāe inquiry district trigger the sale or lease process, but individuals would ultimately have the right to sell or lease.

The Bill fell a long way short of what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought in the 1883 petition and since. It did nothing to resolve Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns about the Native Land Court, nor to respond to the demand that Māori be able to determine title among themselves. Nor did it guarantee the right of hapū and iwi to make collective decisions about land administration – it merely provided for the possibility that owners could decide collectively to sell or lease, without preventing individuals from taking that step. It did not prohibit all sales, Crown and private, as Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought. And nor did it provide for titled land to be leased in an open market; instead, it granted the Crown a privileged market position by virtue of its position as both land purchaser and agent for the owners.

Of the 4.5 million acres covered by the Bill (see map 8.2), the Crown either owned, leased, or was negotiating to buy some 1 million acres, all of which lay outside the inquiry district. The remaining 3.5 million acres – broadly corresponding with the 1883 petition area – was still in Māori ownership and had not yet gone before the court.<sup>775</sup> It is not clear why Ballance felt the need to prohibit private purchasing in this vast area, as the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 already barred all private purchasing until 40 days after title had been ascertained, and the Crown was already negotiating to purchase almost all of the land that had been through the court.<sup>776</sup> Ballance told the House that he had initially considered imposing restrictions on the lands immediately adjacent to the proposed railway route, before deciding that a much larger area should be covered. In this, he claimed to have Wahanui's support, though this was only partially true as we will see in the next section.<sup>777</sup>

8.7.2 The Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, October–November 1884

Ballance's proposed legislation was explicitly intended not only to advance the railway but also to advance settlement of Te Rohe Pōtae. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had never been consulted about any settlement programme, let alone given their consent. While they were not opposed to settlement, they were anxious to ensure that they could control its manner and timing, in order to ensure that it served their people's interests, as was their right under the Treaty of Waitangi. In their representations to the Crown, they had offered no more than the possibility of some land being offered for leasing in an open market if satisfactory laws were put in place.

On October 24, while Ballance's Bill was still under consideration, Richardson delivered the annual Public Works Statement to the House. His speech emphasised the Government's view that the railway must be completed as quickly as possible.<sup>778</sup> Although Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not consented to the railway,

775. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317.

776. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883, s 7.

777. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317; doc A67, p 65.

778. 'Public Works Statement', 24 October 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 87–88; doc A90, p 49.

Richardson said he had issued instructions for a detailed survey of the preferred route, and he hoped to issue tenders for construction of the first section south of Te Awamutu within 'a few weeks'. He said he would leave to Ballance 'the task of obtaining land along the line'.<sup>779</sup> Richardson did not specify whether he expected Ballance to acquire land for settlement, or merely land for the railway. But the general tone of his speech certainly implied that the Government was determined to settle the whole country. Richardson spoke of railways, bridges, and roads as part of a great colonising task, which would take several generations and would require considerably more immigration from Britain. The Government's task was to 'steadily pursue the functions of colonization as fast as . . . our means permit'.<sup>780</sup>

8.7.2.1 Wahanui's speech to the House of Representatives, 1 November 1884

Wahanui and other Māori leaders were dismayed with Ballance's Bill. They had consistently told the Government that no decision would be made about the railway, let alone about settlement of the land alongside the railway, until satisfactory land laws were enacted. Now, the Government was proceeding with legislation intended to open the district's land for settlement, without having first addressed their concerns about land title determination, the court, collective management by hapū, or protection from sale.

In response to a petition signed by, among others, Whanganui rangatira Te Keepa, Kawhia Native Committee chairman John Ormsby, and Eastern Maori member of the House of Representatives Wi Pere, Wahanui was granted leave to address the House of Representatives.<sup>781</sup> He did so on 1 November, just before the Bill received its second reading (see appendix 11 to this chapter).<sup>782</sup> Wahanui spoke in Māori, with Captain Gilbert Mair translating.<sup>783</sup> Wahanui told the House he had been sent by his people for two causes. The first was to retain sole authority over their lands:

Te take tuatahi ko to matou oneone, te whenua o a matou tupuna tae iho ki ahau me toku iwi. E ki tuturu ana ahau, ko to matou whakaaro e penei ana ma matou anake e whakahaere aua whenua.

---

779. 'Public Works Statement', 24 October 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 87–88; doc A90, p 49.

780. 'Public Works Statement', 24 October 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 87–88; doc A90, p 49.

781. 'Native Land Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 555; doc A41, p 155; doc A78, pp 1072, 1077, 1089–1090.

782. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 316, 555–556. Also see doc A41, pp 154, 159; doc A78, pp 1077–1078.

783. Document A110 (Meredith), p 668.

The first subject on which I shall speak concerns our lands – the ancestral lands of myself and my people. [I say firmly that our thinking is like this: the administration of those lands is for us alone.]<sup>784</sup>

The second was to ensure that the Native Land Court was not allowed into the district:

Tuarua, kaore matou e pai kia haere mai te mana o te Kooti Whenua Maori ki runga ki aua whenua, i te mea he whenua papatupu era no matou ake kaore ano kia ekengia e te mana Pakeha, kaore ano kia pa noa tona ringaringa, kaore ano kia takahia noa e te waewae o te Pakeha. Kaore ano kia whai hoko, reti ranei, aha ranei. Koia ahau e ki nei: Waiho kia matou te tikanga me te whakahaere inaianei, muri iho ma matou tahi ko te Kawanatanga e ata whakaaro he ture hai whakahaere.

We are not happy for the authority of the Māori Land Court to come into force over those lands, because they are our own customary lands. As yet no European's authority has yet been exercised over them, his hands have not touched them, his feet have not even trampled them. He has not achieved any sales or leases yet. So therefore I say, leave to us the rules and the management now, and later, together with the government, we will carefully consider a law for their administration.<sup>785</sup>

Wahanui explained that he opposed Ballance's proposed legislation, which he saw as an attempt by the Crown to obtain the district's land.

No te tirohanga atu ka kite ahau i nga niho roroa niho kokoi o taua taniwha kei te upoko, kei te waha hoki me te tara hoki kei tona hiku; mohio ana ahau ko ana niho kokoi rawa hei horo i nga tangata, me te tara hei whakamate i te whenua. No toku kitenga i enei niho tuatini, ka mahara ahau, kei te he.

When I looked at it I saw great sharp teeth in the head of this taniwha [monster], in its mouth also and a spike in its tail, knowing that those very sharp teeth were for swallowing up men, and the spike to destroy the land. When I saw these many teeth I thought, this is wrong.<sup>786</sup>

---

784. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885'; He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2-d1.html>, accessed 22 February 2018; 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317; see also doc A110, pp 668–672; doc A41, p 156. Amendments to translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

785. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885'; 'Native Land Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 555–556 (appendix); He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2-d1.html>, accessed 22 February 2018; 'Native Land Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 555. Also see doc A110, pp 668–672; doc A41, p 156. Translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

786. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885'; 'Native Land Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 555. Translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

The ‘teeth’ Wahanui referred to were the Bill’s land administration functions, which effectively gave the Crown control over sales and leases of Māori land. As Rees had warned, Wahanui and other Māori leaders saw nothing to recommend such a measure. The sting in the tail was the Crown’s exclusive right to purchase land within the 4.5 million-acre zone.

Wahanui asked the House not to pass the Bill, and instead to pass legislation that would recognise and protect his people’s authority. He reminded the House of the constitutional relationship between Māori and the Crown, saying that Tāwhiao had gone to Britain to ask the Queen to honour her obligations and make fair laws, but had been told to deal with the colonial authorities, and that was why Wahanui was now appealing to the House. He described the relationship in terms which suggested that, although Parliament had the power to make laws, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retained the ultimate authority over their lands:

Titiro ia ki te wati kei toku ringa e mau ana, noku tenei wati. Mehemea ka pakaru, maku e mau atu ki te watimeke kia mahia, me toku tohu atu hoki nga mate ki a ia, a mana e mahi i runga i taku i tohu ai. Kei te otinga ka hoki mai ano toku wati ki au: kei au anake te tikanga. Na e pa ana tenei kupu whakarite naku ki toku whenua.

This watch which I hold in my hand is mine; and, if it requires repairs, let me take it to the watchmaker and have it repaired. I will explain to the watchmaker what requires to be done to it, and then he can repair it according to my direction. Then, when he has repaired it, he returns it to me, and I pay him for it, and then it is mine to do what I please with. I apply this idea to my land and I think it is a parallel case to my land. I do what I like with it, and when it needs repairs I do not ask anybody, but take it straight to the watchmaker, and he does what is necessary. That is the principle upon which we wish to deal with our land.<sup>787</sup>

Although Wahanui did not explicitly refer to the Treaty, he was clearly expressing his understanding of the relationship between kāwanatanga – the power granted to the Crown to govern and make laws – and the commensurate obligation on the Crown to use that power to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of Māori communities over their territories and resources. Wahanui asked Parliament not to be swept away in its desire to obtain land for settlement, and instead to preserve Māori authority. Specifically, he said: ‘Me titiro mai ki taku e pai ai, me ta toku iwi i hiahia ai, ara, kia waiho te tikanga me te whakahaere mo a matou whenua kia matou anake.’<sup>788</sup> This was a direct appeal for iwi to retain full control of land – both in terms of law (tikanga) and in terms of governance and management (whakahaere). However, Mair translated him as saying: ‘I claim the consideration of this House, and ask it to give effect to my wish and the wish of my people, and that the authority over our lands may be vested in our Committee.’ Mair, in his translation, was presumably referring to the Kawhia Native Committee.<sup>789</sup>

---

<sup>787</sup>. ‘Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885’; ‘Native Land Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 556.

<sup>788</sup>. ‘Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885’.

8.7.2.2 Ballance’s response to Wahanui, 1 November 1884

Addressing the House in response, Ballance said that Wahanui’s opposition arose more from ‘want of familiarity’ with the Bill’s provisions ‘than from anything contained in them’. Ballance said that Wahanui, if he truly understood the Bill, would see its protective intent. The Bill, he said, was based on two principles. The first was that it prohibited all private dealings in Māori land within the affected area. Ballance said that the Government had initially intended to prohibit dealings only within a certain distance of the line, but had decided to extend the prohibition to cover all dealings in land that the railway would benefit. Ballance said that Wahanui had supported the prohibition on private transactions in ‘the whole of the Waikato, including his lands’. He made no mention of Wahanui’s opposition to the Crown’s purchasing right. The second principle, Ballance said, was that the Crown would act as agent for Māori landowners in any sales or leases of their land, administering the land for the owners’ benefit. Ballance acknowledged that this was one of the ‘teeth’ that Wahanui had spoken of. He said it was a ‘tentative’ proposal only and had been intended to ensure that Māori could get the best prices for their land.<sup>790</sup>

He acknowledged that Māori landowners would be unwilling to hand their lands over Crown appointees and would instead want their lands dealt with by a body made up mainly of their own representatives. He also acknowledged that Wahanui and other Māori leaders wanted ‘the power to deal with their own lands’ and were seeking ‘the fullest privileges of self-government with respect to dealing with their own lands.’<sup>791</sup> He said there were two views of land administration: first, those who sought the free-trade in Māori land; and secondly, those who sought ‘tribal’ Māori control of land under the ‘united intelligence of the tribe in council’. In his view, individualisation had done Māori a great deal of harm, and tended only to accelerate the transfer of land from Māori to private Europeans: ‘Our object is not to divide and conquer; our object is not to wrest from the Natives their land without their full and intelligent consent.’ He therefore indicated his support, in principle at least, for tribal control over Māori land. But – notwithstanding the suggestions already made by Wahanui and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and by Wi Pere and Rees – he said that no appropriate policy had yet been brought forward.<sup>792</sup>

He said that Māori were pressing for native committees to be used for land administration, but the native committee movement was ‘in its infancy’ and not yet ready to take on the land administration role. However, ‘when the time comes’, Parliament should be prepared to hand control of land over to boards made up mainly of elected Māori representatives, and to grant them ‘extensive powers with 789. ‘Native Land Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 556.

790. ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–313.

791. ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 312.

792. ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 314–315.

respect to the administration of land.<sup>793</sup> Ballance, here, was referring not to owner committees (as proposed by Rees and Pere), nor to existing native committees. Rather, he was proposing that the commissioner and assessors already provided for in his legislation be renamed a 'board', but with greater Māori representation.<sup>794</sup>

With respect to determination of land titles, Ballance acknowledged that the Native Land Court 'has not given satisfaction' to Māori people, and said this was principally because the court was individualising title whereas Māori traditionally held land in common. However, with 'a few amendments', he said, the court remained the best tribunal for determining title to Māori land, whether it was awarding that title to iwi, hapū, or individuals. Native committees could not carry out this function, he said, because committee members would inevitably have interests in the land they were adjudicating on. Only the court, he said, could conform to 'the principles . . . of English jurisprudence' by being 'above suspicion' and immune from 'intimidation' and 'bribery'. Notwithstanding those reservations, he said that committees with 'slightly larger powers' could perform some 'useful functions', possibly acting 'as a Court of first instance', with the court hearing appeals.<sup>795</sup> As discussed earlier, Wahanui and other Māori leaders had criticised the Native Committees Act 1883 because it failed to empower Māori communities to determine title among themselves, or to administer land transactions.

Though he was not willing to offer what Wahanui sought – an end to the court, and tribal control over title determination and land administration – Ballance nonetheless recognised the strength of Māori opposition to all parts of the Bill other than 'the prohibition clause'. He also saw that 'Wahanui's great influence among his own people would be much lessened' if Parliament enacted laws that he had opposed and his people had not yet discussed among themselves. With little more than a week left in the parliamentary session (Parliament rose for the year on November 10), Ballance therefore proposed to withdraw all parts of the Bill relating to the administration of sales and leases of Māori land (including those relating to the planned role of the commissioner and Māori assessors), leaving those provisions to the next parliamentary session in 1885.<sup>796</sup>

Ballance subsequently introduced amendments removing all of the land administration clauses. Six new clauses were inserted, prohibiting all private alienation of Māori land in the 4.5 million acre restriction zone.<sup>797</sup> All that remained of the original Bill was its final provision, clause 7, which provided that nothing would preclude the Crown from negotiating to purchase or otherwise acquire Māori land in the area covered by the Bill.<sup>798</sup> Ballance acknowledged that the Crown's immediate requirement was to acquire 3,360 acres of land along which the railway would

---

793. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 312.

794. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 313.

795. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 315–316.

796. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 316–317; doc A78, pp 1084–1085.

797. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 317.

798. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317.

run, and he believed Māori would freely offer that land. He gave no reason for the Crown retaining purchasing rights over a vastly greater area.<sup>799</sup>

It is quite clear from Ballance's speech that he saw the constitutional relationship in quite a different light from Wahanui. Ballance made no reference to Wahanui's watchmaker analogy and did not appear to regard the Crown as having any obligation to enact the laws that Wahanui sought. Rather, he appears to have regarded Māori as possessing property but not political rights with respect to their territories, and to have a right to be consulted. After announcing his amendments, Ballance and other Ministers insisted that their sole purpose was to prevent land speculation in the railway area until a new system of Māori land administration that met with Māori approval could be put in place.<sup>800</sup>

8.7.2.3 Views of other members, 1 November 1884

After Ballance had spoken, Wi Pere gave his views. He said that all previous laws affecting Māori land had been made by Europeans, and '[t]he result of these laws has been that all Māori lands have passed away'. Like Wahanui, he objected to the court and individualisation of title, and to the Crown retaining control of land transactions. He said that all authority should rest with owners, with representative committees acting on their behalf. The Government could assist, but not have control over Māori lands. In the immediate future, he said, the only good that could be done for Wahanui's land was to 'stop the Court . . . stop the surveys . . . and stop the selling and leasing'. Only once 'a good law' was passed, designed by Māori and confirmed by Parliament, should there be any further move towards land title determination or land transactions.<sup>801</sup>

In the colony's history, he said, the Crown had never allowed Māori to make their own laws. Europeans had made the laws and had obtained 30 million acres of Māori land. They 'ought to be satisfied with that land for the present', and leave remaining Māori land to be administered by Māori. He said that Wahanui was saying to the Government: 'keep back your dogs from coming and killing my sheep', because he (Wahanui) no longer had power to restrain Europeans who wanted to come into the district and cause trouble. Put another way, he was asking that 'a fence be placed round his land, and, if the gate is to be opened to let any one in upon the land, let it be done by the owner of the soil: let him open the gate himself'.<sup>802</sup>

Bryce also spoke. He criticised Ballance for having already failed to obtain significant areas of land along the railway. While he did not think that Māori land should be treated differently from European land, he nonetheless thought that 'if land belonging either to the Maoris or to Europeans is to have its value so largely enhanced by public works executed at the general expense of the colony,

799. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317.

800. Document A78, pp 1091–1092, 1102; doc A67, pp 66, 69–70, 127–128.

801. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 317–318.

802. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 318.

that land should contribute something special towards the cost of those works.<sup>803</sup> Here, he was reasserting the policy that he and other members of the Atkinson Government had advocated before the election. Although Ballance did not support this approach, some members of the Government did, as we will see.

Bryce also spoke about land title determination, saying it was 'impossible' to recognise communal title, as that 'would simply bar the utilization and settlement of the land' and settlement of land was essential for the good of the colony and the Māori people. Native committees could make some contribution to land title determination by arranging for Māori to meet and make their own arrangements for land title before presenting the result to the court. But they could not themselves ascertain or individualise title, because such an approach would be 'beyond their conception'. It was therefore 'entirely hopeless to expect that any Māori Committee could progress in the settlement of title if left to themselves'. Jealousy of one another, and the tendency to taihoa – wait a while – would cause the settlement of title to be 'indefinitely delayed'.<sup>804</sup> In making these comments, Bryce confirmed what Māori leaders had suspected – that he had never intended native committees to have full powers over land title determination, nor full powers over land administration. For Bryce, as for most other non-Māori members of the House of Representatives, the overriding priority was to obtain Māori land for settlement by Europeans, and Māori wishes would be accommodated only to the extent that they did not impede this goal.

Though Bryce did not comment in detail on the Bill's withdrawn provisions, he did observe that Ballance's proposal to allow Māori to sell land either directly to the Government or through a Crown-controlled commissioner was likely to lead to dissatisfaction. He recommended that land be sold only through the commissioner.<sup>805</sup>

8.7.2.4 *Wahanui's continued objection, 6 November 1884

After Ballance's amendments were made, Wahanui and five other leaders petitioned the Legislative Council. They said it was 'a matter of life and death' to Māori that their concerns about land legislation be addressed. They remained very concerned about Ballance's proposed land law:

the Maori people are now threatened with law of which they have never heard, which law may swallow up all their land and so destroy them, wherefore we are in great fear and trouble and to you, the fathers of the people, we now call that you may hear our cry and shelter us from the evil which is swiftly coming upon us.<sup>806</sup>

---

803. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 321; see also doc A78, pp 1087–1089.

804. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 321–322.

805. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 322.

806. 'Wellington', Nelson Evening Mail, 7 November 1884, p 3; doc A78, p 1090; doc A110, p 672.

Wahanui spoke to the Legislative Council on 6 November 1884. He reiterated the utmost importance of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retaining their self-government.

Tuatahi, ko te tino take o aua hiahia kia tau ano ki au te mana whakahaere i toku whenua, i raro ano i te mana o te Kawana. Kahore ano kia pa noa te ringa o te pakeha ki enei whenua.

The first, the principal, object that I have in view is that I should have the full control and power over my own lands, subject to the authority of His Excellency the Governor. These lands, so far, have not been touched by the hands of Europeans.<sup>807</sup>

This was Wahanui's first recorded use of the term 'mana whakahaere' to describe the authority he sought for his people. As noted in section 8.7.2.1, he had previously used the term 'whakahaere' in conjunction with 'tikanga', to refer to full authority over both law and administration.

Wahanui said the Bill, as introduced, had a whole body covered in niho (teeth), and a tara (thorn or spike) in its tail. The Government had now removed most of the teeth, with the exception of one. His objection (whakakino) to that remaining tooth was great, and he appealed (inoi) to the council not to proceed with it.<sup>808</sup> Though Wahanui did not specify which clause he was referring to, legislative councillors and other contemporary observers were in no doubt that he meant clause 7, which preserved the Crown's right to purchase.<sup>809</sup>

Wahanui repeated his demand that the Native Land Court must have no jurisdiction within Te Rohe Pōtae, at least until the Government and Māori had agreed on satisfactory laws. He said he was not opposing the Government, but wished to work with them to make satisfactory arrangements.

Tuarua, e hiahia ana ahau kia whakamana te Komiti, kia tukua ma te Komiti e whakahaere katoa nga mahi i runga i nga whenua i roto i taua takiwa.

---

807. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2.html>, accessed 26 February 2018; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 427; doc A110, pp 672–673; doc A78, pp 1093–1094.

808. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2.html>, accessed 26 February 2018; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 427; doc A110, pp 672–673; doc A78, pp 1093–1094.

809. 'Legislative Council', Southland Times, 7 November 1884, p 3; 'Legislative Council', Daily Telegraph, 7 November 1884, p 3; 'Legislative Council', Nelson Evening Mail, 7 November 1884, p 4; doc A78, pp 1090, 1093.

Secondly, I should wish that my Committee — that is, the Native Committee — should be empowered, so that all dealings and transactions within that proclaimed district should be left in the hands of that Committee.<sup>810</sup>

Wahanui may have discussed empowerment of the committee in his negotiations with Ballance, but this appears to have the first time he raised the prospect publicly. Previously, he had asked more generally for iwi and hapū to retain control of their lands.

Wahanui said he made his requests of Parliament in the belief that its work was tapu (sacred) and should be carried out in a spirit of truth (pono) and justice (tika).

Tuatoru, e hiahia ana ahau kia pai te hanga i nga ture mo nga iwi e rua, kia rite tahi te whakahaere mo te iwi Maori me te iwi Pakeha, kia pai ai te noho tahi i roto i nga tau e haere ake nei.

Thirdly, I wish that the laws for the two peoples should be carefully framed, so that the arrangements for the Māori and Pakeha peoples are the same, so that living together in the future will be satisfactory.<sup>811</sup>

8.7.2.5 The Legislative Council's response, 7–8 November 1884

Members of the Legislative Council generally accepted the prohibition on private land dealings as a necessary step to prevent speculation along the railway route. However, several members could see no reason why the Crown needed to retain purchasing rights over the entire 4.5 million acres if it only wanted land for the railway corridor.<sup>812</sup> The legislative councillor Walter Mantell said he feared the Crown was returning to 'the good old system' of using pre-emptive powers to acquire 'the largest possible amount of [Māori] land for the least possible price'. He urged the Government to amend clause 7 to make it clear that it intended purchasing only in a narrow area along the railway line, and also to ensure that the Government could acquire land only by negotiating openly with the acknowledged leaders of an iwi or hapū.<sup>813</sup>

The former premier, Daniel Pollen, said he could see no reason for the Crown to have exclusive purchasing rights over such a large area of land. The Crown's record

810. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1N-gaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2.html>, accessed 26 February 2018; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 427.

811. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1N-gaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2.html>, accessed 26 February 2018; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 427. Translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

812. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 431–433; doc A67, pp 69, 72. Also see doc A41, p 160 n; doc A78, pp 1096–1097.

813. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 433.

of dealing with Māori land was as bad or worse than that of private individuals, and Parliament was now being asked to approve a wide purchasing power without having any opportunity to debate the Crown's intended purchasing policy.<sup>814</sup> He said that Māori wanted no more than 'to restore to the tribes and the hapus of tribes authority over the tribal estates', and Wahanui's clear wish was that 'no dealings whatever' should be permitted within the lands he was responsible for, at least until that authority was restored. Dr Pollen therefore recommended that the Bill be amended to limit the Crown's purchasing rights.<sup>815</sup>

Another legislative councillor, George McLean, said he felt no alarm about clause 7 because he did not believe that Parliament would ever again tolerate large-scale Crown purchasing of Māori lands. He accepted that the measure was temporary, and that the Government intended clause 7 only to allow it to acquire land for the railway, and to secure some additional land at discounted rates in acknowledgement of the 'enormous' benefit the railway would bring to Māori landowners.<sup>816</sup>

Notwithstanding the concerns expressed by the likes of Pollen and Mantell, the council voted to allow the Bill, subject to an amendment requiring that any Crown purchases must be made from the owners as identified by the district's native committee.<sup>817</sup> One newspaper claimed that this amendment was made at Wi Pere's prompting.<sup>818</sup> If adopted, this would have gone some way towards easing Māori concerns, as it would have allowed the committee to ensure that iwi and hapū could make collective decisions. According to the legislative councillor Wi Tako Ngātata, Wahanui supported the amendment.<sup>819</sup>

8.7.2.6 The railway and Ballance's land legislation proceed, 7–10 November 1884

As the Legislative Council was debating this Bill, the House of Representatives was debating another measure affecting Te Rohe Pōtae – the Railways Authorisation Bill. This measure formally authorised the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway along the central route from Te Awamutu to Marton. The Bill received its second and third readings on November 6, and came into effect the following day, allowing the Crown to begin active preparations for construction of the railway.<sup>820</sup> As noted earlier, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not yet consented to the railway, and had insisted they would not do so until satisfactory laws were enacted for the protection of their land and authority.

814. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 431–433.

815. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 431–433.

816. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 434–435.

817. Document A78, pp1096–1097; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', as amended by the Legislative Council, 5 November 1884; doc A78(a), vol 4, pp1727–1728. Also see 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 482'; 'Native Land Bill', Poverty Bay Herald, 15 November 1884, p 2; 'General Assembly: Legislative Council', Temuka Leader, 11 November 1884, p 2; doc A78, pp1091–1092.

818. 'Native Land Bill', Poverty Bay Herald, 15 November 1884, p 2; doc A78, pp1091–1092.

819. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 8 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 489.

820. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1885, D-1, p 4.

On November 7, the House debated its public works programme, allocated £780,000 to railway construction nationwide, and £90,000 for purchases of Māori land, and £90,000 to assist British migrants to New Zealand. As there was no debate on the land purchasing measure, it is impossible to determine whether it was specifically intended for the railway area. The immigration budget had been a matter for some debate. The Government had, by this time, assisted 110,833 Europeans to settle in the colony (including 9,619 in the previous 2½ years) and had borrowed to fund this programme. According to some members, a large proportion of the new migrants were agricultural labourers, who remained unemployed. This, then, might explain the demand for land in Te Rohe Pōtae and other parts of the North Island. The view of Vogel, the colonial treasurer, was that immigration and public works went hand in hand in advancing the colony's prosperity, and in future it would be preferable to have a much larger settler population.<sup>821</sup>

After addressing the public works programme, the House considered the Legislative Council's proposed amendment to Ballance's land legislation. A cross-House committee, comprising Stout, Ballance, Bryce, and one other member, recommended against the amendment. Stout, on the committee's behalf, told the House that any restriction on the Crown's power to purchase land would have to be sent to London for the Queen's consent, thereby leaving the land with no protection against private speculators.<sup>822</sup> Stout also reported that the amendment was 'not justified by experience', and that native committees 'have not yet attained the position' that would justify placing them between landowners and the Crown.<sup>823</sup> He did not address the fact that it was Parliament that had created native committees and determined that their powers would not extend to control over land title determination or land administration. Nor did he address the underlying reason for the Legislative Council's amendment – to prevent the Crown from buying land without the full consent of iwi and hapū.

In response, the former governor and premier Sir George Grey said that all of the committee's reasons were 'baseless'. The effect of the Legislative Council's amendment, he said, would be to require the Crown to buy land from tribal leaders, as it had before individual title was introduced and Crown pre-emption abandoned in the 1860s.<sup>824</sup> It was taking 'no power whatever' from the Crown to require it to buy land using the system it had previously used, Grey argued. Nor, he said, could Stout justify his claim that Māori leaders were incapable of dealing with their lands. They had proved entirely capable of negotiating land arrangements

---

821. 'Public Works Statement', NZPD, 1884, vol 50, p 86; 'Public Works', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 461, 463; 'New Zealand Loan Bill', NZPD, 1884, vol 50, pp 364–369.

822. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 478; doc A78, p1098.

823. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 478; doc A78, p1098.

824. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 478–479.

before individual title and free trade had been introduced.<sup>825</sup> It would be entirely possible to grant native committees full powers to control land administration within their districts, Grey continued, subject to some modest limits in the public interest – including a restriction on the amount of land a committee could sell to any individual European, and a restriction on offshore dealings to prevent sales to absentee speculators from London or elsewhere in Europe.<sup>826</sup>

Māori members of the House of Representatives spoke in favour of the Legislative Council's amendment. Te Puke Te Ao (Western Maori) said its effect was to ensure that land could not be sold except by the correct owners, and native committees were the most suitable body for determining who the owners were.<sup>827</sup> Wi Pere gave a long speech in an attempt to delay the Bill. He said the amendment was a simple one. Its effect was that the native committees would determine who owned the land, and then gather the owners in one place so they could hear the Government's proposal for purchase. He asked: 'Why should this simple proposition be opposed by the Europeans?'<sup>828</sup> He asked why the Government was unwilling to deliver what Māori sought and empower the native committees. 'Are they afraid to trust the Native people?' He added: 'If the Government wish to purchase portions of land along the line of [the] railway, then they should go to the Native Committee and make terms with them.'<sup>829</sup>

In response, Stout insisted that the Government's sole purpose was to prevent private speculation in the district. Without answering Grey's points, he insisted that, if the council's amendment was passed, the Bill would have to go to England for the Queen's assent, the Government would be unable to prevent private land speculation in the affected area, and 'the whole business of the North Island Main Trunk Railway would be stopped.'<sup>830</sup>

The House rejected the amendment, and the Legislative Council voted against pressing the issue further.<sup>831</sup> The Bill was passed into law, as the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act, on 10 November 1884.

8.7.2.7 The Crown grants Te Rohe Pōtae Māori requests for a liquor ban – September–November 1884

Whereas the Crown did not deliver what Wahanui sought in respect of land, it was willing to accept another of his demands. On 8 September, while Wahanui was in Wellington, the 'Blue Ribbon' petition was presented to the governor. It had about

825. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 478–479.

826. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 478–479.

827. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 479–480.

828. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 482.

829. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 480.

830. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 485–486; doc A78, p 1102.

831. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 485–489; doc A78, p 1102.

1,400 signatures and called for the governor to use his powers under section 25 of the Licensing Act 1881 to order that no publican licences could be issued ‘throughout our district extending to Waipa, Kawhia, Mokau and all its boundaries.’<sup>832</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders’ concerns about liquor arose from two sources. First, they were aware that Native Land Court hearings – which were becoming increasingly frequent in areas bordered their territories – were often associated with drunkenness. Secondly, the establishment of an armed constabulary camp at Kāwhia, with a liquor canteen, had created opportunities for alcohol to be onsold to Māori. Wilkinson had reported in mid-1884 that this had led to some instances of drunkenness, though for the most part the district’s leaders were eager to keep alcohol out of the district.<sup>833</sup>

During his negotiations with Ballance in September, Wahanui had discussed the petition and reiterated the desire of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for a prohibition on the sale of spirits in their district. He also briefly raised the matter in his speech to the House of Representatives in November:<sup>834</sup>

Tetahi o aku tino tonono ki tenei Paremete, ko te hoko waipiro me arai rawa atu, kua rawa e tuku mai taua mea whakarihariha ki tomatou takiwa. E tohe ana ahau kia kaha rawa koutou, nga Rangatira o tenei Whare kia tutakina rawatia taua mea hara kei kai haere mai ki to matou takiwa ngau kino ai oku iwi.

One of my most important requests to this Parliament is that the sale of spirits should be absolutely blocked; do not allow that disgusting thing into our district. I insist that you should be strong, [oh] leaders of this House, to completely block that criminal stuff for fear that it should come into our district, hurting our people.<sup>835</sup>

During the negotiations, Ballance had been positive about the request, and in his response to Wahanui in the House Ballance publicly announced that it would be granted. In response to the petition, Ballance said, instructions had been given to bring the prohibitive clauses of the Licensing Act into effect throughout the King Country. That was being done ‘with the almost unanimous assent’ of Māori in that district.<sup>836</sup>

The Government then issued a proclamation in December 1884 forbidding the sale of liquor within what was called the Kawhia Licensing Area. This broadly coincided with the Kawhia Native Committee’s area, but with some omissions. Kāwhia township was excluded, in spite of the fact that it was the source of most concern to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, apparently on the basis that it was occupied by Europeans and section 25 provided that proclamations could apply only to Māori land. The land between Kāwhia and Aotea Harbours was also excluded, apparently 832. Petition and covering letter forwarded to Premier, 8 September 1884 (doc A71, pp17–18).

833. ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts’, AJHR, 1884, G-1, p6; doc A78, p908.

834. Document A78, p1078.

835. Document A110, pp668–672. Translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

836. ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p312.

as a result of a lack of clarity in the survey map that was used as a basis for the proclamation. And some land in the Waipā district south of the Pūniu River was also excluded.<sup>837</sup>

Ballance initially proposed that the prohibition area be called ‘King Country Licensing Area’, but the Under-Secretary for Native Affairs, T W Lewis, advised against it, in order to avoid the appearance that the Government was giving any recognition to Tāwhiao. ‘Kawhia Licensing Area’ was adopted, even though the prohibition excluded Kāwhia township.<sup>838</sup>

The proclamation meant that Te Rohe Pōtae became New Zealand’s first ‘dry’ district – no alcohol could be bought or sold within its boundaries. The Otago Daily Times regarded it as ‘undoubtedly a matter of great importance’ in the colony’s history.<sup>839</sup> Although the areas left outside the licensing district were relatively small, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders saw them as significant, presumably because they represented encroachments on the five tribes’ boundary, and also because they limited the leaders’ ability to protect their people from alcohol-related harm. They raised these concerns with the Government in 1885, as we will see in sections 8.8.2.2 and 8.8.4.

8.7.3 Treaty analysis and findings

The formation of a new Government in August 1884 appeared to hold some promise for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Whereas Bryce had sought to restore Crown pre-emption and push forward with his land purchasing objectives, the new Government – and in particular its Native Minister, John Ballance – promised to work with Māori to develop laws that would satisfy their concerns. But the Government was also determined to push ahead with the railway as a matter of urgency and saw this as a precursor to opening the railway lands to settlement. It saw these measures as being of vital importance to the colony’s economic prosperity and was willing to invest substantial sums of borrowed money to bring them to fruition. As Richardson and Vogel made clear, it intended not only to satisfy the land hunger of Europeans already in New Zealand, but also to fund significant numbers of assisted migrants.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, on the other hand, continued to comply with the terms of their previous agreements with the Crown and to press for the Crown to deliver on the terms of the June 1883 petition in a manner that gave effect to their rights under the Treaty. While they continued to raise specific concerns about the Native Land Court, title determination, management and disposition of land, and control of liquor, these were all elements of their more general desire for the Crown to use its powers of kāwanatanga to recognise and protect their authority in accordance with the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. During this period, Wahanui

837. Document A71, pp 205–209; doc A78, pp 1106–1107; Native Office to Native Minister, 10 March 1885 (doc A71(a) (Robinson and Christoffel document bank), vol 1, pp 213–214); ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 3–4.

838. Document A71, pp 205–209; doc A78, pp 1106–1107.

839. ‘Editorial’, Otago Daily Times, 4 February 1885, p 2; doc A71, p 205.

adopted a new term – mana whakahaere – to describe the practical authority that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought.

8.7.3.1 The meaning of mana whakahaere

The Government's willingness to negotiate created new opportunities for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to set out the conditions on which they would recognise Crown authority, accept the railway, and ultimately consider opening their lands for settlement. Wahanui was able to meet with Ballance and other members of the House of Representatives, and to address both Houses of Parliament.

The position he presented was clear, and entirely consistent with that set out in the 1883 petition. In that petition, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had made it clear that no progress could be made towards the railway or settlement until satisfactory laws were in place. The laws they wanted would have to keep the court out of the district; provide for Māori to determine title among themselves; provide for hapū and iwi to manage land collectively; prohibit sales of land; and provide for leasing on an open market.

Wahanui's negotiations with Ballance during September 1884 modified the position of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori only very slightly. Wahanui placed increasing emphasis on the Crown passing laws that would protect Māori authority in its entirety. He sought 'te mana whakahaere i toku whenua' (translated at the time as 'full control and power over my own lands'). He also asked of Parliament: 'kia waiho te tikanga me te whakahaere mo a matou whenua kia matou anake.'<sup>840</sup> This was translated at the time as a request 'that the authority over our lands may be vested in our Committee.'<sup>841</sup> We understand it more broadly, as a demand for Parliament to provide for Māori to retain full control of their lands – both in terms of tikanga (law and underlying values) and in terms of whakahaere (political, judicial, and administrative control).

Whereas the 1883 petition had focused on general objectives, Wahanui was now also addressing the question of how those objectives could be brought to fruition in a practical sense. This inevitably required him and other Māori leaders to determine how they could work within a framework of the laws and institutions that Parliament had provided or might be willing to provide in future. During the post-election parliamentary session, therefore, the focus of Māori leaders turned towards increasing the powers of native committees to carry out the mana whakahaere functions they sought. Māori had not designed the native committee system, nor determined the powers that committees would have. But, since the formation of the Kawhia Native Committee, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought to work within this Crown-designed system, suggesting ways in which it might be adapted to deliver the mana whakahaere that they sought.

With his Native Land Laws Amendment Bill, Wi Pere sought to empower committees selected by owners within each district to determine iwi, hapū, and individual interests, and to oversee land administration and alienation. When

---

840. Document A110, pp 668–672.

841. Document A110, pp 668–672.

Wahanui appeared before the Legislative Council, he sought agreement for native committees to be empowered to carry out these functions. Wahanui did not see the committees as replacing the traditional authority of iwi and hapū, but as supplementing and reinforcing that authority by mediating between Māori communities and Europeans, in particular by having oversight of ‘all dealings and transactions’ while respecting the rights of iwi and hapū to make final decisions. In a sense, he presented the committees as having potential to become a partnership body.

More generally, Wahanui set out his understanding of the constitutional and Treaty relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. Using the watchmaker analogy, he explained how their respective spheres of authority would be brought into effect, and how they would operate in relation to each other. He acknowledged that the authority he sought to have recognised in statute would be ‘i raro i te mana o te Kawana’. This was translated at the time as ‘under the authority of the Governor’, but appears to reflect a view that the Treaty provided for mana Māori to be protected by the Crown.<sup>842</sup> It was also an acknowledgement that echoed the 1883 petition’s request for Parliament to make laws that would recognise and protect Māori authority. This was not a statement of submission; rather, it was a statement in recognition of the distinct spheres of authority that existed under the Treaty, those of kāwanatanga, encompassing a right to make and enforce laws for the colony, and of tino rangatiratanga, encompassing full authority exercised by Māori over their territories.

Within those territories, Wahanui sought no less than mana whakahaere (full control and power), encompassing both tikanga (law and values) and whakahaere (political and administrative control). Wahanui referred specifically to land title determination and land administration, which were his most immediate concerns at the time. But we do not think the term ‘mana whakahaere’ can be read down to mean only that. Land, in a Māori context, is a source of mana, and therefore of political authority generally. Wahanui also referred to the exercise of tikanga – the Māori system of law and the values that underpinned it. Furthermore, by referring to matters such as liquor control, Wahanui clearly intended mana whakahaere broadly to include rights of self-government and self-determination over the full range of community affairs, consistent with the responsibilities of rangatira to protect and provide for all matters concerning the well-being of their people. He also intended for those rights of self-determination to be protected by statute, within the territory defined by the boundary.

As Wahanui saw it, the governor’s role, and therefore that of the Crown, was to use its lawmaking powers to recognise and guarantee Māori authority in accordance with article 2 of the Treaty. The Crown was responsible for fixing its broken land laws on behalf of Māori landowners, just as a watchmaker’s job was to fix a broken watch on behalf of its owners. Once the watch was fixed, it would be ‘mine to do what I please with’. This was an eloquent analogy for the Treaty relationship, under which (as explained in chapter 3) the Crown acquired powers to make law and govern, but those powers were fettered by corresponding obligations to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of Māori communities, including their rights to hold land and other resources communally in accordance with their traditions, and their rights to retain, use, manage, develop, or dispose of that land as they wished.

---

842. Ngāti Maniapoto leaders used similar wording in the 1904 Kawenata, where they referred to the Treaty as providing for the Queen to protect the mana of Māori land and people. See section 3.4.3.

8.7.3.2 *The opportunity to provide for mana whakahaere

Wahanui sought nothing that the Treaty did not offer. Yet the Crown, despite its rhetoric about working with Māori, did not deliver. Ballance consulted Wahanui, and the House of Representatives and Legislative Council offered him an unprecedented platform from which to deliver his demands, but the Bill that Ballance subsequently introduced did not address the issues Wahanui had raised. It did not address the concerns of Te Rohe Pōtae and other Māori about the Native Land Court. It did not provide for Māori to determine land titles among themselves. It did not guarantee that owners could manage and use land communally; rather, it provided only for a possibility that owners could make collective decisions about sales and leases. It did not prohibit all sales of land; instead, it granted the Crown exclusive rights to purchase in a vast area of land surrounding the railway. And it did not guarantee that land transactions would occur in an open market; instead, the Crown was to be placed in a privileged position in which it could deal directly with owners.

We acknowledge that the Government had been in office for only a few months. But the Te Rohe Pōtae petition had been delivered in June 1883. Ballance and other Ministers had had well over a year to come to grips with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori demands, even before Wahanui came to Wellington. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had made it clear that, after recognising their boundary, the next step towards providing for their legitimate Treaty rights was to address their concerns about the Native Land Court and to empower them to determine land ownership among themselves. Although Wahanui knew of Ballance's reservations about giving the committees full responsibility to determine land titles, this continued to be what he demanded when he spoke in Parliament.

It was entirely within Government's capabilities to introduce legislation giving effect to these wishes. With respect to determination of land titles, the most obvious option by this time was to increase the powers of the Kawhia Native Committee to prepare it for the process of determining title to Te Rohe Pōtae lands. Provisions with similar effect had been proposed by Māori members of the House of Representatives in 1881 and 1882, and by McLean a decade earlier; as discussed earlier, the 1882 Bill had wide support among Parliamentarians and was only narrowly defeated in spite of Bryce's opposition (see section 7.4.4.6). As Ballance was drafting his Native Land Settlement Bill (later enacted as the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884), Rees and Wi Pere were bringing forward their proposals for titles to be awarded to hapū, and for the empowerment of native committees. The Government could have incorporated some or all of these provisions within its proposed legislation. Yet the Government included no such provisions.

If – as the Crown submitted to us – the Government did not follow this course because it was concerned about allowing the Kawhia Native Committee to determine title in a district that included several iwi with competing interests, it had other options open to it. One option, which was suggested by John Ormsby (section 8.8.2.2), was that it reconstitute the committee to more fairly represent all Te Rohe Pōtae iwi. It could also have considered other options, such as encouraging the iwi concerned to negotiate among themselves outside of any court or committee process. Māori did not lack mechanisms for managing conflicts over land and other matters. Pan-tribal hui had long been used to negotiating customary rights, as well as political alliances, including the Kingitanga. It was only after the court arrived at the district's borders that such arrangements began to fray. The rangatira behind the June 1883 petition had always acknowledged that a range of hapū and iwi held customary rights to land within the boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae. Their wish was for those interests to be settled under Māori and chiefly authority according to their tikanga, not that of the Government and the court. It was for this clear purpose that they had advanced the petition.

When debating the Native Lands Settlement Bill, a majority of the Legislative Council, and several members of the House of Representatives, clearly shared Wahanui's view that Māori could resolve such matters among themselves. The Legislative Council's proposed amendment (requiring the Crown to negotiate for land purchases only with owners as determined by the district native committee) could have had this effect, while also allowing the Kawhia Native Committee to ensure that the Crown brought land only from rangatira acting on behalf of their hapū. In rejecting the proposed amendment, the Government resorted to the constitutional argument that it could not restrict the Crown's land purchasing authority without first seeking the Queen's explicit consent. This argument did not convince Sir George Grey, who had filled the role of both governor and premier, and who saw the proposal as taking no power from the Crown. In fact, the question did not concern the Crown's powers to buy Māori land; it concerned the method by which the owners of that land would be determined.

On that point, Stout and other members of the cross-party committee objected to native committees being given that role, on the basis that the Crown was unwilling to place native committees between itself and potential land sellers. They do not appear to have considered the previous Government's assurances that native committees could inquire into titles. Wi Pere put it succinctly when he asked whether the Government was simply unwilling to trust Māori to manage their own affairs.

That is not to say that the proposals put forward by Rees and Pere, or by the Legislative Council, were perfect solutions to the problem of how Māori could take control of the land title determination process. All were based on the district native committee model, which had been developed by the Crown. What Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had initially sought was the right to determine such matters among themselves, with the Crown providing no more than legal assurance that decisions made by Māori, in accordance with their own tikanga, would be recognised in law. The Crown had opportunities to explore options to bring such a system into effect, and declined to do so, in spite of Wahanui's clear explanations of the mana whakahaere that he sought.

Once the Crown had developed the native committee system, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders showed that they were willing to work within this framework, provided that the committees were empowered to carry out the functions that they had sought in the petition. The Crown chose not to enact legislation to grant those powers, and turned down opportunities provided by Rees and Pere, and by the Legislative Council. In this, it breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.

The Government similarly declined opportunities to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae and other Māori to administer lands, in particular by declining opportunities to empower native committees to negotiate with Europeans on behalf of owners. It rejected the proposals put forward by Rees and Wi Pere, and instead proposed that land transactions be managed by a Crown appointee. In the event, these proposals were not brought into effect.

8.7.3.3 *The Government's railway and land policies

The March 1883 agreement had provided that an exploratory survey would be completed and the Government would then return to negotiations. After the December 1883 agreement, the Government still did not have permission to build the railway or do anything more than complete surveys. Yet the Government nonetheless pressed ahead with plans to construct the railway. Without seeking the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the railway, it determined the railway route, allocated railway funds, approved borrowing, began detailed surveys, and announced plans to call for tenders for construction of the railway.

It also enacted legislation that restricted the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by prohibiting all private (but not Crown) land transactions within a 4.7 million-acre area surrounding the railway route. It did so because its intention was that railway construction would be followed quickly by land settlement. There were different views within the Government as to how that could best be achieved. All were in agreement that land prices would rise, and that it was necessary – now that the preferred railway route had been announced – to prevent speculation by private investors. Ballance's view was that Māori landowners should be paid fair prices for their land and would then be willing to open the district for settlement. Other Ministers believed that the Crown should acquire large areas of land along the railway line, onselling them at a profit to fund the railway. These tensions were not resolved during 1884.

Wahanui strongly opposed the Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill, and in particular the Crown purchasing provision. Irrespective of whether the Crown intended to take advantage of the exclusive purchasing right it was granting itself over Te Rohe Pōtae lands, it had restricted Māori property rights in order to advance settlement of the district, and it had done so against the express wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders.

By pressing ahead with preparations for the railway, and for settlement of the district, without first obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and by enacting legislation that restricted the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori without their consent, the Crown failed to actively protect their rights in land, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.

These breaches did not directly affect the landholdings of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, as their lands had not yet passed through the Native Land Court and therefore could not be alienated. But they did limit the options of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in future dealings with the Crown. As we will see, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to hold out hope that the Crown would empower the Kawhia Native Committee in accordance with the demands set out in the June 1883 petition. But their stance in future negotiations was influenced by the knowledge that the Crown would not always honour agreements and was determined to give its railway and settlement objectives priority over their Treaty rights. Whereas Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had hitherto demanded their mana whakahaere as of right, in future negotiations they would be prepared to compromise.

8.8 THE RAILWAY AGREEMENT, FEBRUARY–APRIL 1885

As the parliamentary session ended in November 1884, the negotiations between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were far from resolved. The Crown continued to press ahead with its railway plans, but knew that further work would be needed to develop legislation that would achieve its settlement goals. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were very concerned about these actions. Not only was the Crown pressing ahead without their consent, it had failed to address their requests for mana whakahaere, failed to address their more specific concerns over statutory provisions for land title determination and land administration, and – once again – enacted legislation they opposed.

Soon after the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884 was passed, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders reminded Ballance that they had not yet consented to the railway and would not consent unless their conditions were met – that is, until the Crown used its lawmaking powers to provide statutory protection for their rights of self-determination. Ballance responded by agreeing to meet and negotiate. He met Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at Kihikihi in February 1885. During these negotiations both sides gave some ground. Ballance promised Te Rohe Pōtae a substantial measure of authority with respect to land, but he remained unwilling to give in to Māori demands that the Native Land Court play no role in their district. Rather, he repeated the proposal he had made to Wahanui in September – that the Kawhia Native Committee would act as a court of first instance, with the Native Land Court playing a role only when the committee could not reach agreement. Nor was he willing to leave the Kawhia Native Committee or Māori landowners full control over land transactions, insisting instead that all transactions be managed by a committee comprising Māori and Crown appointees (albeit, he suggested, with an elected Māori majority).

Altogether, during the Kihikihi hui Ballance made 20 promises or assurances about land title determination, land administration, and other matters such as the rating of Māori land, management of minerals and other resources, and control of liquor. Shortly afterwards, Ballance met Tāwhiao, and described his proposals as giving Māori 'large powers of self-government'.<sup>843</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae Māori did not get all that they had sought; what Ballance offered was not a fully realised Treaty relationship in which the Crown would use its powers of kāwanatanga to recognise their rights of tino rangatiratanga and (their term) mana whakahaere. Nonetheless, they formed the view that what Ballance offered was more than they had got from Bryce or any other Government before. They believed they had a choice: accept a compromise which was less than what they were entitled to, on the basis that it represented progress; or reject Ballance's proposals and risk the Government continuing to pursue its railway and settlement goals unilaterally, in a manner that would inevitably be less favourable to them. They chose the former option.

This section describes the negotiations in greater detail and sets out the basis on which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori subsequently gave their consent for the railway to proceed.

8.8.1 The Government's land settlement plans and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns

Once Parliament had risen for the year on 10 November, Wahanui left Wellington, visiting other communities, including Nelson and Auckland. Late in the month, he met Ballance in Whanganui and also attended a banquet where Ballance – speaking to a mainly European audience – elaborated on his plans to urgently complete the railway and open Te Rohe Pōtae for settlement.<sup>844</sup>

8.8.1.1 Ballance outlines the Government's new policies, November 1884

Ballance described the railway as 'a great work', which the Crown had a duty to complete 'without any delay'. The railway would 'lay open' the entire 4.5 million acres for European settlement, thereby 'dissipating the depression' and instead bringing 'grand prosperity' to the North Island.<sup>845</sup> Although he had not yet obtained consent for the railway, Ballance nonetheless announced that construction would begin in February 1885 with a ceremony to turn the first sod.<sup>846</sup> The Government was by this time undertaking practical steps to begin construction,

---

843. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 27.

844. 'The Native Land Policy of the Government', Evening Post, 28 November 1884, p 2; 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, pp 2921–2922. Also see doc A78, pp 1105–1106; doc A41, p 161.

845. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, pp 2921–2922; doc A41, p 161; doc A78, pp 1105–1106.

846. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, pp 2921–2922.

including sending a team of surveyors to fix the exact location of the line. The Department of Works planned to call for construction tenders in February.<sup>847</sup>

Having indicated in his speech to the House that the Crown had little desire to purchase land other than what was needed for the railway corridor, Ballance now said that it would 'of course' buy land for settlement, though it would only buy land in accordance with 'commercial principles' – that is, if the land was desirable enough that the Crown could onsell it at a profit.<sup>848</sup> However, he said his preference was to enable Māori to develop their own lands and offer them for settlement. In order to support this, he proposed a scheme that was similar in most respects to his original 1884 Native Land Settlement Bill.<sup>849</sup>

In particular, he proposed that the prohibition on private dealings already established for Te Rohe Pōtae should be expanded to cover the entire country. Whereas Bryce had previously proposed that Crown land boards be established to manage land transactions on behalf of Māori owners, and Ballance in 1884 had proposed that Crown-appointed commissioners fulfil that function, Ballance now proposed that land transactions should be managed by boards in which Māori would have 'a large share of representation'.<sup>850</sup> Under this system, Ballance said, Māori would retain 'a large degree of control' over their lands and would be able to offer those lands for sale or lease to the highest bidder. His hope was that Māori would see that the Crown meant to treat them fairly and would recognise that their interests were 'identical with the interests of colonization'.<sup>851</sup>

If they could see that the Government were not encouraging land sharks, and were not themselves anxious to be a land-shark Government but rather prepared to see the natives utilise their own lands, they would become hearty cooperators in the work of colonisation.<sup>852</sup>

Ballance's speech provides further evidence of the Government's ambivalent stance on Crown purchasing within the district. It was determined to press ahead with the railway, and with opening the land for settlement, but had not yet determined how that settlement might occur or who might manage it. Ballance's speech indicated that he remained open to the idea of Māori managing the settlement process themselves, but Crown purchasing would also be part of the equation. There is no evidence that he had made this clear to Wahanui during the September negotiations.

---

847. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1885, D-1, p 4.

848. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, p 2924.

849. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, p 2923.

850. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, p 2924.

851. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, p 2924.

852. 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884; doc A78(a), vol 6, p 2924; doc A41, p 161; doc A78, pp 1105–1106.

8.8.1.2 *Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns about the railway, December 1884–January 1885

Whereas settler newspapers claimed that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were ‘entirely in accord’ with Ballance’s land settlement and railway plans, this was not the case. Not only had the Crown enacted legislation that Wahanui had opposed, it also pressed ahead with preparations for railway construction without first obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders or resolving the issues they had raised, including those concerning land title determination, land administration, and self-government more generally. As Marr observed, the Government appeared to believe that the Railway Authorisation Act ‘was the only authority it required’, in spite of Wahanui’s clear explanations to members and Ministers about his arrangement with Bryce.<sup>853</sup> On December 3, five days after Ballance’s speech, Taonui wrote to the Minister asking why the railway was proceeding when the Crown had not yet received their consent:

Friend we are at a loss to know what wrong we and our people have done that you should have ignored us when you commenced Government works in our localities, that is, that you should have commenced the construction of the railway before coming to see us, the owners of the land, and discussing the matter fully with us in accordance with the promise made by Mr Bryce to Wahanui at Whatiwhatihoe, where he asked Wahanui to allow the preliminary survey of the line to be made. Mr Bryce assured Wahanui that it was only intended at that time to explore the line of railway and when the best route had been discovered, he would visit us again to confer with us regarding his wish to commence the construction of the railway. If Mr Bryce had at that time asked Wahanui to agree to his commencing the construction of the railway, Wahanui would not have taken upon himself the sole responsibility of acceding to his request but would have left it to the people to give their consent. Although Mr Bryce is not now in the position he then held, you have succeeded to his position to carry out his arrangements, and it would have been a graceful act on your part if you had carried out his promise as a token to us of the sincerity of your arrangements with Wahanui.<sup>854</sup>

The Crown’s agent in Te Rohe Pōtae, George Wilkinson, was sent to meet Taonui and smooth things over. After meeting Taonui, Wilkinson reported that the rangatira was amenable to the railway but had said he ‘should have been consulted’ before work went ahead. Wilkinson said this was also the view of the Kawhia Native Committee.<sup>855</sup> While Wilkinson presented Taonui’s position as one of needing to be consulted, his letter made it plain that what they expected was to be able to give their consent. This was in keeping with the agreement that was reached with Bryce in March 1883: other than the exploratory survey, no further work of any kind would be permitted without their consent (see section 8.5). The Crown nonetheless continued to make preparations for construction to begin. It placed a notice in the Kahiti in December, informing Māori that the central route had been selected. The same month, surveys went ahead to fix the exact route. Ballance gave instructions to build cottages for railway staff, and Wilkinson was instructed to ‘inform’ affected rangatira that this construction was occurring and tell them it was usual practice. Early in January, Wilkinson attempted to sound out Taonui and other rangatira to determine how many of their people would be available to work on the railway.<sup>856</sup>

853. Document A78, p1107.

854. Taonui to Ballance, 3 December 1884 (doc A20(a), pp 49–50).

855. Wilkinson to Under Secretary, Native Department, 19 December 1884 (doc A91, vol 1, pp84–90).

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders continued to express concern about the Government proceeding without consent, and about the pace of those preparations. Many wrote to the Government, and others approached Crown officials in the district, seeking information about the Government’s intentions. They sought clarification, for example, about how much land would be taken for the railway, and whether they would be paid for it, and for timber and gravel used in its construction. Some were told they would be paid for the land, but only after title was determined.<sup>857</sup>

Although the Government had intended to award construction contracts in February, officials in the district advised that Ballance should meet Te Rohe Pōtae leaders before that occurred.<sup>858</sup> According to Wilkinson, Māori in the district had said they ‘were being constantly asked to agree to some new action regarding the railway but that Govt seemed to ignore them by not consulting with them as to whether these matters should be carried out.’<sup>859</sup> Wahanui arrived back in Te Rohe Pōtae late in December, and in January began a series of hui around the district, where he consulted Te Rohe Pōtae communities about the railway proposal. On 10 January, he attended a meeting at Te Kōpua which resolved not to obstruct the railway – implying that obstruction had been under consideration – and on 15 January Crown surveyors reached agreement with Māori at Te Kawa about protection of eel weirs affected by the line.<sup>860</sup>

8.8.2 Ballance seeks agreement to the railway, February 1885

Also in January, Ballance began a tour of Māori communities throughout the central North Island. His general aim was to discuss his proposed legislation for Māori land. With respect to Te Rohe Pōtae, he had other objectives. First, he sought ‘to obtain the consent of the chiefs and native people to the construction of the North Island Trunk line’. Then, he sought their consent ‘to the subdivision of their lands,

---

856. Document A91, vol 1, pp 66–76.

857. Document A91, vol 1, pp 65–70, 82–83, 91–93; doc A78, pp 1107–1109, 1110–1112.

858. Document A91, vol 1, p 64.

859. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, 8 January 1885 (doc A91, vol 1, p 67).

860. Document A78, pp 1111–1112; doc A91, vol 1, pp 57–63.

the individualizing of all native titles, and 'their active cooperation when the work will begin.'<sup>861</sup>

Wahanui had made it clear that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not interested in subdividing lands unless they could manage the process for themselves, and also that they did not favour individualised titles. Ballance himself had acknowledged the harmful effects of individualising title, yet now seemed bent on pursuing it as part of his settlement agenda.

Ballance's tour began with hui in early January at Rānana and Pipiriki on the Whanganui River. He then continued to Te Rohe Pōtae, meeting Te Kooti and his followers at Kihikihi on 3 February; Wahanui and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at Kihikihi on 4 and 5 February; and Tāwhiao at Whatiwhatihoe on 6 February. He then continued to the Parawai (Hauraki), Rotorua, Tauranga, and Tūranga (Gisborne).<sup>862</sup> The Kihikihi hui is particularly important for our purposes, since it was there that representatives of the five tribes set out the conditions on which they would consent to the railway, and Ballance in turn made a series of pledges to them.

8.8.2.1 The Whanganui hui, January 1885

Before reaching Kihikihi, Ballance stopped at Rānana on the Whanganui River for a two-day hui (7 and 8 January), where he met southern Whanganui leaders such as Te Keepa. So far as we can determine, none of the parties to the 1883 agreements were present, nor any of the rangatira who contested those agreements in subsequent petitions. As with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, Whanganui leaders were concerned with their lands and with the roles of the new native committees. They asked that the boundary of Whanganui peoples be defined and that their native committee be empowered to conduct surveys, administer sales and leases, and make decisions about the railway.<sup>863</sup>

Ballance, in response, advocated for the Whanganui people to welcome settlers, who he assured them would bring prosperity, as would the railway by raising land prices. He said the native committee powers was 'a very large question' which the Government had yet to resolve. His view was that the committees 'may do a great deal of good in the ascertainment of title to land', but there might also be occasions on which committee members would have interests in the title determination. Therefore, in his view, there should be a right of appeal 'to a body above suspicion', the court. The court would also 'give legal sanction' to the committee's decisions, and Māori should therefore recognise 'that the Land Court still remains ultimately to resolve the question of title among you.'<sup>864</sup>

Once title was awarded, he said, owners would be able to elect committees which would make decisions about selling or leasing on their behalf. The

---

861. 'Mr Ballance and the Waikato Natives,' New Zealand Herald, 27 January 1885, p 5; doc A41, p165.

862. Document A78, pp1112–1113; doc A41, p165. Also see doc A68, p13.

863. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, p1.

864. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 2–3.

transactions would then be administered on the owners' behalf. Whereas the Native Land Settlement Bill 1885 had provided for this work to be carried out by a Crown-appointed commissioner assisted by two Māori assessors, Ballance now proposed that a board would carry out this function. The board would have the same structure – a Crown appointee and two Māori (either elected or nominated) – but the inference was that all would be equal members.<sup>865</sup>

8.8.2.2 The Kihikihi hui, February 1885

After the Rānana hui had been completed, Ballance proceeded to Jerusalem, where another meeting was held on 9 January. He then continued on to Kihikihi, where he met Te Kooti and his people on 3 February. This was followed by a meeting of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders on 5 February. Rangatira reported as attending and speaking at the hui include Wahanui, Taonui, Manga (Rewi Maniapoto), John Ormsby, Hopa Te Rangianini, Aporo Te Taratutu, and Pineha Tawhaki (aka Te Tawhaki Pineaha). All of these were of Ngāti Maniapoto. Also present, and speaking, were Hitiri Te Paerata (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa); Te Rangituatea (Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Maniapoto); Te Herekiekie (Ngāti Tūwharetoa); Te Hoti Tamehana (son of Wiremu Tamihana; Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Hourua), Te Hauraki, James Thompson (another Tamihana), and Kingi Hori (apparently of Ngāti Tūwharetoa<sup>866</sup>).<sup>867</sup> Te Herekiekie described himself at the hui as 'one who manages matters at the Whanganui end of the block.'<sup>868</sup>

The claimant John Kaati told us this was 'not an ordinary hui', with several hundred people attending from a range of iwi, making it a considerable logistical undertaking. This attendance reflected the 'possible wide-ranging effects' on the district's Māori. The agreement reached at Kihikihi was as significant to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as the Treaty was to Māori nationally: 'There has been no other hui in Te Rohe Pōtae of such high importance ever since, making this one the most significant hui ever held.'<sup>869</sup>

8.8.2.2.1 WHAT TE ROHE PŌTAE LEADERS SOUGHT

After formal welcomes had been completed, Wahanui presented his understanding of what had so far occurred. According to the Government's official record of the meeting, he said that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had agreed to a policy under which 'we were to hold on to the land . . . to preserve the land and the people, and to

865. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 3–4.

866. Document A53 (Stirling), vol 2, p 854.

867. The Government kept a full record of this and other hui that Ballance attended during his tour: 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 12–24. Also see 'The Native Minister in Waikato: Visit to Alexandra', Waikato Times, 5 February 1885, p 2; 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 5 February 1885, p 5; 'The Native Minister in Waikato', New Zealand Herald, 6 February 1885, p 5. In this inquiry, several witnesses described the hui, including Dr Loveridge (doc A41, pp 165–172), Ms Marr (pp 1122–1140), and Ms Boulton (doc A67, pp 83–86, 100–105). All relied on the official report and newspaper accounts.

868. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22.

869. Document H15, paras 125–130.

keep the tikanga'. But, through a combination of Government and Māori actions, that had broken up and divisions had emerged – in this, Wahanui may have been referring to the decision by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to continue negotiations with the Government in Tāwhiao's absence. Wahanui said that Bryce 'made a compact with me, which was signed, that a search for the railway was to be made, and, if a suitable line were found, he was to return and let me know'. This decision had been made by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders, because there had not been time to consult others. Consent for the exploratory survey was given on the understanding that the Crown would return to negotiations 'before doing anything else'.<sup>870</sup>

The Wanganui Herald had previously used the term 'compact' to describe the 16 March 1883 agreement. So far as we can determine, this was the first time Wahanui or another Te Rohe Pōtae leader was quoted as using the term. The available records do not say whether Wahanui spoke in English or Māori, and we cannot know whether the term 'compact' was his or a translator's; nonetheless, the word suggests that Wahanui felt that a solemn agreement had been reached. He was also quoted as describing the agreement as a 'contract'.<sup>871</sup> Having established the terms of the 'compact', Wahanui then explained:

I . . . said to Mr Bryce, 'What you wish for has been agreed to; now I want you to agree to my request.' Mr Bryce asked me, 'What do you want?' I then said, 'I am going to send a petition to the House, and I want you and your Cabinet to back it up.' I went on with the petition at once, but you know yourselves what it is.<sup>872</sup>

He said that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders 'were not consulted with regard to the erection of trig stations; the consequence of this was that the Maoris got unsettled seeing what was being done, as one brother could not advise the other or tell the other anything about it'. As discussed in section 8.5, there is evidence that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders gave conditional consent to the trig survey, but it is possible that the details were not fully explained to them. As a consequence of concerns about surveys, Wahanui said, he was sent to Wellington to meet Ballance. There, he spoke with Ballance about the external boundary and also set out his expectations:

- ▶ That the Crown leave Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to sanction the railway line (meaning it would not proceed without their consent)
- ▶ That Europeans gold prospectors should not enter the district without the authority of the district's leaders
- ▶ That additional powers be given to Māori committees 'to conduct matters for the people'
- ▶ That liquor licences not be granted in the district
- ▶ That the Native Land Court not consider any Te Rohe Pōtae lands unless the district's leaders sanctioned it, and that Europeans should 'refrain from

---

870. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 13–14.

871. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 13–14.

872. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 14.

interfering with the Maori lands, but leave the Natives to manage them themselves.<sup>873</sup>

In sum, as well as seeking confirmation of their external boundary, Wahanui had continued to seek broad powers for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to administer their own affairs, with the Kawhia Native Committee exercising control over land title determination, land administration, minerals and resources, and unspecified ‘matters for the people’. Here, in other words, Wahanui was fleshing out some of the practical details of what mana whakahaere would mean.

Of the matters raised by Wahanui, we note that only one had been substantially honoured: the Government had prohibited liquor sales in most of the district. Government surveyors had also substantially completed the external boundary survey, except where the petition area overlapped the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi blocks (as discussed in section 8.6.6.4), the surveyors had insisted on excluding that block because it had already been before the court). So far as we can determine, this was not discussed with Wahanui until later in 1885.<sup>874</sup>

Having set the scene by referring back to previous negotiations, Wahanui then left it to the Kawhia Native Committee chairman, John Ormsby, to elaborate on the specifics of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori now sought. Ormsby began by reminding Ballance that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had been ‘estranged’ from Europeans for many years. The 1883 petition was the only step that had ever been taken towards ending that estrangement, and the Crown had done nothing in response.<sup>875</sup>

Ormsby said that the principal concern of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori was for their land. They opposed the court, because they had ‘never seen any good’ come from it; all land that passed through the court ended up in European hands. Often, this occurred as a result of ‘fictitious’ claims, typically backed by Government agents or private speculators. The court, Ormsby said, was ‘a machine by which the lands are transferred by the Native owners to either the companies or the Government.’<sup>876</sup> The other means by which the Government acquired Māori land was through roads (and, by inference, other public works), which were inevitably followed by the imposition of rates on Māori land, forcing owners to sell.<sup>877</sup> Ormsby said that, when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sent in their petition, all they had wanted was laws that would benefit them and did not act as a means to separate Māori from their lands:

We wished that we should be allowed ourselves to manage matters concerning our own lands. The reason why we wish to manage our lands ourselves is because we,

---

873. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 13–14.

874. The survey work had begun in December 1883. By mid-1885, the District Surveyor Laurence Cussen reported that he hoped the surveys would be ‘finished during the present season’: ‘Report of the Surveys of New Zealand for the Year 1884–1885’, AJHR, 1885, C-1A, p 24; doc A78, pp 989–990, 1111–1112; doc A79, pp 59–60.

875. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

876. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

877. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

being the owners of land, know all about it, and are the proper persons to manage it.<sup>878</sup>

In response to the petition, Ormsby said, the Crown had established Māori committees but had not empowered them as Te Rohe Pōtae leaders wished. The committees were ‘only a shadow’ of what had been sought; they had no substance.<sup>879</sup> The Crown had also prohibited private companies from dealing in land, but had not imposed the same restriction on itself. Ormsby said it was time to ‘start a new policy’ with respect to Māori land. There were five key elements to what he sought:<sup>880</sup>

- ▶ The Native Land Court should play no role in the district, and the Kawhia Native Committee should instead be empowered to fulfil the court’s land title determination functions. The committee, Ormsby said, should have the power to compel owners to appear before it.
- ▶ Land titles should be awarded not to individuals but to hapū, ‘because from the time that our ancestors first settled on this land it was always divided amongst hapus; nothing was known about individualizing titles’.
- ▶ Each hapū should be able to appoint its own committee, which could make decisions about how land would be used, including whether it would be leased or sold.
- ▶ A board appointed by the Kawhia Native Committee should conduct all sale and lease transactions on owners’ behalf. As well as replacing the court, the Kawhia Native Committee should also replace the Native Trustee.
- ▶ Māori land should not be subject to rates.<sup>881</sup>

Here, for the first time, a Te Rohe Pōtae leader was speaking openly about the possibility of selling land. This was a significant concession: the 1883 petition had not contemplated any sales, and (as we will see in chapter 11) some Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would continue to argue against sales. But Ormsby imposed three caveats: first, that all decisions must be made by hapū acting collectively; secondly, that all transactions be managed by the Kawhia Native Committee; and thirdly, Ormsby said, the Government should play no role whatsoever in managing land transactions on behalf of Māori, nor in buying land for settlement. The Government’s sole role, Ormsby said, was to protect Māori in possession of their lands:

878. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

879. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

880. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

881. In the official record, Ormsby referred to committees and boards interchangeably, in a manner that made it unclear whether he expected the Kawhia Native Committee or owner committees or some other ‘board’ to fulfil these functions. However, newspaper coverage made it clear that Ormsby was referring to boards appointed by the Kawhia Native Committee. Wahanui later informed the Native Affairs select committee that the Kawhia Native Committee was to manage land transactions on owners’ behalf. See ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885–I, G-1, pp 15–16; ‘The Native Minister in Waikato’, New Zealand Herald, 5 February 1885, p 5; ‘The Native Minister in Waikato: Visit to Alexandra’, Waikato Times, 5 February 1885, p 2; ‘Evidence of Wahanui before the Native Affairs Committee on the Native Land Disposition Bill’, AJHR, 1885, I-2B, p 5.

There are no persons who have more right to dispose of Native land than the owners of that land; and I say that if the Government have the selling or the purchasing of Native lands it shuts the Natives out of the market; and we wish the Government at the present time . . . to look after our lands for us – that is, that no person should be allowed to come in and interfere with our management of them.<sup>882</sup>

These demands were consistent with the sentiment of the 1883 petition. The underlying principle was that Māori should retain and manage their land as they saw fit, and that the Crown's only role was to protect their right to do so. Having spent two years negotiating with the Government over these matters, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were now offering greater detail about the legal and institutional arrangements they saw as necessary to fulfil their goals.<sup>883</sup> If the Government met these demands, Ormsby said, there would be 'no further trouble' about settlement or public works.<sup>884</sup>

Having dispensed with land, Ormsby also raised three other matters – liquor, gold prospecting, and Māori participation in the colony's lawmaking. With respect to alcohol, Ormsby said that the Government had prohibited liquor licenses, but 'the portion we were most anxious about was left out.'<sup>885</sup> He was presumably referring to Kāwhia, where the European population was greatest and where alcohol had first entered the district in significant quantities. He therefore asked Ballance to correct the omissions in the Kawhia Licensing Area, and to ensure that the regulations were 'as stringent as it is possible to make them.'<sup>886</sup>

With respect to gold, Ormsby said that the district was 'overrun' with prospectors, who failed to seek permission from the true owners of the land. He asked that the Government temporarily prohibit prospecting for gold, iron or other minerals until arrangements could be made to ensure that such activities were carried out properly and under the owners' authority.<sup>887</sup>

The other matter that Ormsby raised was Māori participation in the colony's democracy. He pointed out that general electorates were established on the basis that there would be one member for every 5,000 people (including non-voters such as women and children). In contrast, the Māori population was 40,000 and yet there were only four Māori electorates. The number of Māori electorates should double.<sup>888</sup> Ormsby also referred to the colony's lawmaking processes:

Previously, it has been the custom for the Acts to be made by the Europeans only, and the Maoris have no voice in the matter; although the Maori members may be in

---

882. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

883. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

884. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

885. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 15; doc A71, p 205.

886. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

887. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

888. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

the House at the time that the Acts are passed they have no knowledge of them—they have no voice, no power.<sup>889</sup>

When a new law was proposed, he said, Māori should be consulted. Copies of Bills should be circulated among Māori, and Māori should also be able to propose their own legislation and have Parliament ratify it. In his view, this could ‘easily’ be done and European members could be persuaded not to oppose Māori initiatives.<sup>890</sup> In this, it seems likely that Ormsby’s views reflected Wahanui’s experience in Wellington, where he had clearly explained the laws he required in return for consent to the railway, and Ballance had then brought forward legislation of a different nature.

Taonui and other rangatira spoke in support of Ormsby’s words. Taonui said that Ormsby had set out ‘all that we have been discussing’.

We wish that all these matters that have caused pain to our hearts and trouble to our land may be done away with; and this is the day on which they can be done away with. Then we shall truly be one, and say to each other, ‘Ehoa, tena koe; Ehoa, tenakoe.’ We shall then nod our heads one to another and gaze in each other’s countenances.<sup>891</sup>

After continuing in the same vein, Taonui then added: ‘If you carry out these matters I shall nod my head to you; if you will not carry them out I will not nod my head to you.’<sup>892</sup>

8.8.2.2.2 BALLANCE’S RESPONSE

Ballance had begun the hui by stating that he would ‘keep nothing back’ and would state the Government’s intended policy ‘without any reservation whatever.’<sup>893</sup> This contrasted with his stance at Rānana, where he had emphasised that the Government had still to determine its policies, especially with regard to land title determination.

In respect of the ‘compact’ between Wahanui and Bryce that no further work would be completed after the exploratory survey, Ballance said the Native Department had no record of this agreement. However, having heard of the agreement from Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira, he had resolved to visit them, ‘for I felt that it was my duty to make good all promises.’<sup>894</sup> Ballance also defended the Government’s record on consulting Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, telling those present that he had sought Wahanui’s view on the Native Land Settlement Bill and that when Wahanui had objected to some parts of the Bill the Government had withdrawn them. As we discussed in section 8.7.3, this was true in respect the land

889. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

890. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

891. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 16.

892. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 16.

893. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

894. ‘Notes of Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

administration clauses, but not in respect of the Crown retaining rights to purchase land in the district.<sup>895</sup>

In response to Ormsby, Ballance made a series of promises about land title determination and administration, which went part way towards delivering what Ormsby had sought.<sup>896</sup> Regarding determination of land titles, Ballance acknowledged Ormsby's criticisms of the Native Land Court, but rejected the call for it to be kept out of the district altogether. While the Court had faults, it was 'supposed to be an independent tribunal, that will decide fairly between the conflicting parties', whereas native committees might show bias towards the tribe that formed the majority of the committee. In other words, Ballance said, 'no institution is altogether perfect. All require to be hedged in with sufficient safeguards'.<sup>897</sup>

We observe that, at the time, the Native Land Court itself did not have extensive 'safeguards': there was no mechanism by which Māori could seek an appeal against the court's decisions (rehearings could be granted by the Native Affairs Committee, but the cases were returned to the court). Māori themselves were concerned about decisions based on false evidence or in the absence of the true owners. Some of these concerns had been raised by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and Rewi in particular, in earlier negotiations (see chapter 7). The only real safeguard in place was that Native Land Court judges were assisted by Māori assessors, who might have better understanding of the relevant history and tikanga than European judges did.

Although Ballance was not willing to do away with the court, he proposed to grant native district committees 'larger powers', under which 'all cases will come before the Native Committee in the first instance, and then go on to the Native Land Court, which will finally deal with the matter'. On its own, this statement could be read as an endorsement of the existing Native Committees Act, which provided for committees to inquire into questions of land title but left the court to make all decisions. Previously, however, Ballance had responded to Wahanui's speech in the House of Representatives by saying that the committees could act 'as a Court of first instance', with the court hearing appeals.<sup>898</sup> By using the same language ('first instance') he appeared now to be endorsing that proposal. At Rānana, he had made clear that the court would have to ratify all decisions made by committees, but he offered no such caveat here, leaving the impression that committees would have powers to inquire into titles as Bryce had previously promised.

Ballance said he was also considering an amendment to the law to prevent Māori who had little or no interest in a land block from making claims to the court.<sup>899</sup> He also proposed to empower native committees to adjudicate in minor civil disputes between Māori in their districts. Committees were already empowered to adjudi-

---

895. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

896. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 16–18; doc A78, pp 1128–1129.

897. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

898. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 315–316.

899. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

cate on disputes of up to £20 in value, but only if both disputing parties agreed. Ballance said that his proposal was to give the committees 'the same power as a court'. Ballance said he intended to introduce legislation during 1885 to give effect to this change.<sup>900</sup> He also proposed to give the committees some revenue, possibly by empowering them to collect dog tax from Māori in their districts, and said he believed the chairman should be paid 'a small sum.'<sup>901</sup> Although Ormsby had not specifically requested the changes to committees' dispute resolution and revenue gathering powers, they appear to be consistent with Wahanui's general requirement that committees be empowered 'to conduct matters for the people'.

Regarding Ormsby's proposals for hapū title and for land administration, Ballance said his view was that all owners should be named on the title. Once title was awarded, owners could elect committees which would administer lands on their behalf and make decisions about sale or lease. Ballance said he favoured this approach because of 'abuses' that had arisen when the law had provided for 10 individuals to be named on each title.<sup>902</sup> While Ballance was not agreeing to vest title in hapū, this suggested that he was agreeing that decisions should be made collectively by owners.

If the committee wanted to sell or lease land, Ballance said, it could approach a board that would manage the process on their behalf. At Rānana, Ballance had said the board would comprise a Crown appointee and two Māori, who would be either elected or nominated. He now said that one of the Māori members would be the chairman of the Māori committee, and one other 'should be perhaps' elected by Māori, though the Government had not yet decided on the method of appointment.<sup>903</sup> This strongly implied that the board would have a Māori majority without giving a definite assurance. Ballance's thinking about the makeup of these boards was clearly evolving as he travelled.

Together, these measures might have given Māori control over the boards. Ballance said the boards would not be able to do anything except with the approval of the committee of owners, and by this means the 'fullest power' would remain with the owners.<sup>904</sup> Ormsby had asked that the Kawhia Native Committee manage land transactions, and Ballance gave no reason why it should not. Nor did he give any reason why a Crown appointee was required to manage land transactions on behalf of hapū and iwi.

Regarding rating of Māori land, Ballance said he agreed with Ormsby. His view was that it was unfair to impose rates on land that was not being used (by which he meant farmed). No Māori land within the area affected by the railway would have rates imposed unless it had been sold, leased, or cultivated, in which case rates would be necessary to pay for the roads that served the land.<sup>905</sup>

---

900. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

901. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

902. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

903. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

904. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 18.

905. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

Ballance also discussed the Government's land purchasing and settlement objectives. He said the Crown had halted private purchases of Māori land in order to protect the owners. The Government itself was 'not anxious' to buy Māori land, and he did not see it as necessary. The Government's 'principal object' was 'to get the land and country settled'. If Māori would use the proposed land administration system to make land available for settlement, the Government 'will assist them and not otherwise interfere'.<sup>906</sup> Ballance also indicated that, under this system, Māori would enjoy the benefits of rising land prices. At that time, Ballance said, there were 'large blocks of land in this country which have really no value at all, because there are no roads or railways through them'. If those blocks were sold, 'they would not receive more than three or four shillings an acre, whereas if railways or roads were made through it it would sell for as many pounds an acre'.<sup>907</sup>

In effect, Ballance was telling Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that they would be left to manage the district's settlement themselves, and that the Government would only step in and buy land if voluntary settlement did not occur. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had already indicated their willingness to make land available for settlement if the right laws were put in place and would have seen this as a significant concession.

Having dealt with land issues, Ballance turned to the other matters Ormsby had raised. With respect to the licensing boundary, Ballance said there had been 'some misunderstanding or mistake'; the Government's intention had been to deliver exactly what had been sought in the petition. He undertook to investigate and take immediate steps to address any gaps in the licensing area.<sup>908</sup>

With respect to prospecting, Ballance said that Wahanui had raised this issue during their September talks, and the Government had responded by prohibiting prospecting on Māori land except with the consent of the owners and the Native Minister. Ballance had not approved any prospecting since that time and would not approve prospecting on any land until title had been awarded. He was, however, prepared to delegate his decision-making power to the chairman of the Kawhia Native Committee.<sup>909</sup>

With respect to lawmaking, Ballance agreed that Māori should be consulted on all legislation affecting them. He said that once he returned to Wellington he would circulate a Bill proposing new land laws.<sup>910</sup> He also agreed that Māori should have more members in the House of Representatives and promised to advocate for an increase. He gave no promises about the exact number, on the grounds that there were differing views among members of the House of Representatives about the exact size of the Māori population.<sup>911</sup>

---

906. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 18.

907. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

908. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 18.

909. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 19.

910. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17.

911. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 18.

8.8.2.2.3 FURTHER DISCUSSIONS

Ormsby, in turn, continued to press for land title determination to be conducted solely by the Kawhia Native Committee. The committee, he said, 'would be the proper body to deal with the land', though he admitted that it was 'not properly constituted just now'.<sup>912</sup> If the committee was given extra powers, he said, it should also be broken up and fresh elections held, with each hapū and iwi striving to elect its own representative. He expressed confidence that, with new elections, all iwi and hapū would be properly represented. In this, he appears to have been acknowledging concerns about the initial election and the lack of representation for some iwi, in particular those from Waikato (section 8.6.4.1), while also assuring Ballance that a properly constituted committee would be above suspicion and could therefore be trusted to carry out land title determination in a fair manner.<sup>913</sup>

Ormsby acknowledged that some hapū had applied to the court for title to be determined, but he said this had occurred before the Kawhia Native Committee had been established, when rangatira 'had no other course open to them'. Now that the committee existed, 'those applications should be recalled, and the matters left to the Native Committees to deal with'.<sup>914</sup> Land titles, he said, were 'a matter that requires a great deal of attention from all of us'. The court had been in operation for 20 years with no other system available to Māori. The reason he favoured committees over the court was that, before the court existed, 'land was sold, and there was an end of it; there was no trouble afterwards in connection with it'.<sup>915</sup>

In other respects, Ormsby indicated acceptance of much of what Ballance proposed. He welcomed Ballance's promise of additional powers for native committees, but said those powers should not be limited to small civil disputes – the committees should also have power to adjudicate on larger disputes.<sup>916</sup> He supported the principle of committees of owners deciding how to manage land and also appeared willing to consider Ballance's idea for a board (comprising a commissioner, the native committee chair and one other, who Ballance had suggested would be an elected Māori) to manage land transactions, so long as they could sell or lease to the highest bidder and not leave Māori 'shut out of the market'.<sup>917</sup>

He accepted Ballance's assurances with respect to rating, so long as they were put in writing so they would not be forgotten, as the 'compact' had been. By 'compact', he was presumably referring to the March 1883 agreement under which (as Wahanui had explained earlier in the hui) an exploratory survey would be conducted and no further decisions made without the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.<sup>918</sup> Ormsby also accepted Ballance's offer to delegate decision-making

---

912. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

913. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

914. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

915. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

916. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

917. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19, 20.

918. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

powers with respect to prospecting. And he also took Ballance's word that gaps in the licensing area had not been deliberate and would be addressed.<sup>919</sup>

Ballance, in response, acknowledged Ormsby's concerns about the court, but said the 1883 legislative changes had banned lawyers and 'removed many of the evils' from the court. Furthermore:

I trust that the powers that we are going to give to the [native] Committees will tend to remove most of the evils remaining. It is the desire of the Government to remove from the operation of the Court all objections which might be taken by the people themselves who own the land.<sup>920</sup>

Once land had been through the court, Ballance said, it should remain in owners' hands, subject only to survey and court fees.<sup>921</sup> This comment indicated that there would be an ongoing role for the court. However, the reference to empowerment of native committees clearly suggested that they would play a greater role in land title determination. In the context of Ballance's earlier comments (both in Parliament and here) and Ormsby's insistence that the court should not make land title decisions, it seems likely that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders believed Ballance intended to empower the committees as courts 'of first instance'.

In response to questions about the role of the proposed boards in managing land transactions, Ballance said that any land sold or leased would be 'submitted for public competition, so that the highest price will be obtained for the land'.<sup>922</sup> He promised that whatever was agreed about rating and other matters would be recorded in writing and confirmed through an exchange of letters.

8.8.2.2.4 CONDITIONAL AGREEMENT TO THE RAILWAY

With the parties having reached an understanding on most matters, the hui adjourned for the night. In the morning, the assembled rangatira turned their attention to the railway. Wahanui, Taonui, Te Rangituatea, and others asked for more time to consult with their people, and with Whanganui and Ngāti Tūwharetoa leaders, before giving their final decision on the railway.<sup>923</sup> Wahanui, in particular, emphasised that the people would have to decide and that Whanganui and Ngāti Tūwharetoa must be involved, since they had interests in the forested Tūhua lands through which the railway would pass.<sup>924</sup> He told Ballance this did not mean he was 'keeping back the railway-line', but simply that he was anxious to see the people who had not been able to attend the hui. After he had seen those people, 'the final settlement will take place': 'I want to discuss with them the matters that were gone into yesterday. Yesterday you did not refuse to us the things

---

919. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 18–19.

920. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 19.

921. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 19.

922. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 20–21.

923. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 21–24.

924. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 21.

that have been refused by two or three previous Governments.<sup>925</sup> The sole outstanding matter, Wahanui said, was that a road was being built from Kāwhia via Te Kōpua to the Waipā Valley, and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also wanted a road from Te Kōpua to Kihikihi.<sup>926</sup>

Ormsby also spoke again, telling Ballance that the meeting had been ‘highly pleased’ with Ballance’s responses: ‘The sting of the scorpion has been broken off: the road we look upon as the scorpion, and the rates as the sting from it. Yesterday that sting was destroyed; now we have changed that insect, the scorpion, into one that we can utilize.’<sup>927</sup> Like Wahanui, Ormsby emphasised the need to consult, as some hapū in the vicinity of the railway might not agree with what the hui decided.<sup>928</sup>

Ormsby then asked Ballance how much land he would need for the railway. Ballance said he required a corridor of one chain wide for the railway, with a wider area – up to two chains – along hillsides where cuttings were needed. Stations would require an area of five acres, or 10 acres for stations at larger settlements.<sup>929</sup> He proposed to deal with the land in the same manner as if it was being taken from Europeans for public works. Once the owners were known, the Crown would pay the compensation at the same rates as if they were Europeans. He also gave assurances that timber would be paid for, that the railway would not interfere with waterways, and that ‘[n]o injury whatever will be done to Native land.’<sup>930</sup> With respect to railway construction, he said:

The Government proposes to let the contracts in such a way that the Natives may be able to take them. That is to say, that a portion of the line will be let in small contracts, so that the Natives themselves may contract and make the line. Therefore a large amount of the money for the construction of this line will go amongst the Native people directly.<sup>931</sup>

Ballance acknowledged rangatira who had asked about protection of eel weirs and about maintaining forests for food, and responded ‘that the money that will come to the people through the construction of this railway will be worth all the berries in the world, and the eels, too.’<sup>932</sup> Responding to the request for a road between Te Kōpua and Kihikihi, Ballance said that if the road could be made easily, it would be made.<sup>933</sup> When Te Rangituatea said he did not wish to part with his land, Ballance said he would not have to. All the Government sought was land

---

925. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 21.

926. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22.

927. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22.

928. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22.

929. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–23.

930. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–24.

931. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–24.

932. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–24.

933. ‘Notes of Native Meetings,’ AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

for the railway. It would otherwise be left to Te Rangituatea and other owners to decide what they did with their land, but the Government did not wish them to let the land go.<sup>934</sup> Having exhausted all topics of discussion, Ballance then gave two further assurances in conclusion:

I have explained the matter as fully as I can, and I have only to say, in conclusion, that not a single Native right will be prejudiced. As I said yesterday, greater powers will be placed in the hands of the Natives to deal with their own land, when their land will be enormously increased in value through the construction of this railway and roads. I therefore call upon you all to assist the Government in carrying on these works.<sup>935</sup>

Rewi Maniapoto then spoke. Referring to the tensions that had emerged among Te Rohe Pōtae tribes, he said he had believed the matter settled during Bryce's time 'from all parts of the boundary', but he now found 'objections coming from some parts'. This was why further discussion was needed. His personal view was that the Government should get on with construction and complete the railway within five years 'that I might ride on it before I die'.<sup>936</sup>

Ballance offered to give Te Rohe Pōtae Māori until the end of February to complete their discussions. Wahanui then concluded the hui by telling Ballance he would have an answer within three weeks; and if he had no answer by then, the agreements reached during the hui would stand. He took this approach, he said, 'in order that everybody may understand'.<sup>937</sup>

We will settle it now, lest what has been offered to us now should be taken away; for Governments have offered us things, and we have not accepted them; and it may be, if we do not accept these offers now, at the end of three weeks that the offer will be withdrawn. We must settle it within three weeks whether the thing is to go on. I am talking in this way in order that you [Ballance] may hear, and that my people may hear.<sup>938</sup>

The hui therefore concluded with general agreement among those present that the railway should proceed, based on Ballance's many assurances. In several respects, what Ballance offered fell short of what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought. In particular, with respect to land title determination and administration, he offered considerably less than the mana whakahaere (full control and power) that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders wanted. But he nonetheless offered more than any previous Minister. As Wahanui made clear, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders felt they had to

---

934. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22-24.

935. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22-24.

936. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

937. Document A78, p 1141.

938. 'Notes of Native Meetings,' AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

compromise at this point, and accept what was offered, lest it be withdrawn and something worse put in its place.

8.8.2.3 The hui at Whatiwhatihoe, February 1885

Immediately after the hui, Ballance travelled to Whatiwhatihoe where he met with Tāwhiao and the Kingitanga contingent. The railway, land, and lawmaking processes were all discussed, though Tāwhiao's main concern was his 1884 petition requesting Māori self-government, on which he was still awaiting a response.<sup>939</sup>

Speaking for the King party, Te Wheoro described what he considered to be the rights accorded to Māori under the Treaty. He said the Treaty did not reserve power for Europeans, but gave it to Māori as well: 'it states in the Treaty of Waitangi, Maori chiefs should be treated in the same way as the people of England, and given the same power. It was understood that the Maoris would be allowed to govern themselves in the same way that the Europeans are allowed to govern themselves.'<sup>940</sup> Te Wheoro's words highlight the fundamental difference that had emerged between Tāwhiao and the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira who were negotiating over the railway. Both, by this time, accepted the Queen's overarching authority. But Tāwhiao and his advisors wanted a Parliament of its own under the Queen, whereas Wahanui sought to persuade the settler-dominated Parliament to deliver mana whakahaere for his people.

In response to Te Wheoro's comments, Ballance accepted that the Treaty was 'binding on both races.' He said, however, that there was only one 'supreme' authority in the colony, and there could therefore be only one Parliament and one Government:

The Treaty does not give the right to set up two governments in New Zealand. The chiefs there bound themselves to accept the laws of the Queen, in exchange for which she guaranteed to them their lives, their liberty, and their property.

Subject to that proviso:

We are prepared, under that Treaty, as I have said – under the laws which the Queen has given to the colony, and under the Constitution of the colony – to give the Natives large powers of self-government. That is the meaning of the Treaty.<sup>941</sup>

However, Ballance said that Europeans and a large proportion of Māori valued the institutions of the colonial government, and 'no foreign interference will ever be tolerated'. By 'foreign interference', he appears to have been referring to Māori institutions that rivalled Parliament or the Government. Ballance repeated the promise of 'self-government' on three other occasions during the hui. He also said

939. A transcript of the meeting is recorded in 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 25–29; see also doc A78, pp 1142–1145.

940. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 27.

941. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 27.

the Government was 'now extending self-government to the Native race under the Parliament and Government and institutions of the colony', that it was 'prepared to extend to the Native people large powers of self-government by means of their Native Committees', and that the Government would grant Māori 'great powers of self-government' through the committees, 'and not . . . take from you any of the powers that you now possess.'<sup>942</sup>

Whereas, at Kihikihi, Ballance had specified the powers that committees would have (including power to act as courts of first instance for land title determination, as tribunals for minor disputes, as regulators of gold prospecting, and to conduct some other administrative functions) he was now extending his promise to include a general right of self-government subject to the existing colonial institutions. Ballance, furthermore, promised to reform the committees' electoral system to 'make them really represent the people' and ensure that all Māori had a voice in their election.<sup>943</sup> Tāwhiao's simple response was to say that Māori wanted self-government 'independent of the [colonial] Government.'<sup>944</sup>

Having discussed the powers of committees, Ballance also referred to his proposal to establish a system whereby committees of owners would make all decisions about land use:

When the owners of a block of land are found out they will have the power of appointing a Committee among themselves to manage that land, and that land cannot be sold or leased without the consent of the Committee and the people. No private European will then be allowed to come in by a back-gate and get the land away from the people. What shall be done shall be done with the consent of the people themselves.<sup>945</sup>

He said the only land that would be taken for the railway 'will be the land on which the railway will stand, and that will be paid for unless, when the owners are determined, they . . . give it'. Otherwise, the Government's intention was 'to leave the management of Native lands as much as possible in the hands of the Natives themselves', because '[t]he owners of the lands are the best judges to decide what shall be done with them'. No other land would be sold or leased without the consent of the owner committees.<sup>946</sup> As he had at Kihikihi, Ballance was implying that the Crown had no intention of purchasing land for settlement, though he stopped short of giving an absolute assurance. Ballance added that the railway would bring great benefit to the district's Māori, giving employment to their young people, and 'increas[ing] fourfold or tenfold the value of their land.'<sup>947</sup>

As he had at Kihikihi, Ballance promised to consult Māori leaders about any proposed legislation and ensure that their views were taken into account. He

---

942. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 27–28.

943. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 27–28.

944. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 27.

945. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 26.

946. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 26.

947. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 26, 28.

therefore invited Tāwhiao and Te Wheoro to visit Wellington so they could give their views on his proposed Māori land legislation. He said Māori had the power, through the Parliament, of making laws that were 'equal to the whole wants of the Native people' – though he did not explain how this could be so when Māori had four representatives and settlers had 91.<sup>948</sup> He did, however, repeat his Kihikihi promise to push for greater Māori representation in Parliament. On this, one of the rangatira present, Pāora Tūhaere, argued that the number of Māori and European members of the House of Representatives should be equal.<sup>949</sup>

Tāwhiao said he agreed to the railway, on condition that he was consulted about all railway lines and roads, and that the railway 'is left to me' to manage. 'I own this district. I am the head man . . . the representative of the land.' The railway 'can only go through on my agreement'.<sup>950</sup> He asked when the Government would respond to his petition, as Lord Derby could give no reply until he received the New Zealand Government's response. Ballance said the Government's law officers were preparing a reply, and it would be sent without delay.<sup>951</sup> Ballance also emphasised the constitutional position as he saw it:

Lord Derby would not speak one word against the Government of the colony. He recognizes as fully as any man in New Zealand that the Parliament and Government of this colony are supreme within the colony . . . Lord Derby knows that the Queen, through Her Government and the Parliament, acts in this colony just the same as she does at Home. The Queen is here as well as in England—that is, her power is here. It is exercised in her name and by her authority.<sup>952</sup>

8.8.2.4 Ballance's meetings in other districts, February–March 1885

Ballance's tour was intended partly to progress the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae, and partly for purposes of consulting Māori about land laws. As we have described, Ballance arrived with preconceived ideas about the system he wanted – one in which the court would retain the final say over land title determination and boards with Crown appointees would administer lands on behalf of Māori land-owners. In Thames, he said that the boards would comprise a Crown appointee, the chair of the district native committee, and one Māori to be nominated by the governor. This differed from what he had said at Kihikihi in two ways: first, Māori would definitely have a majority; and, secondly, the second Māori member would be appointed by the Crown, not elected by the people. He also said that owners would be able, by majority, to overrule decisions made by owner committees.<sup>953</sup> According to Marr, at this and other meetings, Ballance presented his proposals as offering Māori 'significantly better opportunities to control and manage their land' and as evidence that the Government could be trusted 'to protect Maori and assist

948. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 26–27, 28.

949. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 27–28.

950. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 26–27.

951. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 28 (doc A78, pp 1146–1147).

952. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 26.

953. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 30–31.

them to more fairly participate in new opportunities and benefits expected from settlement.<sup>954</sup>

8.8.3 The tribes give their final agreement to the railway, February–March 1885

During the remaining weeks of February, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and communities continued to meet and discuss whether they would confirm their agreement to allow the construction of the railway to proceed. Ngāti Maniapoto held a small hui on 10 February, and Ngāti Raukawa held one five days later. Following those hui, a major gathering took place at Kihikihi on 27 February. Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Hikairo were all represented. One contemporary source said that Ngāti Tūwharetoa was present but Whanganui iwi were not; other sources said the reverse was true. As Marr noted, some Tūhua rangatira could affiliate to both, which may have been a source of the confusion.<sup>955</sup>

Although there are no detailed accounts of the hui, Marr said that ‘there was considerable discussion at the hui over whether land for the railway should be given free, or would need to be paid for, and if it had to be paid for, how this might be implemented.’ John Ormsby argued that the land should be given as payment for the £1,600 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would owe for the survey of their external boundary once that work was completed. Others, according to Marr, suggested that Māori should give the land in return for passes allowing them to ride the railway for free.<sup>956</sup>

Immediately after the hui had concluded, John Ormsby telegraphed Ballance confirming agreement to construct the railway, subject to three conditions: first, the railway line was to be one chain wide; secondly, the land in question should be paid for; and, thirdly, the railway should be fenced in on both sides (this condition was apparently aimed at protecting livestock owned by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori).<sup>957</sup> A week later, on 4 March, Wahanui wrote to Ballance, confirming that those at the hui had consented to the railway and would allow one chain width of land to be taken. Questions concerning ‘the land required for the railway, the land on either side of the railway, and that required for the stations’ should be deferred for further consideration when Ballance next visited.<sup>958</sup>

Whereas Ormsby had said that the railway corridor would be paid for, Wahanui made no mention of payment. This suggests that the question of payment remained unresolved. Later, at the sod-turning ceremony in April, Wahanui

---

954. Document A78, p 1148.

955. Ormsby said that the agreement that arose from this meeting was made on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa; Te Rangituata said that Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, and Whanganui, with Ngāti Tūwharetoa absent; Te Pikikōtuku of Whanganui said the hui was attended by some Tūhua rangatira who were affiliated to Whanganui; Wahanui said it represented ‘the four tribes’, presumably meaning Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui, who were the original four tribes from the 1883 petition: doc A91, vol 1, pp 18–24, 41–54; doc A78, pp 1151–1154; doc A20, p 73.

956. Document A78, pp 1154–1155.

957. Document A78, pp 1155–1156; doc A20, p 73.

958. Document A78, pp 1158–1159.

told the premier, Sir Robert Stout, that the land for the railway corridor would be gifted.<sup>959</sup> In August, Wahanui confirmed to Parliament's Native Affairs Committee that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were willing to gift land along the railway corridor, but he did not wish to 'state whether the Maoris will give the land along the line', preferring that the decision be left to hapu along the line.<sup>960</sup> Ormsby then wrote to the Government early in 1886, confirming that no more than one chain was to be taken, along with a single acre for each small station and three acres for each large station.<sup>961</sup> Further details of the gifting were worked out during 1886 and 1887. Details of the actual land taken for the railway will be discussed in chapter 9.

In addition to railway and land matters, Wahanui's 4 March 1885 letter asked Ballance to take the 'strongest' preventative measures against 'Europeans or others' prospecting on Te Rohe Pōtae lands. Here, Wahanui appeared to be seeking confirmation of Ballance's promise that no prospecting would be allowed without the Kawhia Native Committee's consent.<sup>962</sup> Wahanui also advised the desire of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to turn the first sod 'ourselves'.<sup>963</sup> Ballance wrote back. He acknowledged Wahanui's letter, but did not keep his promise to set out the Government's understanding of the Kihikihi agreement. He said the Government had decided that Premier Robert Stout was the appropriate person to conduct the sod-turning ceremony, though he could be assisted by Wahanui and the chiefs.<sup>964</sup>

8.8.4 The turning of the sod ceremony, April 1885

In the weeks immediately following the agreement, Wilkinson reported that some of Tāwhiao's supporters objected to construction of part of the line that went through their lands, and that Hauāuru 'and some other chiefs' had 'determined not to give their consent' to the railway.<sup>965</sup> Te Pikikōtuku of Whanganui also wrote to Ballance expressing concern about a rumour that Wahanui had agreed to sell Whanganui land along the railway line; the Native Department responded that Wahanui had not committed to the sale of any land.<sup>966</sup>

959. According to Cleaver and Sarich, the Ngāti Tūwharetoa ariki Tūkino Te Heuheu heard Wahanui telling Stout that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were giving the backbone of their ancestor Tūrongo 'for nothing': 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Petition of Te Wherowhero Tawhiao together with Two Hundred and Seventy Six Others re Māori Land Councils Bill, Together with Minutes of Evidence', AJHR, 1905, I-3B, p17; doc A20, pp 141–142.

960. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with Minutes and Appendix', AJHR, 1885, I-2B, p8; doc A20, pp 85, 141; see also doc A78, p1159.

961. Document A20, p142.

962. Wahanui to Native Minister, 4 March 1885 (doc A78, p1159); see also doc A41, p176; doc A20, p73.

963. Wahanui to Native Minister, 4 March 1885 (doc A78, p1159).

964. Document A78, p1159.

965. Wilkinson to Native Department, 25 March 1885 (doc A91, pp 23–24).

966. Document A78, pp1155–1156. Te Paiaka was not objecting to the railway itself. The railway had been discussed at the hui at Rānana on 8 January, and Whanganui Māori had appeared to accept the decision about the line as having already been made: 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp1–9.

The turning of the sod ceremony took place on 15 April 1885, on the south side of the Pūniu River.<sup>967</sup> In chapter 9, we describe the ceremony and the speeches given there. In summary, Wahanui and Stout agreed to share the turning of sod duties. Stout, in his speech, said the ceremony marked a coming together of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and Europeans, after many years of estrangement.<sup>968</sup>

Wahanui named the railway corridor ‘Tūrongo’, after the great Ngāti Maniapoto ancestor.<sup>969</sup> Of all the substantive matters that had been discussed since Ballance came to office, Wahanui raised only one – control of liquor. He expressed concern that the Kawhia Licensing Area’s boundary lay south of the Pūniu, which had been named in the 1883 petition as the northern boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae. Wahanui, gesturing to the river, said:

I consider we could not have a better boundary with which to keep back the liquor than this stream of fresh water running down below us. I have seen, in one map that has been published, a certain boundary defining this licensing district; but that I did not agree to. I myself consider the proper boundary by which to keep back the liquor is a river of fresh water like the Puniu.<sup>970</sup>

The Native Department had already looked into this matter after Ormsby expressed concern in February. On 9 April 1885, a new proclamation was issued, adjusting the boundaries. The Pūniu became the northern boundary of the licensing area, and Kāwhia was now included.<sup>971</sup> Further adjustments were made on several other occasions before the final boundary was declared in 1894. In 1887, a separate Upper Wanganui Licensing Area was proclaimed, which was contiguous with much of the Kawhia Licensing Area’s southern boundary, creating a vast prohibition area through much of central North Island.<sup>972</sup> Stout later wrote that, if the Government had not accepted Wahanui’s demand for the prohibition of liquor sales in the district, ‘I feel sure that he and his people would not have consented to the railway being made.’<sup>973</sup>

Taonui also spoke, saying he wanted further discussion with Ballance ‘with regard to what is below the surface, and with regard to what is on the other side’ – a comment that Cleaver and Sarich interpreted to mean he wanted more discussion

967. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 2–3.

968. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 2–3.

969. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4; doc A71, p 206.

970. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4; doc A71, p 206.

971. ‘Kawhia Licensing Area’, 9 April 1885, New Zealand Gazette, 9 April 1885, pp 404–405.

972. Document A71, pp 204–209; doc A78, pp 1106–1107.

973. Stout wrote this to Frederick Wallis, The Bishop of Wellington, who later read it at a public meeting: ‘Liquor in the King Country: A Public Protest’, Evening Post, 24 July 1900, p 2 (doc A71, p 226).

about the process of construction.<sup>974</sup> He would also ‘have something to say with regard to the position of the stations’. But as Ballance was not there, he said, he would leave his points for another time.<sup>975</sup> This suggests that he shared Wahanui’s view, expressed in his 4 March letter to Ballance, that there would be further discussion about land and stations. We will address those matters in chapter 9.

8.8.5 Treaty analysis and findings

The railway agreement marked a significant step in the relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. From the Crown’s point of view, it meant that two years of negotiation had brought a tangible result – the railway could begin. For Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, it was a compromise, which did not deliver all that they had sought in terms of Crown recognition for and protection of their mana whakahaere, but nonetheless did represent significant progress from what had previously been offered, and it was therefore an arrangement they were prepared to accept.

8.8.5.1 The nature of the February 1885 agreement

The Kihikihi agreement fell short of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought in some important respects. First, the court would continue to have a significant role in determining land titles, though the Kawhia Native Committee would, Ballance promised, become a court of first instance. Secondly, titles would not be vested in hapū, though Ballance’s proposed land administration system would allow owners to make collective decisions about their lands. Thirdly, land transactions would not be managed by a subcommittee of the Kawhia Native Committee, but by a board with Crown representatives.

In respect of determining land titles, Ballance was willing to have the Kawhia Native Committee act as a ‘Court of first instance’, but told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders the court would have to remain in case the committee could not resolve disputes. He gave two reasons for his stance. First, he did not accept that native committees could be impartial – they would inevitably reflect some tribes or hapū more than others.<sup>976</sup> Secondly, he believed the court was needed as an appeal body in case of disputes.

Although Te Rohe Pōtae leaders accepted the compromise position he offered, they made it clear that it was not their preference. Even after Ballance had outlined his position, Ormsby continued to argue for the Kawhia Native Committee to have sole jurisdiction over the determination of land titles. Ormsby acknowledged that the committee’s makeup was not ideal (as discussed previously, this was a direct result of the very casual manner in which Wilkinson had conducted

---

974. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 5; doc A20, p 74.

975. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway: (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod of), at Puniu, 15th of April, 1885’, AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 4–5.

976. ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317.

the election), and he offered to hold fresh elections in order to ensure that all iwi and hapū were properly represented.

Ballance's argument about the court as an appeal body would be more persuasive if the Crown had at this time offered Māori opportunities to appeal decisions of the Native Land Court. However, as other Tribunals have noted, prior to 1894 Māori could only apply for full rehearings (with the attendant expense). Because they required the case to be started afresh, rehearings were not granted lightly. After 1880, applications for rehearing were determined by the chief judge of the Native Land Court. During this period, the Native Affairs Committee repeatedly highlighted the lack of any appeal mechanism.<sup>977</sup>

Ballance's argument about impartiality must be considered alongside the litany of Māori complaints about the court. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had unambiguously rejected the Court in their 1883 petition and continued to do so in their 1883 and 1884 negotiations with the Crown, and again at the hui at Kihikihi in February 1885. They did so because of the 'evils' they associated with the court, which were not limited to drunkenness and exploitation by European lawyers and agents, but also concerned the individualisation of title and a general lack of faith in the court's ability to make fair or just decisions due to judges' lack of knowledge of tribal history or tikanga. To put this last point another way, they did not regard the court as remotely fair or impartial. Yet Ballance continued to insist on the court's impartiality despite acknowledging these failings.

On the other hand, empowering the Kawhia Native Committee to determine land titles was not necessarily a perfect alternative, at least as the committee was constituted at the time. Ormsby appeared to acknowledge that it was not fully representative of all iwi and hapū with interests in the district. And the committee's boundary created added complications, by including almost all Ngāti Maniapoto lands while bisecting the rohe of several other iwi. Some iwi were concerned that Ngāti Maniapoto would dominate the decision-making process to the exclusion of their interests, and those concerns cannot simply be dismissed. Some, like Te Heuheu, and some Whanganui Māori, simply wanted to keep tribal rohe together in the same jurisdiction.

It might have been possible for Ballance to address some of these concerns, for example by accepting Ormsby's offer of fresh elections, or by considering renegotiation of boundaries. The court and the Kawhia Native Committee were not necessarily the only alternatives. There might have been other possibilities, including withdrawing the court from the district and providing time for direct negotiation among the affected parties to resolve issues among themselves without pressure to place their lands before the court. In their June 1883 petition, what Te Rohe Pōtae had sought was the right to determine ownership among themselves; it was only later that empowerment of the Kawhia Native Committee had become their goal.

Accepting the Native Land Court as a court of appeal was a compromise for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, but it was one they were prepared to live with in light of the assurance that the committee would act as a court of first instance. To some degree, that assurance may have offered Māori the time they sought, since it would allow Te Rohe Pōtae communities to negotiate among themselves without Government or settler involvement. It was an imperfect solution, and one that was to some extent forced on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by the circumstances that they faced, including the pressures from the court and settlement along the boundary, and the flawed native committee legislation. But it was nonetheless a compromise that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were prepared to accept.

---

<sup>977</sup> Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 498; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauonoka, vol 1, p 388.

Similarly, they accepted compromises in the system of land administration that Ballance proposed. Whereas they had wanted the Kawhia Native Committee (or a subcommittee) to manage land transactions with settlers, Ballance insisted on at least one Crown appointee also being involved. His statements in the House suggested that he regarded the Crown's involvement as necessary to protect Māori landowners from unscrupulous Europeans. Ballance said that transactions would involve three members – the Crown appointee, the chairman of the Kawhia Native Committee, and one other, possibly elected by Māori. If the boards were constituted along these lines, the Māori members would be in a majority, and would be accountable to their Māori constituents. This, too, was a compromise, but it was one that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were prepared to accept.

Likewise, although they did not get the hapū titles they wanted, they were prepared to accept Ballance's assurances that he was seeking to prevent a repeat of previous difficulties when blocks had been awarded to 10 hapū leaders while others were excluded. Ballance argued that all hapū members should be named on the title. This was acceptable to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders on the basis of his assurance that owners would be able to make collective decisions about their land.

In all of these respects, the Kihikihi agreement fell short of delivering the mana whakahaere that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought and were entitled to under the Treaty. When a modified version of Ballance's proposals was subsequently enacted in the Native Land Administration Act 1886 (see section 8.9.3.5), Māori refused to make use of the provisions, which they saw as favouring the Crown. Tribunals have since acknowledged that Act for taking some steps towards providing for communal management of Māori lands, but have also found that it fell well short of delivering what the Treaty required.

Ballance offered Te Rohe Pōtae leaders less than what they had sought, and less than what they were entitled to. But he also offered more than any other Native Minister had, or would for a long time afterwards. They accepted a compromise. The value of that compromise would depend on whether the promises Ballance had made were delivered.

8.8.5.2 *What was agreed?

For Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the agreement went further than any previous agreement with the Crown towards recognising their mana whakahaere (full control and power) over their own lands. If the Crown did not deliver what had been sought, it did at least make some concessions and give some assurances that were important to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. Altogether, Ballance made 20 promises or assurances to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the hui at Kihikihi. In respect of land, his promises were:

- The Kawhia Native Committee would be empowered to play a greater role in land title determination, possibly becoming a court 'of first instance' in this district, holding initial hearings to determine titles which the court would then ratify or consider on appeal.
- Elected committees of owners would determine how lands would be managed and would make all decisions about sale or lease. No lands would be sold or leased without the consent of the owner committee.
- Three-person boards with Māori representation (and possibly a Māori majority) would manage all land sales and leases on the owners' behalf. They could do nothing without the consent of owner committees, which would retain the 'fullest power'. The boards would comprise a Crown-appointed commissioner, the chair of the district's native committee, and one other, possibly elected by Māori.
- All sales or leases would be 'submitted for public competition, so that the highest price will be obtained for the land'.
- Māori land would not be subject to rates unless it had been leased, sold, or cultivated.

In addition to these specific promises, Ballance gave the following assurances about the Crown's land purchasing and land law intentions:

- The Crown was 'not anxious' to buy Māori land and intended to acquire only what it needed for the railway – a corridor of 1–2 chains wide, and 5–10 acres for stations. So long as Māori voluntarily made land available for settlement by leasing, the Government would not interfere. Ballance did not specify how much land would need to be made available, or when, but rather stressed that all decisions would be left to hapū.
- Māori landowners would be left to enjoy the benefit of rising land prices. Ballance anticipated that land prices would increase up to tenfold in value. This implied that Māori would retain a substantial proportion of their land.
- Ballance also gave the general assurance: 'Not a single Native right will be prejudiced.'

Regarding the railway itself, Ballance promised:

- The Crown would take no more than 1–2 chains' wide for the railway corridor, and 5–10 acres for stations.
- Once owners were identified, they would be paid for the land that was taken for the railway corridor and stations, and for any timber or other resources used. The amounts paid would be determined on the same basis as if the land was being taken from Europeans. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori later agreed to gift one chain for the corridor, and 1–3 acres for stations.
- Māori communities would be awarded contracts for the construction of parts of the railway. Therefore 'a large amount of the money' from the construction would go to the people directly.
- The railway would not interfere with waterways and would do '[n]o injury whatever' to Māori land.

During the negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had identified other matters as important, including control of liquor, control of prospectors, hearing of civil disputes, and Māori participation in lawmaking processes. With respect to these, Ballance made the following promises:

- ▶ The Government would address the gaps Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had identified in the Kawhia Licensing Area.
- ▶ Ballance would delegate to the Kawhia Native Committee chairman his power to grant or withhold consent for gold prospecting.
- ▶ Native committees would be given the same powers as a court to hear civil disputes up to a certain value. It would no longer be necessary for disputing parties to agree to place their dispute before the court. Ballance said he would introduce legislation in 1885 to bring this about.
- ▶ Māori would be consulted on all legislation affecting them. More specifically, Ballance would circulate a Bill during 1885 proposing new Māori land laws.
- ▶ Ballance would press for an increase in the number of Māori Members of the House of Representatives, so that Māori had proportionate representation.

Ballance furthermore gave a commitment that his promises with respect to rating and all other matters would be recorded in writing and confirmed through an exchange of letters.

In addition to these promises and assurances, Ballance indicated that he was considering, or would consider, other matters:

- ▶ Giving native committees some source of revenue, possibly by empowering them to collect dog tax from Māori in their districts.
- ▶ The introduction of small payments to native committee chairmen.
- ▶ Amending native land laws to prevent claims to the court by people who had little or no interest in the land.

With respect to civil disputes, the Kawhia Native Committee sought power to adjudicate all disputes whereas Ballance proposed to restrict the committee to small disputes. With respect to liquor and prospecting, Ballance largely accepted what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought, and indeed had done so prior to the Kihikihi hui – all that remained at that point was to finalise details of the licensing committee boundary, which Ballance showed himself willing to do. The claimants submitted that control of liquor was a central element of the railway agreement.<sup>978</sup> The Crown did not directly answer this claim, but did submit that there was no agreement to prohibit liquor sales in perpetuity. It also submitted that negotiations over control of liquor occurred alongside those over the railway, rather than being a central element of those negotiations.<sup>979</sup> Our view is that the request for a prohibition on sale of liquor represented the broader desire of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for Māori communities to exercise mana whakahaere (full control and power) over the full range of their communities' affairs, including those that were important to social well-being. They were asking the Crown to use its powers to assist them in preventing harm to their people. As Stout made clear, prohibition of liquor 978. Submission 3.4.128, p 2; submission 3.4.128(b), p 22.

979. Submission 3.4.301, pp 30, 79–80.

sales was an essential precondition for Māori consent to the railway. We therefore agree with the claimants that the prohibition was a central element of the railway agreement.

With respect to land, Ballance's promises fell some distance short of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought. He was not willing to grant Māori full control over land title determination as they had sought. And he was also unwilling to provide for the Kawhia Native Committee to manage land transactions, instead insisting that these be managed by a board with Crown representation. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori nonetheless signalled that they consented to his proposals. They told him they were pleased with what he had said, since it went further than any previous Government had offered, and on the basis of his promises and assurances they gave their consent to the railway.

Claimants saw the Kihikihi hui as a critical juncture in the series of negotiations between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. In their view, Ballance had given 'the strongest undertakings about Maori control over local affairs and land dealings' in the railway region, and had done so 'in order to get the railway agreed to', and because he had 'more confidence that his predecessors . . . that he could create an environment in which Māori would be prepared to sell land'.<sup>980</sup>

The Crown's view was that, in this and other mid-1880s agreements, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were prepared to accept a compromise because they knew that 'in order to allow their people full access to the colonial economy, some measure of the political autonomy they previously enjoyed had to be sacrificed'.<sup>981</sup> We agree with the Crown only insofar as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were prepared to appeal to the authority of the Crown in response to new circumstances. For more than 40 years since the Treaty, they had sustained their tino rangatiratanga without placing any reliance on the Treaty relationship and without accepting that the Crown had any right to make or enforce laws applying to their territories. As we have seen in preceding chapters, they had gone to great lengths and faced great costs to sustain their tino rangatiratanga in the face of Crown indifference or direct attacks. In the 1883 petition, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had signalled a new approach, in which they demanded the Crown use its powers of kāwanatanga to enact laws that would recognise and protect their tino rangatiratanga. This was a significant change from the full independence they had previously exercised, and it was a significant step towards the relationship envisaged by the Treaty under which the Crown and Māori would each exercise authority with distinct but potentially overlapping spheres of influence. During 1884, Wahanui continued to demand the Crown use its powers in a Treaty-consistent manner.

We agree with the Crown that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were willing to engage with the colonial economy under the right conditions – the 1883 petition had indicated as much. But we do not agree that this was why they accepted a compromise at Kihikihi – none of the compromises they accepted improved their economic prospects. Rather, in general terms they were compromising because of the pressures

---

980. Submission 3.4.130(e), pp 23–24, 26.

981. Submission 3.4.301, p1.

they faced at their borders largely due to previous Crown actions, which made an arrangement with the Crown increasingly necessary if they were to continue to exercise tino rangatiratanga. And in the specific context of the February 1885 Kihikihi hui, they accepted a compromise because Ballance had offered more than Bryce had been willing to, and because they felt they had to accept quickly out of fear that the Crown would otherwise withdraw its offer. In this, they were influenced by previous disappointments, in which Bryce and Ballance had failed to deliver what they had sought. Put another way, they compromised at Kihikihi because they felt they had to, in order to reach an agreement in which the Crown guaranteed them some reasonable degree of autonomy and authority over their lands, without preserving it entirely.

8.8.5.3 Was Ballance fully open about the Crown's policies?

Ballance attended the Kihikihi hui as the Native Minister and therefore as the Crown's representative. Whereas at Rānana he made clear that he was making proposals on which the Government had still to make final decisions, he offered no such caveat at Kihikihi. On the contrary, he told those assembled he would 'keep nothing back' and would state the Government's intended policy 'without any reservation whatever'.<sup>982</sup> Those assembled clearly understood that he had taken over from Bryce and now had responsibility for Government policy on native affairs. As the hui began, Hopa Te Rangianini described him as the Queen's representative and as 'the person who points out the Queen's policy',<sup>983</sup> and Ballance described himself as 'the representative of the Government' and therefore of the Queen.<sup>984</sup>

Having promised to be entirely frank and honest with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, Ballance also clearly explained which of their demands he accepted and which he refused. He gave no indication that his promises and assurances were anything other than Government policy. Indeed, for most of his promises (including those concerning the railway, land title determination, and land administration) he used the terms 'the Government proposes' or 'we propose', implying that the Government was in agreement.<sup>985</sup> He used 'I propose' to refer to his promises to empower native committees to adjudicate civil disputes, and to attempt to increase the number of Māori members of the House of Representatives.<sup>986</sup>

In fact, as we explained in section 8.8.1, Government policy with respect to Māori land in the district was far from settled. Ballance had told the House he favoured increased powers for native committees, but had not won general agreement. He did not tell the Kihikihi hui that this was a personal view which might not win parliamentary support. Based on the comments made by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, it is very doubtful that they would have accepted Ballance's proposals if

---

982. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

983. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 12.

984. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

985. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 17, 20, 23.

986. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 17, 23.

they had known of this uncertainty. As we will see in section 8.9, Ballance never introduced legislation to give effect to some of his promises.

Furthermore, while Ballance's personal preference was to establish a system under which Māori would voluntarily make land available for settlement, he clearly anticipated some Crown purchasing, as he had told the banquet at Whanganui. And others in his Government, and in opposition, clearly wanted the Crown to begin large-scale purchasing along the railway line as soon as possible, as indicated in the governor's speech. As we will see in section 8.9.1.1, it did not take long after the Kihikihi hui for those voices to assert themselves. Yet Ballance made no mention of Crown purchasing, except to assure those assembled that the Crown was 'not anxious' to acquire the district's lands and would be content if it could acquire enough for the railway and if land for settlement were made available by leasing under a system that left full control with the owners. Again, if Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had been told that some in the Government wanted to buy large areas of the district's land as quickly as possible, it is very doubtful that they would have accepted Ballance's proposals.

More broadly, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had spelled out their understanding of their Treaty rights in the June 1883 petition, making clear that they understood article 2 of the Treaty as guaranteeing their tino rangatiratanga. The Government's view (which we will consider in section 8.9.1.2) was that the Treaty offered no more than a guarantee of possession of land, which in its view was fully provided for in existing native land laws.

In these respects, Ballance was less frank than he ought to have been about the areas of Government policy that were uncertain or counter to Māori interests. We do not think that he deliberately lied to the district's leaders, but in his concern to secure agreement to the railway he emphasised those elements of his argument that might win support, while glossing over the elements that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders might object to. His approach contrasted with that of Wahanui, who said clearly at the Kihikihi hui that he could not give final consent until he had consulted and obtained consent from the leaders of the five tribes and in particular the leaders of Whanganui and Ngāti Tūwharetoa, who had not been well represented at Kihikihi or at the preceding tribal hui. Wahanui therefore gave conditional consent, telling Ballance he would have a final answer within three weeks, and if he did not get an answer in that time the Kihikihi agreement would stand. This was an open and transparent way of doing business, which reflected Wahanui's understanding of the tikanga involved, including his understanding that the word of a rangatira was his bond and must therefore be expressed with great care.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori assembled at Kihikihi were entitled to the same consideration from Ballance. They were making decisions about the future of their district and its land. They were therefore entitled to nothing less than full disclosure of the Crown's goals and policies, including any areas of uncertainty. By failing to be fully open, Ballance – acting as the Crown's representative – denied Te Rohe Pōtae Māori the opportunity to make a fully informed decision about his proposals, or about the railway. He therefore denied them the opportunity to manage their affairs as they wished, in accordance with the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. His actions as a Crown representative therefore breached the Crown's duty to negotiate fairly, honourably, and in good faith.

8.8.5.4 Was the Crown obliged to honour Ballance's promises?

As noted in the previous section, Ballance was negotiating with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders as the Crown's representative. His promises were therefore binding on the Crown, irrespective of any subsequent refusal by other Ministers or members of the House of Representatives to comply. This was a matter of the Crown's honour and its responsibility to negotiate fairly, honourably, and in good faith. It was also a question of tino rangatiratanga. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were negotiating over matters that fundamentally affected their authority over lands, resources, and people. They accepted what Ballance proposed in its entirety and granted their consent for the railway on the understanding that the agreement would be honoured.

The Crown could not unilaterally alter any part of the agreement without first returning to negotiations and seeking the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. In opening submissions, Crown counsel said that Ballance's promises were not binding agreements, but general statements of intent.<sup>987</sup> But, in closing submissions, Crown counsel conceded that the Crown had 'failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it departed from representations it had made' at the Kihikihi hui, and thereby 'breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles by not acting in good faith and by failing to respect their tino rangatiratanga.'<sup>988</sup> This concession suggested that the Crown did not have to honour Ballance's Kihikihi promises, but did have to re-engage if it was not going to. We presume that the Crown, here, was acknowledging the possibility that either Ballance might be unable to honour the assurances he had given, in particular because the Government had not yet made decisions, as Ballance explained at Rānana but not at Kihikihi. The breach occurred, the Crown suggested, not because of a failure to deliver what had been promised, but because of a failure to consult over that failure.

We agree with the Crown that it was obliged to re-engage if, for any reason, it decided not to honour the promises or assurances that Ballance had made. But we do not think that the concession goes far enough. At Kihikihi, Ballance gave an assurance that he was speaking frankly and holding nothing back. He was careful to distinguish between promises, intentions, and suggestions that would require further consideration. And he gave no indication that the Government had yet to make decisions about the matters he was speaking about. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders accepted his promises and assurances in good faith, and it was on the basis of those statements that they consented to the railway.

This was, to them, a very significant step; it was the opening of a district that had been previously closed to the Crown, and it signalled acceptance of the Crown's right to give practical effect to its powers of kāwanatanga in this district by enacting laws that applied to the district's lands and by constructing public works. As 987. Statement 1.3.1, p 274.

---

988. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had previously made clear on several occasions, this was a step they would be willing to take only if they had received clear assurances that the Crown would enact laws that recognised and gave effect to their rights under articles 2 and 3 of the Treaty, or (to use Wahanui's words) their mana whakahaere. The negotiations at Kihikihi concerned the details of how that might be achieved.

Under these circumstances, the Crown was obliged to do more than go away and consider whether it would do what Ballance had said it would do. It was obliged to take all reasonable steps to implement what had been agreed and then to return to negotiations if it genuinely was unable to deliver. If the Crown could not deliver on any substantive element of the February 1885 agreement, the entire basis for that agreement would be called into question, including the Crown's right to proceed with the railway and its right to enact laws that applied in Te Rohe Pōtae. Put simply, the Treaty partnership required both parties to keep their word.

By the time of the sod turning, the Crown had already taken steps to fulfil one of Ballance's promises, by addressing Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' concerns over liquor control in Kāwhia. For most of the Crown's other promises and assurances, further action was needed. In section 8.9.4, we will consider whether the Crown during 1885 and 1886 made genuine attempts to honour the assurances that Ballance had given with respect to empowerment of native committees, administration of Māori land, and mineral prospecting. We will also return to Ballance's promises in future chapters concerning the railway (chapter 9), the Native Land Court (chapter 10), and Crown purchasing of Māori land (chapter 11).

8.9 LAND SETTLEMENT AND THE END OF THE AUKATI, 1885–86

Having obtained Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' consent for the railway, the Government was obliged to take all reasonable steps to implement the measures it had promised to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. More generally, it continued to be obliged to recognise and protect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, even as it became less and less willing to do so.

With respect to land, the Crown was obliged to empower the Kawhia Native Committee to act as a court of first instance in determining land titles – or, if it was unwilling or unable to do that, to reopen consultation with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and find some other means by which Māori communities could determine title among themselves. Furthermore, at minimum the Crown was obliged to: provide for the establishment of owner committees with full power to determine how their lands should be managed; ensure that all land sales or leases occurred in an open market in accordance with hapū wishes; ensure that the board established to manage land transactions included the Kawhia Native Committee chairman, and acted solely as an agent for owners; honour its assurances that it would leave Māori in control of their own lands so long as some land was made available for settlement by leasing; honour its assurances that Māori would have the opportunity to benefit from rising land prices along the railway; and ensure that Māori land was not subjected to rates before it was sold, leased, or farmed.

With respect to the railway, it was obliged to take no more land than it had said it would for the railway corridor, or to obtain consent and ensure that Māori were fairly paid for any additional land; it was obliged to pay fairly for timber and other resources used in construction, and to ensure that Māori had opportunities to win construction contracts. On other matters, the Crown was obliged to correct the errors in the Kawhia Licensing Area boundaries; to provide for the Kawhia Native Committee to manage prospecting within the district; to consult Māori over all legislation affecting them; and to consider increasing Māori representation in the House of Representatives.

As we will see in this section, by mid-1886 the Crown had broken many of these commitments, especially those concerning land. When Ballance returned to Wellington he faced a barrage of criticism from Government and opposition members of the House of Representatives, and from settler media, for having offered Te Rohe Pōtae Māori too much control over their lands – lands which settler politicians and their constituents were increasingly desperate to obtain for settlement purposes. Ballance either gave in to this pressure or was defeated; during his remaining time in office, he attempted to deliver only part of what he had said he would.

He did introduce new legislation for Māori land administration, but it failed to deliver much of what he had promised and was enacted despite strong opposition from Wahanui and other Māori leaders. We do not know what discussions Ballance had behind closed doors, but he made no attempt to introduce legislation to empower district native committees as he had promised, or to increase Māori representation in the House of Representatives. By the end of 1885, the Crown was committed to a large-scale land purchasing programme within Te Rohe Pōtae. Notwithstanding Ballance's assurances at Kihikihi, and notwithstanding the right of tino rangatiratanga guaranteed by the Treaty, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were to be given no opportunity to control the pace and manner of settlement. Ballance did grant the Kawhia Native Committee the authority to control gold prospecting and he also took steps to correct the errors in the Kawhia Licensing Area; these were the only two promises that were substantially honoured.

We consider these events below. The railway commitments will be considered in chapter 9.

8.9.1 The Government's amended land settlement policy

With the railway construction getting under way, the Crown had – through negotiation – achieved one of its goals for Te Rohe Pōtae. It had also made considerable progress on another of its goals – asserting its authority over the district. Throughout the negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had recognised the Crown's right to make law and had asked that the Crown use its power to protect their lands and provide for their autonomy. They had yet to engage fully with the Native Land Court, but – from the Crown's point of view – had taken a significant first step with their 1883 request for confirmation of their external boundary. The Crown's third goal was to settle the district. On this, it had so far made little progress; any settlement plan could only proceed once the owners' titles were confirmed in accordance with the colony's laws. That meant either empowering the Kawhia Native Committee to determine land titles (at least in the first instance) or persuading Māori to bypass the committee and place their lands before the court.

8.9.1.1 Initial Government and settler responses to Ballance's promises – February–March 1885

Ballance had told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that he was willing to leave the district's settlement in their hands. So long as they made some land available for settlement by leasing, he had said, the Government would be satisfied and leave them to manage their lands as they wished, without intervening either by purchasing land outside the railway corridor or by other means.<sup>989</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had said (in the 1883 petition<sup>990</sup>) that they would welcome settlement so long as their lands and autonomy were protected, and Ballance took them at their word. His view was that hapū would willingly offer lands for sale or lease if they knew they were getting good prices, and his promises to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were made on this basis.<sup>991</sup>

But, among colonial politicians, and among settlers more generally, Ballance's views were not widely supported. Bryce and other members of the Atkinson Government had seen no reason for Māori to enjoy the benefit of rising land prices; in their view, the State was funding the railway, and the State should therefore receive the benefit.<sup>992</sup>

Some Ministers in the Stout–Vogel Government were of the same view and wasted no time in telling Ballance so. Almost immediately after the Kihikihi hui, the Colonial Treasurer Julius Vogel wrote to Ballance observing that his meetings had been 'very successful', but also warning that his 'conciliating disposition' was leading Māori to ask too much.<sup>993</sup> Vogel was concerned about payment for the railway corridor, urging Ballance to fix a value immediately, while the land was 'waste' and therefore (from the Crown's point of view) of little value.<sup>994</sup> But his main concern was to repudiate Ballance's promises that the Crown did not intend to buy large areas of land and would be content with Māori leasing land for settlement. Vogel said that, by giving these assurances, Ballance had gone 'much further than the Colony will approve'. He reminded Ballance that the Crown had bor-

989. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13.

990. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

991. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 13; see also 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884 (doc A78(a), vol 6, pp 2921–2922); doc A41, pp 147–149.

992. For example, see 'Native Lands Settlement Bill, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 320–322; doc A78, pp 1087–1089; 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 8 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 434–435. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 558.

993. Vogel to Ballance, 8 February 1885 (doc A68(a), pp 16–20); see also doc A41, p 184; doc A68, p 22; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 558; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, p 377.

994. Vogel to Ballance, 8 February 1885 (doc A68(a), pp 16–20); see also doc A41, p 184; doc A68, p 22.

rowed large sums for the railway and wanted a return not only from the railway itself but also from the surrounding land.

It may have been diplomacy to appear to disclaim any wish to get land but remember this: the House the Colony and common prudence demand that we should get large tracts of land into our own hands along a line on which we are going to spend a million and a half.<sup>995</sup>

In Vogel's view, Māori might be willing to offer land for sale under Ballance's system, but 'it is risky'. Vogel advised Ballance to instead undertake a programme of large-scale Crown purchasing: '[I]n my opinion you should set yourself to acquire immediately at least a million acres freehold, & more if practicable.'<sup>996</sup>

Vogel made similar comments in a speech in Auckland soon afterwards, saying that the Crown had imposed restrictions on the 4.5 million-acre zone 'because we desire to see it settled'. The Crown would not force Māori to give it up, but was 'open to purchase large blocks' and was already 'under negotiation for very large blocks upon the railway.'<sup>997</sup> These must have been outside the inquiry district, since title had yet to be determined for the vast majority of Te Rohe Pōtae land. Vogel noted the reality that, if Māori believed their lands were to be taken from them, that would have 'roused opposition . . . from one end of the line to the other' and made it 'impossible for that line to be commenced'.

The broad view of the Government in relation to the lands of the natives is this, that we should do everything we possibly can to secure the land, and to convince the natives that the one object to be gained is to put that land to useful purposes of settlement, whether by Europeans or Maoris, and not allow these vast tracts of land to remain unused and unoccupied, but to subject them to purposes of settlement by an industrial population.<sup>998</sup>

There are two important points to take from Vogel's comments. First, Vogel was saying that the Crown would obtain large areas of land and thereby manage the settlement process; Māori would not be trusted to manage their own lands as they wished. He said this was 'the broad view of the Government', indicating that his approach, and not Ballance's, was now in the majority. Secondly, Vogel was acknowledging that Ballance had not been fully open with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about its settlement agenda and about the internal policy debate that had been occurring between Ballance and other Ministers. If the Government had been

---

995. Vogel to Ballance, 8 February 1885 (doc A68(a), pp 16–20); see also doc A41, p 184; doc A68, p 22.

996. Vogel to Ballance, 8 February 1885 (doc A68(a), pp 16–20); see also doc A41, p 184; doc A68, p 22.

997. 'Sir Julius Vogel's Address at the Theatre Royal', New Zealand Herald, 2 March 1885, p 2 (doc A146 (Hearn), p 53).

998. 'Sir Julius Vogel's Address at the Theatre Royal', New Zealand Herald, 2 March 1885, p 2 (doc A146, p 53).

open about its agenda, Vogel acknowledged, the result would have been widespread Māori opposition. As we will see in section 8.9.1.3, that is what occurred once the Government's settlement and purchasing plans became clearer.

Settler media were similarly scathing about Ballance's promises. The Auckland Star claimed that Ballance's scheme, if enacted, would put an end to sales and leases of Māori land, thereby preventing settlement.<sup>999</sup> Most newspapers argued that the Crown should be purchasing large areas, on the basis that land values would increase greatly along the railway route as construction progressed and the Crown ought to receive the benefit.<sup>1000</sup> The alternative to Crown purchasing, one newspaper said in March 1885, was to allow 'native speculators' to get the 'unearned increment' that the statutory restrictions were denying European speculators.<sup>1001</sup>

8.9.1.2 The Government rejects Tāwhiao's petition, March 1885

On 28 March, the premier, Robert Stout, wrote to the British Colonial Secretary Lord Derby forwarding the New Zealand Government's response to Tāwhiao's petition. The response had been delayed until after Ballance's North Island tour and was sent a month after Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had assented to the railway, and a week before the sod-turning ceremony.<sup>1002</sup> It explains the Government's understanding of its Treaty obligations, in respect of land and, more generally, Māori rights of self-government and self-determination.

As discussed earlier, Tāwhiao's petition had set out Tāwhiao's understanding of the Treaty as preserving the Māori lands and 'rights of chieftainship', and as granting to Māori the Queen's protection and the Queen's laws 'in like manner' as the people of Britain.<sup>1003</sup> The petition also listed numerous breaches of the Treaty by the government in New Zealand, including buying land from people who did not own it, invading Māori territories, confiscating Māori land, imprisoning Māori leaders without trial, and failing to provide Māori with equal representation in Parliament.<sup>1004</sup> The Government had also breached the Treaty, Tāwhiao said, by establishing the Native Land Court and thereby destroying Māori land rights that had been guaranteed in the Treaty, sweeping away the rights of rangatira to secure lands on behalf of their people, appointing Māori assessors while giving them no power, awarding land to individuals, and excluding the real owners from obtaining title to their land.<sup>1005</sup>

999. Editorial, Auckland Star, 11 March 1885, p 2; doc A68, pp 47–48.

1000. Document A41, pp 184–185; doc A68, pp 22–26, 28–29, 31, 34–35, 210–211; doc A20, pp 82, 87–88; doc A146, pp 52–53, 55–56.

1001. Editorial, Poverty Bay Herald, 2 March 1885, p 2 (doc A68, p 23); see also doc A146, p 56.

1002. 'Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State', AJHR, 1885, A-1, pp 32; see also submission 3.4.301, pp 21–23.

1003. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp 3–5.

1004. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp 3–5.

1005. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp 3–5.

In general terms, Tāwhiao sought the right for Māori living on ancestral lands to govern themselves in accordance with their own laws. He referred to section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act 1852, which provided for the establishment of autonomous districts in which Māori would continue to govern themselves in accordance with their own ‘laws, customs and usages’, asking the Queen to bring the section into effect for Māori districts.<sup>1006</sup> His petition sought the establishment of a single Māori government, to parallel the colonial government; the appointment of a Māori commissioner to mediate between Māori and settlers over matters of land and law; the return to Māori of taxes levied from them; the empowerment of Māori to appoint their own judges to determine land titles; and the return of confiscated lands.<sup>1007</sup>

Stout’s response revealed much about the premier’s attitude to the Treaty and to Māori rights of self-determination more generally. He said he would only discuss the period since 1865, when imperial troops were removed from New Zealand and the colonial government acquired responsibility for native affairs. From 1865, he said, he was ‘quite certain . . . there has been no infraction of the Treaty of Waitangi’. He drew this conclusion without addressing any of Tāwhiao’s specific allegations of Treaty breach, many of which concerned government actions after 1865, on grounds that they had all been ‘dealt with before’ in previous petitions.<sup>1008</sup>

Stout unequivocally rejected any notion that Māori had rights to make their own laws or govern themselves independently of colonial authorities. He rejected Tāwhiao’s request for the proclamation of autonomous native districts under section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act, claiming that the intended purpose – allowing Māori to continue to live according to their own ‘laws, customs, and usages’ – was already achieved by the Native Land Act, under which the Native Land Court was required to deal with Native land . . . according to Native customs or usages.<sup>1009</sup>

By giving the court as a reason for opposing genuine Māori self-government, Stout was ignoring the fact that the court dealt solely with land tenure, not with self-government more generally. He made no mention of the litany of complaints about the court and its operation made by Tāwhiao and other Māori leaders, who saw it as destroying chiefly authority and Māori communal relationships with land. And he ignored the fact that the court was a settler institution specifically established to impose English systems of law, dispute resolution, and land tenure over those of Māori.

Stout did pronounce himself willing to entertain the idea of a limited ‘form of local government’ for Māori communities. He said the county of Waipa was

---

1006. ‘Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand’, AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp 3–5.

1007. ‘Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand’, AJHR, 1885, A-2, pp 3–5.

1008. ‘Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State’, AJHR, 1885, A-1, p 32; see also submission 3.4.301, pp 21–23; doc A78, p 1151.

1009. ‘Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State’, AJHR, 1885, A-1, p 32.

‘practically a native district’, and if Māori wanted similar local self-government in other districts the Government would see no difficulty in granting that.<sup>1010</sup> The county of Waipa was constituted under the Counties Act 1876, which made local counties responsible for local by-laws, public works and libraries, and regulating public health and safety. We are unsure of the basis for Stout’s conclusion that the Waipa County was ‘practically a native district’. Jane Luiten, in her history of local government in Te Rohe Pōtae, noted that the county lay on 180,000 acres of confiscated land north of the Pūniu, of which Māori possessed a few isolated and tiny holdings, the rest being owned by farmers and Auckland property speculators.<sup>1011</sup> Newspaper reports from the time indicate that the councillors were Europeans.<sup>1012</sup>

In any case, Stout acknowledged that Tāwhiao was seeking much more than the powers of a local county council; the King was seeking a Parliament for Māori under the Queen, which would make law for Māori districts independently of the colonial Parliament. This accorded with the view that Te Wheoro had expressed at Kihikihi, that article 3 of the Treaty entitled Māori and settlers to their own legislatures within their own territories. But Stout was dismissive of Tāwhiao’s request:

Seeing that in the Legislative Council and the House of Representatives the Natives are represented by able chiefs, and that they have practically no local affairs to look after that cannot be done by their Committees—local bodies recognized by the Government—Ministers do not deem it necessary to point out the unreasonableness and absurdity of such a request.<sup>1013</sup>

Here, Stout made no mention of the complaints that Tāwhiao and other Māori leaders had made about their lack of influence in the House of Representatives, arising from the significant under-representation of Māori voters. He also presented native committees as possessing sufficient power to satisfactorily manage all local affairs within Māori districts. As we have seen, the committees were empowered to do little more than adjudicate in very minor civil disputes, and Māori leaders regarded the committees’ powers as manifestly inadequate.<sup>1014</sup> Indeed, these were the same committees that Stout in 1884 had dismissed as being not ready to become involved in land transactions or decisions about ownership.<sup>1015</sup> In effect, Stout was dismissing Māori concerns about the court and the powers of native committees, while making clear that in his view the Treaty entitled Māori to very little in the way of communal self-determination. While he did not specific-

---

1010. ‘Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State’, AJHR, 1885, A-1, p32.

1011. Document A24, pp 55, 59.

1012. For example, see ‘Waipa County Council’, Waikato Times, 20 June 1882, p 4; ‘Waipa County Council’, Waikato Times, 13 March 1884, p 2.

1013. ‘Despatches from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State’, AJHR, 1885, A-1, p32.

1014. Document A78, p1151.

1015. ‘Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill’, 7 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 478; doc A78, p1098.

ally address the matter, his comments suggested that the Government by this time had very little sympathy for Ballance's promise of substantially increased powers for native committees.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Derby, acknowledged Stout's response in a 23 June letter to Governor Jervois, making clear that Britain no longer took any responsibility for the Crown–Māori relationship. As Lord Derby explained the constitutional relationship:

under the present constitution of New Zealand the government of all Her Majesty's subjects in the Islands is controlled by Ministers responsible to the General Assembly, in which the Natives are efficiently represented by persons of their own race . . . it is no longer possible to advise the Queen to interfere actively in the administration of Native affairs any more than in connection with other questions of internal Government.<sup>1016</sup>

Lord Derby nonetheless conveyed the British Government's hope that Māori rights, customs, and institutions would be protected:

Although . . . Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to give you specific instructions as to the applicability at the present time of any particular stipulations of a treaty which it no longer rests with them to carry into effect, they are confident . . . that the Government of New Zealand will not fail to protect and to promote the welfare of the Natives by a just administration of the law, and by a generous consideration of all their reasonable representations.

I cannot doubt that means will be found of maintaining to a sufficient extent the rights and institutions of the Maoris without injury to those other great interests which have grown up in the land, and of securing to them a fair share of that prosperity which has of necessity affected in many ways the conditions of their existence.<sup>1017</sup>

Upon receiving Lord Derby's response later in 1885, Tāwhiao acknowledged that the colonial Government had gained responsibility for Māori in 1865, but said that the Queen had agreed to this without consulting the Māori people.<sup>1018</sup>

8.9.1.3 The Native Land Disposition Bill, June 1885

By March 1885, then, the leaders of the Stout–Vogel ministry had signalled their opposition to some of Ballance's key promises. Notwithstanding Ballance's promise that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would be left to make their own decisions about settlement of the district, Vogel had insisted that the Crown needed to urgently

---

1016. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2A, p12; doc A78, p1151.

1017. 'Despatches from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand', AJHR, 1885, A-2A, p12.

1018. Document A78, p1197.

purchase one-third of the 4.5 million-acre railway area. And notwithstanding the promise of substantially increased powers for the Kawhia Native Committee to inquire into land titles, Stout had indicated that native committees had sufficient powers to do all that was required of them, and the Native Land Court adequately met Māori needs with respect to land title determination.

As the Government hardened its attitude towards Te Rohe Pōtae Māori aspirations, it also stepped up its commitment to its land settlement goals. It had already, in January, reopened its Whanganui land purchasing office (which had been closed) and appointed Thomas McDonnell as land purchasing officer for the region, charging him with buying land near the proposed railway route in blocks outside of this inquiry district which had already been through the court.<sup>1019</sup>

In June, it took another significant step towards advancing its settlement agenda, by introducing new legislation aimed at opening Māori land for settlement. The Native Land Disposition Bill, as it was called, was to apply to the entire country. Some of its provisions reflected the system that Ballance had outlined at Kihikihi, under which owner committees would decide how to manage lands, with a board then managing any sales or leases on the owners' behalf.

But there were also some important differences. Whereas Ballance had promised that owner committees would make all decisions about land sales or leases and that no land would be sold without owners' consent, the Bill provided for 'local committees' which could make decisions by a simple majority. There would be no meeting to elect committee members; instead, they would be nominated in writing, in the same manner as Kawhia Native Committee members had been. There was no provision to ensure that all owners consented before alienation took place, and nor was there any provision by which owners could veto a decision made by the committee.<sup>1020</sup> All private sales and leases would be carried out by a Crown-appointed commissioner, acting in accordance with decisions made by a district board of management. The board would comprise the commissioner, one other Crown appointee, and the chair of the district native committee.<sup>1021</sup> At Kihikihi, Ballance had suggested that the third member might be elected by local Māori, which would have given Māori a majority.

Once the board had been asked to sell or lease, it was empowered to do as it saw fit. It could survey, subdivide, and build roads and other works, deducting the expenses from the proceeds of sale or lease, with no requirement to consult the owners, let alone obtain their consent. As well as deducting development costs, the board was also empowered to charge a 5 per cent commission on any rent or 1020. Native Land Disposition Bill 1885, cl 3, 13, 25, 36. Clause 3 defined 'owner' to mean 'any native owner of land' (except where the land had been purchased from the Crown or a European, and was held by the owner as an individual). Clause 25 provided that: 'Owners may sell or lease to the Crown without and notwithstanding the appointment of a local committee. A local committee may sell or lease to the Crown.' Clause 36 prohibited all private dealings.

1019. Document A78, pp 1181–1182.

1021. Native Land Disposition Bill 1885, pts 2, 3.

purchase money, which would be paid to the Crown.<sup>1022</sup> These expenses had not been discussed at Kihikihi.

Whereas Ballance had promised that all sales or leases would occur in an open market, the Bill provided that owners (individually or collectively) could sell directly to the Crown, bypassing the local committee and the board of management. A local committee could also sell directly to the Crown. Neither local committees nor owners could sell or lease privately, except through the board.<sup>1023</sup>

In material ways, this was not the land administration system that Ballance had promised at Kihikihi. Collectively, these variations meant that – should the system set out in the new legislation be enacted – hapū and iwi would be denied the powers that they had sought to manage their own lands. Owners' decisions would not have to be unanimous; sales and leases would be managed by a Crown-appointed commissioner; the commissioner would act in accordance with the decisions of a board which had a majority of Crown appointees and was not required to consult the owners, let alone obtain their consent; substantial expenses could be deducted without the owners having given prior consent; the Crown would be able to buy land from anyone it pleased, with no promise of transparency or competition; and no provision was made for owners to veto decisions made by the local committee.

8.9.1.3.1 INITIAL MĀORI AND SETTLER VIEWS

Ballance had promised to circulate the Bill before the parliamentary session began in June. According to Dr Loveridge, this did not occur – Ballance appears to have been modifying the Bill up to 15 June, the day before it was introduced to the House.<sup>1024</sup> After introduction, the Bill was circulated among Māori and settler communities for comment. The response in the settler press was as negative as it had been after the Kihikihi hui. The general view was that the Bill would halt all settlement of Māori lands, with dire consequences for the colony's stuttering economy.<sup>1025</sup> The Press of Christchurch expressed the commonly held settler view that the Government wanted to 'convert the centre of the North Island into a Maori paradise – at the expense of the European taxpayers.' Under Ballance's Bill, Māori would be 'unimproving and grasping landlords,' and the Government would become 'the hated middleman, who squeezes out the rents and sells up defaulters.'<sup>1026</sup>

Soon after the Bill's introduction, the Government faced a vote of no confidence, principally motivated by an unpopular Budget which had increased taxes. During that debate, the former Premier Harry Atkinson expressed the Opposition's view of Ballance and his Bill. Whereas Māori had known Bryce as a hard negotiator, Atkinson said, they knew that Ballance would give them all they wanted. Ballance's promises would reopen questions that had previously been resolved. Māori would 1022. Native Land Disposition Bill 1885, pt 5.

1023. Native Land Disposition Bill 1885, cl 25, 36.

1024. Document A41, p 48. For introduction, see NZPD, 1885, vol 51, p 14.

1025. Document A68, p 47.

1026. Editorial, The Press, 5 June 1885, p 2 (doc A68, p 47). According to Loveridge, the newspaper was quoting the former Native Minister, John Bryce.

come to believe ‘that . . . they will govern the Europeans instead of the Europeans governing them.’<sup>1027</sup> Furthermore, Atkinson continued, the land on either side of the railway would never be settled, and Māori would believe ‘that . . . the whole of that land belongs to them, with the railway made through it – a railway made and completed at the expense of the country’:

And I say . . . that the Natives are told, and believe . . . that the whole of that land is to be left to them for their own disposal after the railway is made. They have no idea of giving to the colony any of the enormous increase in value which will accrue from the colony’s works. They believe that it will all go into their own pockets.<sup>1028</sup>

Though Ballance had good intentions, Atkinson said, the inevitable consequence of his approach would be ‘broken promises, pledges unfulfilled’.<sup>1029</sup>

If settlers thought the Bill did far too much for Māori, Māori thought it did too little. Rangatira from around the country wrote to Ballance giving their views. Some favoured the Bill, at least in principle; others trenchantly opposed it. Many of those who wrote noted that it was an improvement on current law, since it provided (albeit with some exceptions) for all owners to be represented in decisions about land. But the changes since Ballance’s North Island tour did not go unnoticed.<sup>1030</sup>

In the House, Ballance read a letter from Te Wheoro (Tāwhiao’s advisor), which said that Te Wheoro could not point out all the faults in the Bill, ‘as there are so many’. Te Wheoro’s view was that the native committees – not boards with a Crown-appointed majority – should be left to manage the land; or, better still, native committees should design their own law.<sup>1031</sup> Ballance also read a letter from the Kawhia Native Committee chairman, John Ormsby. Ormsby said he accepted the ‘principle’ of the Bill, but objected to some of its clauses. While he did not specify what that principle was, other Māori leaders who wrote to Ballance indicated that they supported the ‘principle’ of hapū controlling their own lands.<sup>1032</sup> Ormsby’s main objection was to clause 22, ‘enabling the Crown to get behind the Board’ and buy land directly from Māori individuals or groups.<sup>1033</sup>

But, in Ormsby’s view, the Bill as a whole was ‘of minor importance’ compared with the question of how title would be determined. Ormsby reminded Ballance that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori ‘have no confidence’ in the existing system under which the Native Land Court determined title to Māori land.<sup>1034</sup> Ormsby informed Ballance that Wahanui would soon be in Wellington to continue negotiations.<sup>1035</sup>

---

1027. ‘Want of Confidence’, 8 July 1885, NZPD, vol 51, pp 418–419; doc A68, p 26.

1028. ‘Want of Confidence’, 8 July 1885, NZPD, vol 51, pp 418–419; doc A68, p 26.

1029. ‘Want of Confidence’, 8 July 1885, NZPD, vol 51, pp 418–419; doc A68, p 26.

1030. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 390–392.

1031. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 391.

1032. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 391–392.

1033. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 391–392.

1034. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 391–392.

1035. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 391–392.

Wahanui arrived in mid-June, along with other leaders.<sup>1036</sup> Over the next few weeks, the views of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders appear to have hardened against the Bill, and against Ballance himself.

On 29 July, the New Zealand Herald reported that the district's leaders had lost confidence in Ballance, who they now believed would 'promise anything' without any intention to keep his promises.<sup>1037</sup> They objected to the Bill 'in the strongest manner possible', seeing it as 'the means by which the Government, through unscrupulous agents, will be enabled to wrest from them their lands'. Wahanui, the newspaper reported, had been instructed to inform the Government that they would not part with their lands either to the Government or anyone, except by leasing. In order to prevent the Government from having any means of breaking their resolve, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had raised in full the £1,600 owing for the external boundary survey and intended to pay it off. Taonui, Te Rangituatea, Hitiri Te Paerata, and numerous others had signed a petition asking for the abolition of the Native Land Court, due to its 'maladministration' of Māori land, and leaders had determined that the court would never adjudicate title to their lands.<sup>1038</sup> Whereas Ormsby had asked that the Crown honour its Kihikihi agreement, these leaders appeared to be advocating a return to the pre-Kihikihi position in which the court would play no role in land title determination even as an appeal body.

8.9.1.3.2 THE GOVERNMENT'S DEFENCE OF THE BILL'S LAND PURCHASING PROVISIONS

Faced with fierce criticism of the Bill, the Government became increasingly defensive. Ballance sought to present the Bill as providing 'fair play' to both Māori and settlers, and as providing a mechanism for land dealing which served 'the interests of the Government and . . . the interests of the Natives themselves.'<sup>1039</sup> Māori possessed a vast estate, he told the House. The Bill served Māori interests by allowing them 'to guard that portion of the land which public policy requires should not go from their hands'; and it served settler interests by ensuring that they would not be prevented from acquiring some of that land if they wished.<sup>1040</sup> Furthermore, Ballance said, the Bill violated no Māori right and was entirely consistent with the Treaty, under which the Crown had received the pre-emptive right in return for Māori 'ownership' of their land. He said the Crown in Britain had 'only recently determined that the treaty was still binding'. But the Crown, Ballance said, had gone further than the Treaty demanded:

while we retain the right of purchase in our hands, we give the Natives an opportunity of getting a better price for their land by placing it in the open market, by offering it to

---

1036. Document A78, p1165; doc A68, p48.

1037. 'The Natives and the Government', New Zealand Herald, 29 July 1885, p5.

1038. 'The Natives and the Government', New Zealand Herald, 29 July 1885, p5.

1039. 'Native Land Disposition Bill', 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 393, 394.

1040. 'Native Land Disposition Bill', 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 394.

competition . . . It is just and fair to the Natives; for instead of having one purchaser, as under the Treaty, they will have the whole public of New Zealand – of the whole world, in fact – as the purchasers of their land.<sup>1041</sup>

In making these comments, Ballance appears to have suggested that the Treaty guaranteed Māori no more than ownership of land, and that Māori interests were served so long as they could retain possession of a portion of what they owned, while selling the rest at fair prices. Even that was more than Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had so far agreed to – they had not yet agreed to consider the possibility of settlement and had made clear they would not do so until the Crown honoured its side of the Kihikihi agreement.

Ballance and Stout both made clear that the Government was walking a fine line in its attempts to persuade Māori leaders (in this district and elsewhere) to open their remaining lands. As Stout explained, the Crown had at least to be seen to be dealing fairly with Māori, Stout told the House, because if Māori perceived otherwise they would not place their lands before the Court, and if they did not place their lands before the Court there would be no possibility of obtaining land for settlement.<sup>1042</sup> Ballance, likewise, emphasised the importance of winning Māori trust and confidence. Maori in the restriction zone, he said, were ‘hostile to the Government . . . had never accepted our institutions, . . . [and] had rejected the rule of every Government that had been in office’:

When the Natives are disturbed about any question, when they feel a want of confidence, when they feel that their land is slipping away from under their feet, you cannot induce them to take advantage of our institutions or come under our laws. You can only do that by establishing among them a feeling of confidence in the justice and equity of our Government. This is the only way in which the Natives can be made to accept our institutions.<sup>1043</sup>

8.9.1.3.3 DEBATE ON THE ROLE OF NATIVE COMMITTEES

If the Bill’s land purchasing provisions were not what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had expected, nor were the Government’s provisions for land title determination. As noted in section 8.9.3, nothing in the Bill expanded the powers of native committees to make them a court of first instance with respect to land title determination, or to provide for the ‘great powers of self-government’ that Ballance had promised to Tāwhiao. While the House was debating the Native Land Disposition Bill, the Government also introduced the Native Land Court Consolidation Bill, which brought together several existing Acts relating to Māori land titles. If the Government had any intention of empowering district native committees to 1041. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 396; doc A67, pp 75–76; doc A41, pp 190–191.

---

1042. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 408–409; doc A68, pp 27–28.

1043. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 5 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 515–520; doc A68, pp 29–30.

inquire into title, this Bill presented an obvious opportunity. But, instead, it did little more than consolidate existing law.<sup>1044</sup>

During debates in the House, Ministers gave no reason for their failure to keep this promise. Stout claimed that it had never been made. The committees, he said, already had ‘enormous powers’, which provided for ‘a form of local self-government’, and Ballance had simply encouraged Māori to take up the opportunities already provided under the law.<sup>1045</sup> This was manifestly untrue, and the former Native Minister John Bryce was scathing in response. Bryce regarded it as ‘absurd’ and ‘perfectly futile’ that Stout characterised native committees as providing for local self-government, arguing that they were ‘never intended to be anything of the kind.’<sup>1046</sup> Rather, Bryce said, the committees had been established as a form of court, and a minor one at that, intended to act as ‘arbitrators’ when Māori had ‘a quarrel or complaint’. While they had powers to hold inquiries into land ownership among ‘other things’, these powers were negligible. The committees could not determine titles, and nor was the Court required to take their advice. Their land title determination powers were no greater than if they ‘were not mentioned in the Act at all.’<sup>1047</sup> This, precisely, was the point that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had expected the Government to address; instead, it did nothing.

8.9.1.3.4 RATING OF MĀORI LAND

During debate on the Bill, opposition members of the House of Representatives also criticised Ballance over his recorded promise that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land would not be subject to rates until the land was sold, leased or brought into cultivation. Stout noted that Te Rohe Pōtae was already exempted from rates – the previous Government’s Crown and Native Land Rating Act 1882 provided that no rates could be levied on land in the East Taupo, West Taupo, and Kawhia counties. He claimed that Ballance had simply promised to retain existing law and said that for this reason no letter had been written to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori confirming the promise.<sup>1048</sup>

8.9.1.4 The Native Affairs Committee considers the Bill, August 1885

Wahanui appeared in August before the House of Representatives’ Native Affairs Committee. There, he argued that he simply sought ‘the authority of administering my own land’; the Crown, in his view, was attempting to take both land and authority. Wahanui asked: ‘Why should our land be taken from us, or why should our authority over that land be held back?’<sup>1049</sup>

1044. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 392.

1045. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 408–409; doc A68, pp 29–30; see also doc A78, pp 1168–1170.

1046. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 411; doc A78, p 1168.

1047. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 411; doc A78, p 1168.

1048. ‘Native Land Disposition Bill’, 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, p 408.

1049. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 5. Wahanui’s evidence is also described in document A67, pp 86, 91, 94–95, 101–103, 107–108, 114.

Wahanui advocated for a land administration system that was similar to what Ballance was proposing, except that the key roles (in land title determination and land administration) would be carried out by Māori, not by the Crown or its appointees. He favoured hapū, acting through elected committees, making decisions about land use and alienation. But he wanted the Kawhia Native Committee to administer land transactions in accordance with owners' wishes. The committee, he said, should have 'the whole administration of the land' – in essence, empowering it to carry out the functions that Ballance had envisaged for Crown-controlled boards or commissioners. He also wanted the Kawhia Native Committee to 'have the power to sell to the highest bidder'. He objected to the Crown having any right to bypass the committee and buy directly from owners. Furthermore, he wanted owners to have a right to veto the Kawhia Native Committee's decisions, thereby leaving final say over land in the hands of hapū.<sup>1050</sup> Asked if he understood that the Bill would have no effect until title had been awarded by the Native Land Court, Wahanui said he did understand but did not agree: 'I will not consent to hand over my land to the Native Land Court at present. I have heard of the cries that have been brought up on all sides during the past year on account of the action of the Native Land Court.'

One 'of the theories' about land titles was that they would be carried out by the Kawhia Native Committee, and that was 'feasible', he said – without making clear what the other 'theories' might be: 'What I say is, that the Committee should have power—full power—to deal with the land in any case. That is only my own opinion.'<sup>1051</sup> He repeated several times that he would not consent to the court.<sup>1052</sup>

Wahanui – like Taonui before him – now appeared to be returning to his pre-Kihikihi position that the court would not be allowed into the district at all, and Māori would instead determine iwi and hapū title among themselves, either through the Kawhia Native Committee or by some other means. Māori communities would then retain full control over their lands; hapū would make all decisions about land use, but the Kawhia Native Committee would manage transactions on their behalf; all transactions would take place in an open market.

The Napier member of the House of Representatives, John Ormond, then asked Wahanui a series of questions about settlement of the district. Did Wahanui believe that the Bill would open the railway area for settlement? Would the area be opened more quickly if the Government purchased directly from Māori? Were Māori willing to assist settlement and advance the colony's prosperity by selling land?<sup>1053</sup> In response, Wahanui said Te Rohe Pōtae Māori supported the goal of bringing prosperity to the colony and had done their part by giving land for the

---

1050. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, pp 5-7, 9-13.

1051. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 9.

1052. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, pp 8-10.

1053. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

railway corridor without asking for any payment. They now wanted to know what they would get in return.<sup>1054</sup>

When pressed on whether Māori would be willing to sell or lease land, or both, Wahanui said owners might be willing to do either, but he could not speak for them, and in any case now was not the time to consider land transactions. Owners first wanted a satisfactory law ‘before they take one step or another’. They wanted, in other words, to be ‘first assured that they shall have authority – full authority – over their land.’<sup>1055</sup> This was the first time that Wahanui had spoken about the possibility of selling land. As already discussed, in the 1883 petition Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought a permanent ban on sales, and in more recent negotiations they had either expressed their preference for leasing or refused to discuss the matter until agreement was reached on satisfactory laws. While sales now appeared to be a possibility if hapū wished, the precondition remained – satisfactory laws had to be in place. This was consistent not only with the petition, but with Wahanui’s 1884 comments to the railway committee that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders expected satisfactory laws in exchange for their cooperation with the Government’s plans.<sup>1056</sup> When Ormond told Wahanui that the railway was being built for the specific purpose of opening Te Rohe Pōtae lands for settlement, Wahanui said this was the first he had heard of it:

I did not know that the railway was to be made with the object or with the understanding that the land was to be settled on each side. I thought it was to connect two places, so far as to enable people to come from one end of the Island to the other. I have now heard for the first time that there is another object in view, and that the Europeans look on the land on each side of the railway as having become their own.<sup>1057</sup>

Nor did he accept Ormond’s view that that the railway would bring ‘enormous value’ to the district’s lands, and that therefore the district’s Māori should ‘assist in the disposal of their land’. He said he did not know that the railway would increase land values, and said he needed to ‘laugh a while’ at the idea that Māori landowners were in some way obliged to sell their lands for settlement.<sup>1058</sup> Then he added: ‘If the railway is being made for the benefit of the Maoris, it is better to stop it.’<sup>1059</sup> This, too, was consistent with the 1883 petition, in which Te Rohe Pōtae lead-

1054. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

1055. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

1056. ‘Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider and report on the best route for the North Island Trunk Railway’, AJHR, 1884, 1-6, p 16; doc A78, p 1069; doc A41, p 149.

1057. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

1058. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

1059. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, together with minutes of Evidence and Appendix’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

ers had made it clear that they had no interest in a railway if it became the means to deprive them of their lands.

Other Māori who appeared before the committee gave evidence similar to Wahanui's. They felt that the Bill gave too much power to the government and was not consistent with the promises that Ballance had made during his tour. The former chief judge of the Native Land Court, Francis Fenton, agreed that the Bill gave the Government almost complete power over land titles and dealing in Māori lands, and would not be acceptable to Māori.<sup>1060</sup> Māori witnesses also argued that questions of land administration should not be considered until problems with land titles and the Native Land Court had been addressed. And they asked for amendments to provide that all hapū members must consent before hapū lands were leased or sold.<sup>1061</sup> The member of the House of Representatives for Eastern Maori, Wi Pere, proposed a series of amendments designed to strengthen owners' control over their own lands and remove the development costs that Ballance proposed to deduct. Ballance also proposed a series of amendments, one of which removed native committees altogether, instead providing that the board of management would comprise three Crown appointees (two of them Māori) and one temporary member elected by the hapū whose land was being dealt with.<sup>1062</sup>

In the face of concerted criticism from Māori and some European witnesses (such as Fenton), and from opposition members of the House of Representatives, the committee recommended that the Bill not proceed during 1885.<sup>1063</sup>

8.9.1.5 The Government commits to large-scale land purchasing, August 1885

While the Bill remained before the select committee, the Government faced another no confidence vote. The main issue was the Government's financial policy and in particular its spending on public works. But the no confidence motion also criticised the Government for having 'failed to make arrangements' to acquire land for settlement along the line and called for all work to cease until the Government had obtained 500,000 acres:

That one of the principal objects of the construction of the North Island Trunk Railway being to open the interior of the North Island for settlement, and seeing that the Government has failed to make arrangements for securing the land necessary for this purpose, no further expenditure should be incurred beyond the present contracts

---

1060. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p30.

1061. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, pp 1-2, 14-15, 16, 56.

1062. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, pp 61-74.

1063. 'Native Affairs Committee: Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, title sheet.

and for the completion of the working surveys until satisfactory arrangements have been made for the acquisition of not less than 500,000 acres of land for settlement.<sup>1064</sup>

The Government also faced continued criticism in the settler press for its failure to 'open up' Te Rohe Pōtae and rapidly push ahead with settlement.<sup>1065</sup> One newspaper commentator savaged Ballance for his Kihikihi promises:

To promise . . . that the Maoris might reap all the benefits in the shape of increment of land value arising from the construction of the railway . . . was to commit the Government to a pledge which future Governments cannot possibly fulfil, and which neither Parliament nor the country can endorse. It is both idle and dangerous to stuff the Natives with such sugar-plums as these.<sup>1066</sup>

In the face of opposition, media and settler pressure, Ballance announced on 28 August that the Government now intended to purchase large areas of Māori land in the railway area.<sup>1067</sup> He said that he recognised as much as any member of the House of Representatives 'that we are called upon to provide for settlement of population' along the railway line. But the Government had been in office for only a year, he said, and could not have done more than it had done.<sup>1068</sup>

As he had in July, he explained that settlement could only occur once title had been determined. It had therefore been necessary to establish 'a feeling of confidence' among Māori along the railway route so they would be willing to place their lands before the court.<sup>1069</sup> That, he said, was now occurring. He had received applications from Taupō Māori for survey and title determination for 450,000 acres, and from Whanganui Māori for survey and title determination for 1.2 million acres. Ballance did not say precisely which land blocks he was referring to; as discussed in section 8.9.2, applications were received later in the year for the Tauponuiatia and Waimarino blocks.<sup>1070</sup> Ballance also said that the Crown had already negotiated the purchase of a 63,000-acre block along the railway line and had purchased and surveyed a 30,000-acre block, which would in six months

1064. 'The Want-of-Confidence Motion', Evening Post, 27 August 1885, p 2; doc A90, p 53; 'Want of Confidence', 27 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, p 269.

1065. See, for example, 'Native Lands Disposition Bill', Poverty Bay Herald, 10 August 1885, p 3; doc A68, p 34.

1066. 'Native Lands Disposition Bill', Poverty Bay Herald, 10 August 1885, p 3; doc A68, p 34.

1067. 'Want of Confidence', 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–356; doc A90, pp 54–56, 69–71; doc A68, pp 31–32, 210–211; doc A41, p 170 n; doc A78, pp 1183–1187; doc A146, pp 54–55.

1068. 'Want of Confidence', 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–356.

1069. 'Want of Confidence', 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–356.

1070. Document A79, pp 79–82.

be settled by small farmers on hundred-acre blocks.<sup>1071</sup> There is no evidence that these purchases were in this inquiry district.<sup>1072</sup>

'My idea is this,' he told the House, 'that before the railway is completed . . . we ought to have acquired along that line of railway nearly two million acres for the purpose of settlement. But if Māori were told of these land purchasing ambitions, or believed they were being treated unfairly, they would become suspicious and would refuse to bring any land before the court or offer any for sale.'<sup>1073</sup> Presented this way, fair treatment – or at least the appearance of it – was not an end in itself, but a land purchasing tactic. Ballance had told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that the Government wanted settlement, but he had also given assurances that the Crown did not intend to purchase large areas and would be content for land to be made available by leasing and for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to make their own decisions about settlement.

In turn, the consistent position of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders had been that settlement would not be discussed until the boundary was protected and satisfactory laws were enacted. They had given their consent for the railway on the basis of those conditions. Now, having won their consent for the railway, and in the face of pressure from settlers, Ballance was setting their conditions and his own assurances aside.

In fact, the Crown was already taking steps to begin purchasing along the railway line as soon as land was titled. As noted earlier, in January it had appointed a purchasing officer for Wanganui. In its financial statement to the House, delivered in June, the Government confirmed plans to borrow £1 million to complete the railway and other works needed for settlement. Of that money, £100,000 was to be used for purchasing of Māori lands during the 1886–87 financial year.<sup>1074</sup>

Through the trig and boundary surveys, the Government had also acquired extensive knowledge about Te Rohe Pōtae lands and their potential for settlement. In August 1885, the surveyor Laurence Cussen presented an extensive report about the 'general character' of the lands in the 'Rohe Potae block', including a map dividing the district into first class 'good agricultural land', second class 'pastoral' land, and third class 'very broken or poor country'. He gave details, furthermore, of topography, vegetation, soil types, climate, and proximity to the railway, and 1071. 'Want of Confidence', 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–355 (doc A90, pp 69–71).

1072. The Crown's return of lands purchased from Māori in the year to 31 March 1885 show no Crown purchases either completed or under way in the inquiry district: 'Lands Purchased and Leased from Natives in the North Island', 31 March 1885, AJHR, 1885, C-7. Nor had any applications for title been filed from within the inquiry district, other than the five tribes' 1883 application. Ballance may have been referring to the Waimarino and Taupouiatia applications, which were filed later in 1885: doc A79, pp 77–82.

1073. 'Want of Confidence', 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–355; doc A90, pp 54–56, 69–71; pp 54–56; doc A68, pp 31–32, 210–211; doc A41, p 170 n; doc A78, pp 1183–1187; doc A146, pp 54–55.

1074. 'Financial Statement', 19 June 1885, AJHR, 1885, B-1, p xvii; doc A68, p 202. Earlier, Vogel had told Ballance the railway would cost £1.5 million: doc A41, p 184.

also reported on the locations of coal deposits and limestone formations.<sup>1075</sup> He had been explicitly instructed to gather this information,<sup>1076</sup> and his report later guided the Crown's initial land purchasing priorities.<sup>1077</sup>

8.9.1.6 *The Government's handling of the Joshua Jones lease

The Government's increasing determination to break the aukati and open Te Rohe Pōtae for settlement was reflected in its handling of the so-called Jones lease during 1885. Since 1882, an Australian settler, Joshua Jones, had entered into an agreement to lease timber and mineral rights on part of the Mokau-Mohakatino block. However, Jones's relationship with Mokau Māori quickly soured after he claimed that the lease also gave him rights to land and applied to the whole block.<sup>1078</sup>

As discussed in section 8.7.2, the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884 prohibited private land dealings within a 4.5 million-acre area surrounding the railway. Jones lobbied the Government, claiming the Act had prevented him from completing his lease negotiations and had therefore left him out of pocket.<sup>1079</sup> The Government responded in September 1885 by enacting the Special Powers and Contracts Act, which included a special provision giving Jones the legal right to complete his lease negotiations. Mōkau leaders were not consulted before the Act was passed.<sup>1080</sup> Ballance explained the Government's support for Jones as being due to the contribution he was making towards 'opening up the aukati'.<sup>1081</sup>

The Mokau-Mohakatino lands he claimed to have rights over lay within the 1883 petition area, which the Crown had agreed to survey. The Government had already breached the terms of the December 1883 agreement by refusing to include the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi blocks in its survey of the Te Rohe Pōtae boundary. By supporting Jones's disputed claim to have rights in lands within the aukati, it was further demonstrating its lack of respect for the district's boundary. Further details of the Jones lease will be discussed in more detail in chapter 11.

8.9.2 *The end of the aukati

The Government's failure to deliver on Ballance's promises, its rejection of Tāwhiao's petition, and its new commitment to settlement and land purchasing in the railway area all caused considerable frustration to Māori leaders in Te Rohe Pōtae and elsewhere. Having consented to the railway and offered the land for 1075. 'Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the Year 1884-1885', AJHR, 1885, C-1A, app 3, p 21; doc A67, p 125.

---

1076. He began his report with: 'In compliance with your instructions, I have the honour to report on the general character of the land in the King Country over which my survey extends'. The report was to the House of Representatives, but the instruction may have been from the Surveyor-General, or the Minister of Lands: 'Report on the Surveys of New Zealand for the Year 1884-1885', AJHR, 1885, C-1A, app 3, p 21 (doc A67, p 125).

1077. Document A41, pp 112-113; doc A67, pp 196-198.

1078. Document A28, pp 327-328.

1079. Document A28, pp 328, 339-340.

1080. Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885, sch 1, cl 17; doc A28, pp 339-343.

1081. Document A28, p 340.

free, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had now lost their bargaining chip, only to find that the Crown wanted more than it had already been given. The very thing that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought to avoid by engaging with the Crown – the loss of their land – now seemed to have become a very real possibility.

The leaders and people of the five tribes found different ways of responding. Some communities turned back to the Kīngitanga or to the Parihaka prophet Te Whiti o Rongomai, rejecting all engagement with the Crown and its institutions, in the hope that a show of resistance would keep the forces of colonisation at bay.<sup>1082</sup> The leaders of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and some leaders from northern Whanganui, decided they had no option but to turn to the court to secure title to their lands. Other Whanganui leaders, along with the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Hikairo, remained on their former course, apparently reasoning that the only means by which they could now secure their land and authority was to honour the Kihikihi agreement and hope the Crown could be persuaded to do so the same. The Kawhia Native Committee attempted to manage the district's affairs as well as it could without real powers, and this included offering significant assistance to the Government's railway construction efforts.

At the end of the year, with the boundary survey almost complete, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders offered to pay the £1,600 they owed for the boundary survey. They then made the decision to lift the aukati, providing both tangible and symbolic proof that they were honouring the agreements they had made with the Crown.

8.9.2.1 Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Waimarino Native Land Court applications, October–December 1885

Late in August, while Parliament was debating the Government's proposed new Māori land laws, Tāwhiao received the British Government's response to his petition. As described earlier, it explained that Britain no longer accepted any responsibility for Māori affairs and was leaving all decisions to the Government in New Zealand.<sup>1083</sup>

Early the following month, a major Kīngitanga hui was held at Poutū (to the south of Tūrangi). According to Marr, between 1,000 and 1,200 people attended; most were from Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Whanganui iwi, and sections of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa that bordered the Taupō district. Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi Maniapoto, and Hone Te One were all absent, as was Tāwhiao.<sup>1084</sup> Hitiri Te Paerata attended, as did Te Herekieke and Matuaahu Te Wharerangi, and the Ngāti Tūwharetoa ariki Horonuku Te Heuheu. The only named Ngāti Maniapoto representative was called Ngatau.<sup>1085</sup>

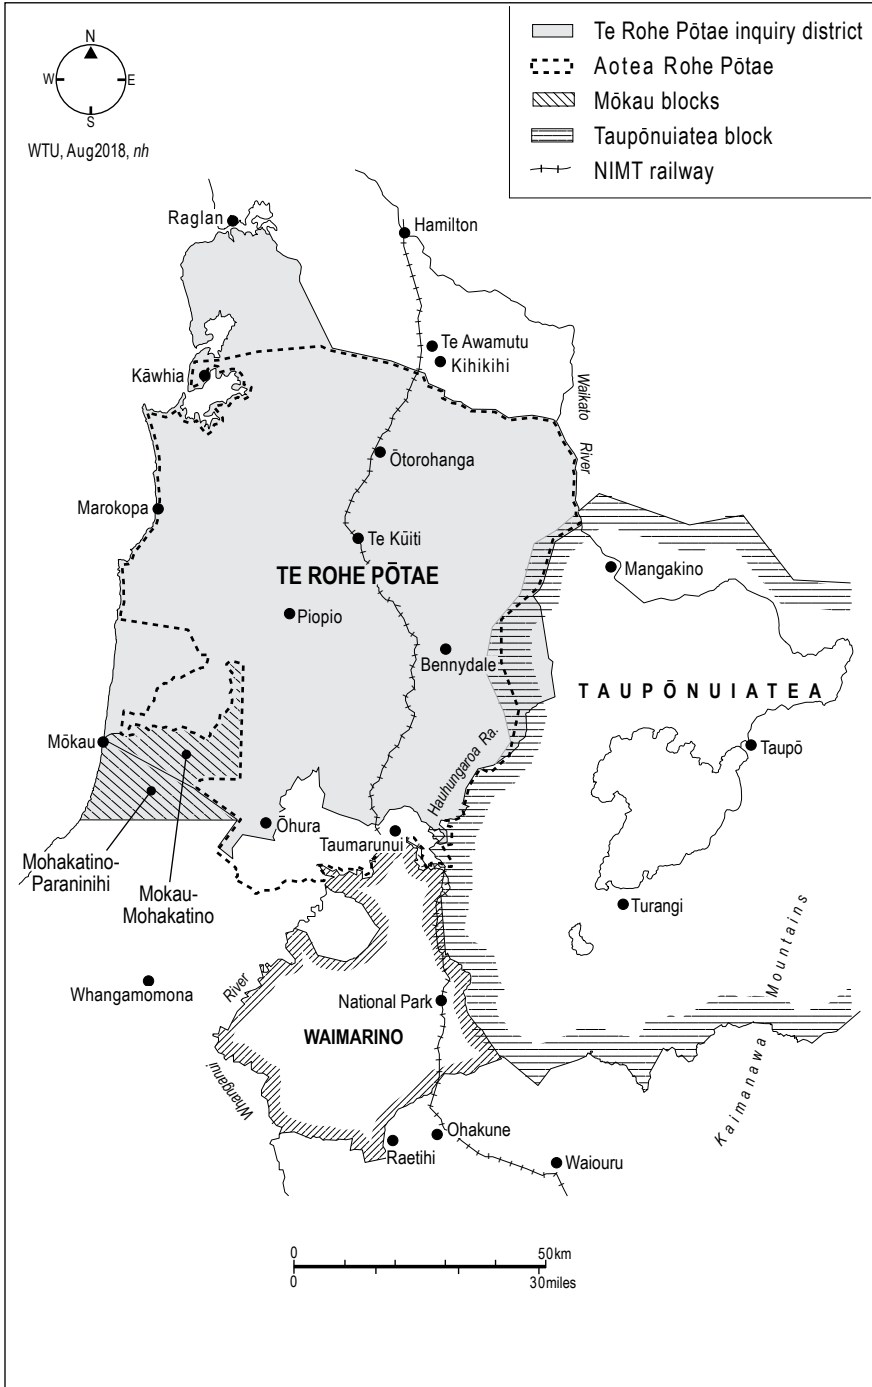

As with so many other hui during this period, the Poutū hui was concerned with questions about land and authority, in particular questions about how to protect lands from the court, how to protect the integrity of tribal rohe, whether

1082. Document A78, pp 1196–1197.

1083. Document A78, p 1197.

1084. Document A78, pp 1199–1200.

1085. 'Native Meeting, Poutu, Taupo', AJHR, 1886, G-3, pp 3–5.

Map 8.3: Tauponuiatia and Waimarino blocks with Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district to support the petition area boundary, and whether and how to engage with the Crown. According to Bruce Stirling, the hui reflected the ‘failure of the Rohe Pōtae’s moderate strategy’ to win meaningful concessions from the Government, which led to a resurgence in support for the Kīngitanga.<sup>1086</sup>

The hui passed resolutions acknowledging Tāwhiao as King of all Maori; acknowledging the Queen’s authority but not that of the colonial government; rejecting the Native Land Court; opposing all land sales, leases, and surveys; calling for native committees established under Tāwhiao’s authority to manage local affairs.<sup>1087</sup> Those attending resolved not to actively obstruct the railway, but determined that they would charge high prices for any materials used, and would not provide any labour.<sup>1088</sup>

The Crown regarded the resolutions, and the resurgent Kīngitanga, as threats to its settlement plans – particularly those concerning Whanganui and Tūhua lands adjacent to the railway. As the Whanganui Whenua Tribunal noted, the Native Department immediately took steps to encourage Native Land Court applications for Whanganui lands along the railway line and also began to charge expenses to its Waimarino block purchasing account.<sup>1089</sup>

According to some reports, the hui divided Ngāti Tūwharetoa. Although the resolutions were passed by a great majority, some sections of the tribe opposed them, and Te Heuheu resented what he regarded as the Kīngitanga’s unwarranted interference in tribal matters. As discussed, he had previously expressed concern about the petition area boundary dividing Ngāti Tūwharetoa territories, and that, too, was discussed at Poutū. Speaking at the hui, Te Heuheu likened the Ngāti Tūwharetoa rohe to ‘a kiwi’s egg lying before me’, which was ‘not yet broken’, and which he now wished to see hatched. Even if a portion was ‘rotten or sold’, the egg remained: ‘It matters not about the disputed boundary of Ngatimaniapoto, and they should shift your boundary. Listen! This is the day my egg shall be hatched’. The clear inference was that the Ngāti Tūwharetoa rohe was one whole which could not be broken by the five tribes boundary, the Kīngitanga, any rival land claims, or even by sales or leases which could take part of the land but not the rohe itself.<sup>1090</sup>

In his speech, Te Heuheu said he was with Matuaahu. As discussed in section 8.5, claimants told us that Matuaahu had supported Wahanui’s negotiations with the Crown,<sup>1091</sup> though we do not have specific evidence of his attendance at the 1883 or 1885 hui at which key agreements were reached. At Poutū, Matuaahu said there had been ‘difficulty’ between Te Heuheu and himself, which he wanted to resolve. He had placed his troubles before Hori Tohipa (Tāwhiao’s advisor). ‘I have little to say re “Rohe-potae.” I did not make it, others did . . . I am not anxious to

---

1086. Document A53, vol 2, p 862.

1087. Document A78, pp 1201–1204.

1088. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 561.

1089. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 561; see also pp 687–588; doc A53, vol 2, pp 894–895.

1090. ‘Native Meeting, Poutu, Taupo’, AJHR, 1886, G-3, pp 3–5. (doc A78, pp 1202, 1205).

1091. Document J22, paras 88–89.

seek support from Europeans.<sup>1092</sup> According to one report of the hui, Te Heuheu, Te Herekieke, and Hitiri Te Paerata were all among those who signed the resolutions recognising Tāwhiao as King. But Te Heuheu also spoke against Tāwhiao, saying he had broken from Tūwharetoa, Raukawa, and Maniapoto by travelling to England without consulting them.<sup>1093</sup>

Soon after the hui, Ngāti Tūwharetoa took steps to secure its position against the perceived threats to their lands. On 31 October 1885, Te Heuheu and other Ngāti Tūwharetoa leaders lodged an application to the Native Land Court for title to the Taupouiatia block. This covered an area exceeding two million acres, including a large area in the east overlapping the 1883 petition area (see map 8.3).<sup>1094</sup> Other Tribunals have considered the events leading to this application, and have concluded that the principal motivation for Ngāti Tūwharetoa leaders was to assert mana over their tribal territories, protecting those territories from rival claims.<sup>1095</sup> Stirling, in this inquiry, drew a similar conclusion, noting that Te Heuheu appeared to see the application as being for definition of a boundary within which Ngāti Tūwharetoa hapū could retain control of their lands.<sup>1096</sup>

But other Tribunals have also concluded that the Crown influenced Te Heuheu's decision to lodge the claim. As the National Park Tribunal noted, the Crown had done little since 1883 to dispel Te Heuheu's fears that Ngāti Maniapoto might lay claim to Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands; it instead encouraged Ngāti Tūwharetoa to resolve any concerns by taking the matter to court.<sup>1097</sup> Furthermore, Te Heuheu's decision to apply for title for the entire Taupouiatia block was made on advice from his son-in-law, Lawrence Grace, who was the member of the House of Representatives for Tauranga and had traveled from Wellington to Taupō towards the end of the parliamentary session expressly for this purpose. Grace had discussed the application with Ballance in Wellington, and he also corresponded extensively with Ballance after his arrival in Taupō. It was Grace who informed Ballance by telegram on 31 October that Te Heuheu had agreed to file the application.<sup>1098</sup> Grace's brother, William, later wrote that the Government had encouraged the application because it was 'dissatisfied with the conduct of Maniapoto over their Rohepotae.'<sup>1099</sup> It is not clear what Wahanui had done to displease the Government, other than remind it of Ballance's promises at Kihikihi.

Ballance himself said that he had encouraged the application. Speaking at a hui at Aramoho (Whanganui) in April 1886, he said:

1092. 'Native Meeting, Poutu, Taupo', 23 September 1885, AJHR, 1886, G-3, p 4.

1093. 'Native Meeting, Poutu, Taupo', 23 September 1885, AJHR, 1886, G-3, p 5.

1094. Document A79, pp 68, 79.

1095. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 206, 225, 240, 287, 289; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 330; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, s 8.2.

1096. Document A53, vol 2, pp 887–888.

1097. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 233–236, 340; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 330, vol 2, p 476. The timing of Grace's visit to Taupō is discussed in doc A78, p 1219.

1098. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 233–236, 340; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 330, vol 2, p 476; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 127.

1099. Document A35, p 66.

Now, let me explain why the Court sat at all at Taupo. I found that Tawhiao was bringing his influence to bear in order to get the chiefs and the people of Taupo to sign a memorial handing over the whole of their lands to him. I told Wahanui at Alexandra that I considered that an improper action on the part of Tawhiao, and on the part of the people themselves, and my reason was this; that I preferred the people themselves should have the title to their lands rather than Tawhiao should have the mana over it. I saw an effort and indication on the part of Tawhiao to become possessed of all the lands on the island, and I felt certain that was wrong, and that it was the duty of the Government to resist Tawhiao to the very utmost. That is one of the principal reasons why the Court sat at Taupo at the time it did.<sup>1100</sup>

Here, Ballance was quite clearly admitting that he had influenced the court process, though he did not specify whether this was by encouraging the application, or by advancing it when others had been held back, or both. He was also admitting to doing exactly what he accused Tāwhiao of doing – denying the right of Ngāti Tūwharetoa communities to exercise mana over their land, in this case by deciding who should take on the responsibility of protecting it.

The Tauponuiatia application marked the end of Ngāti Tūwharetoa involvement in the ‘five tribes’ which had been negotiating for Crown recognition of their right to mana whakahaere. As previously discussed, Te Heuheu had not supported these negotiations but several other senior Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira had, including Te Herekieke and Matuaahu Te Wharerangi. According to the Ngāti Tūwharetoa claimant Napa Ōtimi, theirs were the second and third signatures on the tribe’s Native Land Court application, making it clear that those rangatira no longer saw themselves as supporting the June 1883 boundary.<sup>1101</sup> The former Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae tribes Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, and various iwi of northern Whanganui were now being forced into the role of competing claimants.<sup>1102</sup> Hitiri Te Paerata later explained his frustration at hearing of the application:

I thought the tribal boundary, i.e., the Rohe Potae, was sufficient for Te Heu Heu and all chiefs and myself, consented thinking it was sufficient. I thought that we the hapu would arrange sub-division. I also thought that considering we were friends to support him and I was supporting him, owing to our ancestral relations. We were one body, one mind, one tribe. This day I find he wants to sub-divide the land. Whilst listening to this I thought his proposal was a robbery.<sup>1103</sup>

When the hearings began at Taupō on 14 January, Rewi Maniapoto attended, along with Te Rangianini and several other Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira: Aporo

---

1100. ‘Important Native Meeting at Aramoho’, Wanganui Herald, 27 March 1886, p 2 (doc A53, vol 2, p 895).

1101. Document J22, para 94.

1102. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 130.

1103. Document A53, vol 2, p 888.

Taratutu, Pineaha Tawhaki, Te Hihi, Tupu Kaheke, Hone Kutu and others. Some Whanganui rangatira were also present,<sup>1104</sup> as was Hitiri Te Paerata of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>1105</sup> Taonui was initially unable to attend because he was required at another court hearing at Cambridge.<sup>1106</sup>

The tribes called for an early adjournment so they could discuss matters among themselves. During this adjournment Rewi Maniapoto urged Te Heuheu to withdraw the application so that Wahanui could complete his negotiations and one hearing could be held for the whole of Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>1107</sup> Te Heuheu refused, but he did accept Rewi's request for the Ngāti Tūwharetoa claim boundaries to be moved so as not to encroach on Ngāti Maniapoto lands. The boundaries were subsequently moved, and Ngāti Maniapoto leaders professed themselves mostly satisfied with some exceptions, principally concerning lands immediately north of Pureora, and those in the south between Waimiha and Ketemaringi. The contested lands were included in the Taupouiatia block, creating an ongoing source of grievance for Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa (see chapter 10).<sup>1108</sup>

When Taonui arrived at Taupō on January 18, he held an extended meeting with Te Heuheu, asking him to defer the application. Ngāti Maniapoto, Taonui said, was merely trying to get a law passed to save both people and land, and wanted the tribes to 'all be one people.'<sup>1109</sup> Te Heuheu refused: 'Your boundary splits me in two . . . What about the half of me that is left outside? Who is to save that part. No, I prefer my people to die together as a whole. If you object to my Court going on, state your objection to the Court. We will meet there.'<sup>1110</sup>

When Taonui appeared in court, he asked that the Maraeroa, Hurakia, and Tūhua lands be excluded from the hearing so the tribes (Maniapoto, Tūwharetoa, and Raukawa) could resolve matters among themselves. The judges said he was too late.<sup>1111</sup> Wahanui and other Ngāti Maniapoto leaders later argued that, by accepting the Ngāti Tūwharetoa application, the Crown had broken the terms of Bryce's 1883 agreement with them. During the remainder of the decade they made numerous protests on this matter.<sup>1112</sup>

Other Tribunals have found that, although the Government clearly had some influence on the Ngāti Tūwharetoa decision to apply to the court for title, Te Heuheu made the decision himself. The National Park Tribunal also cast doubt on whether Grace could be regarded as a government agent in his dealings with 1104. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 130.

1105. Document A53, vol 2, p 888.

1106. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 130–131.

1107. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 130.

1108. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 130.

1109. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 130–131.

1110. Mitchell to Native Minister, 15 May 1886 (doc A53, vol 2, pp 915–916).

1111. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 141–142.

1112. For full accounts of Ngāti Maniapoto attempts to address their concerns about the border between the Aotea and Taupouiatia blocks, and about the Government's failure to respect the 1883 boundary, see Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, ch 8; doc A53, vol 2, sections 5.5–5.13; see also doc A78, p 1261.

Te Heuheu, even though he appeared to be taking instructions from and reporting to Ballance. Furthermore, the Central North Island Tribunal found that Wahanui could have done more to communicate with leaders of Ngāti Tūwharetoa and ensure they understood his purposes.<sup>1113</sup>

If the Crown did not manipulate Ngāti Tūwharetoa, the National Park and Central North Island Tribunals found that it did manipulate the court and its process. Between 1883 and 1885 it intervened to prevent the court from hearing applications within the petition area boundary; this suited its ends while it was negotiating with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over the railway. In Ngāti Tūwharetoa territories alone, 108 applications were held back for a short time. Now, presented with a large application that crossed the boundary and served the Crown's newly adopted land purchasing goals by threatening to break Te Rohe Pōtae open, the Crown allowed the case to proceed with haste.<sup>1114</sup>

The Tribunal in its National Park and Central North Island reports found that the application could have been avoided, and the petition area boundary thereby preserved, if the Crown had enacted laws to allow Māori to determine title among themselves. It was reasonable, they concluded, for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to want to do this, and it was entirely possible for the Government to give native committees the necessary powers.<sup>1115</sup> Once the Tauponuiatia application had been filed with the court, other tribes had no real choice but to follow suit if they wanted to protect their interests in their own tribal lands.<sup>1116</sup> By the end of December, a large area of upper Whanganui and Tūhua land was also before the court.<sup>1117</sup>

The Waimarino application, made by three Whanganui rangatira (including Toakohuru Tāwhirimatea) with assistance from the Crown's purchasing agents, covered a 490,000-acre area stretching from Taumarunui south to Owhango.<sup>1118</sup> As with the Tauponuiatia application, the Waimarino application overlapped the Te Rohe Pōtae external boundary, taking in some 88,000 acres of Tūhua land. This became the subject of a long-running grievance, after some Tūhua rangatira (mostly affiliated with Ngāti Hāua) were either excluded from or chose to stay away from the hearings, believing their lands to be protected by the 1883 boundary agreement.<sup>1119</sup>

1113. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 225–226, 234, 330, 332; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 327–328, 332–333.

1114. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 330–331; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 240.

1115. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 330–331; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 231–232, 291.

1116. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 332; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 291.

1117. Document A50, pp 256–258; doc A79, pp 82–83; doc A78, pp 1249–1251.

1118. Document A50, pp 256–258; doc A79, pp 82–83; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, pp 587–588, 562.

1119. Document A50, pp 256–258, 299–303; doc A79, pp 82–83; doc A78, pp 1249–1251; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 648.

8.9.2.2 The Kawhia Native Committee and further meetings with Ballance, November–December 1885

While the Government had been readying itself to buy large areas of land along the railway route, the Kawhia Native Committee had been managing affairs within the district as best it could given its limited powers. In doing so, it appeared to be demonstrating to the Crown that it could manage the land title determination and administrative functions Ballance had promised it.

During its short time in existence, the committee had carried out a wide range of functions. It had used its arbitration powers to resolve disputes. It had advised Wahanui on his dealings with the Government. It had discussed how to manage prospecting activities – according to Marr, Ballance had kept his promise to delegate his powers to grant prospecting licenses to Ormsby, though we do not know exactly when or how this occurred.<sup>1120</sup> The committee had also assisted Government engineers to manage construction of the railway, and negotiated with Government officials over access to (and fees for) timber, gravel, coal, limestone, and other resources, and rents on land used for housing, grazing, and stores.<sup>1121</sup>

The committee collected fees for some of these activities, including land rents, but it held these in trust for the owners. In spite of the broad powers it was exercising – sometimes appearing to exceed what the Native Committees Act 1883 had anticipated – it had very little income of its own. At some point during 1885, Ballance provided for an annual payment £50 to Ormsby, without making it clear whether this was intended as a personal honorarium or to fund the committee's activities. Native Land Court judges at the time were paid £600 per year.<sup>1122</sup>

By the second half of 1885, the trig surveys were close to completion, providing sufficient detail to allow confirmation of title and to support subdivision. As noted in section 8.6.6, the boundary surveys had been substantially completed in 1884, except where the petition area overlapped the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi blocks, which surveyors insisted on excluding because they had already been before the court.<sup>1123</sup>

When Wahanui became aware of the exclusion of these blocks in September 1885 he wrote to Ballance insisting that there was 'but one boundary line from Parininihi to Raukumara' and that Mōkau was included. He said there were other blocks in the petition territory (in Taupō) that had been through the court, but remained within Te Rohe Pōtae (and, by inference, were therefore subject to his demands for Crown recognition of mana whakahaere). Wahanui therefore told Ballance to 'cease this sort of interference . . . lest there be trouble.'<sup>1124</sup> Ballance replied a few days later arguing that Wahanui was under a 'misapprehension', and the surveyors had only adjusted the boundary in order to comply with the court's order over Mohakatino-Parininihi.<sup>1125</sup>

1120. Document A78, pp 1211–1217; doc A79, pp 68, 107–108.

1121. Document A78, pp 1211–1217; doc A79, pp 68, 107–108.

1122. Document A71, p 104; doc A79(e), p 7.

1123. Document A78, pp 989–990, 1211–1212.

1124. Wahanui to Ballance, 25 September 1885 (doc A91, pp 756–757); doc A78, pp 989–990.

1125. Ballance to Wahanui, 3 October 1885 (doc A91, p 759).

Like Bryce, Ballance and Smith appear to have regarded the boundary as being prepared for the purpose of obtaining title to land blocks, whereas the explicit terms of the December 1883 agreement (section 8.5) were that the entire petition area boundary would be surveyed. From Wahanui's point of view, the boundary was not intended to delineate a land block, but to define an area in which Māori authority would prevail. So far as we can determine, the disagreement over the survey was never resolved, and as a result the Crown never fulfilled its commitment to survey the boundary of the 1883 petition area.

Faced with this encroachment on the petition area boundary, and with the Taupouiatia application, the Kawhia Native Committee began to consider how it should approach the task of determining land titles. As had been set out in the 1883 petition, its intention was to first secure title to the petition area (or whatever remained after counter-claims), and then to address hapū subdivision. In addressing these matters, the committee appears to have been proceeding in accordance with its legitimate expectation that the Crown would empower it to determine titles as a court of first instance, even though the Crown had done nothing to fulfil that promise.<sup>1126</sup>

Although the Crown had not respected the petition area boundary, either in its survey or in its handling of competing Native Land Court applications, it did at least appear to be willing to allow the committee a modest role in preparing land title applications for the court within territories that were not affected by the Taupouiatia and Waimarino claims. Late in 1885, it was still forwarding minor land claims to the committee for initial consideration, though the committee declined to address them until the boundary was finalised.<sup>1127</sup>

While the committee was considering its approach to land title determination, Ballance travelled to Kihikihi, arriving on 1 November – the day after he received the telegram informing him of the Taupouiatia application. Notwithstanding their concerns about Taupouiatia and Mohakatino-Parininihi, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori invited him to a major hui at Te Kūiti, where they planned to repay the £1,600 they had raised to pay for the external boundary survey.<sup>1128</sup> It appears that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders intended to show that they were honouring their side of the 1883 and 1885 agreements, and expected the Crown to honour its.

Ballance refused to attend, saying he was indisposed. Instead, he remained in Kihikihi for several days. He also refused to accept the £1,600, saying that the boundary was not yet complete. Some newspapers were sceptical about his claims of illness and suggested that he had other reasons for avoiding a large public gathering of Māori. In Marr's view, having encouraged Ngāti Tūwharetoa to make the Taupouiatia application, he could not now bring himself to attend a celebration of the petition area boundary, which he now knew would never be completed.<sup>1129</sup>

---

1126. Document A78, pp 1213–1217; doc A79, pp 67–68.

1127. Document A78, pp 1211–1212.

1128. Document A78, pp 1219–1220.

1129. Document A78, pp 1222, 1241–1244.

Ballance did receive private visits from individual rangatira, including Wahanui, who discussed, among other things, the railway, surveys, roads, royalties to be charged for timber, and the Native Land Court. Shortly after one of these meetings, the Waikato Times published a report claiming that Wahanui now supported an application to the Native Land Court. Wahanui responded with a vehement denial, in which he would not allow the ‘treacherous’ and ‘evil’ court to deal with his lands.<sup>1130</sup> The reports nonetheless caused concern among the district’s Māori. Soon after the reports appeared, some rangatira from Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Matakore, and Ngāti Hauā passed a resolution to hand their lands to Tāwhiao. At least one of the rangatira involved subsequently pledged his support to Wahanui.<sup>1131</sup>

At its 1 December 1885 meeting, the Kawhia Native Committee debated whether to file an application to the Native Land Court for confirmation of the external boundary, on condition that internal subdivisions be left to the committee; or, alternatively, to resolve iwi and hapū claims first, before applying to the court for confirmation. The committee appears to have regarded itself as having the right to make initial determinations of title (in accordance with Ballance’s Kihikihi assurances) while also acknowledging the legal reality that only the Court could award title. Both Wahanui and Taonui were reported to have been at this meeting.<sup>1132</sup>

The committee decided to pursue the second option, at least for the time being. It was proposed that a hui be called to discuss these issues, and to invite the district’s communities to place their land claims before the committee. If iwi and hapū did not do so, Ormsby said, the committee would be left with no alternative but to take the whole petition area to court. There was general agreement among committee members that no iwi or hapū should act alone. The hui went ahead in April 1886 and will be discussed in section 8.9.3.<sup>1133</sup>

At the same meeting, the committee resolved to approve small numbers of Māori to prospect for gold within its territory, and to ask the Government to provide experienced and trustworthy men to assist. The Government subsequently provided 12 European prospectors who worked in the district alongside 12 Māori. No gold was found and most of the Europeans had left the district by May 1886, though some isolated prospective activities continued under the committee’s oversight for a few years after that.<sup>1134</sup> Marr reported that the 1 December 1885 meeting also made decisions about timber royalties (which had been the subject of a dispute between Māori and contractors); leasing of land for a railway tunnel; land needed for the railway outside the one chain already allocated; compensation for land taken or damaged by public works; coal mining; limestone and gravel charges; establishment of stores and butcheries inside Te Rohe Pōtae; a toll gate at 1130. Document A78, pp 1221–1223.

1131. Document A68, pp 56–57.

1132. ‘The King Country’, Poverty Bay Herald, 7 December 1885, p 2.

1133. Document A79, p 68; see also doc 78, pp 1212–1213.

1134. Document A71, pp 112–114; doc A78, p 1216.

Mangokewa; and a requirement that all buildings erected during railway work be left for subsequent Māori occupation.<sup>1135</sup>

8.9.2.3 The lifting of the aukati, December 1885

By the end of 1885, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had little to show from their negotiations with the Crown. On the positive side, the Kawhia Licensing Area had been established, the Kawhia Native Committee was exercising responsibility for prospecting and resource management within the district, and railway construction had brought new economic opportunities.

But, two years after the December 1883 agreement with Bryce, the external boundary survey had still not been completed. And 10 months on from the Kihikihi hui, the Government was seemingly no closer to enacting laws that provided for mana whakahaere over the land title system or over land administration. Instead, the Government was pressing ahead with a land purchasing agenda and was contributing to pressures that were forcing Te Rohe Pōtae tribes into court.

Amid these difficulties, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders decided to formally lift the aukati. They signalled this by gifting their taiaha, Maungārongo (previously Mahuta), to the Crown. As Ballance had not come to the district as planned in November, the taiaha was instead handed to the Government agent, George Wilkinson, sometime late in the month. Maungārongo held great significance – it was a symbol of authority in the implementation of the aukati. Bryce had earlier asked for the taiaha in 1883, but had been refused, as the tribes were not yet ready to formally open their territory.<sup>1136</sup>

Ballance received the taiaha after returning to Wellington and lodged it in a glass display cabinet at Parliament Buildings for public viewing. The cabinet included an inscription describing the taiaha as ‘the emblem of the aukati’. The taiaha, the inscription read, ‘is celebrated as the emblem of the aukati and signified that the chief holding it had authority to kill any Europeans crossing the forbidden boundary. It was presented to the Government by Wahanui in token of the establishment of peace.’<sup>1137</sup> Ballance was mocked, however, by his political opponents, particularly Sir George Grey, who said he had been the victim of a practical joke.<sup>1138</sup> Though Ballance defended his understanding of the gift and its significance for the Crown’s political relations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, plans to display it in the parliamentary library were dropped. Within a few years, it was on display in the Otago Museum, where it remains today.<sup>1139</sup>

We have heard no wholly persuasive explanation for the decision by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to lift the aukati at this time. Marr suggested that they believed they were entering a new phase in their relationship with the Crown, under which their

---

1135. Document A78, p1215.

1136. Document A78, pp1224–1225.

1137. ‘Taiaha in Library’, 26 May 1886, NZPD, 1886, vol 54, p128 (doc A78, p1226).

1138. Document A78, p1226.

1139. Document A78, pp1227–1231.

boundary had been respected and their authority recognised.<sup>1140</sup> But we find this explanation unconvincing. The boundary survey remained incomplete, and the Crown had recently undermined it by accepting the Taupouiatia application. The Government, furthermore, had conspicuously failed to deliver anything but a fraction of the authority it had promised to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were quite openly unhappy with the Crown's actions at this time.

Other witnesses suggested that the withdrawal of the aukati and the gifting of Maungāorongo were gestures of peace, intended to symbolise the relationship that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought with the Crown. According to the Ngāti Maniapoto researcher Paul Meredith: 'The taiaha was to indicate the final withdrawal of the aukati and that from henceforth no more bloodshed would take place between the Europeans and Ngāti Maniapoto.'<sup>1141</sup> And the Ngāti Maniapoto claimant John Kaati said the gifting of taonga was 'mainly to do with relationships', particularly relationships in which there were reciprocal obligations, and symbolised the existence of an agreement between parties.<sup>1142</sup> Mr Kaati also told us that the change of name, from Mahuta to Maungāorongo, was likely intended to symbolise peace between the Crown and Māori: 'Kia mau tonu te rongō' (Let peace endure).<sup>1143</sup>

By lifting the aukati at this time, Wahanui may have been showing that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were committed to peace with the Crown and settlers, while also reminding Ballance that the relationship involved reciprocal obligations – just as Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were keeping theirs, the Crown should keep its, including its December 1883 commitment to respect the boundary.

With the aukati now lifted, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori waited on the Government to introduce the reforms that had been promised, including reforms to the Court, increased authority for the Kawhia Native Committee, and a new system for enabling the collective authority of Māori land owners through block committees. Ballance circulated drafts of his new Land Disposition Bill and Native Land Court Bills, and held hui at Hastings and Whanganui in early 1886 to discuss the Bills. During these hui, Ballance made further promises to increase Māori self-government.<sup>1144</sup>

8.9.3 The end of Te Rohe Pōtae autonomy

As 1886 dawned, the autonomy that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought through their interactions with the Crown was under considerable threat. The court was preparing to conduct hearings within the petition area; the Crown was stepping up its preparations for land purchasing; any prospect of the Crown granting additional powers to the Kawhia Native Committee was receding; and iwi and hapū leaders were increasingly turning their attention to the question of how to protect their own lands from competing claims.

---

1140. Document A78, pp 1223–1224.

1141. Transcript 4.1.7, p 93.

1142. Transcript 4.1.7, p 150.

1143. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 183–184.

1144. Document A78, pp 1231–1232.

The Taupouiatia claim had effectively ended any Ngāti Tūwharetoa involvement in Te Rohe Pōtae negotiations, and the Waimarino application had split northern Whanganui iwi (some Tūhua leaders did not become aware of it until after hearings). Amid increasing pressure, Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Hikairo attempted to remain unified, and the Kawhia Native Committee continued with its attempts to manage the district's affairs, including hapū land claims. But, by April, the district's leaders were facing the reality that the Native Land Court offered the only means available under the law by which they could secure title to their lands. With considerable reluctance, they filed a claim to the Native Land Court for title to the entire petition area.

The court began hearings in June.<sup>1145</sup> As the court's work got under way, the Kawhia Native Committee fell into a rapid decline. Without any role in considering land title applications, and without any formal authority to represent the district's owners in negotiations over land and resources, it had very little to do. It held its last meeting early in 1887. From 1887, what remained for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders was to negotiate the court process as well as they could, while protesting at the Crown's decision to send the Taupouiatia claim to a hearing and thereby break the 1883 agreement.

8.9.3.1 Further preparations for Crown purchasing, late 1885 to early 1886

As 1885 ended, the Crown was stepping up its preparations for land purchasing in the railway area. New land purchase officers were appointed for the Whanganui and Taupō districts, and for 'the Kihikihi portion of the King Country'. At Taupō and Kihikihi, the role went to William Grace, whose brother Lawrence had advised Te Heuheu on the Taupouiatia Native Land Court application.<sup>1146</sup> Ballance later explained the appointment of more land purchase officers in the restriction zone as a reflection of the 'very great urgency' the Government now accorded its purchasing programme.<sup>1147</sup>

The Evening Post, in a December 1885 editorial, praised Ballance for his 'soothing' manner which had brought the 'fruit to perfection' – a metaphor for Māori lands which were now regarded as ripe for the picking. His support for the Kawhia Native Committee had helped to open up Te Rohe Pōtae, the newspaper said, and Ballance was now concentrating his efforts on encouraging Māori into the Court, knowing that once title was determined 'he can purchase what he wants.'<sup>1148</sup> The editorial described a significant change in Government policy towards Te Rohe Pōtae. Whereas it had previously held back Native Land Court applications and referred them to the Kawhia Native Committee, the Government now confirmed it would allow all applications to go before the Court.

It is not clear whether Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were directly informed of this change. On 9 December, presumably in response to the Taupouiatia application,

1145. Document A79, p111.

1146. Document A67, pp 177–179, 182–183; doc A78, pp 1247–1248.

1147. 'New Zealand Loan Bill', 20 July 1886, NZPD, vol 56, 1886, p 33 (doc A20, pp 90–91).

1148. Editorial, Evening Post, 8 December 1885, p 2; doc A78, pp 1231–1232.

Taonui wrote to Ballance asking that any further court applications affecting the external boundary be refused. The Under-Secretary of the Native Department, T W Lewis, minuted in reply:

I think no notice need be taken of Taonui's letter, but if any reply is sent, I suggest it would be that the government consider the native owners would act wisely bringing their lands into the Native Land Court for adjudication and any applications made will no doubt be [given] effect to.<sup>1149</sup>

As Husbands and Mitchell observed, 'the Crown's need to maintain this political relationship [with the Rohe Pōtae leaders] had been significantly diminished'. It had what it wanted – the railway – and no longer saw a need to maintain goodwill by holding back applications for title.<sup>1150</sup>

In turn, the Crown's approach at this time reflected its increased determination to push ahead with purchasing. Even as the Tauponuiatia and Waimarino blocks went through the court, Crown agents were actively seeking opportunities to buy shares in Māori land.<sup>1151</sup> In April, the Crown purchase agent William Butler began making offers to buy shares in the Tūhua region, thereby alerting the region's leaders that their lands had been through the court.<sup>1152</sup>

8.9.3.2 *The Kawhia Native Committee's consideration of land title applications, April 1886

While the Crown was advancing its land purchasing goals, the Kawhia Native Committee was continuing to attempt to consider land title applications within its territory. From early December to early February, the committee had received six applications to investigate ownership of individual blocks. These were Mangamahoe, Te Kopua, Kawhia, Te Karaka, Okoruhe, and Whenuahou.<sup>1153</sup> The committee met on 6 April 1886. It decided to defer consideration of these claims until after the hui to be held later that month, which would consider whether to file an application for title to what remained of the 1883 petition area after Tauponuiatia and other blocks already before the court had been excluded.<sup>1154</sup>

By this time, the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Raukawa were feeling increasing pressure to take their lands to the court in order to secure title to their tribal territories. In February, March, and April, Ngāti Raukawa leaders had filed three applications for title to Wharepūhunga lands. Two of these applications were signed by Hitiri Te Paerata, who had reluctantly come to accept the prospect that each tribe would need to protect its own interests.<sup>1155</sup> Other title applications were received from Waikato, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Maniapoto

---

1149. Hikaka to Ballance, 9 December 1885 (doc A79, p 85).

1150. Document A79, p 85.

1151. Document A78, pp 1250, 1258–1259.

1152. Document A78, p 1250.

1153. Document A79, pp 69–70.

1154. Document A79, pp 69–70.

1155. Like Taonui, Te Paerata had been dismayed by the Tauponuiatia application: doc A79, p 81.

hapū, and focused particularly on the traditionally contested northern parts of the district.<sup>1156</sup>

The committee also continued to oversee gold prospecting activities within the district. In January, groups of Māori and European prospectors had begun work in various parts of the district. Some immediately struck opposition from local communities; Ormsby and Wahanui intervened to smooth things over, assuring the owners they would share in the wealth from any gold that was discovered. As noted in section 8.9.2, no gold was ever found and prospecting activity quickly dwindled.<sup>1157</sup>

8.9.3.3 Ballance's visit to Te Rohe Pōtae, April 1886

Soon after the Kawhia Native Committee decided to defer its consideration of land title applications in order to secure the remaining external boundary, Ballance visited the district. The visit was part of another North Island tour, during which he sought to persuade Māori to support his revived Māori land law proposals and to bring their lands before the Native Land Court.

In Te Rohe Pōtae, Ballance met with Wahanui and other leaders on 15 April 1886 at Te Kōpua. By this time, they were clearly very frustrated at the lack of progress on the legislative reforms they had sought. Wahanui addressed the meeting very briefly, asking Ballance to 'see about our petition,' adding that if Ballance would not do so 'I have nothing more to say.'<sup>1158</sup> John Ormsby spoke at greater length, telling Ballance that a hui would be held on April 20 so Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could decide what to do about their lands:

Many of them would like their titles to remain as they were; as they received them from their ancestors; but they found it to be now impossible that things can remain in their old state. An investigation into the ownership and title of their lands must be made. They would like to investigate the title and settle it amongst themselves by the native committees, but found they had not the power to do so, and they were now asking themselves what they ought to do.<sup>1159</sup>

Ormsby said Te Rohe Pōtae people had laid all of their land difficulties before the Government, but found it 'gave us no remedy'; they had granted the Government land for the railway and roads, but in return had received 'nothing, or very little'. He now sought Ballance's help to find 'some policy for this district.'<sup>1160</sup> If Te Rohe Pōtae Māori placed their lands before the court, Ormsby said, he wanted to be sure that its processes would be fair, and the judge would understand te reo Māori.<sup>1161</sup> In effect, Ormsby was saying that the Government's broken promises had left the 1156. Document A79, pp 83–84.

1157. Document A71, pp 113–114.

1158. 'Mr Ballance and the Natives: Important Meetings with Ngati Maniapoto and the "King"', Waikato Times, 20 April 1886, p 4; doc A41, p 193; doc A78, pp 1235–1238.

1159. Document A41, p 193.

1160. Document A41, p 193.

1161. Document A41, p 193.

remaining Te Rohe Pōtae tribes with no option but to place their lands before the court. Whereas Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had previously sought Crown recognition of their mana whakahaere, they now could do no more than ask for a court that would not do too much harm.

Ballance, in response, thanked the Kawhia Native Committee for its ‘assistance’ with the railway surveys and gold prospecting, and thanked Ngāti Maniapoto for the railway land.<sup>1162</sup> He said he would ‘like to give far more extended powers to the native committees, and in fact attempted to in Parliament, but was prevented’, due to the ‘great pressure of other business’. This was a tacit admission that the Government had either been unwilling to honour the Kihikihi agreement, or at the very least had refused to make it a priority.<sup>1163</sup> Ballance’s argument that it had been prevented by pressure of other business was not credible; he had introduced new legislative proposals for Māori land administration (the Native Land Disposition Bill 1885) and for the court (the Native Land Court Consolidation Bill 1885), and had simply not included any provision to empower native committees.

Ballance promised to increase native committee powers during the coming parliamentary session, allowing the committees to ‘settle all civil cases’. But he offered no hope that the committees would gain additional powers to determine land titles. Offering those powers was difficult, he said, because of ‘jealousy’ among Maori.<sup>1164</sup> Acknowledging that this meant title could be determined only through the court, he gave some assurances that court processes would be improved. Specifically:

- ▶ the judge would speak te reo Māori
- ▶ no ‘objectionable’ person or person with a conflict of interest would be allowed to act as an assessor or interpreter
- ▶ any land that was sold would go ‘to the highest bidder’, and would be ‘fairly bought, and at a fair price’
- ▶ the Crown would not begin to negotiate land purchases until the land had ‘passed through the court’ and ‘the owners are entitled to sell.’<sup>1165</sup>

Ballance, here, appeared to be setting aside the promises he had made at Kihikihi, and replacing them with a new and much more limited set of commitments about land rights and improvements in court procedure. As we will see in chapter 11, the Crown would not even honour all of these.

8.9.3.4 *Te Rohe Pōtae Native Land Court application, April 1886

Notwithstanding the outcome of this meeting, the Kawhia Committee continued to consider land title applications, even though it had no power to award title. On 20 April, it began to hear the claim of Hariwhenua (Walter) Searancke to the

---

1162. Document A41, p 193.

1163. Document A41, p 193.

1164. Document A41, p 193.

1165. Document A41, p 193.

Mangamahoe block, but the hearing was deferred so that all parties could assemble their cases.<sup>1166</sup>

The following day, a hui at Te Kōpua resolved to place ‘all the tribal lands included in the boundary survey’ before the Native Land Court, so that the external boundary, or what remained of it, could at last be confirmed. The Waikato Times reported that there was only ‘slight opposition.’<sup>1167</sup> Newspaper reports gave few details about who attended, except that they comprised Ngāti Maniapoto ‘and other tribes’, and also – at Ormsby’s invitation – included members of Tāwhiao’s council.<sup>1168</sup>

On 28 April 1886, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders made an application to take their lands to the court.<sup>1169</sup> The application covered the entire 3.5 million acres described in the original 1883 survey agreement and court application, and therefore overlapped the Taupouniatia and Waimarino blocks, as well as the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi blocks, and pre-1865 Crown purchases in the Mokau-Awakino area. Once those areas were removed, a much smaller area – totalling about 1.6 million acres – would remain for the court to adjudicate on. This would become known as the Aotea-Rohe Potae block.<sup>1170</sup> The application was signed by leading Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira – Wahanui, Kaahu, Taonui, Tukorehu, and Hōne Omipi (John Ormsby) and also by the Ngāti Hikairo rangatira Hōne Te One.<sup>1171</sup> Newspapers reported it as representing ‘the Maniapoto and several other leading tribes.’<sup>1172</sup>

Shortly before they had made this application, Taonui and other Ngāti Maniapoto leaders had filed an application for rehearing of the Tūhua, Hurakia, and Maraeroa parts of Taupouniatia, arguing faults in the court’s procedures and the substance of its decisions.<sup>1173</sup> As Stirling observed in his Taupō–Kaingaroa overview report, these blocks would become the subject of ‘protracted and bitter’ legal disputes in subsequent years, involving many more applications for rehearings, and ultimately leading to the redrawing of the Taupouniatia north-western boundary.<sup>1174</sup>

More broadly, throughout the remainder of the decade, the leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa were to mount a series of protests against what they saw as the Crown’s betrayal of their March and December 1883 agreements, under which the Crown had agreed to survey the external boundary and take no further

1166. Document A79, p 69.

1167. ‘The Ngati Maniapoto Meeting at Kopua,’ Waikato Times, 27 April 1886, p 2; doc A68, pp 72–73.

1168. ‘The King Natives: Their Lands to be Put Through the Court,’ Auckland Star, 29 April 1886, p 2; doc A68, pp 72–73.

1169. Document A78, p 1268.

1170. Document A79, pp 24–25, 35, 69–70, 87–88.

1171. Document A79, p 35.

1172. Document A78, p 1269.

1173. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 134, 158; doc A53, vol 2, p 994.

1174. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 134, 158; doc A53, vol 2, p 994.

action within it except with their consent.<sup>1175</sup> Early in 1887 they told Ballance they would not pay the £1,600 survey fees, as the Crown had not honoured the original agreement.<sup>1176</sup> The minutes of the 1889 Taupouiatia commission, which investigated some of the concerns of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa, recorded that Ngāti Maniapoto leaders regarded the 1883 agreement as ‘equal to a treaty’ and believed they had entered into it in good faith, on the understanding that it would ‘not be broken by Government’.<sup>1177</sup>

Once the Aotea block hearings got under way, the Crown wasted little time in assigning Wilkinson to monitor the proceedings and report on progress, with the aim of determining who the landowners were so that they might later be approached to sell their shares. Wilkinson subsequently assumed responsibility for land purchasing in the block, as discussed in chapter 11.<sup>1178</sup> The Kawhia Native Committee, meanwhile, pressed ahead with its own title hearings. It considered the Mangamahoe claim, reaching a decision on 2 June. At the same meeting, the committee resolved to build a whare at Ōtorohanga to hear more applications. As Husbands and Mitchell observed, notwithstanding the Government’s failure to grant it any additional powers, the committee evidently believed that once the court had determined the external boundary it would be able to consider the hapū subdivisions, at least in the first instance.<sup>1179</sup>

8.9.3.5 The Native Land Administration Act 1886, August 1886

When Ballance returned to Wellington, he placed his latest land administration Bill before the House. Like his previous Bills, it delivered little of what Māori had sought. In most respects, it replicated the previous year’s Native Land Disposition Bill, which Wahanui and many other Māori leaders had opposed. It provided for elected owner committees to decide whether land would be sold or leased. Committees could make decisions by majority, meaning there was no requirement for all owners to consent, though dissenting owners could apply to have their shares partitioned out.<sup>1180</sup> All sales and leases would be managed by a Crown-appointed commissioner – there would no longer be boards with Māori representation. Owners (individually or collectively) could sell or lease directly to the Crown, so long as a meeting of owners was first called. The Act implied, but did not say specifically, that the meeting of owners would have to consent to 1175. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 134, 158; doc A53, vol 2, p 994. For full accounts of Ngāti Maniapoto’s attempts to address their concerns about the border between the Aotea and Taupouiatia blocks, and about the Government’s failure to respect the 1883 boundary, see Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, chapter 8, and doc A53, vol 2, sections 5.5–5.13; see also doc A78, p 1261.

---

1176. ‘The Native Minister at Otorohanga’, Waikato Times, 27 January 1887, p 3; Mr Ballance at Otorohanga, Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

1177. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 139–140.

1178. Document A67, pp 177–179, 182–183; doc A78, pp 1247–1248.

1179. Document A79, pp 69–70.

1180. Native Land Administration Bill 1886 (25–1), cl 17, 18.

the transaction.<sup>1181</sup> The Bill envisaged no role for native committees and made no attempt to increase their powers. Nor did Ballance introduce any other legislation during 1886 or 1887 to fulfil his Kihikihi promise that committees would receive greater powers.

During debates in the House, Ballance emphasised his hope that Māori would soon hand their remaining 13 million acres over to the commissioner, so those lands could be settled, bringing ‘moral and pecuniary advantage’ to the owners. Opponents argued that it would put an end to sales or leases of Māori land.<sup>1182</sup> The Bill passed its third reading on 9 August 1886, under the title Native Land Administration Act 1886.

Other Tribunals have considered this Act, and the consensus is that it represented a wasted opportunity to establish a Treaty-compliant land administration system. They have found that Ballance had almost certainly consulted more than any previous Native Minister, and the Act went further than any previous legislation towards providing a mechanism by which owners could collectively decide about land transactions. But the Act also contained critical flaws. It placed too much control in the hands of the Crown-appointed commissioner and elected owner committees which were not then accountable to owners; and it provided no role for native committees, despite Ballance’s repeated promises. The Central North Island Tribunal concluded that the ‘whole concept of the Act was defeated by not giving proper effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Maori communities.’ It found that the Crown had breached the Treaty by failing to enact the laws that Māori had sought.<sup>1183</sup>

In our view, the Act was compromised because the Crown was more focused on obtaining land for settlement than it was on genuinely providing for tino rangatiratanga or mana whakahaere. A week after it was passed, the House authorised the Government’s plans to spend £100,000 on land purchasing with the restriction zone. Specifically, the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886 provided that £100,000 out of the £1 million railway loan could be used to purchase land within the restriction zone.<sup>1184</sup> Of the land purchased under this Act, 2.5 per cent was to be set aside for schools, hospitals and other public services, and the remainder ‘shall constitute a railway reserve, the proceeds of which

---

1181. Native Land Administration Bill 1886 (25–1), cl 3, 4–6, 20. Clause 3 provided that ‘owner’ meant ‘any native owner of land’. Clauses 4–6 provided for the Crown to appoint commissioners to manage all private land transactions. Clause 20 provided that: ‘Owners may convey or demise land to the Crown without or notwithstanding the appointment of a Committee. A Committee may convey or demise land to the Crown. But it shall be a condition precedent to any such sale or lease that a meeting of the owners of the land the subject thereof shall have been convened by the Commissioner for the purpose of discussing the terms of such sale or lease, and that the time fixed for such meeting shall have passed.’

1182. ‘Native Land Administration Bill’, NZPD, 1886, vol 55, pp 311–312 (doc A41, pp 198–199).

1183. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 354–356. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 760–761; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 232–233; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006, p 38; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, p 475.

1184. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886, ss 4, 5; doc A41, p 202.

shall be applied . . . in the construction of the said Main Trunk Railway, and of branch railways, tramways, or roads in connection therewith.<sup>1185</sup> Introducing this legislation to the House, Vogel explained that an ‘endowment’ was being established ‘for the purpose of opening up the country adjacent to the North Island Trunk Railway’, and that ‘proceeds of the sale of the land should be specifically tied down for the proper purposes of the railway’.<sup>1186</sup> In other words, the railway was to be funded through the profits from the purchase and onsale of Māori land. By the time this Act was in force, the Crown was already buying land within the 1883 petition area. During the 1886/87 fiscal year, the Crown acquired 400,000 acres of the 480,000-acre Waimarino block. Of that, a significant portion was within the petition area, though none was within this inquiry district.<sup>1187</sup>

8.9.3.6 The decline of the Kawhia Native Committee, 1886–87

In October 1886, the Native Land Court issued its judgment on the Aotea-Rohe Potae block, awarding almost the entire 1.6 million acres to claimants from the five tribes while setting aside a few very small areas for Waikato counter-claimants. The new block was known as the Rohe-Potae block. The following year the court began to turn its attention to tribal and hapū subdivisions.<sup>1188</sup> This was the work that the Kawhia Native Committee had expected to carry out, in accordance with the numerous discussions that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had with Bryce and Ballance. But, once the Mangamahoe case was disposed of, the committee played almost no role.<sup>1189</sup> Instead, as we will discuss in chapter 10, informal tribal and hapū committees played a significant role in arranging subdivisions outside the court, but the Kawhia Native Committee played none.

The committee held its final substantive meeting in October 1886, and met again only once more, in February 1887, to confirm the minutes of the previous meeting.<sup>1190</sup> Ormsby continued, for some years afterwards, to sign letters as chair of the committee and to impose levies on shops and other economic activities. But the committee no longer functioned as a forum for dispute resolution, or as a forum for determining land titles, or as an effective body for negotiating resource management arrangements.<sup>1191</sup> The attempts by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to mould this Crown-designed committee into a body that could serve their purposes had come to nothing.

These attempts had come to nothing in large part because of Crown actions. The committee had not been set up to succeed. It covered a very large and disparate area. It was not constituted in a manner that guaranteed equitable representation

---

1185. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886, s 5; doc A67, pp 120, 132.

1186. ‘North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Bill’, 28 July 1886, NZPD, vol 56, p 314 (doc A67, p 121).

1187. ‘Lands Purchased and Leased from Natives in the North Island’, 31 March 1887, AJHR, 1887, c-3; doc A90, pp 60–61; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 2, p 600.

1188. Document A79, pp 133, 159; doc A60, p 86.

1189. Document A79, pp 65–66, 186–188.

1190. Document A79, pp 65–66, 186–188.

1191. Document A79, pp 65–66, 186–188.

for all of the district's iwi and hapū, and therefore could not count on their support, and this was exacerbated by Wilkinson's very casual approach to committee elections. It lacked resources to conduct its duties effectively. And, above all, it lacked the statutory powers it needed to determine land titles, administer land on owners' behalf, and otherwise administer the district's affairs. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had repeatedly called for the committee to be granted additional powers so it could effectively carry out administrative functions, dispute resolution, land title determination, and resource management duties. They had also called for it to be resourced properly.

The Crown promised to deliver additional powers, but repeatedly failed to act. As a result, the committee could never be truly effective; indeed, Bryce, who had introduced the legislation that established them, acknowledged in 1885 that he had never intended them to determine titles or to exercise powers of self-government.<sup>1192</sup> In the words of the 1891 Native Land Laws commission, the Native Committees Act 1883 was 'a hollow shell the object of which it is difficult to see. It mocked and still mocks the Natives with a semblance of authority.'<sup>1193</sup>

The arrival of the Native Land Court, and the committee's corresponding decline, marked the beginning of the end for Te Rohe Pōtae independence. After years of negotiations, numerous entirely legitimate requests for the Crown to provide for self-determination in respect of land and other matters, and numerous Crown promises made and broken, the Crown had won most of what it sought. The railway was being built; the district's land and people were now subject to the colony's law; and preparations were well under way for the Crown to buy large areas of land for settlement.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, on the other hand, had won little. They had demanded Crown recognition for their autonomy, Crown protection for their land, and freedom from the 'evils' that had befallen other districts through the Native Land Court and laws that supported alienation of Māori land. As we will see in subsequent chapters, the 'evils' arrived nonetheless. The boundary that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had defined in 1883 would never be fully recognised, or given any statutory protection. Within a decade, title to most Te Rohe Pōtae lands would be individualised; much of the land would be sold; tribal and hapū authority would be seriously undermined, and many of the leaders who had ushered the district through its engagement with the Crown would have passed away. Ultimately, as we will see in a later chapter, even the liquor prohibition would not hold.

8.9.4 Treaty analysis and findings

The Crown conceded that it had 'failed to consult or re-engage with' Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'when it departed from representations it had made in February 1885' at Kihikihi. Those representations included, among other things, empowering native committees to play a greater role in Native Land Court processes and provide for 1192. 'Native Lands Settlement Bill', 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 321–322.

1193. 'Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the subject of Native Land Laws', AJHR, 1891, G-1, p xvi; doc A67, p 119; doc A79, p 188.

‘a measure of self-government’. By failing to re-engage before departing from those representations, the Crown submitted, it had breached the Treaty and its principles.<sup>1194</sup> For various reasons described below, we consider that the Crown’s concessions do not adequately describe the scale of the Treaty breaches that occurred in this period.

The Crown’s actions can be contrasted with those of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, who, despite the Crown’s repeated broken promises, continued to provide assistance to the Government in the construction of the railway and on other matters. They continued to make their views known, opposing the Native Land Court, opposing some of Ballance’s land law reforms, and advocating for the Government to increase the powers of native committees. It was in this context that they proceeded to lift the aukati in December 1885 and make the symbolic gifting of the taiaha Maungārongo.

What did it mean to lift the aukati? Given the circumstances – the Crown’s failure to enact the laws it had promised or to complete its survey of the external boundary, and its acceptance of a Native Land Court application encroaching on the boundary – we do not think that the lifting of the aukati can be read as a sign of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders’ confidence in their relationship with the Crown. Nor, by any means, do we see it as an act of submission to the Crown’s authority, as Bryce had anticipated. Rather, as discussed in section 8.9.2, it appears to us that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were sending the Crown a message – that they would honour their side of the bargain, even if the Crown would not. As we have noted before, their word was their bond and could not be broken. By handing over Maungārongo, they signalled their commitment to peace and also their continued determination to uphold the agreements they had made with the Crown. In practical terms, lifting the aukati meant that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would no longer police the borders of their rohe as they had. The Crown, however, continued to have an opportunity to respect those borders, by not sending the Taupouiatia Native Land Court application to court and instead allowing Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to determine iwi boundaries among themselves.

The goal of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, carefully laid out in various communications with the Crown, had been to substitute the aukati with a legally sanctioned boundary defining Te Rohe Pōtae, within which their mana whakahaere would be provided for as a matter of law, and actively protected under Crown authority. This was their entitlement under the Treaty, which provided for the Crown and Māori to exercise distinct but overlapping spheres of authority. The Crown acquired a right to govern and make law, but it was fettered by the right of Māori to retain their tino rangatiratanga over lands, resources, and people. Wherever the Crown’s authority overlapped that of Māori, the Crown was obliged to use its powers to actively protect Māori authority. Through these provisions, the Treaty was meant to provide a place for both Māori and settlers in which each could retain their own cultures and their own systems of law and authority, while moving forward in a manner that brought mutual benefit.

---

1194. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

That is not the course that the Crown adopted. After the Kihikihi hui, it set a course in which its priorities were completion and funding of the railway, and settlement of the district's lands. There was no place in its vision for autonomous Māori communities able to determine the pace, nature, and volume of the settlement that took place. As the Crown moved progressively further from its 1883 and 1885 agreements, the quest by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for Crown recognition of their mana whakahaere faded. The Tauponuiatia hearing in January 1886 broke open the boundary and further tested the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae's tribes. Tribes other than Ngāti Tūwharetoa then had little option but to turn to the court themselves.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders did not turn to the court, as the Crown suggested, because 'they wished to participate more fully in the colonial economy'; they could have done that under a system that allowed them to determine title among themselves. Nor did they see the court application as a desirable step 'given tribal rivalries that existed and the reality that Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui chiefs, amongst other neighbours, had already applied for investigation of title to the Court'.<sup>1195</sup> They applied simply because they had run out of other options – and they had run out of other options because the Crown had failed to empower them as it had said it would.

When Parliament resumed, Ballance introduced legislation that once again failed to deliver what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought, let alone what had been agreed. As noted in section 8.9.3, other Tribunals have found that the Act represented a wasted opportunity to establish a Treaty-compliant land administration system. It went further than any previous legislation towards providing a mechanism by which hapū could collectively decide about land transactions, but it also contained critical flaws, which included placing too much control in the hands of the Crown-appointed commissioner, and elected owner committees which were not then accountable to owners, and failing to provide increased powers for native committees despite repeated promises. The Central North Island Tribunal concluded that the Act failed to give proper effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Māori communities, and we agree.<sup>1196</sup>

Although Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued in their attempts to engage the Crown over the Native Land Court, the powers of native committees, and control of their lands, the Crown did not respond. It had attained its objectives. The railway was under construction, the land was proceeding through the court, and Crown purchasing – a more recent addition to the Crown's stated objectives for Te Rohe Pōtae – could commence once title had been determined and owners had been named.

---

1195. Submission 3.4.301, p71.

1196. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp354–356. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp760–761; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp232–233; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006, p38; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, p475.

As discussed in chapter 3, the Treaty created a partnership between Māori and the Crown, in which there were two spheres of authority – kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga – which would, at times, inevitably overlap. The Treaty therefore required both partners to negotiate openly and in good faith to determine how kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga might interact at a practical level, including the legal and institutional arrangements that might be necessary.

Partnership had effectively lain dormant in Te Rohe Pōtae since the Treaty was entered into and came into effect in 1840. There was little engagement for more than 20 years, and then there was war, followed by an uneasy peace in which Māori attempted to protect their independence from Crown and settler encroachment. As we have explained, we consider that the agreement reached between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown in March 1883 established a basis upon which the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could develop their relationship as Treaty partners in a manner that provided for the exercise of both kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga, in particular by the Crown recognising the external boundary and using its lawmaking powers to recognise and protect mana whakahaere within those boundaries.

But the Crown failed to respect the agreement that had been set in place in March 1883, which was faithfully upheld by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in subsequent months and years. Having agreed to respect the external boundary and do no more towards the railway or land title determination without consent, the Crown then regularly and unilaterally pushed forward with its railway and settlement plans, and ultimately chose to disregard the boundary altogether when that suited its agenda. It did so while conspicuously failing to enact laws that guaranteed the mana whakahaere of Te Rohe Pōtae people. Having turned to the Crown in the hope that it might protect their lands and authority, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had come to see that neither would be forthcoming. As Ormsby had put it, the Crown ‘gave us no remedy’; Ngāti Maniapoto had given roads and the railway and had abstained from appealing to the Crown in England when Tāwhiao had gone. In return, it had got ‘nothing, or very little.’<sup>1197</sup>

From the end of 1885, the Crown largely disengaged from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as it pushed ahead with its railway, land buying, and land settlement plans. Having sent Ministers when it needed something from Māori, the Crown now left its agents to deal with the Kawhia Native Committee. The district’s leaders were left to hand the taiaha Maungārongo to Wilkinson. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had entered negotiations with the Crown while they still retained considerable power, because they possessed and controlled access to their lands and could therefore say no to the railway. At that time, there was potential for them and the Crown to reach agreements that brought the railway and settlement to the district without compromising the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae communities. But that did not occur, and it did not occur because of the Crown’s unwillingness to give full recognition to the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

---

1197. Mr Ballance and the Natives, Waikato Times, 20 April 1886, p 2 (doc A41, p 193).

Many of our specific findings relate to the way in which the Crown failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith and therefore breached the principle of partnership. This was tied to its underlying failure to give effect to the mana whakahaere of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. We will describe the specific breaches below.

8.9.4.1 *Did the Crown breach its agreement to confirm the external boundary before considering tribal divisions?

As discussed in section 8.5, in December 1883 the Crown further agreed with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that:

- ▶ the external boundary (as set out in the 1883 petition) would be surveyed, at a cost not exceeding £1,600; and
- ▶ that competing Native Land Court applications would be held back until the external boundary had been confirmed.

These agreements were not fulfilled. The Crown's surveyors refused to survey the Mōkau parts of the external boundary on the grounds that the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi blocks had already been through the court. They made this decision at some point in mid-1884 without consulting Wahanui or other iwi leaders. When Wahanui heard of it late in 1885, he expressed his considerable displeasure. So far as we can determine, the south-western corner of the 1883 petition area was never surveyed in accordance with the agreement.

By following this course, the Crown was insisting that its land title determination processes would take precedence over the clearly expressed wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders with respect to the boundary survey, and over the terms of the 1883 agreements on that matter. This was a plain breach of their tino rangatiratanga, and of the Crown's duty to act honourably and in good faith in its relationships with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. If the Crown did not wish to complete the survey, or did not believe that it could, it was obliged to reopen negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders so they could make informed decisions. Its failure to do so meant that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders entered subsequent negotiations – including the February 1885 negotiations at Kihikihi – under the impression that their boundary would be honoured. Had they known that it was not to be, they might have made different decisions. Ultimately, this action meant that the promised boundary survey was never completed.

The Crown did complete its survey of the eastern boundary, but then set it aside, accepting the Taupouiatia and Waimarino applications that encroached on large areas within the district. The Crown acknowledged that it supported both the Taupouiatia and Waimarino applications, but submitted that its actions 'must be assessed against the Four-Tribes' decision in 1884 not to apply to the Native Land Court for an external boundary survey, contrary to the undertaking it made in December 1883.<sup>1198</sup> As explained in section 8.6.6.3, the 'four tribes' did not withdraw their December 1883 application. Rather, Rewi withdrew his name from the application, while other leaders continued to uphold their agreement with the Crown.<sup>1199</sup> Then, in June 1884, a section of Ngāti Maniapoto made decisions to withdraw a handful of minor applications they had made to the court prior to the December 1883 boundary application.<sup>1200</sup> The Crown's agent, George Wilkinson, explained at the time that they intended the Kawhia Native Committee deal with their applications before the court did;<sup>1201</sup> and John Ormsby later confirmed to Ballance that this was the case.<sup>1202</sup> These were applications that Bryce had agreed to hold back, and their withdrawal was entirely in accordance with the December 1883 agreement, under which the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori understood that the boundary would be surveyed, a Crown grant would be issued, and the Kawhia Native Committee would then be able to inquire into iwi and hapū titles. If the four tribes had in fact withdrawn their boundary application, why would they have later offered to pay for the survey, and why would Wahanui have expressed frustration at the Crown's unilateral decision to exclude Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parininihi from the survey, and why would Te Heuheu have continued to be concerned about the boundary late in 1885?

---

1198. Submission 3.4.6, p14.

Even if the four tribes had made such a decision, we cannot see how it could have been relevant to the Crown's later decision to support the Taupouniatia and Waimarino applications. Sixteen months had elapsed between the two events, during which time the Crown held back applications in Te Rohe Pōtae (from non-Maniapoto claimants such as Ngāti Hauā) and in Taupouniatia. As Ballance himself said, the Government supported the Taupouniatia application because it feared that the Ngāti Tūwharetoa – responding to the failure of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to win meaningful concessions from the Crown – would otherwise place their lands under the King's mana.

The National Park and Central North Island Tribunals have considered the events leading to the Taupouniatia application in some depth. Those Tribunals concluded that the Taupouniatia application could have easily been avoided if the Crown had empowered Māori to determine land titles among themselves, and the external boundary could therefore have been preserved, at least until the tribes agreed among themselves to a subdivision.<sup>1203</sup> As the Central North Island Tribunal put it:

In our view, the Crown could and should have met the reasonable demands of the Rohe Potae leaders. It should have surveyed the external boundary of the Kingitanga lands, and then given legal powers for the tribes to decide their own titles inside the rohe. Had it done so, and made it clear that it was doing so, then Te Heuheu's application to the Native Land Court would not have been necessary. Also, the Taupo

---

1199. Rewi Maniapoto letter, 26 January 1884 (doc A78, p1018).

1200. Document A79, p77.

1201. Wilkinson to Bryce, 4 June 1884 (doc A41, p140; doc A90, p46).

1202. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p18.

1203. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp330–331; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 231–232, 291.

interests of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Maniapoto would have been properly protected, and the tribes would have negotiated and decided boundaries for the new purpose of leasing land.<sup>1204</sup>

The obvious means of achieving this, the Tribunal found, was by properly empowering native committees, and then reconstituting the Kawhia Native Committee to ensure that it was genuinely representative of all iwi and hapū within the boundary. Once iwi boundaries had been determined, the Tribunal continued, hapū boundaries could then have been determined by iwi committees and registered so they had legal protection.<sup>1205</sup> This was almost exactly what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought and been consistently denied. The Crown's failure to do what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought left Ngāti Tūwharetoa with no means of protecting tribal lands other than by applying to the court, thereby effectively forcing the breakup of the five tribes' shared rohe.<sup>1206</sup>

As described earlier, the leaders of the remaining Te Rohe Pōtae tribes regarded the Crown's acceptance of the Taupouuiatia application as a fundamental breach of the December 1883 agreement. Ormsby, appearing before the 1889 Taupouuiatia commission, said that Bryce had 'agreed that the block should be investigated as a whole', and that no claims would be recognised for parts of the block:

[Ngāti] Maniapoto put great faith in this arrangement and did not think of things outside of the agreement. I consider that the sitting of the Court at Taupo to deal with Taupouuiatia – a portion of the Rohepotae block – was a violation of this agreement.<sup>1207</sup>

By encouraging and then accepting the Taupouuiatia and Waimarino applications in spite of its earlier agreements, and without engaging in further consultation with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, the Crown failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith, and therefore breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatira-tanga and the principle of partnership. These applications, combined with the Crown's failure to empower Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine land titles among themselves, left the remaining tribes with little option but to place their own lands before the court. Once the Taupouuiatia and Waimarino hearings began, it was no longer possible for the promised Crown grant to be issued over the territory covered by the December 1883 agreement. Te Rohe Pōtae tribes were instead set on a course that would ultimately lead to individualisation and fragmentation of title, and a breakdown of communal authority which would render land vulnerable to sale against community wishes, as we will see in chapters 10 and 11.

---

1204. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 333.

1205. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 330–331, 333.

1206. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 330–331; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 231–232, 291.

1207. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, pp 140–141.

8.9.4.2 *Did the Crown honour the commitments Ballance made at Kihikihi in February 1885?

As discussed in section 8.8.5, Ballance made 20 distinct promises or assurances to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders during the February 1885 hui at Kihikihi, and it was on the basis of these promises that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the railway. Many of those promises concerned land title determination and administration. Some concerned other matters, such as prospecting and liquor control. Crown counsel submitted that it had 'kept largely to the core elements' of this and other agreements.<sup>1208</sup> The Crown kept some of its promises and, either by act or omission, failed to keep others. Some promises – such as those concerning the railway and land purchasing – will be considered in depth in later chapters. We will consider each promise or assurance in turn.

8.9.4.2.1 INCREASING THE POWERS OF THE KAWHIA NATIVE COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO LAND TITLES

Ballance promised that the Kawhia Native Committee would have its powers increased to allow it to make initial title determinations, with the court ratifying those arrangements and considering appeals. This followed the December 1883 assurances by Bryce that the committee already had powers to inquire into land titles, subject to confirmation by the court.

Following Kihikihi, Ballance introduced no legislation to increase the powers of native committees. Ballance later told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders he had been unable to introduce new legislation because of the pressure of other business, but this was an excuse. Without addressing land title issues, Ballance found time to draft and introduce the Native Land Disposition Bill 1885, which later became the Native Land Administration Act 1886. He also found time to introduce the Native Land Court Consolidation Bill, later the Native Land Court Act 1886, which consolidated all existing Māori land laws. Either Bill provided him with an opportunity to amend the Native Committees Act; this was simply a course the Government chose not to take. By failing to empower the committees as promised, the Crown breached its duty of good faith. By failing to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to manage land title determination as they wished, the Crown breached its obligation to act in accordance with their tino rangatiratanga, and breached the principle of autonomy.

Ballance also told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at Kihikihi that he would consider amending native land laws to prevent claims to the court by people who had little or no interest in the land. We do not know what consideration he gave to this matter. He did not introduce any statutory amendments to give effect to the suggested change.

8.9.4.2.2 BALLANCE'S PROMISED SYSTEM FOR ADMINISTERING MĀORI LAND

Ballance made three promises with respect to administration of Māori land. First, he promised that elected owner committees would determine how their lands would be managed and would make all decisions about sale or lease. No lands would be sold or leased without the committee's consent. Secondly, he promised that three-person boards with Māori representation (and possibly a Māori majority) would manage all land sales and leases on the owners' behalf. They could do nothing without the consent of owner committees, which would retain the 'fullest power'. The boards would comprise a Crown-appointed commissioner, the chair of the district's native committee, and one other, possibly elected by Māori. Thirdly, he promised that all sales or leases would be 'submitted for public competition, so that the highest price will be obtained for the land'.

---

1208. Submission 3.4.6, p12.

The legislation he subsequently introduced resembled the system he described, but differed from it in material ways. The Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1886 provided for committees of owners (known as block committees) to make decisions about private sales or leases, but these would then be administered by a Crown commissioner, not a board with Māori representation. And the Crown would be allowed to bypass the owner committee and the commissioner, buying directly from individuals or communities. One of the effects of these changes was to exclude Māori from any role in managing land transactions. Another was to prevent hapū from having full communal control over their lands, because the Crown could buy directly from individuals. A third effect was that land would not be sold on an open market, because the Crown would not have to compete with private buyers.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders expressed strong opposition to these changes and in particular to the provision that allowed the Crown to bypass block committees and buy directly from owners. As discussed earlier, the Native Land Administration Act went further than any previous law towards providing for Māori communities to make communal decisions about land; but it only partially delivered that objective. Other Tribunals have found the Crown breached the Treaty by enacting this law, and we agree.

By failing to keep its promises, the Crown breached its duty to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith. By enacting legislation for the administration and settlement of Māori land without the consent of Māori leaders, and by enacting legislation that failed to effectively provide for communal management of Māori land, the Crown failed to recognise and protect their tino rangatiratanga, and therefore breached the principle of autonomy and its duty of active protection.

As we will see in chapter 11, the Crown in 1887 repealed the Native Land Administration Act and replaced it with a new law that made no provision for communal management of Māori land, and excluded private buyers and lessees from Te Rohe Pōtae, further aggravating these breaches of Ballance's Kihikihi promises.

8.9.4.2.3 RATING OF MĀORI LAND

Ballance promised that Māori land would not be subject to rates unless it had been leased, sold, or cultivated. He undertook to write a letter confirming that. The Government subsequently determined that no action was needed to keep this promise, and no letter should be written, because the Crown and Native Lands

8.9.4.2.4

Rating Act 1882 already exempted the Kawhia, East Taupo, and West Taupo counties (which together covered most of Te Rohe Pōtae other than Mōkau) from rates.<sup>1209</sup>

Under the Act, the only rateable land within the district lay south of the Mōkau River, and then only if it was within five miles of a public road.<sup>1210</sup> Nonetheless, in the 1885–86 financial year, rates were levied on some Māori lands in counties overlapping Te Rohe Pōtae, specifically Karioi, Whāingaroa, and Clifton. But, according to Robinson and Christoffel, it is impossible to determine whether the rates were levied within this inquiry district. The Crown and Native Lands Rating Act 1882 was repealed in 1888. Thereafter, the Rating Act 1882 applied. Under its provisions, Māori land was only subject to rates if occupied by a non-Māori.<sup>1211</sup>

So far as we can determine, the Crown honoured the substance of this promise.

8.9.4.2.4 THE CROWN'S LAND PURCHASING INTENTIONS

During the Kihikihi hui, Ballance assured Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that the Crown was 'not anxious' to buy Māori land and intended to acquire only what it needed for the railway – a corridor of 1–2 chains wide, and 5–10 acres for stations. He said that so long as Māori voluntarily made land available for settlement by leasing, the Government would not interfere. Ballance did not specify how much land would need to be made available, or when, but rather stressed that all decisions would be left to hapū. Ballance also assured Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that Māori landowners would be left to enjoy the benefit of rising land prices. Ballance anticipated that land prices would increase up to tenfold in value. We accept that Ballance was not offering a guarantee. His comments nonetheless suggest that the district's Māori would retain a substantial proportion of their land.

As we have described, soon after Ballance's return to Wellington, other Ministers were pressuring him to buy considerably more land than was needed for the railway, in order to ensure that the Crown shared in the benefit of rising land prices. By August, Ballance was publicly committing to the Crown purchase of 1.5 million acres of railway land out of the 4.5 million-acre railway district. From that time on, the Crown was actively preparing to purchase land in this and neighbouring districts.

We do not think that Ballance's assurance can be interpreted as a promise that the Crown would buy no land at all other than what was needed for the railway. He had said only that he was 'not anxious' to do so and would not do so if the land was settled by other means. But Ballance did promise that Māori would be given an opportunity to make their own decisions about settlement; the Crown would begin purchasing only if settlement did not occur. The Crown had breached this

---

1209. 'Native Land Disposition Bill', 3 August 1885, NZPD, vol 52, pp 408–409, 411–412; doc A71, pp 267–268.

1210. Document A71, p 268.

1211. Document A71, pp 267, 270.

promise within months of the Kihikihi hui by committing to a large-scale purchasing programme of its own.

By failing to keep its promise, the Crown breached its duty to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith. By committing to a large-scale purchasing programme for Te Rohe Pōtae lands without first seeking or obtaining the consent of the district's leaders, the Crown failed to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights in land, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of autonomy and partnership.

Although it made preparations for purchasing, the Crown did not in fact begin to purchase until 1890. We will consider the Crown's purchasing programme, and the laws under which it was conducted, in chapter 11.

8.9.4.2.5 RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION

At the Kihikihi hui, Ballance made four promises about the railway:

- ▶ The Crown would take land no more than 1–2 chains wide for the railway corridor, and 5–10 acres for stations.
- ▶ Once owners were identified, they would be paid for the land that was taken for the railway corridor and stations, and for any timber or other resources used. The amounts paid would be determined on the same basis as if the land was being taken from Europeans. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori later agreed to gift one chain for the corridor and 1–3 acres for stations.
- ▶ Māori communities would be awarded contracts for the construction of parts of the railway. Therefore 'a large amount of the money' from the construction would go to the people directly.
- ▶ The railway would not interfere with waterways and would do '[n]o injury whatever' to Māori land.

As already discussed, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders subsequently elected to gift one chain of land for the railway corridor, and one to three chains for the stations. Crown counsel submitted that the Crown paid for additional lands. We will consider the Crown's compliance with Ballance's railway promises in chapter 9.

8.9.4.2.6 POWERS OF NATIVE COMMITTEES

During the Kihikihi hui, Ballance made two promises about district native committees' powers in addition to the land title determination promises already discussed. First, Ballance said he would grant the chairman of the Kawhia Committee power to grant or withhold consent for gold prospecting. As discussed earlier, we do not have specific evidence of Ballance giving this instruction, but it seems that he did so at some stage early in 1885. Thereafter, the committee managed gold prospecting in the district with some assistance from the Crown agent George Wilkinson. Secondly, Ballance said he would introduce legislation giving district native committees the same powers as courts to hear civil disputes up to a certain value, and it would no longer be necessary for disputing parties to agree to place their dispute before the court. Ballance repeated this promise when he met Te Rohe Pōtae leaders again in April 1886. It was never carried into effect, and there is no evidence that Ballance or any other Minister subsequently reopened negotiations on this matter. This was a breach of the Crown's duty to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith, and a breach of the Crown's duty to respect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Maori.

In addition to these promises, Ballance said he would consider giving district native committees some source of revenue, possibly by empowering them to collect dog tax from Māori in their districts. He also said he would consider introducing small payments to native committee chairmen. As noted in section 8.9.2.2, Ballance later arranged for Ormsby to receive a £50 annual payment, though it was not clear whether this was intended to be an honorarium or funding for the committee's activities.

8.9.4.2.7 CONTROL OF LIQUOR

Ballance promised to address gaps in the Kawhia Licensing Area. As noted in section 8.9.4, the licensing area was amended on several occasions during 1886 and 1887. So far as we can determine, Ballance kept this specific promise. As we will see in later chapters, the prohibition was not effectively enforced and ultimately proved ineffectual, leading Wahanui and other leaders to seek new ways to address this issue. As noted in section 8.8.5.2, we see liquor control as reflecting a broader desire of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders to exercise mana whakahaere with respect to social issues, in order to protect and advance their people's well-being.

8.9.4.2.8 PARTICIPATION IN PARLIAMENT AND LAWMAKING

Ballance made two promises at Kihikihi about Māori involvement in Parliament and lawmaking. First, he said that Māori would be consulted on all legislation affecting them. More specifically, he said he would circulate a Bill during 1885 proposing new Māori land laws. Ballance did circulate his proposed Bill in 1885 and received a considerable amount of feedback from Māori communities. Ballance also toured Māori communities late in 1885 and in 1886 during the parliamentary recess, again holding discussions about his legislative plans. As other Tribunals have noted, he probably consulted more than any previous Native Minister.<sup>1212</sup> Secondly, Ballance promised to press for an increase in the number of Māori Members of the House of Representatives, so that Māori had proportionate representation. There is evidence that Ministers discussed this, but there is no evidence of any further consultation on the matter, let alone any concrete proposal for legislative reform.

We note that Ballance had promised only to seek this reform – he did not suggest that the Government would necessarily agree. In our view, he kept his promise. However, by failing to take the matter further, the Government was choosing to set aside the very real concerns that many Māori leaders had expressed about their influence on legislative processes. At the heart of all of their concerns was the fact that it was mainly settlers who devised Māori land laws – Māori members of the House of Representatives were too few in number to have real influence.

---

1212. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 354–356.

8.10 CONCLUSION

The Tribunal's principal function is to consider claims by Māori alleging that the Crown has breached the Treaty and its principles. In Te Rohe Pōtae, claimants' understanding of the Treaty relationship is fundamentally shaped by their understanding of the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements – which they understand collectively as Te Ōhākī Tapu. Before we directly address questions of Treaty principle, it is therefore necessary to address the differing claimant and Crown understandings about the nature of Te Ōhākī Tapu.

8.10.1 Te Ōhākī Tapu

The claimants put it to us that Te Ōhākī Tapu is a matter of deep significance to them, because it contains the sacred words of their tūpuna rangatira as well as the honour of the Crown. They described Te Ōhākī Tapu variously as a declaration of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights of self-determination; as a series of agreements between Māori and the Crown; and as a single, overarching agreement or compact under which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori acknowledged the Crown's right to make laws and govern, and the Crown agreed to recognise and protect their authority and right of self-government within their rohe. They argued, also, that the Crown had not negotiated in good faith, in that it led them to believe that it would respect their authority and right of self-government when it never intended to honour that assurance. And they argued, furthermore, that the Crown failed to honour the specific promises it had made about Māori land laws and other matters throughout the 1883–85 negotiations.

The Crown acknowledged that it made representations to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori which it subsequently did not honour and that it should have re-engaged with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders over these matters. But it did not accept the claimants' view of the overall significance of the 1883–85 negotiations for the Treaty relationship. The Crown regarded Te Ōhākī Tapu as a matter of importance only to the claimants. Crown counsel submitted: 'The term carries with it a sense of looking back to an important series of events in history and symbolises the importance of events and agreements to Rohe Potae Māori.'<sup>1213</sup>

In our view, the components of Te Ōhākī Tapu should be of equal significance to the Crown today as they are to the claimants, because they refer to events and agreements upon which the entire Treaty relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori hangs.

8.10.1.1 The declaration of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tino rangatiratanga

Te Ōhākī Tapu originated as a declaration by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of the mana and tino rangatiratanga that they and their tūpuna had held and exercised for generations. Counsel for the Ngāti Maniapoto Trust Board described this as a 'declaration of ongoing autonomy' and 'an assertion of the right to govern within the Rohe Potae.'<sup>1214</sup> This was a right that had been in existence for many centuries. And it was a right that had been guaranteed to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by the Treaty of Waitangi.

<sup>1213</sup>. Submission 3.4.301, p 1.

<sup>1214</sup>. Submission 3.4.1, para 5.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori declared their mana and tino rangatiratanga to the Crown through a series of actions during 1883. The first action was the laying down of pou roherohe to mark the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae. Through this process, which was led by the senior Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Taonui Hikaka, he, Wahanui, and others hoped to establish a basis on which the traditional owners of Te Rohe Pōtae lands could advocate on behalf of their authority, as represented in their relationship with their customary lands, which they believed had been guaranteed to them by the Treaty. Rangatira and their communities from various iwi – Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui, and later Ngāti Hikairo – came to join in this cause. It was a bold initiative that would require the active maintenance of community support.

During their March and December 1883 negotiations with the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders asserted their tino rangatiratanga by restricting the Crown's access to the district and declaring that further access would only be granted if the Crown used its lawmaking powers to acknowledge their rights of self-government.

In their June 1883 petition, they outlined the rights that were guaranteed to them under article 2 of the Treaty, 'i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga, me te kore ano hoki e whakaraurua ta matou noho i runga i o matou whenua.' We translate this as: 'which fully guaranteed to us our absolute chiefly authority, as well as confirming to us our absolute and undisturbed possession of our lands.'<sup>1215</sup>

These were:

- ▶ The right to determine the ownership to their lands and associated resources;
- ▶ The right to determine the current and future management and use of their lands and associated resources;
- ▶ The right to determine how they would deal with matters of importance to the health and well-being of their people.

The petition recognised the Crown's desire to exercise its practical authority in Te Rohe Pōtae, particularly the Crown's wish to construct a railway line through the district. It laid down the requirement that, in order for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to agree to the construction of the railway through their territory, the Crown would have to guarantee and provide for those rights through the use of its legislative powers. Rewi Maniapoto put this most succinctly when, in early 1884, he wrote to the Government, saying: 'We are very desirous of obtaining self government. You are anxious for railways; give us what we desire and we will give you what you want.'<sup>1216</sup>

Later, in speaking before Parliament, Wahanui argued that the Crown must use its legislative powers to provide for 'te mana whakahaere i toku whenua' (translated at the time as 'full power and authority over my own lands'). As explained in section 8.7.3, we do not think this request can be read down to refer only to

---

1215. Our translation differs from that in the original, which described the effect of articles 2 and 3 as confirming 'to us the exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands.'

1216. Copy of letter (in English only) from Rewi Maniapoto, 26 January 1884 (doc A78, p1018).

questions of land title and administration, though those were Wahanui's most immediate concerns at the time. Rather, mana whakahaere referred more broadly to the rights of rangatira to exercise political authority, and social and economic leadership, in service of their people's well-being. It was, in other words, an assertion of the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae people to autonomy or self-determination that should have been recognised and protected by the colony's laws. We therefore understand mana whakahaere as representing the way in which tino rangatiratanga could be given practical effect, supported by legislation. Wahanui used the analogy of a watchmaker who is given a watch to fix: the Crown was to be entrusted with the role of using its lawmaking powers to protect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and in turn provide means by which they could exercise their autonomy.

For the claimants, there was a tapu element to the actions taken by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at this time, from the laying down of the boundary to the declaration of their rights. In a letter to the Crown shortly before the petition was submitted, Rewi Maniapoto explained that 'Te Ki Tapu', the sacred word of the people, was that the encircling boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae would never be broken: the iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae would continue to exercise mana in respect of their lands and waterways. Tom Roa told us that 'Te Ki Tapu' represented the commitment of the people made on their behalf by rangatira: 'the word of Rangatira held sway, committing the people, and later, should the commitment made by the Rangatira be broken, redress was to be sought, sometimes as a consequence, blood was spilt.'<sup>1217</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had maintained their mana and tino rangatiratanga for more than four decades since the signing of the Treaty. What was new in 1883 was their demand to the Crown to actively protect that tino rangatiratanga, in particular by enacting laws to protect their rights to retain, use and manage the district's lands as they wished. In pushing for the Crown to enact these laws, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were acknowledging the Crown's right of kāwanatanga. In return, they demanded and expected that kāwanatanga would be used to actively protect and give practical effect to their tino rangatiratanga. We recognise and agree with the petitioners' understanding of the Treaty of Waitangi in this respect: the Crown had a responsibility to use its powers of kāwanatanga to give effect to the exercise of tino rangatiratanga, and to act in partnership with Māori to bring into effect arrangements by which this should occur.

8.10.1.2 Opportunities for the Crown to give effect to the terms of the Treaty

There were significant opportunities for the Crown to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty through the series of engagements that took place from March 1883 through to the end of 1885. Despite the fact that Native Minister Bryce occasionally acted in a blunt fashion, the Crown recognised the need to engage Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in dialogue and to gain their consent before encroaching on their lands. This was an acknowledgement that, in practical reality, Te Rohe Pōtae

---

<sup>1217</sup>. Document H9(c), pp 2–3.

Māori continued to be able to enforce the aukati and maintain their authority within it.

The agreement between Bryce and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders on 16 March 1883 was a watershed moment in this respect. The agreement made both parties aware of the other's ultimate objectives and established a process by which those objectives could be advanced through negotiation. Progress was also made towards achieving those objectives – the Crown could commence its exploratory railway survey, and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would submit their petition for the Crown's consideration.

In his letter, Bryce described this as the 'friendly relations now established between your tribe and me'. Later, Wahanui said that this moment presented an opportunity to enter into a meaningful partnership ('te piringa pono'), but only if the Crown proceeded in accordance with the sacred word of the people – te kī tapu. The March 1883 agreement helped establish a process by which both parties could engage with each other on a reciprocal basis.

As we explained in section 8.3.4, the 16 March agreement had constitutional significance, both because it was an agreement between Treaty partners and because it established, for this first time, a process through which those partners would be able to bring the terms of the Treaty into practical effect in this district.

A number of opportunities arose during the subsequent 1883–85 negotiations for the Crown to use its powers of kāwanatanga to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty. The first opportunity arose when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori submitted their petition. At that stage, the Government could have looked to pass bespoke legislation giving effect to the plain terms of the petition, or to consider an alternative model based on the native committees Bills that had been put up from 1880–82, which provided Māori with a more substantive role in the land title determination process.

The next opportunity arose following the December 1883 agreement to survey the external boundary. The Government could have completed that work and then turned to re-engage with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over how their authority could be enabled while allowing for the railway to be introduced into the district. A further opportunity emerged when the Stout–Vogel ministry first came to power, when member of the House of Representatives Wi Pere proposed measures for empowering the native committees, alongside the proposals that the Government was contemplating for the railway and land settlement.

The most significant opportunity came in the agreements reached between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and John Ballance during the hui at Kihikihi in February 1885. At that point, the Crown still had the opportunity to redress its Treaty breaches that had arisen in the course of previous negotiations. After all, title had yet to be determined to the land, and no purchasing in the district had yet occurred.

This could have been achieved first through Ballance and the Government of which he was a part recognising that 'self-government' (which he referred to in generous terms when speaking to Tāwhiao at Whatiwhatihoe in 1885) was not only a guaranteed right under the Treaty, but something that could have been given practical effect. Ballance came close by making a range of promises to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in response to their demands: empowering native committees to become courts of first instance in determining land titles and to regulate other matters; providing for committees of owners to manage Māori lands; and expanding the area in which sales of alcohol were prohibited.

The agreements reached at Kihikihi were the closest the Crown came to acknowledging that, in order to gain Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreement to constructing the railway, it would have to provide formal recognition of their authority in accordance with their right of tino rangatiratanga. But Ballance would not give way on all of their demands. Most crucially, he did not concede that the Native Land Court would not be involved in determining the title to their lands. However, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori recognised that in order for the terms of the Treaty to be brought into practical effect in the district, they would need to compromise on some areas. They accepted Ballance's assurances on the grounds that what he offered was the best means by which they could secure their authority in the district, from which they could work with the Crown in partnership into the future.

Ballance's promises were the high-water mark in the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. They represented the furthest that the Crown was willing to commit in providing for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori authority. But they were no more than a high-water mark; unlike the tide of settlement that Bryce accurately predicted, these waters were quick to recede.

8.10.1.3 *The Crown's failure to recognise Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tino rangatiratanga

It is for this reason that we do not agree with counsel for the Ngāti Maniapoto Trust Board that Te Ōhāki Tapu included 'a promise by the Crown that [the] governing autonomy [of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori] would be recognised and respected in all respects, including within laws passed by Parliament.'<sup>1218</sup> The promises Ballance made at that hui – even construed at their most generous – did not amount to a promise by the Crown that their governing autonomy would be recognised in all respects. No matter how we might look at his promises, neither Ballance, nor other ministers in his Government, nor those who were in power before him, were willing to acknowledge the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga for what it was: a powerful guarantee of autonomy and self-determination in all spheres of life, which qualified the Crown's right to govern and make laws. Rather, they saw the Treaty as offering, at most, very limited rights of self-government subject to the colony's laws, along with a guarantee of rights to possess land which (in their view) were sufficiently protected by existing native land laws.

The promises Ballance made at Kihikihi nonetheless won the agreement of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. They agreed because Ballance had gone further than any other Minister in offering Te Rohe Pōtae Māori a significant degree of control over title determination and land administration, and because they feared the offer might be withdrawn if it was not accepted. Had Ballance's promises been brought into effect, it might have been possible for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown to keep working together to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty in this district in a manner that was appropriate for new circumstances such as the arrival of public works, settlement, and Crown institutions. Any such solutions would have required ongoing negotiation between Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and the Crown, meeting as formal equals.

---

1218. Submission 3.4.1, para 5.

The Crown did not follow this course. It did not implement Ballance's promises, and nor did it pursue an ongoing partnership with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. It did not see the Treaty in those terms. From its point of view, it had acquired supreme authority in 1840 and was negotiating only in order to bring that power into practical effect within this district. It appeared willing to provide for Māori autonomy only to the extent that was necessary to win Māori consent for the railway and for Native Land Court applications.

The Crown's attitude to the Treaty was most starkly illustrated in Bryce's and Stout's communications with the British government. From their point of view, the colonial government was meeting the Crown's Treaty obligations by providing legal recognition for Māori ownership of land under the Native Land Act (see sections 8.5.1.1 and 8.9.1.2). Much like the court itself, following the transfer of responsible government, Māori had no right of appeal against decisions made by the responsible ministers of the day. This was amply demonstrated when the British Government declined to consider Tāwhiao's petition and instead returned it to the colonial government to consider.

A notable aspect of the Crown's approach in this respect was that at no point did it declare its position on the Treaty to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori directly. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, by contrast, approached matters openly and transparently, such was their commitment to upholding their article 2 and 3 rights by demanding statutory protection for them. The Crown chose not to take up the opportunities that were presented by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and instead pushed ahead with its objectives of 'opening' the territory for the railway, the Native Land Court, and European settlement.

8.10.1.4 *Te Ōhākī Tapu – a demand to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty

As noted in section 8.2.3.1, the 'ōhākī' referred to by the claimants was that which originated in 'Te Kī Tapu' – the declaration in the petition of 1883 of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori mana and tino rangatiratanga. Te Kī Tapu expressed their desire for mana whakahaere, as guaranteed to them by the Treaty of Waitangi. It indicated what would be needed to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty, and it gave guidance on how the Crown could provide statutory recognition for the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. We also recognise that the Crown not only refused to take up Te Kī Tapu at the time, but it also actively disregarded it. For successive generations of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, Te Kī Tapu became Te Ōhākī Tapu.

We are led to these conclusions partly due to our understanding of what an 'ōhākī' is in the Māori idiom. In te reo Māori, an 'ōhākī' is an utterance of great significance – one that is made by one party to another on the assumption that it must be given effect. It is a declaration that is associated with a dying (or sometimes parting) wish. As Nigel Te Hiko told us, however, ‘The Ohaaki Tapu in my view was not a ‘dying wish’ . . . in a literal sense. Instead a metaphorical interpretation should be attributed.’ Mr Te Hiko emphasised the enduring nature of an ōhākī, the ‘hau’ (breath) ‘giving life to the kupu so that these words survive long after death.’ This, in turn, was intensified by the tapu nature of the ōhākī.<sup>1219</sup> We understand the ‘ōhākī’ of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to have been their declaration to the Crown of how it could give practical effect to the Treaty within the territory defined by the June 1883 petition.

In our view, Te Ōhākī Tapu represents the enduring wish of Te Rohe Pōtae people for a healthy and functioning Treaty relationship based on the mutual exchange of rights and powers enshrined in the Treaty, and on the expectation of mutual benefit on which the Treaty was based. As we have seen, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the course of the negotiations, acknowledged that the proper sphere for the exercise of kāwanatanga resided in Parliament, in its capacity to make laws for the benefit of Māori and New Zealanders generally. In terms of the Treaty relationship, the Crown’s role, through legislation, was to provide for and protect the rights that were guaranteed to Māori under the Treaty. So long as Parliament passed laws for the benefit of Māori and in a manner that was consistent with their tino rangatiratanga, it would be in fulfilment of its obligations under the Treaty.

Equally, Te Ōhākī Tapu expressed the right of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to tino rangatiratanga, and the practical manner in which that right would be exercised in their territory. This was not simply an acknowledgement of existing rights and authority under which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would continue to practise their own laws and customs in their communities. Rather, it involved statutory recognition of enduring rights of self-determination even as the colony developed and settlement occurred, along with recognition for and empowerment of institutions that were equipped to negotiate these new circumstances.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori described these powers using the term ‘mana whakahaere’, which was translated at the time as ‘full power and authority’. We understand this in simple terms as referring to the practical exercise of the right of autonomy and self-government. More specifically, it referred to the power of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to organise and exercise mana in the context that was presented to them in engaging with the Crown and with settlers as the colony expanded into their territories. This power of mana whakahaere was a practical expression of the Treaty’s guarantee of tino rangatiratanga under article 2 of the Treaty.

In the mid-1880s, the powers that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought primarily concerned their lands. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders wanted institutions that would allow them to exercise chiefly authority in determining the ownership of their land, and in deciding whether and how that land would be used for the communal benefit through development or, in some cases, alienation. Part of this exercise involved marking out the specific territory within which chiefly authority would endure, and protecting it in law and in tikanga. This, too, was in keeping with the Treaty's guarantee of tino rangatiratanga under article 2.

---

1219. Document 112, pp14–15.

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders also wanted powers to enable them to exercise authority in respect of issues of concern to their communities, such as the distribution of alcohol in their territory. This was also in keeping with their understanding of the provisions of article 2.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori stood to benefit from their relationships with settlers, should they have chosen to engage in the economic activities that might have occurred in the rohe as a result of lifting the aukati. While they did not seek economic development at the cost of their land and authority, they expected – and were promised by the Crown – that in opening their territory in a controlled fashion they would have the potential of deriving some economic benefit. This particularly applied to the construction of the railway and any benefits that stood to be derived from having settlers in their midst, including growth in the value of their land. The most important point was that if any opportunities did arise, they would have the potential to benefit equally alongside any other section of the population: the Crown would not advantage one party over another. In respect of land, Māori would be able to determine the extent to which settlement would occur, and the pace at which it would occur. This was their right, under both articles 2 and 3 of the Treaty.

In short, we recognise Te Ōhākī Tapu as a series of negotiations and agreements that were founded on the declaration by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in 1883 that the Crown should give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty. The utmost importance of these negotiations can be seen in the use by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders of the 1880s of the phrase 'Te Kī Tapu', or the 'sacred word', to describe the conduct they sought from the Crown. Their significance can also be seen in the term 'ōhākī, a last request or testament, which indicates the responsibility and legacy that these events created for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. In our view, the negotiations of the 1880s constituted a demand by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that the Crown use its power of kāwanatanga to provide statutory recognition for the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. They were therefore an opportunity to advance the Treaty relationship to a new level, with the following essential features:

- ▶ The recognition by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of the Crown's right of kāwanatanga, as exercised first and foremost through Parliament.
- ▶ The protection and provision by the Crown for the exercise of the mana whakahaere (full control and authority) and tikanga (law and values) of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within their own lands. The exercise of mana whakahaere included, among other things:
  - means by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could exercise full authority and power over their lands, including by determining ownership of land and the future management, use, and disposition of that land;
  - means by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could have authority over matters of importance to the well-being (economic, social, and cultural) of their people, including social issues such as the control of alcohol in their territory; and

- the mutual benefit arising from any Crown initiatives in the territory that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to, notably (at that time) those deriving from the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.

The details of this relationship – including the institutions and laws that would be required to give practical effect to both kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga in this district – required negotiation, in keeping with the Treaty principle of partnership. New circumstances would inevitably arise over time which would need to be worked out through discussion and dialogue.

While the details of the 1883–85 negotiations reflected the parties' particular concerns at the time, the relationship that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought with the Crown was an enduring one. Te Ōhāki Tapu continues to be of profound importance to the claimants, and – as we have noted previously – in our view it should have been given effect by the Crown. The events, negotiations, and agreements that comprised what claimants now call Te Ōhāki Tapu were all attempts by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to develop a functioning relationship with the Crown in which there was a place in the district for both kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga. The Crown did not provide for this in the 1880s. If it is serious about its Treaty relationship with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, it must do so now.

8.10.2 The Crown's Treaty breaches and the prejudice suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori

While the Crown had many opportunities to respond practically and reasonably to Te Ōhāki Tapū and to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty, it did not take advantage of them; in fact, there were many occasions on which it took the opposite path. Many of the actions the Crown took during the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements and their immediate aftermath were in breach of its Treaty obligations and had the effect of narrowing the options available to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as the relationship with the Crown proceeded through successive stages. This led to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori accepting compromises to their Treaty rights, in order to secure the minimal concessions the Crown was prepared to offer.

The Crown's Treaty breaches after Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to the railway construction caused widespread and long-lasting damage to the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and to the relationships between Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū. The lifting of the aukati, for example, followed the Crown's encouragement and acceptance of Native Land Court claims for lands within the 1883 petition area. However, the court's processes dealt a fatal blow to the determination of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to maintain their external boundary. This was precisely the result the Crown desired.

8.10.2.1 The Crown's response to the June 1883 petition

The Crown's acts in response to the June 1883 petition, in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori set out their Treaty rights, were in breach of the Treaty. The legislation that was passed, providing for some minimal reforms to the Native Land Court process and for the creation of native committees, was not an adequate response in the circumstances. The Government had no intention of making further reforms; nor are we convinced that the Government was hampered in its ability to do more. The Crown's failure to contemplate and put into effect a meaningful measure in response to the petition of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori constitutes a breach of the Treaty principles of autonomy and partnership, and the Crown's obligation to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. This was the first of the Crown's Treaty breaches during the period of the negotiations, which had significant effects on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

In the months following the hui, Bryce held back competing applications to the Native Land Court, in accordance with the December 1883 agreement, but he also encouraged iwi and hapū who had concerns about the boundary survey to resolve their differences in court when the time was right. His Government made no effort to address Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' concerns about the Native Committees Act or other Māori land laws. On the contrary, his Government developed policies aimed at supporting large-scale Crown purchasing of Māori land along the railway line, its intention being to use profits from that purchasing to fund the railway. Although the Government did not get an opportunity to implement this policy before it lost office at the 1884 election, the policy increased tensions among Te Rohe Pōtae tribes.

8.10.2.2 *The Stout–Vogel Government's initial approach to the railway and Māori land reforms

When the Stout–Vogel Government came to office in August 1884, it signalled its intention to press ahead as quickly as possible with the railway. Wahanui travelled to Wellington and spoke to both houses of Parliament, making clear that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would consent to the railway only if the Crown enacted laws to recognise and give effect to their 'mana whakahaere' ('full power and authority') over their whenua (territories). The Government made no effort to meet these demands. On the contrary, it actively rejected opportunities that were presented to it, first when Rees and Wi Pere presented proposals for land titles to be awarded to hapū and native committee powers to be increased, and, secondly, when it rejected a Legislative Council amendment to the Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill which would have empowered native committees to determine who owned land. If the Crown was unwilling to empower native committees in this manner, it could have explored alternatives with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, but it chose not to. By declining opportunities to provide for the mana whakahaere of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and in particular to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine iwi and hapū boundaries among themselves, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.

While it had not met the preconditions that Wahanui and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had put in place, the Crown nonetheless pushed on with its railway plans, announcing the preferred railway route, allocating funds for railway construction and land purchasing, beginning detailed surveys, and announcing plans to call for tenders for construction of the railway. Against strong opposition from Wahanui, it also enacted the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, prohibiting all private alienation of Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae and other areas surrounding the railway, while allowing the Crown to make purchases. By pressing ahead with preparations for the railway, and for settlement of the district, without first obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and by enacting legislation that restricted the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori without their consent, the Crown failed to actively protect their rights in land, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership. These breaches did not immediately affect the landholdings of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, but did limit the options of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in future dealings with the Crown. Their stance in future negotiations was influenced by the knowledge that the Crown would not always honour their demands and was determined to give its railway and settlement objectives priority over their Treaty rights.

8.10.2.3 *The effect of Ballance's promises at the Kihikihi hui

Ballance had a significant opportunity to put matters right at the Kihikihi hui and went further than any of his predecessors in making promises to empower native committees and protect the rights of Māori landowners. In making these promises, Ballance did not clearly explain that the Government had yet to make decisions and that it was therefore possible that some of his promises might not come to fruition. Nor was he fully open about the Government's intentions to purchase land within the district. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were making decisions about the future of their district and its land and were therefore entitled to nothing less than full disclosure of the Crown's goals and policies, including any areas of uncertainty. By failing to be fully open, Ballance denied Te Rohe Pōtae Māori the opportunity to make a fully informed decision about his proposals, or about the railway. Through his actions, the Crown therefore breached its duty to negotiate fairly, honourably, and in good faith.

8.10.2.4 *The Crown's failure to keep its promises

In December 1883, the Crown promised to survey the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae as described in the June 1883 petition. According to the letters that were exchanged between the parties, a Crown grant to the petitioners would follow completion of the boundary survey. Bryce promised to hold back competing Native Land Court applications until the boundary survey had been completed. The Crown did not keep these promises. In 1884, its surveyors excluded the Mokau-Mohakatino and Mohakatino-Parinihi blocks as they had already been before the court for title determination. By following this course, the Crown was insisting that its land title determination processes, to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had never consented except to the extent necessary to confirm the boundary, would take precedence over the clearly expressed wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and over the terms of the 1883 agreement. This was a plain breach of the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and of the Crown's duty to act honourably and in good faith in its relationships with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The Crown's failure to consult on this matter meant that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders entered their February 1885 negotiations with the Crown under the impression that the boundary would be honoured. Had they known it would not be, they might have made different decisions.

Later, in 1885, the Crown encouraged and then accepted Native Land Court applications for the Taupouiatia and Waimarino blocks. Both of these blocks encroached on the external boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae as described in the June 1883 petition. The Central North Island and National Park Tribunals found that these applications could have been avoided if the Crown had taken reasonable steps to empower the tribes involved to determine land title among themselves. By encouraging and then accepting the Taupouiatia and Waimarino applications in spite of its earlier agreements, the Crown failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith, and therefore breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatira-tanga and the principle of partnership. These applications, combined with the Crown's failure to empower Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine land titles among themselves, left the remaining tribes with little option but to place their own lands before the court. Once the Taupouiatia and Waimarino hearings began, it was no longer possible for the promised Crown grant to be issued over the territory covered by the December 1883 agreement. Te Rohe Pōtae tribes were instead set on a course that would ultimately lead to individualisation and fragmentation of title, and a breakdown of communal authority which would render land vulnerable to sale against community wishes, as we will see in chapters 10 and 11.

At Kihikihi in February 1885, Ballance made numerous promises and assurances to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, and it was on the basis of these promises and assurances that they gave their consent to the railway. The Crown acknowledged that it promised to provide native committees with a greater role in Native Land Court processes and 'a measure of self-government'; that it promised to empower committees of owners to control alienation of land; and that it promised that all land sales and leases would take place in a free market. It acknowledged that it had 'failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it did not fulfil these representations, and thereby breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles by not acting in good faith and by failing to respect their rangatiratanga'.<sup>1220</sup> We agree with this concession, while noting that the Crown also breached the principle of partnership by failing to re-engage over these promises. Even though it had chosen not to honour key elements of the February 1885 agreement, the Crown nonetheless went ahead with construction of the railway.

We also concluded that the Crown failed to honour Ballance's assurances about the Crown's land purchasing intentions. Ballance had given assurances that the Crown intended only to acquire small amounts of land along the railway line so long as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori voluntarily made land available by leasing. By August 1885, Ballance had publicly committed to buying 1.5 million acres of Māori land along the railway line, and from that time the Crown began to actively prepare for land purchasing on a significant scale, for example by voting funds and appointing purchase agents. By failing to keep its promise, the Crown breached its duty to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith. By committing to a large-scale purchasing programme for Te Rohe Pōtae lands without first seeking or obtaining the consent of the district's leaders, the Crown failed to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights in land and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of autonomy and partnership. Because the title determination process had not begun in Te Rohe Pōtae, the Crown could not immediately begin purchasing and would not do so until 1890 (see chapter 11).

---

1220. Submission 3.4.307, para 66.

8.10.2.5 *The Crown's failure to give effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Maori

The essence of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought, in return for the railway, was for the Crown to give practical effect to their tino rangatiratanga (or, to use the term they adopted, their mana whakahaere). As discussed in section 8.10.1.3 and in the sections immediately above, the Crown repeatedly failed to take reasonable steps to do this. It failed to complete the agreed survey of the external boundary. It repeatedly failed to take opportunities to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine land titles among themselves, or to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae communities to administer their lands as they wished. It pressed ahead with preparations for the construction of the railway and the purchasing of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands, without first obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. (Ultimately, as we will see in a later chapter, it also failed to provide for mana whakahaere with respect to social issues, in particular the control of liquor.) In all of these ways, it failed to honour the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, failed to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in possession and authority over their lands, and thereby breached the principle of autonomy.

8.11 PREJUDICE

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered significant and long-lasting prejudice from these Treaty breaches.

The first effect was felt on the relationship between the iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae: Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Hikairo, and Māori of the northern Whanganui region. Rangatira from these iwi had established a process under tikanga, through Taonui Hikaka's process of setting out pou roherohe in the boundaries of the district, to protect the mana and tino rangatiratanga of communities. This was done with the intention that their traditional forms of authority could be maintained, through traditional means of decision-making. That was their right to do so under the Treaty.

However, the Crown's actions caused significant damage to these relationships, which began to tell from shortly after the June 1883 petition was submitted to Parliament. The iwi were soon pitted against each other, which led to applications to the Native Land Court from Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui groups for the determination of title to their lands both in and outside the rohe. This caused damage to their tikanga, with long-term ramifications, particularly as the land came before the court.

The Crown's actions also caused significant damage to the ability of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to exercise their mana and their tino rangatiratanga in respect of their lands and their communities. This could be seen most notably in the swift decline of the Kawhia Native Committee, which had so much promise as a body to exercise mana whakahaere had it been properly empowered. The prejudice they suffered in this respect feeds directly into our analysis of issues in the subsequent chapters of our report, where we consider matters such as railway construction, title determination, land alienation, and control of liquor.

While the direct impacts of the Crown's actions are discussed in these chapters, the long-term ramifications were felt by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in other areas of life well into the twentieth century, and therefore feature as part of our consideration of issues in the chapters that follow.

As a consequence of the Crown's actions, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori have had their ability to exercise their tino rangatiratanga and their mana in respect of their ancestral lands, waterways, and associated resources seriously damaged. Their economic base was seriously undermined, leaving them unable to participate on an equitable basis in the colonial economy. Although connections with these lands and resources have continued, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori have not been able to utilise or care for them in the ways they had in the past.

8.12 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Our key conclusions and findings in this chapter have been:

- ▶ We recognise Te Ōhākī Tapu as a series of negotiations and agreements that were founded on the declaration by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in 1883 that the Crown should give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty. The utmost importance of these negotiations can be seen in the use by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders of the 1880s of the phrase 'Te Kī Tapu', or the 'sacred word', to describe the conduct they sought from the Crown. Their significance can also be seen in the term ōhākī, a last request or testament, which indicates the responsibility and legacy that these events created for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. In our view, the negotiations of the 1880s constituted a demand by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that the Crown use its power of kāwanatanga to provide statutory recognition for the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. They were therefore an opportunity to advance the Treaty relationship to a new level, with the following essential features:
  - ▶ The recognition by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of the Crown's right of kāwanatanga, as exercised first and foremost through Parliament.
  - ▶ The protection and provision by the Crown for the exercise of the mana whakahaere (full control and authority) and tikanga (law and values) of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within their own lands. The exercise of mana whakahaere included, among other things:
    - means by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could exercise full authority and

- power over their lands, including by determining ownership of land and the future management, use, and disposition of that land;
- means by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could have authority over matters of importance to the well-being (social, economic, and cultural) of their people, including social issues such as the control of alcohol in their territory; and
  - the mutual benefit arising from any Crown initiatives in the territory that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to, notably including (at that time) those deriving from the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.
- The details of this relationship – including the institutions and laws that would be required to give practical effect to both kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga in this district – required negotiation, in keeping with the Treaty principle of partnership. New circumstances would inevitably arise over time which would need to be worked out through discussion and dialogue.
- The Crown failed to take up this opportunity, and at times actively undermined it. During the course of the negotiations that were entered into from March 1883, and following the agreement of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the railway, the Crown failed to provide for or actively protect the rights that were guaranteed to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori under article 2, and breached the principle of autonomy.
- On several occasions during the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements, the Crown failed to be fully open with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about its policies or intentions, or misled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, breaching its obligation to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith. It thereby breached the principle of partnership.
- In respect of specific events:
- In its response to the June 1883 petition, which included the Native Committees Act 1883 and the Native Lands Amendment Act 1883, the Crown failed to empower Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to determine land titles among themselves, failed to empower Te Rohe Pōtae communities to manage lands as they wished, and failed to prohibit land sales, thereby breaching the Treaty principles of autonomy and partnership, and the Crown's duty to actively protect the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.
  - By informing Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that they would have to make an application to the Native Land Court in order to have the boundary of the June 1883 petition area surveyed, the Crown misled them and therefore breached its Treaty obligation to negotiate honestly and in good faith, and therefore breached the principle of partnership.
  - By pressing ahead with preparations for the railway, and for settlement of the district, without first providing for the mana whakahaere of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (in particular by providing for them to determine land titles among themselves), the Crown failed to actively protect their rights in land, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.
  - By enacting the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884 while disregarding opportunities to empower native committees to determine land titles, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.

- By refusing to complete its survey of the external boundary as agreed in December 1883, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith in its relationships with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.
  - In the February 1885 negotiations at Kihikihi, the Native Minister John Ballance was not fully open about the Crown's land purchasing intentions, or about areas of uncertainty in government policy with respect to native committees. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori may have made different decisions about the railway if they had been fully informed. The Crown therefore breached its duty to negotiate fairly, honourably, and in good faith.
  - Following the Kihikihi hui, the Crown introduced and enacted the Native Land Administration Act 1886 and the Native Land Court Act 1886, without keeping its promises to increase the powers of native committees or fully empowering Māori landowners to make communal decisions about land management and disposition. The Crown thereby breached its duty to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith, failed to actively protect the authority of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of autonomy.
  - By committing in 1885 to a large-scale land purchasing programme for Te Rohe Pōtae lands without first seeking or obtaining the consent of the district's leaders, and in spite of previous assurances to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders which had contributed to their decision to consent to the railway, the Crown breached its duty to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith, failed to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights in land, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of autonomy and partnership.
  - By encouraging and then accepting the Taupouuiatia and Waimarino applications in spite of its December 1883 promise to hold back applications that breached the boundary, the Crown failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith, and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.
- Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered prejudice from these Treaty breaches through:
- damage to relationships between hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae, which undermined their ability to act collectively to preserve their mana whakahaere;
  - the loss of control over the title determination process, when the land subsequently went through the Native Land Court;
  - the loss of control over their ability to determine the management and disposition of their land interests, particularly whether their land should be alienated or not; and
  - the loss of control over certain social issues that affected them.

CHAPTER 8 APPENDIX I

THE 1883 PETITION OF THE FOUR TRIBES

Reproduced from AJHR, 1883, J-1, pp 1-4

Ki te Kawana o te Koronui o Niu Tireni ki nga Mema o nga Whare e rua.

HE PITIHANA tenei na matou na nga IWI o MANIAPOTO, o RAUKAWA, o TUWHARETOA, o WHANGANUI, ki te PAREMETE: TENA KOUTOU.

E INOI atu ana matou kia tino tirohia e koutou, kia tino whakaarohia ano hoki nga mea e whakapouri nei ia matou, e arai mai nei i mua i o matou aroaro; na te mea, ko aua tikanga e whakapouri nei ia matou, i ahu mai ia koutou i te pakeha te nuninga, ko te take, na runga in nga ture e hanga ana e koutou.

Kua tino tirohia hoki e matou te aronga o te mahinga a nga ture i hanga nei e koutou, i te tuatahi tae mai ana ki o tenei ra, e ahu katoa ana te aronga o aua ture ki te tango i nga painga i whakaturutia kia matou e nga wahi tuarua tuatoru o te Tiriti o Waitangi, i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga, me te kore ano hoki e whakararua ta matou matou noho i runga i o matou whenua.

Ko nga ture katoa I hanga nei e koutou mo te taha ki o matou whenua, kaore rawa matou i kite painga i roto o aua ture, ana whakamahia ki te whakarite whakawa ki runga ki nga whenua Maori i roto i nga Kooti Whenua Maori ki Kemureti me era atu wahi; a, kua waiho aua tikanga e mahia nei ki nga Kooti Whenua hei tikanga whakapouri hei pikaunga taimaha anohoki ki runga kia matou. Na runga i to matou kuare ki te whatu o roto o aua ture, riro ana matou te whakawai e nga Horo Whenua me a ratou tangata, kia tukua etehi o matou whenua kia Kootitia kia tuturu ai o matou whenua kia matou; E Pa ma, i runga i te tukunga atu o etehi o matou whenua kia Kootita (sic), no wai te mana i tuturu ki runga ki aua whenua? He pono, i puta mai ano ki nga Maori he Tiwhikete hei whakaatu i tona tika ki runga ki te whenua i te mutunga iho o aua whakawa, otiia, na runga i te matau o te pakeha, wairangi noa te Maori ki te whakaae ki nga Roia e whakaturia mai ana e nga Horo Whenua, tohu noa matou, e no matou aua Roia; kaore, he kumekume i ngawhakawhakanga kia roa, kia nui ai nga moni e pau, kia kore ai nga Maori e kaha kit e utu, kia hopu ai o ratou ringa ki te wheneua, tona tukunga, iho, mau ana ko te wairua i nga Maori, ko te whatu, riro ke ana i nga Horo Whenua.

Kua oti hoki matou te karapoti e nga mahi nanakia katoa, e nga mahi whakawai a nga Horo Whenua tae mai ana ano ki etehi o nga Maori, me nga awhekaihe kua oti nei te here e nga Kamupene kia ratou, hei taki atu ia matou ki roto ki nga kupenga a nga Kamupene.

I runga i te nui rawa o to matou raruraru ki te kimi i etehi tikanga hei wawao i o matou whenua, i nga mate kua oti nei te whakatakoto, ka ui matou mehemea kaore he ture hei peehi mo enei mahi kino, ka utua mai kahore, heoiano tona tikanga me haere tahi ki te Kooti.

Na ia matou e kaha ana ki te pupuru i o matou whenua, e mohio ana matou kei te tahuri to koutou kawanatanga ki te whakatuhera i to matou takiwa, ia koutou e mea nei ki te hanga i nga Rori, i nga Ruuri teihana, me nga Rerewe, koia ka whakawatea i te ara hei mahinga mo enei mahi kino ki runga ki o matou whenua i te mea kaore ano i hanga paitia nga tikanga mo nga ra e takoto mai nei.

Me whakaae atu koia matou ki enei tikanga e mahia nei i runga i te kupu kore?

Ko ta matou kupu tenei, ki te waiho ko enei tikanga kua whakahuatia ake nei hei tikanga mo nga ra e takoto mai nei, e mahara ana matou kaore e tika kia whakatuheratia to matou takiwa ki enei tikanga whakarihariha.

He aha te pai kia matou o nga Rori, o nga Rerewe o nga Kooti Whenua, mehemea ka waiho enei hei ara rironga mo o matou whenua, ka ora noa atu hoki matou ki te noho penei, kua he Rori, kua he Rerewe kua he Kooti, otia, e kore matou e ora mehemea ki te kahore atu o matou whenua ia matou.

E hara i te mea e kuare ana matou ki nga painga e puta mai ana i roto i te oti o nga Rori o nga Rerewe, me era atu mahi pai a te Pakeha, kei te tino mohio matou, e ngari, ko o matou whenua te mea pai ake i enei katoa.

Ko nga mea tenei e whakapouri nei i a matou ko nga mea kua oti nei te whakamarama iho.

I roto ano i te tau nei, i whiriwhiria ai e nga hapu etehi tangata hei whakahaere i te rohe o to matou whenua, ki te whakaaraa pou hei tohu mo nga whenua e toe mai aua kia matou e tuku atu nei i tenei Petihana, kaore nei te Pakeha ki ta matou mohio iho e whai paanga ana ki te whenua i runga i te ritenga o te ture.

Ka tonu atu tenei matou kia whakamana mai e to koutou tino Whare enei tikanga ka tonoa atu nei.

1. E hiahia ana matou kia kore matou e mate i te nui rawa o nga rorerore o te whakamahinga o te Kooti Whenua Māori i te whakamahinga i o matou take whenua; kia wehe atu ano koki nga tikanga tahae, nga mahi haurangi, nga mahi whakatutua tangata, me nga mahi whakarihariha katoa e aru nei i muri i nga nohoanga o nga Kooti.

2. Me hanga mai ano hoki e te Paremete, tetehi ture hei whakapumau, i o matou whenua kia matou, me o matou uri, mo ake tonu atu, kia kore rawa e taea te hoko.

3. Kia waiho ma matou ano e whiriwhiri nga rohe o nga Iwi e wha kua whakahuaina ake nei, me nga rohe o nga hapu o roto o aua Iwi, me te aronga o te nui o te paanga o ia tangata ki nga whenua o roto o te whakahaerenga rohe ka tuhia iho nei ki tenei Petihana.

Koia tenei te rohe?—

Timata i Kawhia, ka rere mai ki Whitiura, tapahi tonu mai i runga o Pirongia, ka heke iho ki runga o Pukehoua, ki te puau o Mangauika, haere i roto o Waipa, te puau o Puniu, haere i roto o Puniu, te puau o Wairaka haere tonu Mangakaretu, haere i uta, Mangere, ka makere ki roto o Waikato, haere tonu, te puau o Mangakino haere tonu, i roto o Waikato, te puau o Waipapa, haere i uta, te Parakiri, rere tonu Whangamata, Taporaroa, ka makere ki roto o Taupo, te au o Waikato, i waenganui o Taupo, ki Motuoapa, te Tokakopuru, Ngutunui, te Kopiha, te Whakamoenga, te Riaka, te Matau, rere tonu Hirihiri, Tauranga, rere tonu i roto o Tauranga te matapuna, ka tapahi i runga o Kaimanawa, te matapuna o Rangitikei, haere i roto o Rangitikei, te Akeake, haere i te rohe o Ruamatua, te matapuna o Moeawhango haere i te rohe o Rangipo, Waipahihi, ka makere ki Waikato ka haere i te au o Waikato, Nukuhaupe, ka kati ki Paretetaitonga, ka huri ki tua o Paretetaitonga, te Kohatu, Mahuia, te Rerenga o Toakoru, te Takutai, Piopioatea, te Ruharuha, Hautawa, te Hunua, Manganui, te Murumuru, te Iringa o te Whiu, te Makahiroi, Pukehou, Huirau, ka makere ki roto o Whanganui, Paparoa, haere i roto o te awa o Paparoa, te Maanga a Whatihua, rere tonu i roto o Paparoa, Makahikatoa rere tonu, ka piki i te Upoko o Purangi, te Ruakerikeri, te Puta o te Hapi, rere tonu te Araware, te matapuna o Pikopiko te Tarua te Kaikoara, te Patunga o Hikairo, te Kiekie, ka Makere ki Ohura rere tonu te Whauwhau, Kokopu, Oheao, haere i roto i Oheao, te Motumaire, piki tonu i te hiwi o te Motumaire, ka heke ki Taungarakau, rere tonu te puau o te Waitanga, haere tonu, te Rerepahupahu, haere, Opuhukoura, te Hunua, te Rotowhara, te Matai, Waitara te Matawai o Waipingao, ka puta ki te puaha, e ruatekau maero ki te Moana nui, rere atu i waenga moana, ki te taha hau-raro, ka huri mai ano ki Kawhia ki te timatanga.

4. A te wa e rite ai enei whakaritenga mo te aronga ki te whenua, me whakatu mai e te Kawanatanga etehi tangata whaimana, hei whakapumau i a matou whiri-whiringa me a matou whakaaetanga ki runga i te ritenga o te ture.

5. A te wa e oti ai te whakatau o te nui o te paanga o ia tangata o ia tangata ki te whenua, ka hiahia te tangata ki te reti, e kore e mana te reti e whakaritea e tona kotahi, e ngari me panui marire ki roto ki nga nupepa kua oti te whakarite mo taua mahi, hei whakaatu i te takiwa e hokona ai te rihi o aua whenua e hiahia ana ki aretia, kia ahei ai te katoa te haere mai ki te hokonga o aua rihi.

E hara i te mea he hiahia no matou ki te pupuru i nga whenua o roto i te whaka-haerenga rohe kua tuhia iho nei ki tenei Pitihana kia puru ki te Pakeha, ki nga mahi reti, ki nga Rori ranei kia kaua e mahia ki roto; i nga mahi ranei a te iwi nui kia kaua e mahia; e ngari he hiahia kia kore atu nga mahinga a nga Kooti Whenua ia ratou e mahi nei.

Kia mohio ano hoki koutou, ki te whakaaetia mai ta matou Pitihana ka tino awhina matou ki nga ritenga e nui haere ai nga ara, e puta mai ai nga painga ki tenei motu; a ka tino inoi tonu atu matou kia tino manakohia e koutou tenei Pitihana.

Ko nga kai awhina enei i tenei Pitihana ka whakapirihia mai nei ki tua.

WAHANUI

TAONUI

REWI MANIAPOTO

Me ona hoa e 412.

Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Ehanganui Tribes

Presented to the House of Representatives, 26th June, and ordered to be printed.

[Translation.]

To the Governor of New Zealand and the Members of both Houses of Parliament.

This is a Petition from us the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes, to Parliament; Greeting.

Your petitioners pray that you will fully look into and carefully consider the matters which are the cause of much anxiety to us, and are raising a barrier in front of us, because these matters that are causing us anxiety have principally emanated from you, the Europeans, in the form of legislation.

We have carefully watched the tendency of the laws which you have enacted from the beginning up to the present day; they all tend to deprive us of the privileges secured to us by the second and third articles of the Treaty of Waitangi, which confirmed to us the exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands.

We do not see any good in any of the laws which you have enacted affecting our lands, when they are brought into operation, in adjudicating upon lands before the Native Land Court at Cambridge and other places; and the practices carried on at the Land Courts have become a source of anxiety to us and a burden upon us.

Through our ignorance of those laws we have been induced by speculators (land-swallowers) and their agents to allow some of our lands to be adjudicated upon so that our lands might be secured to us.

Sirs, having allowed some of our lands to be adjudicated upon, who was it that became possessed of them? It is true that after the investigations the Natives received a certificate of title showing their right to the lands, but through the superior knowledge of the Europeans we accepted foolishly the lawyers recommended to us by the speculators (land-swallowers), thinking that they were to act in our interests, but in reality they were intended to prolong the investigations, thereby increasing the expenses to so great an extent that the Natives were unable to defray them, so that they (the speculators) might seize the land, the result being that we secure the shadow and the speculators (land-swallowers) the substance.

We are beset on every side by outrageous practices and the temptations we are exposed to by speculators and even Maoris and half-castes, whom the companies have secured to decoy us into the nets of the companies.

In our perplexity to devise some means by which we could extricate our lands from the disasters pointed out, we ask, is there not a law by which we could suppress these evils? and we are told that the only remedy is to go to the Court ourselves.

Now, while we are striving to keep our lands, we are aware that your Government is trying to open our country by making roads, carrying on trig. surveys and railways, thereby clearing the way for all these evils to be practised in connection with our lands before we have made satisfactory arrangements for the future.

Are we to allow the present system to be carried on without remonstrance?

We wish to state that, if the above-mentioned practices are to be carried on in future, we think that it would not be right that our land should be rendered liable to such an objectionable system.

What possible benefit would we derive from roads, railways, and Land Courts if they became the means of depriving us of our lands? We can live as we are situated at present, without roads, railways, or Courts, but we could not live without our lands.

We are not oblivious of the advantages to be derived from roads, railways, and other desirable works of the Europeans. We are fully alive to these advantages, but our lands are preferable to them all.

The matters set forth above are the cause of our anxiety.

During the present year certain persons were selected by the hapus to define the boundaries of our lands, and erect posts to mark out the lands still remaining to us, your petitioners, upon which the European, to the best of our knowledge, has no legal claim.

We, therefore, pray that your Honourable House will give effect to the following:—

1. It is our wish that we may be relieved from the entanglements incidental to employing the Native Land Court to determine our titles to the land, also to prevent fraud, drunkenness, demoralization, and all other objectionable results attending sittings of the Land Court.

2. That Parliament will pass a law to secure our lands to us and our descendants for ever, making them absolutely inalienable by sale.

3. That we may ourselves be allowed to fix the boundaries of the four tribes before mentioned, the hapu boundaries in each tribe, and the proportionate claim of each individual within the boundaries set forth in this petition, which are as follows:—

Commencing at Kawhia, from thence to Whitiura, thence over Pirongia to Pukehoua, thence to the mouth of the Manganika, following up Waipa to the mouth of the Puniu, along the Puniu to the mouth of Wairaka, along Wairaka to Mangakaretu, from thence to Mangere, thence to the Waikato, following the Waikato to the mouth of Mangakino, thence still following the Waikato to Waipapa, thence to Parakiri, thence to Whangamata, thence to Taporaroa, thence to Lake Taupo, following the course of Waikato in the centre of Lake Taupo to Motu-o-Apa, thence to Tokakopuru, thence to Ngutunui, thence to Kopiha, thence to Whakamoenga, thence to Riaka, thence to Matau, thence to Te Hirihiri, thence to Tauranga, following up Tauranga to its source, thence to the summit of Kaimanawa, thence to the source of Rangitikei, following down to Te Akeake, thence along the boundary of Ruamatua to the source of the Moeawhango, following the boundary of Rangipo to Waipahihi, from thence into Waikato, following Waikato to Nukuhaupe, thence to Paretetaitonga, thence to Te Kohatu, thence to Mahuia, thence to Te Rerenga-o-Toakoru, thence to Takutai, thence to Piopioatea, thence to Te Ruharuha, thence to Te Hautawa, thence to Te Hunua, Manganui, Te Murumuru, Te Iringa-o-te-Whiu, Te Makahiroi, Pukehou, and Huirau, thence into Whanganui, thence to Te Paparua, along Paparua Stream to Maanga-a-whatihua, thence to Paparoa, thence to Makahikatoa, thence over Te Upoko-o-Purangi to Te Ruakerikeri, thence to Puta-o-Hapi, Te Arawaere, thence to the source of Pikopiko, thence to Te Tarua te Kaikoara, Te Patunga-o-Hikairo, Te Kiekie, Ohura, Te Whauwhau, Kokopu, Oheao, thence over the Motumaire Ridge into Taungarakau, along Taungarakau to the mouth of Waitanga, following Waitanga to Te Rerepahupahu, following Rerepahupahu to Opuhukoura to Te Hunua, thence to Te Rotowhara, Matai, Waitara, Waipingao, following Waipingao out to the coast, thence twenty miles out to sea, and then taking a northerly course twenty miles at sea to Kahwia, the starting point.

When these arrangements relating to land claims are completed, let the Government appoint some persons vested with power to confirm our arrangements and decisions in accordance with law.

If, after any individual shall have had the extent of his claim ascertained, he should desire to lease, it should not be legal for him to do so privately, but an advertisement should be duly inserted in any newspaper that has been authorized for the purpose, notifying time and place where the sale of the lease of such land will be held, in order that the public may attend the sale of such lease.

There is no desire on our part to keep the lands within the boundaries described in this petition locked up from Europeans, or to prevent leasing, or roads from being made therein, or other public works being constructed, but it is our desire that the present practices that are being carried on at the Land Courts should be abolished.

We wish you to understand that, if our petition is granted, we will strenuously endeavour to follow such a course as will conduce to the welfare of this Island.

And your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

WAHANUI,
TAONUI,
REWI MANIAPOTO,
And 412 others.

WAHANUI'S SPEECHES TO PARLIAMENT

WAHANUI'S SPEECH TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 1 NOVEMBER 1884

Wahanui spoke to the House of Representatives on 1 November 1884. His speech was in te reo Māori, with a translation by Captain Gilbert Mair. The speech and translation follow:

E te Pika tena koe me nga Mema o tenei Kaunihera, tena koutou. I hiahia ahau kia tae mai au ki tenei Whare ki te whakapuaki i te hiahia o toku iwi. I whaikupu ano ahau ki tera Whare o te Paremete i runga i aua hiahia o toku iwi. Tuatahi, ko te tino take o aua hiahia kia tau ano ki au te mana whakahaere i toku whenua, I raro ano i te mana o te Kawana. Kahore ano kia pa noa te ringa o te pakeha ki enei whenua. Kua roa ahau e noho ana i konei, kua kite hoki au i te Pire a te Kawanatanga. I kite au he nui rawa nga niho o taua Pire. He niho katoa kei te tinana a he tara ano kei te whiore e mau aua. No muri mai nei i taku whikorero ki tera Ware katahi au ka kite kua mahia paitia taua Pire e te Kawanatanga. Kua unuhia e te Kawanatanga te nuinga o nga niho o taua Pire, kotahi tonu te mea i kite au e mau tonu aua. Ka nui taku whakakino mo tenei niho e mau tonu nei, a e inoi ana ahau ki tenei Kaunihera kia kaua e whakamana taua rarangi o te Pire. E tono ana hoki au kia kaua e mana te Kooti ki runga ki aua whenua inainei. Kaore au i te ki me kaua rawa e mana te Kooti engari e mea ana ahau kaua e pa atu ki aua whenua i tenei wa, engari taihoa marire kia ta te manawa, kia taea ai te ata whakarite marire ki te Kawanatanga, a kia rite raano he tikanga hei reira e tika ai kia rapua he tikanga mo nga mahi o muri atu. Kaore au i te arai i te Kawanatanga, engari e hiahia ana ano ahau ki te whakahoia i a ratou, kia taea ai te whakahaere pai i taua takiwa. Koia nei te tuatahi o aku whakahe mo taua Pire. Tuarua, e hiahia ana ahau ki a whakamana te Komiti, kia tukua ma te Komiti e whakahaere katoa nga mahi i runga i nga whenua i roto i taua takiwa. Engari hoki ki taku titiro atu kua ahua ngawari mai te Kawanatanga ki ta matou i pai ai. E whakapuaki atu ana au i tenei tono inaianei kei raruraru ano tatou a muri rake nei, a ka kataina tatou e era atu Komiti me era atu whenua o te Ao. I mahara tonu au he mea tapu tenei Paremete, he tapu hoki ana mahi me haere i runga i te pono me te tika. Tuatoru, e hiahia ana ahau kia pai te hanga i nga ture mo nga iwi e rua, kia rite tahi te whakahaere mo te iwi Maori me te iwi Pakeha, kia pai ai te noho tahi i roto i nga tau e haere ake nei. Kati ra aku kupu mo tenei mea, heoi ano ra ka whakapai atu ahau kia koutou mo to koutou whakaae kia tae mai au ki to koutou aroaro. Kia ora koutou e noho ana ikonei ki te mahi i nga ture i runga i te ngakau tika me te ngakau pai.<sup>1</sup>

Mr Speaker, salutations to you. To all the honourable members of this House, salutations. It was my great desire to speak before this House on behalf of my people. That brought me here. There are two subjects for which I was sent here. My first reason was to explain to you my sentiments; my second, that I might look upon the works that are being done in this House. I will now speak the wishes and the words of my tribe. The first subject on which I shall speak concerns our lands—the ancestral lands of myself and my people. I say that we wish to have the sole administration of those lands. Secondly, I do not wish the action of the Native Land Court to be brought into force over those lands. The reason of this request is, that the lands that I speak of are ancestral lands, and the hands of the Europeans have never touched them. No white man's foot has trodden upon those lands, nor has any European obtained authority over them, either by lease or otherwise. This is the reason why I say that we should have the administration of those lands; but afterwards I will ask this House to help me to devise a law for administering them. I have already mentioned my ideas on this subject to the Native Minister. His word to me was, "Your ideas are good." After I had been in this place some time, I saw the proposed Bill. When I saw this Bill I found that it had great sharp teeth from the head to the mouth, and there was a sting also in its tail. I saw that its teeth were very sharp, and were designed to swallow up the people, and that the sting also will destroy the land. When I saw those sharp teeth I thought in this way: This watch which I hold in my hand is mine; and, if it require repairs, let me take it to the watchmaker and have it repaired. I will explain to the watchmaker what requires to be done to it, and then he can repair it according to my directions. Then, when he has repaired it, he returns it to me, and I pay him for it, and then it is mine to do what I please with. I apply this idea to my land, and I think it is a parallel case to my land. I hope that the House will duly consider my words. Do not let the House be carried away with a desire to obtain lands, but rather let the House consider that which is just and right. These are my ideas on this subject, and since I have seen the Bill I asked the Native Minister if he would consent to my inserting some provisions. At present there is no embarrassment with regard to my land; the title to it is undisputed. But I am actuated by a fear that trouble will come upon it. That is why I come here now. The object of Tawhiao's visit to England was lest the laws passed in this House should injuriously affect his land, and it has been the head of the Government in England that has told Tawhiao to come back to New Zealand. Therefore I ask this House to pass just laws with regard to my land. I hope, also, that this House will carefully consider, carry out, and give effect to the laws of that great lady who lives in England—I mean the Queen—so that the laws for both races, the Natives and Europeans, may be carefully administered. Do not let such laws as some of the clauses in this proposed Bill be affirmed. They appear to have been drafted, or designed, without due consideration. These are my words to this House: I claim the consideration of this House, and ask it to give effect to my wish and the wish of my people, and that the authority over our lands may be vested in our Committee. Another request I have to make is that the sale of spirits within our district shall be stopped absolutely. I do not want that great evil brought upon our people. I hope this House will be strong in preventing this evil coming upon us and upon our people. That is all I have to say, and I can only add that it is my great desire and wish that you pass just laws with respect to my land and my people.<sup>2</sup>

---

1. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaV01NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2-d1.html>, accessed 4 June 2018.

WAHANUI'S SPEECH TO THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, 6 NOVEMBER 1884

E te Pika tena koe me nga Mema o tenei Kaunihera, tena koutou. I hiahia ahau kia tae mai au ki tenei Whare ki te whakapuaki i te hiahia o toku iwi. I whaikupu ano ahau ki tera Whare o te Paremete i runga i aua hiahia o toku iwi. Tuatahi, ko te tino take o aua hiahia kia tau ano ki au te mana whakahaere i toku whenua, I raro ano i te mana o te Kawana. Kahore ano kia pa noa te ringa o te pakeha ki enei whenua. Kua roa ahau e noho ana ikonei, kua kite hoki au i te Pire a te Kawanatanga. I kite au he nui rawa nga niho o taua Pire. He niho katoa kei te tinana a he tara ano kei te whiore e mau aua. No muri mai nei i taku whikorero ki tera Ware katahi au ka kite kua mahia paitia taua Pire e te Kawanatanga. Kua unuhia e te Kawanatanga te nuinga o nga niho o taua Pire, kotahi tonu te mea i kite au e mau tonu aua. Ka nui taku whakakino mo tenei niho e mau tonu nei, a e inoi ana ahau ki tenei Kaunihera kia kaua e whakamana taua rarangi o te Pire. E tonono ana hoki au kia kaua e mana te Kooti ki runga ki aua whenua inainei. Kaore au i te ki me kaua rawa e mana te Kooti engari e mea ana, ahau kaua e pa atu ki aua whenua i tenei wa, engari taihoa marire kia ta te manawa, kia taea ai te ata whakarite marire ki te Kawanatanga, a kia rite raano he tikanga hei reira e tika ai kia rapua he tikanga mo nga mahi o muri atu. Kaore au i te arai i te Kawanatanga, engari e hiahia ana ano ahau ki te whakahoia a ratou, kia taea ai te whakahaere pai i taua takiwa. Koia nei te tuatahi o aku whakahe mo taua Pire. Tuarua, e hiahia ana ahau ki a whakamana te Komiti, kia tukua ma te Komiti e whakahaere katoa nga mahi i runga i nga whenua i roto i taua takiwa. Engari hoki ki taku titiro atu kua ahua ngawari mai te Kawanatanga ki ta matou i pai ai. E whakapuaki atu ana au i tenei tono inaianei kei raruraru ano tatou a muri rake nei, a ka kaitaina tatou e era atu Komiti me era atu whenua o te Ao. I mahara tonu au he mea tapu tenei Paremete, he tapu hoki ana mahi me haere i runga i te pono me te tika. Tuatoru, e hiahia ana ahau kia pai te hanga i nga ture mo nga iwi e rua, kia rite tahi te whakahaere mo te iwi Maori me te iwi Pakeha, kia pai ai te noho tahi i roto i nga tau e haere ake nei. Kati ra aku kupu mo tenei mea, heoi ano ra ka whakapai atu ahau kia koutou mo to koutou

---

2. 'Native Land Settlement Bill', NZPD, 1884, vol 50, pp555-556.

whakaae kia tae mai au ki to koutou aroaro. Kia ora koutou e noho ana ikonei ki te mahi i nga ture i runga i te ngakau tika me te ngakau pai.<sup>3</sup>

Mr Speaker, I have to salute you and the honourable members of this Chamber. I have wished to be able to explain before this Chamber the desires of my people. I have already had an opportunity of addressing the other Chamber on the subject of these desires of my people. The first, the principal, object that I have in view is that I should have the full control and power over my own lands, subject to the authority of His Excellency the Governor. These lands, so far, have not been touched by the hands of Europeans. I have been here some time, and I have seen the Bill introduced by the Government. I saw that there were a great number of teeth in that Bill. The whole body was covered with teeth, and it also had a tail with a sting in the end. After I had an opportunity of addressing the other Chamber, I found that the Government had made improvements in it. They drew [most of] the teeth of that Bill, with the exception of one, which now remains in it. I have a strong objection to that tooth which now remains, and I beseech this House not to give power to that clause as it stands. And now I request that the Court may not have jurisdiction over the districts referred to for the present. I do not say always, but for the present, so that we may have time to consult with the Government and to make satisfactory arrangements; and, when the law is agreed to, then we can discuss the prospects for the future. I do not wish to oppose the Government, but I wish to work together with them, in order that we may arrange to deal satisfactorily with that district. That is the first objection which I have. Secondly, I should wish that my Committee—that is, the Native Committee—should be empowered, so that all dealings and transactions within that proclaimed district should be left in the hands of that Committee. But I am glad to say that I see that the Government have been more inclined to deal favourably with us. I make this request now, in order that we may not get into a muddle hereafter, and be made a laughing-stock to all the other colonies (sic) and people. I have always considered that this Assembly should be regarded as sacred, and that its work should be sacred, and should be carried out with truth and equity. Thirdly, I wish to see laws carefully framed for the protection of both races, and that the Natives may be treated in the same way as Europeans, in order that they may live amicably together in the future. I have nothing further to say, except to thank you for allowing me to come here, and to wish you prosperity for the future, and that you may long remain here to deal with the laws in a just and true spirit.<sup>4</sup>

---

3. 'Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885', He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaV01NgaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2.html>, accessed 4 June 2018.

4. 'Native Land Alienation Restriction Bill', 6 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p 427. Minor amendments to translation by the Waitangi Tribunal.

CHAPTER 9

TE TUARA O TŪRONGO: THE NORTH ISLAND MAIN TRUNK RAILWAY

‘The backbone of our ancestor Turongo – that is, the Main Trunk Railway route – we will give to you for running the train-wheels on, right through the Ngatimaniapoto district.’<sup>1</sup>

9.1 INTRODUCTION

On 15 April 1885, over a thousand Māori and settlers gathered on the banks of the Pūniu River near Te Awamutu to witness the turning of the first sod of the middle section of the North Island Main Trunk Railway (NIMTR).<sup>2</sup> Standing under a ceremonial arch, Wahanui turned the first three sods, which Premier Stout wheeled in an ornamental barrow, tipping them out amidst loud cheers from the crowd and the singing of ‘God Save the Queen.’<sup>3</sup> Following the ceremony, Stout spoke of the turning of the sod as symbolic of a new era of ‘peaceable relations between Europeans and Maoris.’ To those Māori present, he promised a share in the long-term economic prosperity the railway would bring. Wahanui then announced to the crowd that the railway line would thereafter be known as ‘Turongo.’<sup>4</sup> Celebrations were said to have continued into the night.<sup>5</sup>

The NIMTR was the most significant public works project in Te Rohe Pōtae. Construction of the line began in the north of the inquiry district in 1886 and reached its southern boundary in 1903. The first North Island Main Trunk train completed the journey from Auckland to Wellington in August 1908. Later that year, New Zealand Prime Minister, Joseph Ward, marked the NIMTR’s official opening by driving the last spike of the railway at Manganuioteao, near Ōhākune,

---

1. The opening quote of this chapter is attributed to Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira Rewi Maniapoto and Wahanui at the 1885 ceremony to mark the turning of the first sod of the central section of the North Island Main Trunk Railway: doc A20 (Cleaver and Sarich), p 142.

2. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway. Turning the First Sod’, Te Aroha News, 18 April 1885, p 7; AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 2–3.

3. ‘The North Island Trunk Railway. Turning the First Sod’, Te Aroha News, 18 April 1885, p 7; AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4; Neill Atkinson, Trainland: How Railways Made New Zealand (Auckland: Random House, 2007), p 45.

4. Document A20, pp 73–74. See the first sidebar in this chapter for an explanation of the name Tūrongo.

5. RS Fletcher, Single Track: The Construction of the Main Trunk Railway (Auckland: Collins, 1978), p 125.

to the south of this inquiry district. A major milestone in the development of New Zealand's transport infrastructure nationally, the railway has an added symbolic significance in this inquiry. As seen in chapter 8, the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to the railway marked the end of the aukati and the beginning of a new era of Crown–Māori relations in the district.

The main source of evidence relied on this chapter is Philip Cleaver and Jonathan Sarich's research report, 'Turongo: The North Island Main Trunk Railway and the Rohe Potae, 1870–2008'.<sup>6</sup> Other research reports relied upon include those by Cathy Marr and Brent Parker.<sup>7</sup> The chapter also draws on claimant evidence, Government records, the comprehensive body of Waitangi Tribunal reports and scholarship relating to public works issues, as well as general histories of the main trunk line and New Zealand railways history more broadly.

9.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

During railway negotiations with the Crown between 1883 and 1887, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to the railway's construction through their territory based on a series of specific Crown agreements. Whether the Crown kept to these agreements, known by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as Te Ōhākī Tapu, is the subject of this and other chapters of this report. In this chapter, we focus on Crown agreements relating to the railway's construction. Specifically, we concentrate on whether the Crown took more land for the railway's initial construction than Māori agreed to, whether Māori were adequately compensated for the use of their land and resources to build the railway, the employment of Māori on the railway line, its environmental effects, and whether the Crown adhered to its promise to fence the line. More generally, we consider whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown gained mutual benefits from the railway's construction and whether the Crown had an ongoing Treaty duty to consult Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in decisions concerning the railway's construction.

In chapter 8 we described the series of negotiations and agreements known to claimants as Te Ōhākī Tapu. We recognised the 1883 petition of the 'four tribes' as a declaration that the Crown should give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty. We also found that the negotiations constituted a demand that the Crown use its power of kāwanatanga to provide statutory recognition of the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Agreement to build the NIMTR, a major public work, through Te Rohe Pōtae was one of the most significant outcomes of those negotiations. While Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would later gift part of the land required for the railway, the formal transfer of railway lands to government ownership took place under public works legislation and, in acquiring the land, the Crown

---

6. Document A20.

7. Marr, 'Te Rohe Potae Political Engagement 1864 – 1886' (document A78); Tauariki, Ngaia, Roa, Maniapoto-Anderson, Barrett, Douglas, Joseph, Meredith, and Wessels, 'Ngāti Maniapoto Mana Motuhake: Report for Ngāti Maniapoto Claimants and the Waitangi Tribunal' (document A110); Parker, 'Report on the North Island Main Trunk Railway Compensation Hearing' (document A96).

The naming of the line Tūrongo

After turning the first sods of the middle section of the North Island Main Trunk Railway, Wahanui offered the name Tūrongo for the section. According to George Wilkinson, Rewi Maniapoto, who was standing beside Wahanui, called out the name Tūrongo to signal his agreement.<sup>1</sup>

As discussed in chapter 2, Tūrongo was a famed Ngāti Maniapoto and Tainui ancestor. Son of Tāwhao and half-brother of Whatihua, Tūrongo travelled inland from Kāwhia and established the settlement of Rangiatea, near Ōtorohanga. Over time, Tūrongo's descendants came to occupy the region from Pirongia and Wharepūhanga south to Tūhua, while Whatihua's descendants lived in coastal regions from northern Kāwhia to Pirongia.<sup>2</sup>

Wahanui's naming of the railway after Tūrongo was a declaration of his mana. However, in his speech at the 1886 sod-turning ceremony, he took care to emphasise that this act of mana should not be seen as encroaching upon the rights of iwi and hapū who occupied land on each side of the railway track.

It does not affect the land on either side of the chain wide, because each person knows the name of his own piece. The person of rank has his own portion, and so has the person of low degree, and it is not a proper thing for a person who is of rank to contest a person of low degree with regard to the title to his land.<sup>3</sup>

In 1905, Ngāti Tūwharetoa leader Te Heuheu Tukino, who was present at the 1885 ceremony, recalled hearing Rewi Maniapoto and Wahanui telling Stout that '[t]he backbone of our ancestor Turongo – that is, the Main Trunk Railway route – we will give to you for running the train-wheels on, right through the Ngatimaniapoto district'.<sup>4</sup> To end the sod-turning ceremony, Stout confirmed that indeed 'this section should be called Turongo'. At this point, Rewi introduced Stout to his only child and whāngai daughter Ngahua.<sup>5</sup>

---

1. Document A110 (Meredith), p 678.

2. Document A110 (Maniapoto-Anderson), pp 195–196; doc A98 (Thorne), p 76; doc A97 (Borell and Joseph), p 33; transcript 4.1.1, p 15 (Tom Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

3. Document A110, p 678; G. T. Wilkinson, 'The North Island Main Trunk Railway (Report on the Ceremony of Turning the First Sod Of)', at Puniu, 15th April 1885; AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4.

4. Document A20, p 142.

5. Document A20, p 74. We heard about Rewi Maniapoto's whāngai daughter Ngahua at the first of our Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, at Ōtorohanga, from her mokopuna Amiria Emery. Transcript 4.1.1, p 170 (Amiria Emery, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010).

followed the procedures set down in that legislation. Therefore, as well as assessing whether the Crown kept to the agreements negotiated with Māori in the 1880s, we also measure its conduct against well established Treaty jurisprudence on public works takings.

This chapter covers the construction of the NIMTR within the inquiry district from the negotiation and planning stages until it was opened for traffic in 1903. Although largely focused between 1885 and 1903, it examines some issues beyond that scope, including payment of compensation and the completion of fencing. This chapter has some discussion of the administration and purchasing of Māori land in this period, but these topics are dealt with more fully in chapters 10 and 11 respectively.

The chapter does not include the railway's role in the introduction of alcohol into the district or the rating of lands adjacent to the railway. Nor does it cover various other twentieth-century issues raised by claimants, including post-1903 land takings and compensation, surplus lands and land disposals, employment, long-term economic benefits from the NIMTR's operation, and the restructuring and privatisation of the NIMTR. The cumulative impacts of the NIMTR on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori will be further addressed in future chapters of this report.

9.1.2 How the chapter is structured

Section 9.2 examines relevant Tribunal jurisprudence and the submissions of the parties to establish the issues for determination in this chapter. Section 9.3, on the NIMTR negotiations, opens by placing the railway in its broader historical context. It then briefly reviews this report's previous discussion of the Te Ōhākī Tapu negotiations up to 1885, before detailing further negotiations between the Crown and Māori concerning the railway from 1885 to 1887. Next, section 9.4 offers a narrative account of the NIMTR's construction between 1886 and 1903. Section 9.5 sets out the Tribunal's analysis and findings on the key areas of land takings, land gifting, compensation, labour contracts, resource use, the environmental impacts of construction, and the fencing of the line. Section 9.6 outlines the prejudice suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and section 9.7 contains a summary of our findings. Appendix 1 contains more detailed information about the land gifted and taken for the NIMTR, and the compensation paid.

9.2 ISSUES

This section summarises the existing Tribunal jurisprudence on railways and public works, and derives from these a set of standards for Crown action in respect of public works takings for the NIMTR. An extended discussion of the jurisprudence on public works will be provided in a future chapter of this report. The section then discusses the positions of the parties, including a concession from the Crown, before setting out the key issue questions for the chapter.

9.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The findings of previous Tribunals on the 1883–85 negotiations between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, most notably the Central North Island and Whanganui Tribunals, have already been discussed in chapter 8.

The taking of Māori land for railways and other public works has been extensively covered by past Tribunals. This chapter provides a brief summary of past Tribunal findings on public works before setting out the Treaty standards arising from this jurisprudence, which determine whether a particular taking may be regarded as Treaty-compliant.

Tribunal jurisprudence on public works stretches back to the 1990s. A significant report of that decade, Te Maunga Railways Land Report, considered the 1955 taking under public works legislation of land from Te Maunga, near Papamoa, for railway housing, and the Crown's Treaty obligations in returning that land under the offer-back provisions introduced in the Public Works Act 1981. The Te Maunga Tribunal found any compulsory acquisition of Māori land to be a breach of the plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty, in particular its guarantee of te tino rangatiratanga and the undisturbed possession of Māori lands. In the English version of the Treaty, it went against the text outlining that Māori could retain their land until they wished to sell it.<sup>8</sup>

Another key principle, established by the Ngāti Rangiteaorere Tribunal, is that the Crown is obliged to consult with Māori before compulsorily acquiring their land.<sup>9</sup> Later Tribunals have built on this finding, arguing that any taking of Māori land without notice or genuine consultation with Māori owners automatically breaches the principle of partnership.<sup>10</sup> In addition, past Tribunals have found that the Crown breached the principle of partnership by introducing public works legislation without the consent of Māori, whether through failure to provide for Māori self-government institutions or through introducing the legislation at a time when Māori had no representation in Parliament.<sup>11</sup>

---

8. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Maunga Railways Land Report (Wellington: Brooker's, 1994), pp 67–71, 81.

9. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngati Rangiteaorere Claim Report (Wellington: Brooker & Friend Limited, 1990), p 47.

10. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 2, pp 837, 872; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006, Report on the Post-Raupatu Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, p 273; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 2, pp 742–743, 766–767.

11. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 819, 837, 839; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 273, 283; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 2, pp 782, 800; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, p 742.

Further breaches, this time of article 3 and the related principle of equity, occurred when different mechanisms existed for the taking of Māori land than for general land, and where Māori were disadvantaged by these differences.<sup>12</sup>

9.2.2 Treaty standards for public works takings

The jurisprudence on railways and public works forms the basis for the Treaty standards against which we will assess all land takings for railways in this chapter. These standards will be considered further in the Public Works chapter to be released in a future part of the report. They are:

- for any proposed public works involving Māori land, the Crown has a duty to consult with Māori landowners and obtain their consent;<sup>13</sup>
- the Crown should only resort to compulsory acquisition of Māori land as a last resort, and only in the national interest;<sup>14</sup>
- the Crown must never compulsorily acquire Māori land for public works purposes if an alternative site is available.<sup>15</sup> In other words, the Crown must distinguish between site-dependent takings and those which could be situated in locations other than Māori land;
- in cases of essential site-dependent takings involving Māori land, the Crown has a protective duty to take measures to minimise the impact on Māori landowners, including by ensuring that sites such as wāhi tapu, urupā, and kāinga are excluded from these takings;<sup>16</sup>
- alternative options to obtaining freehold title (such as arranging a leasehold, easement, licence, covenant or joint ownership arrangement) should be considered before resorting to permanent alienation;<sup>17</sup> and,

---

12. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 3, pp 1096–1097; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 873; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 282, 286.

13. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngati Rangiteaorere Claim Report, p 47; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1995), p 11; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 839; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 273, 282–283, 291; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, pp 793, 801–802; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, pp 742–743.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report, pp 11, 21; Waitangi Tribunal, Turangi Township Report (Wellington: Brooker's, 1995), pp 285–286; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 819, 867–872; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, p 295; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, p 781.

15. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Maunga Railways Land Report, p 70; Waitangi Tribunal, Turangi Township Report, pp 364–365; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 276–277.

16. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 851–852; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 279–280, 297; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, pp 794, 799.

17. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report, p 11; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 839; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 297–298; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, p 801.

- compensation should be awarded in a fair and timely manner, and land exchanges should be preferred to monetary compensation where the affected landowners agree.<sup>18</sup>

9.2.3 Crown concessions in this inquiry

The Crown has made one concession in relation to the NIMTR. The Crown concedes that some owners of the Rangitoto–Tuhua block were not compensated for land taken for the railway’s construction, and that this failure to pay compensation ‘was a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>19</sup> The Crown does not specify which subdivisions of the Rangitoto–Tuhua block it failed to pay compensation for land taken.

9.2.4 Claimant and Crown arguments

The claimants’ overall submissions on the NIMTR focused on the question of whether the Crown kept to the agreements it made during the mid-1880s concerning the railway’s construction and operation.<sup>20</sup> There were also many specific claims which provide more detail on the railway’s impact on particular claimants and claimant groups, some of which are discussed in this chapter, as well as future chapters of the report.<sup>21</sup> Whereas the 1880s negotiations covered many aspects of the ongoing relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori after the lifting of the aukati, here we are specifically concerned with the Crown’s undertakings relating to the railway up until 1903.

Both parties agreed that, in statements at Kihikihi in February 1885, and in continuing negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori between 1885 and 1887, Ballance and Stout made a series of specific agreements concerning the railway’s

---

18. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngati Rangiteaorere Claim Report, p 48; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report, p 11; Waitangi Tribunal, Turangi Township Report, p 373; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 841; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, pp 291–292; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 2, pp 796, 801–802; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, pp 752–753.

19. Submission 3.4.293, p 2.

20. Submission 3.4.121.

21. Wai 440 (submissions 3.4.198); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 784 (submission 3.4.147); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 1099, Wai 1100, Wai 1132, Wai 1133, Wai 1136, Wai 1137, Wai 1138, Wai 1139, Wai 1798 (submission 3.4.189 and 3.4.189(a)); Wai 1482 (submission 3.4.154(a)); Wai 1523 (submission 3.4.157); Wai 1593 (submission 3.4.230); Wai 2014 (submissions 3.4.208); Wai 556, Wai 616, Wai 1377, Wai 1820 (submission 3.4.279); Wai 1606 (submission 3.4.169(a)); Wai 1823 (submission 3.4.178); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 1894 (submission 3.4.145); Wai 762 (submission 3.4.170); Wai 928 (submissions 3.4.175(a)); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 1455 (submission 3.4.156); Wai 1704 (submission 3.4.297); Wai 1640 (submission 3.4.191); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 1197, Wai 1388 (submission 3.4.209); Wai 37, Wai 933, Wai 1196 (submission 3.4.239); Wai 366, Wai 1064 (submission 3.4.205); Wai 833, Wai 965, Wai 1044, Wai 1605 (submission 3.4.227); Wai 845 (submission 3.4.166); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1147, Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1594 (submission 3.4.164(a)); Wai 483 (submission 3.4.135); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249(c)).

construction and operation. Both parties also accepted that the Crown was, in its own words, ‘honour bound’ as Treaty partner to uphold its specific agreements to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and that if unable to fulfil any aspects of these agreements, the Crown had an obligation to consult Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.<sup>22</sup> The Crown further agreed that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could reasonably have expected consultation on ‘the local details of lands to be taken for the railway corridor and its operation.’<sup>23</sup>

Significant points of difference remained, however, in how the parties interpreted the Crown’s undertakings concerning the railway between 1883 and 1887, in what they saw as their implications for future Crown conduct, and in their view of whether the Crown fulfilled its agreements.

The claimants argued that rangatira agreed to the construction of the railway on the basis of what they saw as historical and ongoing commitments concerning the railway. There was no time limit on these commitments, and they could reasonably be expected to continue after the railway’s completion and into the present day.<sup>24</sup> In the Crown’s view, the 1880s agreements related primarily to the period of the railway’s construction and did not bestow an ongoing duty to consult with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over management and governance decisions concerning the railway’s operation beyond 1903.<sup>25</sup> These competing views around the Crown’s railway commitments in the twentieth century will be addressed in future chapters of this report.

The claimants said that the Crown broke many of its promises concerning the construction of the NIMTR through the inquiry district. In their submissions, the claimants differentiated between two distinct ‘phases’ of railway construction. The first phase involved the sections of railway from the Pūniu River south to Mokau Station (also known as Puketutu Station) constructed during the 1880s. The second phase related largely to the land between Mokau Station and the southern boundary of the inquiry district at Taringamotu, north of Taumarunui, constructed during the 1890s and early 1900s.

During the first phase, the claimants said, the Crown mostly honoured its commitments to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerning the railway’s construction. It consulted with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori on the route of the line and negotiated with Māori (through the Kawhia Native Committee) to pay for stone and timber used in its construction.<sup>26</sup> It granted small work contracts to Māori and fenced both sides of the railway.<sup>27</sup> It also made some attempt to pay compensation to Māori landowners (although the claimants disputed whether this compensation ever reached the landowners).<sup>28</sup>

However, by the second phase of construction, beginning in the 1890s, the claimants said that the Crown had largely lost sight of its earlier agreements with

---

22. Submission 3.4.293, pp 1–2, 14; submission 3.4.121, p 85.

23. Submission 3.4.293, p 13.

24. Submission 3.4.121, p 13.

25. Submission 3.4.293, pp 147–148.

26. Submission 3.4.121, pp 16–17, 76.

27. Submission 3.4.121, p 16.

28. Submission 3.4.121, p 24.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. It took far more than the one chain width of track Ballance had promised. It refused to pay Māori for land taken for the railway.<sup>29</sup> It took gravel for railway construction from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands without consulting or compensating the owners.<sup>30</sup> Later, the Crown took land for gravel pits under public works legislation, thus denying Te Rohe Pōtae Māori income from future royalties.<sup>31</sup> Contracts for the railway's construction were not set aside for Māori, and the Crown's lack of consultation with Māori over the route of the railway led to the desecration of urupā and wāhi tapu.<sup>32</sup> While the Crown eventually fenced the railway, it did not do so until 1909, causing many stock losses for Māori with lands adjoining the railway.<sup>33</sup>

By contrast, the Crown said that it 'kept largely to the core elements of its agreements with Rohe Pōtae Māori in respect of the construction of the NIMTR'.<sup>34</sup> However, it also cautioned the Tribunal to be 'realistic' in its assessment of the Crown's past conduct and account for the 'many factors' which influenced the railway's construction and operation, such as its cost, size, and the technical challenges encountered.<sup>35</sup> In relation to the claimants' contention that it took too much land for the railway, the Crown contended that Ballance made 'broadly consistent' statements about how much land would be required for the railway.<sup>36</sup> However, it also noted that, at the time, a detailed survey of the railway had not yet been completed and that it was 'clear' that the 'actual amount of land that would be needed' might vary.<sup>37</sup> The Crown further submitted that its takings were necessary for the 'safe, efficient, and viable' operation of the railway and to provide for the 'future requirements' of what was a major piece of public infrastructure.<sup>38</sup>

On the issue of work contracts for Māori, the Crown noted that by the 1890s, the Government had moved away from issuing private contracts for the line's construction towards employing Public Works Department gangs to carry out the work. However, in the Crown's view, this did not mean that local Māori were not employed on the line's construction after this date.<sup>39</sup> Concerning payment for resources used in railway construction, the Crown said that it 'generally' compensated Māori for construction materials.<sup>40</sup>

Regarding the environmental impacts of the NIMTR's construction, the Crown acknowledged it had a duty to ensure that wāhi tapu and taonga were not harmed during the railway's construction, both as an 'implicit' part of the Te Ōhākī Tapu

---

29. Submission 3.4.121, p 85.

30. Submission 3.4.121, p 85.

31. Submission 3.4.121, p 77.

32. Submission 3.4.121, p 21.

33. Submission 3.4.121, pp 23–24; doc A20, p 122.

34. Submission 3.4.293, p 22.

35. Submission 3.4.293, p 2.

36. Submission 3.4.293, p 10.

37. Submission 3.4.293, p 11.

38. Submission 3.4.293, pp 78–79.

39. Submission 3.4.293, p 140.

40. Submission 3.4.293, p 105.

negotiations and as a Treaty obligation, as long as ‘it was reasonable to do so’.<sup>41</sup> The Crown said it deeply regretted instances identified by claimants ‘where the construction of the railway prejudicially affected the environment of Rohe Pōtae Māori and their wāhi tapu and other sites of significance’.<sup>42</sup>

However, it denied that these instances of damage amounted to a Treaty breach and submitted that the Tribunal must weigh up a range of factors in considering whether the Crown has breached the Treaty in relation to damage to wāhi tapu, including the Crown’s ‘knowledge’ of an area’s significance to Māori and the extent to which it was ‘reasonably possible’ to avoid such damage.<sup>43</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that individual Māori may have been prejudiced due to stock losses caused by its delay in fencing the southern portions of the line, but maintained that the time taken was reasonable due to financial and ‘practical considerations’.<sup>44</sup>

9.2.5 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry<sup>45</sup> and briefly summarised the parties’ arguments, these are the issues that will be determined in this chapter:

- Did the Crown keep to its specific agreements concerning the planning and construction of the railway, as negotiated between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, Bryce, Ballance, and Stout between 1883 and 1887?
- What land did Māori agree to gift to the Crown for the railway, and did the Crown fairly compensate Māori for lands taken for the railway outside of this gifting?
- In acquiring land for the railway under public works legislation, and in its later construction of the NIMTR, did the Crown adhere to the standards for Treaty-compliant public works takings?
- Did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown gain mutual benefits from the railway’s construction?

9.3 NIMTR NEGOTIATIONS

9.3.1 Introduction

In chapter 8 we discussed in detail the series of negotiations between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over the opening of the district to the NIMTR and settlement. In April 1885, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders gave their consent to the railway on the basis of assurances that the Crown would enact laws to protect their communal authority over their lands. Their consent was also subject to certain conditions being met concerning the railway’s construction.

---

41. Submission 3.4.293, p 114.

42. Submission 3.4.293, p 121.

43. Submission 3.4.293, p 121.

44. Submission 3.4.293, p 30.

45. Submission 1.4.003, pp 35–39.

For both parties, the railway agreement marked the culmination of a series of negotiations that had been taking place since the late 1870s. In those negotiations, the Crown had sought Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreement for the railway and, more generally, for the district to be opened to Crown institutions and settlement. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, in turn, demanded that the Crown to use its lawmaking powers to protect their rights of tikanga and mana whakahaere over their lands and resources, as was guaranteed by their tino rangatiratanga under article 2. As discussed in chapter 8, this request was the essence of Te Ōhāki Tapu.

In this section, we summarise the key components of the specific agreements reached in regard to the railway up to April 1885 and consider the significance of these agreements, as perceived and understood by both parties at the time.

9.3.2 The NIMTR in historical context

From its beginnings in England in the 1830s, the railway was the ultimate symbol of nineteenth-century empire, modernity, and the industrial age.<sup>46</sup> As Britain broadened and consolidated its colonial reach throughout the world, railways followed closely behind.

In the settler colonies of Canada and Australia, railways were a critical tool for opening up new resources and vast new tracts of territory for European settlement, displacing indigenous populations in the process.<sup>47</sup> In India, railway construction was critical to the extension of British military power over the subcontinent.<sup>48</sup>

In 1870s New Zealand, railway construction was at the heart of a comprehensive programme of public works and assisted immigration spearheaded by the ‘father’ of New Zealand rail, Colonial Treasurer Julius Vogel. Vogel’s scheme aimed, in part, to stimulate the stagnant economy that characterised the years following the 1860s wars by borrowing money from Britain to encourage immigration and build public infrastructure needed for economic development.<sup>49</sup>

However, Vogel’s public works scheme had even bolder aims beyond boosting the lagging colonial economy. Vogel hoped that the scheme would revitalise the ‘colonizing spirit’, achieving by ‘peaceful Pakeha conquest’ what the wars of the 1860s had failed to do: the overcoming of Māori resistance and the opening up of the North Island’s interior to European settlers.<sup>50</sup> Speaking in Parliament in 1870 in support of the policy, Premier Fox expressed hope that it would ‘reillumine’ the ‘sacred fire’ of colonisation in New Zealand.<sup>51</sup> Central to the Government’s plan to revitalise New Zealand’s colonial project was an ambitious programme of railway construction: the Government promised to construct over 1,000 miles of railway within nine years, including a trunk system running the length of the two main islands.<sup>52</sup>

---

46. Atkinson, Trainland, p 10; doc A20, p 18.

47. Document A20, pp 18–19.

48. Document A20, p 18.

49. Document A20, pp 23–24.

50. Atkinson, Trainland, pp 28–30.

51. Document A20, p 22.

52. Atkinson, Trainland, pp 28–30.

Vogel's policies, which were adopted by other colonial governments, contributed to exponential growth in New Zealand's public railway system. In 1870, when Vogel took office as colonial treasurer, New Zealand had just 76 kilometres of public railways; by 1880, that had grown to 1,828 kilometres.<sup>53</sup> This included a line from Auckland to Te Awamutu on the edge of the aukati, which opened in 1880.<sup>54</sup> Two years earlier, the Government (under Premier Sir George Grey) had announced plans to complete the railway from Auckland to Wellington via Taranaki, and Parliament had authorised construction of Wellington–Foxton and Te Awamutu–New Plymouth segments of the line.<sup>55</sup> However, this plan could only proceed if the Government acquired land in Te Rohe Pōtae – a district that had been protected since the war from settler encroachment and remained under the authority of the Kīngitanga and its tribes. The Government's interest in this district extended well beyond the railway; it also wanted to assert its sovereignty over the district. It faced further pressure from business interests who saw opportunities to profit from land dealing and timber milling if the district could be opened up.<sup>56</sup>

As discussed in chapter 8, negotiations occurred between Ministers and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the 1870s, principally concerning the terms on which the Kīngitanga might accept the colonial Government's authority, but also sometimes concerning the railway. No agreement was reached during this period. In the following paragraphs, we rely on content from chapter 8 to summarise briefly the negotiations and agreements which followed.

In 1880, the failure of previous negotiations and deteriorating economic climate led the new Government (under Premier John Hall) to abandon temporarily plans for the completion of the NIMTR through Te Rohe Pōtae to Taranaki.<sup>57</sup> By 1882, the Government was facing considerable pressure from settlers (particularly in Auckland) to complete the railway.<sup>58</sup> In August, Parliament enacted the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act 1882, allowing the Government to raise a loan for completion of the NIMTR (see section 8.3.2). By this time, it had resumed negotiations with Tāwhiao, but had not sought – let alone received – consent for the railway. The Government's negotiations with the Kīngitanga collapsed in October and from then on, the Crown would deal almost exclusively with tribal leaders, particularly those of Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>59</sup>

In general terms, the negotiations would follow a familiar pattern, in which the Government would ask Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to consent to the railway, but then press ahead with its plans before that consent was forthcoming, while ignoring the principal demands made and conditions imposed by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders.

In November 1882, Bryce wrote to Wahanui urging him to open the district to roads and railways, promising that such works would greatly enhance the value

---

53. Document A20, p 24.

54. Document A20, pp 36, 44.

55. Document A20, p 37.

56. Document A20, pp 37–38.

57. Document A20, p 44.

58. Document A41 (Loveridge), pp 20–21.

59. Document A78 (Marr), pp 668–705.

of Māori lands in the district. Wahanui undertook to consider the proposal.<sup>60</sup> Although, in March 1883, without having obtained consent, Bryce instructed the surveyor Charles Hursthouse to carry out exploratory surveys along the proposed railway route from Alexandra through the Mōkau area to Taranaki. When Te Rohe Pōtae Māori discovered this was happening, they escorted Hursthouse out of the district (see section 8.3.2.1). Wahanui and Bryce continued to correspond, and during 1883 the negotiations finally began to advance, as discussed in sections 8.3.3 to 8.7.1.<sup>61</sup>

In September 1884, a select committee came together to determine the best railway route out of a possible four. Wahanui met with the select committee and emphasised that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had only agreed to exploratory railway surveys. Once the Crown had decided on a route, they still needed to seek the consent of any Māori affected, which would only occur once the Crown had put in place satisfactory laws for the protection of Māori land. Ballance also met with Wahanui that month to negotiate the terms on which consent for the railway might be given.<sup>62</sup>

The select committee decided upon the central route for the NIMTR from Te Awamutu to Marton on 9 October. This route, the committee reasoned, was the best of the four in terms of land opened for settlement, directness and speed of the route, and connections with existing settlements.<sup>63</sup> Although the Government had sought Wahanui's views, it had certainly not obtained consent for construction to begin on any of these routes. Nonetheless, it began to make provisions for railway construction and for acquisition and settlement of Te Rohe Pōtae lands. In November, two laws were enacted to serve these purposes. As discussed in section 8.7.2 of chapter 8, the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884 prohibited all private land dealings in a 4.5-million-acre area along the railway route in order to prevent private speculation in lands the Crown wanted to open for settlement. The Railways Authorization Act 1884 formally authorised construction of the NIMTR along the Te Awamutu–Marton route, under the provisions of the Public Works Act 1882.

Soon afterwards, Ballance gave a speech describing the railway as 'a great work', which the Crown had a duty to complete 'without any delay'. The railway would 'open up' the entire 4.5 million acres for European settlement, thereby 'dissipating the depression' and instead bringing 'grand prosperity' to the North Island.<sup>64</sup> As discussed in section 8.8.1, although he had not yet obtained consent for the railway, Ballance announced that construction would begin in February 1885 with a ceremony to turn the first sod. By this time, the Government was undertaking practical steps to begin construction, including sending a team of surveyors to fix the exact location of the line. The Department of Works planned to call for construc-

---

60. Document A78, pp 700–701.

61. See also doc A110, pp 630–631; doc A78(a) (Marr document bank), vol 2, pp 522, 524.

62. Document A78, pp 1068–1069; doc A41, pp 149–150.

63. E Richardson, 22 October 1884, NZPD, vol 49, pp 596–598.

64. Document A78, pp 1105–1106; doc A78(a), vol 6, pp 2921–2922.

tion tenders in February. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders expressed considerable frustration over this turn of events, regarding it as a breach of Bryce's May 1883 agreement to complete the exploratory survey and return to negotiations.<sup>65</sup> Ballance agreed to meet them at Kihikihi in February 1885, and it was there that agreement was reached for construction of the railway.

9.3.3 Further NIMTR negotiations, 1885–87

At the February 1885 Kihikihi hui, Ballance made a series of agreements with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about various matters, including land titles, land administration, liquor control, and the railway. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the railway based on these agreements.

As discussed in section 8.8.5.2 of chapter 8, Ballance told Māori at Kihikihi that the railway corridor would be no more than one chain in width, 'except where it runs along the side of hills where cuttings are made, where a little more will be required—perhaps two chains', with 'perhaps five acres, or, for some stations where there is likely to be a large settlement, ten acres, for each station'; that the Crown would fully compensate Māori for any land taken for the railway, including timber used in railway construction; that the Crown would award Māori contracts to construct certain sections of the railway; and that the railway would do '[n]o injury whatever' to Māori land.<sup>66</sup>

Regarding payment for lands taken for the railway, Ballance agreed that the Government would compensate Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the same way as it did Europeans affected by public works takings:

Now we propose to deal with the Natives in the matter of this line precisely as we should deal with Europeans. The law is the same in both cases. We have considered the principle that, if we take land for public purposes such as a railway, we have the right to pay for it.<sup>67</sup>

Beyond this passing mention of public works in relation to compensation, there was little specific discussion of the legal mechanism by which the Government proposed to transfer the lands for the NIMTR into its ownership. This is despite the fact that, by the time of the February 1885 hui, the Government had already enacted legislation authorising the railway's construction under the Public Works Act 1882.<sup>68</sup>

In section 8.8.3, we noted that on 27 February 1885, following a major tribal gathering, John Ormsby telegraphed Ballance confirming the agreement of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the railway, on the condition that the railway line would be one chain wide, and that all land taken for the railway be paid for. He further

---

65. Document A78, pp 1109–1110.

66. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–24.

67. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22.

68. For further discussion of the legislative mechanisms by which land was taken for the railway, see section 9.4.2.1 of this chapter.

Links and chains: units of measurement used in this chapter

A chain is a unit of measurement used for land distances, especially roads and railways. A chain measures 22 yards (20.1168 metres). A link is 0.01 of a chain (20.1168 centimetres). The measurement survives today in the form of the 'Queen's Chain'.

specified that Māori consent to the railway was conditional upon the full length of the railway being fenced on both sides. On 4 March 1885, Wahanui wrote to Ballance, confirming that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had 'met and agreed to allow the railway to proceed' on the condition that the railway would be one chain wide. However, he asked that 'consideration of the question of the land required for the railway, the land on either side of the railway, and that required for stations' be 'deferred' until a later visit.<sup>69</sup>

The Government initially declined Wahanui's request that he be the one to turn the first sod on the railway, but agreed that Māori could assist in the ceremony.<sup>70</sup> The land that would be required for the railway also came under discussion at the April 1885 sod-turning ceremony, as outlined in section 8.8.4 of chapter 8. During the speeches following the turning of the sod, which were recorded by George Wilkinson, Hopa Te Rangianini warned Stout that he should take only 'the line for the railway, from one end to the other'. He added:

You must not by-and-by branch off in the direction of Taupo, because I shall cause you trouble, if you do that. Or if you branch off in any other direction I shall cause you trouble. All the affection that the Maoris wish to show to you in this matter is this line of railway only. After this is done, and I see how we get on together, then I may alter my mind.<sup>71</sup>

Following Te Rangianini's speech, Taonui stated that he intended to 'say a word or two' to Ballance about the 'work or carrying-out of this railway' and 'the position of the stations', but that he would reserve these for when Ballance was present.<sup>72</sup> In addition, there was the prospect that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori might gift land for the railway, an idea which had been raised even prior to the Kihikihi hui, although it is not clear from where it originated. In November 1884, Ballance told Parliament that Māori leaders, including Wahanui, had indicated that they would gift the land required for the NIMTR.<sup>73</sup> Similarly, during his North Island tour of 69. Document A20(a) (Cleaver and Sarich document bank), pp 37–38; doc A20, p 73.

70. Document A20(a), pp 37–38; doc A20, p 73.

71. Wilkinson, 'The North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1885, D-6, pp 4–5.

72. Wilkinson, 'The North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 5.

73. Document A20, p 139.

early 1885, Ballance encouraged Whanganui Māori at Rānana to gift land for the railway.<sup>74</sup>

Two decades later, Te Heuheu Tukino, as noted earlier in this chapter, recalled a conversation he had heard at the ceremony between Rewi Maniapoto, Wahanui, and Premier Stout, during which Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had offered to gift the lands for the railway without payment: 'We will not ask for any payment; we will not ask for any tax or consideration at all; there it is; we give it to you for nothing; take it.'<sup>75</sup> This offer, which may have been the subject of private conversation between Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira and the Premier rather than the formal speech-making, was not recorded in any of the official accounts of the ceremony.<sup>76</sup>

Nevertheless, in August 1885, Wahanui told the Maori Affairs Committee that the idea to gift land for the track and stations had 'emanated from ourselves, without asking for compensation or payment.'<sup>77</sup> He explained: 'My sincere wish is that prosperity may come to the Government of the colony; that the railway should be made. We will give the land for the railway and for the railway stations. This is my contribution; this proves my love to the undertaking.'<sup>78</sup> But he concluded his statement with a challenge to the Crown to reciprocate: 'I want to know what return the Maoris are to get. We show our love to Europeans; what return will they make for our giving our land for the railway and the railway stations?'<sup>79</sup>

Further details of the gifting were worked out in hui and written correspondence between Te Rohe Pōtae and government representatives during 1886 and 1887. On 4 March 1886, Ormsby wrote to Wilkinson on behalf of the Kawhia Native Committee. In his letter, which has only survived in English translation, Ormsby confirmed that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to gift 'one chain in width for the line' and 'one acre each for the small stations and three acres each for the large one'. Lands 'taken outside these areas' or 'damaged' such as 'through removal of earth' were to be paid for.<sup>80</sup> He asked the Government to appoint an official to fix the value of these lands. The conditions of the gifting, Ormsby informed Wilkinson, repeated earlier statements Wahanui had made to the Under-Secretary of Native Affairs.<sup>81</sup>

Ormsby made similar statements concerning the gifting at a meeting with Ballance at Te Kōpua in mid-April 1886. At the meeting, which was attended by Wahanui and around 60 other Māori, Ormsby repeated his request to Ballance, on behalf of the Kawhia Native Committee, that the Government appoint an official to work with a Māori representative to assess the value of the land taken over the

74. Document A20, p 139.

75. Document A20, p 142.

76. Document A20, p 142.

77. Native Affairs Committee, 'Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8; doc A20, p 141.

78. Native Affairs Committee, 'Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

79. Native Affairs Committee, 'Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill', AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

80. Document A20, p 142; doc A20(a), p 205.

81. Document A20, p 142; doc A20(a), p 205.

one chain width gifting.<sup>82</sup> After giving his view that ‘the railway itself was good payment’ for Māori, Ballance went on to explain that the cause for the delays in payment was finding the owners to pay them and that the Government would welcome the committee’s assistance.<sup>83</sup>

Later that year, on 28 September 1886, Wahanui telegraphed Ballance to confirm the agreement of Te Rohe Pōtae tribes to the gifting of one chain of land stretching from the banks of the Pūniu River to Te Rerenga-o-toa Kohuru, south of the inquiry district near the settlement of National Park, as well as three acres for principal stations and one to two acres for smaller stations.<sup>84</sup> Ballance accepted the tribes’ ‘generous proposal’ and assured Wahanui again that any land taken beyond this gifting would be paid for.<sup>85</sup> At a further hui in January 1887, Ballance again stated that the Government would compensate Māori for any land taken beyond one chain wide for the track and three acres for stations.<sup>86</sup> At no point in these discussions did Ballance raise the Government’s plans to transfer the gifted lands into its ownership using public works legislation.

The Crown’s agreements, as well as the conditions on which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to the railway’s construction between 1885 to 1887, can be summarised as follows:

- the Crown would take 1–2 chains for the width of the railway corridor (including cuttings into hillsides) and 5–10 acres for stations;
- Māori owners would be fully compensated for any land taken for the railway, once ownership of the land had been determined, and the Crown would compensate Māori for any timber or resources used in construction. However, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori later agreed to gift one chain for the corridor, and 1–3 acres for stations;
- Māori would be awarded contracts to construct certain sections of the railway;
- the railway would not interfere with waterways, and would do ‘[n]o injury whatever’ to Māori land;
- the full length of the track would be fenced on both sides and in a timely manner, which was a condition on which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would allow the construction of the railway; and,
- the section of the track lying within the inquiry district was to be named ‘Turongo’, as declared by Wahanui at the turning of the sod ceremony in 1885.

In section 9.4, we assess whether the Crown adhered to these specific agreements during the railway’s construction, as well as measuring its conduct against the Treaty standards for public works takings set out in section 9.2.2.

---

82. GT Wilkinson, ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts: Waikato (including Kawhia, Waipa, and Upper Mokau)’, AJHR, 1886, G-1, p 7.

83. ‘Meeting at Kopua’, Waikato Times, 15 April 1886, p 2; doc A20, p 143.

84. Document A20(a), p 206. The five tribes named were Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Whanganui, and Ngāti Hikairo.

85. Document A20(a), p 207.

86. Document A20, p 143.

9.4 THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE NIMTR

9.4.1 Introduction

The North Island Main Trunk Railway enters the inquiry district at the Pūniu River south of Te Awamutu. Soon afterwards, it passes to the west of Tokanui, the location of a former psychiatric hospital and the modern-day Waikeria Prison, before crossing Te Kawa Swamp, a significant wetland and mahinga kai for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori until its drainage for pasture in the twentieth century.

The line then travels through the historic Māori settlement of Ōtorohanga, crossing the Waipā, a major tributary of the Waikato River. It next passes through Hangatiki and Te Kumi, close by the Waitomo, Ruakuri, and Aranui Caves, before entering the township of Te Kūiti in the Mangaokewa Valley. After entering the Waiteti Valley and crossing a major viaduct over the Waiteti Gorge, it then climbs, tracking in a south-easterly direction through the rugged hill country of the upper Ōngarue Valley.

Between the watersheds of the upper Mōkau and Whanganui Rivers, it enters the Poro-o-tarao tunnel through Tihikārearea hill, where it begins its descent, weaving alongside the Ōngarue River, which it crosses three times before reaching Taumarunui. Shortly before arriving at Taumarunui, the railway passes through Ōkahukura, where it meets the location of a now-closed branch line to Stratford. The line exits our inquiry district at the Taringamotu Stream, just north of Taumarunui.

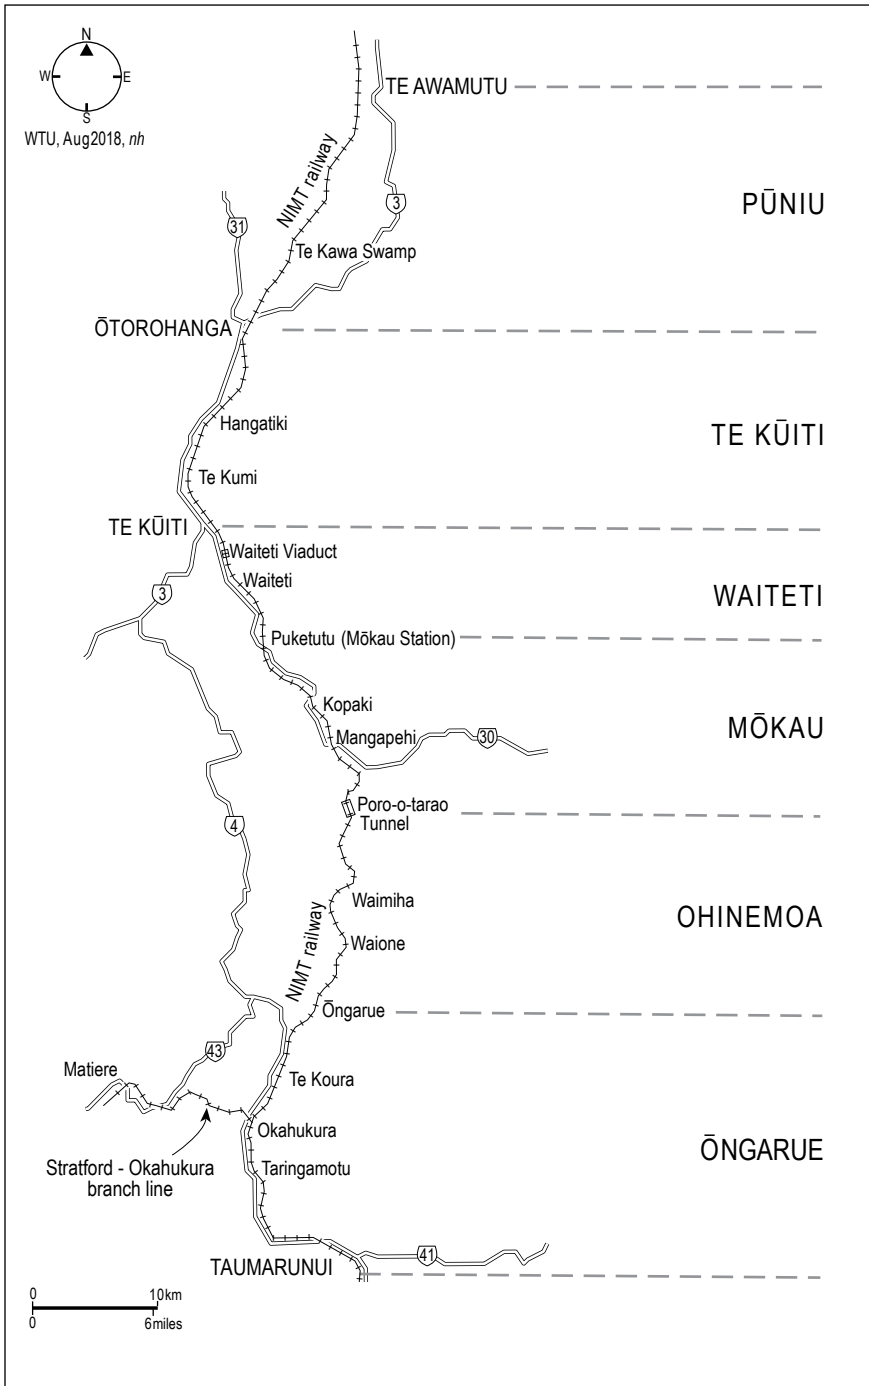

The NIMTR was constructed through the inquiry district between 1885 and 1903, with work advancing on the next stage as soon as the previous stage was complete. By the 1880s, the construction and operation of the national railways network was the responsibility of two government departments. The Public Works Department, established in 1870, took responsibility for the planning and construction of new lines. The Railways Department, established in 1880, was responsible for the operation and ongoing maintenance of the country's railways.<sup>87</sup>

As noted in section 9.3.2, planning for the construction of the NIMTR through the King Country was well underway before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had even consented to the railway's construction through their territory. Soon after Parliament voted in favour of the central route in October 1884, the Public Works Department instructed its surveyors to carry out more detailed surveys of the proposed line. The line was to be constructed in sections, progressing north to south through the inquiry district.

The Government advertised the first contracts for the line's construction from the northern end at Te Awamutu and the southern end at Marton in February 1885. The department awarded the contract for the construction of the 15-mile two-chain (24.14 kilometres) stretch of the line running from Te Awamutu south

---

87. Atkinson, Trainland, p 38; Rosslyn J. Noonan, By Design: A Brief History of the Public Works Department Ministry of Works, 1870–1970 (Wellington: Government Printer, 1975), p 39.

Map 9.1: North Island Main Trunk Railway route

Date	Event
July 1880	North Island Main Trunk Railway line completed as far south as Te Awamutu.
January 1884	Government surveyor John Rochfort completes his initial survey of the central route through the inquiry district.
9 October 1884	Parliamentary select committee reports in favour of the central route.
24 October 1884	Parliament approves the construction of the NIMTR along the central route.
15 April 1885	Wahanui and Premier Robert Stout turn the first sod of the NIMTR at a ceremony on the banks of the Pūniu River.
April 1885	Public Works Department awards the first contract for construction of the railway within the King Country for the Pūniu section (from Te Awamutu to Ōtorohanga).
August 1885	Public Works Department awards contract for the construction of the Poro-o-tarao section (including tunnel).
1886	Work begins on the Poro-o-tarao tunnel.
19 August 1886	Public Works Department awards contract for the construction of the Te Kūiti section (from Ōtorohanga to Te Kūiti).
8 March 1887	Pūniu section of the line (Te Awamutu to Ōtorohanga) opened to traffic.
9 March 1887	Public Works Department contracts the construction of the Waiteti section of the railway (Te Kūiti to Mokau Station, including the Waiteti Viaduct).
2 December 1887	Construction of the Te Kūiti section of the line completed.
8 May 1889	The NIMTR officially opened as far south as Mōkau Station. <sup>1</sup>
27 August 1890	Construction of Poro-o-tarao tunnel completed. <sup>2</sup>
September 1892	Construction work commenced on the Mōkau section of the railway (from Mokau Station to Poro-o-tarao tunnel).
21 December 1896	Mōkau and Poro-o-tarao sections officially opened for traffic.
December 1897	Work commenced by this date on the construction of the Ohinemoa section (from Poro-o-tarao tunnel to Te Kawakawa, south of Ōngarue).
23 August 1901	Ohinemoa section completed.
1 December 1903	NIMTR officially opened to traffic as far as Taumarunui, just south of our inquiry district.

1. Fletcher, Single Track, p 137.

2. Fletcher, Single Track, p 137; 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1891, D-1, p 9.

Table 9.1: Timeline of NIMTR construction within the inquiry district to Ōtorohanga (the Pūniu section) in April 1885, the same month as the turning of the sod ceremony officially marking the beginning of construction on the line.<sup>88</sup>

Further south, the department contracted the construction of a 53-chain tunnel (1.7 kilometres) at Poro-o-tarao, through the range dividing the Mōkau and Whanganui catchments, in August 1885.<sup>89</sup> Construction of the Pūniu section of the line, including four stations, was complete as far as Ōtorohanga by February 1887 and opened for traffic on 8 March 1887.<sup>90</sup>

The Public Works Department contracted the 10-mile 59-chain (17.28 kilometres) section of the line running south from Ōtorohanga to Te Kūiti (Te Kūiti section) in August 1886. A contract for the construction of the eight-mile 53-chain (13.94 kilometres) Waiteti section of the railway, south from Te Kuiti Station to Mokau Station, including the construction of a major viaduct over the Waiteti Gorge, was let in March 1887.<sup>91</sup>

The railway construction workers, or ‘navvies’, employed on the NIMTR from the mid-1880s represented the first major influx of Europeans into the inquiry district. While the exact number of construction workers employed is unknown, the total is likely to have been in the many hundreds, if not thousands.<sup>92</sup> By 1900, for instance, close to 400 men were said to have been working on the northern end of the railway alone.<sup>93</sup>

In some cases, makeshift construction camps became permanent settlements, such as Te Kūiti, which started life as a railway camp near the existing Māori settlement of Tokangamutu.<sup>94</sup> In other cases, settlements all but vanished from existence after workers moved on to the next section of line, such as Carson’s camp located south of Waimiha, which housed workers on the southern section of the line between Poro-o-tarao tunnel and Ōngarue from 1897 to 1902.<sup>95</sup> Railway construction workers therefore proved transitory, but sometimes workers stayed on to lease or purchase land from Māori, joining the permanent settled population of the district.<sup>96</sup>

On 8 May 1889, the stretch of the NIMTR from Te Awamutu south to Mokau Station (including the Pūniu, Te Kūiti, and Waiteti sections) was officially opened 88. ‘The General Assembly’, New Zealand Herald, 26 August 1885, p 6; ‘Public Works Statement (by the Minister for Public Works, the Hon. Edward Richardson)’, AJHR, 1886, D-1, p 4.

89. ‘Public Works Statement (by the Minister for Public Works, the Hon. Edward Richardson)’, AJHR, 1887, D-1, p 33.

90. ‘Public Works Statement’, AJHR, 1887, D-1, p 33.

91. ‘Public Works Statement’, AJHR, 1887, D-1, p 33.

92. Document A20, p 122.

93. PJ Gibbons, ‘Some New Zealand Navvies: Co-Operative Workers, 1891–1912’, in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 11, no 1, 1977, p 55.

94. Document A20, p 123; Christine Johnson, Ruth Larsen, and Kevin Ramshaw, comps, Main Trunk: Portrait of a Railway, A Celebration of 100 Years of North Island Railway History, (Wellington: Grantham House, 2008), pp 48–50.

95. Document A20, pp 123–124.

96. Document A20, p 124.

for traffic.<sup>97</sup> Meanwhile, work continued on the Poro-o-tarao tunnel section. The section was originally contracted with the goal that it would open in August 1887, but poor access and rough terrain delayed its completion, which did not occur until August 1890.<sup>98</sup>

From the late 1880s, with New Zealand continuing to feel the effects of a long economic recession and global shortage of credit, construction on the central section of the NIMTR slowed.<sup>99</sup> Apart from the work on the Poro-o-tarao tunnel, no further work had been completed on the sections of line south of Mokau Station by July 1890, when the department reported that works on the NIMTR were 'at a standstill'.<sup>100</sup>

By 1892, construction work had resumed on the Mōkau section of the line, running from Mokau Station south to the Poro-o-tarao tunnel and the section was officially opened to traffic in December 1896.<sup>101</sup> The same month, work had begun on the Ohinemoa section, running south from the Poro-o-tarao tunnel through to Te Kawakawa, near Ōngarue. Although, progress was slow, as poor weather and difficult conditions hampered construction crews.<sup>102</sup>

Further south, however, little new work was completed on the line for close to a decade. In 1892, a select committee appointed to inquire into the NIMTR recommended that all new construction be suspended until finance for the line was confirmed, Crown land purchasing was further advanced, and the issue of the NIMTR's route finally settled. Regarding finance, the 1892 select committee estimated the cost of constructing the line at £2,007,985, almost twice the Government's initial calculations of £1,293,134.<sup>103</sup> The committee's recommendation that new work be halted until Crown purchasing was further advanced on the adjoining blocks was aimed at minimising the Government's costs in purchasing such lands, which was similar to a policy outlined by Richard Seddon as new Minister of Public Works a year earlier:

If we proceed with the construction of [the North Island Main Trunk Railway] to any material extent, it will happen that the further we progress through or approach towards Native lands the more difficult it will become for the Government to deal with the Natives, and the higher the price we shall have to pay. . . . The Government considers, therefore, that it would be folly, under these circumstances, to construct these railways much further until arrangements have been made with the Natives for the purchase of their lands, and with the owners of private lands that they will

---

97. Fletcher, Single Track, p 137.

98. Fletcher, Single Track, pp 132, 137.

99. Document A20, p 93.

100. 'Public Works Statement (by the Minister for Public Works, the Hon. Thomas Fergus, 25th July 1890), AJHR, 1890, D-1, p 4.

101. 'Public Works Statement (by the Hon. W. Hall-Jones, Minister for Public Works, 14th December, 1897), AJHR, 1897, D-1, p v.

102. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1897, D-1, p v; Fletcher, Single Track, p 193.

103. Document A20, p 93.

lease or dispose of the lands to be benefited, on terms to be agreed upon between the Government and the owners of such lands.<sup>104</sup>

In line with this policy, the Crown, from 1892, embarked upon a large-scale purchasing programme in the inquiry district, purchasing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land using funds from the North Island Main Trunk Loan Application Act alongside its regular purchasing.<sup>105</sup> We discuss Crown purchasing in relation to the railway, and more generally, in chapter 11 of this report.

Further grounds for the select committee's recommendation that new work be halted on the NIMTR lay in continuing disputes over the route the railway should take south of Ōngarue.<sup>106</sup> By 1899, the Government had completed detailed surveys for the original central route, as well as three alternative routes to Taranaki, via Ngaire, Waitara, and Awakino. Based on these surveys, the Government decided to proceed with the central route as planned, while recommending that a branch line be constructed to Taranaki, via Ngaire.<sup>107</sup>

From 1899, the pace of construction work on the NIMTR picked up considerably. With surveys of the proposed lines complete, uncertainty no longer existed over the line that the railway would take south of Ōngarue. Meanwhile, settler pressure was building on the Government to complete the line, with the Public Works Department noting in 1899 that '[n]umerous petitions have been presented to the House praying for the early completion of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.'<sup>108</sup> By September 1900, 350 men were said to be at work on the Ohinemoa section of the line alone.<sup>109</sup>

Construction was further boosted in 1901, when the Government took out a public works loan of £1,000,000, most of which was put towards the completion of the NIMTR. By September 1902, the Ohinemoa section had been opened for goods traffic, and work was progressing on the Ōngarue section of the line.<sup>110</sup> With the completion of the Ōngarue section of the line, the NIMTR was officially opened for traffic from Auckland as far as Taumarunui on 1 December 1903.

The NIMTR took another five years to construct, reaching completion in 1908, with the cost of construction estimated at over £2,500,000.<sup>111</sup> The railway's

104. 'Public Works Statement (by the Minister for Public Works, The Hon. R. J. Seddon, 8th September, 1891)', AJHR, 1891, D-1, p 7.

105. Document A20, p 93.

106. 'Report of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Committee', AJHR, 1892, I-9, p 1.

107. 'Public Works Statement (by the Hon W. Hall-Jones, Minister for Public Works 12th September, 1899)', AJHR, 1899, D-1, pp 105-113; 'Report of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Committee', AJHR, 1892, I-9, p 1.

108. W. Hall-Jones, 28 September 1900, NZPD, vol 114, p 377.

109. 'Public Works Statement (by the Hon. W. Hall-Jones, Minister for Public Works, 28th September, 1900)', AJHR, 1900, D1, p v.

110. 'Public Works Statement (by the Hon. W. Hall-Jones, Minister for Public Works, 22nd October, 1901)', AJHR, 1901, D-1, pp i-ii; 'Public Works Statement (by the Hon W. Hall-Jones, Minister for Public Works, 16th September, 1902)', AJHR, 1902, D-1, pp v-vi; Johnson, Larsen, and Ramshaw, Main Trunk, pp 48-50.

111. Document A20, p 98.

arrival in Te Rohe Pōtae transformed the inquiry district in both immediate and long-lasting ways, which although outlined briefly in the following paragraphs, will be analysed in more detail in future chapters of this report. It opened vast new areas of land for settlement and farming in Te Rohe Pōtae, and provided the means of transporting those settlers' produce to market.<sup>112</sup> Further, most of the new European settlers in the inquiry district, whose numbers increased from around 1,400 in 1901 to 12,000 in 1911, settled in areas close to the railway.<sup>113</sup> The native townships of Ōtorohanga, Te Kūiti, and Taumarunui would become the principal service centres of the King Country, with their growth linked directly to the railway and the employment opportunities and general economic activity it opened up.<sup>114</sup> Issues related to how Te Rohe Pōtae Māori benefited from employment and economic opportunities arising from the operation of the NIMTR will be discussed in future chapters of this report. In particular, Te Kūiti and Taumarunui were known as 'railway towns', with much of their employment and economic activity centred around servicing the railway. During the NIMTR's construction, Te Kūiti formed the base for rail construction further south, while Taumarunui became a major rail depot for the North Island from 1903.<sup>115</sup>

In Te Rohe Pōtae, as elsewhere, the railway was the harbinger of massive environmental change, as the line made new lands accessible to settlers and new industries viable. The opening of new lands for farming led to the mass conversion of forest and swamps into pasture.<sup>116</sup> The felling of the central North Island's 'Great Bush' was made possible using the railway to transport logs. The railway also opened new areas of the country to tourism, a burgeoning industry in early twentieth-century New Zealand. From the early 1900s, the Department of Tourist and Health Resorts, initially founded as a division of the Railways Department, launched an ambitious programme of scenic reserve creation across the country. The acquisition of lands near to, or visible from, the NIMTR became a major focus of scenery preservation officials. As we will see in future parts of this report, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would be impacted directly by such land takings. However, we now turn to detailing essential issues concerning the construction of the NIMTR.

9.4.2 Land takings for the initial construction of the NIMTR

As the railway advanced southwards from 1885, the Government moved to secure land for the railway's construction. Between 1886 and 1902, the Crown would use public works legislation to transfer into Crown ownership approximately 1,087 acres of Māori land for the railway line and related purposes. The same legal process applied both to land that Māori had agreed to gift and to lands outside of the gifting. Post-1903 land takings will be discussed in a future chapter of this report.

---

112. Atkinson, Trainland, p 65.

113. Document A20, p 193.

114. Document A20, p 210.

115. Document A20, pp 208–209.

116. Atkinson, Trainland, p 65.

9.4.2.1 The legislative framework

By the time of the North Island Main Trunk Railway's construction through the inquiry district, legislation allowing the Government to acquire land compulsorily for public works purposes had been in place for several decades. Land for the railway's construction through Te Rohe Pōtae was acquired under the Public Works Act 1882 and its successor legislation, the Public Works Act 1894.<sup>117</sup> We discuss the development of public works legislation in general in the Public Works chapter, which will be released in a future part of this report. For present purposes, however, it is important to note that in the period critical to the construction of the NIMTR, the provisions for railway takings were different from those for other types of public works taking.

In the Public Works Act 1882, the taking of land for railways was dealt with in Part VI. There, section 129 stipulated that before anything else could happen, a special Act had to be passed giving authority for the railway line to be made. That Act had to give the line's start and end points and 'state as nearly as may be' the route it would take in between. In the case of the NIMTR, the empowering Act was the Railways Authorization Act 1884. A schedule to that Act described the line as running 'from a point at or near Marton to Te Awamutu via Murimotu, Taumarunui, and the Ongarue River Valley'.<sup>118</sup>

Thus, with the railway legally authorised, the land takings for its construction then had to be carried out according to the procedures set out in public works legislation. Under section 130 of the Public Works Act 1882, the governor was required to issue a proclamation defining the middle line of the railway or a section of it and to deposit plans of the affected land in the office of the registrar of the Supreme Court for public inspection. Only after the plans had been desposited could the Crown actually take the land.

Nevertheless, once a middle-line proclamation had been issued, the land in question could be entered and construction begin. The same section of the Act also required the Minister to give notice of the taking to all owners and occupiers of the land 'so far as they can be ascertained'. It specified, however, that such notice could occur at any time before or after (emphasis added) the taking. Moreover, it also provided a legal loophole for non-notification by specifically stating that an omission to notify the owners would not invalidate the taking.<sup>119</sup> The 40-day window for lodging objections, allowed in the case of other types of public work, did not apply to railway takings unless particularly provided for in a special Act.<sup>120</sup>

In short, these separate provisions for railway takings included the right to occupy land without a survey and begin construction without prior notification or

---

117. Document A20, p146. Both Acts required that railways be made under authority of a special Act that described the line of the railway and its two end points. In the case of the NIMTR, the empowering Act was the Railways Authorization Act 1884. Section 3 of the Act provided for the cost of the railway to be funded out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for that purpose. Section 8 incorporated the Public Works Act 1882 and its amendments into the Act; see also doc A20, pp146–147.

118. Document A20, pp146–147.

119. Public Works Act 1882, ss130–131.

120. Public Works Act 1882, ss130–131.

consultation with owners. Owners who resisted the Government's incursion into their lands risked arrest. The provisions were repealed in the Public Works Acts of 1894, 1908, and 1928 and were not repealed until a major overhaul of the Public Works Act in 1981.<sup>121</sup>

While on the face of it these provisions did not differentiate between Māori-owned and general land, Part 11 of the 1882 Act did contain provisions for the taking of Māori land. As historian Cathy Marr noted, this was the first time that public works legislation made the distinction.<sup>122</sup> These separate procedures were set out in sections 23 to 26 of the Act. They empowered the Crown to take any Māori land required for a public work, once an order in council had been passed defining in general terms the land needed. Two months after the gazetting of such an order, the Crown could enter and take the land without directly notifying or gaining consent from the owners. These separate provisions for takings of Māori land continued in force up to late 1887. In that year, the Act was amended so that when Māori land was being taken for railway purposes, only the provisions of the legislation relating to railways had to be followed.<sup>123</sup>

Moreover, there was also the so-called 'five per cent rule'. From the 1860s, this rule had permitted governments to take up to 5 per cent of any block that had passed through the Native Land Court and use it for the purposes of roads or railways, as outlined in legislation such as the Native Lands Act 1865 and Native Land Court Act 1886. The right was initially limited to 10 years after the Native Land Court had issued a certificate of title, but was later extended to 15 years. The Crown was not required to notify or compensate landowners for takings under the 5 per cent rule. We discuss the Government's use of the 5 per cent provisions to acquire land for roading in a future part of our report. Here we are concerned with their use to acquire land for railways. Writing in 1927, the year the 5 per cent rule was finally removed from legislation, Apirana Ngata commented to Peter Buck that 'the railways have been notorious offenders' in their use of the rule.<sup>124</sup>

9.4.2.2 Takings by proclamation

As noted previously, the Railways Authorization Act 1884 permitted the Government to begin construction of a line from Te Awamutu to Marton, under the provisions of the Public Works Act 1882. The next step in the formal process of acquiring the land for the railway took place on 2 April 1885. That day, the governor issued an order in council proclaiming the area that would be required for the central section of the line, from the Pūniu River in the north to Marton in the south.<sup>125</sup> The proclamation declared that 'a railway, having an average width of three hundred links [three chains] . . . shall be constructed on or through all lands

---

121. Document A20, p164.

122. Cathy Marr, Public Works Takings of Maori Land, 1840–1981, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahaua Whanui Series (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1997), pp 105–110; doc A20, p146.

123. Public Works Act Amendment Act 1887, s13(3).

124. Document A20, p172.

125. Document A20, pp147–148.

held or occupied by Native owners; the total length being two hundred and ten miles or thereabouts.<sup>126</sup>

It will be noted that this April 1885 proclamation, which applied to the inquiry district as well as an area south of the district, immediately departed from Ballance's statements at Kihikihi only two months earlier that takings for the track would generally be one chain in width 'except where it runs along the side of hills where cuttings are made, where a little more will be required – perhaps two chains'.<sup>127</sup> Nevertheless, the April 1885 order in council was only the first of a series of required steps to delineate formally the land to be taken for the railway, and did not necessarily indicate the final area of land that would be needed for the railway's construction.

On the same day as its 2 April 1885 order in council, the Crown issued three 'middle-line' proclamations which, along with their associated public works plans, effectively defined the route to be taken by the three sections in question. The total distance involved was around 30 miles.<sup>128</sup> Proclamations defining the middle line for further sections of the railway were then issued as construction progressed. The issuing of each of these proclamations meant that the Department of Public Works could then immediately enter upon the land named in the proclamation and construct the railway. As each section of the line was finished, and more detailed surveys completed, the governor issued a series of Gazette notices formally taking the land for the railway. Each notice referred to Public Works Department plans defining the area of land being taken.<sup>129</sup> Public works notices of intention to take land were also to be put in the Māori equivalent of the Gazette called Kahiti, as well as on the notice board at local post offices.<sup>130</sup>

The land for the construction of the railway through the inquiry district, including takings for stations and quarries, was formally taken in nine separate proclamations between 29 April 1886 and 29 November 1902 and generally followed the order of construction from north to south. The exception was where additional land was taken to adjust existing takings or for other purposes such as ballast pits.<sup>131</sup>

126. Document A20, pp 147–148. Part VI of the Public Works Act 1882 contained specific provisions relating to public works takings for railways. These required that railway takings were to be made under the authority of special legislation. For the central section of the North Island Main Trunk Railway this was the Railways Authorization Act 1884.

127. 'Notes of a meeting between the Hon. Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February, 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 22; doc A20, p 79.

128. Document A20, p 148.

129. New Zealand Gazette, 1886, p 596 (PWD plan 13652); New Zealand Gazette, 1888, p 455 (PWD 15097), New Zealand Gazette 1888, p 386 (PWD 13652A); New Zealand Gazette, 1888, pp 386–387; New Zealand Gazette, 1888, p 1281; New Zealand Gazette, 1895, p 1448; New Zealand Gazette, 1899, p 1121; New Zealand Gazette, 1902, pp 2420–2421; New Zealand Gazette, 1902, p 2618. These Gazette notices were accompanied by 79 separate Public Works Department plans of the area to be taken. For copies of these plans, see doc A140(a)(i) (Parker document bank).

130. Document A63 (Alexander), pp 19, 35, 76; Marr, Public Works Takings of Maori Land, p 138.

131. Document A140 (Parker), p 3.

Overall, between 1886 and 1902, the Government took around 1,087 acres of land to construct approximately 70.5 miles of railway through the inquiry district.<sup>132</sup> This total included 24.9 acres taken for ballast pits and a water reservoir in 1895 and 1902, respectively, and land acquired for railway stations.<sup>133</sup>

The Tribunal is aware of at least 16 NIMTR stations in the inquiry district.<sup>134</sup> Using historical Public Works Department plans and modern mapping, researcher Brent Parker has been able to estimate the area of land used for 10 of these stations: Te Mawhai, Te Kawa, Kiokio, Otorohanga, Hangatiki, Te Kuiti, Mokau, Mangapehi, Waimiha and Ongarue.<sup>135</sup> While the smallest station (Kiokio) was just over 1.7 acres in area, at least four stations (Otorohanga, Hangatiki, Mokau and Ongarue) exceeded the 10-acre maximum earlier indicated by Ballance.<sup>136</sup> In total, these estimates suggest that approximately 89.8 acres were taken for these 10 stations alone. Of the remaining six stations, insufficient information was available for Parker to venture any figures for Te Kumi and Kopaki. According to Parker, land takings for Okahukura Station did not form part of the initial takings for the railway.<sup>137</sup> We do not know the area for stations at Poro-o-tarao, Te Koura, and Taringamotu.

Even allowing that the six stations for which estimates are unavailable may have been smaller than the average of 8.98 acres per station and allowing a conservative figure of 5 acres per station (the minimum station area indicated by Ballance) this indicates that at least 114 acres may have been taken for 16 NIMTR stations in the inquiry district.

As to the track itself, Cleaver and Sarich estimated that 574 acres would have been taken in the inquiry district if the Government had strictly adhered to a

132. The gazetted takings for the railway indicate that the total area of land taken was 1,096 acres. However, adding up the total acreages taken from the Public Works Department plans that provided the supporting detail for these gazetted takings, indicates the total area taken to be approximately 1,087 acres. The reason for the discrepancy between these figures is unclear: see doc A20, p148; doc A140; table 9.1.

133. 24.4 acres was taken for a ballast pit at Mangaokewa in two separate takings in 1895; 0.5 of an acre was taken in 1902 for a water reservoir near Ongarue Station, on the Rangitoto-Tuhua 77 block; doc A140(a), pp3-5.

134. Parker's table of land takings in document A140(a) lists the following NIMTR stations: Te Mawhai, Te Kawa, Kiokio, Otorohanga, Hangatiki, Te Kuiti, Mokau, Mangapehi, Waimiha, Ongarue, Te Kumi, Kopaki, and Poro-o-tarao. A station existed at Okahukura, but Parker noted it did not form part of the initial takings for the railway: doc A140(a). In addition, Cleaver and Sarich mentioned additional stations at Te Koura and Taringamotu: doc A20, pp111, 121. It is unclear, however, whether these stations formed part of the initial takings for the NIMTR. Note: this figure does not include stations located on the Stratford-Okahukura branch line. Te Mawhai Station is the subject of a specific claim for Wai 440.

135. Te Mawhai Station (10 acres), Te Kawa Station (10 acres), Kiokio Station (1.7 acres), Otorohanga Station (12.5 acres), Hangatiki Station (11.3 acres), Te Kuiti Station (9.4 acres), Mokau Station (10.2 acres); Mangapehi (5.4 acres), Waimiha (6 acres), and Ongarue (13.3 acres): doc A140(d) (Parker appendix).

136. Cleaver and Sarich initially estimated an area of 12 acres 1 rood 5 perches for Mokau Station. In subsequent errata, they revised their estimate for this station to 9 acres 3 roods. See doc A20(d). For reasons of consistency, we have relied upon Parker's estimate of 10.2 acres for this station.

137. Document A140(d); doc A140(a), p 5 n one-chain width, and calculated the length of the railway as being just over 71.5 miles.<sup>138</sup> However, there is an error in the original survey plans: the actual length of the railway through the inquiry district is closer to 70.5 miles (113.46 kilometres).<sup>139</sup> Furthermore, if one chain had been taken for the entire 70.5-mile length of the railway corridor, the area required for the track would have amounted to approximately 560 acres. As noted earlier, however, the total area taken for railway purposes was around 1,087 acres. Subtracting 138.9 acres from that to cover ballast pits, reservoirs, and railway stations, as calculated previously, we are left with 948 acres for 70.5 miles of track. This suggests that the width taken for the track was much closer to a 1.7-chain average than the one-chain width Ballance had specified in 1885. However, the fact that Ballance explained that up to two chains may be needed for cuttings means this average still falls within the range of takings for the track Te Rohe Pōtae Māori understood might need to occur. Nevertheless, the exact length of track which likely required taking two chains for cuttings is unknown, making it difficult to determine the extent to which the Government kept to its assurance of sticking to a one-chain width for the majority of the construction of the track. What is known is that all takings were from Māori land.

9.4.3 Gifted lands and compensation agreements

As discussed in section 9.3.3, the gifting of certain lands for the railway continued to be the subject of ongoing discussions between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and Ballance during 1886 and 1887. During these discussions, Ballance accepted the offer of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to gift one chain for the width of the railway, and between one and three acres for stations, and assured them that the Government would compensate Māori for any lands taken outside of the gifting. He did not elaborate on how the Government proposed to transfer any gifted lands into its ownership.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori assented to the railway's construction through their territory based on exploratory surveys completed by the Government during 1884, a point we noted at section 9.3.2. However, the exact land to be taken (based on more detailed survey work) remained to be settled.<sup>140</sup> In addition, local agreements concerning the gifting, and compensation for the excess lands outside the gifting, remained to be worked out with affected hapū and iwi along the route of the proposed railway.

Between 1886 and 1888, government officials negotiated the details of the gifting with Māori owners of the blocks on the northern sections of the railway, from the Pūniu River as far south as Mokau Station.<sup>141</sup> Despite the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae

138. Document A20(e) (Clever and Sarich errata), pp 1–2.

139. Document A140(b), paras 13–15.

140. Document A140(a)(i); see also doc A20, pp 148–149; transcript 4.1.7, p 64 (Tom Roa, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-ā-noho Marae, 5 November 2012). Public Works survey plans from 1897 describe the Rangitoto–Tuhua block sections (which all of the 1899 and 1902 railway takings were from) as 'Native Land not adjudicated upon'.

141. Specific claims encapsulated by this section include Wai 1386 (although the claimants did not present closing submissions), Wai 762, Wai 928, Wai 1255, Wai 1455, Wai 1147, and Wai 1203.

rangatira that the settlements for the railway be kept outside the Native Land Court, the Government would subsequently apply to the court to make formal orders of compensation for these blocks.<sup>142</sup>

The government's applications came before the court at Ōtorohanga in December 1890.<sup>143</sup> Government official Thomas Cheeseman attended the hearings on behalf of the Public Works Department, while some of the Māori owners of the blocks involved were also present. Cheeseman told the court that Māori had agreed to gift one acre for the railway, and three acres for each station, and that the Government would compensate the owners for any land taken beyond this. At that point, court minutes record that he produced correspondence in support of his statement (although the exact nature of these documents is not stated).<sup>144</sup> Cheeseman explained that he had tried to estimate the value of the land 'on a liberal scale' and reach settlements with Māori owners outside of the court.<sup>145</sup> The court's role in the negotiations was therefore limited to giving its sanction to informal agreements officials had already reached with Māori owners out of court. Concerning the offer of Wahanui and others to gift land for the railway, Cheeseman noted:

Some of the owners now say that they were not bound by Wahanui's arrangement, but others admit it as binding and wished to know the Court's opinion to have the question of how far the natives are bound by that agreement decided.<sup>146</sup>

Copies of the court's compensation orders have not been located as part of the research for this inquiry. However, surviving court minutes give some indication of what was gifted, as well as the varying levels of support for the gifting among hapū along the line.

The owners of at least three blocks were said to have agreed to keep to the original terms of the gifting. For instance, Cheeseman reported that the owners of the Otorohanga block had 'agreed to adhere to the original agreement with regard to the line and for the surplus have agreed to take £5 including damages & gravel pit'.<sup>147</sup> However, the owners of five other blocks did not wish to be paid any compensation, even where the land taken exceeded the gift. For instance, in relation to the Waikowhitiwhiti block, Cheeseman reported that 'Te Matapihi and her co-owners have agreed that they make no claim for any of the land (including the excess) taken for Railway purposes'. Te Matapihi, who was present, then confirmed to the court that 'they do not wish for any compensation'.<sup>148</sup> The owners of the Pokuru block, on the other hand, refused to gift any land and were awarded

---

142. Document A96 (Parker), p 4.

143. Document A20, p 154; doc A20(a), p 64; doc A96, p 3.

144. Document A20, p 154; doc A20(a), p 64.

145. Document A20, p 154; doc A20(a), p 64.

146. Document A96, p 5; doc A20(a), p 64.

147. Document A20(a), p 68.

148. Document A20(a), p 68.

compensation for the full area taken.<sup>149</sup> In relation to this block, Mr Cheeseman reported that the block's owners have agreed to accept £60 to cover the 27 acres taken and that: 'These people would not agree to give any portions free.'<sup>150</sup>

The owners of the Te Kumi block agreed to gift one chain for the railway line and three acres for stations. While two of the block's owners, Raurau and Ngapera, initially accepted an offer of £8 10s for the excess lands, Raurau later stated that she wished to 'renounce her claim to compensation' on the basis that the area was a burial ground: 'she finds there are dead there, & she cannot take the money she asked for'.<sup>151</sup>

Regarding the northern sections of the railway, court minutes record that, during its Ōtorohanga sitting between 2 and 16 December 1890, the court confirmed compensation settlements with the owners of 11 blocks north of Te Kūiti, all corresponding to the Pūniu and Te Kūiti sections.<sup>152</sup>

In relation to the railway sections further south, an application to subdivide Rangitoto–Tuhua had also come before the court at its December 1890 sitting. Despite its title, Parker found that the application almost certainly referred not to the large Rangitoto–Tuhua block as such, but rather to the 9.5-mile stretch running from the southern boundary of the Te Kumi block in the north to Mokau Station in the south, through the Pukenui block and northern Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 (a length closely approximating to the Waiteti section of the railway).<sup>153</sup> Cheeseman's statements at the court hearing, in which he mentioned a valuation for 9.5 miles of line, support the conclusion that the Rangitoto–Tuhua application referred only to the Waiteti section.<sup>154</sup>

At the hearings, Cheeseman reported that the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Taonui Hikaka had spoken on behalf of Ngāti Rōrā and had agreed 'for self and people' to the gift of 'one chain wide and three acres for Stations, & also the right to fell the bush for a chain on each side of line'.<sup>155</sup> Ngāti Rōrā had extensive land interests that extended both north and south of their base at Te Kūiti.<sup>156</sup> His offer to gift land for the railway related only to the section as far south as Mokau Station, however, 'fresh arrangements . . . altogether' would need to be made for the 'continuation of the line beyond Mokau station'. Moreover, he did not 'wish the question of compensation for excess to be gone into until the line is completed through his land'.<sup>157</sup> Cheeseman at that point indicated that he did not wish to proceed any further with the 'Rangitoto case' for the time being, thus leaving matters unresolved.<sup>158</sup>

149. Document A20, p 156; doc A20(a), p 67.

150. Document A20(a), p 67.

151. Document A96, p 18.

152. Document A20(a), pp 64–73; doc A20, pp 154–155.

153. Document A96, pp 10–11.

154. Document A96, p 11.

155. Document A96, p 17.

156. As stated in chapter 2, Ngāti Rōrā interests included Hangatiki, Pureora, and Waimiha, and much of the Mōkau River catchment. The Pukenui block was awarded to Ngāti Rōrā in 1893: doc A60 (Berghan), pp 774–775.

157. Document A96, p 17.

158. Document A96, p 17.

Over the following decade, the Crown reached compensation arrangements for two further blocks along the railway line.<sup>159</sup>

The takings for the northern-most of these blocks, the Te Kuiti block, came back before the Native Land Court in 1899, after the Crown applied to subdivide the block. At the hearing, George Wilkinson informed the court that the Crown had acquired interests in the Te Kuiti block amounting to 1,908 acres, from which it planned to deduct 12.5 acres in exchange for the 1888 taking of seven acres of the block for the railway and the 1895 taking of 5.5 acres for the Mangaokewa ballast pit.<sup>160</sup> However, following further discussions, which are not recorded in court minutes, the court determined the following day that the Crown's interests in the block were as follows:

The area purchased is 1908 acres. Out of this is to be deducted the area of the ballast pit 5-2-5. Balance of Crown award 1902 acres, exclusive of the railway line, which has been given without payt [payment].<sup>161</sup>

Further south, the railway takings from the Pukenui block appear to have been subject to an out-of-court compensation settlement in 1899.<sup>162</sup> As seen previously, in 1888 the Crown took 87.5 acres from the Pukenui block for the Waiteti section. In February 1899, the Crown applied to the Native Land Court to define its interests in the Pukenui 2 block (the portion of the former Pukenui block containing the railway, created following the 1893 subdivision of that block).<sup>163</sup> Later that month, after negotiations between Ormsby, representing the owners, and Wilkinson, the Crown agreed to deduct around 106 acres from the Crown's award to compensate the Māori owners of Pukenui 2 for the 1888 railway taking of 87 acres, as well as 18 or so acres taken from the block for the Mangaokewa ballast pit in 1895.<sup>164</sup> Wilkinson noted that the arrangement avoided the need for a 'compensation court'.<sup>165</sup> The 87-acre taking apparently included the one chain width and 'excess'.<sup>166</sup>

South of Pukenui, the railway enters the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block. The Waiteti section of the railway ends at Mokau Station, part way through the block. The question of whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori gifted land for the railway within the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block was disputed between the parties in this inquiry.<sup>167</sup> On this point, the claimants submitted that none of the land within the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block was gifted. They said that Taonui Hikaka's offer to gift land for 159. Document A96(c) (Parker document bank), p 20.

160. Document A96(c), p 20; doc A96(d), p 1. 18 acres, 3 roods and 31 perches was also taken from the Pukenui 2 block in 1895 for the same ballast pit.

161. Document A96(c), p 20; doc A96(d), p 3.

162. Subject of specific claims for Wai 556, Wai 616, Wai 1377, and Wai 1820.

163. Document A20, p 156; doc A140(b)(i), pp 29, 99–103; doc A60, p 775.

164. Document A20, p 156; doc A140(b), para 25; doc A140(b)(i), p 29.

165. Document A20, pp 156–157; doc A140(b)(i), p 29.

166. Document A140(b), para 25.

167. Submission 3.4.121, pp 44–46; submission 3.4.293, pp 61–67.

the railway as far south as Mokau Station was not taken up by the Crown, and that he had, furthermore, specifically declined to make any undertaking about land south of there.<sup>168</sup> The Crown argued that the gifting not only encompassed a one-chain corridor right through the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block, but may have extended south beyond the block’s southern boundary.<sup>169</sup> In support of its position, the Crown cited Parker’s research. Parker’s view that the gifting reached at least as far as the southern boundary of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block relied on a series of correspondence produced in the context of later disputes over the fencing of the NIMTR in the 1900s.<sup>170</sup>

As discussed further in section 9.4.8, by the turn of the twentieth century, the Crown’s failure to complete fencing of the sections of railway south of Mokau Station was a major source of grievance for Māori landowners on either side of the line, and was the subject of several deputations and petitions. In several of these appeals, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori correspondents, including Ormsby himself, referred to an earlier agreement by the Government to fence the line as far south as the Poro-o-tarao tunnel, on the southern boundary of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block.<sup>171</sup> In addition, WH Hales, then engineer-in-chief of the Public Works Department, wrote in 1905 that when the railway construction was commenced the Native owners of the land between the Puniu River and Poro-o-tarao offered to give the land required for the railway free and the Government undertook to erect the fences along both sides of the line through this country.<sup>172</sup>

In our view, in the absence of any evidence of the Crown having reached separate settlements with the owners of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block, such retrospective references to the gifting – produced in the context of discussions of the fencing of the line, not the gifting itself – are not in themselves sufficient to prove that the gifting extended any further than the southern boundary of the Pukenui block.

No individual compensation arrangements are known to have been attempted with the Māori owners of any of the blocks south of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block, taken in 1899 and 1902.

The known details of the giftings and compensation agreements, as well as the lands taken outside of the giftings, are set out in table 9.1. To read an expanded version of this table, which includes the detailed calculations of the giftings and takings, as well as explanatory notes on the takings and compensation, refer to the appendix of this chapter.

168. Submission 3.4.121, pp 44–46.

169. Submission 3.4.293, pp 61–67.

170. Submission 3.4.293, pp 63–66.

171. Document A140(b), paras 10.1–10.11; doc A140(b)(i), p 1; doc A96(c), pp 19–20; doc A20(a), p 211.

172. Document A140(b), para 10.9; doc A140(b)(i), p 2.

TE MANA WHATU AHURU

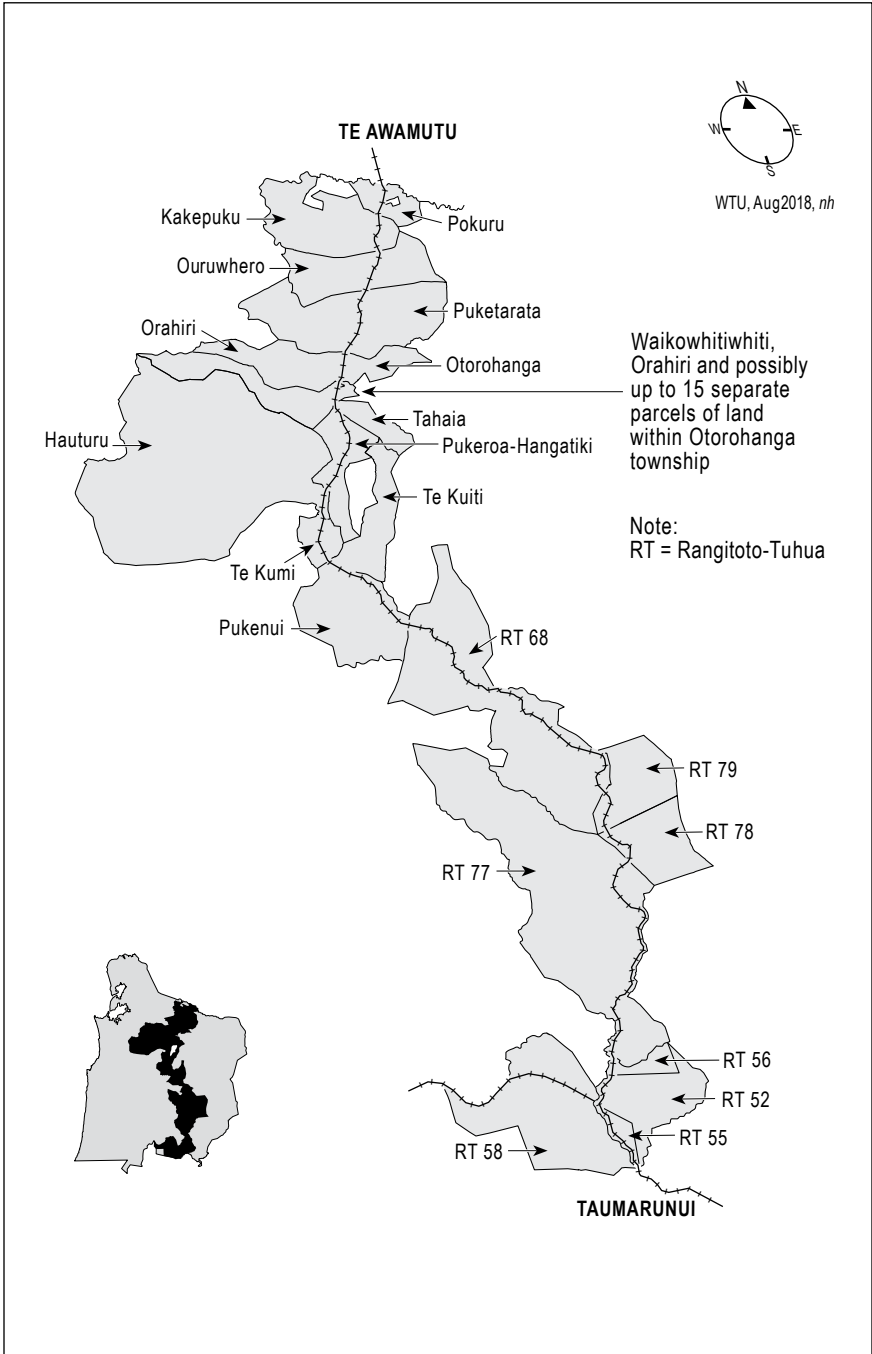

9.4.3

Block	Year of taking	Length of track through block (miles and chains)	Estimated area of taking (acres)
Pokuru	1886	1 mile 70 chains	26.9
Kakepuku 10 and 12	1886	2 miles 3 chains	23.1
Ouruwhero – North and South	1886	2 miles 28 chains	34.1
Puketarata 2 and 11	1886	3 miles 67 chains	37.3
Otorohanga	1886	1 mile 59 chains	17.6
Waikowhitiwhiti, Orahiri and Tahaia blocks	1886, 1888	1 mile 64 chains	30.1
Pukeroa- Hangatiki	1888	4 miles 59 chains	45.7
Hauturu	1888	1 mile 58 chains	19.4
Te Kumi	1888	2 miles 70 chains	32.5
Te Kuiti	1888	42 chains	7
Te Kuiti	1895	n/a	5.5
Pukenui	1888	4 miles 70 chains	87
Pukenui 2	1895	n/a	18.9
Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 (north of Mokau Station)	1888	4 miles 3 chains	77.5
Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 (south of Mokau Station)	1899	11 miles 7 chains	200.4
Rangitoto–Tuhua 79	1899, 1902	3 miles	46.5
Rangitoto–Tuhua 78	1902	2 miles 40 chains	63.1
Rangitoto–Tuhua 77	1902	13 miles 25 chains	219.3
Rangitoto–Tuhua 77	1902	n/a	0.5
Rangitoto–Tuhua 56	1902	1 mile	14
Rangitoto–Tuhua 52	1902	1 mile 75 chains	26.8
Rangitoto–Tuhua 55	1902	4 miles 11 chains	54
Rangitoto–Tuhua 58	1902	1 mile 7.1 chains	0.1
Total		70 miles 38.1 chains<sup>1</sup>	1087.3

1. The distances cited in this chapter and in the appendix to this chapter are those from Te Awamutu, 2 miles 10 chains north of the start of our inquiry district. Taking into account the inaccuracy in the original survey of the Rangitoto-Tuhua 68 block, which overestimated the length of the line through that block by 2 miles 30 chains, the overall distance of the NIMTR between the northern and southern boundaries of our inquiry district can be calculated at 70 miles 38.1 chains.

Area gifted (acres)	Area of taking not gifted (acres)	Compensation agreed
0	26.9	£60
0	23.1	£26
26.1	8	£10 10s
20.9	16.4	£8 for excess in Puketarata 2; £7 10s for the one chain and the excess in Puketarata 11.
13.9	3.7	£5 (excess land), £3 (damage, gravel pit and removal of soil).
27.5	2.6	£3 10s for excess in Tahaia block. Store back-rent to be paid (Tahaia).
45.7	0	Fence to be straightened.
19.4	0	None.
32.5	0	None. Fence to be straightened. Gifting included right to fell timber one chain on each side of the track.
7	0
0	5.5	Exchanged for land purchased by Crown in same block.
0	87	Exchanged for interests acquired by the Crown in the same block.
0	18.9	Exchanged for interests acquired by the Crown in the same block.
0	77.5	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	200.4	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	46.5	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	63.1	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	219.3	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	0.5	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	14	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	26.8	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	54	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0	0.1	No compensation awarded for this taking.
193	894.3

Table 9.1: Giftings, land takings for the NIMTR and agreed compensation in the Te Rohe Pōtae district between 1886 and 1903, from north to south

Map 9.2: Land blocks through which the North Island Main Trunk Railway passes in the Te Rohe Pōtae district

As seen from table 9.2, between 1886 and 1902 the Crown formally took around 1,087 acres of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land for the construction of the NIMTR through the inquiry district. Of this land, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to gift approximately 193 acres of land. The remaining 894.3 acres was not included in the gifting, and therefore was subject to the payment of compensation by the Crown.

The question of whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were fully and fairly compensated for these land takings is discussed in section 9.4.4.

9.4.4 Fairness and payment of compensation

Between 1890 and 1899 the Government reached several individual compensation settlements with Māori owners of the blocks along the railway, from the Pūniu River as far south as the northern boundary of Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block, for lands outside of the gifting. These are set out in table 9.2.<sup>173</sup>

As mentioned in section 9.4.3, in 1899, the court gave its sanction to two out-of-court agreements between government officials and Māori owners. In one of these, the Crown agreed to deduct 5.5 acres from interests it had acquired in the Te Kuiti block to compensate owners for the 1888 taking of 5.5 acres for the Mangaokewa ballast pit.<sup>174</sup> Similarly, in 1899, Native Land Court minutes noted that the Māori owners of the Pukenui 2 block, via their representative Ormsby, had reached agreement with the Crown's agent George Wilkinson to deduct 106 acres from the Crown's interests in the Pukenui 2 block as compensation for its earlier takings for the railway and part of the Mangaokewa ballast pit.<sup>175</sup>

For the blocks for which compensation settlements were reached, analysis by claimant counsel suggested that the rates per acre agreed exceeded the purchase price paid by the Crown in the same blocks and some cases were higher than the prices paid when the same land was on-sold to settlers a decade later. For instance, the owners of the Kakepuku block agreed to £26 in compensation for the taking of just over 23 acres for the railway, a rate of £1 2s 6d per acre. When the Crown began purchasing in the Kakepuku block in the late 1890s it paid only 6 shillings an acre and later onsold the same land to settlers for £1 per acre.<sup>176</sup>

The claimants concluded that the agreements confirmed by the court in the 1890s 'appea[r] to be fair considering what the Crown was to pay for similar land within a few years.'<sup>177</sup> Similarly, the rates awarded for lands taken in the Pokuru, Ouruwhero, Puketarata, and Te Kumi blocks ranged from £15 to £2 4s 8d an acre: all significantly higher than when the Crown began purchasing on the same blocks in the late 1890s and early 1900s.<sup>178</sup> Serious questions remain, however, over whether the compensation amounts awarded by the court ever reached the Māori owners of the blocks concerned.

---

173. Specific claims encapsulated by this section include Wai 551, Wai 948, Wai 846, Wai 1455, Wai 1147, and Wai 1203.

174. Document A96(c), p 20; doc A96(d), p 1.

175. Document A20, p 156; doc A140(b), para 25.

176. Submission 3.4.121, pp 48–49.

177. Submission 3.4.121, p 48.

178. Submission 3.4.121, pp 48–49.

As explained in the detailed table in the appendix, the Māori owners of several blocks affected by the takings for the NIMTR requested that their compensation be put towards survey fees or exchanged for other Crown interests in the same blocks. The owners of the Pokuru block, from which the Government took 26.9 acres of land in 1886, had arranged for their compensation to be put towards survey fees, and in 1892 the court ordered that £58 17s 9d be paid to the surveyor-general. However, the survey costs remained unpaid in 1898. That year, Judge Walter Edward Gudgeon, who had been instructed to inquire into the unpaid compensation for the Pokuru block, confirmed the court's 1892 order that £58 17s 9d be put towards survey fees and the remainder paid to the block's owners, although no records have survived as to whether either of these payments were ever made.<sup>179</sup> The outstanding compensation for the Kakepuku 10 and 12 blocks was put towards survey liens in 1894.<sup>180</sup>

As seen in table 9.1, railway lands taken from the Pukenui 2 block in 1888, and 1895 takings from the Pukenui 2 and Te Kuiti blocks for the Mangaokewa ballast pit were exchanged with other interests the Crown had acquired in the blocks. This left compensation payments of £37 10s, relating to several blocks (Ouruwhero North and South, Puketarata 2 and 11, Otorohanga, Waikowhitiwhiti, Orahiri, Tahaia), outstanding.

Unfortunately, many of the relevant government files relating to the taking of lands for the railway's construction could not be located during the research for this inquiry.<sup>181</sup> Some clues as to their content survive, however, in the records of a 1946 Royal Commission on Licensing led by Justice Smith. These indicate that Public Works Department officials had taken initial steps to arrange payment to the Māori owners as early as 1891.

That year, T W Lewis, head of the Native Department, wrote to enquire whether the Crown's land purchase officer, George Wilkinson, could 'without interference with his more important land purchase duties, pay the compensation.'<sup>182</sup> The wording of Lewis's request is telling. Even Native Department officials viewed the Government's land purchasing programme as of higher priority than ensuring Māori owners received the compensation they were due.

However, Smith's report suggested that this compensation 'seems to have remained unpaid because there were so many owners and the amounts were so small' that Wilkinson 'could not make satisfactory arrangements for payment.'<sup>183</sup> This was the last effort the Government made to pay compensation owed to the 179. Submission 3.4.121, p 51; doc A95(k) (Parker document bank), pp 20–27.

180. Submission 3.4.121, p 52.

181. Document A20, p 165.

182. 'King Country: Report by the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Licensing (the Hon. Mr Justice Smith) on the History of the Proclamations of the King-Country and on the question of a Sacred or Solemn Pact, Pledge, or Treaty between the Government and the Maori Tribes', AJHR, 1946, H-38, appendix C, p 374.

183. 'King Country', AJHR, 1946, H-38, appendix C, p 374.

owners of the blocks on the northern section of the railway through the Native Land Court.<sup>184</sup>

In relation to the blocks south of Te Kūiti, the Government's awareness of the detail of the commitments made during the 1880s and its ongoing obligation to compensate Māori owners for lands outside of the gifting appears to have faded over time.

During 1903, the resident engineer at Ōngarue and the district engineer in Auckland corresponded on the matter of the gifting. In the exchange, Resident Engineer JD Louch referred to a recent conversation in which Wilkinson had told him that Māori had not been compensated for the lands taken for the railway south of Te Kūiti.<sup>185</sup> Louch advised that the matter of compensation be dealt with immediately. However, his concern appears to have been motivated less out of concern for the Māori owners left out of pocket than fear that costs to the Government of paying the outstanding compensation would rise the longer payment was delayed. Wilkinson had further informed Louch that Māori had agreed to gift one chain for the railway track, but that any additional land was to be paid for.<sup>186</sup> The district engineer then referred the matter to the under secretary for Public Works.<sup>187</sup>

The Public Works Department tasked an official, H Thompson, with inquiring into the issue of compensation on its behalf. He reported on 19 February 1903 that 'it appears that a width of one chain was given free, any excess to be paid for'. Thompson further noted that '[t]his concession was made by a chief named Wahanui, but we have no evidence as to how far south Wahanui's influence extended'.<sup>188</sup> A file note, dated 20 August 1903, indicated that Thompson was asked to identify which lands had already been compensated and whether applications to the court had been made for the remaining lands. It advised that for any lands that had not been compensated, 'application should be made to the Court as usual'.<sup>189</sup> However, a further file note by the same official, dated 26 May 1905, simply noted: 'It has since been decided not to refer matters to [the] Native Land Court'.<sup>190</sup>

The likely cause of the Government's apparent change in policy between 1903 and 1905 lies in advice the Public Works Department sought from Solicitor General Fred Fitchett in November 1903. That month, the department wrote to the Solicitor General to ask whether the Government was liable to compensate Māori for land acquired for railway construction.<sup>191</sup> A copy of this advice has not been located as part of the research for this inquiry. However, it appears that the Solicitor General's advice that the Government was not liable to pay compensation for lands acquired for the railway stemmed from the application of the 5 per cent

---

184. Document A20, p156.

185. Document A20, p157; doc A20(a), p215.

186. Document A20, p157; doc A20(a), p215.

187. Document A20, p157; doc A20(a), p216.

188. Document A20(a), p217.

189. Document A20(a), p217.

190. Document A20(a), p217.

191. Document A20, p158.

rule. As noted earlier in section 9.4.2.1, this rule permitted governments to take up to 5 per cent of a block for roads or railways without notice or compensation to Māori owners, within a 5 to 10 year period of the block being awarded title by the Native Land Court.<sup>192</sup>

From 1903, the Public Works Department consistently maintained it was not liable to compensate Māori for lands taken during the railway's construction. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori submitted two applications for compensation for railway takings in 1911 and 1923. We have no further information on these applications beyond the fact that the department stated in each case that it was not liable to pay compensation.<sup>193</sup> This suggests that the Public Works Department's policy remained unchanged into the 1920s.

We have no evidence that the Government subsequently sought to compensate Māori owners of land taken for construction of the railway through our inquiry district at any time in the twentieth century. As such, as far as we can tell, it remains unclear whether any of the owners of the blocks in the table ever received the compensation that was originally awarded to them.

9.4.5 Labour contracts

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the NIMTR's construction expecting that Māori would receive mutual benefits from the economic prosperity the railway would bring. These included benefits directly associated with the railway's construction, including the opportunity for local Māori to earn income from working on the railway. As noted in section 9.3.3, the awarding of contracts to Māori had been a feature of the agreements between rangatira and Crown representatives during the Te Ōhākī Tapu negotiations. Ballance had told rangatira at Kihikihi in 1885 that the Government would let a portion of the line in small contracts 'so that the Natives themselves may contract and make the line.'<sup>194</sup>

The policy of reserving construction contracts for local Māori originated prior to the Kihikihi hui. In December 1884, George Wilkinson recommended to the head of the Native Department that 'certain portions of the work' on the Pūniu section of the line be given to Māori. Māori were 'very good' at bush clearing and earthworks, he advised, and would 'be glad to take work of that sort, either by day labour, or in small contracts.'<sup>195</sup> This policy of letting contracts to Māori, Wilkinson wrote, would be 'well and politic' for the Government to pursue as it would 192. Document A20, p 158; doc A96(g), pp 8–9; submission 3.4.121, pp 109–110.

193. 'King Country', AJHR, 1946, H-38, appendix C, p 379.

194. 'Notes of a Meeting [at Kihikihi]', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24. Ballance made similar promises to Whanganui Māori at Rānana in January 1885, when he stated that 'my colleague, the Minister for Public Works, upon my recommendation, is desirous of affording the Native people an opportunity of taking small contracts on the railway; and it is proposed, therefore, that along the middle portion of the railway near Manganui-a-te-ao the survey be made, and small contracts given in such a way that the Native people may tender for them': 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon. Mr Ballance and the Whanganui Natives at Ranana on the 7th January 1885', AJHR, 1885, G1, p 4.

195. Document A20, p 99; doc A20(a), pp 53–54.

provide Māori with cash income and deter them from 'taking money advances' for their land, while making the 'formation of the line popular with them.'<sup>196</sup>

At the turning of the sod ceremony in April 1885, Premier Stout affirmed the Government's intention to set aside a portion of the line to be constructed by Māori labour:

Here, on this section, we intend to ask the Maoris to make it, and they will get the same money for doing it that Europeans get. . . . When this section is made it will be known as the Maori section, and I hope it will be better than that which the Europeans make.<sup>197</sup>

Public Works Department reports from the early stages of the railway's construction confirm that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori received contracts to work on both the Pūniu and Te Kūiti sections of the line. The department's annual report for 1885 noted that a six-mile length of the northern section of the line south of the Pūniu River had been reserved 'to be performed by the Maori population resident in the district' and that the 'whole of this work has been taken up in small contracts' and was 'well in hand.'<sup>198</sup> At the same time, 50 Māori workers were working on a contract to build a bridge and support road over the Pūniu River. The report further noted that 'the Natives are pressing the department to let them have contracts for further works' and the Minister hoped to 'comply with their wishes.'<sup>199</sup>

By March 1886, £9,519 8s 4d had been paid out from the NIMTR loan on 'Native and petty contracts', with £2,080 15s still to be paid.<sup>200</sup> The department's annual report for that year stated that 'in cases where contracts have been let to Natives, they have done a great deal of work very satisfactorily and at moderate prices; and, whenever they have demanded excessive prices, the contracts have been advertised and let by public tender.'<sup>201</sup> During 1887, it was reported that 120 Māori were contracted on earthworks for the Te Kūiti section of the line, while other Māori were employed in building service roads for the railway.<sup>202</sup> By March 1887, a bridge over the Pūniu River and a road from the Pūniu south to Kawa Station were complete, with the Public Works Department reporting that the 'earthwork and fencing on these roads were done by Natives.'<sup>203</sup>

Despite favourable reports on the work of Māori contractors constructing the Pūniu and Te Kūiti sections of the line, Edward Richardson, Minister for Public Works from September 1884 to October 1887, was forced to defend his policy of 196. Document A20, p 99; doc A20(a), pp 53–54.

197. 'North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4.

198. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1885, D-1, p 4.

199. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1885, D-1, p 4.

200. Document A20, p 99.

201. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1886, D-1, p 4.

202. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1887, D-1, pp 33–34.

203. 'Public Works Statement', AJHR, 1887, D-1, p 34.

reserving certain works for Māori in Parliament.<sup>204</sup> Questioned in the House on whether the sections of the railway being built by Māori had first been offered to Europeans by public tender, Richardson responded:

Six miles of earthworks on this railway were reserved for competition amongst the Maoris only; and it would be satisfactory to the House to know that the price for which this work had been let to the Maoris was a very fair one compared with the price paid to Europeans, and that the work was being carried on so far in a very satisfactory manner.<sup>205</sup>

The following year, in June 1886, opposition MPs proposed a motion that contracts on the line be opened to Europeans as well as Māori.<sup>206</sup> In reply, Richardson stated that ‘a certain number of small piecework contracts’ had been let to Māori within the King Country as ‘a matter of policy’.<sup>207</sup> His rationale for this policy was a pragmatic one: if Māori were offered contracts on the line, they were less likely to oppose the railway and the Government’s efforts to acquire land for it:

The Government thought it was of extreme importance to get these men at work, as they were in most cases interested in the land, and it tended to do away with any opposition which might be raised to the works being carried out by Europeans. . . . The letting of these works was a matter of policy, as it facilitated the carrying of the line through what was called the King Country, and it induced the Maoris not to throw obstacles in the way of the acquisition of the land required.<sup>208</sup>

He made no mention of his colleague Ballance’s promises to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori regarding work contracts at Kihikihi just a year earlier.

In October 1887, a new Minister of Public Works, Edwin Mitchelson, replaced Richardson following the Stout–Vogel Government’s defeat in the 1887 general election.<sup>209</sup> With the change in Minister, the Government’s policy of specifically reserving contracts for Māori on the railway seems to have come to an end.<sup>210</sup>

The lack of an official policy to contract Māori labour from the late 1880s did not mean that Māori were no longer employed in constructing the line after this time. Official reports from the 1890s suggest that some of the Māori workers previously employed on the NIMTR had gained new employment constructing connecting roads. For instance, Wilkinson reported in June 1890 that entire Māori

204. Richardson was also briefly Minister of Public Works between 16 and 28 August 1884: Noonan, By Design, appendix VIII.

205. ‘North Island Main Trunk Railway’, 1 September 1885, NZPD, vol 53, p 405.

206. ‘Contracts for Works out of Loan’, 9 June 1886, NZPD, vol 54, pp 354–355.

207. ‘Contracts for Works out of Loan’, 9 June 1886, NZPD, vol 54, p 354.

208. ‘Contracts for Works out of Loan’, 9 June 1886, NZPD, vol 54, pp 354–355.

209. Mitchelson was also his predecessor as Public Works Minister between November 1883 and August 1884: Noonan, By Design, appendix VIII.

210. Document A20, p 101.

whānau had been employed on building a road from the Waitomo Caves to the Hangatiki Station.

The formation was let by contract in small sections to different parties of natives, who, from the experience they gained whilst working on the railway-line during its formation in this district, are now very good road-makers. The aptitude and liking they have for this kind of work is almost surprising. . . . They take their contract sections at a lump sum previously fixed by the engineer in charge of works, and then go and camp alongside of their work with their wives and families, the women doing the cooking, washing, and getting firewood, whilst the men work early and late at their contract. Road-formation, or “mahī-rori” as the Natives call it, is a kind of labour that they prefer to all others.<sup>211</sup>

The shift in government policy away from specifically reserving construction contracts for Māori coincided with the introduction of a new system for organising labour on large public works projects. Introduced by Richard Seddon, Minister for Public Works from January 1891 to March 1896, the ‘cooperative system’ was designed to cut out private contractors from government construction projects.<sup>212</sup> Instead, Public Works Department engineers would oversee the completion of public works projects by work gangs employed directly by the department. The new system eliminated many of the ‘petty contracts’ that Māori had previously tendered for. No evidence was received in this inquiry on how many Māori may have gained employment working on the new construction gangs under the Department of Public Works. However, historian Neill Atkinson described the new cooperative system as ‘a limited form of unemployment relief’ designed to relieve the many European settlers struggling from the effects of the long economic recession.<sup>213</sup> Likewise, historian Peter Gibbons’s research suggested that the work gangs were mostly made up of recent immigrants and unemployed European settlers.<sup>214</sup>

Given that the cooperative system seems to have been, at least in part, targeted at resolving the issue of unemployment among European settlers and recent immigrants, it seems reasonable to conclude that fewer Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were employed in the construction of the southern sections of the NIMTR through the inquiry district than had been employed further north.

9.4.6 Resource use and payment

The vast quantities of natural resources such as timber and stone required for railway construction presented a further opportunity for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to benefit from the railway’s construction through their lands.<sup>215</sup>

---

211. GT Wilkinson, ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts’, AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 3.

212. Document A20, p 101.

213. Atkinson, Trainland, pp 51–52.

214. Document A20, pp 101–102.

215. Specific claims encapsulated by this section include Wai 1455, Wai 1447, and Wai 1327.

As discussed in section 9.3.3, the Government's requirement for natural resources for use in railway construction had been the subject of specific agreements by Ballance at the Kihikihi hui of February 1885. In response to concerns raised by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at the hui that they be paid for any trees felled during the railway's construction, including for sleepers, Ballance reassured those present that they would be compensated for any bush damaged, as well as the value of timber cut down.<sup>216</sup> Use of stone for ballast and other railway construction purposes was not specifically mentioned during the 1880s negotiations. However, the Tribunal notes that the Crown has a clear Treaty duty to compensate Māori landowners fully for losses stemming from public works takings, and this extends to the exploitation of natural resources on Māori land.

Railway construction used vast quantities of timber. Atkinson described the early Railways and Public Works Departments as 'voracious consumers' of timber resources. Wood was used for sleepers, stations, sheds and workshops, housing, signal and telegraph poles, and firewood.<sup>217</sup> By 1885, Wilkinson reported that a considerable quantity of timber was being used by railway contractors.<sup>218</sup> This timber was sourced both locally and from outside of the inquiry district. The first timber mill in the inquiry district had been established in 1886 between Ōtorohanga and Hangatiki by Messrs Graham, Dunneen, and Mainwaring. Shortly afterwards, it was purchased by JW Ellis, an English immigrant and Kāwhia storeowner.<sup>219</sup> Around this time, the company purchased cutting rights over 1,100 acres of kahikatea forest near Ōtorohanga. Ellis and Burnand Ltd, the company Ellis formed with his later business partner, JH Burnand, would go on to become one of the largest timber companies in the country.<sup>220</sup>

Initially, most of the wood used for railway sleepers in the construction of the NIMTR was sourced from outside the inquiry district and in many cases outside the country.<sup>221</sup> During the first few decades of railway construction in New Zealand, it was standard practice to import foreign hardwood timbers, such as Australian jarrah, from overseas for use as railway sleepers.<sup>222</sup> Following experiments with local timbers, such as tōtara, pūriri and kauri, the use of native timbers for sleepers appears to have increased from the 1890s.<sup>223</sup> However, it was not until 1898 that sleepers were first taken from within the inquiry district on any significant scale.<sup>224</sup>

216. 'Notes of a Meeting [at Kihikihi]', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 22–23.

217. Atkinson, Trainland, pp 64–65.

218. Document A20, p 103.

219. 'Obituary. Mr JW Ellis', New Zealand Herald, 7 August 1918, p 6.

220. Michael Roche, History of New Zealand Forestry, (Wellington: New Zealand Forestry Corporation Limited in association with GP Books, 1990), p 116.

221. Document A20, p 103.

222. 'Importation of Sleepers and Foreign Timbers (correspondence with Railway Commissioners relating to the)', AJHR, 1891, D-16, pp 1–2.

223. 'Importation of Sleepers and Foreign Timbers', AJHR, 1891, D-16, pp 1–2.

224. Document A20, p 108.

Stone was used in railway construction primarily for ballast, the gravel packed under the railway lines and around the sleepers. Despite Ballance's assurances to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that the Government would take only the land required for the railway track and stations, several of the initial land takings for the NIMTR through the inquiry district were for gravel pits. For instance, the takings from the Ouruwhero and Otorohanga blocks both included land for gravel pits.<sup>225</sup> Unlike the wood used for sleepers, most of the ballast used for the construction of the railway in the inquiry district appears to have been derived from local sources within the district.<sup>226</sup>

The Kawhia Native Committee played a prominent role in negotiating the purchase of timber and stone resources from Māori landowners during the early phases of railway construction from the mid-1880s. Between October and December 1885, for instance, Wilkinson reported that the committee's work had included fixing prices for different grades of timber, and that a considerable quantity of timber was being used by railway and other contractors.<sup>227</sup> In November 1885, the Waikato Times reported that the railway contractors were paying Māori royalties of one shilling per cubic yard to take gravel from the Pūniu River (a charge the Times regarded as exorbitant).<sup>228</sup> In March 1886, John Ormsby wrote to contractor JJO'Brien advising him of the charges for timber outside the railway line required for the railway. The prices were for whole trees: £3 for tōtara, and £1 10s for certain other timbers, including matai, rimu, and kahikatea.<sup>229</sup> Ormsby advised O'Brien that the committee had appointed Te Hurinui of Waimiha to assess the timber taken and collect the royalties for the Māori owners.<sup>230</sup>

In March 1888, Ormsby reached agreement with J and A Anderson, who held the contract for the Waiteti section of the line, over the extraction of gravel from the Mangaokewa River.<sup>231</sup> Ormsby wrote to the contract manager, on behalf of the owners, advising their agreement to the payment of a royalty of twopence per cubic yard for the taking of 15,000 to 18,000 cubic yards of gravel. It is not clear whether Ormsby was acting on behalf of the Kawhia Native Committee in doing so.<sup>232</sup>

---

225. Document A96, pp 6–7; doc A20, p 151. Note that the boundary of the Te Kumi block appears to have been adjusted to exclude a gravel pit that was no longer in use: doc A96, pp 8–9.

226. Document A20, p 103.

227. Wilkinson 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1886, G-1, p 4.

228. Document A20, p 104.

229. Document A20, p 105; doc A20(a), p 428.

230. Document A20, p 105; doc A20(a), p 428.

231. Document A20, p 107.

232. Document A20, p 107; doc A20(a), p 249. The copy of Ormsby's letter in Cleaver and Sarich's document bank is unclear, but it appears to end with Ormsby's name, possibly followed by the letters 'CKNC'. This could be a summarised form of 'Chairman Kawhia Native Committee', but we cannot be certain. Given that the committee met for the final time in early 1887, it is not clear on what authority Ormsby would have been acting at this time. There is evidence showing that Ormsby continued to sign his name as chairman of the committee until 1889 in other contexts: doc A71 (Robinson and Christoffel), p 108.

As well as setting prices, Ormsby also, at times, acted as arbiter in disputes between contractors and local Māori. This was seen in 1887, after contractor Isaac Coates reached an agreement with a Māori woman for the extraction of sand, gravel, and ballast from a site on the Waipā River. Coates and the Waikato Times gave two different accounts of the woman's identity and how much she was paid, with Coates claiming he paid £40 to a woman named Parehaka and the Times stating that the woman, Ngaonewhero, received £15 for the gravel.<sup>233</sup> After other Māori arrived at the site and demanded that work be stopped, as the woman paid for the gravel had no rights in the land, Ormsby intervened. Ormsby and other Māori leaders including Wahanui and Taonui, later met with Coates, Wilkinson, and a police constable to resolve the dispute, eventually agreeing that the contractor had dealt with the wrong individual and setting a price of threepence per cubic yard to be paid to the land's rightful owners.<sup>234</sup>

In other cases, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori resorted to more direct methods of enforcing payment for their resources. While constructing a service road to access the Poro-o-tarao tunnel over the summer of 1885–86, Māori were reported to have tied up the boat of the contractor O'Brien, refusing to untie it until he paid for firewood used by his contractors.<sup>235</sup>

As railway construction progressed in the southern part of the inquiry district from the late nineteenth century, European sawmillers sought to negotiate purchasing rights from the Māori owners of blocks near the railway. In 1898, for instance, Ellis and Burnand reached agreement with the Māori owners of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 36 (Te Tiroa) block to purchase cutting rights over forest in the Mangapehi region.<sup>236</sup> By August 1900, Wilkinson reported that Europeans were negotiating with Māori to purchase tōtara in parts of the Rangitoto–Tuhua block.<sup>237</sup>

Public Works Department reports from the late 1890s and early 1900s confirm that some Māori received contracts to supply sleepers for railway sections south of Mokau Station. Between July 1898 and December 1902, for instance, individual Māori received contracts to supply sleepers and provided some 4,875 for use on the Poro-o-tarao and Ōngarue sections of the line.<sup>238</sup> However, the small number of contracts awarded to Māori was insignificant in comparison to the share of large European-owned sawmilling companies in the timber trade. For instance, between 1900 and 1904, Ellis and Burnand alone supplied 38,000 sleepers for the Mangapehi and Ōngarue sections of the line.<sup>239</sup>

By contrast, only one Māori-owned sawmill is known to have been established along the railway in the inquiry district. The Auckland Weekly News reported in 1900 that Māori at Ōngarue had recently established a steam sawmill near

---

233. Document A20, p 106 n

234. Document A20, p 106.

235. Fletcher, Single Track, p 136.

236. Document A20, p 197.

237. Document A20, p 197.

238. Document A20, p 108.

239. Document A20, pp 108–109.

Ōngarue Station. However, this venture proved short-lived. Several years later, the mill had been leased and then sold to European mill operators.<sup>240</sup> While the reasons behind the Ōngarue mill's sale are unknown, Cleaver and Sarich noted, the significant capital and financial risk involved in establishing a sawmill are a likely explanation for the lack of Māori-owned sawmills.<sup>241</sup>

While few Māori owned sawmills, some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori profited from sleeper contracts through the royalty payments for timber cut from their land. The figures of the payments Māori received for such royalties are unknown, but in Cleaver and Sarich's assessment 'they may not have been insignificant'.<sup>242</sup> The last known supply of sleepers from within the inquiry district was in 1904.<sup>243</sup> By this time, the line had been completed within the boundary of the inquiry district, and it appears that timber for the construction of the final section of the NIMTR was sourced from forests further south.<sup>244</sup>

In relation to stone resources, the practice of individually negotiating contracts for taking stone from Māori owners appears to have come to an end with the introduction of the cooperative system. Whereas Ormsby had been able to negotiate royalty payments directly with the private contractors who held the contract for each section, after taking direct control of construction in the early 1890s, the Department of Public Works appears to have opted to take land for quarries outright rather than face the ongoing expense of royalty payments to Māori owners.<sup>245</sup> This was the case in relation to the 1895 taking of 24 acres from the Pukenui 2 and Te Kuiti blocks for the Mangaokewa gravel pit.

The Mangaokewa River and associated takings, which took place under successive public works takings from 1895 to 1912 are discussed at greater length in the Public Works chapter, which will be released in a future part of this report. As mentioned before, during 1888, Ormsby negotiated a payment of twopence per cubic yard for the taking of approximately 15,000 to 18,000 cubic yards of gravel from the Mangaokewa River as ballast for the Waiteti section of the railway.<sup>246</sup> The following year, the resident engineer reported that 'good quality' shingle was being extracted from the Mangaokewa River. He went on to recommend that the Public Works Department take 'immediate steps' to 'obtain the right to take ballast from this place' as the next ballast reserve was 100 miles north at Te Awamutu.<sup>247</sup>

In 1895, the Government compulsorily acquired around 24 acres from the Te Kuiti and Pukenui 2 blocks for the Mangaokewa gravel pit.<sup>248</sup> As noted previously in section 9.4.4, the Māori landowners subsequently agreed to a land exchange with other interests that the Crown had acquired in the two blocks. The Tribunal

---

240. Document A20, pp 109, 199.

241. Document A20, p 199.

242. Document A20, p 109.

243. Document A20, p 109.

244. Document A20, p 109.

245. Document A20, p 111.

246. Document A20, p 107.

247. Document A20(a), pp 196–197.

248. Document A20, p 150.

received no evidence that the Government consulted with the Māori owners prior to acquiring their land under public works legislation. It also notes that the provisions for railway takings of this time did not require taking authorities to either notify or consult with owners prior to taking their land.

In some cases, the Government appears to have extracted resources for railway construction from Māori land without any attempt whatsoever to compensate the Māori owners. In October 1901 Ormsby led a deputation to the Minister of Railways, Sir Joseph Ward, in Wellington to draw the Minister's attention to a range of railway-related matters, including the non-payment of royalties for stone sourced from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land at two sites: Waimiha and Maramataha. Ormsby informed the Minister that Māori had previously received threepence per cubic yard for material taken for railway ballast. However, the Public Works Department, upon inquiring into the deputation's claims, could find no evidence of such royalties ever being paid to Māori, either by private contractors or the department.<sup>249</sup>

The Public Works Department acquired the two sites under the Public Works Act in 1903.<sup>250</sup> The following year, the department and the Māori landowners, represented by a member of the Māori land council, settled on a price of £50 for the two quarries, including 'any royalties due to date'.<sup>251</sup> By this time, both quarries had been well worked, with 'all of the pumice sand' in the Waimiha quarry having been used, while some rock remained in the Maramataha quarry.<sup>252</sup> The award was confirmed by the court in 1904.<sup>253</sup>

While the Government eventually compensated the owners of these two quarries for their losses, there is no evidence that the 1901 deputation and the complaints of Māori owners led the Crown to review its various policies over years on payment for gravel extracted from Māori land.

9.4.7 Damage to the environment and wāhi tapu

The construction of the NIMTR permanently transformed the landscape of the inquiry district. As construction of the line progressed southwards, surrounding lands were significantly modified. Forest cover was cut, streams diverted, and cuttings carved into hillsides. As outlined in claimant evidence in this section, the railway's construction directly impacted sites of significance to Māori, including urupā.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had raised concerns over the potential environmental impacts of the railway before construction began. In March 1884, Tanu, who lived at Te Kumi, wrote to Wilkinson with concerns regarding bush at Maungawhero, Mangipo, and Poporo, which he feared could be destroyed by fire if the railway ran

---

249. Document A20, p 110.

250. Document A20, p 110.

251. Document A20, p 110; doc A20(a), p 82.

252. Document A20, p 110; doc A20(a), pp 81–99.

253. Document A20, p 110, doc A20(a), pp 81–99.

through the land.<sup>254</sup> Asked for comment, Native Minister Bryce responded that the railway's route had not yet been settled.<sup>255</sup>

The environmental risk posed by the railway was raised again by Māori in February 1885 at Kihikihi. At that hui, Hopa Te Rangianini expressed concern at the railway's potential impact on waterways and forests, vital sources of tuna and berries for Māori. According to the official record of the meeting, Te Rangianini stated that

He owned a swamp, over which the railway would pass, and he obtained eels, which were his principal food in summer. He said he had heard that in England railways were taken over viaducts, and he asked that this might be done in this case, instead of filling up the swamp.<sup>256</sup>

Ballance responded by stating that the Government would build bridges and culverts, that 'watercourses should not be interfered with' and that '[n]o injury whatever will be done to Native land.'<sup>257</sup> Aporo Taratutu also raised the potential environmental impact of the railway at the Kihikihi hui, where he asked that forest areas be preserved from destruction. He mentioned the area of forest between Mangawhare and Te Kumi, which he valued as a source of kahikatea berries.<sup>258</sup>

Similarly, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also appear to have raised concerns at the damage to urupā or wāhi tapu that could result from railway construction. In an undated letter, probably written around the start of construction, the Public Works Department advised King Tāwhiao, Rewi Maniapoto, Te Ngakau, Wahanui, Taonui, and Hopa Te Rangianini that it would contact them immediately if human remains or ornaments were found during construction.<sup>259</sup> In Cleaver and Sarich's view, this letter, which appears to be responding to an earlier item of correspondence, was likely prompted by a request from rangatira.<sup>260</sup>

The Public Works Department's plans setting out the initial takings for the railway's construction show that the line cut through multiple areas of wetland and significant tracts of forest. South of the Pūniu River, on the Ouruwhero and adjoining Puketarata blocks, the line runs through Te Kawa Swamp, then the inquiry district's most extensive wetland and a significant source of tuna for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.<sup>261</sup> The railway's construction through the swamp in 1886 involved major earthworks, including building a three-quarter mile embankment and the shifting of 125,000 cubic yards (near to 96,000 cubic metres) of spoil.<sup>262</sup>

254. Document A20, p 112.

255. Document A20, p 112.

256. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 23.

257. 'Notes of Native Meetings', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

258. Document A20, p 113.

259. Document A20, p 114.

260. Document A20, p 114.

261. Subject of a specific claim for Wai 846.

262. Dick Craig, Land of the Maniapoto (Te Kūiti, King Country Chronicle, 1951), p 50.

To the south of Te Kawa, the railway crosses the Mangaokewa River, which was diverted for the line's construction.<sup>263</sup> On the adjoining Otorohanga and Orahiri blocks, the railway crosses a significant area of swampland and bridges the Waipā River.<sup>264</sup> On the Pukeroa–Hangatiki block, the line runs near to the Mangapu and Mangarapa Rivers as well as through a number of tracts of kahikatea bush, fern, and scrub land.<sup>265</sup> On the Hauturu and Te Kumi blocks, the line passes through swamp and kahikatea and mānuka forest.<sup>266</sup> Its construction involved substantial environmental modifications to bridge the Mangaokewa River and Waiteti Gorge, the latter of which was heavily forested and contained a series of limestone cliffs, including burial caves.<sup>267</sup>

Towards the southern boundary of the inquiry district, on the large Rangitoto–Tuhua block, the railway line crosses and runs next to several major rivers, including the Mōkau and Mangapehi Rivers, the Ohinemoa and Waimiha Streams, and the Ōngarue River before it reaches Taumarunui.<sup>268</sup> In the course of its passage through the Rangitoto–Tuhua block, it also runs through significant areas of raupō swamp, mānuka scrub, and forest land.<sup>269</sup> As noted previously in this chapter, the construction of the southern sections of the track was likely to have involved a significant volume of earthworks due to the hilly nature of the country.

Cleaver and Sarich identified a few instances where officials proved willing to adapt their plans when local Māori raised concerns about potential environmental damage caused by railway construction. In October 1886, the Waikato Times reported that the course of the railway near Ōtorohanga had been altered to avoid damage to 'an extensive bush of kahikatea and rimu.'<sup>270</sup> To the north, government documents show that officials were aware of Te Kawa Swamp's significance to Māori as a source of tuna as early as January 1885. That month, government surveyor John Rochfort notified the Public Works Department of the potential for works to damage eel weirs in the swamp and suggested the weirs be relocated.<sup>271</sup> Later that month, Rochfort met with Wilkinson and local Māori, who agreed that additional drains would be built to protect the supply of tuna.<sup>272</sup> The culverts later placed in the railway embankment may have resulted from this discussion.<sup>273</sup>

However, with these few exceptions, the Government appears to have proceeded with the NIMTR's construction with little consideration of the line's impact 263. Document A140(a)(i), plans 1D–1L.

264. Document A140(a)(i), plan 1O.

265. Document A140(a)(i), plans 3D–3F.

266. Document A140(a)(i), plans 3G–3J.

267. Document A140(a)(i), plans 3K–4C. We discuss the takings from the Mangaokewa River and Waiteti Gorge in relation to specific claims in our discussion of public works in a future chapter of this report.

268. Document A140(a)(i), plans 4F–8Z: see also Fletcher, Single Track, p 135.

269. Document A140(a)(i), plans 4F–8Z.

270. 'A Trip to Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 26 October 1886, p 3.

271. Document A20, p 112.

272. Document A20, p 112.

273. Document A20, p 113.

on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and their significant sites. One significant reason for this conclusion is that the protests of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not heard.

Harry Kereopa, a kaumātua of Te Ihingārangi hapū, gave extensive evidence on the impact of railway construction on wāhi tapu in the Waimiha Valley.<sup>274</sup> At Whenuatupu, an area once renowned for its whare wānanga known as Miringa Te Kākara, the Poro-o-tarao tunnel cuts directly through the Tihikārearea hill.<sup>275</sup> According to Mr Kereopa, his tūpuna ‘had been promised that [the railway] would go around Tihikārearea.’<sup>276</sup> Tihikārearea, a kāinga and wāhi tapu, is of great significance to Rereahu and Te Ihingārangi for its associations with the tūpuna Rereahu and Rangianewa, who had made a home there, and Haea, and Hineaupounamu, who had lived there as children.<sup>277</sup> It is named after the kārearea or native falcon, a great guardian hawk that is said to have lived on the maunga.<sup>278</sup> Tihikārearea was also home to 23 sacred healing trees. While most were used for rongōā to treat ailments such as tuberculosis, polio, and influenza, seven of them were used for embalming bodies.<sup>279</sup> The healing trees at Tihikārearea are believed to have been discovered by the ancestor Te Ihingārangi, who was said to be so tapu that everywhere he stepped also became tapu.<sup>280</sup>

Local hapū were only alerted to the Government’s plans to construct the railway directly through Tihikārearea when construction workers arrived to begin work on the tunnel, around 1886. According to Mr Kereopa, local Māori confronted the construction workers and told them they could not put the track through Whenuatupu:

[t]he people brought up Te Ohaki Tapu and the warning about waahi tapu but their cries and protests fell on deaf ears.<sup>281</sup>

Two tapu pou erected by tohunga across the railway’s path failed to prevent the tunnel’s construction.<sup>282</sup> The sacred grove of trees on Tihikārearea was felled before tohunga could remove the tapu from them.<sup>283</sup>

In the claimants’ view, the destruction of these trees not only caused many people to die from illnesses that traditional Māori medicine could have cured, but can be directly attributed to a wider loss of mana experienced by the tohunga of the Waimiha Valley, a region once renowned as a ‘sanctuary’ and ‘spiritual haven’

---

274. Transcript 4.1.11, appendix B, pp 374–375 (Rangi Harry Kereopa, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi Marae, 7 May 2013); doc H4 (Kereopa); doc L14(a) (Kereopa).

275. Subject of specific claims for Wai 762 and Wai 1309.

276. Document H4, p 8.

277. Document A110 (Douglas), p 322.

278. According to local kaumātua, the current name of this maunga, Tihikōreoreo, is incorrect. The correct name for the mountain is Tihikārearea, after the guardian hawk: doc A110, p 322.

279. Document H4, p 7.

280. Transcript 4.1.11, appendix B, p 360 (Rangi Harry Kereopa, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi Marae, 7 May 2013).

281. Document H4, p 8.

282. Document H4, p 8.

283. Document H4, p 8.

ideal for tohunga.<sup>284</sup> Local Māori also consider the woodchips from these trees, which were left at the bottom of the hill before being chopped up for railway sleepers, to be a cause of death and sickness in the area.<sup>285</sup> Today, the claimants attribute the large number of car accidents that have taken place in this area to the remaining tapu that could not be removed.<sup>286</sup>

In addition, the railway's construction was responsible for polluting a puna wai tapu at Potakataka in the Waimiha Valley.<sup>287</sup> As Mr Kereopa told us, at the time of the railway's construction, the tohunga of the valley were living at the puna, a sacred pool sourced from an underground stream valued for its purity and healing properties.<sup>288</sup> However, with the coming of the railway and farms to the district, the water became paru or muddied, forcing the tohunga to climb into the hills to access the pure water there.<sup>289</sup>

Railway construction also caused considerable damage to a number of pā and urupā. Immediately after entering the inquiry district, the railway cuts directly through the ancient pā of Haereawatea or Noho Awatea.<sup>290</sup> As Shane Te Ruki told us at a Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hearing, this pā was built by Ngāti Maniapoto chief Peehi Tūkōrehu and his siblings, Ngā Tapa and Mangatoatoa.<sup>291</sup> It was from his stronghold at Haereawatea that in the 1820s Tūkōrehu launched many military expeditions as well as repelling attacks from Ngāti Toa and Ngāti Raukawa.<sup>292</sup>

Further south, as discussed in section 9.4.3, the Te Kumi block owners withdrew their earlier request for compensation after learning that the railway takings in question included a former urupā.<sup>293</sup> Claimant Tom Roa spoke of the damage caused by the railway's construction in the Ōtorohanga area. This included 'the desecration of wāhi tapu' concerning 'an urupā on the northern boundary abutting on the Waikowhitiwhiti block' and the lair of the taniwha Waiwaia (later destroyed by the Otorohanga Flood Protection Scheme of the 1970s, which is discussed further in a later volume of this report).<sup>294</sup> Claimant Miria Te Kanawa-Tauriki explained that the construction of the railway through the Waikowhitiwhiti block divided Te Marae o Hine, a place of refuge and where violence was forbidden

284. Submission 3.4.170(a), p 236.

285. Document L14(c) (Kereopa).

286. Document H4, p 8.

287. Transcript 4.1.11, appendix B, p 359 (Rangi Harry Kereopa, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi Marae, 7 May 2013); doc H4, pp 6–8; doc L14 (Kereopa), p 16.

288. Document L14, pp 15–16; doc A110, p 323.

289. Document L14, pp 15–16; doc A110, p 323.

290. Document A110, p 344; doc A20, p 115; transcript 4.1.1, p 60 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010); subject of a specific claim for Wai 2014.

291. Transcript 4.1.1, p 60 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010); see also transcript 4.1.10, p 334 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku Campus, 9 April 2013).

292. Document A110, p 227.

293. Document A96, p 18.

294. Document O17 (Roa), p 2.

that is elaborated on in chapter 2, from a significant urupā.<sup>295</sup> Further, part of the railway line was laid on top of the urupā. These actions caused Ms Te Kanawa-Tauariki's tūpuna and whānau to relocate to Tarewaanga Marae. At Te Kūiti Pā, Te Tokanganui-ā-noho Marae has also suffered damage over the years from the construction of the railway so close to the marae, as vibrations and noise pollution have weakened the pās foundations, disrupted the way in which Ngāti Rōrā practise tikanga on the pae, and contributed to cracking in carvings.<sup>296</sup>

Between the Mōkau headwaters and Ōngarue, the railway crosses through the Waimiha Valley. Known as He Wahi Tohunga, the Waimiha Valley is the home of many sites of significance to Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū.<sup>297</sup> As we heard from claimants in this area, the construction of the NIMTR caused irreparable damage to many wāhi tapu. Mr Kereopa gave evidence that the railway cut through a Te Ihingārangi urupā near Waimiha, forcing his people to relocate their kōiwi to a new site.<sup>298</sup> Later, Te Ihingārangi were forced to move their kōiwi again, this time to make way for a road.<sup>299</sup>

Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Raerae claimants gave evidence of the displacement of tūpāpaku by the railway line.<sup>300</sup> Hoane Titari John Wi told of the destruction of Ngariha, a small pumice hill at Te Kawakawa, just outside the Ōngarue township.<sup>301</sup> The hill, which was the site of a marae and urupā, was cut in two by the construction of the NIMTR in 1901, forcing people to relocate their kōiwi to the Catholic churchyard.<sup>302</sup> To add to the grievances of local hapū, railway workers also removed pumice from Ngariha for ballast.<sup>303</sup> Decades later, the local hapū were again forced to move their tūpāpaku when the other part of the hill was demolished during the construction of the Ōngarue-Waimiha Road in the 1930s.<sup>304</sup> Other Ngāti Urunumia claimants described the forced relocation of Te Kōura Putaroa Marae to the opposite side of the Ōngarue River, which included the removal and reburial of their tūpāpaku.<sup>305</sup> Ngawai Tane spoke of the way that from that point, Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Pahere people had to travel to the 295. Document 06 (Tauariki), p 4; subject of a specific claim for Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, and Wai 2335.

296. Document 845 (Turner-Nankivell), p 8; doc s18 (Jacobs), p 1; subject of specific claims for Wai 556, Wai 616, Wai 1377, and Wai 1820.

297. Document A110, p 322.

298. Document H4, pp 9–10.

299. Document H4, pp 9–10.

300. Submission 3.4.199, pp 54–55; transcript 4.1.11, appendix B, p 238 (Hoane Titari John Wi, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi Marae, 6 May 2013); transcript 4.1.15, pp 906–909 (Eliza Rata, hearing week 10, Maniaroa Marae, 3 March 2014); doc Q30 (Rata), pp 6–7; doc Q9 (Tane), pp 9–11; subject of specific claims for Wai 928 and Wai 1455.

301. Document L22 (Wi), p 9.

302. Document L22, p 9.

303. Transcript 4.1.11, appendix B, p 238 (Hoane Titari John Wi, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi Marae, 6 May 2013).

304. Document Q30(b) (Rata), pp 6–7.

305. Submission 3.4.199, p 55; doc Q9, pp 7–10; subject of specific claims for Wai 1255, Wai 1309, and Wai 1455.

marae by waka across the river. Years later, the construction of State Highway 4 through their land cut off the marae from the urupā.<sup>306</sup>

9.4.8 Fencing of the NIMTR

The understanding that the Government would fence both sides of the track through the inquiry district had been an explicit part of the railway agreements of 1885. In his telegram to Ballance of 27 February 1885 agreeing to the railway's construction, Ormsby advised that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consented to the railway on the conditions that the line 'be paid for and be one chain wide & fenced at once on both sides'.<sup>307</sup> When, the following day, Wilkinson informed Ballance that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had consented to the railway being built through their lands, he noted the condition that the line should be fenced on both sides 'as a protection for their cattle etc'.<sup>308</sup>

In terms of the northern sections of the line, the Crown kept to its agreement to fence both sides of the line as far south as Mokau Station. It appears that the Government planned to fence the track even before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had agreed to the railway's construction. For instance, on 25 February 1885, two days before Ormsby's telegram confirming Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consent to the railway, the head engineer of the Public Works Department informed the Minister of Public Works that he intended to fence both sides of the line.<sup>309</sup> Early contracts for the construction of the line also specified that the line be fenced.<sup>310</sup>

However, by the time construction resumed south of Mokau Station, around 1892, the Crown appears to have lost sight of its earlier commitment. Thus, the Mōkau section of the line (opened for traffic in 1896) and the Ohinemoa and Taumarunui sections (opened in 1901 and 1903, respectively) were not fenced until 1909, a year after the official opening of the NIMTR to traffic.<sup>311</sup> During this period, the Government fielded numerous complaints from both Māori and European settlers at the lack of fencing on the line. In April 1900, Taonui Kaha and 31 others wrote to Native Minister James Carroll to ask for the line to be fenced between Mokau Station and Poro-o-tarao.<sup>312</sup> They explained that Māori had been losing stock since the train started running, and that 'as we have but little stock the loss is a very serious one to us'.<sup>313</sup> In concluding their petition, they reminded the Government of Ballance's agreement to fence the line. They wrote:

When the railway line was being formed in our district commencing at the Puniu River an arrangement was made between Ngati Maniapoto and the Hon. Mr Ballance the Minister for Native Affairs at that time to the effect that both sides of the line

---

306. Document Q9, p 11.

307. Document A20, p 115; doc A20(a), pp 41–42.

308. Document A20, pp 115–116; doc A20(a), p 40.

309. Document A20, p 116.

310. Document A20, p 116.

311. Document A20, pp 117–122.

312. Document A20, p 117.

313. Document A20, p 117; doc A20(a), p 208.

running through the Rohe Potae of the Ngati Maniapoto and commencing at Puniu were to be entirely fenced.<sup>314</sup>

Asked to investigate, local Public Works officials confirmed that animals had been killed.<sup>315</sup> However, the Public Works Department took no immediate action, informing the petitioners that it would consider fencing the line ‘when further progress was made with extending the railway southwards’.<sup>316</sup>

The following year, in October 1901, Ormsby led a deputation to the Minister of Railways, Sir Joseph Ward, on a number of matters, including the fencing of the NIMTR.<sup>317</sup> Ormsby requested that the line be fenced as was the case with the Crown’s previous undertakings to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. However, upon being asked to look into Ormsby’s claim, the Public Works Department could not find documentation of any previous agreement to fence the line.<sup>318</sup> The head of the Public Works Department subsequently advised Ormsby that no written evidence of such an agreement existed and that he doubted whether previous governments would have committed to pay for fencing.<sup>319</sup> The Public Works Department’s stance remained unchanged in 1906, when it advised the head of the Railways Department that it could find no evidence of an agreement to fence the line in its records.<sup>320</sup>

Meanwhile, Māori with land adjoining the line continued to appeal to government officials and Ministers that the line be fenced. In September 1905, Wehi Te Ringitanga wrote to Wilkinson of heavy losses Māori at Mangapehi had suffered due to trains hitting stock: ‘I have been four years living at Mangapehi, and not a month has lapsed but month by month the train strikes some stock belonging to us Maoris.’<sup>321</sup> Edward Emery, a direct descendant of Wehi Te Ringitanga, gave evidence at the 2014 hearings in Taumarunui. Emery told us that his koroua, whose pig farm was the biggest in the rohe with numbers in the thousands, suffered numerous losses from stock being killed on the line, as well as from thieves operating along the line.<sup>322</sup>

An October 1905 letter, by Makere Te Uruweherua and 21 others, detailed stock losses between Taumarunui and Taringamotu Stations: ‘Fifteen horses have been killed, eight cows, and five pigs; these are what have actually been seen by us; the bulk of our live stock are found in the Ongarue river, and in the Whanganui river.’<sup>323</sup> The Railway Department responded that it had no obligation to fence

314. Document A20(a), p 208.

315. Document A20, p 117; doc A20(a), p 209.

316. Document A20, p 117.

317. Document A20, p 117.

318. Document A20, p 118.

319. Document A20, p 118.

320. Document A20, pp 118–119.

321. Document A20, pp 120–121; doc A20(a), p 226.

322. Transcript 4.1.17, pp 1483–1486 (Edward Emery, hearing week 11, Wharauoa Marae, 31 March 2014); subject of a specific claim for Wai 1704.

323. Document A20, p 121.

the line and that owners were responsible for keeping their animals off the line. On 28 February 1906, Native Minister Carroll advised the Acting Minister of Railways that Member of Parliament WT Jennings had met deputations of Māori at Mangapehi, Ōngarue, and Taringamotu, all of whom complained about stock losses suffered by both Māori and Europeans. One hapū claimed to have lost £260 worth of stock in a few years.<sup>324</sup>

Europeans settlers also complained at the lack of fencing. In a letter to the acting Minister of Railways, Alex Bell (senior) asked that the line be fenced between Taringamotu and Taumarunui. He outlined the losses suffered by his own family, and by local Māori, due to the killing of stock by the railway.<sup>325</sup> 'Last week two valuable bullocks were killed, a few weeks ago two horses were caught on the bridge and cut to pieces, over sixty animals have been killed or maimed within the last eighteen months.'<sup>326</sup> In September 1906, a petition in the name of MH Laird and others called for the line to be fenced because of the large number of animals being killed by trains. The petitioners identified themselves as 'settlers both European and Natives, residing between Puketutu and Taumarunui.'<sup>327</sup>

Instead of compensating owners for stock losses, the Railways Department threatened legal proceedings against individuals whose animals were found wandering on the line. For instance, Ngahiwi Te Wakatoroa, who had previously written to Ward to ask that a fence be erected between Mokau Station and Horangapai, received a letter from a Railways official notifying him that he would be sent a court summons due to cattle 'trespassing' on the line. It is unclear whether this summons was ever sent.<sup>328</sup> Two years later, proceedings to prosecute two Europeans for trespass of stock were withdrawn after Ormsby intervened, again reminding Native Minister James Carroll of the Government's earlier promise to fence the line. He explained his own interest in the case on the grounds that it was 'highly important to Ngati Maniapoto because, if it is upheld, and enforced, the Native owners of the land adjoining the railway would greatly suffer.'<sup>329</sup> The Railways Department later agreed to halt proceedings.<sup>330</sup>

The Railways Department began to push for the fencing of the line from 1904, but took no action, believing that the responsibility to fence the line lay with the Department of Public Works. It was not until 1907 that Cabinet finally approved funding of £9,020 out of the Department of Public Works budget for the erection of fences along the line between Mōkau Station and Taumarunui. The work, which was carried out by the Railways Department, was completed in 1909.<sup>331</sup> The Tribunal received no evidence that either department sought to compensate

---

324. Document A20, p 121.

325. Document A20, p 121.

326. Document A20, pp 121–122.

327. Document A20, p 122.

328. Document A20, p 119.

329. Document A20, p 119.

330. Document A20, p 119.

331. Document A20, p 122.

property owners for the significant stock losses which occurred during the period between 1903 and 1909 when the line was opened, but unfenced.

9.5 TREATY ANALYSIS AND FINDINGS

On 6 November 1908, 23 years after the 1885 ceremony to mark the turning of the first sod of the NIMTR through the inquiry district, Prime Minister Sir Joseph Ward drove the railway's last spike into the ground at the Manganuioteao Viaduct north of Ōhākune, mid-way between Auckland and Wellington. Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira had played a central role in the 1885 ceremony, but by the time of the 1908 last spike ceremony, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were conspicuously absent from the celebrations.<sup>332</sup>

Speaking at the railway's opening, the former Minister for Public Works, W Hall-Jones, praised the engineering feats overcome in the line's construction and its future contribution to 'developing a great extent of country'.<sup>333</sup> It was fitting, he went on, that the Prime Minister was present to drive the last spike, as it had been then-Premier Robert Stout who had 'turned the first sod' on the railway back in 1885.<sup>334</sup> Prime Minister Joseph Ward spoke in praise of the 'important part that the railway was destined to play in opening up the interior of the country', and expressed his thankfulness that 'the native troubles of years past' no longer formed 'a bar to the development of the island'.<sup>335</sup>

By 1908, the official narrative of the NIMTR's history had become a celebration of the district's European development and 'native troubles' overcome. Neither the gifting of Māori land for the railway, nor the agreements that underpinned Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consent to the NIMTR, gained any recognition in this account.

In our view, the conspicuous absence of Māori from the opening ceremony for the NIMTR symbolised the wider marginalisation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori within their ancestral lands over the decades of the railway's construction. It also reflected the slow process of forgetting, whereby the Government's awareness of its commitments to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori gradually faded from Crown consciousness. A further symbol of this erasure of the railway's Māori history lay in the issue of the line's naming. Wahanui's request that the line be named 'Turongo' had been agreed to by Stout at the April 1885 sod-turning ceremony. The Crown is, at the time of writing, yet to fulfil this promise.

As seen in section 9.3.3, following years of negotiations with the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed in 1885 to the construction of the railway through

---

332. Newspaper reports of the event make no mention of any Māori being present at the driving of the spike, nor at celebratory banquets held in Wellington and Auckland. Neither were any Māori names included in the lists of 'invited' guests on board the special trains which travelled from Wellington and Auckland to the opening ceremony at Manganuioteao: 'Linking the Cities', New Zealand Herald, 6 November 1908, p 5; 'Auckland to Wellington, Opening of the Main Trunk Line', Star, 6 November 1908, p 1; 'Opening at Last', Evening Post, 5 November 1908, p 8.

333. 'Wellington-Auckland Railway', Auckland Star, 6 November 1908, p 5.

334. 'Wellington-Auckland Railway', Auckland Star, 6 November 1908, p 5.

335. 'The Main Trunk', New Zealand Herald, 7 November 1908, p 8.

their territory. They did so based on Te Ōhākī Tapu, which in chapter 8 we found amounted to a demand on the part of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that the Crown should give practical effect to the Treaty.

In addition, over the period from 1885 to 1887 the Crown made a series of specific agreements concerning the railway's construction and operation. These included the understandings that section of the track within the inquiry district would be named Tūrongo, that the Government would take only the minimum area required for the railway's construction, that Māori landowners would be fully compensated for any lands they did not wish to gift for the railway, that the Government would reserve labour contracts for Māori to construct the railway, and that damage to the environment and taonga would be minimised. Further, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to the railway's construction on the condition that the line would be fully fenced on both sides.

Many of these agreements aligned with the Government's existing duties under the Treaty of Waitangi. These included the duty to notify and fully consult with Māori landowners prior to acquiring their land for public works projects, to limit public works acquisitions to essential public works only, to explore alternative options to permanent alienation wherever feasible, to avoid damage to significant Māori sites, and to compensate Māori landowners in a fair and timely manner for any land taken.

In the sections that follow, we analyse the extent to which the Crown abided by, or departed from, its agreements arising from the Te Ōhākī Tapu negotiations, as well as its wider Treaty obligations, in relation to the railway's initial construction through the inquiry district up until 1903, with some issues like compensation and fencing taking us through to 1909.

9.5.1 The legislative framework

After giving their consent to the railway's construction through the inquiry district, rangatira subsequently offered to gift certain lands required for the railway corridor and stations (discussed further in section 9.5.3). However, regardless of whether the land for the railway was gifted, the Crown would formally acquire title over the land using public works legislation.

The Government began the first formal steps to acquire land for the railway with the passage of the Railways Authorization Act 1884, a necessary step to authorise the taking of the land under the Public Works Act 1882. However, at Kihikihi the following February, Ballance made only passing mention of the Government's plans to use public works legislation to transfer the lands required for the railway into its ownership. Two years later, in 1887, when he agreed to the offer by rangatira to gift certain lands for the railway, Ballance made no reference to the legal mechanism by which the Crown intended to acquire title over the gifted lands.

We have seen no evidence to suggest that the Crown at any point acted unlawfully or contrary to its own legislation in acquiring lands for the initial construction of the NIMTR. However, the Government acting within its own laws does not take account of the fact that the Crown's legislative regime was itself in breach of the Treaty. As discussed in section 9.2.1, successive Tribunals have found fundamental aspects of nineteenth- and twentieth-century public works legislation to be in breach of the Treaty. These include the ability to compulsorily acquire land without the consent of Māori landowners, which cuts across the guarantee of te tino rangatiratanga over their lands, while the lack of provisions to notify or consult Māori landowners prior to taking their lands for public works contravened the principle of partnership.

As we have seen, even the minimal protections for Māori landowners faced with public works takings were absent from the legislative provisions for railway takings under public works legislation. These provided authorities with sweeping powers to enter, begin construction upon, and formally acquire land for railways without, at any stage, informing landowners.

The powers afforded to the Crown under the railway provisions of public works legislation ran directly contrary to Māori understandings of the Te Ōhāki Tapu negotiations which, as we saw in chapter 8, were founded on the declaration by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in 1883 that the Crown should give practical effect to the Treaty.

During the wide-ranging discussions culminating in Te Rohe Pōtae Māori giving their agreement to the railway's construction through their territory, little mention was made of the precise legal mechanisms by which the Government intended to transfer land for the railways into its ownership.

We do not have the evidence to determine the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira knew of the Government's intention to formally acquire land for the railway under public works legislation. It may be that tribal leaders assumed that the specific agreements they reached with the Crown concerning the railway's construction would override the minimum protections of the public works legislation. They also might have reasonably expected that their offer to gift part of the land for the railway would exempt such lands from acquisition under the Public Works Act. Public works notices of intention to take land were put in the Gazette and the Māori equivalent Kahiti, as well as on the notice board at local post offices. Therefore, rangatira would only know of the Government's intention to take land under public works legislation if they looked at any of these things.

What is clear is that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not presented with sufficient information on the full implications of the Crown's chosen legal mechanism for transferring lands for the railway into its ownership. They cannot be said to have given their full and informed consent to the application of public works legislation to their lands. This lack of Māori consent, as we will see, would grow increasingly significant over time as the Crown's awareness of its specific agreements concerning the railway began to fade.

Accordingly, we find that the Crown failed to gain Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consent to the application of public works legislation to transfer lands for the railway into its ownership. This was a breach of the principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.

9.5.2 Land takings for the initial construction of the NIMTR

The Crown's lack of effective authority over the area behind the aukati meant that it had little choice but to consult with Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira over the NIMTR's construction. After extended negotiations, tribal leaders agreed to a preliminary railway survey in March 1883, then gave their consent to the railway's construction in 1885. The broader conditions attached to that consent are set out fully in chapter 8.

However, in relation to the railway's construction, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to the building of the NIMTR through their territory based on Ballance's assurances – given at Kihikihi in February 1885 – that the land needed for the railway would be one chain in width (except for cuttings where two chains might be required), as well as five acres for stations and up to 10 acres for stations serving larger settlements.<sup>336</sup> Later the same year, Wahanui and Ormsby offered to gift certain lands for the railway, on the condition that the gifting not exceed one chain in width for the track and three acres for stations. The gifting was a highly symbolic statement of mana, though the demand of rangatira that any additional land taken was to be paid for can be seen as an acknowledgement that such takings might be necessary.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori gave their general consent to the NIMTR's construction through the territory at a time when detailed surveys of the railway's planned route were not available. It was clear that these high-level negotiations between the Crown and rangatira needed to be followed up by local consultation with hapū and iwi along the line, once more details of the lands required were known. This point is not in dispute between the parties in this inquiry, with the Crown acknowledging that it had made a commitment to discuss with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori what land it intended to take for the railway corridor and its operations.<sup>337</sup>

During the first phase of construction, from around 1886 to 1889, government representatives appear to have recognised this need for local consultation with Māori landowners on the ground. Throughout this period, direct negotiations between government representatives and Māori owners of the lands adjoining the Pūniu, Te Kūiti, and Waiteti sections of the railway also revealed the sharply differing stances of landowners towards the gifting itself. While some owners offered to gift more than the one chain maximum specified by Te Rohe Pōtae leadership, others informed officials they did not wish to abide by the gifting at all.

In the case of the Waiteti section (encompassing the Pukenui 2, Te Kuiti, and northern Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 blocks), for instance, Taonui's offer to gift one chain of railway was not taken up by the Crown. While compensation agreements for the Pukenui 2 and Te Kuiti blocks were subsequently confirmed between the Crown and Māori landowners, no such individual agreement was ever reached with the owners of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block. The Crown appears to have made no effort to settle upon compensation arrangements with the owners of any of the blocks south of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block.

Planning for the railway was underway before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had even consented to its construction through their territory, highlighting the Crown's lack of consultation with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Despite Ballance's assurances that one chain in width, or up to two chains for cuttings, would be required for the railway

---

336. Document A20, p71.

337. Submission 3.4.293, pp1–2.

corridor, two months after the Kihikihi hui the governor issued a proclamation authorising the Government to take an average of three chains in width for the central section of the NIMTR.

As seen in section 9.4.2.2, the eventual takings for the railway track through the inquiry district would average closer to 1.7 chains in width. Although this is more than the one-chain width Ballance had said would generally be required for the line in 1885 at the Kihikihi hui, it still falls within his description outlining that up to two chains might be needed for cuttings. Because we do not have evidence of the exact length of line that would have required cuttings of up to two chains, we cannot say whether the Crown then exceeded its agreement to keep to one chain for much of the track.

The Crown points out that, at the time of Ballance's 1885 statements, a detailed survey of the railway was not available and that the Government could not give exact figures on the 'actual amount of land that would be needed' as this was dependent on geography.<sup>338</sup> In relation to the geographical features of the inquiry district, the original Public Works Department plans show that the land taken for the track was especially wide in the southern part of the inquiry district.<sup>339</sup> This variation in the width of track taken is likely to be explained, at least in part, by the more difficult terrain in the southern regions of the inquiry district.

From the Waiteti section south, the railway enters rugged and hilly terrain, where more railway cuttings were required to keep the tracks within the necessary gradient and protect the line from slips. Additional takings are likely to have been required where the track ran adjacent to rivers, as it did both between Ōtorohanga and the Mangaokewa Gorge, and south of the Poro-o-tarao tunnel.<sup>340</sup> Though as mentioned before, we do not have sufficient evidence to say whether the land the Crown acquired for the railway's initial construction exceeded what could then have reasonably been expected for the railway's future operational needs.

However, in relation to stations, estimates are available for the area of 10 of the 16 known stations in the inquiry district. Of these, all but one exceeded the five acres that Ballance had told Māori would be needed for small stations. At least four exceeded the 10-acre minimum Ballance had specified for large stations.

We consider that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could expect that, if the Crown needed to depart from its original agreements concerning the railway's construction, it would come back and consult Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for their views. Such consultation was necessary at the level of the general agreements between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira concerning the railway's construction. It was also necessary at the local level with hapū and iwi concerning the particular land to be taken for the railway.

---

338. Submission 3.4.293, p 11.

339. Document A20(e), pp 1–2.

340. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 290–293 (Philip Cleaver, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-ā-noho Marae, 8 November 2012). For a map of the river system between Te Awamutu and Waimiha, see Fletcher, Single Track, p 135.

At the general level, the Crown failed to consult with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira before proclaiming that the Government could take an average of three chains in width for the central section of the NIMTR. This exceeded the one-chain width Ballance had told Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would likely be needed for the railway's construction, with the exception of two chains for cuttings. We consider that, in the circumstances, the Crown needed to consult further with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira before proclaiming the three-chain average, which went well beyond what it had originally agreed to at Kihikihi in 1885.

At the local level, the parties in this inquiry agreed that the Crown needed to consult with the hapū and iwi who owned the land proposed to be taken along the railway's route. In the case of the blocks between the Pūniu River and the southern boundary of the Pukenui 2 block, government representatives did carry out a handful of local negotiations with Māori owners. The route of the track was adjusted to take into account some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns over environmental damage (see section 9.4.7). However, it is clear that in most cases this did not happen. From the Mōkau section south to the boundary of the inquiry district, the Crown did not engage in such local hui with Māori landowners of the remaining blocks. As a result, we find that it is highly unlikely that the owners of the blocks south of Mokau Station were ever aware of the details of their lands to be taken for the railway until after construction had started. Thus, they had no opportunity to consent or object to the location of the takings.

We find that the April 1885 proclamation provided for more land to be taken than rangatira had agreed to, and the Crown did not consult them about this. In the event, the amount of land taken for the railway track was broadly within the one to two chain range Ballance had specified at the February 1885 Kihikihi hui. However, the Crown did take more land for at least four stations than rangatira had consented to. Accordingly, we find that the Crown breached the principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and failed to perform its duty of active protection.

9.5.3 Gifting of land

The question of why rangatira chose to gift the lands for the railway, and the broader significance of the gifting, has been the subject of some debate in this inquiry. The claimants argued that rangatira regarded the gifting of the railway as a tuku, which in tikanga terms carried a corresponding obligation for the Crown to reciprocate.<sup>341</sup> The customary nature of tuku and tuku whenua is discussed in chapter 2.

In the claimants' view the Crown, then and now, 'misunderstood the nature of the tuku of the land for the railway'.<sup>342</sup> In particular, it 'failed to understand that there were reciprocal obligations arising from the gift'.<sup>343</sup> They argued, further, that the original gifting by rangatira should be understood in terms of the 'traditional

---

341. Submission 3.4.121, p 13.

342. Submission 3.4.121, p 14.

343. Submission 3.4.121, p 14.

gifting’ practice of tuku and that the Crown obtained no legal title over the land as a result of the gifting.<sup>344</sup> This claim was dismissed by the Crown, which submitted that it ‘acquired the railway line legally’ and that the claimants’ contention that the railway was a tuku appears to be an afterthought and is not supported by the claimant evidence presented in the course of the inquiry.<sup>345</sup>

As with the practice of naming the railway after an esteemed ancestor, ‘Turongo’, the offer of rangatira to gift certain lands for the railway may be understood, first and foremost, as an expression of continuing Te Rohe Pōtae mana whakahaere over their tribal territories. Wahanui’s considerable mana was reflected in the subsequent agreement by many hapū and iwi along the line to abide by the original terms of the gifting, with a number of landowners choosing to gift more land than required.

This reciprocal nature of tuku is reflected in Wahanui’s statements before the Maori Affairs Committee in 1885, when he described the gifting of the railway as an expression of ‘my love to the undertaking’. However, at the same time, he underscored his expectation of reciprocity: ‘I want to know what return the Maoris are to get. We show our love to Europeans; what return will they make for our giving our land for the railway and the railway stations?’<sup>346</sup>

As with the early land purchases of the 1850s discussed in chapter 11, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were aware by the 1880s of the vast difference between the Crown’s view of land transactions and the customary practice of tuku whenua. We do not accept the claimants’ contention that the Crown did not gain legal title over land gifted for the railway although, as we will explore further in future chapters, we consider that the Crown has a residual duty to return such lands once they are no longer required for the purpose they were gifted.

However, we share the claimants’ view that the railway’s gifting may be regarded as a tuku, in its broadest sense. That is, it may be seen as a confirmation of their determination to create an ongoing relationship, from which both parties would receive mutual benefits.

9.5.4 Compensation

We now turn to the matter of compensation. Specifically, we consider whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were fairly compensated for lands taken for the NIMTR’s construction through the inquiry district. On this point, we acknowledge the Crown’s concession that it did not pay compensation to some Rangitoto–Tuhua owners for lands taken from them for the railway, and that this failure breached ‘the Treaty and its principles.’<sup>347</sup> However, as previously noted, this concession is of limited use as the Crown failed to specify which Rangitoto–Tuhua blocks it applied to.

As we saw in section 9.4.3, between 1886 and 1888, government representatives negotiated separate compensation settlements with the Māori owners of blocks

---

344. Submission 3.4.121, p 43.

345. Submission 3.4.293, p 42.

346. ‘Native Affairs Committee’, AJHR, 1885, 1-2B, p 8.

347. Submission 3.4.293, p 2.

along the northern sections of the line. In December 1890, the Native Land Court made formal orders of compensation concerning most of these agreements. Two further agreements – concerning lands taken from the Te Kuiti and Pukenui 2 blocks – were formalised by the court in 1899.

There is no significant dispute between the parties in this inquiry as to whether the compensation settlements awarded for the blocks were fair, at least in comparison to the prices that would be paid under the Crown's purchasing monopoly the following decade. However, around £37 of the approximately £120 the court ordered to be paid appears to have remained unpaid. Further, the Government reached no individual compensation settlements with the owners of any of the blocks south of the Pukenui 2 boundary (including the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 blocks and the remaining Rangitoto–Tuhua blocks affected by the initial takings for the railway).

In relation to the blocks for which compensation was awarded, officials justified their failure to pay on the basis that the small areas of land and multiple owners involved made it too difficult to determine the correct recipients. Yet, as we saw in chapter 8, in the 1880s Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had explicitly asked for powers to administer title over their own lands, without the interference of the Native Land Court. Had this been granted, and the Kawhia Native Committee empowered to settle land title on behalf of local hapū, there would have been no issue in awarding and distributing compensation to its rightful recipients. Consequently, in not empowering the Kawhia Native Committee and rangatira, the Crown itself assumed full responsibility for ensuring payment of compensation to the right people.

Further, as explored in chapter 11, the Government's denial of compensation to the owners of railway lands took place in a period when the Government was expending considerable resources in determining individual land interests, in pursuit of its programme of Crown purchasing. This shows that if the Crown had the opportunity, capability, and capacity to determine individual land interests, it certainly had the same means to pay compensation, but lacked the motivation to do so. Thus, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners were doubly disadvantaged: by the Crown's failure to empower their own institutions with powers to settle land title, and by its overwhelming push to purchase Māori lands to the exclusion of all other considerations.

The Crown's later decision not to compensate Te Rohe Pōtae Māori owners for railway lands taken in the southern portions of the inquiry district appears to have stemmed from a 1903 legal opinion from the Solicitor General's office that the Government was not liable for compensation due to the application of the 5 per cent rule. The 5 per cent rule applied both to Māori-owned land and to land blocks purchased by settlers. However, the Central North Island Tribunal found the rule to be discriminatory against Māori and in breach of article 3 of the Treaty and the principle of equity. This was because it applied to Māori land for a longer period than it did to other landowners (10 to 15 years as opposed to five) and because far more Māori land came under the 5 per cent provisions than did non-Māori land.<sup>348</sup>

When Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to gift part of the land for the railway, they did so on the understanding that the Government would fully compensate them for any lands acquired for the railway outside of this gifting. However, 30 years after the initial takings, few Māori owners whose lands were taken for the railway had received the compensation promised by the Crown. In the north of the inquiry district, Māori were denied compensation for their lands both by the Crown's failure to put in place institutions by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could administer their own lands, as well as by the Crown's overwhelming prioritisation of its land purchasing programme. In the railway's southern sections, the Crown made no effort whatsoever to compensate Māori owners for lands acquired from them for the railway, a consequence of its application of the 5 per cent rule.

Accordingly, we agree with the Central North Island Tribunal's finding that the 5 per cent rule was discriminatory against Māori and the principle of equity. We also find that in failing to pay compensation to Māori owners whose lands were taken for the railway, the Crown breached the principle of equity and failed to perform its duty of active protection.

9.5.5 Labour contracts

We found in chapter 8 that Te Ōhāki Tapu was founded on a declaration in 1883 that the Crown should have implemented Treaty rights to ensure that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were equally able to benefit from the advantages that the railway would bring to their district. Had the Crown acted in this manner, its actions would have neatly aligned with the Treaty principle of mutual benefit, which includes the right of Māori to new technologies. As the Radio Spectrum Management and Development Final Report of 1999 put it, 'Maori expected, and the Crown was obliged to ensure, that they and the colonists would gain mutual benefits from colonisation and contact with the rest of the world, including the benefits of new technologies.'<sup>349</sup>

As seen earlier in this chapter, at the Kihikihi hui of February 1885 Ballance agreed that Māori would be reserved labour contracts over certain portions of the line.<sup>350</sup> Ballance's commitment was affirmed by Stout at the turning of the sod ceremony several months later.<sup>351</sup>

We accept that the Crown had an obligation, arising from borht the Te Ōhāki Tapu negotiations and the Treaty, to ensure that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were equally

348. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 852–853.

349. Waitangi Tribunal, The Radio Spectrum Management and Development Final Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1999), p 52; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Fishing Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1988), pp 193–195; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, pp 4–5; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana, vol 1, p 23.

350. 'Notes of a Meeting [at Kihikihi]', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

351. 'The North Island Main Trunk Railway', AJHR, 1885, D-6, p 4.

able to access benefits the railway brought to the inquiry district, and that these included offering Māori employment on the railway.

However, we do not accept the argument of claimant counsel that the statements of Ballance and Stout in 1885 amounted to a general promise to employ wholly or predominantly Māori labour to construct the entire length of the line through the inquiry district, as it is clear from their context that they applied only to the Pūniu and Te Kūiti sections of the line.<sup>352</sup>

As we saw in section 9.4.6, the Government did fulfil its promise to award Te Rohe Pōtae Māori contracts to construct the Pūniu and Te Kūiti sections of the line. The early 1890s saw a wider shift in Crown policy from contracting construction of the line out to private contractors to the employment of Public Works Department work gangs directly supervised by the department.

While existing secondary studies of the railway workforce suggest that the public works schemes of the 1890s were primarily aimed at providing employment for unemployed settlers and new immigrants, we do not have enough district-specific evidence to say conclusively how many Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were employed on such schemes.

What we can say is that after 1887, no specific government policy was in place to ensure that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities were equally as able as European settlers and new immigrants to benefit from employment on the NIMTR's construction. In our view, this reflects the wider disregard with which the Crown treated the agreements it reached with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders during the 1880s railway negotiations in later stages of the railway's construction.

9.5.6 Resource use and payment

Ballance told Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in 1885 that the Government would require only land for track and railway stations. As Cleaver and Sarich noted, the Crown does not appear to have raised the prospect of land takings for other purposes, such as quarries, prior to gaining Te Rohe Pōtae consent to the railway's construction.<sup>353</sup> Despite this, the Crown's initial takings for the NIMTR through the inquiry district included several takings for gravel pits.

During the mid- to late -1880s, the Kawhia Native Committee and, at times, John Ormsby reached agreements with private contractors for the payment of royalties to Māori property owners for stone extracted from their land. From the 1890s, however, the Government's preference seems to have been to acquire land for gravel pits outright under the Public Works Act, rather than face the ongoing expense of royalties. This was seen in the 1895 taking from the Mangaokewa gravel pit. Despite a pre-existing arrangement with the Māori owners to extract gravel from the site, the Public Works Department opted to alienate permanently 24 acres for the gravel pit. We have no evidence that the Crown consulted with the Māori landowners before proceeding with a compulsory taking.

---

352. Submission 3.4.121, pp 10, 87–88.

353. Document A20, p 151.

The Crown has a Treaty obligation to exhaust all alternatives to permanent alienation before compulsorily acquiring Māori land. During the 1880s, the Kawhia Native Committee and Ormsby's negotiations with private contractors on behalf of Māori landowners make clear that Māori owners were willing to give their consent to resource extraction from their land, if they were paid royalties.

There is no reason that the Government could not have continued these arrangements once it assumed direct control of railway construction from the early 1890s. However, in the case of takings for gravel extraction, the government departments concerned appear to have opted for permanent alienation simply to avoid liability for ongoing royalty payments. In doing so, the Crown placed money and expediency before the rights of Māori owners to retain ownership of their tribal lands.

Accordingly, we find that the lack of consultation with Māori landowners about the local details of the land taken for quarries, including the possibility of royalty payments, was a breach of the principle of partnership and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.

9.5.7 Damage to the environment and wāhi tapu

It is not unexpected that some modification to the environment may have needed to occur during the construction of such a major public work as the NIMTR. However, as outlined in section 9.2.2, the Government had a Treaty duty to ensure that – in acquiring Māori land for a public work and during construction – damage to any sites of significance to Māori was avoided. Additionally, Ballance had assured Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at Kihikihi in February 1885 that the railway would not interfere with waterways and would do '[n]o injury whatever' to Māori land.

The Crown argued that the Government's ability to avoid damage to wāhi tapu is dependent on its 'knowledge' of a site's significance to Māori.<sup>354</sup> We find that the Crown could have only obtained such knowledge through early consultation with Māori landowners along the proposed railway. In a few cases in the northern part of the inquiry district, the Crown did undertake such consultation with positive remedial action and results. Otherwise, detailed local consultation, if it occurred at all, typically took place after construction had already been completed and the land formally acquired under public works legislation.

Accordingly, we find that the Crown failed to ensure that sites of significance to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were avoided. This was a breach of the principle of partnership and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.

9.5.8 Fencing of the NIMTR

A further specific agreement made by Ballance in 1885 concerned the fencing of the NIMTR. As seen in section 9.3.3, the understanding that the Government would fence the track through the inquiry district was an explicit part of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consent to the railway and has not been contested among the parties to this inquiry. The Crown acknowledges that the fencing of the line 'formed part of the agreement with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about the railway.<sup>355</sup> What is at issue is whether the Crown's delay in fencing the section of line between Mokau Station and Taumarunui was reasonable in the circumstances of the time.

---

354. Submission 3.4.293, p121.

As seen in section 9.4.8, despite mounting complaints from both Māori and settlers at stock losses resulting from animals wandering on the line, the Crown did not fence the line until 1909, six years after the line was officially opened for rail traffic within the inquiry district. On this matter, the Crown denied that its delays in fencing the line amount to a breach of Treaty principles. Instead, the Crown argued that its delay in fulfilling its 1885 commitment to fence the line was justified due to the Government's need to 'balance a number of practical considerations', including the light traffic on the line and the significant cost involved.<sup>356</sup>

In our view, however, the Crown's failure to fence the line was less due to 'practical considerations' such as cost, than the ongoing dispute between Public Works and Railways officials over who was responsible for fencing the line, and the denial of the government departments in question that such an agreement existed in the first place. The 1905 estimate of £8,989 for the fencing of the line between Mokau Station and Taumarunui, while not insignificant, is negligible in comparison to the overall sum of £2,500,000 the Crown was willing to invest in the NIMTR's construction.

Accordingly, we find that the Crown's delay in fencing the line demonstrated a lack of good faith and breached the principle of partnership.

9.5.9 Conclusion

Part of the Crown's failure to keep to the agreements it had made concerning the railway in the 1880s lay in the Government's own declining knowledge of the detail of what had been agreed to. This lack of awareness, even among senior government officials, of the details of the gifting or specific Crown agreements entered into during the 1880s negotiations concerning railway construction, can be seen as early as 1891. That year, then-head of the Native Affairs Department, T W Lewis, was said to have advised that the Public Works Department should not compensate King Country Māori for lands taken for the railway as 'the land was in the first place given by the Natives'.<sup>357</sup>

This diminishing knowledge of the Crown's prior commitments to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over the 1890s and 1900s is attributable, in part, to the deaths or declining influence of many of the key players in the 1880s negotiations. On the Crown side, John Ballance had died in 1893, while Stout's political influence waned from the early 1890s. Of Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira who had played a prominent part in the Te Ōhākī Tapu negotiations, Taonui Hikaka and Rewi Maniapoto died in 1892 and 1894, respectively. Wahanui passed away in 1897. Of those alive during the negotiations, only John Ormsby survived long enough to hold the Crown to its obligations into the twentieth century. However, descendants of those Te Rohe

---

355. Submission 3.4.293, p 28.

356. Submission 3.4.293, pp 29–30.

357. Lewis to Native Minister, 15 April 1891, AJHR, 1946, H-38, appendix C, p 374.

Pōtae Māori who were active during the period have continued to keep the issues that arose from the railway negotiations alive up to the present day.

As the awareness of officials of the Crown's earlier agreements to Te Rohe Pōtae concerning the railway began to fade, the Government increasingly fell back upon the provisions of Public Works Acts – legislation that was not only in breach of fundamental Treaty principles, but had been applied to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands without their full and informed consent.

Nevertheless, the Crown's knowledge of, and ability to abide by, its agreements to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerning the NIMTR's construction through their lands should not have been left to rely largely upon the recall of the individuals who had been personally involved in the negotiations. The information that would have been available to Crown officials, such as the parliamentary record and Native Land Court records, does not seem to have been enough to ensure that the Crown gave due regard to Māori interests, particularly after 1900.

The Crown failed to make crucial details of what was agreed concerning the railway from 1885 to 1887 available to the public, and failed to ensure that details of the Crown's agreements were transmitted to the government departments directly charged with carrying out the railway's construction and operation. This speaks to the lack of care and good faith in which the Crown entered into the railway negotiations in the 1880s. In our view, the Crown's subsequent amnesia concerning its agreements further compounds the breaches of partnership and its accompanying duty of good faith identified in chapter 8.

9.6 PREJUDICE

We find that the Crown's breaches in respect of the railway's construction prejudiced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the following ways.

While Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consented to the railway's construction through their territory, they were not adequately consulted about subsequent changes to public works legislation concerning land takings for the railway. This included the Crown's lack of consultation on the April 1885 proclamation of an average of three chains for the railway corridor. In addition, the Crown failed to consult Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerning the local details of lands to be acquired for the railway. This resulted in the destruction of, or irreparable damage to, taonga and wāhi tapu.

Although the area of land lost for railway construction was not substantial, the land taken for at least four of the railway stations in the district exceeded the maximum acreage indicated by Ballance at the Kihikihi hui in 1885. Consequently, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered some land loss for railway construction beyond that which they consented to be taken.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also suffered financial prejudice as a result of the Crown's Treaty breaches. The Crown's failure to pay compensation due to Māori landowners affected by land takings for the railway deprived the owners concerned of income at a key moment in the region's economic development. Meanwhile, the apparent shift in government policy away from negotiating royalty payments for use of stone resources on Māori land towards a preference for compulsorily acquiring such lands under public works legislation likewise denied Māori a source of income. Finally, Māori landowners living along the stretches of railway also suffered loss of income from stock losses stemming from the Government's delay in fulfilling its promise to fence the line until six years after it had officially opened.

We note that the ongoing prejudice arising from the Crown's breaches in respect of the railway will be considered in future chapters of this report.

9.7 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Our key findings in this chapter have been:

- that the Crown failed to gain Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consent to the application of public works legislation to transfer lands for the railway into its ownership. This was a breach of the principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.
- that the April 1885 proclamation provided for more land to be taken than rangatira had agreed to, and the Crown did not consult them about this. In the event, the amount of land taken for the railway track was broadly within the one to two chain range Ballance had specified at the February 1885 Kihikihi hui. However, the Crown did take more land for at least four stations than Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira had consented to. These actions amounted to a breach of the principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.
- that the gifting of the railway land can be regarded as a tuku in its broadest sense and as such was a confirmation by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of their determination to create an ongoing relationship from which both parties would receive mutual benefits.
- that we agreed with the Central North Island Tribunal's finding that the 5 per cent rule was discriminatory against Māori and the principle of equity. We also found that in failing to pay compensation to Māori owners whose lands were taken for the railway, the Crown breached the principle of equity and failed to perform its duty of active protection.
- that the lack of consultation with Māori landowners about the local details of the land taken for quarries, including the possibility of royalty payments, was a breach of the principle of partnership and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.
- that the Crown failed to ensure that sites of significance to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were avoided. This was a breach of the principle of partnership and a failure of the Crown's duty of active protection.
- that the Crown's delay in fencing the line demonstrated a lack of good faith and breached the principle of partnership.
- that, in general, the Crown's later neglect in adhering to several of the specific agreements it made concerning the railway's construction, and its failure to communicate the details of these agreements to the government departments involved, is indicative of the Crown's wider disregard for the agreements reached with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders in the railway negotiations of the 1880s.

CHAPTER 9 APPENDIX

GIFTINGS AND LAND TAKINGS

Table 9.3: Giftings, land takings for the NIMTR and agreed compensation in the Te Rohe Pōtae district between 1886 and 1903, from north to south

This table is an expanded and more detailed version of that provided in chapter 9, section 9.4.3. Following the table is a description of the calculations for each block. Unless otherwise specified, the figures for acres taken for each block and subsequent totals are estimates derived from Brent Parker's document A140(a) table and corresponding Public Works Department survey plans. As the takings area survey plans do not exactly correspond with block boundaries, in most cases it is not possible to determine the exact acreage of takings from each block. Where survey plans included more than one block, the estimated taking area has been calculated from the block that the majority of the taking fell into.

The distances cited in chapter 9 and this appendix are those from Te Awamutu, 2 miles 10 chains north of the start of our inquiry district. Taking into account the inaccuracy in the original survey of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block, which overestimated the length of the line through that block by 2 miles 30 chains, the overall distance of the NIMTR between the northern and southern boundaries of our inquiry district can be calculated at 70 miles 38.1 chains.

Block	Year of taking	Length of track through block (miles and chains)	Estimated area of taking (acres)	Area gifted (acres)
Pōkuru	1886	1 mile 70 chains	26.9	0
Kakepuku 10 and 12	1886	2 miles 3 chains	23.1	0
Ouruwhero – North and South	1886	2 miles 28 chains	34.1	26.1
Puketarata 2 and 11	1886	3 miles 67 chains	37.3	20.9
Otorohanga	1886	1 mile 59 chains	17.6	13.9
Waikowhitiwhiti, Orahiri and Tahaia blocks	1886, 1888	1 mile 64 chains	30.1	27.5
Pukeroa-Hangatiki	1888	4 miles 59 chains	45.7	45.7
Hauturu	1888	1 mile 58 chains	19.4	19.4
Te Kumi	1888	2 miles 70 chains	32.5	32.5
Te Kuiti	1888	42 chains	7	7
Te Kuiti	1895	n/a	5.5	0
Pukenui	1888	4 miles 70 chains	87	0

Area of taking not gifted (acres)	Compensation agreed	Notes
26.9	£60	Taking includes Mawhai Station. The Māori owners of this block requested that £58 19s 9d of their compensation for the block be put towards the payment of survey liens, with the outstanding balance paid to the owners. Despite an 1892 court order, both amounts remained unpaid in 1898, when the court issued another order that the compensation be paid.
23.1	£26	The court ordered in 1894 that the outstanding compensation for these blocks be put towards outstanding survey liens.
8	£10 10s	Taking includes Te Kawa Station. We have no evidence to suggest that the owners received the compensation for this block.
16.4	£8 for excess in Puketarata 2; £7 10s for the one chain and the excess in Puketarata 11.	Likely to include Kiokio Station. We have no evidence to suggest that the owners received the compensation for this block.
3.7	£5 (excess land), £3 (damage, gravel pit and removal of soil).	We have no evidence to suggest that the owners received the compensation for this block.
2.6	£3 10s for excess in Tahaia block. Store back-rent to be paid (Tahaia).	Taking includes Otorohanga Station (gifted). We have no evidence to suggest that the owners received the compensation for this block
0	Fence to be straightened.	Includes Hangatiki Station (gifted).
0	None.	All land gifted.
0	None. Fence to be straightened. Gifting included right to fell timber one chain on each side of the track.	Taking includes Te Kumi Station (gifted).
0
5.5	Exchanged for land purchased by Crown in same block.	Additional taking for Mangaokewa ballast pit.
87	Exchanged for interests acquired by the Crown in the same block.	Taking includes Te Kuiti Station.

Block	Year of taking	Length of track through block (miles and chains)	Estimated area of taking (acres)	Area gifted (acres)
Pukenui 2	1895	n/a	18.9	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 (north of Mōkau Station)	1888	4 miles 3 chains	77.5	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 (south of Mōkau Station)	1899	11 miles 7 chains	200.4	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 79	1899, 1902	3 miles	46.5	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 78	1902	2 miles 40 chains	63.1	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 77	1902	13 miles 25 chains	219.3	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 77	1902	n/a	0.5	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 56	1902	1 mile	14	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 52	1902	1 mile 75 chains	26.8	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 55	1902	4 miles 11 chains	54	0
Rangitoto–Tuhua 58	1902	1 mile 7.1 chains	0.1	0
Total		70 miles 38.1 chains	1087.3	193

Table 9.3: Giftings, land takings for the NIMTR and agreed compensation in the Te Rohe Pōtae district between 1886 and 1903, from north to south

Area of taking not gifted (acres)	Compensation agreed	Notes
18.9	Exchanged for interests acquired by the Crown in the same block.	Additional 1895 taking for Mangaokewa ballast pit.
77.5	No compensation awarded for this taking.	Taking includes part of Mokau Station.
200.4	No compensation awarded for this taking.	Taking includes part of Mokau Station, Kopaki Station, and Mangapehi Station.
46.5	No compensation awarded for this taking	Includes Poro-o-tarao Station. Probably includes part of Poro-o-tarao tunnel
63.1	No compensation awarded for this taking.	Taking includes Waimiha Station.
219.3	No compensation awarded for this taking.	Taking includes Ongarue Station.
0.5	No compensation awarded for this taking.	Additional 1902 taking for a reservoir near Ongarue Station.
14	No compensation awarded for this taking.
26.8	No compensation awarded for this taking.
54	No compensation awarded for this taking.
0.1	No compensation awarded for this taking.
894.3

9.8.1 Pökuru block, 1886

A total of 26.9 acres was taken from the Pökuru block for the railway (including Mawhai Station). The NIMTR enters the Pökuru block at 2 miles 10 chains and exits at 4 miles. There are 80 chains in a mile. The total length of track through the block is 1 mile 70 chains. The owners did not wish to gift any land for the railway, and agreed to accept £60 in compensation for the taking of their land. In May 1892 the court ordered that £58 19s 9d of this compensation be paid to the surveyor-general for survey costs, and that George Wilkinson be authorised to pay the balance to two owners, Tikitini and Hori Keeti.<sup>1</sup>

9.8.2 Kakepuku 10 and 12 blocks, 1886

The total area taken from the Kakepuku blocks was 22.72 acres. Plan PWD 13652, however, shows that this figure equates to the taking for just the length of track from the four-mile point to the six-mile point. The minutes of the December 1890 Native Land Court sitting provide a more accurate figure for the land taken from the Kakepuku blocks: 23.1 acres. This discrepancy is explained by the fact that the survey plans for the Ouruwhero block contain a small area of the Kakepuku block. The NIMTR enters the Kakepuku blocks at 4 miles and exits at 6 miles 3 chains. The total length of track through the block was 2 miles 3 chains. None of the land in the Kakepuku blocks was gifted. At the Native Land Court, the owners accepted an offer of compensation of £26 for all of the area taken for the railway.<sup>2</sup>

9.8.3 Ouruwhero North and South blocks, 1886

The area taken from the Ouruwhero block was 34.48 acres. However, it is necessary to subtract from that figure the small area (0.38 acres) known to have been taken from the Kakepuku block. This would leave an estimated total taking area of 34.1 acres from the Ouruwhero block. The track enters the Ouruwhero block at 6 miles 3 chains and exits at 8 miles 31 chains. This gives a length of 2 miles 28 chains. The minutes from the 1890 Native Land Court hearing suggest that the owners agreed to gift the railway corridor plus excess from the block's southern boundary as far as a ballast pit on the block. The owners in the northern part of the block agreed to gift the rail corridor from the ballast pit to the northern boundary, but requested payment for the excess area on that length of line (which amounted to 8 acres). A one-chain gifting for the total length of the railway through the Ouruwhero block (therefore not including the land for Te Kawa Station) would equate to 18.8 acres. Adding to that the 8 acres of excess compensated in the northern portion (which must have included the land for Te Kawa Station – situated between the 7.25- and 7.5-mile points), we arrive at a total of 26.1 acres. This means that the total area gifted (comprising the one chain width plus 7.3 acres of excess gifted) is 26.1 acres.<sup>3</sup> We note that claimant counsel, citing a 1965 survey plan (see document A20(a), p

---

1. Document A140(a); doc A96, pp 5–6; doc A140(a)(i), plans 1C, 1D.

2. Document A96, p 6; doc A96(a)(2), p 5; doc A140(a)(i), plans 1D–1G.

3. Document A140(a); doc A96, p 6.

384), suggested that the area of excess gifted in the southern part of the Ouruwhero block was 6.25 acres, but it is not clear from where this figure is derived.<sup>4</sup>

9.8.4 Puketarata 2 and 11 blocks, 1886

An estimated 37.3 acres was taken from the Puketarata blocks. Based on the estimates in document A140(a), adding the takings for the Puketarata 2 block (the portion of the block indicated by Parker as falling within the gifting) gives a total of 26.1 acres. Since the survey plan does not exactly correspond with block boundaries, this total also includes an area from the Ouruwhero block. This gives a total of 11.2 acres for the taking in the Puketarata 11 block. The railway enters the Puketarata block at 8 miles 31 chains and exits at 12 miles 18 chains. The total length of the railway through the block is 3 miles 67 chains. At the December 1890 hearing, the owners of Puketarata 2 agreed to gift the one-chain corridor, but requested compensation for the excess. Based on an estimated track length of 2 miles 49 chains through the Puketarata 2 block, this would equate to a gifting of 20.9 acres, leaving an excess of 5.2 acres. None of the land taken for the railway in the Puketarata 11 block was gifted.<sup>5</sup>

9.8.5 Otorohanga block, 1886

An estimated 17.6 acres was taken from this block for the railway. Note that the Crown, citing ML-Plan 3165/7/2, gives a figure of 15 acres for the railway takings from the Otorohanga block, but it is unclear where on the plan this 15 acres is derived from.<sup>6</sup> The NIMTR enters the Otorohanga block at 12 miles 18 chains and exits at 13 miles 77 chains. The total distance of track within the block is 1 mile 59 chains. At the December 1890 Native Land Court hearing, the owners of the block agreed to gift the railway corridor. They agreed to £5 in compensation for the excess (which included a gravel pit and unspecified damages). Later the court agreed to award a further £3 compensation to the owners for damage caused by removal of soil. Based on the distance of track through the block, a one-chain gifting would have equated to 13.9 acres, making the excess 3.7 acres.<sup>7</sup>

9.8.6 Waikowhitiwhiti, Orahiri, and Tahaia blocks, 1886, 1888

The estimated total area taken from these three blocks was 30.1 acres. The NIMTR enters the Waikowhitiwhiti block at 13 miles 77 chains, and exits the Tahaia block at 15 miles 61 chains. The length of the track through the Tahaia block was 34 chains. At the December 1890 Native Land Court hearing, the owners of the Waikowhitiwhiti and Orahiri blocks agreed to gift the land for the track and the excess without compensation. The owners of the Tahaia block agreed to gift the land for the track, but requested compensation for the excess. The area taken for

---

4. Submission 3.4.121, p 45.

5. Document A140(a); doc A96, pp 6–7.

6. Submission 3.4.293, p 44.

7. Document A140(a); doc A96, p 7.

the Tahaia block was 6 acres.<sup>8</sup> A one-chain width would therefore involve 3.4 acres. Thus, an excess of 2.6 acres must have been taken as well.

9.8.7 Pukeroa–Hangatiki block, 1888

We received varying figures on the area of the taking from the Pukeroa–Hangatiki block. The title order for the block gives the area of the taking as 60 acres.<sup>9</sup> However, due to the overlap in survey plan boundaries between the Pukeroa–Hangatiki block and the Tahaia block to the north, we have relied on Parker’s estimate of 45.7 acres.<sup>10</sup> The NIMTR enters the Pukeroa–Hangatiki block at 15 miles 61 chains and exits at 20 miles 40 chains. The length of the track through the block is thus 4 miles 59 chains. At the December 1890 Native Land Court hearing, the owners of the Pukeroa–Hangatiki block agreed to gift all of the land for the railway.

9.8.8 Hauturu block, 1888

Citing the Hauturu East 1 title order (see document A92), the Crown cites the area taken from this block as 19 acres. We have relied on Parker’s figures in document A140(a), which estimate the area taken at 19.4 acres.<sup>11</sup> The NIMTR enters the Hauturu block at 20 miles 40 chains and exits the block at 22 miles 18 chains. The length of the track through this block is thus 1 mile 58 chains. At the December 1890 Native Land Court hearing, the owners agreed to gift all the land for the railway.

9.8.9 Te Kumi block, 1888

The Crown, citing the title order for the Te Kumi block gives the total area taken from this block as 21 acres, while Parker estimates the area of the taking at 30.4 acres.<sup>12</sup> Based on other known figures relating to the taking from this block, we consider Parker’s estimate more accurate. A one-chain gifting through the 2-mile 70-chain block would have, by itself, amounted to 23 acres. Adding to this figure the area of excess (stated to be 6.5 acres in the Native Land Court minutes) and the taking of 3 acres for Te Kumi Station gives a total of 32.5 acres. The NIMTR enters the Te Kumi block at 22 miles 18 chains and exits the block at 25 miles 8 chains, making the length of the track through the block 2 miles 70 chains. At the December 1890 hearing, the owners of the Te Kumi block agreed to gift the strip of land for the railway, 3 acres for railway stations and the right to fell the bush one chain wide on either side of the railway line. In regard to the excess, stated to be 6.5 acres, all owners, with the exception of Raurau and Ngapera, agreed to gift it. Raurau and Ngapera agreed to £8 10s in compensation for their share of the

---

8. Submission 3.4.293, p 44; doc A92, Tahaia Title Order, SA-TO-Tahaia.

9. Submission 3.4.293; doc A92, Pukeroa Hangatiki Title Order, SA-TO-Pukeroa-Hangatiki-A

10. Document A140(a); doc A96, p8.

11. Document A140(a); doc A96, p8; doc A96(a)(2), p9.

12. Document A92, Te Kumi Title Order, SA-TO-Te Kumi.

excess, but both later withdrew their claims on condition that a fence along the railway line be straightened to exclude a disused gravel pit.

9.8.10 Te Kuiti block, 1888, 1895

In an 1899 hearing for the Te Kuiti block, George Wilkinson confirmed that the Māori owners of the Te Kuiti block had agreed to gift 7 acres taken from the block in 1888 for the railway, while requesting compensation for the 1895 taking of 5.5 acres for the Mangaokewa ballast pit. The railway enters the Te Kuiti block at 25 miles 8 chains and exits at 25 miles 50 chains. This makes the length of the track through the block 42 chains.<sup>13</sup>

9.8.11 Pukenui block, 1888

Parker, citing ML plan 6448A, said 87 acres were taken from the Pukenui block for the railway in 1888.<sup>14</sup> In Parker's table of railway takings (see document A140(a)), the plans showing takings for the Pukenui block are shown as overlapping in the north with the taking for the Te Kuiti block, and in the south with the taking for the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block. The taking from the Te Kuiti block (shown in PWD plan 13652, sheet 11) is known to have been seven acres (see section 9.7.10). As the survey plan covers a total of 15.9 acres, this suggests that the share of the plan that fell within the Pukenui block amounted to 8.9 acres. Adding this 8.9 acres to the total takings, which exclusively fall within the Pukenui block, gives a total of 71.55 acres. This suggests that, at the southern boundary of the block, the share of PWD plan 15579, sheet 5 corresponding to the Pukenui block was 15.45 acres, while the share within the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block was 11.15 acres. The NIMTR enters the Pukenui block at 25 miles 50 chains and exits at 30 miles 40 chains. The total length of the railway through the block was thus 4 miles 70 chains. At a December 1899 Native Land Court hearing to subdivide the Te Kuiti block, the Crown agreed to subtract 87 acres (as well as 18 acres 3 roods 31 perches it had acquired from the same block in 1895 for the Mangaokewa ballast pit) from the interests it had acquired in the block.<sup>15</sup>

9.8.12 Pukenui 2 block, 1895

See the aforementioned discussion on Pukenui block, 1888. Pukenui 2 block contained the 1895 taking for the Mangaokewa ballast pit (not included in the 87 acres already listed), exchanged in 1899 for interests that the Crown had already acquired in the same block.<sup>16</sup>

---

13. Document A96(c), p 20; doc A140(a); doc A140(a)(i), p 28; doc A140(b), para 18.3; PWD Plan 13652, sheet 11 (doc A140(a)(i), plan 3K).

14. Document A140(b), para 25.

15. Document A20, p 156; doc A140(b), para 25.

16. Document A20, p 156; doc A140(b), para 25.

9.8.13 Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block (north of Mokau Station), 1888

The takings within this part of the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block include all 65 acres 2 roods 33 perches within PWD plan 15579 sheets 6 to 9, plus 11.5 acres that fell within sheet 5. PWD plan 15967 shows an additional small taking of 2 roods 28 perches, making a total of 77 acres 3 roods 21 perches (77.88 acres) in all.<sup>17</sup> The NIMTR enters the Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block at around 30 miles 40 chains from Te Awamutu Station. Mokau Station is located at approximately 34 miles 43 chains from Te Awamutu, so the distance between the block's northern border and this point is around 4 miles 3 chains.<sup>18</sup>

9.8.14 Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 block (south of Mokau Station), 1899

According to Parker, 200.4 acres was taken from Rangitoto–Tuhua 68 south of Mokau Station for the construction of the railway. Document A140(a) indicates that the NIMTR enters this part of the block at 34 miles 43 chains and exits at around 48 miles, thus giving a length of 13 miles 37 chains. However, subsequent research by Parker indicates that the original survey had been carried out before the exact site of the Poro-o-Tarao tunnel-mouth had been decided.<sup>19</sup> This meant that the approach to the tunnel was shown as 2 miles 30 chains longer than its actual length. Thus, rather than 13 miles 37 chains, the correct length of the NIMTR through this section of the block is 11 miles 7 chains, and the railway exits from the block at 45 miles 50 chains (not 48 miles).

9.8.15 Rangitoto–Tuhua 79 block, 1899, 1902

The total area taken from this block for the railway was 46.5 acres. According to document A140(a) the railway enters the Rangitoto–Tuhua 79 block at 48 miles and exits at 51 miles. However, adjusting for the survey inaccuracy noted in the previous reference, the actual entry point of the railway into the block is 45 miles 50 chains and the exit point is 48 miles 50 chains.

9.8.16 Rangitoto–Tuhua 78 block, 1902

From the Rangitoto–Tuhua 78 block, 63.1 acres was taken for the railway. The railway enters the block at 48 miles 50 chains from Te Awamutu. It exits the block at 51 miles 10 chains.<sup>20</sup>

9.8.17 Rangitoto–Tuhua 77 block, 1902

From the Rangitoto–Tuhua 77 block, 219.8 acres was taken for the railway. The NIMTR enters the block at 51 miles 10 chains. It exits the block at 64 miles 35 chains.<sup>21</sup>

---

17. Document A140(a), p 3; doc 140(a)(i), p 38.

18. Document A96, p 20 n

19. Document A140(b), para 14.

20. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

21. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

9.8.18 Rangitoto–Tuhua 56 block, 1902

According to Parker, 14 acres was taken from the Rangitoto–Tuhua 56 block for the railway. The railway enters the block at 64 miles 35 chains. It exits the same block at 65 miles 35 chains.<sup>22</sup>

9.8.19 Rangitoto–Tuhua 52 block, 1902

According to Parker, 26.8 acres was taken from Rangitoto–Tuhua 52 for the railway. The NIMTR enters the block at 65 miles 35 chains from Te Awamutu. It exits the block at 67 miles 30 chains.<sup>23</sup>

9.8.20 Rangitoto–Tuhua 55 block, 1902

From the Rangitoto–Tuhua 55 block, 54 acres was taken for the railway. The railway enters the block at 67 miles 30 chains. It exits the block at 71 miles and 41 chains.<sup>24</sup>

9.8.21 Rangitoto–Tuhua 58 block, 1902

From the Rangitoto–Tuhua 58 block, 0.1 of an acre was taken for the railway. The railway enters the block at 71 miles 41 chains. It exits the block at the southern boundary of the inquiry district at 72 miles 48.1 chains.<sup>25</sup>

---

22. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

23. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

24. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

25. Entry and exit points adjusted to account for survey inaccuracy noted in document A140(b), para 14.

CHAPTER 10

TE KOOTI WHENUA MĀORI / THE NATIVE LAND COURT, 1886–1907

Many of them would like their titles to remain as they were, as they received them from their ancestors; but they found it to be now impossible that things can remain in their old state. An investigation into the ownership and title of their lands must be made. They would like to investigate the title and settle it amongst themselves by the native committees, but found they had not the power to do so, and they were now asking themselves what they ought to do . . .

—John Ormsby, April 1886<sup>1</sup>

10.1 INTRODUCTION

In late July 1886, the Native Land Court began its investigation into the 1.6 million-acre Aotea–Rohe Potae block. The court's hearing was the result of an application filed three months earlier by Wahanui, Kaahu, Taonui Hikaka, Hone Te One, Tūkōrehu, Hone Omipi, and 62 others on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Whanganui, and Ngāti Hikairo. In contrast to the years of negotiation that had preceded the introduction of the court into the district, once the application was received matters proceeded very quickly. By October 1886, the court had issued its judgment, awarding almost the whole block to the five claimant tribes.

In the years following, the court worked its way through the many applications to subdivide the block, first between its respective iwi, then its hapū, and to define the relative interests of the individual owners. In doing so, the court was converting land held collectively in customary title into land held in individual shares under a Crown-derived title.

As time passed, the exercise of the court's jurisdiction shifted. From the 1890s on, an increasing amount of the court's time was spent administering the blocks that had already passed through the court. This involved the processing of succession orders and the further partitioning of the original subdivisions. In addition, as its purchasing programme in the district gained pace, the Crown became a more active and visible presence in the court process as it sought to have the interests it had purchased defined and subdivided.

The main source of evidence relied on in this chapter is Drs Paul Husbands and James Mitchell's research report, 'The Native Land Court, Land Titles and

---

1. 'Mr Ballance and the Natives', Waikato Times, 20 April 1886, p 4; doc A41 (Loveridge), p 193.

Crown Land Purchasing in the Rohe Potae District, 1866–1907.<sup>2</sup> The chapter also draws on claimant evidence, court minute books, other research reports relevant to the Native Land Court (including those by Paula Berghan, Leanne Boulton, Dr Terry Hearn, Dr Donald Loveridge, and Cathy Marr), and the extensive body of Waitangi Tribunal reports and scholarly works that have examined the court.<sup>3</sup>

10.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The arrival of the court in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1886 was particularly significant because Māori had staunchly resisted its introduction into their rohe for many years. The court had long been a frequent topic of discussion between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The Crown saw the introduction of the Native Land Court into Te Rohe Pōtae as critical to its goal of European settlement of the district. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, however, were deeply sceptical that the court would allow them to retain their land and control the pace and extent of any settlement of the district, as they wished. They were familiar with the workings of the Native Land Court in other districts and with its negative effects. They were particularly critical of the social and financial costs associated with the court, and with the scale of land alienation that often followed title determination. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, not wanting to experience these outcomes themselves, called several times for the power to themselves determine title to lands in the district. They also wanted titles to be awarded to hapū, rather than individuals.

However, when the court eventually sat in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1886, the core complaints and requests on which Māori from the district had petitioned the Crown had not been addressed. There were, nevertheless, some improvements in the court's process. The court was located in Ōtorohanga, a Māori township without the hotels and public houses found in European townships; lawyers and agents were – at first – barred from attending sittings; and the court was presided over by Judge William Gilbert Mair, a fluent te reo Māori speaker, although a former military leader for the Crown during the wars. These changes meant that some of the problems that had plagued court sittings elsewhere – typically involving the consumption of alcohol and the activities of greedy land-sharks and storekeepers – were mitigated in Te Rohe Pōtae. However, these changes, the claimants argued, did not reduce the impact of the court on Māori customary tenure. In their view, the native land legislation, the title it offered and the fact that a European judge was the final arbiter of the court process meant that they could no longer control their own lands in accordance with their tikanga.

---

2. Document A79 (Husbands and Mitchell).

3. Berghan, 'Block Research Narratives' (document A60); Boulton, 'Land Alienation in the Rohe Potae Inquiry District, 1866–1908, An Overview' (document A67); Hearn, 'Māori Economic Development in Te Rohe Pōtae Inquiry District, c.1885 to c.2006' (document A146); Loveridge, 'The Crown and the Opening of the King Country' (document A41); Loveridge, "'In Accordance with the Will of Parliament": The Crown, the Four Tribes and the Aotea Block, 1885–1899' (document A68); Marr, 'Te Rohe Potae Political Engagement 1864–1886' (document A78).

The nature of the individualised titles, we were told, had long-lasting impacts on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, their ownership and use of their land, and their exercise of mana whakahaere. The Native Land Court titles, they claimed, ‘seriously undermined the tribal structures’ of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, facilitated the large-scale alienation of Māori land, and destroyed the ability of Māori to ‘develop, use, occupy and enjoy their lands according to tikanga.’<sup>4</sup> We turn now to examine whether such claims are well-founded.

10.1.2 How the chapter is structured

This chapter examines the operations and outcomes of the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae between 1886 and 1907. It begins by briefly examining the origins of the Native Land Court and the way in which the court had come to operate by 1886, as well as the form of title it awarded. The chapter then examines the court’s operations and impacts in two main periods. First, it considers how title to the initial Aotea–Rohe Potae block and its subdivisions was determined between 1886 and 1890, with a particular focus on the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were able to control and influence the court’s operations. Secondly, it considers the effects that subsequent partition and succession had on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land holdings after 1892. The chapter concludes by examining two further issues: the costs associated with the court process, and the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori protested the court, along with the redress that was available to them if they were dissatisfied with the court’s decisions.

10.2 ISSUES

10.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The Tribunal has considered the establishment, operations, and impacts of the Native Land Court system in extensive detail in several inquiries. Other Tribunal panels have found that some form of new title system was needed, both to allow Māori to engage in the colonial economy and to avoid a repeat of the Waitara purchase. The Pouakani Tribunal, for instance, considered that ‘there had to be a fair system of establishing ownership when a sale was contemplated.’<sup>5</sup> According to the Turanga Tribunal, ‘precise boundaries and certainty of ownership’ were needed for this purpose.<sup>6</sup> In the view of the Hauraki Tribunal, customary tenure also had to evolve to ‘meet both Maori and settler needs’, including ‘the requirements of mining, commercial agriculture and other land uses, including its sale, lease, or development’. That Tribunal emphasised, however, that there were a number of options open to the Crown to achieve that purpose, not all of which required

---

4. Submission 3.4.107(a), pp 39–40.

5. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993 (Wellington: Brooker’s Ltd, 1993), p 308.

6. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua: The Report on the Turanganui a Kiwa Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 2, p 439.

‘full-scale tenure conversion and abrogation of the customary base.’<sup>7</sup> The Tauranga Moana Raupatu Tribunal similarly characterised the Crown’s ‘radical modification of Maori land tenure’ as ‘not an inevitable result of European mindsets but a sustained and deliberate policy choice on the part of the Government.’<sup>8</sup>

Whatever the nature and design of a system to establish ownership, however, Māori input and consent was required before any change to customary tenure was implemented. Successive Tribunals have found that the establishment of the Native Land Court did not meet this standard. Nor were Māori consulted in any meaningful way regarding the detail of the legislation that created and empowered the court. The Hauraki Tribunal, for example, considered that the changes introduced by the first of the two Native Land Acts that initiated this system of land law, the Native Land Act 1862, ‘warranted explicit, prior consultation with Maori.’<sup>9</sup> Instead, only limited, general consultation occurred. As such, the Crown did not have a mandate to establish the court.<sup>10</sup>

The Taranaki Tribunal found that the Native Land Court usurped the ability of Māori to determine land ownership themselves by presuming ‘to decide for Maori that which Maori should and could have decided for themselves.’<sup>11</sup> This was contrary to the article 2 guarantee that Māori title, and Māori control over it, would be respected. The Turanga Tribunal emphasised that ‘the Crown’s right to make laws for the regulation of Maori title could not be used to defeat that title or Maori control over it.’<sup>12</sup> Having usurped the right of Māori to determine title to their land, the court established by the Crown was also an inappropriate forum to determine customary ownership. The Europeans who were given control of resolving disputes between Māori ‘were outsiders looking in.’<sup>13</sup> But determining customary rights, according to the Central North Island Tribunal, ‘required a deep knowledge of history, whakapapa and relationships among the various kin groups with rights to land and resources in a district.’<sup>14</sup> Tribunals have also been critical of the costs incurred from participation in the Native Land Court process, particularly those arising from survey.<sup>15</sup>

---

7. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 2, p777.

8. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupata o Tauranga Moana: Report on the Tauranga Confiscation Claims (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), p304.

9. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p710.

10. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p710.

11. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (Wellington: GP Publications, 1996), p282.

12. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p534.

13. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu: A Report on Moriori and Ngati Mutunga Claims in the Chatham Islands (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2001), p146.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 2, p537.

15. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p519; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2017), vol 3, pp1270–1272.

Other Tribunals have found that the titles awarded by the court were inappropriate and deficient in many respects. The Turanga Tribunal found that the Native Land Court replaced communal rights in Māori land with ‘a kind of virtual individual title’, under which individuals held tradeable shares in communal land but had no allotment of their own.<sup>16</sup> These individual tradeable shares had no precedent in tikanga Māori. In Māori communities, rights were held communally and were managed by rangatira on the community’s behalf in accordance with tikanga. But under this new form of title, individuals could sell or lease their shares without the consent (or even knowledge) of rangatira or the community as a whole.<sup>17</sup>

The Turanga Tribunal found that, under the Native Land Court regime, title was individualised only for the purpose of sale or lease. For every other purpose, the land remained ‘merely customary land outside English law and commerce’. Under this form of title, it was much easier to sell or lease land than to retain and use it. In effect, therefore, Māori communities were effectively excluded from joining the colonial economy by any means other than selling or leasing.<sup>18</sup> Further, this form of title was introduced despite the opposition of most Māori, who wanted a form of title that reflected communal rights in land.<sup>19</sup> The Turanga Tribunal found that the Crown’s ‘selective individualisation’ of land titles was a clear breach of the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. It excluded hapū from sale and lease decisions, failed to provide legal support for chiefly leadership, and in these ways ‘confiscated rights formerly vested in tikanga Maori’.<sup>20</sup>

The Hauraki, Central North Island, and National Park Tribunals drew similar conclusions. In The Hauraki Report, the Tribunal found that the hybrid form of title imposed on Māori divided communities, and was ‘utterly destructive of efforts to develop the land, pauperising, socially damaging and psychologically dispiriting’.<sup>21</sup> Similarly, the Central North Island Tribunal found that the individualised titles created by the court ‘were in fundamental violation of Treaty guarantees, deprived communities and leaders of their collective rights and their tino rangatiratanga, and created structural pressures for alienation of interests in land’.<sup>22</sup> For the National Park Tribunal, many of the prejudicial effects of native land title were caused by the ‘fundamental breach found in all native land legislation – namely, the constricting requirement that ownership interests be recorded as tenancies in common’. Each named owner had their own interest that they ‘could sell . . . independent of the others’. In so doing, they could undermine the desire of communities to retain and use their land.<sup>23</sup>

---

16. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 441.

17. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 441, 443.

18. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 443–444, 446.

19. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 443–444, 446.

20. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 446.

21. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 785.

22. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 537.

23. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 1, p 271.

10.2.2 Crown concessions

The Crown made three concessions relating to the Native Land Court. First, the Crown conceded ‘that its failure to include in the native land laws prior to 1894 a form of title that enabled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities to control their land and resources collectively breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>24</sup>

Secondly, the Crown accepted ‘that the individualisation of Maori land tenure provided for by the native land laws made the lands of Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū more susceptible to fragmentation, alienation and partition, and that this contributed to the undermining of tribal structures in Te Rohe Pōtae’. The Crown conceded ‘that its failure to protect these tribal structures was a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>25</sup>

Finally, the Crown conceded ‘that in a number of instances, for example in some subdivisions within the Rangitoto–Tuhua block, the iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae had to give up unreasonably large amounts of land to pay for survey costs, and that the Crown’s failure to protect the affected iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae from this burden breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>26</sup>

The Crown also acknowledged, but did not concede, ‘that where costs associated with the determination of land titles, in particular survey costs, were an excessive and disproportionate burden on Māori land owners, and where land was alienated to cover these excessive costs, there is a real issue of whether there was a failure on the part of the Crown to design a fair titling regime, and a failure on the part of the Crown to protect Māori interests in land they wished to retain.’<sup>27</sup>

Crown counsel also pointed to the concessions concerning Crown purchasing as being relevant to Native Land Court issues.<sup>28</sup> One particularly relevant concession from those submissions is that although the Crown was ‘planning to provide for Māori District Committees to have a greater role in Native Land Court processes and to provide a mechanism for a measure of self-government’, it ‘failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it did not fulfil these representations, and thereby breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles by not acting in good faith and by failing to respect their rangatiratanga.’<sup>29</sup> The Crown’s other concessions on purchasing are dealt with in detail in chapter 11.

10.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

Over 130 claims in this inquiry contain grievances related to the Native Land Court.<sup>30</sup> The issues set out in these claims include that the court was forced on Te

24. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

25. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

26. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

27. Statement 1.3.1, pp 83–84.

28. Submission 3.4.305, pp 9–10; submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

29. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

30. These include: Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 1099, Wai 1100, Wai 1132, Wai 1133, Wai 1136, Wai 1138, Wai 1139, Wai 1798 (sub-

Rohe Pōtae Māori, despite their repeated requests to determine title themselves. The claims alleged that the adversarial court process was inappropriate and unfair, and failed to properly or adequately recognise customary interests. Claimants also raised grievances related to the costs of the court process, and particularly the land that was alienated to pay for survey charges. Claimants alleged that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered severe prejudice as a result of the court's operations and the individualisation of land interests, including the fragmentation and alienation of their land, and the undermining of tribal society.<sup>31</sup>

Claimant counsel in this inquiry, citing the Hauraki Tribunal, acknowledged that a new form of land title was necessary to allow Māori to engage with the commercial economy.<sup>32</sup> But they also submitted that the form of title introduced by the Crown under the Native Land Act 1862 and subsequent Māori land laws was intended to make land 'easily alienated by the Crown and private purchasers', to '[u]ndermine customary Māori authority', and to '[p]romote colonisation and settlement'.<sup>33</sup>

The Crown's view was that a new form of title was necessary 'to facilitate Māori involvement in the new colonial economy'.<sup>34</sup> There existed, counsel argued, an 'economic need for defined tracts of land and a simple, uncluttered bundle of rights, as opposed to the complex configuration of rights based on resource use such as mission 3.4.189); Wai 972 (submission 3.4.134); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 1482 (submission 3.4.154); Wai 1593 (submission 3.4.230); Wai 1523 (submission 3.4.157); Wai 1599 (submission 3.4.153); Wai 1944 (submission 3.4.233); Wai 2014 (submission 3.4.208); Wai 2274 (submission 3.4.125); Wai 2313; Wai 2314; Wai 556, Wai 616, Wai 1377, Wai 1820 (submission 3.4.279); Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1386, Wai 1762; Wai 1361 (claim 1.2.5); Wai 1500 (submission 3.4.160); Wai 1598 (claim 1.1.146); Wai 1806 (claim 1.1.177); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 2117 (submission 3.4.161); Wai 399, Wai 577 (submission 3.4.159); Wai 478 (submission 3.4.155); Wai 729 (submission 3.4.240); Wai 762 (submission 3.4.170); Wai 836 (submission 3.4.131); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 1455 (submission 3.4.156); Wai 1640 (submission 3.4.191); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 366, Wai 1064 (submission 3.4.205); Wai 555, Wai 1224 (submission 3.4.163); Wai 575 (submission 3.4.281); Wai 845 (submission 3.4.166); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1059, Wai 50 (submission 3.4.221); Wai 1073 (submission 3.4.207); Wai 1147, Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 1196 (submission 3.4.239); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1594 (submission 3.4.164); Wai 1738 (submission 3.4.206); Wai 1803 (submission 3.4.149); Wai 483 (submission 3.4.135); Wai 535 (submission 3.4.243); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submission 3.4.246); Wai 868 (submission 3.4.247); Wai 1962 (submission 3.4.172); Wai 656 (submission 3.4.241); Wai 870 (submission 3.4.202); Wai 1112, Wai 1113, Wai 1439, Wai 2351, Wai 2353 (submission 3.4.226); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1450 (submission 3.4.90); Wai 1498 (submission 3.4.193); Wai 1499 (submission 3.4.171); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 1611 (submission 3.4.152); Wai 1898 (submission 3.4.200); Wai 1974 (submission 3.4.192); Wai 1975 (submission 3.4.201); Wai 1978 (submission 3.4.232); Wai 1995 (submission 3.4.144); Wai 1993 (submission 3.4.235); Wai 2084 (submission 3.4.174); Wai 2087 (submission 3.4.218); Wai 2352 (submission 3.4.219); Wai 125 (submission 3.4.210); Wai 537 (submission 3.4.179); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141); Wai 2345 (submission 3.4.139).

---

31. Document A79, pp 3–5.

32. Submission 3.4.107, pp 25–26; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 777.

33. Submission 3.4.107, p 26.

34. Submission 3.4.305, pp 30–31.

food-gathering sites that may have characterised earlier times.<sup>35</sup> Crown counsel submitted that, as well as opening ‘up Māori land to direct settler purchase or lease’, it also intended that native land title would ‘encourage and facilitate assimilation by enabling Māori to deal as they saw fit with their land and resources by giving them the same rights as Europeans.’<sup>36</sup>

The claimants argued that the Crown’s native land legislation ‘fundamentally transformed’ the traditional processes and practices of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (emphasis in original).<sup>37</sup> In their view, ‘[t]he Native Land Court was a totally inappropriate vehicle to determine Māori customary rights and interests.’<sup>38</sup> Although the Crown had made some changes to the court process in response to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns, those changes did not address their fundamental concerns, nor did they provide for ‘the core demand for tribal control over the process of title determination.’<sup>39</sup>

The Crown contended that the changes it made to the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae were designed to ensure that the court ‘was not beset with the problems that had affected earlier sittings . . . in other districts.’<sup>40</sup> Those changes included the court’s location at Ōtorohanga, a Māori kāinga that was inside the liquor prohibition area and reasonably accessible to Māori. As a result, ‘the problems associated with storekeepers and drunkenness either did not exist or were very limited.’<sup>41</sup> The banning of lawyers and European agents from the court, as well as the appointment of ‘a suitably skilled and experienced judge, assessor and interpreter . . . [also] helped in material ways to address problems associated with the Court’s processes.’<sup>42</sup> The Crown submitted that the changes it made to the court both ‘met the particular requests of Rohe Pōtae leaders and led to an effective title determination process over the following decade.’<sup>43</sup>

The claimants identified several aspects of the court’s process that they said were prejudicial to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, including the location, timing, notification, and length of hearings, and the court’s treatment of absentees.<sup>44</sup> In the claimants’ view, the adversarial nature of the court process itself was also damaging, particularly to relationships between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori whānau, hapū, and iwi.<sup>45</sup>

Crown counsel accepted that there was ‘considerable variation in the amount of notice given’ for court sittings, and that hearings were sometimes delayed. The Crown cautioned, however, that there was insufficient evidence of how Māori responded in those situations. As such, ‘it is difficult to assess what prejudice, if

---

35. Submission 3.4.305, p 36.

36. Submission 3.4.305, p 3.

37. Submission 3.4.107, p 60.

38. Submission 3.4.107, p 68.

39. Submission 3.4.107, pp 28, 32.

40. Submission 3.4.305, p 58.

41. Submission 3.4.305, p 57.

42. Submission 3.4.305, p 58.

43. Submission 3.4.305, p 7.

44. Submission 3.4.107, pp 86–91.

45. Submission 3.4.107, pp 67, 76.

any, Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered as a result.<sup>46</sup> The Crown also accepted that the court ‘had a significant presence in the inquiry district’, but argued that the effect of that presence on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori was ‘difficult to quantify.’<sup>47</sup> Crown counsel also accepted that the safeguards provided for non-participants ‘fell short of being a complete remedy to the complex problem.’<sup>48</sup> The Crown did not directly respond to the claimant’s submission that the court’s adversarial nature damaged relationships between Māori, but argued that ‘there may have . . . been occasions where the adversarial nature of [court] proceedings ensured a more complete picture was presented.’<sup>49</sup>

The claimants further argued that, by participating in the court process, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori incurred ‘onerous’ costs. These included direct costs, such as survey charges and court fees, as well as indirect costs, such as lost productive time and inter-Māori and hapū disputes arising from court hearings.<sup>50</sup> The Crown accepted the Native Land Court process continued to result in costs to Māori. However, counsel questioned ‘the overall scale of the costs, the extent to which they were reasonable, and their overall impact and effect.’<sup>51</sup>

Claimant counsel also submitted that, where Māori were aggrieved by court decisions, the remedies provided, both before and after the creation of the Native Appellate Court in 1894, were not suitable.<sup>52</sup> The Crown did not accept ‘that justice was not done, or seen to be done’, before 1894 or that ‘the rehearings and appeals processes as they applied in the Rohe Pōtae district were inadequate.’<sup>53</sup>

In the claimants’ view, the titles issued by the Native Land Court ‘seriously undermined the tribal structures of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori whanau, hapū and iwi.’<sup>54</sup> They failed to recognise shared customary resources and imposed boundary lines that did not reflect tikanga.<sup>55</sup> The claimants further submitted that: ‘The individualisation of titles destroyed the ability of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori whanau, hapū and iwi to develop, occupy and enjoy their lands according to tikanga.’<sup>56</sup>

As set out in section 10.2.2, the Crown conceded that individualisation and its related processes contributed to the undermining of tribal structures in Te Rohe Pōtae, in breach of Treaty principles. Nonetheless, it also submitted that the tenure reform undertaken by the Native Land Court ‘was meant to facilitate Māori involvement in the new colonial economy’ and was, despite the ‘many issues’ that arose as a result, consistent with the Treaty.<sup>57</sup> We note further that the Crown, in apparent contradiction of its concession, does not consider individualisation,

---

46. Submission 3.4.305, pp 52–53.

47. Submission 3.4.305, p 55.

48. Submission 3.4.305, p 68.

49. Submission 3.4.305, p 35.

50. Submission 3.4.107, pp 44–45.

51. Submission 3.4.305, p 86.

52. Submission 3.4.107, pp 109–115.

53. Submission 3.4.305, pp 97–99.

54. Submission 3.4.107, p 99.

55. Submission 3.4.107, p 66.

56. Submission 3.4.107, p 60.

57. Submission 3.4.305, pp 30–31.

fragmentation, alienation, or partition to themselves be contrary to Treaty principles, even though those processes could ‘lead to tribal structures being undermined’.<sup>58</sup> The Crown recognised that the new native land title did not recognise shared resource rights, but argued that ‘customary tenure did not offer the degree of security and certainty that was required for land transactions in the new economy’.<sup>59</sup>

The claimants submitted that ‘the titles issued by the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae made it very easy for Māori owners to sell their portions but extremely difficult for them to develop their land and turn it to profitable use’.<sup>60</sup> Claimant counsel pointed to other detrimental impacts arising from the titles issued by the court: the fractionation of interests that occurred due to the imposition of European succession rules,<sup>61</sup> the related process of partition and fragmentation of land into smaller parcels,<sup>62</sup> and the creation of uneconomic or inaccessible land blocks.<sup>63</sup> The claimants also submitted that the Crown acted in bad faith by ignoring restrictions on alienation placed on titles to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land.<sup>64</sup>

The Crown accepted that many of the intended benefits of native land titles were ‘constrained or undermined in a number of ways’, particularly by Crown pre-emption.<sup>65</sup> Crown counsel cautioned, however, that while native land titles facilitated alienation, they did not cause it: ‘the fact that the Court determined title to a parcel of land did not lead inevitably to the alienation of that land’.<sup>66</sup> The Crown further accepted that, over time, Native Land Court titles had other detrimental impacts including fragmentation and the creation of uneconomic and landlocked blocks.<sup>67</sup> It also accepted that it steadily reduced restrictions on alienation, though submitted that in doing so, it was seeking ‘to treat Māori on the same basis as non-Māori’.<sup>68</sup>

10.2.4 Issues for discussion

Despite the Crown’s concessions in this inquiry, the parties continue to disagree about some fundamental issues regarding the processes, operations, costs, and impacts of the Native Land Court and its form of title in Te Rohe Pōtae.

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry<sup>69</sup> and briefly summarised the parties’ arguments, we identify the remaining issues for discussion as:

---

58. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 112–113 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

59. Submission 3.4.305, p 38.

60. Submission 3.4.107, p 41.

61. Submission 3.4.107, p 71.

62. Submission 3.4.107, p 73.

63. Submission 3.4.107, pp 104–105.

64. Submission 3.4.107, p 92.

65. Submission 3.4.305, p 77.

66. Submission 3.4.305, p 82.

67. Submission 3.4.305, pp 79–82.

68. Submission 3.4.305, pp 69–70.

69. Statement 1.4.3.

- How did the Native Land Court operate under the native land legislation and what form of title was issued by 1886?
- How was title to the initial parent blocks and definition of relative interests determined?
- What was the effect of subsequent partition and succession on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners?
- What were the costs associated with the court process?
- To what extent did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori protest the court and what redress was available?

The court in Te Rohe Pōtae was ultimately very active, creating 269 parent blocks, followed by a multitude of subsequent partitions. Dealing with the crucial resource of land, it was a feature of life for all Māori. As a result, there are a large number of claims that either directly or indirectly address the operations and impacts of the Native Land Court on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Where possible, we cite examples and case studies to illustrate how the court operated and any prejudice that might have been caused to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. We respond to particular claims and assess the extent of any prejudice suffered in the take a takiwā chapters of our report.

Several claims alleged that the Native Land Court made decisions that were in breach of Treaty principles. However, under section 6 of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, the Tribunal only has the power to consider claims concerning any policy or practice, or any act done or omitted, by or on behalf of the Crown. Other Tribunals, such as the Rekohu and Te Urewera Tribunals, have found that ‘the Native Land Court was not “the Crown”, nor was it an agent of the Crown.’<sup>70</sup> As the Te Tau Ihu Tribunal noted, the Waitangi Tribunal is not an appellate court, and the decisions of the Native Land Court ‘stand unless altered by a duly empowered court or by legislative action.’<sup>71</sup>

Other Tribunals have found, however, that the question for the Tribunal is whether a decision of the Native Land Court ‘was inconsistent with Treaty principles and, if it was, whether the Crown should have intervened.’<sup>72</sup> As counsel for the parties did not submit that we should take a different approach, we consider that the approach of previous Tribunals is also appropriate for this inquiry.

10.3 HOW DID THE NATIVE LAND COURT OPERATE AND WHAT FORM OF TITLE WAS ISSUED BY 1886?

As detailed in chapter 8, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had long opposed the introduction of the Native Land Court into their core lands. They had sought an alternative process which would allow them to determine iwi and hapū land titles among themselves, in a manner consistent with their tino rangatiratanga and mana 70. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p1092; Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu, p33.

71. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 2, p780.

72. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu, p33; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp1092–1093.

whakahaere. They had also sought a form of title that would recognise hapū as the principal rights holders in Māori land.

Their opposition to the court reflected their long engagement with the Kingitanga, and their observation of the effects of the court in surrounding districts. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were by no means alone in opposing the court. Māori across the North Island had formed similar views through their exposure to the court, first under the operation of the Native Lands Act 1865, then under the Native Land Act 1873.

Their overarching concern about the court had been one of authority – that is, they believed it was their right to determine land titles among themselves. In chapter 8 we found that the Crown had failed to provide for that right and had thereby breached the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga.

But Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also had numerous, more specific concerns about the court – including the fairness of its processes and the form of title it awarded. They raised many of these concerns during the 1883–86 negotiations with the Crown. When they finally turned to the court in 1886 for title to their lands, this was not an endorsement – as explained in chapter 8, they had simply been left with no other option.

As noted in section 10.2.3, claimants acknowledged that some improvements were made to court processes as a result of these negotiations, but argued that those improvements did not adequately address Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' concerns.

This section therefore considers how the court operated – both in terms of its processes and the form of title it awarded. In order to arrive at a full understanding of this issue, we will first briefly survey why the Crown established the court, and how it operated from the time of its establishment through to 1886, when Te Rohe Pōtae lands were placed before it.

10.3.1 The origins of the Native Land Court and early Māori views

The Native Land Court was the result of a long debate concerning the issue of Māori land.

The ways in which rights in land were held differed sharply between the English fee simple system and Māori custom, and these differences were at the heart of the debate over Māori land. An English fee simple title confers a right of ownership and an exclusive right of use. Under the English system, land is a commodity that can be bought or sold, and transferred to another by will. These titles can be possessed by individuals.

By contrast, under tikanga, Māori held land communally, usually at a whānau or hapū level. As discussed in chapter 2, while rangatira played a role in allocating land or resources, this was a management function rather than an expression of sole ownership.<sup>73</sup> Rather than ownership, the determining factor in land rights and interests for Māori was ancestral connection. As such, communal rights to occupy

---

73. ET Durie, Custom Law (Wellington: Victoria University of Wellington Treaty of Waitangi Research Unit, 2013), pp 84–89.

land were not necessarily equal or exclusive and were often closely intertwined between groups. Boundaries between the rohe of different groups could therefore be fluid, as Ngatoko Kupe of Ngāti Taiwa (a hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto) told the Native Land Court in 1888: 'According to Maori custom after a rohe is laid down, people may cross the rohe and occupy the other side providing they do not do so in an aggressive spirit, that would not effect [sic] the validation of the rohe laid down.'<sup>74</sup>

As well as occupation rights, groups could also exercise other kinds of right by virtue of their ancestral connections, including rights to seasonal occupation, rights to use resources, and rights to safe passage.<sup>75</sup> Rights to land were not static and could change or be extinguished, either from lack of use or as the result of migration or conquest. Rights could also be transferred through 'gifting', though typically only for limited periods, and '[a]bsolute land alienation was generally inconceivable.'<sup>76</sup>

In the two decades following the signing of the Treaty in 1840, these differing relationships to and understandings of land had led to numerous misunderstandings between the Crown and Māori around the country. In the absence of any regular process for determining ownership of Māori land, the Crown's attempts to purchase Māori land were beset with problems. It frequently failed to ensure that it was negotiating with the rightful owners, or to adequately explain the nature of the transactions to Māori.<sup>77</sup> These failures had their most serious consequences at Waitara, where the Crown attempted to purchase the block from a small group of sellers who were acting without the sanction of the wider community of owners. When Wiremu Kīngi and his people refused to recognise the Crown's purchase, war broke out.<sup>78</sup>

In the wake of this experience, the Crown began to consider creating a new court to determine ownership to Māori land, partly in order to avoid a repeat of that conflict. In particular, the Crown was aiming to assimilate customary title with a secure form of Crown-granted title that would be tradeable and usable in the new colonial economy. Proposals to this effect were discussed with Māori attending the Kohimarama conference in 1860 and received cautious, but limited, support. As the Turanga Tribunal put it, 'Maori at this stage were interested in the possibility of a titles tribunal, but hardly committed one way or the other. The devil, as they say, would be in the details, and there were no details available.'<sup>79</sup> However, there was no further consultation with Māori prior to the passage of the first statute, the Native Lands Act 1862.

---

74. Otorohanga (1888) 4 Otorohanga MB, p 185; doc A110 (Barrett), p 224.

75. Durie, 'Custom Law', pp 61–63, 84–85; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993, pp 13–14.

76. Durie, 'Custom Law', pp 76–81.

77. For example, see Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, pp 185–186.

78. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 409.

79. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 409–411.

The Native Land Court envisaged by the 1862 Act and its associated rules was quite different to the court that came later. However, as Richard Boast argued, the Act did introduce the basic conceptual structure which underpinned the [native land] system, based on the three planks of waiver of Crown pre-emption, conversion of customary titles to English tenures, and the creation of a new judicial body to control the process – the Native Land Court.<sup>80</sup>

The court was to be comprised of two Māori members and a European president. Its task was to ascertain and define the ownership of native lands according to Māori custom, then to issue a certificate of title. The Act established a two-step process. If the court found that land was owned communally, the title would reflect that fact in the first instance. Communities were given the option of subsequently subdividing their land into individual holdings, but it was not compulsory.<sup>81</sup> The court sat in Kaipara in 1864 and in 1865, under new rules, in Hauraki. In both cases, however, it appears that the two-stage process was not applied – declarations of ownership were made in the names of a select group of rangatira, apparently to facilitate sale of the blocks.<sup>82</sup>

This early incarnation of the Native Land Court, however, was short-lived. In late 1864, a proclamation established a single nationwide court and relegated the Māori judges to the role of native assessors.<sup>83</sup> These changes were formalised in 1865 by a new Native Lands Act, which created an ‘English style adversarial court.’<sup>84</sup> Most significantly, the 1865 Act repealed the two-stage process of the 1862 Act and instead introduced the 10-owner rule. This rule provided that blocks smaller than 5,000 acres could have a maximum of 10 named owners, who theoretically represented a larger group of other owners.<sup>85</sup> In practice, because the law did not expressly recognise the 10 owners as holding land in trust for unnamed owners, the court refused to recognise the named owners as trustees. Those owners not on the title were dispossessed of their customary interests in the land.<sup>86</sup> For blocks over 5,000 acres, a tribal title was still possible, but rarely used before provision for it was abolished in 1867.<sup>87</sup>

Previous Tribunals have identified two main purposes behind the Crown’s introduction of the Native Lands Acts of 1862 and 1865. First, the Crown wanted to create a secure form of title, usable in the colonial economy. Secondly, the 80. Richard Boast, The Native Land Court 1862–1887: A Historical Study, Cases and Commentary (Wellington: Thomson Reuters, 2013), p 50.

---

81. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 412.

82. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 682–683.

83. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 684.

84. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 414.

85. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 684–685.

86. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 400.

87. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 698–699.

Crown wanted to facilitate the large-scale alienation of Māori land to satisfy settler demand.<sup>88</sup>

These were not the Crown's only motivations. The Hauraki Tribunal noted that there was a so-called 'civilising mission' aspect to the native land regime. The preamble to the 1862 Act, for instance, stated that its purpose was to 'promote the peaceful settlement of the colony and the advancement and civilization of the Natives'. The Crown in this inquiry also submitted that it had 'sought to encourage and facilitate assimilation by enabling Māori to deal as they saw fit with their land and resources by giving them the same rights as Europeans'.<sup>89</sup> We find this submission an interesting acknowledgment of the attitude the Crown adopted to its Treaty partner in the 1860s.

The Hauraki Tribunal found, however, that the 'civilising mission' was only a secondary motivation. The Crown's primary motivation was to ease and encourage the alienation of Māori-owned land.<sup>90</sup> In addition, at least some settlers and politicians hoped that the native land laws would, in the words of Henry Sewell, bring Māori lands 'within the reach of colonisation' and lead also to 'the detribalisation of the Maoris'.<sup>91</sup> In the wake of the conflict at Waitara in 1860, for instance, William Richmond, the Minister for Native Affairs, had called for the eradication of 'the beastly communism of the Pah' by allowing Māori to partition their common property.<sup>92</sup> The Turanga Tribunal found that by 1873 the Crown was aware – or at least indifferent to the possibility – that its 'new Native land system would lead to widespread Maori landlessness and through this the destruction of Maori communities'.<sup>93</sup>

Māori protests about the court began from an early stage in its operations. Māori witnesses to Colonel Haultain's 1871 inquiry into the native land laws, for instance, favoured more tribal control over the title determination process.<sup>94</sup> Te Wheoro told Haultain that he had 'been opposed to the Court from the very commencement' and bemoaned the Crown's failure to consult before passing the original 1862 legislation.<sup>95</sup>

Major reform of the court occurred again in 1873. Despite the growing Māori calls for a greater role in title determination, the Crown did not fundamentally alter the jurisdiction of the court. Indeed, the 1873 Act formed the basis of subsequent native land legislation for the remainder of the nineteenth century,

88. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 778; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 531.

89. Submission 3.4.305, p 3.

90. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 778.

91. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 669.

92. 'Native Offenders Bill', Nelson Examiner and New Zealand Chronicle, 15 August 1860, pp 2–3; Keith Sinclair, 'Christopher William Richmond', in The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed William Hosking Oliver and Claudia Orange (Wellington: Allen & Unwin/Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), vol 1, pp 364–365.

93. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 532.

94. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 715.

95. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 414.

Henry Sewell on the Objects of the Native Lands Act 1862

In 1870, Henry Sewell, former premier and Minister of Justice, explained:

The object of the Native Lands Act was two-fold: to bring the great bulk of the lands in the Northern Island which belonged to the Maoris, and which before the passing of that Act, were extra commercium – except through the means of the old land purchase system, which had entirely broken down – within the reach of colonisation. The other great object was the detribalisation of the Maoris – to destroy, if it were possible, the principle of communism which runs through the whole of their institutions, upon which their social system was based, and which stood as a barrier in the way at attempts to amalgamate the Maori race into our social and political system. It was hoped by the individualization of titles to the land, giving them the same individual ownership which we ourselves possessed, they would lose their communistic character, and that their social status would become assimilated to our own.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Sewell, 29 August 1870, NZPD, vol 9, p361; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p669.

including the 1880 Act under which the Aotea–Rohe Potae block was heard in 1886 (see section 10.3.3).<sup>96</sup> Under the 1873 Act, certificates of title were replaced with memorials of ownership that required all owners to be named, abolishing the 10-owner regime.<sup>97</sup> Individual owners were given an undivided but alienable interest, though alienation was subject, at least initially, to some conditions.<sup>98</sup> Essentially, the 1873 Act created a hybrid form of title that was neither truly customary nor a Crown-granted freehold.<sup>99</sup> As discussed in section 10.2.1, previous Tribunals have found that the titles awarded under the 1873 Act made it very difficult for owners to do anything with their land other than sell it.<sup>100</sup>

10.3.2 Māori engagement with the court

As the only forum to secure title, the court was widely used by Māori. Nonetheless, it remained a controversial institution that was the subject of decades of Māori

---

96. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 417.

97. Native Land Act 1873, s 47.

98. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 398.

99. Boast, The Native Land Court 1862–1887, p 99.

100. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 443–444, 446; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 785.

protest.<sup>101</sup> In the minds of many Māori, including those in Te Rohe Pōtae, the court was associated with land alienation.

The court's hearings also became notorious in many districts for the associated activities of greedy storekeepers and land-sharks, as well as social ill-effects for Māori such as drunkenness and poor health. In particular, the court at Cambridge was seen as a site of drunkenness and demoralisation.<sup>102</sup>

All the while, Māori continued to call for either a greater role in the court process or, as with the 'repudiation movement' of the 1870s, abolition of the court entirely. The repudiation movement, led by Hēnare Mātua, emerged in Hawke's Bay in response to Crown and private purchasing tactics in the area. The movement sought to reverse earlier purchases and recover land, or at least obtain a better price. It also called for the abolition of the court.<sup>103</sup>

The movement became influential across the country in the 1870s, including in districts neighbouring Te Rohe Pōtae such as Whanganui and Taupō.<sup>104</sup> Across the North Island, other Māori sought to avoid the court, forming their own rūnanga, komiti, and other bodies to determine title, discuss land matters, and control land communally. Their attempts, however, were thwarted, with the Crown either refusing to grant them legal recognition or actively undermining them.<sup>105</sup>

As discussed in chapter 8, Rewi Maniapoto sought to engage with the Crown in the late 1870s over his concerns about the court. As he saw it, the court granted land to people with lesser interests, allowing them to sell or lease without the knowledge of the rightful owners or rangatira, thereby threatening the eastern border of the aukati.<sup>106</sup> When the Crown failed to provide a meaningful response,<sup>107</sup> he sometimes engaged in court hearings in a defensive capacity, seeking to protect the aukati.<sup>108</sup>

Throughout their 1883–86 negotiations with the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders raised numerous concerns about the court's process. Their 1883 petition raised concerns about lawyers drawing out court processes to force Māori to sell, and about the social costs (including drunkenness) of court attendance.<sup>109</sup>

As well as asking that Māori be left to determine title among themselves, the petition asked for a form of title that reflected the communal rights of iwi and hapū. Iwi and hapū boundaries would be drawn, and subdivision would then stop,

101. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 717.

102. Document A79, p 136; Boast, The Native Land Court 1862–1887, pp 104–108.

103. Document A37 (Anderson), p 169; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 198.

104. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 198.

105. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 291–300; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 2, pp 872–875; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 551–568.

106. Document A78 (Marr), pp 395–400.

107. Document A78, pp 399–401.

108. Document A79, p 52; doc A28 (Thomas), p 246.

109. Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi Maniapoto and 412 others, 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', 26 June 1883, AJHR, J-1, p 1.

although individuals would be named on the title and have their relative interests in the communal land defined.<sup>110</sup>

In subsequent negotiations with the Crown, hapū ownership and management of land remained the preferred position of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. They also argued that judges were ignorant of te reo Māori, and of the relevant history and tikanga, which could result in title being awarded to the wrong people while the real rights holders missed out. And they expressed concern about the court's failure to protect the interests of groups who did not appear before it, and of the lack of adequate appeal processes.

In April 1886, when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori applied to the court for determination of title to their lands, they did so only because the risks of not applying had become too great. Their application was by no means an endorsement of the court, or of its processes or the form of title it represented. Rather, they applied in order to head off other claims that traversed their lands, and thereby keep Te Rohe Pōtae together as one block.

Even then, they applied only after seeking assurances from the Native Minister, John Ballance, that the judge would understand te reo Māori, and that court processes would be fair.<sup>111</sup> Ballance, in response, gave a number of assurances, including that judges would speak te reo.<sup>112</sup> But he took no steps to provide for title to rest with hapū communally, and nor did he honour the wish of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that lawyers would never be allowed in the court.

In essence, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were left to face the court in the hope that they could prevent it from operating in the way they had feared.

10.3.3 Native Land Court process and title by 1886

The Native Land Court's 1886 sitting in Te Rohe Pōtae was conducted under the Native Land Court Act 1880, as amended by other Acts from 1881, 1882, and 1883.<sup>113</sup> The legislation governing the court and its title was subsequently amended several times over the period covered by this chapter.

In exercising most of its powers, the Native Land Court was required to have both a judge and at least one native assessor sitting.<sup>114</sup> In general terms, the role of the assessor was to assist the judge in interpreting tikanga Māori. In addition, for most of the nineteenth century, the assessor's assent was required for a decision of the court to be valid.<sup>115</sup>

The court was further served by a small staff consisting of an interpreter, a clerk, and a registrar (though not always all three), as well as by the surveyors who conducted the surveying required for its work.<sup>116</sup> Before 1 October 1886, lawyers and

---

110. Wahanui, Taonui, Rewi Maniapoto and 412 others, 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', 26 June 1883, AJHR, J-1, p 2.

111. Document A41, p 193.

112. Document A41, p 193.

113. Document A79, p 104.

114. This included, after 1894, the Native Appellate Court.

115. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 11.

116. Document A79, p 406.

agents were largely banned from appearing in court under section 4 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883.<sup>117</sup> Cases were, however, frequently conducted by Māori kaiwhakahaere (conductors) on behalf of the claimants.<sup>118</sup>

By 1886, any Māori could make an application to the court for it to determine title to an area of land. A survey was not required at this stage, but the application did need to describe the boundaries of the claimed block.<sup>119</sup> A full survey plan would need to be drawn up and exhibited before the court could issue a certificate of title.<sup>120</sup>

Under the Native Land Court Act 1880, the Māori claimants and counter-claimants had to prove that they owned the land ‘according to Native custom or usage.’<sup>121</sup> The court had by this stage developed a number of causes of action, referred to as take, to interpret native custom. These included take raupatu (rights derived from conquest), take tupuna (rights derived from ancestry), and take whenua tuku (rights derived from gifts or grants).<sup>122</sup> In practice, however, the court often refused to deal with the detail of occupation rights, ‘based on the thought that customary rights were . . . settled [as] at 1840 or that 1840 provided a starting point for determining Maori freehold title.’ Thus if a hapū or iwi were not in occupation at this point, the court did not look to the reasons why.<sup>123</sup>

In theory, this inability to deal with the intricate nature of customary rights could have been rectified by the Native Committees Act 1883. This was also an opportunity for the Crown to meet Māori demands for more control over their lands. As discussed in chapter 8 (see section 8.4.6.2), under that statute, native committees had the power to inquire into the ownership of blocks, to ascertain successors of deceased owners, and inquire into boundary disputes. But the legislation did not go far enough. The decisions resulting from these inquiries would not be binding, but were to be distributed ‘to the Chief Judge of the . . . [Native Land] Court for the information of the Court.’<sup>124</sup> While the court could choose to consider these decisions, it was not required to take them into account. Rather, it had discretion to decide what criteria or rules it would use to determine ownership of the land, using ‘such evidence as . . . [the court] shall think fit.’<sup>125</sup> The power remained firmly in the hands of the court to make the final decisions.

Thus, the only way that the parties could avoid the court having to determine matters was by reaching out-of-court arrangements. The 1880 Act empowered the court to give effect to ‘any arrangements voluntarily come to amongst the Natives

117. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883, s 4. The Native Land Court Act 1886, which came into effect on 1 October 1886, subsequently made it possible for lawyers and agents to appear in court with the assent of the presiding judge (s 65).

118. Document A79, p 15.

119. Native Land Court Act 1880, ss 16–17, as amended by section 17 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883.

120. Native Land Court Act 1880, ss 26–33.

121. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 24; doc A79, p 105.

122. Document A79, p 105.

123. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu, pp 131–132; doc A79, p 105.

124. Native Committees Act 1883, s 14.

125. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 23; doc A79, p 105.

themselves.’<sup>126</sup> As will be detailed in this chapter, such out-of-court arrangements were a common feature of the court’s operations in Te Rohe Pōtae.

Where it did have to determine ownership, the court first identified the group or groups who had rights in the land, and then the individual owners in whom those rights would be vested. In doing so, the court could divide the block as it saw fit and name the owners for each division.<sup>127</sup>

The form of title awarded by the court in 1886 was still largely based on the provisions of the Native Land Act 1873, which we have discussed (see section 10.3.1). That Act had abolished the 10-owner rule of the 1865 Act and instead granted memorials of ownership that were required to list every Māori with an interest in the land. As discussed in section 10.3.1, this was not true individualisation: interests under the 1873 Act were undivided and held in common, creating ‘a half-way house between customary or collective ownership and individual ownership.’<sup>128</sup> The Turanga Tribunal found that, effectively, the 1873 Act ‘individualised Maori title only for the purpose of alienation’, noting that ‘[f]or every other purpose, it was merely customary land outside English law and commerce.’<sup>129</sup> There was no provision for the collective management of land held under native land title and would not be until 1894 (see section 10.5.1.4).

A few aspects of Native Land Court title had changed by the time the court arrived in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1886. Under the Native Land Court Act 1880, memorials of ownership were renamed certificates of title.<sup>130</sup> This was not a fundamental change: individuals still had to be named on the title, and they, not the collective, were given ownership rights. More significant amendments in 1880 and 1882 allowed individuals to partition out their interests and therefore deal with those interests, removing any remaining trace of community control.<sup>131</sup>

10.3.4 Treaty analysis and findings

We agree with the claimants that the native land legislation needed to provide some form of authority for Māori control over their lands, and a form of modified title to protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands whilst enabling them to engage with the colonial economy. As the Hauraki Tribunal put it, Māori land tenure ‘could not remain static, frozen in 1840 modes’. It had to evolve in response to demographic changes, population movements, and new economic opportunities.<sup>132</sup> Most importantly, as the Central North Island Tribunal found, ‘Maori and

---

126. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 56.

127. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 34.

128. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, p 271.

129. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 443.

130. Boast, The Native Land Court 1862–1887, p 100; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 753. The new certificates of titles continued to ‘have the same force and effect and may be dealt with as a memorial of ownership under the Native Land Act, 1873’ (Native Land Court Act 1880, s 70).

131. Native Land Court Act 1880, ss 43–44; Native Land Division Act 1882, s 12; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 731.

132. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 777.

settlers required certainty in their dealings with each other over land, which in turn required some security of title.<sup>133</sup>

But as with other Tribunals, we consider that in this district the Native Land Court system and title provided to Māori by the Crown was not the solution, nor was tenure conversion necessary. Rather, some modification was all that was needed for those lands that Māori wished to use in the new economy. As the Hauraki Tribunal found, there were ‘many possible options for giving greater clarity and definition to land rights without full-scale tenure conversion and abrogation of the customary base’.<sup>134</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, in their 1883 petition, seemed open to the possibility of a new system and form of title which would bring the required precision and therefore open up new opportunities, while still reflecting the reality that traditional land rights were held communally, in particular by hapū.

But, as was discussed in chapter 8, such an outcome was not compatible with what the Crown and settlers were seeking. We consider that, as in other districts, while the Crown had multiple motivations for converting Māori customary title into individual tradeable shares, its primary motivation was to facilitate the large-scale alienation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori-owned land and its settlement by Europeans.<sup>135</sup> This motivation is evident in the explicit statements of Native Ministers at the time. John Bryce, for instance, told Parliament in 1883 that he considered it ‘highly desirable – indeed almost necessary’ to bring the ‘large tracts of unoccupied [Māori] land in the North Island’ into ‘profitable occupation’.<sup>136</sup> John Ballance, who had himself acknowledged the harm of individualised title, also came to see ‘the individualizing of all native titles’ as necessary for fulfilling his settlement agenda.<sup>137</sup>

Furthermore, by 1886 the effects of the native land laws were very clear, both to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. Māori in other districts had suffered from the effects of dramatic, rapid land alienation, and had seen the negative impact of court title and land loss on tribal cohesion and influence. Indeed, as discussed in chapters 7 and 8, the experiences of Māori in other districts with the court and its title had been a key factor in shaping Te Rohe Pōtae Māori views towards the court and their opposition to its operation in their rohe.

In their negotiations with the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were adamant that they wanted to control the pace and extent of European settlement within their rohe.<sup>138</sup> As well as controlling the process of title determination themselves, they wanted titles to be awarded first on a tribal basis, then a hapū basis. Any individual

133. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 441.

134. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 777.

135. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 778; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 531.

136. Document A41, p 94.

137. ‘Mr Ballance and the Waikato Natives’, New Zealand Herald, 27 January 1885, p 5; doc A41, p 165.

138. For example, see ‘Notes on Native Meetings’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14–16.

interests would be contingent on the underlying title of the blocks sitting with hapū, creating a balance of community and individual interests.

It is significant that, while the Crown made some changes to the court's processes during the 1880s (at least partly in response to the concerns expressed by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori), it made no effort to put in place a form of title that reflected Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' demands. Indeed, as the Crown acknowledged in this inquiry, '[t]here is no evidence that the Crown considered any land tenure options for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori other than that which existed in the Native land legislation that applied at the time.'<sup>139</sup>

Instead, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were left with no choice but to engage with a court that was charged with converting communally held customary title into individual interests. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders may have hoped to avoid the large-scale alienation that had occurred in other parts of the country following engagement with the court, but the form of title was against them.

The Crown's changes to the court process, while generally minor, did address some complaints from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. From 1883, dealings were prohibited until 40 days after title was ascertained to discourage land speculation, the application process was simplified, and alienation restrictions made more difficult to remove. Lawyers and agents were also largely banned from court sittings from 1883, though a subsequent amendment which came into effect on 1 October 1886 allowed them to appear in court with the assent of the presiding judge.<sup>140</sup> The Crown also established the native committee regime, with the potential for committees to have some (albeit limited) input into the title determination process. The extent to which these changes were able to improve the court process and allow Te Rohe Pōtae Māori meaningful input into title determination will be considered in the next section.

Despite the procedural changes, the title that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would receive from the court would be the same as Māori had received elsewhere: all owners would be listed on the certificate of title; all would possess interests in the land, which could be traded without the consent or even knowledge of rangatira and the community; and there would be no provision for tribal title or communal management. With this form of title, the interests of individual owners would remain vulnerable to purchasing agents, all without adequate tribal input or safeguards against alienation.

The Turanga, Hauraki, and Central North Island Tribunals have all found that the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga by imposing this form of title without the consent of the affected Māori communities and thereby undermining communal decision-making about land. This in turn diminished the roles of rangatira in decision-making processes and denied Māori opportunities to

---

139. Submission 3.4.305, p 22.

140. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883, s 4; Native Land Court Act 1886, s 65.

join in the colonial economy by means other than the sale or lease of land.<sup>141</sup> We consider that these findings are also applicable to the claims before us.

10.4 HOW WAS TITLE TO THE INITIAL PARENT BLOCKS AND THE DEFINITION OF RELATIVE INTERESTS DETERMINED?

When the Native Land Court commenced hearings to determine title in Te Rohe Pōtae, Māori were clearly hoping that the reforms made to the court over the previous years had improved its processes and operations, while also reducing its negative effects. However, as the previous section outlined, while the Crown made some minor changes to the court during the 1880s, it left some of their most significant concerns unaddressed. In particular, the extent of involvement the Kawhia Native Committee would have in the title determination process remained unknown, and the form of title awarded by the court remained unchanged.

Drs Husbands and Mitchell conclude that '[i]t is clear that Otorohanga in 1886 did indeed see the nineteenth-century Native Land Court at or near its best'.<sup>142</sup> They also pointed to the 'glowing' assessments of the court's operations by other historians, including Keith Sorrenson and Richard Boast.<sup>143</sup> But they also cast a cautious tone, noting that 'the Native Land Court was still the Native Land Court', and that despite its improvements, 'the sitting in Otorohanga nevertheless betrayed serious flaws'.<sup>144</sup>

As outlined in section 10.2.3, the claimants argued that the changes the Crown made to the court process did not address their fundamental concerns, nor provide for tribal control of the process as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought.<sup>145</sup> By

---

141. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 446; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 784–785; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 537.

142. Document A79, p 137.

143. Document A79, pp 135–136.

144. Document A79, p 139.

145. Submission 3.4.107, pp 28, 32. Several claims alleged that the court's processes for investigating and determining title were inadequate, including: Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 1482 (submission 3.4.154); Wai 1944 (submission 3.4.233); Wai 2014 (submission 3.4.208); Wai 2313; Wai 2314; Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1598 (claim 1.1.146); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 2117 (submission 3.4.161); Wai 399, Wai 577 (submission 3.4.159); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 1455 (submission 3.4.156); Wai 1640 (submission 3.4.191); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 555, Wai 1224 (submission 3.4.163); Wai 845 (submission 3.4.166); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1073 (submission 3.4.207); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1594 (submission 3.4.164); Wai 535 (submission 3.4.243); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submission 3.4.246); Wai 1962 (submission 3.4.172); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249).

contrast, the Crown argued that its changes to the court in Te Rohe Pōtae 'led to an effective title determination process over the following decade'.<sup>146</sup>

This section considers whether the Crown's reforms of the Native Land Court allowed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to play a significant role in the title determination process, as they had sought. It also considers the extent to which the Crown's actions might have influenced the court's process. The section largely focuses on the period between 1886 and 1890, when the court determined ownership of the entire Aotea–Rohe Potae block and then defined the parent blocks within it. The section concludes by considering the court's announcement in 1890 that it would begin defining the relative interests of owners of the land it was dealing with, and whether that decision was influenced by the Crown's commencement of purchasing in the district.

10.4.1 Determining ownership of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block, 1886–87

The Native Land Court's initial hearing of the Aotea–Rohe Potae case opened at Ōtorohanga on 28 July 1886. The hearing was held in 'a large and commodious court house', purpose-built for the occasion by the Kawhia Native Committee.<sup>147</sup> The presiding judge was William Gilbert Mair, while the Māori assessor was Paratene Ngata of Ngāti Porou (father of Apirana Ngata).

Ōtorohanga was the preferred location of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for the court sitting. As well as being the 'principal residence' of Taonui, it was also relatively isolated and therefore far from the public houses that might have otherwise caused trouble. But it was not the preferred location of all the court's participants. Both Waikato Māori and Judge Mair himself had favoured towns like Alexandra (Pirongia), Kihikihi, or Cambridge, where there was more accommodation. Some of the Waikato counter-claimants, who laid claim to the area around Kāwhia Harbour and the northern and eastern portions of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block, were particularly concerned about the court being held in the heart of Ngāti Maniapoto territory. Nonetheless, in line with the wishes of the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori applicants, the hearing proceeded at Ōtorohanga.<sup>148</sup>

Setting the tone for how the court would operate under his tenure, Judge Mair adjourned the court at the outset to encourage the parties to reach out-of-court arrangements concerning the inter-tribal boundaries within the block. Judge Mair told those attending that he was 'willing to afford the people . . . every facility to arrive at some arrangements' in order to 'shorten proceedings'. In the end, however, the parties were unable to reach agreement, and left the question of the boundaries for a later time.<sup>149</sup>

The hearing ran until 20 October. In the nearly three months that the court sat, it heard evidence both from the applicants – Wahanui, Kaahu, Taonui Hikaka, Hone Te One, Tūkōrehu, Hone Omipi, and 62 others, who applied on behalf of

146. Submission 3.4.305, p 7.

147. 'Native Land Court at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 23 October 1886, p 2.

148. Document A79, pp 106–109.

149. Maungatautari 4H (1886) 1 Otorohanga MB, pp 36–38; doc A79, p 111.

Map 10.1: Aotea–Rohe Potae Block

Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Whanganui, and Ngāti Hikairo – and eight Waikato counter-claimants.<sup>150</sup>

In this section, we examine the 1886 hearing of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block

150. There had originally been at least 13 counter-claimants. However, following out of court discussions, many were incorporated into the main claim and so withdrew their individual claims, see doc A79, pp 112–114.

in some detail. The Crown emphasised that the changes it had made to the court process for the 1886 sitting ‘went a considerable way to addressing Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns about the Court.’<sup>151</sup> The claimants, however, cautioned that the 1886 hearing should not be seen as representative of the court’s operation in Te Rohe Pōtae generally.<sup>152</sup> They did not deny that the 1886 sitting saw the court ‘at or near its best’, as observed by Drs Husbands and Mitchell, though they argued this was more a consequence of the efforts of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori than any changes initiated by the Crown.<sup>153</sup> The hearing was clearly a momentous event in the history of the district, and in the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. Significantly, the decision that the Native Land Court reached in 1886 had implications for the decisions that the court made as it subdivided the block over the following decades. The way that the court went about hearing evidence and reaching its decision in 1886 also influenced how the court operated in the district in the years to come.

10.4.1.1 The parties open their cases

Wahanui and Tuao Ihimaera of Whanganui opened the case for the applicants on behalf of the northern and uncontested areas of the block respectively. On behalf of Hikairo, Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui, Wahanui laid claim to the land within the 1883 Rohe Pōtae boundaries, including those areas that had already passed through the court. His claim was based on the take tupuna of Tūrongo (the same tupuna after whom the railway was named) and the 12 subsequent generations of permanent occupation.<sup>154</sup> He further claimed ‘through my kaha in holding the land’ and asserted that ‘all the five tribes have occupied [the land] continuously.’<sup>155</sup>

Several counter-claims were then ‘set up.’ Drs Husbands and Mitchell identified at least 13 counter-claims at this stage. Some of these claims were made by individuals from within the five tribes who based their claims on different ancestors or hapū. Following out-of-court discussions, five such counter-claims were ‘effectively incorporated’ into the applicants’ claim after they added a number of ancestors to the application.<sup>156</sup> The eight counter-claimants who remained and eventually gave evidence in the hearing were largely Waikato. Five laid claim to the northern and eastern portions of the block, an area broadly encompassing the area between ‘the Waikato River to the east and Puketarata and the Waipa River in the west, and the Puniu River and Tuhua ranges in the north and south.’ The counter-claimants to this area were:

- ▶ Te Tumuhuia of Ngāti Hourua and Ngāti Naho;
- ▶ Kaukiuta of Ngāti Wairere, Ngāti Pare, and several other hapū;

---

151. Submission 3.4.305, p 21.

152. Submission 3.4.330, p 16.

153. Submission 3.4.330, p 17.

154. Document A79, p 112.

155. Document A79(a) [Husbands and Mitchell document bank], vol 6, p 2761.

156. Document A79, pp 112–114.

- ▶ Haimona Patara, who represented ‘Ngati Haua, Ngati Koroki and their subsections’;
- ▶ Keremeta Ahunuku of Waikato and the hapū Te Were Koruru, Ngāti Paretenaki, and Ngāti Koura; and
- ▶ Wiremu Te Whitu of Ngāti Hourua.

Two other counter-claimants laid claim to the land around Kāwhia Harbour: Wiremu Te Wheoro on behalf of ‘the people of Kawhia and Waikato generally’ and particularly Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Ngahia, and Harete Te Waharoa, representing Ngāti Hourua. Finally, Mihi Pepene claimed a small piece of land at Kaipihia and Mangauika through ‘ancestry, gift and continuous occupation’.<sup>157</sup>

The presence of so many counter-claims in the hearing was a significant setback for the hopes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about how the process to determine title to their lands would proceed. Rather than the orderly and civil process they had pressed for during their negotiations with the Crown, they were instead confronted with the possibility of a fiercely contested hearing and pitted against groups they had previously regarded as allies.

10.4.1.2 The parties present their evidence

With their prima facie cases established, the applicants and counter-claimants then presented their substantive evidence, both taking 28 sitting days to do so. The counter-claimants presented their cases first, as was standard procedure. They were followed by the applicants, for whom five representatives from Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo gave evidence: Wahanui, Hauauru Poutama, Hone Kaora (John Cowell), Wetere Te Rerenga, and Te Oro Te Hoko.<sup>158</sup>

Wahanui, who had whakapapa connections to both Raukawa and Ngāti Maniapoto, apparently represented Raukawa.<sup>159</sup> His evidence was first delayed and then cut short by illness, though he did eventually return to be cross-examined before the close of the applicants’ case. As the rights of Whanganui and Tūwharetoa were uncontested, they did not appear to present evidence in support of their claims. As noted above, however, Tuao Ihimaera of Whanganui did appear at the beginning of the hearing alongside Wahanui to establish the applicants’ prima facie case, and members of Tūwharetoa attended the hearings.<sup>160</sup> The evidence presented by the counter-claimants and the applicants primarily focused on the areas they were contesting in the northern and eastern portions of the block and around Kāwhia. The inclusion of these areas within the 1883 petition had been the subject of some controversy (see chapter 8). As detailed in chapter 2, these areas had been the subject of intense conflict in the past, particularly in the first half of the nineteenth century. Much of the evidence therefore concerned the

157. Document A79, pp 115–116.

158. Document A79, pp 124–130.

159. Document A85 (Young and Belgrave), pp 274, 278. It appears that Hitiri Te Paerata also attended the hearings at some point, though he did not give evidence.

160. Document A79, p 130; doc A79(g) (Husbands and Mitchell, post-hearing evidence), p 22.

events of that period, and the differing interpretations of the counter-claimants and applicants of their outcomes and significance.

10.4.1.2.1 THE CLAIMS TO THE BLOCK'S NORTHERN AND EASTERN PORTIONS

The Waikato counter-claims concerning the northern and eastern portions of the block were heard first, starting with Te Tumuhuia of Ngāti Hourua and Ngāti Naho. He claimed that, during the 1820s wars, his ancestors had defeated Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Whakaterere, and Ngāti Paiariki and had so conquered the eastern part of the block. Two witnesses then provided further detail: Te Aho-o-te-rangi on the conquest of the area, and Hone Rewiti (John Davis) on their boundaries and settlements on the land.<sup>161</sup>

The cases presented by the other counter-claimants to the east of the block largely followed a similar pattern, with slightly varying accounts of Waikato's conquest and occupation of the area. Keremeta Ahunuku's cross-claim was somewhat different: he claimed the same land as Kaukuita, but largely on the basis of gifting from Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira.<sup>162</sup>

Hauauru Poutama of Ngāti Matakore and Ngāti Maniapoto appeared as a witness for the applicants to respond to the counter-claims concerning the northern and eastern portions of the block. His testimony illustrates some of the dynamics at play in the court process between the applicants and counter-claimants. Hauauru had previously been part of the Kīngitanga's boycott of the court. He attended the hearing, however, to defend his claim to 'Rangitoto, Purakia, Tuhua . . . Wharepuhunga, Huirimoana, Puketarata and Kakepuku'. His claim to the area was absolute:

We are the sole owners of this country from the earliest period, no outside tribes or hapus ever came to interfere with the rights to game, fish & such other things, nor was there any cause for any such attempts, as the ownership over the country was absolutely ours.

By contrast, he asserted that the Waikato counter-claimants 'had no right whatever' to the land. He rejected their accounts of the area's history, claiming that Ngāti Maniapoto hapū had played the key role in battles like Hurimoana, with Waikato hapū playing only a minor role. Waikato, he claimed, had not conquered the land but had needed aid and protection. They had, moreover, only occupied the area after the Waikato war, when 'all the country around here was filled with Waikatos who had retreated before the troops'. He further claimed that Raukawa had not been driven south by Waikato but had responded to Te Rauparaha's call for assistance.<sup>163</sup>

Hauauru was cross-examined by counter-claimants for six days. Drs Husbands and Mitchell characterise this cross-examination as being 'as acrimonious as it was

161. Document A79, pp 116–117.

162. Document A79, p 118.

163. Document A79, pp 125–126.

drawn out', with Hauauru 'displaying great rancour towards his questioners' and the court itself.<sup>164</sup> This was not uncommon. Indeed, despite some improvements to its processes in Ōtorohanga, important aspects of the court's process remained unchanged. By its very nature, the court process encouraged conflict. As a result, relations between the applicants and counter-claimants were – as was the case between Hauauru and the Waikato counter-claimants – frequently rancorous.<sup>165</sup>

10.4.1.2.2 THE CLAIMS TO KĀWHIA

The counter-claims concerning Kāwhia were heard second, beginning with Harete Te Waharoa, who presented Mohi Te Rongomau of Ngāti Hourua and Ngāti Mahanga as a witness. Mohi claimed that several key Waikato hapū – 'Ngati Mahuta, Ngati Te Wehi, Ngati Temaingua, Ngati Patupo, Ngati Pou, Ngati Tipa, Ngati Hine and Ngati Hau' – had defeated Te Rauparaha and settled 'Kawhia, Aotea and Whaingaroa.'<sup>166</sup>

Te Wheoro, presenting on behalf of Waikato, took the largest portion – 10 days – of the counter-claimants' total time. He appeared despite Tāwhiao's opposition to the court and its hearing of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block. Because of Tāwhiao's position, he also 'stood alone', with the kaumatua 'to whom he had looked for support and evidence . . . kept from appearing'. But he participated nonetheless to protect the interests of his people. He gave a detailed account of how Waikato had conquered and occupied Kāwhia. In his account, Waikato had defeated Te Rauparaha and Ngāti Toa and Ngāti Koata at Whenuapo and Te Arawi in 1822, leaving 'none of the original people remaining'. Te Kanawa, Kiwi, Te Wherowhero, and Te Tuhi had then led the settlement of Kawhia, including placing European traders at Kawhia to encourage trade.<sup>167</sup> After Te Wheoro's evidence and cross-examination, Anaru Manuhira Tu Te Ao Te Uira of Ngāti Mahuta and Tuarea Takoke of Ngāti Kiriwai appeared as witnesses in support of his counter-claim, confirming his account of Waikato's conquest and settlement of Kāwhia.<sup>168</sup>

The inclusion of Kawhia within the Aotea–Rohe Potae boundaries – and of Waikato claims within that area – was controversial. On the third day of Te Wheoro's testimony, Whitiora arrived with a message from Tāwhiao calling upon the court to withdraw Kawhia from consideration. Whitiora referred to an 'arrangement' that Ballance and Tāwhiao had met in April 1886 to further discuss the possibility of a 'sitting of the Land Court' in Kāwhia. But Ballance was now, according to Whitiora, unwilling to intervene, and so Whitiora called on the court to consider the King's request. After objections from Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo, however, and with the parties unable to reach an agreement outside of court over the matter, Judge Mair decided to continue the hearing with Kawhia still included. He noted that it was unusual 'for the Court to take out any part

---

164. Document A79, pp 125–126.

165. Document A79, p 141.

166. Document A79, p 118.

167. Document A79, p 120.

168. Document A79, p 123.

of a block without the assent of the claimants'. In this case, they wanted to continue hearing Kawhia. He pledged, however, that all the court's participants would receive 'a fair hearing' and 'that no one's mouth should be shut'.<sup>169</sup>

For the applicants, Hone Kaora (John Cowell) of Ngāti Hikairo gave evidence about their claim to the land from Kāwhia to the Waipā River. He asserted that 'Maniapoto and Ngāti Hikairo [had] an undisputed right to Kawhia from its old ancestor to the present time'. He characterised the hostilities in the region as 'a series of reprisals, amongst the people themselves', after which Waikato had returned home. There had been 'no conquest . . . effected on either side'. He moreover claimed that Ngāti Hikairo, Maniapoto, and Ngāti Apakura had repulsed the attempts of 'lower Waikato' to seize Kāwhia and the flax trade there.<sup>170</sup>

Wētere Te Rerenga, a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira based at Mōkau, gave evidence about the applicants' claim to the south-western portion of the block. But he also spoke at length about the battles regarding Kāwhia, portraying Ngāti Maniapoto – rather than Ngāti Hikairo or Waikato – as the principal actor in Te Rauparaha's defeat. He acknowledged that Waikato had 'entered the country' to join the flax trade with Maniapoto and Hikairo, but claimed that they had left once they had acquired arms. As other applicant witnesses had emphasised, Wētere claimed that only Kiwi and his people had remained in Kāwhia, 'on sufferance' from the actual landowners. In a hint at the damage to inter-tribal relations caused by the court process, Wētere claimed that the Maniapoto, Hikairo, and Waikato alliance had 'only now been severed' by Te Wheoro's counter-claim: 'You have been the cause of this separation . . . no ill feeling would have arisen had you not appeared as claimants . . . we consider you have no grounds of claim and are merely intruding'.<sup>171</sup>

During his cross-examination, Wahanui also characterised Te Rauparaha's departure from Kāwhia as peaceful. He claimed that the transfer of the area from Te Rauparaha to Te Rangituatea had given Maniapoto 'increased mana over it'. He also asserted that Waikato had only arrived after 'the advent of the Pakehas', with the 'greater part' arriving after the Waikato war.<sup>172</sup> In his original evidence, given at the beginning of the applicants' case, Wahanui had stated that he had given 'shelter to those in need' (referring to Waikato), allowing them to 'take shelter in the strong arms of Wahanui'.<sup>173</sup>

10.4.1.2.3 MIHI PEPENE'S CLAIM

The final counter-claimant to be heard was Mihi Pepene, concerning her claim to Mangauika, in the north of the area being investigated. She presented two witnesses. Her brother, Pita Tana, asserted that their family had occupied the land for four generations, and gave evidence of their urupā and pā sites. Aperahama Patene, the second witness and kaiwhakahaere for the case, gave evidence about

---

169. Document A79, pp 121–123.

170. Document A79, pp 126–128.

171. Document A79, pp 128–129.

172. Document A79, pp 129–130.

173. Document A79, p 124.

Te Kanawa's gift of the land to Te Tuhi and his brothers, as well as hapū of Ngāti Pou and Ngāti Mahuta.<sup>174</sup>

Te Oro Te Hoko of Ngāti Ngāwaero, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Matakore presented evidence for the applicants responding to Mihi Pepene's claim to Mangauika. After establishing his own claim to the land by ancestry and occupation, he asserted that Pepene's father, Henry Turner, had been 'placed' on the land rather than gifted it. As evidence of this, Te Oro pointed to various payments that Turner had made for the use of the land and its resources.<sup>175</sup>

10.4.1.3 The court's judgment

After the close of the parties' cases on 13 October, Judge Mair delivered his 15-page judgment on 20 October 1886. His decision largely vindicated the applicants' case. While noting the 'very contradictory evidence' that had been presented, Judge Mair mostly preferred the evidence of the applicants.<sup>176</sup>

In the judgment, Mair first set out the three questions that the court had had to grapple with:

- ▶ First, had the lands of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Whakaterere in the eastern part of the block fallen 'into the possession of Ngāti Haua and its hapū, or of any other Waikato tribe' either by conquest or gift?
- ▶ Secondly, had Waikato 'actually conquered' Te Rauparaha at Kāwhia and then entered 'into sole possession and occupancy'? Or, as the applicants maintained, had 'Te Rauparaha deliberately [abandoned] Kawhia during an interval of peace' and left the land to Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Maniapoto?
- ▶ Finally, regarding Mihi Pepene's claim to Kaipiha, 'Was there a bona fide gift of any part of the land, followed by permanent occupation?'

On the first question, Judge Mair acknowledged that the 'bulk of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Whakaterere' had left the land for Kapiti. But he noted that 'some remained and kept the fire burning', while others were able to return 'and enjoy full possession without hindrance or interference'. As a result, 'there was no conquest of the land' by Waikato, who had 'never exercised mana over this land'. They had 'merely resided on it temporarily as refugees' and had earned no rights to it. He accordingly dismissed most of the counter-claims. Mair made an exception, however, for Te Tumuhua, who was 'entitled to some consideration' through 'his connection with Hauauru'. He was duly awarded 2,000 acres 'at or near' Korakonui.

On the second question, Judge Mair also agreed with the applicants that there had been no conquest at Kāwhia 'according to the strict meaning of the term'. Instead, 'Te Rauparaha and his people went away quietly at a time when there was no fighting', leaving Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hikairo established as 'the principal people' before the Waikato War. The court did, however, recognise that 'Kiwi's people' had rights in certain areas – Kāwhia, Te Taharoa, and Te Awaroa – on the basis of occupation.

174. Document A79, p 123.

175. Document A79, p 129.

176. Document A79, pp 130–131.

Finally, the court upheld Mihi Pepene's claim to Kaipiha. The court found that while the 'claims by ancestry are not made clear', she had 'an undoubted right' based on 'long and continuous occupation'. She and her co-claimants were awarded 2,000 acres.

For the most part, then, the applicants were successful. After the small awards to take account of the successful counter-claimants, the applicants were awarded 'all the balance of the Rohe Potae Block, with the islands of Karewa and Te Motu, excluding such portions as are held under Crown Grant, or have been purchased by the Crown.'<sup>177</sup>

10.4.1.4 Approving the lists of owners

Following the court's judgment, its first piece of business was to approve the lists of owners. This process provided an early demonstration of how the views of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to conflict with the law, and of the limited authority that they actually held in the court process. Consistent with their desire to maintain collective authority, the claimants 'showed a strong desire' to provide the court with a list of iwi and hapū associated with the block, rather than lists of individuals.<sup>178</sup>

Their preference appears to have been partly in response to the presence of native agents and Crown land purchasing officers, including George Wilkinson, during the hearing. As soon the judgment had been passed, these officials had begun canvassing owners about their willingness to sell, much to the consternation of Wahanui and the other tribal leaders.<sup>179</sup> As pointed out by Drs Husbands and Mitchell, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had already witnessed 'in surrounding districts how difficult it was to manage a block with several dozen or several hundred owners, and how vulnerable such a block was to alienation.'<sup>180</sup> Submitting only the names of iwi and hapū, rather than individuals, was obviously an attempt to avoid such a fate, particularly given the size of the Rohe Pōtae block, and the likely number of individual owners.

However, despite the claimants' preference, Judge Mair insisted that they prepare lists of individual owners. His view prevailed, and the parties prepared their lists of individual owners.<sup>181</sup> According to Drs Husbands and Mitchell,

Startlingly little is known about how these lists were compiled. Lists were made and altered both through discussions among the parties outside of the Court or by order of the Court following more formal proceedings where lists were debated, names

177. Document A79, pp 132–133.

178. 'Mr Wilkinson's Report on the Judgment', Waikato Times, 26 October 1886, p 2.

179. Document A79, p 148.

180. Document A79, pp 147–148.

181. 'Mr Wilkinson's Report on the Judgment', Waikato Times, 26 October 1886, p 2; doc A79, p 147.

Aotea–Rohe Potae Case: Hapū and Iwi Listed for Each Block

Te Taharoa block: Waikatos (Ngāti Kaiawhi, Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Karere, Ngāti Amaru, hapū), Ngātitoa – Tūrongo Maniapoto

Te Awaroa block: Waikatos (Ngāti Kiriwai), Ngāti Te Kanawa – Tamainu, Maniapoto – Ngāti Hounuku, Ngāti Korokino, and Ngāti Te Kanawa (Maniapoto)

Kawhia block: Waikatos (Ngāti Ngahia), Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Tapatupo, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Apakura

Rohe Potae block: Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Pourahui, Ngāti Rora, Ngāti Whakaterere, Ngāti Makahori, Ngāti Uekaha, Ngāti Unu, Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Ngututu, Ngāti Pakorotangi, Ngāti Tahinga, Ngāti Tera, Ngāti Kinohaku, Ngāti Werawera (Kapiti), Ngāti Peehi, Ngāti Urumia, Ngāti Rereahu, Te Rereanga's List (including Ngāti Rungaterangi, Ngāti Kauwhakarewa, Ngāti Kaputuhi, Ngāti Hinewai, Ngāti Kahutotara, Ngāti Hekeitewa, Ngāti Kaikaramau, Ngāti Pakorotangi, Ngāti Mihi, Ngāti Tunae, Ngāti Tu, Ngāti Rakei, Ngāti Hineuru, Ngāti Hineuto, Ngāti Parahia, Ngāti Waiora, Ki Herangi hapus), Ngāti Raukawa (and their hapus), Ngāti Matakore, Ngāti Hikairo (and their hapus), Whanganui (and their hapus)

In addition, the Korakonui block was awarded to Tumuhua and his co-claimants, and the Kaipiha block to Mihi Pepene and her co-claimants.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. 2 Ōtorohanga MB 85–161.

objected to and names inserted. The court records reveal little about how the initial lists of owners were prepared and there is little in the minutes to indicate exactly how lists were then modified or names struck out or added in court.<sup>182</sup>

After five sitting days to consider the submitted lists, the court eventually accepted 4,369 names for the Aotea–Rohe Potae case, including at least 3,234 names for what became the Rohe Potae block. At the insistence of the claimants, the lists of individual names were organised by hapū and iwi.<sup>183</sup> At Wahanui's request, 'all the orders' made at the sitting were declared inalienable with 'restrictions against sales, mortgages etc.'<sup>184</sup> The work of confirming ownership lists continued through to 1887, though the court was initially delayed by a Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa boycott (see section 10.7.1).

---

182. Document A79, p 148.

183. Document A79, p 151.

184. Document A79, p 152.

10.4.2 Deciding on next steps

With the ownership lists confirmed, the court's next task was to begin subdividing the block. The normal approach to subdivisions was to deal with applications as they arose. However, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had long envisaged a more controlled, staged approach to the determination of title to their lands. After the boundary of their rohe had been fixed, they first wanted the boundaries between iwi to be determined, then the hapū and individual subdivisions.

As outlined above, in the wake of the 1886 hearing Ngāti Maniapoto were reportedly reluctant to proceed any further, as they were worried that subdividing the block would lead to its alienation.<sup>185</sup> Continuing to prefer that title be granted on a hapū basis, they had also initially resisted naming individual owners to the Aotea–Rohe Potae block, and only relented after Judge Mair insisted that they do so.

By January 1887, they had also apparently accepted that the Rohe Potae block would indeed be subdivided. John Ormsby told Native Minister Ballance that they expected the court would resume later that year by subdividing the block, 'first amongst the tribes and then amongst the hapus'.<sup>186</sup> A year later, in April 1888, Ormsby went further, telling Native Minister Edwin Mitchelson and other members of parliament and officials that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori now wanted individual titles. Ormsby's views were not shared by other leaders at the same meeting. Herekiekeie, for instance, made a new call for hapū title and control over land.<sup>187</sup> Indeed, Ormsby himself expressed notable reluctance in calling for individualisation, which he seemed to view as now being inevitable. He noted that 'however much the natives round here were satisfied with the hapu titles, if the majority outside desired it, it would be better to bow to their wishes and have them individualised'.<sup>188</sup> Ormsby's comments about individualisation were also part of his broader argument that the native land laws needed to 'bear lightly on all', and particularly that the Crown should not have an exclusive purchasing right.<sup>189</sup>

There are several explanations for why Te Rohe Pōtae Māori appear to have changed their mind on subdividing the Rohe Potae block. Wilkinson later postulated that their original opposition had been 'for the purpose of preventing sales, &c., and to keep the power in the hands of the chiefs'. But having found that the court could not award the land to iwi and hapū only, they had furnished lists of owners. From here, he wrote, 'commenced the jealousy, ill-feeling, bickerings, and quarrelling that finally resulted in their subdividing the original large block, with over four thousand five hundred owners, into numerous small blocks, with separate lists of owners for each'.<sup>190</sup>

---

185. Document A79, p 180.

186. Document A79, pp 180–181.

187. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

188. Document A79, pp 182–183.

189. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

190. Document A79, p 184.

As with the original decision to go to the court in 1886, control over the court process was likely a key consideration for the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders. Due to an amendment in 1886, any Māori could now initiate a partition, with or without the sanction of the community of owners or its leaders.<sup>191</sup> This presented an unacceptable risk to the tribal leadership. They therefore strove to maintain control of the process and to proceed with subdivision in an orderly fashion. They likely also realised that one block of 1.6 million acres, with 4,500 owners, would be unmanageable.<sup>192</sup>

At the January 1887 hui, Ormsby had also expressed his concern about the Crown purchasing interests in Māori land before title had been ascertained. Ormsby requested that ‘the settling [of native land sales] should be prohibited until the titles had been individualised’.<sup>193</sup> In response, Ballance assured Māori that ‘[t]he Government would not purchase any land until the sub-divisions had been made’.<sup>194</sup>

Other than contemporary newspaper reports, no written record of this commitment appears to exist, and there was later disagreement between Crown officials and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over its meaning. Loveridge argued that ‘the bureaucracy in Wellington took note of his promise, and honoured it’. When the Crown commenced purchasing two years later, having ‘decided that sufficient progress with sub-division had been made’, T W Lewis ‘considered [it] necessary’ to write a formal letter to Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauauru to inform them of the Crown’s intentions.<sup>195</sup> Hauauru, however, had apparently interpreted Ballance’s assurance to mean that the Crown would wait for all subdivisions to be completed before starting purchasing. Wilkinson – who had been present at the January 1887 hui – assured Lewis that he had ‘never heard any Minister propose, or agree . . . not to commence purchase until the portion of each hapu was subdivided and surveyed into a separate block’.<sup>196</sup> Given the context in which the commitment was made, however, as a response to Ormsby requesting a halt to sales until titles had been individualised, we do not consider Hauauru’s interpretation to be unreasonable. Ultimately, this appears to have been yet another assurance given by the Crown that it did not keep.

10.4.3 Defining the iwi and hapū subdivisions

After providing a brief overview of the court’s work in defining the iwi and hapū subdivisions of the Rohe Potae block, this section considers several aspects of the court’s process. In doing so, it assesses the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were able to be involved in the court’s decision-making and to influence its operations during title determination.

---

191. Document A79, pp184–185.

192. Document A79, pp185–186.

193. Document A79, pp180–181.

194. Document A68 (Loveridge), pp81–82.

195. Document A68, p82.

196. Document A79, pp220–221.

10.4.3.1 Overview

In November 1887, Judge Mair adopted the approach requested by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and particularly by Wahanui, Te Rerenga, and Hauauru. The Rohe Potae block would be subdivided on a tribal basis first, proceeding to hapū and individual divisions at a later time.<sup>197</sup>

The court began working on the tribal divisions of the Rohe Potae block in April 1888. The boundary between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Rangatahi was resolved easily, the parties having already agreed outside of court. After further time was allowed for discussion between the parties, the division between Ngāti Maniapoto and Raukawa was also resolved within a matter of days.<sup>198</sup>

The Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo boundary, however, was the subject of considerable disagreement. Along with Raukawa, Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo shared common ancestors, making it difficult to set a firm boundary between the two's respective areas of interest. Out-of-court discussions, despite several adjournments, did not resolve the dispute. John Ormsby, acting as Ngāti Hikairo's spokesperson, concluded that further 'open air meetings' would not help and referred the dispute back to the court. The resulting 44-day hearing across two months in 1888 involved not just the claimants Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Paiariki, but also seven counter-claimants.<sup>199</sup> At the conclusion of this hearing, the court awarded Ngāti Hikairo 'all the western part of the land under claim (from Pirongia to Kawhia).'<sup>200</sup> This prolonged hearing provided an early indication of what could happen when Māori did not reach agreement outside of court.

With the tribal boundaries confirmed, the court next began a task that would continue for more than a decade: the creation of the internal – hapū – subdivisions. Large areas of land passed through the court easily, their ownership having been agreed outside of court. In 1888, this occurred with areas like Hauturu East and West, Kinohaku East, Puketarata, and Tokanui. In these cases, the court's main task was to check and process lists of owners.<sup>201</sup>

Other areas, however, were bitterly contested. In the early period of the court's subdivision work, some of the most contentious cases were Otorohanga and Kawhia.<sup>202</sup> The Otorohanga case involved numerous counter-claimants. With every part of the block contested, the court hearing eventually took 42 days.<sup>203</sup> The Kawhia block, meanwhile, had originally been granted to both Waikato and Ngāti Hikairo. But with the parties unable to agree on the block's division, the court ordered its own division.<sup>204</sup>

197. Document A79, p 175.

198. Document A79, pp 162–163.

199. Document A79, pp 162–163. The counter-claimants included 'representatives of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Matakoe, Ngāti Makahore and Ngāti Ngawaero'.

200. Document A79, p 164.

201. Document A79, p 164.

202. Document A79, pp 164, 166–167.

203. Document A79, p 164.

204. Document A79, p 165.

Even with out-of-court arrangements increasing the pace of the court's work, subdividing the Rohe Pōtae block remained an immense task. A large number of subdivisions passed through the court in a short period: between July and December 1888, the court defined 25 subdivisions.<sup>205</sup> Despite this steady progress, the overall subdivision of the block proceeded slowly; it was not until the mid-1890s that most of the land to the west of the railway line was partitioned. That, of course, still left most of the land to the railway's east undivided, including the enormous 603,355-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua block. The subdivision case for that block, initially resulting in 80 individual partitions, extended over three years between 1897 and 1900 (see section 10.5.1.1).<sup>206</sup>

As will be discussed further in section 10.5.2, subdivisions were themselves often subject to further partitioning, either initiated by the owners or, later, as a result of Crown purchasing. In 1889, Judge Mair complained that 'As fast as I settle one big block, applications come for subdivision of it.'<sup>207</sup> This kind of partitioning was a considerable cause of concern to the Crown and its purchasing ambitions during this period. Wilkinson, for one, considered it 'absolutely necessary' that the new subdivisions be surveyed before purchasing commence. The continued partitioning of the parent subdivisions therefore represented a potential brake on the pace by which the Crown could begin to acquire Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land.<sup>208</sup>

10.4.3.2 Role of the Kawhia Native Committee

As discussed in chapter 8, when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agreed to let the Native Land Court into their rohe in 1886, they understood that the Kawhia Native Committee – formed in 1884 under the Native Committees Act 1883 – would play a role in the court process, particularly at the subdivision stage. They had been encouraged in this understanding by Native Minister Ballance, who had assured them during the railway negotiations of February 1885 that the powers of the committees would be increased. However, no further changes were ever made to the native committee system to expand their powers.

The claimants submitted that the weaknesses of the native committee regime meant that the Kawhia Native Committee 'failed to provide a viable alternative to the Native Land Court in the district.'<sup>209</sup> The committee 'received neither the authority nor the resources to act in accordance with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori aspirations.'<sup>210</sup>

The Crown made several submissions on native committees. On the one hand, it submitted that '[t]he Native Committees Act 1883 . . . provided the opportunity for Rohe Pōtae Māori to use the Kawhia Native Committee as a means to reach decisions about ownership and interests in the Aotea–Rohe Pōtae block and to 205. Document A60 (Berghan), pp 87–89.

206. Document A79, pp 283–284.

207. Document A79, p 167.

208. Document A79, p 216.

209. Submission 3.4.107, p 29.

210. Submission 3.4.107, p 81.

Map 10.2: Internal subdivisions of the Aotea-Rohe Potae block report those decisions to the Native Land Court for its information.<sup>211</sup> However, the Crown also accepted that the statements Native Minister Ballance made in 1885 about his ‘intentions and expectations’ to give further powers to the native committees in the Native Land Court process ‘gave Rohe Pōtae Māori sufficient reassurance to agree, subject to conditions, to the construction of the NIMTR through their district.’<sup>212</sup> The Crown conceded that it then breached the Treaty in failing ‘to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it did not fulfil’ those representations.<sup>213</sup>

While the Kawhia Native Committee was one of the more active and influential native committees, the evidence available indicates that it played only a very minimal role in the court’s activities within Te Rohe Pōtae. As mentioned above, the committee built the Ōtorohanga venue for the Native Land Court’s sitting, but otherwise played no role in the initial title determination of the Aotea–Rohe Pōtae block. This was not unexpected. Before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori filed their application for the court to investigate title in late April 1886, the committee had resolved to wait until the court’s investigation was complete before hearing the applications it had received to that point. As Orsmy had told Ballance that month, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had wanted ‘to investigate the title and settle it amongst themselves by the native committees, but found they had not the power to do so, and they were now asking themselves what they ought to do.’<sup>214</sup>

Nonetheless, despite the Kawhia Native Committee’s exclusion from the 1886 hearing, it was clear that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had expected the committee would play a greater role at the subdivision stage. In the end, however, the committee undertook only one investigation into the ownership of a block within Te Rohe Pōtae, and that occurred before the court’s initial hearing was even complete. In January 1886, the committee had received an application from Hariwhenua and others to determine the ownership of the Mangamahoe block. After deferrals for the parties to assemble their cases and for bereavement, the committee held a hearing and reached a decision on the claim on 2 June 1886.<sup>215</sup> This was after Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had lodged their application with the Native Land Court, but before the court’s Aotea–Rohe Pōtae hearing began.

Three years later, the Kawhia Native Committee’s investigation into Mangamahoe was mentioned by the Native Land Court in its Kakepuku–Pokuru judgment (this block included Mangamahoe). The court did not explicitly endorse the committee’s finding in the Mangamahoe case, but does appear to have used it as evidence for its own decisions.<sup>216</sup> It also referred to testimony Te Maaha Hikuroa and Tupotahi gave to the committee to highlight the differences in the evidence they gave to the court. Although this kind of ‘assistance’ to the court was clearly envisaged by the Native Committees Act 1883, as we saw in chapter 8, Te

---

211. Submission 3.4.305, p 25.

212. Submission 3.4.305, p 28.

213. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

214. Document A79, p 69.

215. Document A79, p 69.

216. Document A60, p 203.

Rohe Pōtae Māori had assumed that the Kawhia Native Committee would play a much more significant role in the title determination process, particularly at the subdivision stage.

The committee had also received requests to investigate the ownership of five other blocks in late 1885 and early 1886, but it appears that it never did so. The committee met for the final time in February 1887 to confirm previous minutes. With no substantive role for the committee in the title determination process, it appears that the decision to go to court in 1886 fatally undermined the committee's relevance. Its final meeting coincided with the decision of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders to allow the court to continue with passing lists of owners to the initial divisions of the Aotea–Rohe Pōtae block. Drs Husbands and Mitchell surmise that this decision superseded their earlier expectation that the committee would play a role in subdivision of the block.<sup>217</sup> It also likely ruled out any revival of the committee. In the end, the expectation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that they would have control over the title determination process through the Kawhia Native Committee was never realised, a consequence of the inadequacy of the 1883 legislation.

The fate of the Kawhia Native Committee after its February 1887 meeting is unclear. John Ormsby, chairman of the committee, remained active. He was involved in negotiating compensation for land takings arising from the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway, as well as in negotiating resource rights, into the 1890s.<sup>218</sup> He also appears to have acted as a conductor in the Native Land Court for several cases after 1888. But Drs Husbands and Mitchell recorded that 'there is no indication that he did this in his capacity as chair.'<sup>219</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal observed that the committees formed under the Native Committees Act 1883 'failed because they were created in such a way that they were unworkable.'<sup>220</sup> Similarly, we do not consider that the Crown set up the Kawhia Native Committee to succeed. As discussed in chapter 8, it covered a large, disparate area, but was not established in a manner that ensured equitable representation for all of the district's iwi and hapū. Moreover, it lacked the statutory powers it needed to meet the aspirations of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, particularly for title determination, and was poorly resourced to discharge the limited functions that it did have. The lack of authority afforded to the native committees was criticised by Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira at the time, and was later singled out by the 1891 Commission on Native Land Laws (the Rees–Carroll commission). As seen in chapter 8, the commissioners criticised the 1883 Act as 'a hollow shell' that 'mocked and still mocks the Natives with a semblance of authority.'<sup>221</sup>

The decline in the activities of the Kawhia Native Committee was mirrored elsewhere, and for similar reasons. Wilkinson reported in June 1888 that the native committees elected in Waikato were languishing due to the court and the effects of

---

217. Document A79, pp 69–70.

218. Document A20 (Cleaver and Sarich), pp 103–107.

219. Document A79, p 187.

220. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 317.

221. Document A79, p 188.

individualisation.<sup>222</sup> By the time the Native Committees Act was repealed in 1902, it had been ‘a virtual dead letter’ for most of the preceding decade.<sup>223</sup>

10.4.3.3 Out-of-court arrangements

With the Kawhia Native Committee unable to play the role that they had envisaged, out-of-court arrangements were the main way for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to influence the court’s decision-making during this period. From the earliest days of its operations in Te Rohe Pōtae, the Native Land Court encouraged Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to reach agreement outside of court. As noted above, Judge Mair allowed time for arrangements to be struck before the initial 1886 hearing and then granted successive adjournments to further encourage Māori to reach agreements outside of court.<sup>224</sup> This practice continued throughout the period under examination in this chapter and was particularly important during the period when iwi and hapū subdivisions were being defined.

The Crown argued out-of-court arrangements were potential remedies for a number of alleged problems with the court and its processes, including its ability to appropriately recognise whakapapa and tikanga.<sup>225</sup> Counsel also pointed out that out-of-court arrangements were a common feature of the Ōtorohanga court.<sup>226</sup> In response, the claimants argued that this proved ‘that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were able to agree amongst themselves the boundaries of their hapū and whanau.’<sup>227</sup>

Reaching agreement outside of court could be a difficult and prolonged process. Drs Husbands and Mitchell concluded that this was largely because ‘traditional tribal relations over land did not translate directly or easily into the sort of titles that the court dealt in.’<sup>228</sup> When owners could not do so and failed to reach consensus outside of court, the result all too often was a long, acrimonious hearing. For instance, as mentioned above, while other tribal boundaries had been able to be resolved out of court, the boundary between Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo had to be resolved by the court after discussions between the parties failed, the court case eventually taking 44 sitting days over two months.<sup>229</sup>

That noted, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori struck out-of-court arrangements for almost every kind of case the court considered: title investigations, boundaries, the allocation of relative interests, and succession cases.<sup>230</sup> They did so through a variety of forums, including both informal hui and more formal hui of tribal committees. In these contexts, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori seem to have relied heavily on kaumātua

---

222. Document A20, p 107.

223. Vincent O’Malley, Agents of Autonomy: Maori Committees in the Nineteenth Century (Wellington: Huia, 1998), p 287.

224. Document A79, p 137.

225. Submission 3.4.305, pp 35, 40, 43.

226. Submission 3.4.305, p 26.

227. Submission 3.4.330, p 11.

228. Document A79, p 197.

229. Document A79, pp 163, 197.

230. Document A79, pp 408–409.

to make the appropriate divisions between groups, drawing on their knowledge of history and traditions.<sup>231</sup> Drs Husbands and Mitchell pointed to two particular examples of the role of kaumātua in these discussions:

in Kinohaku East . . . the boundaries of the subdivision were ‘talked over’ and eventually fixed ‘by the Kaumatua.’ It also held for Whakairoiro where Hariwhenua conceded to Te Anga’s request that his application regarding the block should first ‘be referred to the elders’ of the Ngati Ngawaero hapu ‘as they had not been consulted.’<sup>232</sup>

Because these discussions occurred outside of court, there is very little record of how these arrangements were struck. The minute books also reveal very little about how the court processed out-of-court agreements and whether it inquired into them to ensure that they were consistent with ‘Native custom or usage’, as the native land legislation required, or that all the entitled owners had been involved in the discussions. Cases that had been subject to out-of-court agreements were sometimes appealed later, with appellants claiming that the agreements had been reached by unfair processes.<sup>233</sup>

Out-of-court arrangements were not simply a court-driven initiative. By reaching agreements themselves outside of court, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could influence the court’s decision-making process to at least some degree. The court was largely happy to accept the arrangements Māori had made. In those cases where it was, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were effectively able to decide matters relating to land themselves, albeit within the context and demands of the Crown’s native title system. If successful, out-of-court arrangements could also dramatically decrease the amount of time required for court hearings. As a result, court fees – examined in more detail in section 10.6.1 – were also reduced.

Out-of-court arrangements also ensured the smooth and efficient operation of the court. The court, only ever a small operation, would not have been able to function efficiently or effectively without out-of-court arrangements. They reduced not only the time and resources taken up by hearings, but also allowed the court to avoid getting bogged down in contentious cases that it found difficult to adjudicate. The benefit of out-of-court arrangements to the court’s work was recognised by Judge Walter Edward Gudgeon, who in 1898 told court participants that the court’s ‘one way’ of dealing with cases was ‘to leave it to the people . . . in the first place’ to settle things themselves.<sup>234</sup> The court frequently implored the parties to ‘come to terms as far as possible’ or ‘to settle the matter outside if possible’. Judges not only allowed adjournments to enable parties to discuss matters outside of the courtroom but sometimes ordered them to do so.<sup>235</sup>

---

231. Document A79, pp195–196.

232. Document A79, pp195–196.

233. See, for example, document A79, pp 409–411.

234. Rangitoto Tuhua (1898) 33 Otorohanga MB 313; doc A79, p 406.

235. Document A79, pp196–197.

This all suggests that, despite the claims of Crown officials and colonial observers to the contrary, the process of deciding land matters could be left to Māori and still largely proceed smoothly. Indeed, it also suggests that formal recognition of Māori consensual decision-making might have led to less disharmony in the court process itself. Had the Crown amended the native committee regime along the lines advocated by Ballance in 1885, the committees could have provided such recognition, albeit with recourse to the court remaining for contested or appealed cases.

There are numerous examples of successful out-of-court arrangements being reached in Te Rohe Pōtae during this period. In the Hauturu West subdivision case in 1888, for instance, the ownership of most blocks was determined outside of court, and relatively quickly, with all four subdivisions passing through the court within three days. Only Hauturu West 1 faced a delay, with the case stood over for a night until agreement was struck. The lists of owners for the Hauturu West blocks were then passed within a week.<sup>236</sup>

However, the main problem was that out-of-court arrangements had no legal standing under the native land laws. The court certainly encouraged out-of-court arrangements and, under the native land legislation, it was allowed to give effect to any voluntary arrangements reached by the parties outside of the court.<sup>237</sup> However, as with decisions of the native committees, the court was under no legal compulsion to adhere to out-of-court arrangements and remained the final decision maker.

Drs Husbands and Mitchell argued that, because of this, parties were incentivised to go to court if they were unhappy with the agreements reached outside of court, and as a result, ‘they could . . . drag all parties into the Court.’<sup>238</sup> For the Otorohanga subdivision case, for example, Henry Edwards told the court that one meeting to reach an agreement outside of court had ‘only lasted about five minutes’ before one of the parties, Te Hauparoa, had left ‘in anger’. Te Hauparoa had resolved ‘that the matter must be decided by the Court.’<sup>239</sup> The case eventually took 42 hearing days.<sup>240</sup>

We agree with the Central North Island Tribunal that ‘it was up to Maori to decide how they would resolve . . . disputes’ and that the Crown’s role was ‘to provide their arrangements with legal force.’<sup>241</sup> We consider that a more robust system – whereby the committees could have exercised full, final determination roles with appeal rights for contested cases – would have been fairer and ensured that Māori were the arbiters of their title system.

---

236. Document A79, pp190–191.

237. For example, under section 56 of the Native Land Court Act 1880.

238. Document A79, p 527.

239. Document A79, p 199.

240. Document A79, p 164.

241. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 299.

10.4.3.4 Location and timing of hearings

The court had the potential to be a significant presence in the lives of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, particularly in the critical period when the boundaries and ownership of parent blocks were being determined. The location and timing of its hearings had a direct bearing on how much Māori would be inconvenienced by its operations. Although Te Rohe Pōtae Māori often had input into where and when the court sat, these matters were ultimately decided by the judge.

As discussed in section 10.2.3, the claimants raised concerns about the location, timing, and notification of court sittings in Te Rohe Pōtae. The location of hearings, they argued, forced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'to incur significant and unreasonable costs' (see section 10.6.3).<sup>242</sup> The timing and notification of hearings, meanwhile, 'did not allow for proper (and on occasion any) participation by the relevant parties.'<sup>243</sup> The Crown argued that the location of court sittings was decided by the court itself following submissions from Māori, and that the court's location 'met substantially the wishes of Rohe Pōtae Māori.'<sup>244</sup> Counsel also pointed out that Judge Mair 'sought to minimise disruption to communities by not sitting during harvesting periods,' and frequently granted adjournments.<sup>245</sup>

The court mostly sat at Ōtorohanga during the period between 1886 and 1890. On the urging of Wahanui, Te Rerenga, Hauauru, and other rangatira, Judge Mair agreed in late 1887 that sittings in Ōtorohanga would only deal with business related to Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>246</sup> On at least one occasion, from January to March 1889, the court sat in Kāwhia to deal with several nearby blocks, including the Kawhia block itself. This was presumably done for the convenience of the owners in the affected blocks, though the start of the sitting was nonetheless delayed for a week to allow for interested parties to arrive.<sup>247</sup>

A particular issue relating to the timing of Native Land Court hearings concerns how the court accommodated planting and harvesting seasons. Court sittings held during spring, late summer, and autumn could take Māori away from their cultivations at critical times. During this period, Judge Mair was willing to accommodate the wishes of Māori around harvest time and to adjourn sittings on request. In 1887, for instance, the court did not open until 1 March in order to allow the parties to complete their harvest.<sup>248</sup>

Once a hearing was underway, the court could adjourn proceedings for a number of reasons. The court frequently granted adjournments to allow for further discussion outside of court, both on its own initiative and at the request of Māori. Adjournments were also made to allow parties time to prepare, to hold hui, and to wait for the arrival of interested parties. The court did not always grant the adjournments that Māori sought. In response, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sometimes

---

242. Submission 3.4.107, p 88.

243. Submission 3.4.107, p 87.

244. Submission 3.4.305, pp 54–55.

245. Submission 3.4.305, pp 8, 56.

246. Document A79, p 175.

247. Document A79, p 165.

248. Document A79, pp 174–175.

used the strategy of refusing to attend court. When Wahanui's brother Te Wiwini died in May 1890, for instance, Judge Mair granted only a weekend adjournment, despite a request from Wahanui and Taonui for a longer period. In protest, 'the overwhelming majority' of Māori did not attend court for nearly two weeks, a significant demonstration of the mobilisation and cohesion of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at this time.<sup>249</sup>

10.4.3.5 Role of judges

While Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were able to influence the court's process and decision-making in some respects, the judge remained the central figure in the Native Land Court process. Tasked with a range of roles pertaining to the ownership of Māori land, the judge remained the ultimate decision maker on most matters, both procedural and substantive.

The claimants accepted that the judges who served in Te Rohe Pōtae were familiar with Māori, but cautioned that colonial society struggled 'to produce judges who were competent in law, whakapapa and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tikanga'.<sup>250</sup> They further argued that the native land legislation constrained the judges.<sup>251</sup> In the Crown's view, the judges about whom biographical information is available 'were highly suitable candidates to be judges'.<sup>252</sup> The Crown recognised that judges had to deal with complex and contradictory evidence, but argued this 'would likely have arisen in any forum'. In that context, the preference of judges for 'accommodation and compromise' was inevitable.<sup>253</sup>

By the time he arrived to preside over the Ōtorohanga court, Judge William Gilbert Mair had had a long career in public service. Most recently a presiding judge in Taupō, he had served as a soldier during the invasion of the Waikato and had played 'a leading role in the fighting at Rangiaowhia and Orakau'. Afterwards, he had been a resident magistrate in a number of areas and had led campaigns against Te Kooti in Te Urewera. He acted as resident magistrate and native agent in the Waikato during the 1870s and apparently had 'an extensive and intimate acquaintance with native affairs' in the area. He was also known as 'an accomplished Maori linguist'. As discussed in section 10.3.2, in response to concerns from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that judges should be fluent in te reo, Ballance had undertaken that a Māori-speaking judge would hear the Aotea–Rohe Potae application.<sup>254</sup>

Judge Mair seems to have played a pivotal role in the approach taken by the Ōtorohanga court during its first few years of operation. Drs Husbands and Mitchell stated:

249. Document A79, p 180.

250. Submission 3.4.107, p 83.

251. Submission 3.4.107, p 84.

252. Submission 3.4.305, p 45.

253. Submission 3.4.305, p 46.

254. 'William Gilbert Mair,' in A Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed Guy H Scholefield, 2 vols (Wellington: Department of Internal Affairs, 1940), vol 2, pp 46–47; doc A79, pp 106–107.

There is little doubt that the Court presided over by Judge Mair in Otorohanga was more amenable to Maori input and influence than earlier courts. To an important and perhaps unprecedented degree, iwi and hapū leaders were able to set the agenda of the Court and control the movement of land through its process.

They cautioned, however, that 'such control remained within strict limits. Ultimate power remained with the judge.'<sup>255</sup> Although he was often willing to accommodate the parties appearing before the court, Judge Mair remained willing to exert his control over the process if he considered it necessary. As will be discussed in section 10.7.1.1, he did so when Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa boycotted the court in 1887 and again in early 1888. Further, despite the agreement that Europeans should not take part in court proceedings, and the protests of some Māori participants, in October 1889 Judge Mair allowed WH Grace to act on behalf of claimants to the Tokanui block.<sup>256</sup> He was able to do so due to an 1886 amendment that gave presiding judges the discretion to approve appearances by counsel.<sup>257</sup> As these examples demonstrate, the judge remained the ultimate decision maker on court procedure.

On the whole, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori seem to have liked and respected Judge Mair. Kingi Wētere and four others told Ballance in May 1891 that Mair 'was well acquainted with all matters affecting the Rohe Potae and our cases' and that he was the only judge able to 'deal with questions touching the Rohe Potae.'<sup>258</sup> This does not detract from the main point, however, that the legislation gave him the ultimate authority.

10.4.3.6 Role of assessors

Judge Mair was assisted in his work by a Māori assessor. At his meeting with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at Kihikihi in April 1886, Native Minister Ballance had reassured Māori that 'no objectionable assessors' would be allowed to sit on the court in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>259</sup> To avoid accusations of bias, Māori assessors were usually selected from outside the district. They were, however, generally men of standing within their own communities or on a national basis.<sup>260</sup> While the claimants did not submit directly on the role of assessors in the court process, the Crown described them as 'an important feature of the Native Land Court regime.'<sup>261</sup>

Two assessors served on the Ōtorohanga court from 1886 to 1890: Paratene Ngata from 1886 to 1889, and Nikorima Poutotara in 1890. The father of Apirana Ngata, Paratene Ngata was a Ngāti Porou leader who had fought with Ropata Wahawaha against adherents of Pai Marire on the East Coast and then against

---

255. Document A79, p 223.

256. Document A79, p 175.

257. Native Land Court Act 1886, s 65.

258. Document A79, p 234.

259. 'Mr Ballance and the Natives', Waikato Times, 20 April 1886, p 4

260. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 404.

261. Submission 3.4.305, p 46.

Te Kooti. He had served as an assessor on the Native Land Court in other districts throughout the 1870s and 1880s.<sup>262</sup> Nikorima Poutotara, meanwhile, was a leader of Ngāti Maru and the son of Riwai Te Kiore. Upon his death in 1903, he was described as ‘a diplomatist of no mean order.’<sup>263</sup>

The available evidence indicates that the assessors played a reasonably active role in the court’s process between 1886 and 1890. Drs Husbands and Mitchell contended that they played ‘a more significant role . . . than that of assessors in many other places.’<sup>264</sup> Ngata and Poutotara frequently cross-examined witnesses, checked witness testimony against evidence given in earlier cases, inspected disputed lands, set boundaries, wrote decisions in te reo Māori, and attempted to mediate disputes between the parties outside of court.<sup>265</sup>

Ngata saw his role as ‘understanding the truth and falsehood of the korero’ given in court. To do so, he cross-checked evidence against previous cases and looked ‘at the character of the speakers who were before the Court, if they were a truthful person or a person whose character had been seen in other Courts.’<sup>266</sup> During the Otorohanga-Orahiri case, for instance, Ngata cross-examined witnesses, ‘questioning them sometimes at considerable length on the detail of their evidence and the key points of their claims.’ Later, he was involved in attempting to resolve disputes over Otorohanga by guiding the parties’ discussions outside of court and inspecting the disputed area.<sup>267</sup>

Such was the extent of the involvement of the assessors in this early period that Ngata would later claim, in an unpublished memoir, that he had ‘the greatest task’ in the court’s work, including in making decisions. However, it was his ‘friend [Judge Mair who] had the greatest money and honour for most of the work the two of us completed.’<sup>268</sup> This suggests that, although the work of the court could not have proceeded without the assessors, and although individual judges like Judge Mair seemed to rely on them, the court regime as established by the Crown gave assessors only a limited role to play. The assessors were no substitute for greater Te Rohe Pōtae Māori involvement in the court’s decision-making.

10.4.3.7 Recognition of customary interests

Native Land Court titles were not intended to reflect customary tenure exactly, but rather to simplify the diverse range of customary rights to land into a form more suited for engagement with the colonial economy. Nonetheless, the court was still required to reach its decisions ‘according to Native custom or usage’.

---

262. Steven Oliver, ‘Paratene Ngata’, in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed William H Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), pp 310–311.

263. ‘Personal’, Auckland Star, 9 September 1903, p 2; ‘Local and General News’, New Zealand Herald, 14 September 1903, p 4.

264. Document A79, pp 204–205.

265. Document A79, pp 205–206.

266. Document A79, pp 206–207.

267. Document A79, pp 205–206.

268. Document A79, pp 206–207.

The claimants identified several aspects of Native Land Court processes and titles that they said distorted the court's recognition of customary rights. In particular, they alleged that the adversarial nature of the court process distorted the evidence presented and promoted conflict which damaged intra-hapū relationships.<sup>269</sup> They submitted further that 'a good deal of the responsibility lay with the tenure system', as it 'insisted upon clear divisions and distinct lists of owners even when the situation on the ground remained multiple and fluid'.<sup>270</sup> Overall, the claimants considered that '[t]he Native Land Court was a totally inappropriate vehicle to determine Māori customary rights and interests'.<sup>271</sup>

While Crown counsel accepted that parties before the court possibly presented evidence 'in the way that would best suit their case', they argued that the court would have likely been 'alert to such techniques'. They further argued that the adversarial system had the advantage of allowing challenges to evidence so that a fuller picture might be presented.<sup>272</sup> Counsel further submitted that out-of-court arrangements would have allowed tikanga to be reflected in court decisions.<sup>273</sup> The Crown accepted that its native land legislation 'did not provide for the overlay of residual rights from the customary system it replaced', but also contended that it did not prevent Māori from 'continuing to recognise shared, overlapping and usufructuary rights if they chose to do so and it remained practicable to do so'.<sup>274</sup>

Where the parties were unable to reach out-of-court arrangements, the job of determining customary ownership was left to the court's European judge and Māori assessor. Unpicking these competing claims was rarely a simple task, particularly for outsiders to the district. Part of the difficulty, of course, was that the court's job was to simplify the complexities of customary tenure. This was always going to be a difficult, if not impossible, task. The communal rights that Māori held under customary tenure did not easily fit within defined boundaries and lists of owners, and rights between groups often overlapped. The court was also entirely unable to recognise other kinds of right in land, particularly resource rights.

It is clear that the court in Te Rohe Pōtae sometimes struggled with the task. Several decisions of the Ōtorohanga court refer to the 'very conflicting' or 'very contradictory' evidence presented. In the Pukeroa Hangatiki case, the court described the conflicting evidence it had received about 'ancestors, bases of title, boundaries, ancient marks, pas, settlements, burial places, eel-weirs & other signs'. As a result, the court had found 'it difficult in some instances to obtain a clear insight owing to direct contradictions'.<sup>275</sup>

It was not always that the evidence was contradictory, but simply that the occupation and use of an area by different groups was too complex for the court and its

---

269. Submission 3.4.107, pp 67–68.

270. Submission 3.4.107(a), p 19.

271. Submission 3.4.107(a), p 15.

272. Submission 3.4.305, pp 32, 35.

273. Submission 3.4.305, pp 37–38, 43.

274. Submission 3.4.305, p 36.

275. Document A79, p 201.

simplified form of title to grapple with. In its Kopua–Pirongia–Kawhia judgment, for instance, the court admitted that ‘both sides’ occupied the block, but was not clear why they did so. The presence of Waikato on the land made things even more ‘perplexing’ for the court.<sup>276</sup>

Sometimes the evidence presented by parties to the court would also have done little to help resolve conflicts over rights. The claimants, as well as historians like Dr Ann Parsonson, have argued that the adversarial nature of the Native Land Court process distorted the evidence presented by Māori to support their claims.<sup>277</sup> That is because testimony to the court tended to focus on those things that separated groups – such as battles – rather than points of unity, such as shared whakapapa or intermarriage. Indeed, acknowledging shared interests ‘could be to a party’s disadvantage’ in court.<sup>278</sup> Dr Thomas gave the example of Hone Pumipi, a Ngāti Maniapoto chief of Mōkau, who during his testimony agreed with some aspects of the case presented by a Ngāti Tama witness. William Grace, representing Ngāti Maniapoto in the hearing, thought that Pumipi had ‘nearly cooked our case.’<sup>279</sup> The reluctance of court participants to highlight shared rights or experiences was especially noticeable in regard to the Kingitanga, which ‘had bound most of them together for more than a generation’, yet was scarcely mentioned in court lest it damage their cases.<sup>280</sup>

As Crown counsel pointed out, judges were ‘alert to issues relating to the accuracy and completeness of the evidence’ given by court participants.<sup>281</sup> Drs Husbands and Mitchell pointed to occasions where judges harshly criticised witnesses for the quality or truthfulness of their evidence.<sup>282</sup> Judge Gudgeon, for instance, criticised Ngāti Maniapoto witnesses in the Pukuweka (Rangitoto–Tuhua 2) case for their refusal to discuss certain matters:

There are so many things that the Ngati Maniapoto have not heard of, that evidence of this description is of comparatively little value. They do not say that Ngati Maringi were not slain on this land or that Ngati Kumi Kumi were not killed in revenge, they merely say they do not know.<sup>283</sup>

Gudgeon was similarly dismissive of Ngāti Maniapoto evidence concerning Kāwhia, which he considered ‘deliberately ignored’ matters of conquest that would have also required them to admit that Waikato had rights in the land concerned.<sup>284</sup>

276. Document A79, pp 201–202.

277. Document A79, p 140; Ann Parsonson, ‘Stories for land: Oral narratives in the Maori Land Court,’ in Bain Attwood and Fiona Magowan (eds), Telling Stories: Indigenous History and Memory in Australia and New Zealand (Crows Nest, New South Wales: Allen & Unwin, 2001), pp 22–23.

278. Document A79, p 415.

279. Document A28, p 262.

280. Document A79, p 141.

281. Submission 3.4.305, p 35.

282. Document A79, pp 414–415.

283. Pukuweka Judgement (1897) 29 Otorohanga MB 157; doc A79, p 413.

284. Document A79, p 140.

Judge Gudgeon's criticisms occasionally extended to the decisions made by Judge Mair. The court's failure in such instances to reach a settled view of customary interests could leave Māori vulnerable to inconsistent decision-making between different cases. One particularly prominent example concerned the court's treatment of Ngāti Raukawa over several decades. Because Ngāti Raukawa have settled their Treaty claims with the Crown, we do not have jurisdiction to make findings on these issues, but mention them here simply as context.

Ngāti Raukawa's engagement with the Native Land Court began in 1868, with the Maungatautari case. In that instance, the court found that Raukawa had abandoned the area following their conquest by Waikato. In other cases over the next two decades, the court ruled on Ngāti Raukawa interests several more times, sometimes finding that they had retained their interests and sometimes not.<sup>285</sup> As discussed in section 10.4.1, during the 1886 hearing of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block, Judge Mair's court accepted Ngāti Raukawa's claims to Wharepungua, finding that Waikato had not conquered the area as claimed. However, in 1892, when Judge Gudgeon dealt with an application to determine the relative interests of the owners of Wharepungua, he sharply criticised the court's decision in 1886. Although he could not overturn the court's earlier decision, he did define the relative interests of the owners according to his understanding of the relative strength of their claims to the land.<sup>286</sup> Of the 991 owners accepted by the court in 1886, Gudgeon considered that 572 had 'no right' to the land; he accordingly awarded them only a quarter-share each.<sup>287</sup> The power that the judge had in the Native Land Court process meant that differing opinions of this kind about the rightful ownership of land could have serious consequences for the court's Māori participants.<sup>288</sup>

No matter how much judges were able to critically analyse the evidence they were hearing, they ultimately remained 'outsiders looking in.'<sup>289</sup> We agree with the Central North Island Tribunal that the decisions that the Native Land Court was called upon to make required an 'extensive knowledge of whakapapa.'<sup>290</sup> The Ōtorohanga court's apparent struggle with reconciling the conflicting evidence it received, and then with translating that evidence into the form of title provided by the native land legislation, demonstrates that the court was poorly equipped to deal with the nature of customary tenure.

10.4.3.8 Restrictions on alienation

When investigating title to a piece of land, the Native Land Court was charged with imposing restrictions against alienation if it was deemed necessary. These restrictions, the Te Urewera Tribunal found, were 'the most important' protection

---

285. Document M25 (McKenzie), pp 3–19.

286. Document A85, pp 368–369.

287. Document A85, p 377.

288. Transcript 4.1.16, p 790 (Paul Husbands, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 12 September 2013).

289. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu, p 146.

290. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 484.

mechanisms offered by the Crown to ensure that Māori communities retained sufficient land. Yet in practice they were largely ineffective, undermined by a series of amendments that allowed the Crown to purchase ‘individual interests as if there were no restrictions on titles.’<sup>291</sup>

The claimants submitted that the Crown failed to honour restrictions against alienation, or to ensure Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retained sufficient land.<sup>292</sup> The Crown accepted that, ‘over time . . . the restrictions on alienation were reduced’ and that, where it then purchased land despite restrictions, ‘landowners who wished to retain their land with the restrictions on alienation intact’ faced ‘negative consequences’. However, counsel also noted that ‘Crown policy faced a dilemma: whether to treat Māori on the same basis as non-Māori and allow them to deal with their land as they wished or exercise a more protective role.’<sup>293</sup>

At the time of the initial title determination to the Aotea–Rohe Potae block in 1886, the court was required to investigate whether it was necessary to impose any restrictions on alienation on the title.<sup>294</sup> In the event, at the 1886 hearing, it was Wahanui who requested that the land encompassed by Aotea–Rohe Potae block be declared inalienable. In response, Judge Mair declared that ‘all the orders made at this sitting would contain restrictions against sale.’<sup>295</sup>

By the time the Ōtorohanga court came to defining the iwi and hapū subdivisions of the larger Rohe-Potae block, the law concerning restrictions on alienation had changed. Under section 13 of the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, the court was to investigate whether an owner had a ‘sufficiency of inalienable land for his support’. If they did not, the court could set aside such land as was necessary for their support and declare it inalienable.

We do not have complete statistics for the number of blocks that were declared inalienable by the Native Land Court during this period. According to a schedule likely produced in early 1890, as at the end of 1889 the court had declared 24 blocks inalienable in Te Rohe Pōtae, covering an area of 74,345 acres.<sup>296</sup> In addition, there is evidence that seven other blocks totalling 10,420 acres were declared inalienable between 1889 and 1890.<sup>297</sup>

We do not know how many of these blocks were restricted at the owners’ request. In general, the minute books simply note that a block was to be inalienable, but do not record whether the owners had requested such a restriction or whether it had been imposed by the court on its own initiative. Later, the owners of Kinohaku East 1 (Ototoika) and Marokopa said that they had requested that

291. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp 1272–1273.

292. Submission 3.4.107, p 92.

293. Submission 3.4.305, pp 69–70.

294. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 36.

295. (1886) 2 Otorohanga MB 80; doc A79, p 152.

296. Document A91 (Te Rohe Potae Inquiry Research Programme document bank), pp 315–319.

297. These blocks were: Kinohaku East 1 (Ototoika, 1,347 acres), Kinohaku East 1A (Te Uira, 607 acres), Maketu (984 acres), Marokopa Reserve (123 acres), Puketarata 10 (144 acres), Te Kuiti (7,080 acres), and Te Rete (135 acres). See doc A79, pp 194–195, 422; doc A60, pp 420, 530, 1045. As discussed in section 11.4.5, a number of other blocks were also declared inalienable in the years after 1890.

restrictions against alienation be imposed on their land.<sup>298</sup> The minute books, however, give differing levels of detail for how the restrictions came to be imposed against the two blocks. When the lists of owners for Marokopa were approved in February 1889, for instance, the minute book noted that Te Aroa asked ‘that the land be made inalienable by sale but open to lease for 21 years.’<sup>299</sup> But in the case of Ototoika, the minute book only recorded that the land was to be inalienable and gave no indication of any owner request.<sup>300</sup>

The court could also remove restrictions against alienation from titles, generally upon application of a proportion of the owners. Under the 1888 Act, a majority of owners could apply to the court to remove restrictions. The court could only do so, however, if all owners agreed and if they had sufficient lands elsewhere.<sup>301</sup> The requirement for unanimous consent for the removal of restrictions was progressively reduced, first to a majority of owners in 1890, and then to one-third of the owners in 1894.<sup>302</sup>

From 1892, the Crown was also empowered to remove or ignore restrictions against alienation without any reference to the court. An amendment of that year allowed the governor to remove or declare void any court-imposed restrictions on alienation ‘for the purposes of a sale to Her Majesty.’<sup>303</sup> Then, in 1894, the Crown exempted itself entirely from court-ordered restrictions, meaning that the governor no longer had to declare a restriction void before proceeding to purchase.<sup>304</sup>

We examine the extent to which the Crown purchased land in Te Rohe Pōtae that the court had declared inalienable more fully in chapter 11. At least at first, the Crown appeared reluctant to purchase land that was subject to alienation restrictions. In 1890, for instance, Lewis directed Wilkinson that the ‘Crown could not buy in face of restrictions and unequal shares’. By mid-1892, however, the Crown had commenced purchasing in Whakairoiro 4, the parent block of which had been restricted; it completed its purchase by November. The next year, the Crown began purchasing in the restricted Te Kuiti block.<sup>305</sup> It appears that most Crown purchasing in blocks with restrictions against alienation on their titles occurred after the 1892 amendment allowing the governor to remove or declare void those restrictions. In those circumstances, the court would not have been asked to remove the restrictions.

Some owners were not happy that the Crown was purchasing despite the restrictions against alienation. In March 1894, for instance, Hotutaua Pakukohatu and 11 other ‘leading members of the tribe’ wrote directly to Premier Seddon asking for him to ‘give full effect to the restrictions’ they had placed on Kinohaku East 1 (Ototoika). Wilkinson nonetheless began purchasing interests in the block

298. Document A79, pp 250, 425–426.

299. Marokopa Block (1889) 5 Otorohanga MB 281.

300. Ototoika (1890) 9 Otorohanga MB 339.

301. The Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 6.

302. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1890, s 3; Native Land Court Act 1894, s 52.

303. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s 14.

304. Native Land Court Act 1894, s 76.

305. Document A79, pp 423–424.

two months later.<sup>306</sup> Similarly, in 1899, Hoani Haeriti complained to the Native Land Court about the Crown's purchase of 1,705 acres of Marokopa, despite it having been declared inalienable on his request when the title was investigated. In response, the court simply noted that 'the Law has said that the imposing of restrictions is not to prevent the Crown from buying' and that it was the owners' choice to sell or not.<sup>307</sup>

10.4.4 Defining relative interests and the commencement of Crown purchasing

The final step in the process of individualising ownership interests in Māori land – at least for the purposes of alienation – was the definition of the relative interests of the owners in a block. Not all owners who were declared as having an interest in a block of land on a title had the same connections to the land as others. Some owners had long-standing ancestral connections to land, along with occupation rights. Other owners, meanwhile, were included on titles out of 'aroha' or through marriage.

Under the 1886 Act, the court could define relative interests when a person interested in the land applied for it to do so.<sup>308</sup> But in 1888, the law was amended so that the court was required to define relative interests when issuing an order after an investigation of title or partition.<sup>309</sup> This was the provision that was in effect for most of the period in which the Ōtorohanga court was defining the iwi and hapū subdivisions of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block.

Until 1890, however, the Ōtorohanga court under Judge Mair issued subdivision orders without also defining relative interests, leaving that process for later. Drs Husbands and Mitchell suggested that this may have been at the urging of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, who had long expressed a wish for tribal and hapū subdivisions to be completed first. They pointed to a statement in court by Te Moerua Natanahira in 1889 in regard to the subdivision of Hauturu, who said that he wanted hapū boundaries to be completed before defining individual interests.<sup>310</sup> Crown officials noted at the time the marked reluctance of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to go beyond hapū ownership and accede to individualisation.<sup>311</sup>

In June 1889, the Crown advised Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that it intended to start purchasing land in the district. Over the next six months, as Crown officials conferred over how they would proceed with purchasing, the issue of relative interests was discussed. Wilkinson was hesitant to purchase interests in blocks where the relative interests of the owners had not been defined. He warned that 'it would be impossible for a person unacquainted with the Native owners to form any opinion as to their relative ownership'. T W Lewis, Under-Secretary for the Native Department, shared Wilkinson's concerns but considered that, in the interim, purchase officers should operate on the assumption that all interests were equal. The

---

306. Document A79, pp 250, 425.

307. Document A79, pp 425–426.

308. Native Land Court Act 1886, s 42.

309. Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 21.

310. Document A79, p 238.

311. Document A67 (Boulton), pp 235–236; doc A55 (Marr), pp 58–59.

result, he hoped, would be that Māori owners with greater interests would realise they were being disadvantaged and would therefore go to court to seek definition of their interests.<sup>312</sup> We examine the extent to which the Crown purchased shares in land before relative interests were defined in chapter 11.

In late 1889, Lewis also conferred with the chief judge of the Native Land Court, as well as Judge Mair, concerning the Ōtorohanga court's failure to determine relative interests. Lewis reported to Wilkinson on 28 December 1889 that, as a result of these discussions, when the court resumed it would 'proceed to determine and apportion the relative interests of the owners in all of the Blocks in which orders have been made up to date'.<sup>313</sup>

At its sitting on 20 May 1890, the Ōtorohanga court announced that it would henceforth begin defining relative interests and would keep open all orders adjudicated since the passage of the 'Act of 1887' until this had been done.<sup>314</sup> The only response from the court attendees was from Te Moerua Natanahira of Ngāti Peehi and Ngāti Kanawa, who urged that hapū boundaries be defined 'before individual interests are defined'.<sup>315</sup>

During his cross-examination of Drs Husbands and Mitchell, Crown counsel stated that, on the Crown's analysis, until December 1890, when the sitting ended, Judge Mair determined relative interests for around 87 blocks, including several subdivisions of Aorangi and Kakepuku.<sup>316</sup> The Crown provided minute book evidence concerning these latter two blocks, but did not provide a list of all 87 blocks for which Judge Mair determined the relative interests. It is not clear how many were simply new subdivisions, and how many had previously been determined by the court without relative interests having been defined. Aorangi, one of the blocks cited by the Crown, was an entirely new block, first brought before the court in May 1890. The court issued orders for Aorangi proper and three subdivisions in August, with relative interests defined when the lists of owners were passed in November.<sup>317</sup> The original Kakepuku case, meanwhile, had originally been heard and determined in 1889 without the relative interests of the subdivisions being defined. When Kakepuku was partitioned in October 1890, however, the court defined the relative interests of the owners of the new subdivisions.<sup>318</sup>

In March 1891, Wilkinson complained again that the Ōtorohanga court was failing to define relative interests. He provided the Native Under-Secretary with a list of 92 blocks for which the court had made orders without having defined the

312. Document A67, pp 208–209.

313. Document A67(a) (Boulton document bank), pp 146–148; doc A67, pp 211–212.

314. Aorangi (1890) 9 Otorohanga MB 82–83; doc A79, p169. There does not appear to have been any amending legislation passed in 1887. The reference to the 'Act of 1887' is most likely a reference to section 21 of the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, which required the court to determine relative interests at the time of the title or partition order.

315. Document A79, p169.

316. Transcript 4.1.16, p 670 (Paul Husbands, hearing week 6, Aramiro Marae, 11 September 2013).

317. Document A60, pp 103–108; doc M32 (Crown bundle of documents for hearing week 6), pp 44–46.

318. Document A60, pp 197–205; doc M32, pp 47–52.

relative interests of the owners. Almost all of the orders he listed had been made during the court's 1888 and 1889 sittings, suggesting that the court had not been able to clear the backlog during its 1890 sitting. Wilkinson considered that, in this state, the blocks were 'practically useless as to any benefit that can be got from them either by the Native owners themselves, or anyone else who may desire to acquire them'. He charged that, in doing so, the court had 'defeated' the purpose for which it had been established: 'to change the old Native title to that of one from the Crown for the purposes of settlement'.<sup>319</sup>

Wilkinson's memorandum led to a further intervention by the Native Under-Secretary in April 1891. He first approached Native Minister Cadman, who agreed that the relative interests should be determined 'as quickly as possible'. The Under-Secretary then wrote to the chief judge of the Native Land Court, H G Seth-Smith, asking for the process to be 'hastened'. The chief judge responded that '[t]his can be arranged'.<sup>320</sup>

In the event, the Ōtorohanga court did not sit again until July 1892. When it did resume, it had a new judge – Judge Gudgeon. Defining the interests of owners of subdivisions that had already passed through the court made up a large part of his work. A Gazette notice in late June announced that the relative interests of 41 blocks in Te Rohe Pōtae would be defined at the court's next sitting. The listed blocks had mostly been included in Wilkinson's March 1891 memorandum.<sup>321</sup> In less than four months, the court defined owners' interests in over 100 blocks, a significant chunk of the subdivisions that had passed the court by that stage.<sup>322</sup> The court's minute books do not reveal anything about the process by which Judge Gudgeon determined the relative interests, just the speed. The lists of owners with relative interests attached appear in the minute books between the court's other work. There is no indication of how and when the interests were determined before they were recorded in the minute books.<sup>323</sup>

10.4.5 Treaty analysis and findings

By the end of 1890, the Native Land Court had made orders for 254 individual blocks within the boundaries of the original Aotea–Rohe Potae block, 'representing an area of over a million and a half acres of land'.<sup>324</sup> This had all occurred in three and a half years and represented a momentous change in Te Rohe Pōtae.

The Kawhia Native Committee, in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had placed so much hope prior to the establishment of the court, did not play any substantive

319. Document A67(a), pp 294–298; doc A79, pp 218–219.

320. Document A79, p 219.

321. The Gazette's list of 41 blocks included 'all subdivisions' of Hauturu East, Hauturu West, Kinohaku East, Kinohaku West, and Tokanui. Wilkinson's list had included these subdivisions separately, somewhat accounting for the different totals.

322. Document A79, p 219.

323. For an example, see the definition of the relative interests of the owners of Mangawhero numbers 1 and 4: (1892) 13 Otorohanga MB 29–30.

324. GT Wilkinson, 'Annual Report Upon the State of the Natives in the Waikato and Thames Districts: Waikato and the King Country', 10 June 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-5, p 4.

role in the title determination process. Indeed, it struggled to remain afloat, lacking resources and established by an under-powered legislative scheme. It undertook only one investigation into the ownership of a block. Although its decision was later referred to in a court decision as evidence, this was hardly the kind of role that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had wanted or expected for the committee in the court process.

In the absence of a greater role for the Kawhia Native Committee, out-of-court arrangements were instead the most important way for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to influence the Native Land Court's decision-making at the title determination stage. They offered Te Rohe Pōtae Māori a chance to have a say in decisions affecting their land, as well as reducing some of the costs of the court process. As a result, large areas of land were able to pass through the Ōtorohanga court with minimal dispute.

However, out-of-court arrangements, while significant, were not the same as tribal control of the court, nor were they an endorsement of the court. We consider that out-of-court arrangements were pragmatic responses to the court system, but these responses occurred within a framework that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori fundamentally did not want.

Moreover, if parties were dissatisfied with the arrangements proposed outside of court, they could quickly return to the court instead for a final decision. The result in these instances was often a long, contentious, and costly hearing in an adversarial court process. In these circumstances, and with the stakes so high, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had to pursue exclusive claims, focusing on what separated them from other groups rather than what tied them together. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori discovered this darker side of the court's process early, right from the initial title determination in 1886. Despite their hopes during their negotiations with the Crown for an orderly and civil process to determine title to their lands, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were instead quickly confronted with a fiercely contested hearing and were pitted against groups they had previously regarded as allies.

There is also little evidence of the court seeking to ensure that the out-of-court arrangements it was approving reflected custom, or even that they had been reached by a fair process. This left the interests of people who were not as well versed with the process or who were not present during these discussions vulnerable.

The Crown argued that out-of-court arrangements would have mitigated the impact of several problems with aspects of the court.<sup>325</sup> Crown counsel also argued that their use 'is likely to have ensured that decisions incorporated the tikanga of the parties involved'.<sup>326</sup> That may be the case, but the problem is that we do not know. As the National Park Tribunal stated when commenting on the use of out-of-court arrangements in their inquiry district, although 'justice may have been done, it could not be clearly seen to have been done'.<sup>327</sup> We concur with the

---

325. Submission 3.4.305, pp 35, 37–38.

326. Submission 3.4.305, p 43.

327. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 309–310.

Turanga Tribunal that ‘the Crown had to ensure that there was a proper and accessible system of checks’ for out-of-court arrangements.<sup>328</sup> Such a system was not in place in Te Rohe Pōtae. The Kawhia Native Committee might have been able to provide a more transparent process alongside the court, but, as already discussed, it was not involved in the title determination process.

When the parties could not reach agreement outside of court, the Native Land Court was poorly prepared to undertake the task of determining customary ownership. On one hand, it was required to reach decisions ‘according to Native custom or usage’. On the other hand, it was required to fix boundaries and to allocate interests to owners on an individual basis when such boundaries and ownership did not exist under custom. Strangers to the district, the judge and assessor had to rely on the complex, and sometimes very different, customary evidence presented by the parties. The court often struggled with the task, even with the assistance of the assessors.

Granted, Judge Mair seems to have been keen to accommodate Māori by granting adjournments for harvest season, and to move the court’s location to be closer to the relevant owners. These kinds of decision lessened the impact that the court’s operations had on its Māori participants and helped avoid some of the negative impacts that had been associated with its sittings in other districts. Judge Mair was also willing to adopt the preferred approach of the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leadership to the subdivision of the Rohe Potae block, starting with the tribal subdivisions, then proceeding to the hapū and individual subdivisions. This orderly approach to the subdivision of the block was in stark contrast to the court’s normal approach and testament to the influence of the tribal leaders at the time.

Alongside his conciliatory approach to court proceedings, Judge Mair seems to have had other strong attributes, such as being fluent in te reo Māori. Nonetheless, he still appears to have been poorly equipped to deal with the complexities of customary tenure that existed in Te Rohe Pōtae. It seems that, irrespective of the personal qualities of the judges, the serious deficiencies in the structure of the court made it difficult, if not impossible, for them to undertake their task successfully.

While Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were accommodated under the court’s process, they were still not in control of it. The judge and the court remained the ultimate decision maker, with the power to dismiss Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns, to substitute its own decisions, and proceed regardless. For instance, despite the reluctance of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to furnish lists of owners or to proceed to subdividing the Rohe Potae block, Judge Mair’s insistence that they do so ultimately carried the day. There were clear limits to the extent to which judges were willing – or, indeed, able under the native land legislation – to accommodate the wishes of the court’s Māori participants.

There were also occasions when it appears that the Crown was able to influence the court’s proceedings. Restrictions on alienation were one area where the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori appear to have eventually been thwarted by the Crown’s purchasing imperatives. Imposed at the time of title determination, they were an important protection for owners. We do not know how frequently owners were requesting restrictions on alienation relative to the court deciding to impose them, though we know that owners did request them at least sometimes. Whoever was responsible for their imposition, however, the Crown steadily weakened the provisions allowing restrictions to be removed.<sup>329</sup> Eventually, it amended the law so that its own purchases would not be impeded by the restrictions at all, and did so at a time when under pre-emption it was the only purchaser.<sup>330</sup> As the court told one owner in 1898, ‘the Law has said that the imposing of restrictions is not to prevent the Crown from buying’<sup>331</sup> It was, in other words, made legal for the Crown to buy despite its Treaty duty of active protection.

---

328. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 451.

Similarly, the court’s announcement in 1890 that it would begin defining the relative interests of owners in Te Rohe Pōtae seems to have been inspired at least in part by pressure from Crown officials for it to do so. After an 1888 amendment, the court was legally required to define relative interests when issuing an order after a title determination or partition. The reasons behind the court’s failure to define relative interests up to 1890 are unclear. There is evidence in at least one case that owners were hesitant to define relative interests before completing the hapū subdivisions, and we know that, in general, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were reluctant to go beyond hapū subdivisions. In that context, it is possible that Judge Mair had been acceding to the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in not defining relative interests, but we cannot be certain.

However, with ownership interests undefined, the Crown could not safely commence purchasing. Crown officials were unhappy with this situation and approached judges of the Native Land Court on two occasions urging that the Ōtorohanga court get on with what it regarded as urgent work.<sup>332</sup> An initial intervention at the end of 1889 resulted in the court’s May 1890 announcement. However, rather than clear the backlog of blocks that had already passed through the court, the court under Judge Mair apparently focused on defining the relative interests of blocks passing the court from that time on. This led to a further intervention in March 1891, with the Under-Secretary for the Native Department asking the Native Minister and the chief judge for the process to be ‘hastened’. When the court resumed sitting in 1892 under Judge Gudgeon, it dedicated a significant part of its time that year to defining relative interests, and did so at speed.

We consider that these examples demonstrate an inappropriate level of Crown influence over the court. Moreover, the Crown’s ability to intervene in the court process and influence its activities also demonstrates a broader imbalance between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the Native Land Court system. The Crown had an inherent advantage: if it did not like something about the way that the court was doing business, it could simply amend the native land legislation.

---

329. Document A79, pp 422–423.

330. Native Land Court Act 1894, s76.

331. Document A79, pp 425–426.

332. Document A67, pp 211–212; doc A79, p 219.

Thus right from the start of the Ōtorohanga court's operations, there was a gap between what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori expected of the court process and what was required by law. The legislative regime created a court that could ultimately usurp Māori control over their lands, and undermine their desire to control their title determination process. As the Taranaki Tribunal noted, the court could 'decide for Maori that which Maori should and could have decided for themselves'.<sup>333</sup> This was a point of concern for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and they raised this concern numerous times in the years before the court's entry into their rohe, to no avail.

Indeed, in practice the court typically operated in a manner that demonstrated that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were best placed to be making decisions about their land. As shown above, the court effectively rubber stamped many out-of-court agreements at the title determination stage.

This all suggests that it would have been simpler and more Treaty-compliant to provide in legislation for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori input and control into the title determination via the Kawhia Native Committee. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had expected, based on the commitments given by the Crown during their negotiations, that the Kawhia Native Committee would be able to play a role in title determination beyond what was provided for in the Native Committees Act 1883.

As the Crown has conceded, despite Ballance's commitments in February 1885 to give native committees a greater role in title determination as well as a measure of self-governance, the Crown made no substantive amendments to the native committee regime. We welcome the Crown's concession on this point. However, we consider that the concession does not adequately express the gravity of the Crown's breach in this respect. The Crown's failure to follow through with its commitment to reform the native committee legislation represented a cynical disregard for the demand of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for mana whakahaere.

As we found in chapter 8, in failing to empower the committees as promised, the Crown breached its duty of good faith. In asking to determine title themselves, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had been requesting no more than what the Treaty guaranteed them. The Crown's failure to provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to manage land titling as they wished breached its obligation to act in accordance with their tino rangatiratanga, and breached the principle of autonomy.

With the Kawhia Native Committee marginalised and absent from the court process, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were left to manage the title determination process as best they could. Although the Ōtorohanga court presided over by Judge Mair made some accommodations for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the court process, the deeper legal and structural deficiencies of the court process ultimately prevented them from playing anywhere near the role they had hoped for. We find that, having imposed the court on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori against their express wishes, the Crown's failure to then provide them with a substantial, formal role in the court's title determination process was in breach of the express terms of article 2 of the Treaty and its guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. It was also in breach of the principle of partnership and the duty to actively protect Māori rights in land.

---

333. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 282.

Finally, it is clear to us that many of the inadequacies of the court during this period were caused by the native land legislation and the form of title it was charged with imposing. Both Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the court found it difficult to account for the complexities of customary ownership within the confines of the Crown's native title system. As discussed in the next section, however, the consequences of native land legislation and the title awarded would have an impact well beyond the court's process.

10.5 WHAT WAS THE EFFECT OF SUBSEQUENT PARTITION AND SUCCESSION ON TE ROHE PŌTAE MĀORI LANDOWNERS?

By the end of 1890, there were some ominous signs for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Judge Mair was already noting in 1889 the vast scale of partitioning that was occurring within Te Rohe Pōtae. There was the looming threat of Crown purchasing, which by the end of 1890 was slowly beginning. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders were also beginning to discover that, once every owner had their interest in a block defined, their influence only went so far.

Throughout the 1890s, the consequences of the form of title awarded by the court became clear. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landholdings were made increasingly uncertain, the result of not only the court process and native land title, but also of the commencement of Crown purchasing in the district. Māori attempts to combat this uncertainty – most often by seeking further partition – appear to have only accentuated the issues they were facing.

As outlined in section 10.2.3, the impacts of native land titles on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landholdings and society were a major issue for the parties. The claimants alleged that those titles 'seriously undermined the tribal structures of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori whanau, hapū and iwi', while also making it much easier for owners to sell land than to retain or develop it.<sup>334</sup> The Crown did not deny that native land title had negative impacts for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, including the undermining of tribal structures. However, the Crown also argued that individualisation, 334. Submission 3.4.107, pp 41, 99. A large number of claims raise issues concerning the impacts of individualisation and native land title on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landholdings, including: Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 1593 (submission 3.4.230); Wai 2274 (submission 3.4.125); Wai 2313, Wai 2314, Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1386, Wai 1762, Wai 1500 (submission 3.4.160); Wai 1806 (claim 1.1.177); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 2117 (submission 3.4.161); Wai 729 (submission 3.4.240); Wai 762 (submission 3.4.170); Wai 836 (submission 3.4.131); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1455 (submission 3.4.156); Wai 1640 (submission 3.4.191); Wai 366, Wai 1064 (submission 3.4.205); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1962 (submission 3.4.172); Wai 656 (submission 3.4.241); Wai 1112, Wai 1113, Wai 1439, Wai 2351, Wai 2353 (submission 3.4.226); Wai 1499 (submission 3.4.171); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 1611 (submission 3.4.152); Wai 1898 (submission 3.4.200); Wai 1975 (submission 3.4.201); Wai 1978 (submission 3.4.232); Wai 2087 (submission 3.4.218); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141).

---

fragmentation, alienation, and partition were not contrary to Treaty principles, and that clothing land in native land title ‘did not lead inevitably to . . . alienation.’<sup>335</sup>

The section begins with an overview of the court’s activities and process between 1892 and 1907. It then moves on to consider the justification for and impacts of partitioning, and the impacts of succession on Māori land ownership in Te Rohe Pōtae. Finally, the section considers the impact of Native Land Court processes and title on economic development and tribal society.

10.5.1 Overview: the court and native land title in Te Rohe Pōtae, 1892–1907

From the early 1890s, at the same time as the court continued its work associated with the original determination of title and ownership to the Rohe Potae block, its range of activities also expanded. In particular, as its purchasing programme gained pace throughout the 1890s, the Crown became an active – and at times, the dominant – participant in the court process. Alongside this, the court also became increasingly concerned with the administration of blocks that had already passed through the court.

10.5.1.1 Continued subdivision

In some respects, the court’s work during this period continued largely as it had in its first few years of existence. Subdivision of the iwi and hapū subdivisions, for instance, continued for the rest of the 1890s. In 1892, it determined the subdivisions of Puketarata, Te Taharoa, Kawhia, Pirongia West, and Kinohaku West. It then continued in 1896 with Karuotewhenua B and Mangawhero 2, and the following year with Pukeroa Hangatiki, Otorohanga 1, Hauturu East 1, and Kakepuku 1. In August 1897, the subdivision of the enormous Rangitoto–Tuhua block finally made it to court. It took a year for the court to complete the initial partition; the case then resumed in 1900 to hear evidence on ownership lists and the boundaries of 14 subdivisions. Some subdivisions were fiercely contested, such as Taraunui, Whatitokarua, and Rangitoto, while others – such as Pukuweka, Mataraiia, and Oturoa Rereahu – moved through the court relatively rapidly, their fate already having been agreed outside of court.<sup>336</sup>

10.5.1.2 Increasing Crown presence

In other respects, the court’s activity changed quite drastically during this period. After the Crown commenced purchasing in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1890, and particularly from 1894 on, an increasing amount of the court’s time was taken up with processing the Crown’s land purchases. On application from the Crown, the court defined and partitioned out the Crown’s interests in blocks, and processed and enforced applications for survey charging orders and liens.<sup>337</sup> In March and April 1894, for instance, Wilkinson for the first time brought 40 blocks before

---

335. Submission 3.4.305, pp 30–31, 77, 82; transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 112–113 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

336. Document A79, pp 283–284.

337. Document A79, p 283.

the court seeking the definition of the Crown's interests in them. The interests it had acquired represented 124,738.25 acres of Te Rohe Pōtae land. According to Drs Husbands and Mitchell, this process was repeated 'at least 300 times between March 1894 and December 1901', with the result that the Crown's interests became real, connected to 'a tangible piece of land with its own name and boundaries'. Non-sellers' interests, on the other hand, 'continued to exist in the twilight zone of shares which were neither under communal ownership nor set out in defined parcels of land on the ground'.<sup>338</sup>

Drs Husbands and Mitchell argued that, during this period, the increased focus on the Crown's purchasing programme not only 'underlined a change in orientation of the Otorohanga Court', but also 'signified a major shift in the balance of power and influence within the Court itself'. With the work of title determination largely – but not yet completely – finished, the principal actors in the court changed. Rather than Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira or kaiwhakahaere featuring significantly in the court, George Wilkinson, in his role as the Crown's land purchase officer, 'began to increasingly occupy centre stage'. He bought the shares from owners, verified signatures, calculated how much land the shares represented, calculated survey costs owing, negotiated the division of the land with the non-sellers, and then appeared in court to apply for the awards to the Crown. In doing so, he 'was able to ensure that the overwhelming majority of his purchases passed through the Court with little or no trouble'.<sup>339</sup>

As the Crown's involvement in the court process increased, there is evidence that the distinctions between the court and the Crown occasionally blurred. Drs Husbands and Mitchell pointed to some obvious, but isolated, cases. For instance, in February 1892 Wilkinson temporarily acted as the court's interpreter, while in March 1894 his home was used as a court venue when its usual location was being used as a polling booth. We accept the Crown's submission that these were 'practicable and limited solutions to one-off situations rather than . . . examples of widespread and enduring systemic failings'.<sup>340</sup> But there were other more systemic connections between the court and the Crown. Once Crown purchasing commenced, land purchase officers and the registrar of the court communicated frequently, with officials seeking information about the status of land that the Crown wanted to purchase. Court officers were also commonly copied into minutes exchanged between various Crown officials.<sup>341</sup>

Drs Husbands and Mitchell also pointed to two occasions where judges were directly involved in discussions with Crown officials. In one minute about the Rangitoto–Tuhua 4 (Horokio) sale block, Chief Land Purchase Officer Sheridan wrote to the chief judge of the court about extending the block. The chief judge then instructed the registrar to 'arrange to have the matter brought before the

---

338. Document A79, pp 251–252.

339. Document A79, pp 252–254.

340. Submission 3.4.305, pp 48–50.

341. Document A79, pp 390–392.

Court whilst Judge Mair is in the district'. In another minute about Kinohaku East 1B, Patrick Sheridan, the head of the Native Land Purchase Department, asked Judge Gudgeon to clarify whether the Crown could purchase without individual interests being further defined.<sup>342</sup>

In addition, during the cross-examination of Drs Husbands and Mitchell, counsel for Wai 457, Wai 535, and Wai 1469 questioned the witnesses about a Crown purchase deed for interests in Mangauika that had been attested by Judge Mair at the same time as the block had been before the court.<sup>343</sup> They subsequently provided further evidence on this point, noting that Judge Mair had acted as a witness to the sale of 13 individual interests in Mangauika during 1890. On 10 occasions, he had done so when the block was before the court in some fashion. On 21 December 1890, for instance, Judge Mair acted as witness for six sellers. The next day, the court confirmed the lists of owners for Mangauika and Mangauika 1. Drs Husbands and Mitchell further noted that 'all thirteen of the sales witnessed by Judge Mair were made before the extent of individual interests had been formally determined by the Court'. He also served as an attesting witness for the sale of four interests in Puketarata in 1890, though in only one instance was there a direct overlap with the attestation and the block being before the court.<sup>344</sup>

The claimants did not submit directly on this latter evidence, but on the basis of the evidence presented in Drs Husbands and Mitchell's main report concluded that 'It is not difficult to conclude that the Judges of the Native Land Court were strongly influenced by the Crown.'<sup>345</sup> In response to the examples of Crown officials contacting judges directly, the Crown emphasised that '[the] number of examples before the Tribunal is small' and submitted that judges had administrative as well as judicial roles, so needed to engage with officials. Crown counsel further submitted that 'the evidence does not suggest that the Judges were involved in any particular impropriety' and that the matters they were called on to deal with would have likely come before the court anyway.<sup>346</sup>

We disagree. Beyond any question of judicial impropriety, it is clear that Crown officials should not have been involving judges in these kinds of discussion. In both examples cited above, the Crown's requests could – and should – have been conveyed through the registrar. Similarly, although it may have been convenient for Judge Mair to act as a witness to the Crown's purchase of interests in Mangauika, it was clearly improper for him to have done so while the block was before the court. We consider that this kind of conduct merely demonstrates that the Native Land Court and its judges were intimately associated with the Crown and the latter relied upon it and the native land legislation to impose its colonial agenda on Māori.

---

342. Document A79, pp 392–393.

343. Transcript 4.1.16, pp 856–865 (Paul Husbands and James Mitchell, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 12 September 2013).

344. Document A79(g), pp 17–20.

345. Submission 3.4.107, p 86.

346. Submission 3.4.305, pp 48–49.

10.5.1.3 Administration of existing blocks

From the early 1890s, the court also dedicated a significant amount of time to the administration of blocks that had already passed the court. The processing of succession orders was particularly dominant and in some years consumed most of the court's time. In 1894, for instance, 29 of the court's 63 sitting days were spent dealing with successions, while in 1900 it spent 29 of its 41 sitting days processing successions. Successions became an especially significant part of the court's work after 1900 when Crown purchasing declined.<sup>347</sup> The court also had to administer the interests of minors, appointing and replacing their trustees, certifying when they had attained the age of 21, and transferring money to trustees for land sold on a minor's behalf.<sup>348</sup>

10.5.1.4 Law changes and the provision for incorporations

The law governing Māori land and the Native Land Court continued to be amended frequently. Two particularly significant amendments were introduced by the Native Land Court Act 1894. First, the Native Appellate Court was established, replacing the previous system of rehearings. This will be discussed in more detail in section 10.7.2.1.2.

Secondly, section 122 of the 1894 Act made provision for incorporations, allowing the court to 'constitute the owners . . . a body corporate', with control vested in a committee. The committee was given the power to alienate land, with proceeds going to the Public Trustee for disbursement, following the payment of expenses. Indeed, this incorporation model seems to have had alienation as its primary focus – committees, for example, could not at first raise finance or generate income.<sup>349</sup>

In Te Rohe Pōtae, it appears that only one block, Mangaora, was constituted as an incorporation under the 1894 Act. The experience seems to have been problematic. Before incorporating, the owners had already entered a lease agreement. Having incorporated, however, the Act required that the block be put up for public auction rather than give effect to the existing lease. In addition, the owners had difficulty gaining finance to meet the survey costs necessary for a final title order. Although a committee of owners was eventually constituted, the lease does not appear to have been confirmed.<sup>350</sup> John Ormsby was later reported as describing the attempt to incorporate at Mangaora as 'an expensive and dismal failure . . . on account of the defects in the law, which the Government would not remedy'. He did not elaborate on what those defects were.<sup>351</sup>

Subsequent amendments to the law made it easier for incorporations to gain financing, and the Native Land Act 1909 expanded the focus of the incorporation provisions to include development and farm management. Nonetheless, other than Rangitoto–Tuhua 66A, which was incorporated in 1910, it appears that

347. Document A79, p 286.

348. Document A79, pp 286–287.

349. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 503.

350. Document A79, pp 493–494.

351. 'Settlement of Native Lands', New Zealand Herald, 21 June 1906, p 5; doc A146 (Hearn), p 431.

very few incorporations were established in Te Rohe Pōtae before 1951.<sup>352</sup> We will explore the use of incorporations in Te Rohe Pōtae in the twentieth century further in a future chapter of our report.

The Central North Island Tribunal considered the 1894 provisions for incorporations in some detail. In that inquiry district, as in this one, only one incorporation was created under the 1894 provisions. They attributed this limited uptake to the perceived difficulties at the time in establishing incorporations, ongoing legal uncertainty about their powers, and the lack of benefits offered by the incorporation model. The Tribunal also noted the broader context within which the incorporation provisions were introduced, with Māori still seeking greater control of their land and abolition of the Native Land Court entirely. The Tribunal considered that, '[in] those circumstances, the incorporation provisions of the 1894 Act were so deficient as to render them useless as a vehicle for the collective tribal management of tribal lands.'<sup>353</sup>

10.5.1.5 Judges and assessors

After a period of more than a year when the court did not sit in Te Rohe Pōtae, it resumed sitting at Ōtorohanga in January 1892 with a new judge – Walter Gudgeon – presiding. Like Judge Mair, Judge Gudgeon had a military background. He had been involved in the campaigns against Titokowaru and Te Kooti, and led an Armed Constabulary force in Parihaka. He was also known as an 'excellent Maori scholar' and fluent speaker of te reo Māori, as well as a co-founder of the Polynesian Society.<sup>354</sup>

In all, 11 different judges presided over the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae between 1892 and 1907.<sup>355</sup> After presiding during the critical period from 1886 through to 1891, Judge Mair returned from 1900 to 1904, and again in 1907. After taking over from Mair for the 1892 sitting, Judge Gudgeon presided again from 1897 to 1898 when the court finally began the initial partition of the large Rangitoto–Tuhua block.<sup>356</sup>

According to Drs Husbands and Mitchell, the men who served as judges on the Ōtorohanga court were '[o]ften conversant in Te Reo Maori and sometimes deeply knowledgeable about aspects of Maori society and culture.'<sup>357</sup> There was no general requirement for judges of the Native Land Court to have legal training.<sup>358</sup> The evi-

352. Document A146, pp 431–433.

353. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 379–381, vol 2, pp 778–781.

354. Document A79, p 234.

355. Document A79, p 388. These judges were: William Gilbert Mair (1886–91, 1900–04, 1907), Walter Edward Gudgeon (1892, 1897–98), Laughlin O'Brien (1894), Spencer William von Sturmer (1894), David Scannell (1894, 1900), Henry Dunbar Johnson (1896), Herbert Frank Edger (1899, 1902, 1907), George Thomas Wilkinson (1904–05), Jackson Palmer (1906), Robert Campbell Sim (1906), and Michael Gilfedder (1907).

356. Document A79, p 388.

357. Document A79, p 390.

358. The exception was for the role of chief judge of the Native Land Court, who from 1894 had to be 'a barrister or solicitor of the Supreme Court of New Zealand of not less than seven years standing'. See Native Land Court Act 1894, s 6; submission 3.4.305, p 46.

dence indicates that only three of the judges to preside in Te Rohe Pōtae were formally qualified as lawyers: Herbert Frank Edger, Michael Gilfedder, and Jackson Palmer.<sup>359</sup> Instead, most had previously worked for the colonial government in some capacity, usually as soldiers or as officials in the Native Department. Many had been officials involved in the Crown's purchasing programme in some way. George Wilkinson, for example, was well known to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by the time he became a judge of the Native Land Court in 1904, having been the Crown's purchasing officer in the district in the preceding decades.<sup>360</sup> Some other judges had previously worked as surveyors or in the Land Purchase Department.<sup>361</sup>

Each judge brought their own manner of doing things to the court's proceedings and decision-making. The court under Judge Gudgeon, for instance, was very different to Judge Mair's court. Drs Husbands and Mitchell described the 'blunt efficiency' with which he undertook his duties. In 1892, as well as continuing the court's subdivision work, he took on two additional and significant tasks – the definition of relative interests (as discussed in section 10.4.4) and the levying of survey liens (see section 10.6.2). Contentious cases 'that might have previously taken weeks were dealt with in a matter of days', and judgments were rendered similarly quickly.<sup>362</sup> As discussed in section 10.4.3.7, the differing styles of the court's judges could also extend into their decision-making, leaving Māori vulnerable to inconsistencies between different cases.

Judge Gudgeon was also rather more blunt in tone than Judge Mair had been. He seems to have had a particular antipathy towards Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga, which was occasionally reflected in his comments in court. In 1892, for instance, he scolded Kīngitanga-affiliated Waikato claimants for having failed to behave 'in a sensible manner' by not appearing before the court during the original Aotea-Rohe Potae investigation in 1886. They were, he declared, 'now paying the penalty of their own foolishness' and sharing a block – Te Awaroa – that they were likely solely entitled to.<sup>363</sup> On other occasions during his second term in Ōtorohanga, he referred to Tāwhiao as 'that wretched object the Maori King' and noted that it was 'useless to wait for the Ngati Rora who can never be depended upon since they are half Hauhaus and wholly Kingite.'<sup>364</sup> On the other hand, Gudgeon's ire was also occasionally directed to the Crown, as in the case of a survey error relating to the Waiaraia, Umukaimata, and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1 blocks (see section 10.7.2.3).<sup>365</sup>

It is possible that Mair and Gudgeon's first terms on the Ōtorohanga court ended because they had displeased Crown officials. As detailed in section 10.4.4, the Ōtorohanga court's failure under Judge Mair to define relative interests had been a source of considerable frustration for the Crown's purchasing ambitions in Te

---

359. Document A79, p 389; submission 3.4.305, p 46.

360. Document A79, p 390.

361. Document A79, pp 389-390.

362. Document A79, pp 234-235.

363. Document A79, pp 145-146.

364. Document A79, p 382.

365. Document A79, pp 394-395.

Rohe Pōtae. He was one of five judges whose positions were disestablished in April 1891 by the Liberal Government, ostensibly for a retrenchment and reorganisation of the court.<sup>366</sup> Judge Gudgeon's entreaties on behalf of the owners of Umukaimata and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1, meanwhile, reputedly inspired John McKenzie, the Minister of Lands and Agriculture, to declare that 'I'm damned if he (Gudgeon) will go back to that place (Otorohanga).'<sup>367</sup> Unlike Mair, Gudgeon's position was not disestablished; rather, he was moved to another district. In the event, Mair was reappointed as a judge in 1894, and both he and Gudgeon eventually returned to Ōtorohanga. Ultimately, we do not have sufficient evidence to draw any firm conclusions about the seemingly abrupt ends to Mair and Gudgeon's first terms on the Ōtorohanga court.

Seven Māori assessors served on the Ōtorohanga court between 1890 and 1907, while three served either on rehearings or on the appellate court during the same period.<sup>368</sup> The longest serving assessor during this period was Pirimi Mataiawhea of Te Arawa, who served between 1892 and 1893, and again from July 1897 until the close of the court's 1905 session.<sup>369</sup> He was a leader of Te Arawa who, like other assessors on the Ōtorohanga court before him, had fought for 'loyalist' forces during the wars of the 1860s and 1870s.<sup>370</sup>

The importance of assessors in the court's processes and decision-making declined during this period. Until 1894, the assessor's assent was still required for a decision of the court to be valid. The Native Land Court Act 1894, however, dropped this requirement, meaning that the assessor was now there purely to assist the judge.<sup>371</sup> The role of the assessor was further diminished in 1896, after which an assessor was no longer required for the hearing of succession cases.<sup>372</sup>

From 1892 on, the extent of involvement by the assessors in the court's work is less clear than in earlier years. The assessors continued to play a mediation role and to check witness testimony against evidence given in earlier cases. Faced with a boycott of the court by Ngāti Maniapoto in 1896, for instance, the assessor was tasked with explaining to the parties why the court's business should proceed.<sup>373</sup> Their role during hearings, however, seems to have diminished. Drs Husbands and Mitchell analysed nine particularly contentious subdivision cases for the Rangitoto–Tuhua block heard between August 1897 and July 1898, in which the parties disputed the histories of occupation of the blocks concerned. The assessors should have been well placed to question the witnesses on these issues. However,

---

366. Document A79, p 233.

367. Document A79, p 395.

368. Document A79, pp 448–449. The assessors to serve on the Native Land Court were Paratene Ngata (1886–89), Nikorima Poutotara (1890, 1894), Pirimi Mataiawhea (1892–93, 1897–1905), Karaka Tarawhiti (1894), Reha Aperahama (1896), Mita Taupopoki (1896), and Te Karepu Haerehuka (1906–07). Tata Tamati was involved in rehearings at Kāwhia and Ōtorohanga in 1894. On the Native Appellate Court, the assessors were Nikorima Poutotara (1900) and Poata Mereamo (1904–05).

369. Document A79, pp 396, 448.

370. Document A79, p 396.

371. Native Land Court Act 1894, s18.

372. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896, s6.

373. Document A79, pp 402–403.

the historians found that while the assessors were engaged during court hearings, they no longer seemed to play a central or pivotal role. In the nine cases, the assessor questioned 11 of the total 54 witnesses called, while the judge examined 29 of the witnesses.<sup>374</sup> The assessors, then, took ‘a supporting rather than a leading role’ during this period, perhaps reflecting their diminishing powers under native land legislation.<sup>375</sup>

10.5.1.6 Timing, notification, and location of hearings

On average, the court sat for around 90 days each year between 1892 and 1907, though some years saw very little activity while others were much busier. In 1892, for instance, the court opened on 250 days, while the next year it opened for just six.<sup>376</sup> The Native Land Court therefore had the potential to be a significant presence in – and disruption to – the lives of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

During his first term on the Ōtorohanga court, Judge Mair had been willing to accommodate the wishes of Māori around harvest time and adjourn sittings on request.<sup>377</sup> After his departure, however, the court appears to have frequently sat during harvest season. Drs Husbands and Mitchell recorded that:

The Court sat through August, September, October and November in 1892 and 1897, and August through October in 1896. It was in session in the early part of the year, from January until at least the end of March in 1892, 1898, 1899, 1901, 1904, 1905 and 1907. In 1898 the Court sat more or less continuously in Otorohanga from 11 January to 14 July before relocating to Te Kuiti from 22 July until 20 August. In 1899, it worked largely without interruption from the middle of January until the beginning of July, breaking only to relocate between Te Kuiti and Kawhia and then Kawhia and Otorohanga.<sup>378</sup>

It is unclear whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were requesting adjournments for cultivations throughout this period, or how the court responded to their requests. On at least a few occasions, Māori were able to gain adjournments for harvest season. They did so either by request or, in the case of a sitting in 1901, by simply not turning up to court.<sup>379</sup>

Under the provisions of the various Native Land Acts that applied during the period covered by this chapter, the chief judge was generally required to give notice of the receipt of an application ‘in such manner as appears to him best calculated to give [it] proper publicity’. Such notice was also to include the ‘day and place when and where the Court will sit for hearing the application.’<sup>380</sup> According to the

374. Document A79, pp 399–401.

375. Document A79, p 403.

376. Document A79, p 333.

377. Document A79, pp 174–175.

378. Document A79, p 299.

379. Document A79, pp 299–300.

380. As, for example, in the Native Land Court Act 1880, ss 20–21.

general rules of the court, notices were to be inserted in both the Kahiti o Niu Tireni in te reo Māori and in the Gazette in English. Copies were also required to be sent to a variety of interested parties, including the resident magistrates, native assessors, claimants, counter-claimants, objectors, and other relevant parties.<sup>381</sup>

There were no guidelines for how much time was considered adequate notice of a hearing. In practice, the amount of time between the publication of a notice and the advertised beginning of a hearing in Te Rohe Pōtae could vary considerably. In the period between 1892 and 1902, the amount of time given as notice ranged from 5 days to 43 days.<sup>382</sup> The median amount of notice given was 19 days.<sup>383</sup> Sometimes very little notice was given: on seven occasions during the same period, the court gave eight days or less notice before the beginning of sittings. On most of these occasions, a relatively small number of applications were gazetted, but this was not always the case. The 8 March 1894 notice, for example, was published just five days before the commencement of the advertised sitting on 13 March, but included 174 applications.<sup>384</sup> We did not receive any evidence about how long it took for notices to be physically distributed in Te Rohe Pōtae. This would have had an impact on the effectiveness of the notices, particularly where very little notice was given.

Even where adequate notice was given of a court sitting, there were no guarantees that the sitting would begin on the date advertised. At one extreme, for example, two Kinohaku West cases advertised to be heard in Te Kūiti on 19 August 1898 were not heard until at least March 1899.<sup>385</sup> The court had been adjourned a week earlier due to the absence of Judge Gudgeon. Despite this, on 19 August there was still 'a large attendance of natives and other parties interested' at court due to the Gazette notice.<sup>386</sup> The court was adjourned until early September, perhaps the result of a request from claimants for an adjournment to allow them to tend to their cultivations. In the end, the court does not appear to have sat again until mid-January 1899; the reasons for this delay are unclear.<sup>387</sup> It then had to deal with a backlog of previously gazetted cases before moving on to the cases advertised in July and August of the previous year.

The sheer number of applications advertised in each notice could have a significant impact on the actual start date of court hearings. A hearing originally scheduled to begin in late April 1897 did not begin until mid-July – a delay of 81 days. The notice for the hearing advertised 795 cases. Similarly, a hearing of 421 cases scheduled to begin mid-February 1902 did not commence until late June, a delay of 126 days.<sup>388</sup>

---

381. Native Land Court Rules 1882.

382. Document A79, pp 447–448.

383. Document A79, p 373.

384. Document A79, pp 447–448.

385. Document A79, p 447.

386. (1898) 33 Otorohanga MB 374.

387. The claimants had made a request for an adjournment to allow them to tend to their crops, but it is unclear if this request was acted on by the court or if the adjournment until September was the result of other factors; see (1898) 33 Otorohanga MB 374–375.

388. Document A79, pp 447–448.

The court in Te Rohe Pōtae continued to sit most often in Ōtorohanga. But as the nature of the court's business changed from the 1890s on, the court occasionally sat in other locations when it was more convenient to do so. These locations included Kāwhia, Kihikihi, Te Kūiti, and Taumarunui. Between 1892 and 1907, the court spent 1,052 days sitting in Ōtorohanga and 381 days sitting on other locations.<sup>389</sup>

It is unclear if Māori were usually involved in the decision to move the location of court sittings. On at least some occasions, Māori successfully petitioned the court to have their cases moved to more accessible locations. In 1892, for instance, a series of Kawhia cases that had been gazetted for Ōtorohanga were moved to Kāwhia on the request of Māori.<sup>390</sup> The same happened in 1899 for Kawhia cases gazetted for Te Kūiti.<sup>391</sup>

10.5.2 Partitioning and title fragmentation

When the initial hapū subdivisions were made in Te Rohe Pōtae, the immediate outcome was typically a large block with a significant number of individual owners. Each had an undivided interest that was not marked out on the ground. There was, as already discussed, no provision for communal management of the land or of these interests before 1894. The incorporation model, introduced in that year's Native Land Court Act, did not prove attractive to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. In these circumstances, partitioning offered the main avenue for owners seeking to having their interests defined and to therefore create landholdings that were usable in the new economy.

At the same time, Crown pre-emption was in place, and the Crown's purchasing programme, particularly throughout the 1890s, was increasingly active. The Crown, as will be explored more in chapter 11, conducted its purchasing by attrition, buying the shares of individual owners and later applying to have its interests cut out, necessitating partitioning.

The Crown only rarely purchased entire blocks. For instance, of the 61 blocks in which the Crown applied to have its interests defined by the court in 1898, it had purchased only nine in whole. Most of the blocks it purchased whole were small and had only a few owners. In the 52 blocks which it had not acquired in whole, the Crown had to have its interests partitioned out. Of the 61 blocks the court processed that year, the Crown had purchased an average of 69 per cent of the shares. In 20 of the 61 blocks, the Crown had purchased less than a majority of the shares. In three Kinohaku East blocks, for instance, it purchased less than a quarter of shares in each block, including in Kinohaku East 1 (Ototoika), where it acquired only 12.5 per cent of the shares.<sup>392</sup>

In blocks where it had not succeeded in acquiring all shares before applying to the court to have its interests cut out, the Crown frequently continued

---

389. Document A79, p 281.

390. Puketarata (1892) 12 Ōtorohanga MB 122–123.

391. Document A79, p 376.

392. Document A79, pp 257–258.

its purchasing in the ‘residue’ blocks owned by non-sellers. Where these efforts were successful, further partitioning was necessary. This process was sometimes repeated several times.<sup>393</sup> In subdivisions of Kinohaku East 2 (Pakeho), for instance, the Crown had its interests defined 20 times between November 1897 and April 1908. In this way, the original area was not only progressively alienated, but the land remaining in Māori ownership became increasingly fragmented.<sup>394</sup>

A further example of how the Crown’s purchasing could cause multiple rounds of partitioning can be seen in Puketarata. The court awarded the Crown interests in 44 different Puketarata blocks between March 1894 and October 1901. Drs Husbands and Mitchell stated that the owners of these blocks ‘were subjected to successive waves of Crown purchasing followed by Court decreed partition’. The Crown was first awarded its interests in 15 blocks in March 1894. It then continued purchasing, including in subdivisions allocated to non-sellers after its first round of purchasing. Subsequent partitions to allocate the Crown its newly acquired interests occurred between November 1897 and June 1898, and again in January and February 1901. Although the Crown acquired 13 of these 44 blocks outright, in 11 blocks it had acquired less than 20 per cent of the shares when it applied to have its interest cut out.<sup>395</sup>

The deficiencies of the native title system and the effects of the Crown’s purchasing programme therefore made Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landholdings increasingly uncertain during this period. This uncertainty put significant pressure on Māori to further subdivide their land themselves. Partitioning presented an opportunity to reduce the number of owners on each title to a more manageable amount, allowing the possibility of farming or development. Partitioning also helped to secure ownership: as well as reducing the number of owners to keep track of, it defined where interests lay on the ground and so provided some certainty in the face of the destabilising influence of Crown purchasing.

The result of this partitioning, whether initiated by Crown purchasing or by Māori themselves, was the fragmentation of land holdings. Fragmentation was not simply legal, but also geographical, creating smaller, dispersed blocks of land in which ownership interests were concentrated. Sometimes this partitioning was strategic, an attempt to consolidate land holdings in order to facilitate development – though it could have the opposite effect if blocks were rendered uneconomic in the process. Other partitioning was motivated by the desire to have smaller whānau blocks. An example of such ‘family partitioning’ can be seen in Rangitoto A. Created in 1900, the block was originally 109,215 acres with 1,042 owners. It was subdivided in 1904 into 69 sections, around half of which had fewer than 10 owners.<sup>396</sup>

At the same time, partitioning could also be a difficult process to control, particularly with the continuation of Crown purchasing activity. All too often

---

393. Document A79, p 261.

394. Document A79, p 263.

395. Document A79, pp 265–266.

396. Document A146, pp 411–412; doc A60, pp 875–876.

the outcome was over-subdivision, with a preponderance of small, uneconomic blocks. Partitioning also incurred further court fees, survey costs, and other court-related costs (see section 10.6). The scale of partitioning taking place in Te Rohe Pōtae was commented on by the Stout–Ngata commission in 1907. This commission was established to report on ‘unoccupied or not profitably occupied’ land and to recommend how such land could ‘best be settled in the interests of the Native Owners and the public good’.<sup>397</sup> Having visited Te Rohe Pōtae, the commissioners commented: ‘We are not aware of any Native district, which until 1888 was closed to the law-courts, where the Native Land Court has been so active and where subdivision has proceeded so far as in this portion of the Rohe-Potae.’ They singled out Kinohaku East, Hauturu East and West, Pirongia, and Rangitoto–Tuhua as areas that were particularly fragmented.<sup>398</sup>

Roy Haar told us about the example of Rangitoto–Tuhua 60.<sup>399</sup> The experience of this block indicates the frequency of partitioning that occurred in some of the blocks in Te Rohe Pōtae. Originally created in 1900 with 153 owners, the block was subdivided into nine blocks in 1904. Four of these subdivisions had between 23 and 34 owners; the remaining five had fewer than 11. By 1929, however, the 1904 subdivisions had been partitioned an additional 47 times.<sup>400</sup>

The example of Kinohaku East 2 section 28 illustrates just how quickly the partitioning process sometimes moved. Kinohaku East was originally partitioned between 1888 and 1892 into 17 subdivisions. Kinohaku East 2 (Pakeho), created in 1888, was the largest of these initial subdivisions at 29,250 acres and had 236 owners. This block was partitioned in 1897 into 28 subdivisions that averaged 1,017 acres in size, and ranged from one to nearly 10,000 acres. Kinohaku East 2 section 28 was the largest subdivision to remain in Māori ownership, at around 4,404 acres with 41 owners. Section 28 was then itself partitioned in 1902 into 17 sections ranging from five to 1,480 acres, with an average size of 243 acres. Most of these new blocks had less than 10 owners, indicating that the partition had been intended to secure the owners’ interests.<sup>401</sup> This all occurred in the space of less than 15 years.

The way that the Native Land Court went about partitioning created other problems for Māori landowners. Although the court in Te Rohe Pōtae began by conducting tribal, then hapū subdivisions, it processed subsequent partitions according to the applications that it received. This ad hoc form of partitioning was contrary ‘to the known and accepted principles of land economy’.<sup>402</sup> The resulting subdivisions were not always viable economic units, limiting the development opportunities for their owners (as will be discussed more in section 10.5.4). A particularly damaging outcome of the court’s ad hoc approach to partitioning was that

397. Document A79, p 264.

398. R Stout & A T Ngata, ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District (An Interim Report)’, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, pp 2–3.

399. Document s29 (Haar), p 6.

400. Document s29(a) (Haar appendixes), pp 2–5; doc A60, pp 974–977.

401. Document A79, pp 494–495.

402. Document A146, pp 611–612.

Map 10.3: Partitions of Kinohaku East 2 (Pakeho) land could end up with restricted access or, in the worst-case scenario, no access at all ('landlocked land').

We heard from several claimants who have interests in landlocked land. John Hone Arama Tata Henry of Ngāti Maniapoto, for instance, gave evidence about Puketiti 4B, which has been landlocked since its partition in 1906. To access the block, the owners have to seek the permission of owners of two other blocks of land. Mr Henry told us that, as a result, the owners cannot easily access or develop the land, nor raise the finance needed to gain access to the block.<sup>403</sup>

Tangiwai Hana King of Ngāti Mahuta told us that there are several landlocked blocks within the Taharoa block, located at the southern mouth of Kāwhia Harbour.<sup>404</sup> Attempts by the owners to provide access to some of the landlocked blocks within Taharoa have failed. In 1912, for instance, Turanga Te Wania designated 19 acres of Taharoa A1C as a roadway to access the surrounding blocks. However, the roadway was never formed, nor linked with public roads. As a result, 403. Document 016 (Henry), pp 21–22; submission 3.4.160, pp 75–77.

404. Document 11 (King), p 4; submission 3.4.171, pp 24–40.

Map 10.4: Taharoa A6D2 of the 19 blocks adjoining the roadway, only one block has access to a public road today.<sup>405</sup>

Another landlocked block is Ramatiti (Taharoa A6D2), the land where Ms King’s mother and grandmother grew up. Landlocked since creation, the block’s owners initially relied on the Māori land between Ramatiti and the road for access.

405. Document J1, pp 6–7.

However, the adjoining Māori land was sold in 1942. Since then, in order to access the land, the owners have had to either rely on permission from adjoining land-owners or approach the land by sea.<sup>406</sup> These landlocked blocks in Taharoa have created numerous difficulties for the owners. Without access, the land is difficult to develop and valued less. Often, the only option is sell to adjoining farmers, something that Ms King told us ‘has happened on so many occasions.’<sup>407</sup> The impacts of landlocked land on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori will be further addressed in future chapters of our report.

10.5.3 Succession and the fractionation of interests

At the same time as titles were fragmenting, creating an ever-greater number of increasingly small blocks, succession laws were causing the interests in those titles to fractionate.

The Native Land Court Act 1880 provided that the court should process successions ‘according to Native custom or usage.’<sup>408</sup> Under tikanga Māori, occupation was as important as descent as a means of succeeding to the land.<sup>409</sup> From an early stage, however, the Native Land Court misinterpreted custom and determined instead that all descendants of a deceased owner held equal entitlements in land inherited from their parents, regardless of whether they occupied the land.<sup>410</sup> This became the rule it would apply, and thus succession orders were made in favour of all the children of the deceased in equal shares, whether they occupied the land or not. This meant that, following the deaths of the original owner or owners, the number of owners on each title increased. This process was repeated every time an owner died, meaning that titles became very congested over time. In turn, the value of interests in a block – both in terms of the amount realisable by sale or lease, or of profits from development – declined for each owner.

The impact of the court’s succession rules and the fractionation that resulted was amplified by two other factors. The Māori population, rather than declining as had been expected by Europeans, instead grew steadily after 1900, including in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>411</sup> At the same time, the amount of land remaining in Māori ownership significantly decreased. Less land therefore had to be shared between many more people.

There are several examples of the impact of fractionation in Te Rohe Pōtae caused by the Native Land Court’s succession rules. Once the court had made a title order, it did not take long for successors to begin to crowd titles. When Te Moani Mauritu, sole owner of the 102-acre Kinohaku East 2 section 28B6, died in 1910, his seven children inherited the block in equal shares. Similarly, the 78-acre Kinohaku East 2 section 28B3 was originally awarded to five owners, but by 1920 it had 11 owners owing to successions resulting from the deaths of three of the

---

406. Document J1, pp 11, 14–15.

407. Document J1, p 5.

408. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 45.

409. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 690.

410. Document A79, p 500.

411. Document A146, p 101.

original owners.<sup>412</sup> Thomas Tūwhangai told us of the 6,572-acre Hurakia block, originally created in 1891 with 367 owners.<sup>413</sup> By 1936, when the remaining 1,768 acres in Māori ownership were consolidated as Hurakia A1, there were 297 owners on the title – only 70 owners fewer than when the block was more than three times bigger. As of 2014, there were 1,846 owners.<sup>414</sup>

Over time, with more and more successions, the issue has become particularly pronounced in some blocks. Dr Beryl Roa told us, for instance, that at the time of our hearings in 2013 the 301-acre (122 hectares) Kopua A2 had 716 owners, with ‘hundreds of descendants’ still to succeed to the block. For most, she said, this block ‘is their only entitlement left in Kopua One’, a block that was originally 9,375 acres.<sup>415</sup>

10.5.4 Effects on economic development

By the time the Aotea–Rohe Potae block went through the court in 1886, the New Zealand economy was in the midst of significant changes. Improvements in transport, such as the arrival of refrigerated shipping and the building of railways, changed the nature of New Zealand farming. Once subsistence-based, farming instead was becoming an intensive industry, dependent not just on additional stock but ‘sustained improvements in the productivity of land, labour, and stock’. While this shift required significant investment, it resulted in surpluses of meat, butter, and cheese for profitable export. At the same time, wheat, once a mainstay of the Te Rohe Pōtae economy, declined in importance.<sup>416</sup>

Drs Husbands and Mitchell argued that ‘Maori in the Rohe Potae district should have been well placed to take advantage of changes in the national economy’. They had retained ownership of most of their lands, some of which were likely to be ideal for pastoral and dairy farming. They also possessed other valuable resources, such as the ‘[e]xtensive stands of timber on lands soon to be made accessible by the arrival of the railway.’<sup>417</sup> Perhaps most significantly, they had the railway and should have stood to gain both from its construction and from the increased value of their land.

Native Land Court title was supposed to go some way towards facilitating the entry of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into the colonial economy. Of course, title alone was not sufficient for successful economic development: resources, knowledge, access to finance, and stable institutional arrangements were also important.<sup>418</sup> However, title influenced the ability of Māori to retain land and its attendant resources, as well their ability to raise capital, either through sale or finance.

---

412. Document A79, pp 500–501.

413. Hurakia (1891) 28 Waikato MB 179–185.

414. Document R13 (Tūwhangai), pp 32–33; doc R13(a) (Tūwhangai appendixes), pp 1, 16.

415. Document O3 (Roa), p 5; doc A91, p 313.

416. Document A146, pp 381–382; doc A79, p 508.

417. Document A79, p 508.

418. Document A146, p 18.

The benefits that were touted to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori before the court entered the district did not, for the most part, eventuate. By 1901 – 15 years after the introduction of the court into Te Rohe Pōtae – Māori appear to have been behind Pākehā on several economic indicators. Compared to Pākehā, not as much Māori land was in crops or in sown grass, and they had fewer cattle or pigs per capita.<sup>419</sup> Sheep grazing, which was thriving amongst Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by 1890, declined as more land (particularly those lands suitable for farming) were alienated.<sup>420</sup> Dairy farming became a major part of the Te Rohe Pōtae economy, though it was again a Pākehā-dominated industry. There was the bright spot of the Te Kuiti Co-operative Dairy Factory Company, which involved a number of Māori shareholders. But even they, the 1907 commission reported, were not ‘farming on an efficient scale.’<sup>421</sup> Timber-cutting leases provided Te Rohe Pōtae Māori some income, though not enough to enable them to run their own saw-milling operations.<sup>422</sup> These measures had become even more skewed by the 1930s, at which point most Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were economically marginalised, with less land, wealth, and income than their Pākehā neighbours.<sup>423</sup>

The impacts of partitioning and the court’s succession rules left Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land increasingly susceptible to alienation, and to Crown purchasing in particular. When the court arrived in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1886, Māori had retained control over almost all of their land. However, by 1910, this situation had changed dramatically: more than half of the inquiry district had been alienated.

It was not simply the amount of land retained by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, but the way that it was held. As outlined above, uneconomic blocks and interests became a common feature of land holding in Te Rohe Pōtae, the result of a court system that paid little regard to what was needed by Māori for economic development. These blocks were small, geographically fragmented, often with an unmanageable number of owners, and sometimes with restricted or no access. The pressures of Crown purchasing, as well as the lack of an effective mechanism for communal management of land, encouraged partition or alienation rather than development, exacerbating the problem further.

By the early twentieth century, these problems were becoming clear to both Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. As will be discussed in chapter 12, when preparing vested lands for settlement, for instance, the Department of Lands and Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Land Board chose to ignore the partitions originally created by the court, indicating they were not suitable for farming.<sup>424</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, along with others, began calling for an improved system. At Easter 1909, for instance, some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori attended an important

---

419. Document A79, pp 508–511.

420. Document A79, pp 512–514.

421. R Stout and AT Ngata, ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District’, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 8; doc A79, pp 515–516.

422. Document A79, pp 517–518.

423. Document A146(b) (Hearn summary), pp 14–15.

424. Document s5 (Pumipi), p 4.

hui at Tokaanu convened by Te Heuheu Tukino to discuss various land matters. Among other things, the attendees – numbering ‘500 or 600’ – criticised the court’s system of partitioning.<sup>425</sup> Specifically, the hui resolved:

In the matters of partitions :–Before the partition of any block by the Native Land Court, there should be placed before the Court a sketch plan, together with the report of an authorised surveyor, pointing out the best road-lines upon such land, so that the Court shall be enabled to give each subdivision means of access, either by abutment upon the road, or by some approach to that road. There should be some means whereby the Registrar of the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court may give effect to a partition agreed to in writing signed by all the parties owning or holding an interest in the land.<sup>426</sup>

We do not have any evidence of how the Crown responded to this call to institute a more orderly, planned system of partitioning.

If Māori owners chose not to partition down to smaller, family subdivisions, they faced significant uncertainty as to the location of their land interests. Often occupation could lead to disputes between owners. What was needed was a management regime that enhanced collective ownership and controlled occupation. No such management system existed until 1894. In 1891, William Rees and James Carroll explained the problem:

As every single person in a list of owners comprising, perhaps, over a hundred names had as much right to occupy as anybody else, personal occupation for improvement or tillage was encompassed with uncertainty. If a man sowed a crop, others might allege an equal right to the produce. If a few fenced in a paddock or small run for sheep or cattle, their co-owners were sure to turn their stock or horses into the pasture. That apprehension of results which paralyses industry cast its shadow over the whole Maori people.<sup>427</sup>

Similarly, in larger blocks, the Crown could purchase a minority of undivided interests over the course of several years before triggering a partition of its interests. In the interim, Māori were deterred from developing their land.<sup>428</sup>

Economic development also required access to capital. As will be discussed in future chapters of our report, this was a particular problem for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. While Native Land Court titles made it easy for Māori to sell interests in land, it proved difficult for them to do anything else with their land. Gaining financing on native title, even from the Crown, was difficult.<sup>429</sup> Selling land was 425. ‘Tokaanu Maori Conference’, Auckland Star, 17 April 1909, p 4; doc A146, p 395.

426. ‘Maori Lands’, Dominion, 31 May 1909, p 6.

427. ‘Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws,’ AJHR, 1891, G-1, pp x-xi; doc A79, p 491.

428. Document A146, p 406.

429. Document A146(b), p 8.

also an option to raise capital for development, but the low prices the Crown paid for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land severely limited their ability to accumulate capital. One justification the Crown gave at the time for the low prices it set for Māori land was the higher transaction costs associated with multiple ownership – a result of the titling and Māori land management system it had itself imposed.<sup>430</sup>

The Crown failed to provide Te Rohe Pōtae Māori with the kind of stable title that would have facilitated greater economic development. As has been seen, Native Land Court titles were by no means static. They were subject to partitioning every time the Crown made purchases, or when owners wanted to secure their interests through subdivision. Succession laws that were contrary to Māori custom could dramatically and frequently increase the number of owners in each block. In addition, the statutory regime governing native land title was also in constant flux, with a barrage of law changes over the years. Each amendment further affected collective and individual rights, and meant that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners had to be constantly vigilant to maintain their rights. The instability of native land legislation stands in stark contrast to the stability of the Torrens title system governing general land. The fundamental tenet of that system – indefeasibility of title – has not changed since 1870. The effect of these constant changes in tenure and the status of land was uncertainty that was severely detrimental to investment and successful economic development.

10.5.5 Effects on tribal organisation and society

The management and retention of land was not just an economic matter for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Land was central to both Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tribal organisation and society. The titles awarded by the Native Land Court had long-lasting effects on both.

The previous sections examined how patterns of Māori landholding changed following the introduction of the Native Land Court into Te Rohe Pōtae, particularly as a result of partition and succession. The Crown has accepted ‘that the individualisation of Māori land tenure provided for by the native land laws made the lands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori iwi and hapū more susceptible to fragmentation, alienation and partition, and that this contributed to the undermining of tribal structures in Te Rohe Pōtae’. The Crown has conceded ‘that its failure to protect these tribal structures was a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>431</sup>

At first, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders had been able to exercise some control over the court process, with partitions first awarded on an iwi and then hapū basis. Eventually, however, the combination of individual titles, increasing partitioning, and the lack of a mechanism for the communal management of land meant that the traditional leadership of Te Rohe Pōtae lost its influence over decision-making for the collective. With individuals able to sell their interests without reference to the collective, maintaining control over the pace and extent of alienation became almost impossible for Māori rangatira and communities. It also made it very difficult for those communities to make strategic decisions about their land, or to develop tribal lands. Partitioning, which could be done in an attempt to defend against further sales, also had the effect of continuing the shift away from communal control of land by iwi and hapū to individual owners.

---

430. Document A146, p 211.

431. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

As discussed in section 10.3.1, the decrease in tribal control caused by the operations of the court and the new title system was not unintended on the part of the Crown. Henry Sewell, for instance, hoped that the court would lead, among other things, to ‘the detribalisation of the Maoris’.<sup>432</sup> Just as importantly, by 1886, after the court had had a similar impact in several other districts, the court’s impact on Māori tribal organisation was certainly not unknown. In 1892, Wilkinson reported that ‘the Native Land Court, in doing away with old Maori title to land and substituting a European one for it, has almost entirely destroyed the influence that the chiefs formerly had over their people in the matter of the disposal of their land’. As a result, he said ‘Jack is now as good as his master’.<sup>433</sup>

This decrease in tribal control was not, however, what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had wanted prior to the entry of the court into the district. Indeed, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rangatira continued to act on behalf of their people. Their attempts, however, were most often rebuffed by the Crown. In March 1894, for example, a group of prominent members of Ngāti Kinohaku wrote to the premier concerning their land at Ototoika (Kinohaku East 1). They pointed out that they and their ‘ancestors and parents’ had lived on the land for seven generations. They requested that the land ‘be permanently reserved for us and our descendants forever to be a permanent settlement for us and our dead’, with no subdivisions made.<sup>434</sup> In response, Wilkinson, while noting that the letter had come from ‘leading members of the tribe’ and that ‘there may be a good deal of truth’ to their claims, dismissed the letter as ‘mere sentiment’. He instead reaffirmed the rights of the individual owners ‘to decide themselves whether he will or will not sell his interest’.<sup>435</sup> The Crown then commenced purchasing of the block in 1894 and partitioned its interests out in 1898.

The contrast between Wilkinson’s attitude in 1894 and that of the Native Ministers a decade before is stark. Prior to the court’s entry into the district, the Crown recognised that it needed the cooperation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for the establishment of the court. This was a recognition of the mana that the traditional structures of authority continued to wield in Te Rohe Pōtae, particularly when compared to other parts of the North Island. Yet by 1894, just eight years after the court had been operating, Wilkinson could dismiss the concerns of rangatira over their land as ‘mere sentiment’ and commence purchasing from those individuals who were prepared to sell.

---

432. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 669.

433. ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts’, AJHR, 1892, G-3, p 5; doc A79, p 528.

434. Document A79, pp 270–271.

435. Document A79, p 271.

10.5.6 Treaty analysis and findings

The court continued to be a significant – and potentially disruptive – presence in the lives of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during this period. The court continued to sit mostly in Ōtorohanga, but also sat in other locations when it was more convenient to do so for the parties involved. Other aspects of the court's process became less flexible: sitting for around 90 days each year between 1892 and 1907, it increasingly did so throughout the year, including during harvest season.

The amount of notice given for court hearings in Te Rohe Pōtae varied considerably during this period, and there were sometimes significant delays between the advertised date of a sitting and the actual start date. The claimants submitted that the 'notification of hearings of the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae did not allow for proper (and on occasion any) participation by the relevant parties'.<sup>436</sup> The Crown accepted there were delays, but cautioned that there was no evidence to indicate how Māori responded to delays in practice, making it difficult to assess whether they suffered any prejudice.<sup>437</sup> We consider it likely that some Māori were prejudiced by these delays, but do not have sufficient evidence to make any firm finding.

During this period, the influence that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could exert over the court process declined. While some subdivision work did continue, including the particularly contentious subdivision of Rangitoto–Tuhua, the court's activities increasingly shifted from the business of title determination to the business of processing the Crown's purchases of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land. Figures like Native Land Purchase Officer Wilkinson increasingly took centre stage. The dynamics between the judges and Māori assessors also changed. A series of legislative amendments in the 1890s steadily eroded the position of assessors.<sup>438</sup> As a result, they appear to have become less active participants in the court process.

As the Crown's involvement in the court process increased, the distinctions between the Crown and the Native Land Court sometimes blurred. Crown and court officials were in frequent contact about the court's business and how it related to the Crown's purchasing programme. On occasion, judges of the Native Land Court were also involved in these discussions. We consider that, while there is only evidence of this occurring twice, it was nonetheless wholly inappropriate for Crown officials to have contacted judges in this way. We agree with the National Park Tribunal that the Crown failed 'to create a clear enough distinction between its land purchasing programme and the adjudicative responsibilities of the court'.<sup>439</sup>

The Crown has conceded that, prior to 1894, it failed to provide a form of title that enabled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities to control their land and resources collectively, in breach of the Treaty and its principles. What was needed at this point was some management regime that could complement collective

---

436. Submission 3.4.107, p 87.

437. Submission 3.4.305, pp 51–53.

438. Document A79, p 398.

439. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kahui Maunga, vol 1, p 332.

decision-making over such titles. The Crown's view is that the incorporation model provided for in the Native Land Court Act 1894 was a Treaty-compliant mechanism for the collective management of Māori land that mitigated the form of title provided. As will be discussed in a future chapter of our report, incorporations did not prove popular with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori before the second half of the twentieth century. One incorporation was formed early on, in 1895, but was later regarded by John Ormsby as 'an expensive and dismal failure'.<sup>440</sup> We did not receive any evidence of the specific defects that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori found in the 1894 incorporation model.

Other Tribunal panels have pointed to the level of Crown control and the difficulties with raising finance on incorporated land as reasons why Māori in other areas opted not to incorporate. We agree with the Central North Island Tribunal that, at a time when Māori were still seeking greater control of their land and to replace the court with their own committees, 'the incorporation provisions of the 1894 Act were so deficient as to render them useless as a vehicle for the collective tribal management of tribal lands'. That Tribunal concluded: '[we] do not accept the Crown's suggestion that this Act met its Treaty obligation in the 1890s to provide collective management mechanisms.'<sup>441</sup> We agree.

The consequences of the deficiencies of native land title, as well as the lack of an effective mechanism for collective management, began to be felt in Te Rohe Pōtae during the 1890s. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were often left with little choice but to alienate or partition their land. Crown purchasing had a destabilising impact for Māori landowners. They could never be certain what interests the Crown had acquired until it sought their definition in court. This was an ongoing problem, because even after it had its interests defined, the Crown often continued purchasing in residue blocks owned by non-sellers, necessitating further partitioning at a later stage. In the meantime, the remaining owners' efforts to develop their land were paralysed, lest they discover that the land they wanted to develop was actually owned by the Crown. Reducing the number of owners on each title, which necessitated partition and the costs associated with it, became the safest option. Unfortunately, the result of such partitioning, whoever it was initiated by, was the fragmentation of landholdings. While partitioning could facilitate land retention or development, it could also have a negative effect on development if blocks became too small to be economic, or if they became landlocked.

The succession rules adopted by the court also changed the way that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land was held. They set in train a process that would steadily increase the number of owners in each block over time, exacerbating the problems caused by title fragmentation and the lack of an effective system for communal management. An increasing amount of the court's time during this period became dedicated to the processing of successions, indicating the extent of fractionation of ownership interests that was occurring even at this relatively early stage.

---

440. 'Settlement of Native Lands', New Zealand Herald, 21 June 1906, p 5; doc A146, p 431.

441. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 380–381.

The economic benefits that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had expected from the Crown's entry into their rohe did not, for the most part, eventuate. The way that land was held in Te Rohe Pōtae under native land title both encouraged alienation, reducing the economic base of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and made it very difficult for Māori to put their remaining land to effective use. Furthermore, Māori landowners had limited access to capital, and had to contend with an ever-changing landscape of land ownership and native land legislation.

Just as significantly, native land title also changed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori society, diminishing the authority of the collective and of the traditional leadership. Individualisation, whether it resulted in sole ownership or land alienation, made it more difficult for the collective and for tribal leaders to make informed, strategic decisions about their land, or to control the pace of alienation. This was not an unknown consequence by this stage, nor was it entirely unintended.

The Crown has accepted 'that the individualisation of Māori land tenure provided for by the native land laws made the lands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori iwi and hapū more susceptible to fragmentation, alienation and partition, and that this contributed to the undermining of tribal structures in Te Rohe Pōtae'. The Crown has conceded 'that its failure to protect these tribal structures was a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles'.<sup>442</sup>

In making this concession, the Crown has also submitted that it does not consider the individualisation of Māori land tenure, alienation, or partition to necessarily be contrary to Treaty principles, even though they had the effect of undermining tribal structures that it had a Treaty duty to protect.<sup>443</sup> The claimants did not respond directly to this submission, but more generally expressed 'disappointment that throughout their submissions the Crown have reduced the concessions made to only apply in certain circumstances and have attempted to gain back the ground conceded'.<sup>444</sup>

We accept that partition and alienation, whether by sale or lease, were not necessarily contrary to Treaty principles. We agree with the Turanga Tribunal that 'precise boundaries and certainty of ownership' were needed for Māori to successfully engage with the new economy and that 'sales, if controlled, could benefit communities'.<sup>445</sup> But, as the Hauraki Tribunal found, 'there were many possible options for giving greater clarity and definition to land interests without full-scale tenure conversion and abrogation of the customary base'.<sup>446</sup>

The individualisation of Māori land ownership provided by the Crown under the Native land regime was not the only option available. Individualisation primarily benefited the Crown and the settlers who wished to acquire Māori-owned land as easily and quickly as possible. It was not something that Māori had asked for; indeed, in Te Rohe Pōtae, Māori had been clear that they preferred hapū titles.

---

442. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

443. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 112–113 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

444. Submission 3.4.330, p 3.

445. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 439, 510.

446. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 777.

We do not accept the Crown's submission that individualisation was not necessarily contrary to Treaty principles. The Turanga Tribunal made findings relevant to the Native Land Act 1873 and we consider their comments are equally pertinent to the legislation as it existed during this period. They found:

[The 1873 Act's] selective individualisation breached the express guarantee in article 2 of the Treaty's Maori text; the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. Autonomy, authority and control are all commonly understood meanings of this well used phrase. Tino rangatiratanga was promised in respect to 'whenua' (land), 'kainga' (villages), and 'taonga katoa' (all things treasured). Critically, the promise was made explicitly to all levels of right holders in Maori society: 'ki nga rangatira, ki nga hapu, ki nga tangata katoa' ('to the chiefs, hapu, and all the people'). By excluding hapu from sale or lease decisions, the Act removed a separate right holder to which an explicit Treaty promise had been made. By failing to provide legal support to chiefly leadership in questions of land alienation, the Act similarly breached a Treaty promise explicitly made to hapu leaders. In this way, the Act confiscated rights formerly vested in tikanga Maori. It effectively removed from these two levels, the right to participate in the most important decisions the community collectively and its members individually would ever make.<sup>447</sup>

Like the Central North Island Tribunal, we consider that the individualised titles provided by the Native Land Court 'were in fundamental violation of Treaty guarantees' because they 'deprived communities and leaders of their collective rights and their tino rangatiratanga, and created structural pressures for alienation of interests in land.'<sup>448</sup>

We have already found that the Native Land Court regime that the Crown imposed on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori was seriously flawed and was not Treaty compliant. The legislative regime and the form of title that it created undermined rather than upheld the article 2 guarantee concerning land and was therefore inconsistent with the express terms of the Treaty. In addition, we find that in failing to prevent subdivision below hapū titles, and in making provision for the individualisation of interests, the native land legislation further aggravated that Treaty breach.

We consider that the Crown's breaches were also exacerbated by the fact that, by 1886, when the court was introduced into Te Rohe Pōtae, the effects of individualisation on Māori land retention and society were well-known to Māori and to the Crown. In response, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought a different kind of title, one that would primarily be awarded to hapū, not individuals. The Crown's failure to provide or to even contemplate providing such a title was contrary to the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and also breached the Treaty principles of partnership and active protection.

---

447. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 446.

448. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 537.

10.6 WHAT WERE THE COSTS ASSOCIATED WITH THE COURT PROCESS?

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori incurred a range of costs as a result of participating in the Native Land Court. Some costs were the direct result of the court's operations, such as court fees and survey costs. Participation in the court process also gave rise to a variety of other direct and indirect costs. Māori had to travel to attend hearings, and then feed and house themselves while the court was sitting, with all the associated costs. As outlined in section 10.2.3, the claimants argued that the costs charged to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were 'onerous'.<sup>449</sup> The Crown, however, questioned the overall scale and impact of the costs, as well as how unreasonable they were.<sup>450</sup> This section examines in more detail the costs incurred by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori when securing title, considering both the extent of those costs and their reasonableness.

10.6.1 Court fees

The court charged Māori for almost all the work it did (see the sidebar on court fees below). Previous Tribunals have found that, while these fees were 'usually the least of the court-related expenses for Maori communities', they could quickly accumulate.<sup>451</sup> The court charged fees every time that Māori appeared in court – not just for investigations of title, but for rehearings, partitions, subdivisions, and other kinds of case.<sup>452</sup> The costs charged included a daily fee, which at £1 per party was among the highest of the court fees. Similarly, £1 was charged for certificates of title or 'any other order conferring title to land'. The judge had some discretion to reduce or write off court fees; it is not clear how widely used that power was in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>453</sup>

Court costs varied considerably. The initial Aotea–Rohe Potae title investigation took three months. For this, the parties incurred total court fees of £136 2s. The court records of the fees are unclear, but it appears that claimants paid at least £48 8s of the total amount, while counter-claimants paid at least £69 10s.<sup>454</sup> For cases

---

449. Submission 3.4.107, pp 44–45. Several claimants raised issues concerning the costs associated with the court process in Te Rohe Pōtae, including: Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 472, Wai 847, Wai 986, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1016, Wai 1054, Wai 1058, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1437, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2120, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 2313, Wai 2314, Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1386, Wai 1762, Wai 1361 (claim 1.2.5); Wai 478 (submission 3.4.155); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 366, Wai 1064 (submission 3.4.205); Wai 845 (submission 3.4.166); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1059, Wai 50 (submission 3.4.221); Wai 1147, Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234); Wai 483 (submission 3.4.135); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submission 3.4.246); Wai 1962 (submission 3.4.172); Wai 1112, Wai 1113, Wai 1439, Wai 2351, Wai 2353 (submission 3.4.226); Wai 2084 (submission 3.4.174); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141).

450. Submission 3.4.305, p 86.

451. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 508.

452. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1265.

453. See, for example, the 1885 Rules of the Native Land Court Act 1880.

454. Document A79, p 143.

Native Land Court Fees

£1 per day for each party
 2s for swearing in each new witness
 £1 for a certificate of title or 'any other order conferring title to land'
 5s for succession orders
 5s to appoint a new trustee or for approval or sale of lease by trustee
 10s to file an application for exchange or partition of land
 £5 to file an application for rehearing 2s 6d for inspection of any record<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), p 289.

that were dealt with relatively quickly, such as those where out-of-court arrangements had been reached, court fees were generally small.

In contested cases, however, court fees had the potential to become substantial. Often spread over many weeks, if not months, contested cases could quickly accumulate court fees. Although the 36,289-acre Pirongia West had been the product of a particularly contentious partition case in 1888, its subdivision in 1892 went reasonably smoothly at first. Taking just five days, the case incurred fees of £7 6s, mostly from daily fees. But when the subdivision case was reheard in August and September 1894 it took 23 sitting days, for which the court charged another £36 3s in fees. Combined with the fees from the original hearing, the subdivision incurred £43 9s in court fees.<sup>455</sup>

In the case of subdivision and succession cases, court costs could accumulate depending on the number of subdivisions or blocks that were being dealt with. The partition of Kinohaku East 2 section 28 into 17 subdivisions in June 1902, while unopposed, incurred £17 in court fees.<sup>456</sup> Subsequent partitioning could also add to the total cost of bringing land through the court. After its 1894 subdivision rehearing, Pirongia West was partitioned several more times. As a result, a total of £84 13s in court fees was incurred in respect of the block and its subdivisions between 1892 and 1907.<sup>457</sup> In succession cases, distinct succession orders were required for each block the deceased had shares in, even if all shares were to be inherited by the same person. When Tiki Marata inherited his mother's shares in 16 blocks, he incurred £4 2s in court fees, mostly from the five-shilling charge for each subdivision order.<sup>458</sup>

---

455. Document A79, pp 289–290.

456. Document A79, p 292.

457. Document A79, p 291.

458. Document A79, p 292.

10.6.2 Survey costs

Survey costs were generally the highest of all court-related costs. Surveys were an essential part of the native land system established by the Crown. The Native Land Court could not issue a certificate of title unless a survey had been deposited with the court. Right from the first Native Lands Act in 1862, it was expected that Māori would bear the costs of surveying their land.<sup>459</sup>

In Te Rohe Pōtae, the Crown took responsibility for the up-front cost of surveys, but Māori had to pay the eventual bill. If payment was not immediately forthcoming, the court would place a lien on the land for the amount owed.<sup>460</sup> In January 1889, the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori reached an agreement over the cost of subdivisational surveys. The Crown agreed to take charge of the surveys for several blocks, withholding the cost for two years and placing liens on the land under section 25 of the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888. After the two years had passed, Māori would be expected to repay the amount owing in either money or land, or the lien would begin to accrue five per cent interest per annum. In return, Māori agreed to pay the actual cost of survey rather than the schedule rates. They would be able to submit the names of their preferred surveyors and an agreed price to the Crown for each block, though the surveyor-general would ultimately decide who would undertake a particular survey. Presumably this might have allowed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to potentially negotiate lower prices directly with surveyors. Drs Husbands and Mitchell noted that the two-year delay before interest began to accrue ‘was markedly more generous’ than what was provided for in the legislation.<sup>461</sup>

10.6.2.1 The scale of survey costs in Te Rohe Pōtae

In total, Drs Husbands and Mitchell calculated that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were charged £23,728 for survey costs between 1892 and 1907. This figure excludes any interest charged and any survey costs attached to land within the extension areas of our inquiry district.<sup>462</sup> The total figure also does not neatly correspond to a particular acreage, but rather includes the cost of the surveys of every subdivision and partition that occurred within the period. As such, some land would have been counted multiple times as it was repartitioned and then resurveyed. As at 2011, the year Drs Husbands and Mitchell completed their report, the total survey charges were the equivalent of 4.2 million dollars in 2011 dollars.<sup>463</sup>

10.6.2.1.1 FACTORS INFLUENCING THE COST OF SURVEYS

Involving a good deal of time and physical labour, surveys could be an expensive feature of the court process. Surveyors were required to cut a boundary line

---

459. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 509.

460. Document A79, pp 301–302.

461. Document A79, pp 300–301.

462. Document A79, p 307.

463. Document A79, p 308.

four feet wide in forest and two feet wide in open country.<sup>464</sup> They charged for each mile cut at a rate approved by the surveyor-general, and could also charge for some incidentals, such as travel expenses. Surveys had to be conducted to a high degree of accuracy, even in blocks of poor quality or where no alienation was contemplated.<sup>465</sup>

It is somewhat difficult to make comparisons between surveys and the costs charged. Different surveyors conducted each survey for different rates, and each block was unique. However, two general factors that could influence the cost of surveys can be identified: namely, the size of the block being surveyed and its terrain.

The length of the boundary line could contribute to, but was not necessarily determinative of, higher survey costs. Some small blocks cost more to survey on a per acre basis than very large blocks. The 12-acre Kakepuku 8, for instance, cost £4 14s 6d to survey – around five shillings per acre. The 2,554-acre Kakepuku 9, meanwhile, cost £62 10s 7d to survey – just sixpence per acre.<sup>466</sup>

Terrain had more of an influence on survey costs. Surveying of forested, hilly, rugged, or inaccessible land required more work than flat and open land. The contract rates for surveying reflected this contrast, with forest cutting set at twice the rate of cutting through open country.<sup>467</sup> The surveyor of the 13,450-acre Pukenui block, for example, was paid £12 for each mile cut through forested areas, but only £6 per mile for ‘open’ country.<sup>468</sup> The surveys of Marokopa and Kinohaku West, located between Kāwhia and Mōkau, were particularly expensive. Totalling 26 subdivisions, and covering an area of 133,000 acres, these blocks incurred £2,957 in survey costs, fees, and interest.<sup>469</sup> The costs of surveying some subdivisions of the mountainous Rangitoto–Tuhua were particularly high; these are discussed in section 10.6.2.3.

By contrast, the initial cost of surveying open land, such as in the northern part of Te Rohe Pōtae, was usually lower than more difficult terrain. The 2,000-acre Kaipiha block, for example, cost just £27 13s 7d to survey. However, as Drs Husbands and Mitchell pointed out, savings could often be ‘offset by the proliferation of partitions that the surveyor was required to mark out.’<sup>470</sup> In Kakepuku, which adjoined Kaipiha on its eastern boundary, the cost of surveying its 14 subdivisions came to £349 15s 5d. In Puketarata, the surveyor charged £453 7s 8d for the survey of 19 subdivisions. At a price per acre rate, the cost of surveying these blocks (seven pence an acre for Kakepuku and sixpence an acre for Puketarata)

---

464. ‘Survey Regulations Under ‘The Land Act, 1885,’ New Zealand Gazette, 20 May 1886, p 635; doc A79, p 302.

465. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp 1255–1256.

466. Document A79, p 341.

467. Document A79, p 302.

468. Document A79, pp 302–303.

469. Document A79, pp 303–304.

470. Document A79, p 305.

was higher than for Marokopa and Kinohaku West (five pence per acre), both of which were ‘mountainous and forested’.<sup>471</sup>

10.6.2.1.2 THE CUMULATIVE IMPACT OF SURVEY COSTS

As with court fees, the impact of survey costs was cumulative. Each new partition created had to be surveyed, leading to further charges for the Māori owners. These subsequent surveys could add significantly to the amounts owed. Kinohaku East, which the Stout–Ngata commission described in 1907 as ‘minutely subdivided’, provides a dramatic example.<sup>472</sup> The original survey charge for the 53,718-acre block was £393 13s 11d.<sup>473</sup> Between 1895 and 1902, 63 court orders were made for partitions of the block, increasing the total survey charges to £2,096 13s 10d. Nearly half of this amount – £1,038 2s 4d – related to the original partition of Kinohaku East 2 (Pakeho), as well as its subsequent partition in 1897 into 28 sections.<sup>474</sup>

Other significant increases in survey costs following partitions were recorded in Pirongia West, Pukenui, Hauturu East and West, and Kakepuku. In the case of Pirongia West, for instance, survey charges increased in 1902 from £151 10s 10d to £760 15s 5d. In Pukenui, meanwhile, survey charges increased to £418 after originally being charged at £116 6s 6d.<sup>475</sup>

10.6.2.1.3 THE IMPACT OF INTEREST ON SURVEY LIENS

Survey debts, once converted into liens, also incurred interest. Under the 1888 Act, interest was set at five per cent per annum, and began accruing one year after a court order.<sup>476</sup> As already discussed, the Crown and Ngāti Maniapoto agreed in 1889 to extend the one-year grace period to two years for subdivisional surveys. Later legislation gave the court more discretion in charging interest. The Native Land Court Act 1894 allowed the court to set a ‘fair and reasonable’ interest rate not ‘exceed[ing] five per centum per annum’ for a maximum of five years.<sup>477</sup> However, this discretion was short-lived. In 1895, the Crown amended the legislation again, setting interest at five per cent in all instances. The 1895 Act also abolished the one-year grace period, with interest instead calculated ‘from the date of the approval of the survey by the Chief Surveyor’.<sup>478</sup> Drs Husbands and Mitchell

---

471. Document A79, p 305.

472. R Stout and A T Ngata, ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District (An Interim Report)’, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 2.

473. Document A79, p 244.

474. Document A79, p 306; doc A60, pp 319–320. The 1897 partition was set off by the Crown’s application to partition out the 8,787 acres it had purchased in the block. As will be discussed in section 10.6.2.2.3, the Crown would have incurred the outstanding survey charges from the 1895 partition proportional to the interests it had acquired in the block. It would have also paid the new survey charges associated with partitioning the three subdivisions in which its interests were awarded.

475. Document A79, pp 306–307.

476. The Native Land Court Amendment Act 1888, s 25; doc A79, p 308.

477. The Native Land Court Act 1894, s 66; doc A79, p 308.

478. The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, s 67; doc A79, p 309.

argued that, under this new regime, it became ‘much more likely that a lien would be subject to interest charges for a prolonged period – perhaps even the full five years – than had been the case under the former legislative provisions.’<sup>479</sup>

Interest on survey liens could significantly increase the amount of debt owing. Only limited records of the interest charged on survey liens are available, covering the period between 1900 and 1908. However, there is enough information to make some observations about the impact of interest on survey liens during that period. In four Pirongia West subdivisions, the interest charged had added 26 per cent to the original lien by the time the debt was paid off. The original lien for Pirongia West 1 section 2G, for instance, was £34 18s 3d. Interest added £8 14s 7d, which along with a 50 shilling order fee, brought the eventual total to £43 17s 10d – a 26 per cent increase.<sup>480</sup> There were similarly significant percentage increases recorded in some Kinohaku East and Pukenui 2 subdivisions during the same period.<sup>481</sup> The impact of interest on the amount of survey liens for Rangitoto–Tuhua is considered in section 10.6.2.3.

While these increases generally involved ‘relatively modest sums’, they ‘nevertheless placed a significant burden upon what was usually a small number of Maori owners.’<sup>482</sup> Pirongia West 1 section 2G had just five owners. Assuming they held equal shares, each would have been liable for £8 10s 14d, a significant sum at the time.<sup>483</sup>

10.6.2.1.4 CROWN ATTEMPTS TO REDUCE SURVEY COSTS

The Crown seems to have made some effort to mitigate the cost of surveys in Te Rohe Pōtae, particularly in the 1880s. As discussed in chapter 8, the Crown agreed in 1883 that the cost to Māori for the survey of the exterior boundary of the Rohe Pōtae would not exceed £1,600. The Government also conducted a trig survey at the same time to reduce the cost of future surveys, though we received no evidence of whether this was successful.<sup>484</sup> The real cost of the boundary survey seems to have been between £12,000 and £20,000; the Crown presumably paid for the outstanding sum.<sup>485</sup> Similarly, as discussed in section 10.6.2, in 1889 the Crown and Māori reached an agreement on the costs of subdivisional surveys. Māori were able to nominate their preferred surveyors in exchange for paying the actual cost of survey rather than the schedule rates. While it is unclear exactly what the effect of this agreement was intended to have been, it is possible that it would have allowed Māori to negotiate lower prices with surveyors directly.

---

479. Document A79, p 309.

480. Document A79, pp 310, 347.

481. Document A79, pp 347–348.

482. Document A79, p 310.

483. Document A79, p 310.

484. In the Central North Island inquiry district, trig surveys alleviated costs ‘in some cases’, provided the cost of the trig survey was not added to the charge for individual blocks, see Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 510.

485. Document A79, pp 41–42.

10.6.2.2 What payment facilities were available to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for survey charges? Did survey costs lead to land alienation?

There were generally two options available to Māori for the payment for survey costs: paying with cash or paying with land, either by alienating a proportion of a block or alienating an entire block for payment of charges owing on one or more blocks.

10.6.2.2.1 PAYING WITH CASH

Paying for survey charges with cash was possible, though it does not seem to have happened frequently in Te Rohe Pōtae. Drs Husbands and Mitchell identified 54 blocks or sections where survey liens were paid by Māori owners in cash between 1892 and 1907, a very small proportion of the overall number of partitions dealt with during this period.<sup>486</sup> They found that survey liens ‘paid off in cash seem to have seldom exceeded £35, with most amounting to less than £20’.<sup>487</sup> Tauī Wētere, for instance, paid the survey liens owing on several Kawhia blocks, though they were reasonably modest at less than £20 per block.<sup>488</sup> Wētere apparently did so with the intention of keeping the land in the owners’ hands. However, while some owners repaid him their share of the charges, others proceeded to sell their land interests, frustrating his efforts.<sup>489</sup>

Owners had to overcome several difficulties to pay for survey charges with cash, particularly for larger debts. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were still not fully immersed in the cash economy. Indeed, their ability to enter the cash economy was restricted by Crown pre-emption, which limited the options available to Māori to develop their land. As the example of Wētere above demonstrates, individualisation of land ownership also made it difficult to coordinate multiple owners to all agree – and be able – to pay in cash, particularly without any effective form of communal management of land.<sup>490</sup>

Part payments in cash and land might have alleviated these difficulties. However, the court refused, from June 1898 at least, to accept gradual or partial payments of survey debts. Wilkinson and the Survey Department had had difficulties with keeping track of partial payments in the Pukeroa Hangatiki block, and apparently did not want to repeat the experience.<sup>491</sup>

10.6.2.2.2 PAYING WITH LAND

More commonly, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had to pay for survey costs in land. This was often the only real option available to them, particularly for substantial survey debts. As will be explored in more detail in chapter 11, the Crown’s imposition of

---

486. Document A79, pp 349–350.

487. Document A79, p 313.

488. Specifically, £5 7s 6d was owing on Kawhia K, £15 19s on Kawhia L, £6 7s 6d on Kawhia N, and £18 14s on Kawhia T: doc A79, pp 312–313.

489. Document A79, pp 312–313.

490. Document A79, p 314.

491. Document A79, p 314.

Sale block	Original block cut out of	Area of sale block (acres)	Area of original block (acres)	Area of sale block as percentage of original block
Kopua 1U	Kopua 1	1,038	9,372	11
Taurangi	Taorua parent block	10,000	Unknown	Unknown
Hauturu West F1	Hauturu West	6,000	42,072	14
Hauturu East A	Hauturu East	6,000	56,615	11
Hauturu East D	Hauturu East	5,000	56,615	9
Mangarapa 3	Mangarapa	400	2,663	15
Umukaimata 4A	Umukaimata	5,000	46,680	11
Total	—	33,438	157,402	—

Table 10.1: Sale blocks created prior to 1896

Source: doc A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), p 351

survey charges on Te Rohe Pōtae land played a key role in the commencement of its purchasing programme in the district, and particularly in breaking the resistance of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to selling their land.

There were two main methods by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori paid for survey costs in land. The first was the designation of a 'sale block' specifically intended to meet the survey costs for several other blocks or subdivisions. In early cases, these blocks were created on the initiative of Māori land owners, as in Kopua 1, where 1,035 acres were cut out to pay for surveys, and in Hauturu East and West, where 6,000 acres were cut out of both blocks.<sup>492</sup> In all, 33,438 acres of land was set aside as sale blocks before 1896 (see table 10.1).

From 1896, the court took control of the process of creating sale blocks. Section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896 empowered the court to create sale blocks with the chief surveyor acting as a trustee along with other 'such persons' who the court thought 'fit' to act as trustees. The court also had the power to name who should receive any surplus after the sale and once all 'of the costs intended to be provided for' had been deducted. According to Drs Husbands and Mitchell, this rather paternalistic provision was meant to ensure that owners actually sold the blocks set aside for survey costs. Sale blocks created under section 10 were particularly prevalent in the Rangitoto–Tuhua subdivisions, with approximately 34,340 acres of the original block used as payment for survey liens (see section 10.6.2.3).<sup>493</sup>

The second method of paying for survey costs in land came in 1894, when the Crown gave itself the power to apply to the court to have land taken in lieu of payment of survey debts. Section 65 of the Native Land Court Act 1894 empowered

492. Document A79, pp 315–316.

493. Document A79, pp 316–317.

Category	Area (acres)
Land from sale blocks created prior to 1896	33,438
Land from sale blocks defined under section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896	35,166
Land taken in lieu for survey liens paid under section 65 of the Native Land Court Act 1894, 1897–1901	16,704
Land paid in lieu of survey lien upon application of the chief surveyor, 1906–1907	6,080
Total	91,388

Table 10.2: Total land alienated in Te Rohe Pōtae to cover survey and related charges, 1890–1907
Source: doc A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), p 370

the court to designate an area of, or interest in, land as payment for a survey lien to the entitled party (almost always the Crown). At least before 1906, the court generally did this at the same time as interests purchased by the Crown were being cut out.<sup>494</sup> In this way, the Crown was able also to acquire land from non-sellers to meet their share of the survey charges owing on the blocks in which the Crown was purchasing.

The amount of land that Māori had to alienate to meet survey costs did not just depend on the scale of the survey costs, but on the price per acre that the Crown was willing to pay for the land. Lower prices meant that more land had to be alienated to meet the charges owing. Crown pre-emption further exacerbated this problem, denying Māori owners the opportunity of seeking higher prices on the open market. Māori landowners were understandably unhappy with this situation. In 1899, for instance, the owners of the 826-acre sale block Maraetaua 6 complained to Premier Seddon about the five shillings per acre the Crown was prepared to pay for the block. They pointed to the quality of the land and called for either 15 shillings an acre or to 'let the land be put into the public market, so that the surveys may be paid for and defrayed'. The Crown held to its original offer, however, meaning that the alienation realised only £206 10s of the £340 owing for survey costs.<sup>495</sup>

Witnesses before our inquiry provided different figures for the total amount of land alienated to pay for survey charges in Te Rohe Pōtae. According to Drs Husbands and Mitchell, more than 91,000 acres of land within the boundaries of the original Aotea–Rohe Potae block was alienated to cover survey costs between 1890 and 1907 (see table 10.2).<sup>496</sup> Leanne Boulton, however, calculated a lower figure of 80,625.28 acres as having been alienated up to the end of 1908.<sup>497</sup> Both Drs

494. Document A79, p 317.

495. Document A79, pp 325–326.

496. Document A79, pp 328, 370.

497. Document A67, pp 429–431.

Husbands and Mitchell and Boulton used the court's minute books to compile their totals, but differed on the amount of land given up for survey charges for several blocks. Ultimately, because they provided more detailed figures down to the level of individual subdivisions, we prefer the total compiled by Drs Husbands and Mitchell.

10.6.2.2.3 SURVEY CHARGES AND CROWN PURCHASING

The Crown's approach to paying survey charges for the land it purchased differed according to the amount of land it acquired. Initially, where the Crown purchased an entire block, such as the sale blocks that were created to pay for survey charges of parent blocks, it paid the associated survey costs. Drs Husbands and Mitchell provided the examples of the Crown's purchases of the Kopua 1U and Hauturu East A and D sale blocks. After the blocks had been sold to the Crown, 'the Chief Surveyor withdrew his application to the Court for a survey charging order against the owners'. After 1900, however, the Crown's practice seems to have changed, with sellers incurring the cost of survey for the sale blocks created under section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896.<sup>498</sup>

The Crown's approach to paying for survey costs remained consistent for when it had acquired only some interests in a block. If there were outstanding survey charges on the block within which it had purchased interests, the Crown generally paid the outstanding charges on the area it was purchasing. Wilkinson explained the reasoning for the Crown's practice in 1901:

It has been generally understood in connection with Rohe Potae purchases where the Government fixes the selling price per acre itself, and the owners cannot sell to anyone else, that Government will pay the portion of survey costs due on the area acquired by it. That is the owners of the land are not to be asked to pay the survey costs on the portion of the block sold to the Government, but only on the portion that they retain.<sup>499</sup>

In addition, further survey charges were incurred as a result of the Crown having its interests cut out of the block. In other districts, non-sellers often had to pay for their portion of these survey costs.<sup>500</sup> That does not appear to have been the case in Te Rohe Pōtae. Drs Husband and Mitchell noted that they found 'no evidence' of non-sellers being charged for the survey costs of the new partition created in these circumstances.<sup>501</sup> The only exception to this approach was where 'the remaining Māori-owned land was divided into more than one section'. In those instances, the Māori owners were responsible for paying for the survey charges associated with the new partitions of their remaining land. Generally, however, the Government paid the full survey cost for the partitions directly resulting from its

---

498. Document A79(g), pp 15–16; doc A79, pp 351–352.

499. Document A79, p 311.

500. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 511–512.

501. Document A79(g), p 16.

purchasing of individual interests.<sup>502</sup> We consider the relationship between survey charges and the Crown's purchasing programme in more detail in section 11.4.2.

10.6.2.3 Case study: Rangitoto–Tuhua survey costs

Several of the features described above were at play in the massive Rangitoto–Tuhua block. In its concessions, the Crown specifically identified Rangitoto–Tuhua as an area where Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had to give up excessive amounts of land to pay for survey costs.<sup>503</sup> The cost of surveying the various subdivisions of the block also featured prominently in several of the claims before us.<sup>504</sup>

At around 603,355 acres, Rangitoto–Tuhua was the largest parent block within the Aotea–Rohe Potae block.<sup>505</sup> Large parts of the block were rugged and mountainous, and the initial survey costs for some of its many subdivisions were high. Three large blocks cost more than £300 to survey, while five were charged between £200 and £300. An additional 11 subdivisions incurred survey charges between £100 and £200. On a per acre basis, the 92-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua 27 (Haupapa) was the most expensive to survey, at 3s 3d per acre for a total of £23 12s 10d. By comparison, most of the Rangitoto–Tuhua subdivisions cost less than 10 pence per acre to survey. In all, and including the £657 6s 2d charged to the owners for the survey of the block's western boundary, at least £6,789 16s 4d in survey costs were charged to the owners of Rangitoto–Tuhua.<sup>506</sup>

There is also particularly detailed information about the interest charged to survey liens on the Rangitoto–Tuhua subdivisions between 1900 and 1908. The percentage increase in original survey liens due to interest and fees ranged from four per cent to 22.5 per cent on the 20 subdivisions for which information is available. The normal increase on these blocks was between seven and 10 per cent of the original lien. Some of these blocks had already incurred significant survey charges. The 227-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua 6 (Matawaia), for instance, cost £36 14s 8d to survey – or 2s 19d per acre. After interest and fees, this amount rose to £45 – a 22.5 per cent increase – by the time it was paid off.<sup>507</sup>

The survey costs on most Rangitoto–Tuhua blocks appear to have been paid in land. The only survey charge paid for in cash was for the 562-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua 41, which cost £26 18s 4d.<sup>508</sup> Twelve sale blocks totalling 34,340 acres were created under section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896 (see table 10.3) to pay survey charges and other court costs for 25 Rangitoto–Tuhua blocks (including the sale blocks). During our hearings, Roy Haar of the Pukepoto Farm

502. Document A79(g), p 16.

503. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

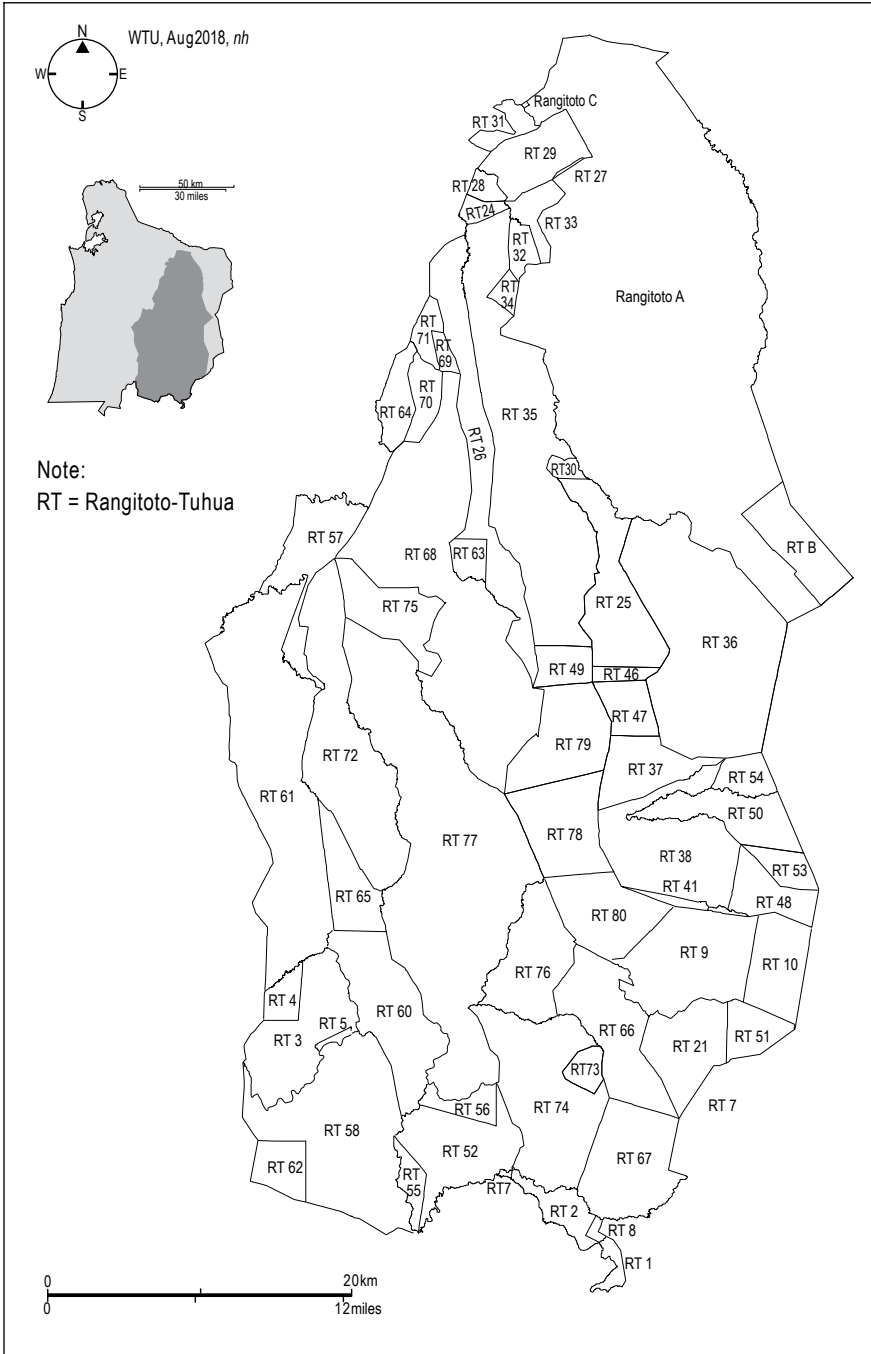

504. These include: Wai 48 (submission 3.4.211, pp 33–34); Wai 478 (submission 3.4.155(a), pp 4–8); Wai 928 (submission 3.4.175(b), pp 29–30); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167, pp 24–25); Wai 1147 (submission 3.4.151, pp 30–31); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168, pp 20–23); Wai 1255 (submission 3.4.199, pp 39–42); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234, pp 9–11); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220, pp 17, 19–21, 23).

505. Document A79, p 283.

506. Document A79, pp 304–305, 339–341.

507. Document A79, pp 309–310, 339, 348.

508. Document A79, p 350; doc A21 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell), p 121.

Sale block	Original block cut from	Sale block area (acres)	Original block area (acres)
Rangitoto–Tuhua 4 (Horokio)	Rangitoto–Tuhua 3	1,770	10,070
Rangitoto–Tuhua 10	Rangitoto–Tuhua 9	6,070	12,437
Rangitoto–Tuhua 46	Rangitoto–Tuhua 25	1,000	10,112
Rangitoto–Tuhua 47	Rangitoto–Tuhua 37	3,000	5,527
Rangitoto–Tuhua 48	Rangitoto–Tuhua 38	4,000	13,239
Rangitoto–Tuhua 49	Rangitoto–Tuhua 35	2,500	30,345
Rangitoto–Tuhua 51	Rangitoto–Tuhua 21	3,000	7,157
Rangitoto–Tuhua 56	Rangitoto–Tuhua 52	2,000	9,031
Rangitoto–Tuhua 61B	Rangitoto–Tuhua 61	1,500	28,525
Rangitoto–Tuhua 62	Rangitoto–Tuhua 58	3,000	21,176
Rangitoto–Tuhua 63	Rangitoto–Tuhua 26	1,500	12,757
Rangitoto–Tuhua 65	Rangitoto–Tuhua 60, 57, and 65	5,000	23,691
Total		34,340	184,067

Table 10.3: Rangitoto–Tuhua sale blocks defined under section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896

Source: doc A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), pp 351–352.

Trust gave evidence about how survey liens had contributed to the reduction in size of Rangitoto–Tuhua 60 (Pukepoto). He particularly pointed to the 5,000-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua 65, which was cut out of Rangitoto–Tuhua 60 to pay the survey charges owing on Rangitoto–Tuhua 60, 57, and 65.<sup>509</sup>

As it is not clear from the minute books whether the acreages of the sale blocks created under section 10 were included in the given acreages of the original blocks, Drs Husbands and Mitchell provided both minimum and maximum proportions for the amount of land that was taken to meet survey charges. At one extreme, sale block Rangitoto–Tuhua 47 was at least 35 per cent of Rangitoto–Tuhua 37, the original block that it was cut from, and at most 54 per cent. At the other extreme, Rangitoto–Tuhua 61B was 5 per cent of Rangitoto–Tuhua 61. In four of the 12 sale blocks, at least 20 per cent of the original block was taken to meet survey charges.<sup>510</sup>

509. Document s29, pp 2, 6; submission 3.4.155(a), pp 4–8.

510. Document A79, pp 322–324, 369–370. Although proceeds from section 10 sale blocks were sometimes used to pay other court costs as well (as with Rangitoto Tuhua 4 and Rangitoto Tuhua 65), survey costs were the largest item by far.

Year	Name of block	Area (acres)	Area taken in lieu of lien (acres)	Area taken in lieu of lien (percentage of block)
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 28	930	38	4.1
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 68	35,434	561	1.6
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 77A	21,360	544	2.5
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 55	1,548	288.75	18.7
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 73	1,494	305	20.4
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 74	16,317	1,245	7.6
1906	Rangitoto–Tuhua 80	7,744	421	5.4
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 31E	518	26.75	5.2
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 31G	325	18.25	5.6
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 27	92	57.50	62.5
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 30	740	199	26.9
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 75	10,112	313.50	3.1
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 72	7,197.24	214	3.0
1907	Rangitoto–Tuhua 78	8,418	325	3.9
Total		112,229.24	4,556.75	—

Table 10.4: Rangitoto–Tuhua land paid in lieu of survey lien upon application of the chief surveyor, 1906–07

Source: doc A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), pp 362–365

In addition, 4,557 acres of Rangitoto–Tuhua blocks were taken in lieu of survey liens upon application of the chief surveyor between 1906 and 1907. These takings ranged from 1.5 to 62.5 per cent of the original acreage of the blocks (see table 10.4).

As with other blocks, the amount of land that Rangitoto–Tuhua landowners had to give up for survey costs depended on the amount the Crown was prepared to pay for their land. Rangitoto–Tuhua 56, for instance, was created under section 10 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896 as a sale block to pay for the survey costs of both Rangitoto–Tuhua 56 and Rangitoto–Tuhua 52. (As discussed in section 10.6.2.2.2, section 10 allowed the court to set aside a portion of a block to be sold to cover survey and other court costs.) In 1903, the owners protested the Crown's offer of four shillings per acre and requested five shillings per acre instead. In another letter the next year, Mehana Tuhoro, Haupokia Te Pakaru, and Parehaitina Tuhoro objected to the cutting out of the sale block itself, which had increased the survey charges owing on Rangitoto–Tuhua 52 by £78 7s 1d. They requested that the Crown refund the survey charges owing on Rangitoto–Tuhua

56. The Crown eventually increased its offer to 4s 8d per acre, but resisted paying for the survey of the sale block.<sup>511</sup>

It is clear that the survey costs charged against some Rangitoto–Tuhua subdivisions were excessive, as the Crown has conceded. As a guide for what constituted an excessive survey charge, we agree with the Te Urewera Tribunal that ‘figures of over 10 per cent were too high, and that, where costs amounted to over 50 per cent of the land, this was completely unacceptable.’<sup>512</sup> As discussed, in at least four of the 12 sale blocks created under section 10 the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896, at least 20 per cent of the original block (or blocks) was taken to meet survey charges. Four other section 10 sale blocks involved the taking of at least 10 per cent of the original block (or blocks).<sup>513</sup> In four blocks where survey liens were paid in land upon application of the chief surveyor between 1906 and 1907, the proportion was greater than 18 per cent. In one of those cases – the 92-acre Rangitoto–Tuhua 27 – 62.5 per cent of the block was taken to pay for survey charges. At a time when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were struggling to retain their land and find their way in the new economy, this scale of additional land loss was particularly costly.

10.6.3 Other court-related costs

Attending Native Land Court hearings resulted in other, indirect costs to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Although the court occasionally sat in other locations in Te Rohe Pōtae to be closer to the blocks being considered, some degree of travel was always necessary for participants. At times, the distances required to be travelled were considerable. Accommodation, food, and the retention of kaiwhakahaere imposed additional costs on participants.

Given these costs, the length of Native Land Court hearings, as well as any delays to the commencement of hearings, were a source of concern for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Between 1892 and 1907, the court sat in the district for 1,433 days, conducting business on 1,347 of those days.<sup>514</sup> Court sittings could go on for months at a time, and often dealt with dozens, if not hundreds, of cases. These cases were all advertised in a single pānui, with a single starting date. It was therefore unclear, at least when a sitting began, when particular cases would be dealt with. In addition, advertised start dates to sittings were often missed as the court dealt with backlogs from previous sittings.

There is very little evidence before us to indicate what Māori did in practice when faced with an indeterminate wait for their case to be considered, or how the court dealt with delays. However, there are examples of Māori complaining about delays, indicating that some at least stayed around. A sitting of the court advertised as beginning on 28 April 1894 did not actually commence until 12 May. This delay drew complaints from Hinaki Ropiha on behalf of others from Whanganui

---

511. Document A79, pp 325–327.

512. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1235.

513. Document A79, pp 369–370.

514. Document A79, p 281.

who had been waiting for the sitting to begin. Hari Whanonga complained on 30 January 1899 about the delay in hearing Maraetaua and Orahiri while the court heard the Pukenui 1 and 2 and Kakepuku 4 cases. Maraetaua and Orahiri would not be heard until 10 February.<sup>515</sup> As discussed in section 10.5.1.6, these delays were by no means the most extreme faced by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori either.

There is only limited evidence of the scale of the incidental costs of involvement in the court process. John Ormsby claimed that the owners of Puhunga had spent between £100 and £140 during the hearing of the block.<sup>516</sup> Some owners of Taraunui (Rangitoto–Tuhua 3) spent £129 10s on incidental costs during the block's three-month hearing in 1897. Although they were able to recover these costs from the proceeds of a sale block (Rangitoto–Tuhua 4), the addition of the costs to the survey charges owed, as well as the price the Crown was prepared to pay for the land, meant that an extra 270 acres had to be sold. Further, by the time the sale of the sale block was finalised in 1904, the principal owner of Taraunui – Miriama Kahukarewao – was so impoverished that she was compelled to ask the Government for an advance to cover the cost of the train fare to come and sign off the sale.<sup>517</sup> This kind of cash poverty suggests that court-related costs were a very real burden on Māori.

In other districts, Native Land Court sittings were accompanied by problems with alcohol and rapacious storekeepers. The evidence indicates that these problems were not a significant feature of the Native Land Court experience in Te Rohe Pōtae. The court sat for the most part in Māori townships and the district was also subject to a prohibition on liquor.<sup>518</sup>

Previous Tribunals have suggested a link between court sittings and poor health amongst Māori attendees. The Central North Island Tribunal, while noting that there was insufficient evidence 'to establish a causal link', concluded 'with some confidence that the conditions in which many Maori lived during sittings, and the toll that absence from home took on normal economic activities were a significant contributor to poverty and poor health in this period.'<sup>519</sup> The Te Urewera Tribunal similarly found that court sittings impacted 'the health and wellbeing of claimants.'<sup>520</sup>

There is only very limited evidence about the health of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori while attending Native Land Court sittings. Conditions at Ōtorohanga could be harsh. During the original sitting in 1886, for instance, the court's attendees were met with a 'most inclement and bitterly cold' winter.<sup>521</sup> At the same time, it should be noted that Wilkinson stated in reference to the 1886 sitting of the court:

---

515. Document A79, p 293.

516. Document A79, p 296.

517. Document A79, p 296.

518. Document A79, p 298.

519. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 518.

520. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1266.

521. Waikato Times, 23 October 1886, p 2; doc A79, p 144.

Notwithstanding that the Court sat continuously through four months of a most boisterous and inclement winter that nine-tenths of the Natives attending Court were living in tents the whole of the time, there was not a single case of death or severe illness amongst them. One cause of this absence of sickness can, I think, be accounted for by the fact that the sale of intoxicating drinks is prohibited in the King-country.<sup>522</sup>

The court's minute books do contain some references to illness among the assembled crowds in Te Rohe Pōtae over the period covered by this chapter. A number of people were 'ill with influenza' during the Puhunga (Rangitoto–Tuhua 61) hearing, causing John Ormsby to seek an adjournment. The court also had to adjourn several times during the Taranui hearing in 1897 due to 'four separate deaths and the illness of both the witness and a kaiwhakahaere'. In both of these specific examples, however, there is no indication of whether the illnesses and death were directly related to the sitting of the court, or 'only incidental to its presence'.<sup>523</sup> More generally, however, we consider it likely that many illnesses at the time would have been more easily transmitted because people were in such close proximity while in court hearings.

10.6.4 Treaty analysis and findings

Although not always the case, it is apparent that participating in the Native Land Court could be expensive for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Because Te Rohe Pōtae Māori often held interests in multiple blocks, some Māori would have faced court-related costs several times. Furthermore, most blocks would come back before the court many more times for succession and subdivision cases, incurring yet more costs.

As outlined in section 10.3.2, the parties in this inquiry focused on three kinds of court-related costs: direct court costs, indirect costs, and survey charges. In general, the claimants argued that '[c]ourt related costs were a burden on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and were so onerous that they faced in many cases long-term detrimental hardship'.<sup>524</sup> The Crown accepted that participation in court proceedings resulted in costs to Māori, but questioned 'the overall scale of the costs, the extent to which they were reasonable, and their overall impact and effect'.<sup>525</sup>

Some direct costs, like court fees, were relatively small on their own, though for long, complex, and contested cases they could become significant. The Crown, indeed, accepted that these fees 'could quickly mount' but argued that apportioning fees relative to participation was fair.<sup>526</sup> We do not agree, particularly given that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not wanted the court to sit in their district, and given the limited control they had over its processes.

---

522. GT Wilkinson, 'Annual Report Upon the State of the Natives in the Waikato and Thames-Hauraki Districts,' AJHR, 1887, G-1, p 5; doc A79, p 298.

523. Document A79, pp 298–299.

524. Submission 3.4.107, p 44.

525. Submission 3.4.305, p 86.

526. Submission 3.4.305, p 89.

Beyond these direct costs, there were also the indirect costs associated with court participation, including travel, accommodation for hearings, and the retention of kaiwhakahaere. These costs could be exacerbated by the imperfect system of notification, particularly the delays that often occurred for commencement of sittings. Evidence of the scale of these costs in Te Rohe Pōtae is scant, though they were significant at least sometimes. It is known, furthermore, that the court typically sat for extended periods each year and that particularly contentious cases could take weeks, if not months, to be resolved. The claimants also alleged that, during hearings, ‘many Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lived in substandard conditions resulting in sickness and death.’<sup>527</sup> We agree with the Crown that there is insufficient evidence for such a broad conclusion.<sup>528</sup> Nonetheless, as previous Tribunals have observed, we consider that the close proximity of so many people during hearings would have likely made the transmission of illnesses easier.

Survey costs were often the most expensive part of the court process for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The claimants submitted that survey costs were ‘excessive’ in Te Rohe Pōtae, while the Crown conceded that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sometimes ‘had to give up unreasonably large amounts of land to pay for survey costs.’<sup>529</sup> The Crown further acknowledged that survey costs could be ‘an excessive and disproportionate burden’ on Māori, and that Crown pre-emption prevented Te Rohe Pōtae Māori ‘from paying these costs by the leasing of their lands.’<sup>530</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were charged at least £23,728 for survey costs between 1892 and 1907. Survey costs often reflected the nature and the size of the block being surveyed. As the claimants pointed out, this meant that the owners of ‘remote, difficult and low-return blocks’ were hit disproportionately hard, particularly because their blocks ‘provided relatively little by way of income to meet those debts, again forcing them to sell to discharge the debts.’<sup>531</sup>

Indeed, survey costs were generally too large to be paid for in cash, particularly as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not yet fully immersed in the cash economy. Only 54 blocks had their survey charges paid in whole or in part between 1892 and 1907; most of these charges were relatively modest. Instead, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori mostly paid for survey costs – including interest – in land. At first, owners took the initiative in creating ‘sale blocks’ to pay for survey charges owing on their lands. Soon, however, the court and Crown took control of the process of cutting out land to pay for survey costs. In total, between 1892 and 1907 more than 91,000 acres of Te Rohe Pōtae land was alienated as payment for survey costs.<sup>532</sup>

As private purchasers were excluded from the market by the Crown’s pre-emption regime, the amount of land that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had to give up for survey costs was determined by the prices that the Crown was prepared to pay. Because

---

527. Submission 3.4.107, p 48.

528. Submission 3.4.305, pp 87–88.

529. Submission 3.4.107, p 52; submission 3.4.305, p 93.

530. Statement 1.3.1, p 83; submission 3.4.305, pp 9–10.

531. Submission 3.4.107, pp 56–57.

532. Document A79(b) (Husbands and Mitchell summary), p 15.

these prices were, as the Crown conceded, '[o]ften . . . considered unreasonably low'; Te Rohe Pōtae Māori often had to alienate more land than they would have otherwise.<sup>533</sup> In some instances, as with Rangitoto–Tuhua 56, the owners were able to negotiate slightly higher purchase prices to reduce the amount of land to be alienated. But in other instances, as with Maraetaua 6, they had to accept the amount the Crown was willing to pay. In that case, the result was that the sale did not even cover the full amount of survey costs owing.

The claimants argued that '[i]t was inappropriate that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were required to pay fees to acquire title to land that they already owned', particularly because the Crown and settlers received the most benefit from the Native Land Court process.<sup>534</sup> The Crown responded that the basic principle for costs should be that 'whoever accrues benefit should contribute costs'. In the case of survey costs, the benefit was gaining secure title. The Crown did accept that it could have taken further steps to reduce the burden on Māori owners, such as imposing 'less onerous consequences for non-payment of survey charges' that would not 'necessarily lead to land alienation.'<sup>535</sup> It also could have differentiated between different categories of owners, including those who did not intend to sell.<sup>536</sup>

Other Tribunal panels have pointed out that it was not only Māori who benefited from securing title. There was a wider national benefit, particularly for the Crown and the settlers who wanted to purchase and settle Māori land. The Te Urewera Tribunal, for instance, commented:

To saddle its indigenous people – particularly those who had scarcely entered the market economy – with the cost of surveying large tracts of North Island land was inequitable. All the more so when, as governments constantly stressed, this land was in the main intended for settlers.<sup>537</sup>

As the Hauraki Tribunal pointed out, taking land through the Native Land Court was often little more than 'the prelude to a succession of partitions and sales', making it difficult to see what benefit Māori received.<sup>538</sup> In Te Rohe Pōtae, as seen in chapter 8, the Crown had been clear that its goal was to acquire Māori land for Pākehā settlement. Furthermore, it had clearly seen settlers – not Te Rohe Pōtae Māori – as the agents of the development that the railway would initiate in the district. In those circumstances, we agree with those Tribunal panels that court-related costs, and particularly survey costs, should have been shared more equally.

---

533. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

534. Submission 3.4.107, pp 50–51.

535. Submission 3.4.305, p 9; transcript 4.1.24, p 139 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

536. Submission 3.4.305, p 9; transcript 4.1.24, p 139 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

537. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1195.

538. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, p 780.

Accordingly, we find that the Crown, in failing to lessen the costs associated with the court process, or to institute a fairer and more equal distribution of those costs, breached the Treaty principle of active protection.

Two particular factors exacerbated the prejudice that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered as a result of court-related costs and the Crown's Treaty breaches. First, we consider it relevant that the Native Land Court was imposed on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori against their will. They had long resisted the introduction of the court into their rohe and only applied to the court for title determination when they faced losing control of the process altogether. Once the court was introduced into the district, participation in the court system was, as the Hauraki Tribunal found, 'virtually obligatory'.<sup>539</sup> Furthermore, while the court that operated in Te Rohe Pōtae was an improvement in several respects, the Crown never met the core demand of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that they have control over the title determination process. Yet, despite all of this, it was Māori who bore many of the costs associated with the court and the titling of their lands. In effect, Māori were forced to pay to give effect to the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga over their land, and they most often paid in land. We consider that this was plainly contrary to the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and to the Crown's duty to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori possession and control of their land and resources.

Secondly, the Native Land Court titling regime usually denied Māori the benefit – secure title – that was supposed to result from survey and titling. As we explored in section 10.4, Native Land Court titles were often a burden to Māori landowners, creating instability and uncertainty that could often only be resolved by partitioning down to smaller blocks with a manageable number of owners. Such partitioning meant that Māori had to incur further court and survey costs in order to gain something resembling the "secure title" promised by the Crown. The Crown acknowledged that there is a question as to whether it created a fair titling system.<sup>540</sup> We consider it did not.

10.7 TO WHAT EXTENT DID TE ROHE PŌTAE MĀORI PROTEST THE COURT AND WHAT REDRESS WAS AVAILABLE?

Despite essentially having been forced into the Native Land Court, most Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought to engage with its processes in order to prevent the worst outcomes. As the Crown has acknowledged in several inquiries, including this one, 'Māori who did not wish to participate in the Native Land Court were nevertheless bound to in order to seek to protect their land interests and were required to incur the costs that attended their participation and any awards the Court made'.<sup>541</sup>

Nonetheless, Māori who participated in the court did sometimes choose to protest its hearings, while others opposed it entirely. Moreover, participation did not

---

539. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 778–779.

540. Statement 1.3.1, pp 83–84.

541. Submission 3.4.305, p 10.

necessarily mean that the worst outcomes would be avoided; court decisions did not always go the way that participants hoped. For Māori who wanted to challenge court decisions, there were two main avenues for seeking redress: rehearings and appeals, and petitions to the Native Affairs Committee. As outlined in section 10.2.3, the parties disagreed over whether these remedies were adequate or suitable, with the claimants arguing that they were not and the Crown arguing that they were.<sup>542</sup>

This section begins by considering how the court in Te Rohe Pōtae dealt with protest and opposition, both from Māori who were normally participants in its processes and from those Māori who chose to stay away from the court entirely. The section then considers the avenues of redress that were available for Māori who were dissatisfied with court decisions or surveys.

10.7.1 Protest and opposition

There was never universal participation by Māori in the Native Land Court process. Even those who had participated in its proceedings sometimes stayed away from court, either explicitly boycotting the court or employing more indirect forms of protest when they did not agree with a certain course of action. There was also a significant minority who remained outside of the court process entirely and continued to oppose the court's activities in the rohe. How the court dealt with Māori who protested or opposed the court, and whether it recognised their interests, are important issues for whether the court process was fair for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

10.7.1.1 *The court's response to protest by participants

On occasion, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who were otherwise participants in the court process boycotted court proceedings. In these instances, the court appears to have been more likely to take a softer approach, or at least less able to respond if there was no other business to go forward with. In part, the court's response depended on the scale of the boycott. When most or all of the parties before the court refused to attend, the court sometimes had no other option but to stop its business.

One of the most significant boycotts of the court in Te Rohe Pōtae occurred in 1887. Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa initiated the boycott in response to the court's decision in the Maraeroa and Hurakia blocks in Taupō. The blocks, located on the eastern boundary of Te Rohe Pōtae, had been heard as part of the Tauponuiatia case. Both groups had been excluded from title to the blocks. Ngāti Maniapoto argued that this had occurred because Taonui had been required to attend the Magistrates court in Cambridge during the original Tauponuiatia hearings, meaning the ‘the dividing line between Maniapoto and Tuwharetoa had been fixed without reference to Maniapoto.’<sup>543</sup>

---

542. Submission 3.4.107, pp109–115; submission 3.4.305, pp97–99. Several claims raised issues concerning the adequacy of redress, including: Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 1944 (submission 3.4.233); Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 1147, Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submission 3.4.246); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141).

The Ōtorohanga court had adjourned in November 1886 with the ownership lists of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block still outstanding. When the court reopened on 15 June 1887, it expected to continue with this work. However, Taonui, Hauauru, and others refused to proceed. They demanded that their application for rehearing of the Taupō cases be addressed first. Judge Mair granted numerous adjournments for the parties to reconsider, but they would not be moved. In the end, the court did not resume until late November 1887, after Judge Mair had become impatient and insisted that the parties proceed with the completion of the lists. Māori did so, but remained reluctant to begin subdivisions of the Rohe Potae block.<sup>544</sup>

Early the next year, the chief judge rejected an application to rehear the Maraeroa and Hurakia cases. When the Ōtorohanga court reopened two weeks later, Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa refused to proceed with the subdivisions of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block. On this occasion, Judge Mair was less accommodating. Other parties were before the court, ready and willing to proceed with their applications. Mair declared that it would be ‘very unfair that they should be disbarred’ because of complaints about the Taupō cases. He then threatened to hear the applications of those willing to proceed at Alexandra or Kihikihi. Mair adjourned the court to allow Ngāti Maniapoto and Raukawa to contemplate their options. The next day, Hauauru returned to court and declared that their complaints about Maraeroa, Hurakia, and other blocks would not be forgotten. He pledged that they would ‘still agitate about those places’. But Mair’s threat had the intended effect: the tribes, Hauauru said, would allow the tribal subdivisions to go ahead.<sup>545</sup>

Another boycott occurred in April 1895 when Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Mahuta withdrew their claims before the court to protest the Native Land Court Act 1894. The Act had extended the Crown’s right of pre-emption. Ngāti Maniapoto withdrew 159 claims (the entirety of their claims before the court), while Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Mahuta withdrew a combined 177 cases. The judge declined to allow the withdrawal, apparently concerned about the ‘trouble and expense’ advertising the applications again would cause the Government.<sup>546</sup> The boycotters, however, continued to stay away. With no other work before it, the court was left to work through the Crown’s applications for survey charging orders and to have its interests cut out of various blocks. The boycott seems to have ended only following the Crown’s request on 22 May 1895 for the court to define its interests in Kinohaku 2 (Pakeho), which forced the owners into rushed discussions to arrange their relative interests.<sup>547</sup>

---

543. Document A79, pp172–174.

544. Document A79, p172.

545. Document A79(a) (Husbands and Mitchell document bank), vol 4, pp142–143; doc A79, pp172–173.

546. Document A79, p 482.

547. Document A79, pp 482–483.

Other boycotts ended much faster. In 1897, for instance, a Ngāti Maniapoto attempt to boycott the court lasted less than a week. The attempted boycott was again a response to the Crown's continued power of pre-emption. Tamihana Te Huirau told the court on 17 July that Ngāti Maniapoto had decided 'not to proceed with the work in the Court in consequence of the pressure of the laws upon us . . . We have decided to call upon all of our hapus to withdraw their cases in order that our wrongs may be addressed by the parliament now about to sit.'<sup>548</sup>

In response, Judge Gudgeon warned the parties present that for the last 20 years this has been the procedure of the Maoris in the matter of their lands. Now this Court has no desire to interfere with the arrangements made by any tribe but we will say this that if any man comes here and asks us what we intend to do with his claim we will at once tell him to go on with the case and if those who ought to oppose him do not do so they will suffer for the reason that if they are not parties to the suit they will have no right of appeal.<sup>549</sup>

Nonetheless, the court adjourned for two days, with the judge noting that 'it is evident that very little will be done until the Maraetaua & Rangitoto Tuhua block have been dealt with.'<sup>550</sup> When the court resumed on 19 July, it continued with succession cases, and received some applications for partition. This suggests there may have been other parties who opposed the boycott, or who at least 'had business which they wanted the Court to go on with.'<sup>551</sup> By 22 July, the boycott was seemingly over: Ngāti Maniapoto returned to court, with Pepene Eketone appearing to seek the fixing of a partition of Karuotewhenua B.<sup>552</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sometimes employed other forms of resistance short of outright boycotts. The subdivision of Rangitoto–Tuhua was originally applied for in 1888, but due to non-attendance it was delayed for nearly a decade. On one occasion, parties who did attend told the court that the other owners had not heard of the sitting, something the judge cast doubt on.<sup>553</sup> The court, however, seemed willing to adjourn cases in these instances, particularly if it had other work to process in the meantime.<sup>554</sup>

10.7.1.2 The court's response to opposition by non-participants

The court was much firmer with those who refused to engage with the Native Land Court process at all. The Kīngitanga was a particular centre of opposition to the activities of the court in Te Rohe Pōtae, both before and after its arrival. As Waikato-Tainui and the Kīngitanga did not participate in our inquiry, we cannot 548. (1897) 28 Otorohanga MB 252; doc A79, p 484.

549. (1897) 28 Otorohanga MB 252; doc A79(e) (Husbands and Mitchell responses to questions of clarification), p 58.

550. (1897) 28 Otorohanga MB 253; doc A79, p 484.

551. Document A79(e), pp 59–60.

552. Karuotewhenua B (1897) 28 Otorohanga MB 273; doc A79, p 484.

553. Document A79, p 177.

554. Document A79, p 179.

reach any conclusions about the prejudice they might have suffered as a result of not attending court sittings. However, we include examples of their treatment here as context for the court's approach to non-participants.

Following the lead of Tāwhiao, a 'significant number' of Māori associated with the Kīngitanga boycotted the court for its initial sitting in 1886. As outlined in section 10.4.1, Te Wheoro was left alone to present evidence on behalf of the Waikato counter-claimants to Kawhia. His testimony was interrupted by Whitiara, who, on behalf of Tāwhiao, called upon the court to withdraw Kawhia from the Aotea-Rohe Potae case. With Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo objecting to any withdrawal, the court ruled that the hearing of Kawhia would continue. The court eventually found in favour of the Ngāti Maniapoto and Hikairo claims to Kawhia.<sup>555</sup>

Kīngitanga resistance to the court continued after the initial 1886 hearing and into the twentieth century. After informing the court in Kāwhia that the King disapproved of 'any dealing' within the Taharoa block, Judge Gudgeon proceeded to hear and decide on the case nonetheless. Supporters of the Kīngitanga also expressed their opposition to the court's activities during the definition of interests in Tokanui 1B and C in 1894, the subdivision of Rangitoto-Tuhua in 1898, and the partition of Hauturu East 1E 5C in 1903.<sup>556</sup>

Māori at Te Kumi, located near Te Kūiti, also refused to go to court. One such individual, Te Whata, had interests in several blocks, including as a principal owner of the 3,693-acre Hauturu East 1E section 5C 2. In 1894, that block was subdivided into five parts on the application of an agent for two minors who owned interests in the block. Te Whata and his people, who had not attended court, were awarded the western portion of the block, but it is unclear if this was a fair representation of their actual interests. The court, however, proceeded regardless.<sup>557</sup>

The consequences for these Māori of not attending court could be serious. Land could be awarded to other parties who were prepared to go to court, resulting either in total loss of a block or an unfair allocation of shares within a block. Absentee owners had to rely on the goodwill of those who did participate in court proceedings to place them on the ownership lists. In the Awaroa case in 1892, which concerned land near Kāwhia, Judge Gudgeon made clear the consequences for the Kīngitanga of their boycott of the 1886 sitting:

It seems almost a certainty to the Court that had the Waikato claimants behaved in a sensible manner and appeared before the Native Land Court in support of their claims that there would have been no Ngatimaniapoto owners to dispute with them. They however listened to bad advice and the consequence is that there are 270 Ngatimaniapoto in the block and Waikato are now paying the penalty of their own foolishness.<sup>558</sup>

---

555. Document A79, p 145.

556. Document A79, p 382.

557. Document A79, pp 383–384.

558. Awaroa (1892) 12 Otorohanga MB 366; doc A79, pp 145–146.

Non-attendance could also limit options for appeal. In their decision on the Karuotewhenua appeal in 1896, the judges of the appellate court warned that an intentional absence in the original case ‘would go far towards depriving them [the appellants] of the right to expect that any grievance they might suffer would be remedied on appeal.’<sup>559</sup> In that case it appears that the appellants had been absent from the original case because of confusion about when it was to be heard, rather than because of an intentional boycott.<sup>560</sup>

10.7.2 Redress

10.7.2.1 Rehearings and appeals

From 1886 until 1894, the main avenue of redress available to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori dissatisfied with a decision of the Native Land Court was to apply to the court for a rehearing. Section 75 of the Native Land Court Act 1886 provided that Māori who were aggrieved with a court decision could apply for a rehearing within 3 months of the original court decision. If the chief judge accepted an application, he could order that part or all of a case be reheard. Cases set down for rehearing would be heard by two judges and one or two assessors.

In 1894, the Crown enacted legislation constituting a new Native Appellate Court.<sup>561</sup> Replacing the previous system of holding special sittings of the court, the new appellate court usually consisted of the chief judge and one other judge. There was also provision for a native assessor, though in line with broader changes to the assessor’s role within the 1894 Act, his assent was not required for a judgment to be valid. Aggrieved Māori had to lodge appeals in writing within 30 days of the decision being ‘pronounced in open court’. Rehearings could consider ‘every question of law and fact’. Decisions were final, with no further appeals.<sup>562</sup>

While we did not receive any detailed evidence about its application in Te Rohe Pōtae, after 1889 there was one further avenue for redress for Māori. Section 13 of the Native Land Court Acts Amendment Act 1889 gave special powers to the chief judge to remedy errors or omissions without having to go to a full rehearing.<sup>563</sup> These powers were subsequently carried over by section 39 of the Native Land Court Act 1894.

10.7.2.1.1 1886–94 : REHEARINGS

The process for making an application for rehearing appears to have been less than clear. The legislation and rules of the court provided little guidance on the form in which applications were to be made, other than that they should be in writing and should ‘state shortly the grounds upon which such application is made.’<sup>564</sup>

559. Karuotewhenua (1896) 11 Otorohanga MB 191; doc A79, p 378.

560. Document A79, p 378.

561. Native Land Court Act 1894, part X.

562. Document A79, pp 429–430.

563. Grant Phillipson, ‘An Appeal from Fenton to Fenton: The Right of Appeal and the Origins of the Native Appellate Court’, New Zealand Journal of History, vol 45, no 2 (2011), p 179.

564. Native Land Court Act 1880, s 47; Native Land Court Act 1886, s75; ‘Rules of the Native Land Court’, 15 March 1890, New Zealand Gazette, 1890, no 14, p 310.

Further, while applications for rehearing had to be made within 3 months of the original court decision, it was sometimes unclear when an original court decision was deemed to have been made. Almost all applications for rehearing concerning the Kawhia block were rejected as being premature – that is, they were filed before the court had made its formal order. Drs Husbands and Mitchell pointed out that ‘[w]hen the Court resumed in 1887 and again in 1888, it did not make an award of title for the blocks described in the original 1886 application and judgment so it is unclear when the opportunity for an application be filed would have arisen.’<sup>565</sup> Faced with this uncertainty, many applicants filed applications for rehearing multiple times. Only one application – from Hone Te One, concerning Kaipiha – from this time appears to have been considered by the chief judge, and it was dismissed.<sup>566</sup>

Aspects of the way in which the chief judge dealt with applications for rehearing were also rather opaque. The chief judge was not required to give reasons for dismissing an application. No published set of criteria by which the chief judge would consider an application existed. This would have probably made it difficult for Māori applicants to know how to best frame their case for favourable consideration. In practice, the chief judge seemed to focus mainly on the narrow facts of each case, and ‘demanded compelling evidence before allowing a rehearing’<sup>567</sup> By 1888, rehearing applications were considered in open sittings, with the chief judge accompanied by an assessor, an interpreter or translator, and a clerk.<sup>568</sup> The role of the assessor in hearing applications for rehearing was simply to assist the chief judge; they had no decision-making power.<sup>569</sup> Rehearing applications could be contested, with other parties from the original case allowed to set up a counterclaim before the chief judge.<sup>570</sup>

Only a small number of applications for rehearing were granted in Te Rohe Pōtae. Of 35 applications filed between December 1888 and September 1891, only one block – Mangawhero – was reheard.<sup>571</sup> In Turoto, an application by Makereti Hinewai to add names to the list of owners under section 13 of the Native Land

565. Document A79, p 153.

566. Document A79, p 153.

567. Document A79(g), p 14.

568. Transcript 4.1.16, p 654 (Paul Husbands, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 11 September 2013); Phillipson, ‘An Appeal from Fenton to Fenton’, p 183.

569. There was some debate over this point. Drs Husbands and Mitchell, pointing to section 24 of the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, argued that the assent of the assessor was not required for a rehearing to be ordered. Crown counsel suggested that ‘Drs Husbands and Mitchell state[d] that the legislation did not stipulate that the assessor’s assent to the Court’s decision was required’. This is incorrect – Drs Husbands and Mitchell were plainly referring only to the assessor’s role in deciding whether or not to grant a rehearing. The Crown correctly pointed out that the assessor’s assent was required when the rehearing was actually heard; this does not appear to have been in dispute. See Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 24; doc A79(g), p 3; submission 3.4.305, pp 41–42; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1101.

570. Transcript 4.1.16 (Paul Husbands, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 11 September 2013).

571. Document A79, p 211. After the Crown provided further information from the Gazette and the chief judges’ minute book, Drs Husbands and Mitchell revised the figures provided in their original report, adding one further rehearing application from the period 1888–90: doc A79(g), pp 4–12.

Court Acts Amendment Act 1889 was also successful.<sup>572</sup> Of the unsuccessful applications, several were dismissed for either being premature or too late. In at least five other cases the applicant withdrew their application (no reasons appear to have to been recorded). Of the remaining applications, the chief judge dismissed some for their ‘very slight’ evidence, which was ‘not sufficient to justify a rehearing.’<sup>573</sup> For example, the chief judge dismissed an application concerning the Pakarikari partition case, stating: ‘taking all facts into consideration and the evident care with which the Court arrived at its former decision I don’t think the Court could come to any other conclusion if a rehearing were ordered.’<sup>574</sup> For most of the other applications dismissed by the chief judge during this period, no reason for the dismissal was recorded.

There was an increase in the number of accepted applications for rehearing in the period between 1892 and 1894: eight cases were reheard from a total 27 applications.<sup>575</sup> The reasons for this increase are unclear, but it might have been related to changes in the judiciary (both of the chief judge and the judge sitting at Ōtorohanga), or simply to the nature of the cases before the Ōtorohanga court at that time.

Of those cases that were eventually reheard, the outcomes of the rehearings seem to have been mostly favourable. In the Mangawhero rehearing – the only case reheard before 1892 – the original order was cancelled and a new order was made, with the descendants of Kuarua admitted into the block.<sup>576</sup> Of the eight cases reheard as a result of applications filed between 1892 and 1894, all resulted in either the original decision being amended, overturned, or replaced with a new order.<sup>577</sup> This suggests that, with applications for rehearing having first been vetted by the chief judge, those applications that made it to a full rehearing concerned decisions that were clearly wrong.

10.7.2.1.2 NATIVE APPELLATE COURT, 1894–1910

Under the Native Appellate Court system, aggrieved parties had 30 days after the pronouncement of the decision in open court to lodge a notice of appeal. This was a considerable decrease from the 3 months allowed under the rehearing system. However, it was also clearer when the period in which to lodge an appeal began and ended.

Drs Husbands and Mitchell questioned whether 30 days was sufficient time for Māori to consult and decide whether to lodge an appeal. They also pointed to the fact that during this period Te Rohe Pōtae remained ‘a region where roads were few and people and information must have still often travelled by foot.’<sup>578</sup> The Crown submitted that the 30-day requirement was ‘not an unreasonable “barrier”’

572. Document A79(g), p 6.

573. Such as for the applications concerning Mangamahoe and Kakepuku, see doc A79(g), pp 7–8.

574. Document A79(g), p 6.

575. Document A79, p 429.

576. Document A79, p 211; doc A79(g), p 9.

577. Document A79, p 429.

578. Document A79, p 431.

and assisted in ‘achieving certainty and finality’.<sup>579</sup> However, Crown counsel did not directly address whether the 30-day time limit was practical in the circumstances of the time.

As section 10.7.2.1.1 outlined, under the rehearing system, it was not enough for an application for rehearing to meet the technical requirements. The chief judge also had to deem that the complaint had sufficient basis to justify a rehearing. Under the new appeals system, however, if an appeal met the technical requirements, the Native Appellate Court automatically proceeded to hear the appeal. Once an appeal was underway, assessors sat on the court alongside the two European judges. We received no evidence as to the extent of the assessors’ involvement in Native Appellate Court cases.

Between June 1895 and December 1906, Māori lodged 82 appeals against decisions of the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae. Nearly half of these appeals – 40 – related to the subdivision of Rangitoto–Tuhua. There were also multiple appeals against the court’s decisions in Kinohaku East 2 (Pakeho), Karuotewhenua, and Taumatotara. From these appeals, the appellate court conducted 39 hearings, and dismissed the remaining 43 appeals, largely on technical grounds. Twelve were dismissed because the applicants failed to pay the required security deposit, 11 were withdrawn by the applicants, and others were deemed invalid or late.<sup>580</sup>

Perhaps as a consequence of the chief judge no longer vetting which cases would be reheard, the results of appeals heard by the appellate court were more mixed than under the old system. Of the 39 hearings held by the Native Appellate Court, 18 resulted in the original order being affirmed or upheld. In 17 other cases, the appellate court cancelled or modified the original orders, while in four other cases it partially upheld and partially modified the original order.<sup>581</sup> For instance, in 1900 the appellate court reversed the decision of the Native Land Court in Pukuweka (Rangitoto–Tuhua 2). In doing so, the Native Appellate Court granted the land to the Whanganui appellants instead of the hapū associated with Ngāti Maniapoto who had won the initial case. The appellate court also overturned the original decision in the Rangitoto title investigation which had favoured Ngāti Matakore exclusively. It instead split the land between Ngāti Matakore and Ngāti Whakatere.<sup>582</sup>

It should be noted that appeals were not necessarily the final recourse for Māori, particularly if they were unhappy with the decision of the Native Appellate Court. As is discussed in section 10.7.2.2, the appellate court’s decision in Pukuweka was subject to petitions, a royal commission of inquiry, and eventually reheard by the Native Appellate Court. Similarly, the ownership of Te Akau was subject to decades of legal dispute, including several appeal hearings, a royal commission, and eventually a Privy Council decision.<sup>583</sup>

---

579. Submission 3.4.305, p100.

580. Document A79, p 431.

581. Document A79, p 430.

582. Document A79, pp 430–431.

583. Document A65(c) (Innes response to Tribunal statement of issues), p5.

As with the rest of the Native Land Court process, appeals were not free for Māori. Appeals were subject to court costs, though they were mostly modest. Data available for 27 appeals cases reveals a median court cost of £2 6s. Costs could be more substantial: the Pukuweka appeal incurred £36 8s in court costs, for example.<sup>584</sup> Court costs for appeals also came on top of the range of court-related costs that had already been incurred.

Appellants were also required to pay a security deposit at a rate set by the presiding judge within 14 days of the deposit being set. In setting the amount, judges 'appear to have been guided primarily by the size and potential expense of the case in question'. In general, deposits for appeals in Te Rohe Pōtae ranged from £2 to £40; the median deposit was £10.<sup>585</sup>

The consequences of not paying the deposit for an appeal were serious. If an appellant failed to pay the deposit set by the court, their case was dismissed, while the decision they had objected to was confirmed 'as if' it had been 'affirmed by the Appellate Court'. The effect of such an affirmation was that no further appeals were possible.<sup>586</sup> The court had a discretion to remit payment of the deposit 'if it shall appear to the Court that the appellant is unable to pay the amount required, and that injustice may be done by the dismissal of such appeal unheard'.<sup>587</sup> However, the power does not seem to have been widely used in Te Rohe Pōtae; Drs Husbands and Mitchell identified just two cases. In one case, £1 out of a £20 deposit was forgiven, although the appellant eventually paid the £1 regardless. In another case, £10 was forgiven.<sup>588</sup>

10.7.2.2 Petitions

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also had the option of petitioning Parliament with their complaints about Native Land Court cases. These petitions were usually dealt with by the Native Affairs Select Committee. Following an investigation of the claims made in the petition, the committee reported back to the House as to whether further investigation or inquiry was justified. The Government was not obliged to adopt the recommendations of the Native Affairs Committee.<sup>589</sup>

Between August 1889 and the end of 1907, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori submitted at least 36 petitions relating to Native Land Court decisions to Parliament, including 30 that were submitted after the establishment of the Native Appellate Court in 1894.<sup>590</sup> Of this latter group, the Native Affairs Select Committee recommended that the Government further inquire or consider 21, and recommended that the remaining nine did not warrant further investigation.<sup>591</sup> Very occasionally the committee made more specific recommendations. For example, in relation to

584. Document A79, p 433.

585. Document A79, pp 432–434.

586. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, s 40; doc A79, pp 432–433.

587. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, s 40.

588. Document A79(e), p 39.

589. Document A79, p 435.

590. Document A79, p 435.

591. Document A79, pp 435–436.

a petition from Ahurei Hikairo and five others concerning Pirongia West 1, the committee recommended that '[t]he Chief Judge of the Native Land Court should hold an inquiry regarding the injustice which appears to have been done to the petitioners.<sup>592</sup>

Not obliged to adopt the recommendations of the committee, the Crown's response to a positive recommendation varied. Where the Crown opted to take action in response to a recommendation, it usually convened a commission of inquiry to investigate the matter further. For example, Ngāti Kauwhata petitions protesting court decisions concerning Maungatautari eventually led to a commission of inquiry in 1881.<sup>593</sup> Similarly, after having had their application for a rehearing of the Maraeroa and Hurakia blocks rejected in February 1888, Taonui Hikaka and Hitiri Paerata had unsuccessfully pursued a number of other strategies to get the cases reconsidered, including a boycott of the Ōtorohanga court and appealing to the Supreme Court. Ultimately, they were successful in convincing the Native Affairs Select Committee, which in August 1888 recommended that an inquiry be held. In response, the Crown established a royal commission of inquiry in 1889, eventually leading to a new investigation of title to the blocks in 1891.<sup>594</sup>

In 1904, the Government established another royal commission to inquire into 25 petitions from North Island Māori concerning the decisions of the Native Land Court.<sup>595</sup> The Native Affairs Select Committee had already deemed these petitions worthy of further consideration. Included in the list to be considered by the royal commission were four petitions relating to Te Rohe Pōtae blocks – Te Kauri 2, Whatitokarua, Pukuweka, and Papaokarewa (Kawhia M). Pukuweka was one of the most contentious investigations undertaken by the Ōtorohanga court, and a demonstration of the incompatibility of the court's process and title when determining complex customary interests. As noted above, the Native Appellate Court had overturned the original decision in the Pukuweka case in 1900, granting the land to Whanganui instead of Ngāti Maniapoto. Ngāti Maniapoto subsequently petitioned the Government about the appellate court's decision in 1902, seeking a rehearing.<sup>596</sup> The Whatitokarua case had also already been before the Native Appellate Court in 1900, but in that instance the appellate court had affirmed the original decision.<sup>597</sup>

The royal commission held hearings in Te Kūiti and Kihikihi in 1905. The commissioners upheld the complaints of the petitioners concerning Te Kauri 2 and Pukuweka, but considered that the petitions concerning Whatitokarua and Papaokarewa did not warrant further action. In the case of Te Kauri 2, the royal commission recommended some concrete action: 'that the partition complained

---

592. Chairman of the Native Affairs Committee, Report on the Petition of Ahurei Hikairo & 5 others, 16 October 1895, doc A59(b) (Mitchell document bank), p 347; doc A79, p 436.

593. Document A120 (McBurney), pp 187–190; submission 3.4.134, pp 25–39.

594. Document A79, pp 172–174.

595. The commission was called "The Royal Commission Appointed Under Section 11 of "The Maori Land Claims Adjustment and Laws Amendment Act, 1904".

596. Document A79, pp 435–436.

597. Document A79, p 455.

of be annulled'; it is unclear whether this happened. In the case of Pukuweka, however, the commission only recommended a rehearing.<sup>598</sup>

The Native Appellate Court eventually reheard Pukuweka in 1910. It set a high bar for overturning its earlier decision, noting 'it would require very cogent reasons' from Ngāti Maniapoto to do so. Whanganui, who were 'in the position of having the judgements of the Courts in their favour', were not required to present evidence in support of their position. The appellate court ultimately upheld its 1900 decision to grant the land to Whanganui. In response, Taonui Hikaka and 18 other Ngāti Maniapoto submitted two further petitions to Parliament. Although the Native Affairs Committee referred both petitions for 'consideration', the Government does not appear to have taken any further action.<sup>599</sup>

In most cases, however, it appears that the Crown took no further action following a positive recommendation from the Native Affairs Select Committee. Drs Husband and Mitchell stated that recommendations 'generally received only cursory investigation before being set aside'. They suggested that this might have partly been because '[a]s a rule, the authorities called upon to verify the validity of a petition's claim were the same as those who had created the grievance in the first place.'<sup>600</sup> Although this certainly occurred in other inquiry districts,<sup>601</sup> we caution that Drs Husbands and Mitchell did not point to any direct evidence that the Native Affairs Select Committee or the Crown consulted Native Land Court judges about any petitions relating to decisions of the Ōtorohanga court.

10.7.2.3 Remedying survey errors

10.7.2.3.1 OVERVIEW

When the court was first established, surveys were conducted by private surveyors. However, there were problems with cost and quality of these surveys, drawing criticism from both Māori and Crown officials. As a result, the Native Land Court Act 1873 gave control of surveys to a new Government surveyors' office.<sup>602</sup> The role private surveyors were to play in the court process varied from this point. The 1880 Act excluded private surveyors entirely, while the 1886 Act allowed private surveyors to conduct surveys provided they held a certificate of competency from the surveyor-general.<sup>603</sup>

Despite these safeguards, the sheer amount of surveying work that had to be conducted meant that problems with the quality of surveys sometimes arose. Particularly as partitioning and Crown purchasing increased from the 1890s, the court was responsible for the creation of thousands of new subdivisions, each requiring a survey. George Wilkinson reported to Lewis in April 1903 that surveys were sometimes not 'carried out in accordance with the Court's Order' and

---

598. Document A79, pp 436–437.

599. Document A79, pp 439–440.

600. Document A79, p 437.

601. For example, see Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kahui Maunga, vol 1, p 325.

602. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 737–738.

603. Native Land Court Act 1886, ss 79–80.

Pokuru 3 Urupā Case Study

Some of the difficulties Māori experienced in gaining redress for court errors are highlighted by the example of the numerous petitions that sought the return of an urupā within Pokuru 3. While petitions in 1892 and 1893 were unsuccessful, a petition lodged in 1895 received a favourable recommendation from the Native Affairs Select Committee. However, Native Minister Seddon rejected the committee's recommendation. He considered that 'it was an unusual course to grant a third hearing, and would require strong reasons to justify it'.<sup>1</sup> Later petitions in 1897, 1909, and 1912 also failed to gain a positive result.

The Crown purchased part of Pokuru 3 in 1901, including the urupā, and gazetted the burial ground as a public cemetery in 1903.<sup>2</sup> The chief judge, responding to the 1909 petition, later cited the Crown's action as having been done 'on the petitioner's representations' but noted that 'it was never intended to give her [Rihi Huangā, the petitioner] a grant of land for her own special purposes'.<sup>3</sup> By 1912, when Rihi Huangā made another petition, the urupā had been bisected by a road.<sup>4</sup>

The matter was eventually resolved in 1922. In August of that year, Rihi Huangā wrote to the Minister of Native Affairs, expressing her frustration with the Crown's inaction:

Tenei ahau kei te noho i roto i te mate i te pouri mo taku urupa i Te lakau[,] ara[,] i Pokuru nama 3A[;] na[,] e tama[,]ko taua urupa kua tino kino rawa inaianei nei[,] ara[,] kua mahia te taiepa a nga keeti kei runga tonu i nga tupapaku inaianei nei[,] e tama[,] kua pau atu aku korero ki a koutou aroaro mo taua urupa[,] a, ki te aroaro hoki o te Kooti whakawa whenua Maori[;] i penei te kupu a te kooti ki a au[,] a[,] ka whakahokia mai taua urupa ki a au[;] e tata ana pea ki te 20 tau inaianei e tatari ana ahau kia whakahokia mai ki ahau taku urupa[,] a[,] kaore ano he kupu a koutou kia tae mai ki ahau mo taua urupa[;] no tenei ra tonu ka kite au kua hanga he taiepa ki runga tonu i nga tupapaku[;] koia ka inoi atu nei ano ahau ki a koutou kia tere ta koutou whakahoki mai ki ahau i taua urupa[,] kia tauri ahau ki te whakapai i oku tupapaku[;] ka inoi tonu atu ahau ki a koutou mo taua urupa ake ake.<sup>5</sup>

1. Document A59(b), p 1163; doc A79, p 437.

2. Document A21, annex 7, Pokuru blocks; doc A79, p 438.

3. Document A59(b), p 1163; doc A79, p 438.

4. Document A59(b), p 1163; doc A79, p 438.

5. Document A59(b), p 1508.

Here am I living in suffering with sadness for my burial ground at Te lakau [or Te Takau], that is, on Pokuru No 3A. Now, my son,<sup>6</sup> that urupa is in a really dreadful state now, because the Gages' fence was built above the bodies at the time. Son, I have exhausted my speeches concerning that urupa before you and before the court judging Māori land; the court said to me this, that is, that that urupa would be returned to me. Now it is nearly twenty years that I have been waiting for that urupa to be returned to me, and no further words of yours have come to me concerning that urupa. On this day I saw that a fence had again been built over the bodies. Therefore I am again pleading with you that your return to me of that urupa should be swift, so that I may set in order my dead. I will go on pleading with you for that urupa for ever and ever.<sup>7</sup>

I am sad because of my burial ground at Te lakau that is at Pokuru Nama 3. It has been desecrated because a fence belonging to the Gages has been built upon the portion where persons are buried. I gave very exhaustive evidence before the Court (NLCT) in reference to this matter and the Court gave me to understand that this burial ground would be returned to me. For twenty years I have waited for this understanding to be given effect to but in vain. Since then nothing more has been said about the matter by you. Today a fence has been erected upon the very place where persons are buried. I therefore entreat you to return to me my burial ground as soon as possible to enable me to put it in order. I shall forever entreat you concerning this burial ground.<sup>8</sup>]

In response, and following correspondence between the Native Department and Lands Department (which continued to oppose any return of the burial ground), the Government finally passed legislation later that year (1922) to return the urupā to the Māori owners.<sup>9</sup>

Rudolph Hotu pointed out during our hearings that it took '27 years of persistently reminding the Crown of the need for it to rectify the wrong that occurred through the Native Land Court award'. Furthermore, by the time the Crown took action, Māori were only able to succeed 'in getting [the] 3 roods which remained of the urupa after the dirty great road had been put smack in the middle of it'.<sup>10</sup>

6. This is an older man addressing Pōmare, who was still relatively young at this time.

7. Waitangi Tribunal translation.

8. Contemporary Crown translation (doc A59(b), p 1507).

9. Native Land Amendment and Native Land Claims Adjustment Act 1922, s 44; doc A59(b), p 1500.

10. Document 532, p 12.

had to be redone.<sup>604</sup> The survey of the Mangawhero–Waipa block, for example, was criticised by William Charles Kensington of the Lands and Survey Office and judges rehearing the case for not following the court's order.<sup>605</sup> Other surveys were simply poorly done. In March 1892, a Survey Office official criticised a survey of the 'Kaingapipi and Te Ngarara' blocks as showing 'great carelessness', with aspects of it being 'anything but good'.<sup>606</sup>

The extent to which faulty surveys were a problem in Te Rohe Pōtae during the period covered by this chapter is unclear. Drs Husbands and Mitchell identified seven cases where Māori or Crown or court officials complained of problems with subdivisional surveys.<sup>607</sup> In addition, the Pouakani Tribunal dealt with a series of problems arising from surveys on the eastern boundary of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block. That Tribunal found that the Native Land Court, when hearing the Tauponuiatia block at Taupō in 1886, did not have a sufficient plan to hear the block. This led to problems with the surveyed boundaries that were only rectified in 1892 after Māori had incurred considerable time and expense.<sup>608</sup> This Tribunal has no jurisdiction to rehear those claims.

The claimants pointed us to other examples of survey errors. Ngāti Hikairo highlighted an instance where a surveyor appeared in court in 1911 to admit an error in the survey of the northern boundary of Pirongia West, resulting in the loss of 800 acres of land for the owners. No action appears to have been taken in response.<sup>609</sup> Dawn Magner, of Ngāti Uekaha, Ngāti Urunumia, and Ngāti Te Kanawa, told us about a survey of Hauturu East which resulted in a survey line bisecting a wharenuī at Pohatuirī, near Waitomo.<sup>610</sup> We address these claims in the take a takiwā chapters of our report.

Of the seven examples of survey errors identified by Drs Husbands and Mitchell, the Crown or court only appears to have provided a remedy in two instances – for an error concerning Te Waanu Natanahira's land in the Kinohaku West T block, and for the Umukaimata survey error.<sup>611</sup>

In December 1901, Te Waanu Natanahira complained to Wilkinson that land he had sown in grass had been incorrectly designated as Crown land by a survey. The error was amended by court order in February 1904, after Te Waanu had 'presumably lost at least two years of profitable use and development' of his land.<sup>612</sup>

604. Document A79, pp 501–502.

605. Document A79, p 502.

606. Document A79(a), p 1366; doc A79, p 502.

607. Document A79, pp 502–505.

608. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993, chapter 10, p 178.

609. Pirongia West (1911) 52 Otorohanga MB 366–367; doc A98 (Thorne), pp 279–280; submission 3.4.226, p 50.

610. Document s20 (Magner), pp 6–7.

611. Document A79, p 503.

612. Document A79, p 503.

10.7.2.3.2 CASE STUDY: UMUKAIMATA SURVEY ERROR

The most significant survey error in Te Rohe Pōtae concerned the boundaries of the Umukaimata, Waiaraia, and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1 and 3 blocks.<sup>613</sup> The Native Land Court investigated title to Umukaimata and the adjoining Taorua parent block at the same time in 1890. Its investigation was conducted on the basis of a sketch plan, which was all that was required at the time.<sup>614</sup> During the investigation, Whaaro, a counter-claimant, added the Waiaraia block to his claim. This piece of land appears to have been left out by the claimants while they awaited the completion of the Mokau Mohakatino and Mohakatino Paraninihi survey.<sup>615</sup>

The survey of Umukaimata was not completed until 1892. In the interim, the Crown commenced purchasing in the Waiaraia and Taorua blocks. The purchase of these blocks was regarded as politically important. The blocks had been offered for sale to the Crown by Wahanui. Wilkinson in particular was keen to purchase the blocks to reassure Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that the Crown was as ready to purchase land in the rohe as it had professed.<sup>616</sup> The Department of Lands and Survey conducted a limited survey of Waiaraia for the Crown in 1891.<sup>617</sup> The surveyor was only asked to survey a line between two points; the remainder of the block's boundary was defined by the neighbouring blocks, as established by the Native Land Court.<sup>618</sup>

The survey of Waiaraia immediately attracted protests. Taonui Hikaka, one of the principal owners of Umukaimata, wrote to Wilkinson in July 1891 that the 'survey is incorrect in my opinion'. He requested that the purchase be delayed until surveys of the surrounding blocks were completed.<sup>619</sup> Wilkinson was concerned and sought clarification of the size and boundaries of Waiaraia from the Chief Surveyor on several occasions. Eventually, however, he appears to have been reassured by the Chief Surveyor's assurances that 'there is no overlap nor confliction of boundaries' and that any error was the responsibility of the Native Land Court.<sup>620</sup> The purchase of Waiaraia went ahead in mid-August 1891.<sup>621</sup>

Even before the survey of Umukaimata was completed in July 1892, there were further objections to the Waiaraia survey. Te Rewatu Hiriako, another owner of Umukaimata, twice complained to the court in January 1892 that parts of Umukaimata had been included in the Crown's purchase of the Waiaraia and Taurangi blocks.<sup>622</sup> In response, the court complained that 'the survey depart-

---

613. Submission 3.4.135, pp 8–29.

614. Document A79, pp 542, 546–547.

615. Document A79, pp 551–552.

616. Document A79, pp 560–561.

617. Document A79, pp 542, 546–547.

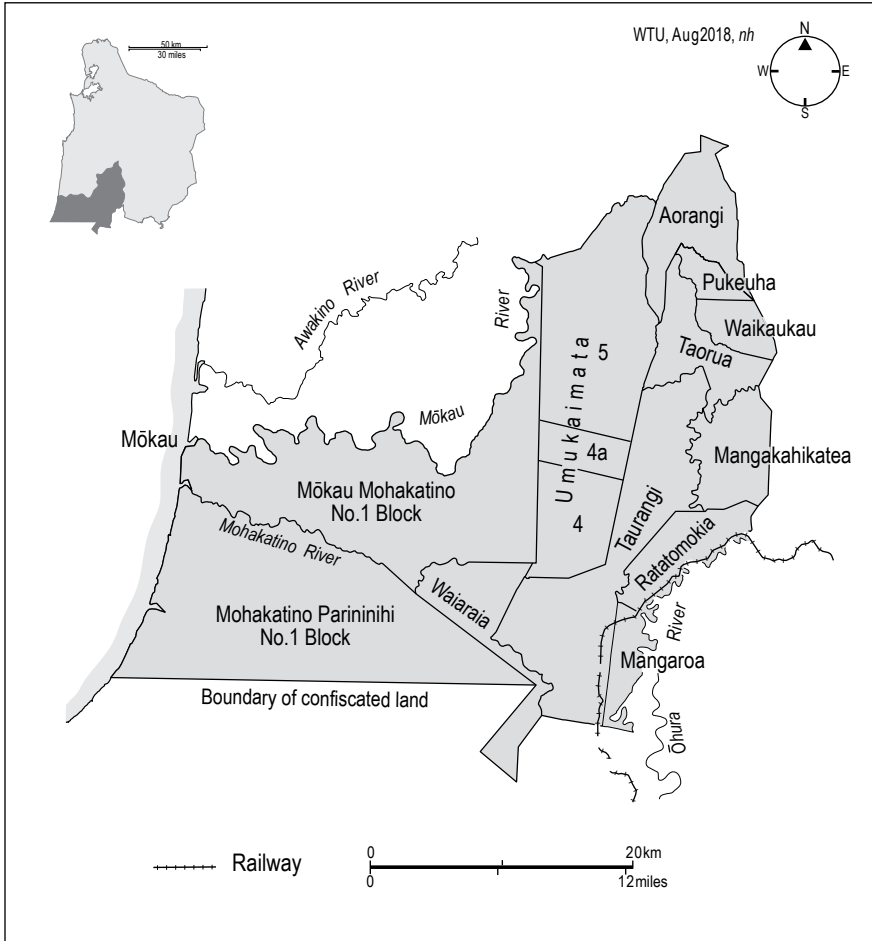

618. Document A79, p 568.

619. Document A79, p 570.

620. Document A79, p 572.

621. Document A79, p 573.

622. Waiaraia (1892) 12 Otorohanga MB 22–23; doc A79, p 576.

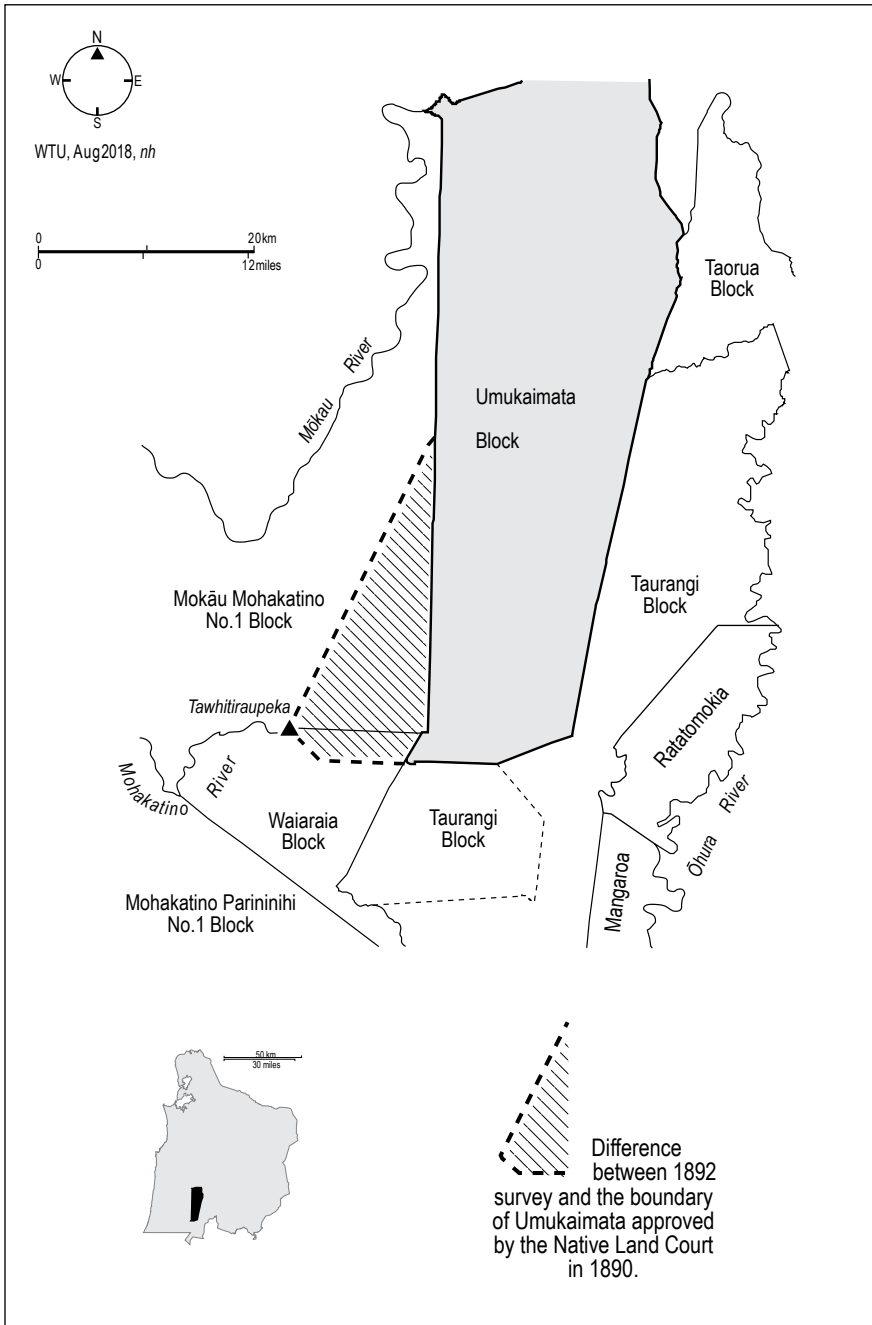

Map 10.6: Umukaimata, Waiaraia, and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1 and 3 blocks as surveyed ment have inverted the order of things' by surveying Waiaraia first, despite its boundaries being dependent on those of Umukaimata.<sup>623</sup> Judge Gudgeon began to pursue the issue, particularly as complaints continued throughout the year. Wilkinson also reminded the Chief Surveyor that he had raised the matter before the sale went through.<sup>624</sup> The Chief Surveyor admitted to Gudgeon that there was an overlap, but reminded him that 'the rule is that the first Block surveyed & approved must stand.'<sup>625</sup>

623. Umukaimata (1892) 12 Otorohanga MB 39; doc A79, p 577.

624. Document A79, pp 577, 579.

625. Document A79, p 578.

Map 10.7: Difference between 1892 survey of Umukaimata and boundaries approved by Native Land Court in 1890

Judge Gudgeon then wrote to the chief judge in August 1892. He reported on the complaints of the owners and detailed ‘several absurdities’ of the boundaries of Umukaimata as passed by the court as compared to its recent survey. He noted that it appeared the Waiaraia survey plan had never been exhibited in court for approval, as was required, meaning there had been no opportunity for Māori to object. He thought that, as a result of the error, ‘the Waiaraia block contains probably 6000 acres of land which properly belongs to the Umukaimata and Mohakatino Parininihi No 1 blocks’. He reported that the owners were ‘naturally very wroth’ that ‘the Govt, through the Native Land Purchase dept’ had ‘successfully swindled them out of so much land’.<sup>626</sup> No action appears to have been taken as a result of Gudgeon’s letter.<sup>627</sup>

Despite the fact that Crown officials, a Native Land Court judge, and Māori were aware of problems with the Waiaraia block from an early stage, it was many years before any remedy for the survey error was provided. After their numerous objections in 1891 and 1892, the Māori owners do not appear to have made any further complaint about the issue until 1907, when Te Rewatu Hiriako, Wiari Te Kuri, and Hone Taonui petitioned parliament.<sup>628</sup> In response, the Crown set aside 2,465 acres of land within Waiaraia as compensation, though the Native Land Court did not hold an investigation to determine who was entitled to ownership of the returned land – known as Te Waro A – until 1915.<sup>629</sup>

Te Rewatu petitioned parliament again in 1925, alleging that the 2,465 acres returned was insufficient redress. He claimed that 11,000 acres had been lost and asked for the balance. Further lobbying by Maui Pomare, Member of Parliament for Western Māori, resulted in an investigation by the Native Land Court in 1928. The court found that the 2,465 acres had only been a ‘rough estimate’, ‘not arrived at on any known facts’. As a result, it could not be determined if the 2,465 acres was ‘adequate recompense’. The judge recommended that an inspection should occur to try and locate the position of Te Pou-a-Wharara, one of the southern boundary points of Umukaimata according to the original court order.<sup>630</sup> An attempt to find the point in 1935 was unsuccessful. By 1936, the Minister of Lands had concluded that ‘I do not see that anything further can be done’ unless new evidence emerged.<sup>631</sup>

In our inquiry, counsel for Ngāti Te Paemate claimed that ‘as with the Crown’s failure to ensure the survey was properly undertaken, by failing to respond to the concerns of the claimants’ tūpuna, the Crown were effectively turning a blind eye to the approach it had taken to the survey’. As a result, the claimants lost land, as well as the time and expense required to pursue a remedy. They consider that the matter remains unresolved.<sup>632</sup> The Crown submitted that it ‘recognises that

---

626. Umukaimata (1892) 13 Otorohanga MB 47–49; doc A79, pp 580–582.

627. Document A79, p 582.

628. Document A79, pp 582–583.

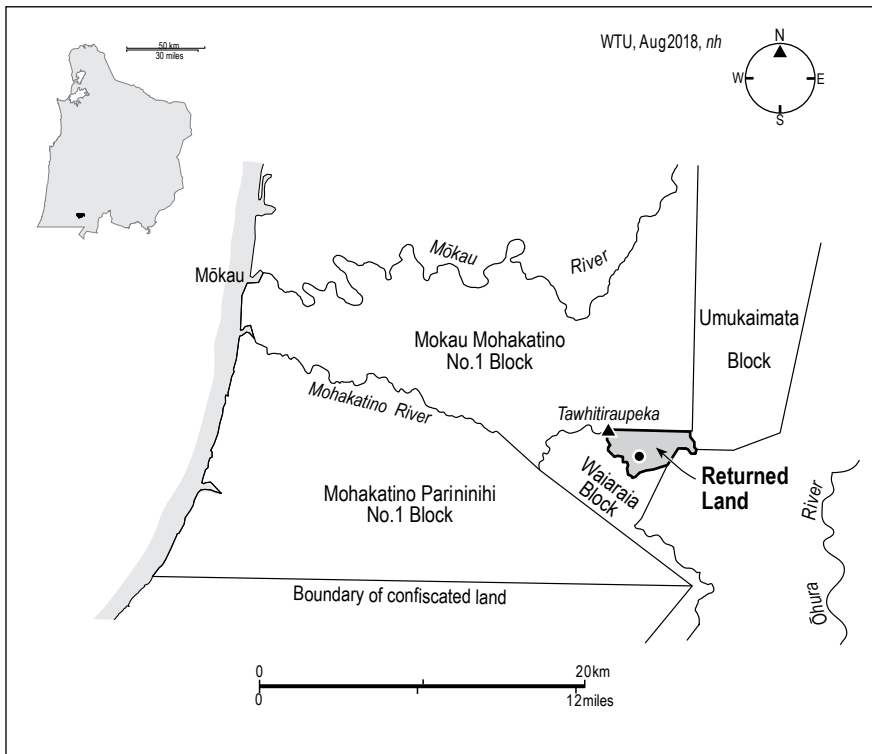

629. Document A79, pp 584–587.

630. Document A79, pp 591–592.

631. Document A79, p 594.

632. Submission 3.4.135, pp 28–29.

Map 10.8: Location of Te Waro A block a serious error occurred in the survey of the boundaries to the Umukaimata, Waiarara and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1 and 3 blocks and that this caused significant prejudice to the owners of Umukaimata 5'. However, counsel further submitted that this prejudice had been addressed as far as possible by the return of 2,465 acres in 1915.<sup>633</sup>

The location of Te Pou-a-Wharara remains unknown today. However, during our hearings, Crown counsel produced evidence which seemed to significantly narrow down the area in which the point might be located. Drawing upon minute book evidence from 1892, counsel suggested that 'Te Pou-a-Wharara is very near to a point known as Tawhitimarangi', a point shown on the sketch map for Waiarara and near the high point known as "Titi".<sup>634</sup> The Crown further submitted that there was an error in the boundary description for Umukaimata provided by Judge Mair, due to the incorrect placement of the boundary for Mokau Mohakatino No. 1 on the sketch map provided to the court. Moreover, counsel submitted that Judge Mair might have 'incorrectly transposed the words "Mohakatino Paraninihi No.1"

633. Submission 3.4.305, p74.

634. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 251–252.

for “Mokau Mohakatino No.1” in his boundary description. Counsel submitted that the returned 2,465 acres therefore ‘adequately compensated’ the Umukaimata owners.<sup>635</sup>

Without knowing exactly where Te Pou-a-Wharara was located, it is difficult to assess whether the 2,465 acres returned in 1915 represented adequate compensation for the land lost as a result of the Waiaraia survey. The land that was given to the owners as compensation is not high quality. Barbara Marsh told us during hearings that ‘It’s steep country. You have to lie on your back to look up the hill.’<sup>636</sup>

More than just the quality of the compensation land, however, we consider that timeliness of redress is also very important. Even though the Crown and the court were made aware of the error with the Waiaraia survey from an early stage, it was more than two decades before the Umukaimata owners received some land back as compensation for their loss. This was notwithstanding the concerns and interventions of both Wilkinson and Gudgeon at the time. It was also despite the fact that Waiaraia had been purchased by the Crown itself, meaning that it had the ability to return the land taken in error. In other words, the Crown had every opportunity to provide fast and full redress. It did not.

As the years passed, it became much more difficult for the Crown to fix the problem it had created. In particular, the location of Te Pou-a-Wharara, which might have been easily ascertained in 1891 or 1892, was lost by the time the Crown eventually came to consider redress. In response to complaints from Te Rewatu and others, the Crown did make some effort to try and locate Te Pou-a-Wharara in order to determine exactly how much land had been lost. Those efforts should not be discounted, but by that stage it was just too late. That it took so long for compensation to be provided, and that it only occurred because of the determined efforts of the block’s Māori owners, indicates that the system of providing redress for survey errors was by no means robust.

10.7.3 Treaty analysis and findings

Given that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had so strenuously tried to avoid the court, it is unsurprising that the court’s arrival in the district did not end their opposition and discontent. Some Māori chose to attend hearings, but also withdrew from court proceedings when they were dissatisfied with its decisions or with the Crown’s broader land policies. Other Māori chose to avoid the court entirely, particularly those associated with the Kīngitanga.

The court does not seem to have had any standard approach for protecting the rights of parties who refused to come to court. Rather, the claimants argued, the court ‘was unduly harsh to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who refused to have their lands subject to’ its process.<sup>637</sup> The Crown argued that, in dealing with such protest and opposition, the court must have been mindful of not setting a precedent that

---

635. Submission 3.4.313, pp 29–30.

636. Transcript 4.1.15(a), p 478 (Barbara Marsh, hearing week 10, Maniaroa marae, 4 March 2014).

637. Submission 3.4.107, p 86.

would encourage Māori to stay away from court.<sup>638</sup> One mechanism of protection that the Crown pointed to – the rights of rehearings and appeal – often did not provide relief because the court was not especially sympathetic to the claims of political absentees. The other mechanism of protection – relying on people who did attend to take account of the interests of non-participants – was also clearly inadequate, even if it provided a remedy in some instances.

Claimant counsel submitted that neither the rehearing system prior to 1894 nor the Native Appellate Court established in 1894 were suitable remedies. For the system in place before 1894, counsel were particularly critical of the lack of transparency by which applications were dealt with.<sup>639</sup> Moreover, they argued, ‘the right to apply for a rehearing was an illusory remedy’ because ‘[m]ost applications were dismissed’.<sup>640</sup> Similarly, counsel argued that the Native Appellate Court established in 1894 was not a suitable remedy due to the time limits and costs involved, as well as the fact that it continued to be manned by judges of the Native Land Court.<sup>641</sup>

The Crown submitted that it ‘does not accept that the lack of an Appellate Court until 1894 necessarily means that justice was not done, or seen to be done’. Counsel pointed to petitions and direct complaints to ministers and Members of Parliament as alternative remedies. The Crown noted that the number of rehearings and appeals was low but rejected speculation that might be due to cost or uncertainty. Counsel also did not accept that the requirements for appeals to be lodged within 30 days or security costs, as well as the additional costs of a rehearing, presented significant barriers for those who wished to appeal a decision.<sup>642</sup>

Because of the number of subdivision cases determined by the Ōtorohanga court in the period before 1894, the adequacy of the rehearing system is an important issue for this Tribunal. As pointed out by the claimants, many applications for rehearing were dismissed in Te Rohe Pōtae. Between December 1888 and September 1891 only one application out of 35 was reheard. More applications for rehearing were successful between 1892 and 1894. During that period, eight applications out of 27 proceeded to a rehearing, and all eight resulted in the original decision being changed in some way.

We do not agree that the limited number of applications to be reheard necessarily means that the rehearing system was an ‘illusory remedy’. However, we do share the claimants’ concerns that aspects of the process by which rehearing applications were dealt with lacked transparency. In particular, although applicants had three months from the date of the original court decision to apply for rehearing, it was not always evident when the date of that original court decision was. As a result, several applications in Te Rohe Pōtae were dismissed simply for being premature or late, rather than on their merits. In addition, there was no prescribed form for Māori to make an application, nor any published set of criteria against

---

638. Submission 3.4.305, p 67.

639. Submission 3.4.107, p 112.

640. Submission 3.4.107, p 114.

641. Submission 3.4.107, pp 113–114.

642. Submission 3.4.305, pp 97–101.

which the chief judge would decide applications. We consider that these aspects of the system would have caused considerable uncertainty for Māori looking to contest a court decision. The chief judge was at least considering applications for rehearing in person by this stage, but continued to exercise a broad discretion with limited review rights.

The Native Appellate Court, established in 1894, was an improvement over the rehearing system in several ways. The chief judge no longer had complete discretion over whether a complaint had sufficient basis to justify a rehearing. Instead, appeals now only had to meet the technical requirements in the legislation. There was also a much clearer period in which appeal notices had to be filed: within 30 days of the decision being pronounced in court. However, we note that this was a much shorter period than provided for under the rehearing system – a third of the time previously allowed. The 30-day period may have achieved ‘certainty and finality’, as the Crown submitted, but we do not consider that it was practical in the circumstances of the time.

In all, 82 appeals were lodged between June 1895 and December 1906, resulting in 39 proceedings. Of the 39 cases that were reheard, 21 resulted in the original order being changed in some way.

Appeals in the Native Appellate Court incurred what appear to have been reasonably modest costs. However, these costs cannot be considered in isolation, and must be considered alongside the costs that Māori had already incurred in bringing their land through the Native Land Court. We also consider that the requirement to pay a security deposit for appeals potentially presented a barrier to Māori seeking redress. Of the 82 appeals lodged between June 1895 and December 1906, 12 were dismissed for failure to pay the security deposit. The consequences of that failure were serious: the original decision was confirmed as if it had been affirmed by the Appellate Court, and no further appeals were possible. Although the court had the power to remit the deposit if it would cause injustice, that power does not appear to have been widely used in Te Rohe Pōtae.

Petitions to the Native Affairs Committee offered another avenue by which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could gain redress for court decisions they disagreed with. Thirty-six petitions relating to decisions of the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae were submitted between August 1889 and the end of 1907. The Central North Island Tribunal considered that petitions to Native Affairs Committee were a ‘significant mechanism’ but was concerned that it was only a recommendatory body.<sup>643</sup> Indeed, in Te Rohe Pōtae positive recommendations from the committee rarely resulted in the Crown taking any further action. While redress was certainly possible through petitions, it could be – and was often – slow, as was the case with the 27 years it took to return the Pokuru 3 urupā to the Māori owners. The lack of speed by which redress was provided to Māori can be contrasted with the rapid pace by which the court operated, and by which the Crown conducted its purchasing of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land, as will be seen in chapter 11.

---

643. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 501.

Given the sheer number of surveys carried out in Te Rohe Pōtae in connection with the court's activities, there do not seem to have been a significant number of serious survey errors. By the time the court arrived in Te Rohe Pōtae, the Crown had taken control of the survey process and instituted a licensing system for the private surveyors contracted to conduct surveys on the Survey Department's behalf. Both the court and the Survey Department were scrutinising surveys. However, there is very limited evidence before us concerning how successful these measures were.

We do know that some errors did occur without being caught by this system of checks, resulting in sometimes serious prejudice to Māori landowners. Claimant counsel argued that '[t]he Crown failed to provide appropriate and affordable processes for remedying survey errors.'<sup>644</sup> The Crown submitted that there was insufficient evidence to 'provide a satisfactory basis for the claimant's broad allegation.'<sup>645</sup>

We are concerned that, of the seven examples of survey errors cited by Drs Husbands and Mitchell, there is only evidence of the Crown providing remedies in two cases. In both cases, the remedies were less than timely. It took over two years, for instance, for the court to fix the survey error of Te Waanu Natanahira's land.

More serious was the Crown's failure to act early to remedy the survey error concerning the boundaries of the Umukaimata, Waiaraia, and Mohakatino Paraninihi 1 and 3 blocks. Crown officials were immediately made aware of concerns about the survey of the Waiaraia block when it was conducted in 1891. But, determined to complete its purchase of the block, the Crown chose to ignore those concerns. During 1892, both the Māori owners of Umukaimata and Judge Gudgeon alerted the Crown again to the survey error. Once again, the Crown took no action in response. It was not until the owners complained again in 1907 that the Crown finally set aside 2,465 acres of Waiaraia as compensation for the owners of Umukaimata.

Only 2,465 acres was provided as redress, likely well under that which was lost. Estimates at the time of the amount of land lost because of the error varied from 6,000 to 11,000 acres. The Crown's failure to act sooner meant that, by the time it was prepared to acknowledge and compensate for the survey error, the location of a critical boundary point – Te Pou-a-Wharara – had been lost, and with it, the opportunity to determine accurately the amount of land lost. That being said, the new evidence presented by the Crown during our inquiry suggests that there may be merit in it now pursuing a further investigation into the location of Te Pou-a-Wharara.

The Crown had every opportunity to provide fast and full redress to the owners of Umukaimata by returning the affected land when it was first made aware of the survey error in 1891 and 1892. We find that its failure to do so was in breach of the Treaty principles of redress, active protection, and good government. The prejudice caused to the owners as a result has been, at best, only partly mitigated by the award of 2,465 acres as compensation.

---

644. Submission 3.4.107, p 115.

645. Submission 3.4.305, p 102.

Taken together, we consider that the various mechanisms by which Māori could revisit decisions of court during this period did not constitute a meaningful or robust system of redress. The procedural, financial, and practical hurdles associated with rehearings and then the Native Appellate Court were too onerous in the circumstances of the time, particularly in Te Rohe Pōtae. Other forms of redress were often much too slow, which at times prevented a full remedy being provided. Accordingly, we find that the Crown's failure to provide a meaningful or robust system of redress breached the Treaty principles of redress and active protection.

10.8 PREJUDICE

The Crown's Treaty breaches in respect of the Native Land Court have caused significant economic, social, and cultural prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. During the hearing of the Crown's closing submissions, Crown counsel acknowledged that, despite the efforts of the Crown 'to improve the way the Court operated and to make it a Court that was better in tune with Māori', the results of the court's operations in Te Rohe Pōtae were nonetheless similar to the experience of Māori in other districts. Of these outcomes, Crown counsel commented:

the individualisation of tenure . . . was just part and parcel of the Native Land Court process – that is what it was set up to do. The lack of communal title is just a consequence that affected all Māori throughout the country. So that outcome is the same for Rohe Pōtae Māori as it is for all the others in the country. And the third outcome, the significant alienation of land, is . . . a result of a whole bundle of factors, but ultimately the outcome is very similar here in this district inquiry as it is in others.<sup>646</sup>

Drs Husbands and Mitchell also argued that, despite improvements in the court's process, 'the outcome for Maori in the Rohe Potae district in terms of land retention and ongoing community control and use appears little better than that for groups in other districts.'<sup>647</sup>

The Crown's native title system and the inadequate protections it offered ultimately facilitated the large-scale transfer of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land to the Crown and settlers. The methods by which this occurred will be considered in detail in chapter 11, but the scale of that transfer needs to be briefly mentioned here to fully understand the short and long-term impacts of the Native Land Court and its form of title on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

As at 1890, 93 per cent of the inquiry district remained in Te Rohe Pōtae Māori ownership. Over the next 15 years, the Crown acquired 639,505 acres of land – around one-third of the inquiry district. A small number of private alienations occurred over the same period, meaning that, by 1905 – less than 20 years after the

---

646. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 111–112 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

647. Document A79, p 539.

court's first sitting at Ōtorohanga – Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retained ownership of 59 per cent of the inquiry district. Within another 20 years, by 1925, this proportion had declined further to 27 per cent, and by 1950, it was just 21 per cent. As at 2010, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retained ownership of only 233,128 acres – 12 per cent of the original inquiry district.<sup>648</sup>

The permanent alienation of so much land had dramatic economic, social, and cultural impacts for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. While we accept the Crown's submission that clothing land in Native Land Court title did not necessarily result in its alienation, it is also clear that several aspects of the Native Land Court process and title encouraged alienation at a scale that was severely prejudicial to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

In section 10.5, we outlined the impacts that Native Land Court titles had on the economic development and tribal organisation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The economic benefits of native land title that were touted to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori before 1886 did not, for the most part, eventuate. Native land titles were not fit for purpose, and were good for little other than alienation. As a result, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori struggled to use their land effectively, or even to retain it. The long-term result was that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were often left economically marginalised.

Native land titles and the individualisation of land ownership also fundamentally changed and undermined Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tribal society. With individuals able to sell their land interests without reference to the collective, the ability of rangatira and communities to make strategic decisions about the retention, use, and alienation of their land and resources was seriously compromised. This prejudice was compounded as more and more land was alienated.

Native land titles changed Te Rohe Pōtae Māori society and their relationships with land in other ways. The boundaries established by the Native Land Court, particularly when followed by purchasing, severed Māori from their traditional lands and sites of cultural and spiritual significance. The Te Urewera Tribunal stated that the work of the court, along with land alienation, 'led to the dramatic shrinking of takiwa within which hapū and iwi had established and exercised their customary rights':

It disrupted the transmission of cultural knowledge. When people no longer lived on the land, or hunted its resources, or made journeys across it, few new places could be named; many old names could be easily forgotten. There would be no new waiata about events that took place on the land. People would be separated from wahi tapu. No new tipuna whare would be built.<sup>649</sup>

These sentiments were echoed by claimants in our inquiry. Eliza Rata, for instance, told us:

---

648. Document A21, pp 127, 129, 131.

649. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, p 1332.

Prior to the Court laying down its boundaries, Ngāti Raerae had ranged freely over our large area of whenua, protecting the resources such as the birds and the Awa and using them to sustain the people. The resources of our whenua and Awa were also used to support our whanaunga and the Kingitanga.

The court, however, ‘restricted our people to a smaller area of land’ and so changed their way of life.<sup>650</sup>

The loss of access to, and in some cases the destruction of, sites of cultural significance, including wahi tapu, were particular grievances for claimants. Tame Tūwhangai told us about how the Native Land Court had impacted upon Ngāti Hari access to Rangitoto–Tuhua 2 (Pukuweka). Pakingahau Hill, for instance, ‘was known as a bird snaring area’ and was where ‘the High Priestess Hinekiore of the Tahere Manu would open the seasonal catch’. However, the area was not awarded to Ngāti Hari when the block went through the Native Land Court, so they lost access.<sup>651</sup> With the loss of other mahinga kai and kāinga, Mr Tūwhangai told us, food sources were depleted, while deforestation caused ‘considerable prejudice to our environmental resources.’<sup>652</sup> Ngāti Maniapoto, meanwhile, have lost access to and control over three significant wahi tapu sites: Rangitaea Pā, Marae-o-Hina Pā, and Orongokoekoea Pā.<sup>653</sup>

The fate of the Paretao eel reserve in the Kawhia block provides a further example of what could happen to collectively owned resources under the native land system. Paretao was a valuable fishery, particularly for tuna. It was made a reserve in 1892, with eight owners who were intended to be trustees on behalf of eight hapū of Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>654</sup> However, the native land legislation did not provide for such a trust, meaning the trustees were regarded instead as owners with rights of alienation. In 1907, the Waikato District Maori Land Board approved a lease for the area, despite the stated intentions of the lessee to drain the wetland on the basis of the health risk it caused to the surrounding township.<sup>655</sup> Frank Kīngi Thorne told us that this resulted in ‘the end of a culture of eel fishing on the shores on Paretao’, as well as ‘the abandonment of kāinga on its shores.’<sup>656</sup>

The effects of the Native Land Court and its form of title on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori have been serious and long-lasting. Subsequent chapters of our report – particularly those concerned with the retention, control, and alienation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land – will continue to trace those effects throughout the twentieth century.

650. Document Q30(b) (Rata), pp 8–9.

651. Document R20 (Tūwhangai), p 12.

652. Document R20, p 13.

653. Document P3 (Roa).

654. Document A76(c) (Belgrave answers to questions of clarification), pp 17–18.

655. Document A76(c), pp 17–18.

656. Document A98, p 154.

10.9 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Our key findings in this chapter have been:

- The Native Land Court that operated in Ōtorohanga was an improvement over the court in other districts. The presiding judge provided some accommodation for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the court's process during the title determination phase. For example, the court was willing to sit when and where it was convenient for its Māori participants, and adopted their preferred approach to subdivision of the Rohe Potae block. The court also encouraged Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to reach agreement outside of court as much as possible. These accommodations offered Te Rohe Pōtae Māori an important chance to have a say in decisions affecting their land, as well as reducing the costs of the court process.
- However, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were still not in control of the process. The judge remained the ultimate decision maker, with the power to dismiss Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns and proceed regardless. Where out-of-court arrangements were opposed, the result was often a long, acrimonious, and costly hearing in an adversarial court process. The Native Land Court was poorly prepared to undertake the task of determining customary ownership in these circumstances.
- We found that the Crown's key failure was that the native land legislation and the court process authorised by it resulted in a lack of Māori control and input into title determination, contrary to the express wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Despite the expectations of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the Kawhia Native Committee did not play any substantive role in the title determination process. We considered that the Crown's failure to follow through with its commitment to reform the legislation relating to native committees so that they could play such a role represented a cynical disregard for the Te Rohe Pōtae Māori demand for mana whakahaere. Accordingly, we found that the Crown's failure to provide Te Rohe Pōtae Māori with a greater role in the court's title determination process was in breach of the express terms of article 2 of the Treaty and its guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. It was also in breach of the principle of partnership and the obligation to act reasonably and in good faith.
- In addition, we found that Native Land Court titles were not in fact or in law awarded in favour of hapū. Rather, they were awarded to individuals belonging to hapū. In this way, they were not reflective of custom. The titles awarded by the court were also ill-suited to the purpose they were supposed to serve – namely, engagement in the colonial economy.
- We found that the Native Land Court regime and the form of title that it created undermined rather than upheld the article 2 guarantee concerning land and were therefore inconsistent with the express terms of the Treaty. We further found that the individualisation of tenure provided for by native land titles breached the express guarantee of tino rangatiratanga in article 2 of the Treaty. The Crown's failure to provide or even contemplate providing title awarded on a hapū basis, as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought, was also contrary to article 2, and breached the Treaty principles of partnership and active protection.

- ▶ We further found that, having imposed its unmanageable form of title on Māori, the Crown by and large failed to meaningfully respond to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori requests for an effective mechanism to communally manage their lands. We consider such a mechanism was essential for the successful participation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the emerging colonial economy. In this way, the law also did not provide for a system of governance that reflected Te Rohe Pōtae Māori custom or aspirations for their mana whakahaere.
- ▶ We also found that the costs of gaining Native Land Court title could be excessive and unreasonable, and were unfairly placed on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, even though most of the benefits of the new title flowed to the Crown and settlers. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were faced with an array of costs at every stage of the court process. Survey costs were a particular burden. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, not fully immersed in the cash economy and restricted in what they could do with their lands by Crown pre-emption, had few options available to repay these debts. Often, the debt could only be repaid by selling land – their most important and valuable resource. We found that the Crown, in failing to lessen the costs associated with the court process, or to institute a fairer and more equal distribution of those costs, breached the Treaty principle of active protection.
- ▶ We found that, for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who wished to challenge a court decision, the two main options – rehearings and, after 1894, appeals, and petitions to the Native Affairs Select Committee – were inadequate. These options were capable of providing remedies, but Māori had to overcome sometimes onerous procedural barriers first, and they often had to wait too long. We found that the Crown failed to provide a meaningful or robust system of review of court decisions, in breach of the Treaty principles of redress and active protection.

CHAPTER 11

NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA I, 1890–1905: CROWN PURCHASING, 1890–1905

What possible benefit would we derive from roads, railways, and Land Courts if they became the means of depriving us of our lands? We can live as we are situated at present without roads, railways, or Courts, but we could not live without our lands.

—Wahanui Huatare and others, 1883<sup>1</sup>

11.1 INTRODUCTION

In the mid- to late 1880s, as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands were going through the Native Land Court, the Crown took a series of steps to ready itself for a programme of land buying. Purchasing officers were appointed. Budgets were allocated. A survey was conducted to determine which lands were most attractive for settlement. Purchasing began in neighbouring land blocks such as Waimarino and Taupouuiatia. And a series of legislative steps eliminated private competitors from the land market. In 1890, as the Native Land Court began to define individual owners' interests on land titles, the Crown's purchasing officers began to make offers.

During the first few years, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were willing to offer small amounts of land on the southern border in order to clear survey charges and court costs on their remaining lands; otherwise, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and communities were generally opposed to land sales. Many wanted to develop farms and were willing to open land for settlement, so long as they could manage the process themselves in order to best serve their people's interests. But their consistent preference was to lease, not sell. In all of these respects, their views remained consistent with what they had sought in their June 1883 petition (see chapter 8).

The Crown's goal, on the other hand, was to quickly buy significant tracts of land along the railway line and in other accessible and fertile parts of the district. Its purpose was not merely to open land for settlement and development, which could have occurred if Māori were free to lease on an open market, but also to profit from land sales so it could fund the railway and other settler infrastructure. The Crown's purchasing programme was deliberately focused on breaking down Māori resistance to land selling. It used its lawmaking powers to prevent Te Rohe

---

1. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

Pōtae Māori from raising money from their lands by any means other than selling to the Crown. It imposed and then called in survey debts, using this as a means to pressure owners to sell. And, although it negotiated with hapū leaders on some occasions, its main approach was to target individuals, often those with the weakest connections to the land or the greatest need of money.

Over months and years, the Aotea-Rohe Potae block land purchase officer, George Wilkinson, gradually acquired shares from individual owners until he had enough to force non-sellers into court, where the Crown's interests were carved off. Wilkinson then began to target non-selling individuals with new offers, setting off further rounds of selling and partitioning. In the first two years after purchasing began, very few shares or blocks were sold. But late in 1891 the ice began to break, and from 1892 through to the early 1900s, vast tracts of Te Rohe Pōtae land were transferred from Māori to Crown ownership. In all, between 1890 and 1905, the Crown purchased one-third of the district – 639,815 acres out of a total of 1,931,136 acres in the district, excluding its extension areas. This included much of the fertile territory around the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers.<sup>2</sup> Much of the remaining Māori land was fragmented, inaccessible, or otherwise difficult to use.

This chapter considers claims about the Crown's purchasing programme, including its use of lawmaking powers to support purchasing objectives, its purchasing methods and tactics, and the prices it paid. One of the important themes of this chapter is the extent to which the Crown had come to disregard what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought during their 1883–85 negotiations on the opening of the district. Through the period covered by this chapter, the Crown sought to pressure the district's leaders to sell land and otherwise paid little regard to their views. Another theme is the preference given to settler interests over those of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. This theme is also reflected in our consideration of the Crown's handling of a disputed 1880s arrangement over the use of land and resources in the Mokau Mohakatino block by settler Joshua Jones. As we will see in section 11.6, the Crown legislated twice during the 1880s to support Jones's rights over those of Mōkau Māori. Ultimately, the Crown purchased the land that was the subject of the disputed agreement.

This chapter relies on three main sources of evidence: Leanne Boulton's research report 'Land Alienation in the Rohe Potae Inquiry District, 1866–1908: An Overview'; Tutahanga Douglas, Craig Innes, and James Mitchell's 'Alienation of Māori land within Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district 1840–2010: A quantitative study'; and Brent Parker's evidence on Crown purchase prices, valuations, and

---

2. Document A21 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell), p131, table B5. See section 11.5.1 for further detail about how this figure has been calculated. The inquiry district totals 1,931,136 acres (excluding extension areas). All of the Crown's purchases during the period 1890–1905 occurred within the original inquiry district. Wherever we mention land sales as a proportion of the inquiry district, we are referring to the original inquiry district. In all, the Crown's purchases amounted to 33.13 per cent of the original inquiry district during this period: submission 3.4.309(a), p 2; submission 3.4.130(g), pp 2–3; doc A21, pp 7, 34. Also see doc A67, pp 11, 28; doc A95 (Parker), p 4.

sales.<sup>3</sup> The chapter also relies on a number of other relevant research reports,<sup>4</sup> as well as claimant evidence, Waitangi Tribunal reports, and scholarly research.

11.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

Land is central to the Treaty relationship. One of the essential features of the Treaty is the mutual recognition of powers: iwi and hapū retained tino rangatiratanga in respect of land and other resources, and the Crown acquired kāwanatanga along with a corresponding obligation to use its governing powers to actively protect Māori land interests.

Land was also integral to Te Ōhākī Tapu. As discussed in chapter 8, in return for recognising the Crown's kāwanatanga, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought laws that would protect their lands and recognise their rights to tino rangatiratanga and mana whakahaere in respect of land – in particular title determination and land administration and alienation. The district's leaders reasoned that appealing to the Crown for just laws would allow them to open their district to settlement under their own mana without risking the large-scale loss of land and associated breakdown of communal authority that had afflicted Māori in other districts. Preceding chapters have discussed how the Crown largely failed to meet those demands, instead encouraging Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into court while enacting legislation to support its settlement and public works goals.

Claimants saw the Crown's purchasing programme as a further betrayal of Te Ōhākī Tapu, and in particular of the Crown's assurances 'that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would retain control of their lands and would benefit greatly from their increased value if they permitted the [railway] to proceed'.<sup>5</sup> They also saw the purchasing programme and supporting legislation as fundamentally at odds with the requirements of the Treaty. Instead of using its lawmaking powers to protect tino rangatiratanga over land, claimants said, the Crown used its powers to coerce sales, control prices, and assert practical sovereignty over the district. The purchasing programme destroyed communities and undermined attempts to develop land.<sup>6</sup>

3. Document A67 (Boulton); doc A21 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell); doc A95 (Parker).

4. These include those by Berghan, 'Block Research Narratives' (doc A60); Cleaver and Sarich, 'Turongo: The North Island Main Trunk Railway and the Rohe Potae, 1870–2008' (doc A20); Hearn, 'Māori Economic Development in Te Rohe Pōtae Inquiry District c1885 to c2006' (doc A146); Francis, 'The Rohe Potae Commercial Economy in the Mid-Nineteenth Century, c1830–1886' (doc A26); Husbands and Mitchell, 'The Native Land Court, Land Titles and Crown Land Purchasing in the Rohe Potae District, 1866–1907' (doc A79); Loveridge, 'The Crown and the Opening of the King Country 1882–1885' (doc A41), "In Accordance with the Will of Parliament": The Crown, the Four Tribes and the Aotea Block, 1885–1899' (doc A68), 'Comments on Part 2 of the Marr Report on "Te Rohe Potae Political Engagement 1864 – 1886 (Wai 898#A78)"' (doc A90), and "The Bane of the Native Race": The Problem of Unused Maori Lands in King Country during the First Decade of the 20th Century' (doc A93); Marr, 'The Alienation of Maori Land in the Rohe Potae (Aotea Block), 1840–1920' (doc A55); Robinson and Christoffel, 'Aspects of Rohe Potae Political Engagement, 1886 to 1913' (doc A71); and Thomas, 'The Crown and Maori in Mokau 1840–1911' (doc A28).

5. Submission 3.4.119, p 49.

6. Submission 3.4.119, p 3.

Claimants argued that Te Rohe Pōtae was unique in the history of the Treaty relationship, in that the Crown granted itself exclusive purchasing rights against the express wishes of the district's leaders and in spite of promises to the contrary. Also unique to this district was 'the unusually rapid pace of land alienation', in which one-third of the district was sold within little more than a decade.<sup>7</sup>

11.1.2 How the chapter is structured

After considering the findings of previous Tribunals, and claimant and Crown arguments, this chapter addresses three substantive issues. First, in why did the Crown restrict the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during 1890–1905? Secondly, how did the Crown buy Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land during this period? And thirdly, did the Crown pay fair prices for the land it purchased? The chapter then considers the Crown's handling of the Joshua Jones lease. It concludes with an analysis of the prejudice Te Rohe Pōtae Māori are alleged to have suffered as a result of the land purchasing programme, followed by a summary of findings and recommendations.

11.2 ISSUES

This section establishes the issues for us to determine concerning the Crown's acquisition of Māori land in the inquiry district between 1890 and 1905. It examines the relevant findings of previous Tribunals, the Crown's concessions on these matters, and claimant and Crown arguments on land purchasing, and on the Jones lease.

11.2.1 What previous Tribunals have said

The Treaty of Waitangi offers powerful guarantees of Māori communities' land rights. It required the Crown to actively protect Māori possession of, authority over, and exercise of traditional relationships with land.<sup>8</sup> Among other things, this meant it could not take steps to interfere with Māori land rights or to separate communities from their land except with their full, free, informed consent.<sup>9</sup>

---

7. Submission 3.4.119, p 3.

8. The Crown acknowledged this obligation: submission 3.4.11, pp 2–3. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Manukau Claim (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1989), pp 65–70; Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Orakei Claim (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1987), p 147; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 4.

9. For example, see Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 147–148; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report 1991, 3 vols (Wellington: Brooker and Friend Ltd, 1991), vol 1, p [233]; Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1996), pp 20–21; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana: Report on the Tauranga Confiscation Claims (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), p 19; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, pp 173, 190–191, 200, vol 2, p 423, vol 4, pp 1238, 1241; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006: Report on the Post-Raupatu Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, pp 18, 20, vol 2, p 601.

The Crown was also obliged to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith, which included keeping its promises and honouring any conditions Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and communities imposed as part of their consent for the railway or for the opening of their district to settlement.<sup>10</sup>

With respect to legislation affecting Māori land, many Tribunal inquiries have found that the Crown's right of kāwanatanga is fettered by the article 2 guarantee of the tino rangatiratanga of iwi and hapū,<sup>11</sup> and that the Crown, in exercising its rights to govern and make law, can override tino rangatiratanga 'only in exceptional circumstances and as a last resort in the national interest.'<sup>12</sup> The Turanga Township inquiry found that it was not enough for the Crown to claim that a proposal was 'in the public interest or . . . justified for reasons of convenience or economy.'<sup>13</sup> More specifically, some inquiries have found that the consent of affected Māori landowners was required before the Crown reimposed the 'pre-emptive' right enshrined in article 2 of the English text of the Treaty.<sup>14</sup>

Tribunal reports have also described eight conditions that must be met for Crown purchases of Māori land to be Treaty compliant: (i) the rightful owners must be identified, and their relative interests known; (ii) all disputes over mana or ownership must be resolved before the Crown enters negotiations; (iii) the whole community must be involved in the decision, not just individuals; (iv) the area of land must be clearly defined; (v) the nature of the transaction must be clearly explained and understood; (vi) the price must be fair; (vii) the transaction must not cause harm to the community of owners, for example by leaving them without sufficient land for their present and future needs; (viii) the owners must give

---

10. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 173–174, 190–191, 208–209, 436; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2018), vol 1, p 134; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, A Report into Claims concerning New Zealand Law and Policy Affecting Māori Culture and Identity, Te Taumata Tuatahi (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2011), p 24; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti / The Declaration and the Treaty: The Report of Stage 1 of the Te Paparahi o Te Raki Inquiry (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2014), pp 526–527.

11. For example, see Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 147–149; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report, vol 1, p [233]; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Sea Fisheries Report, p 269; Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 20–21; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 19; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 173, 190–191, 200, vol 2, p 423, vol 4, pp 1238, 1241; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006, vol 1, pp 18, 20, vol 2, p 601.

12. The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report first applied this test to the taking of land for public works without the consent of affected Māori owners. The Turangi Township and Hauraki reports later extended the test to cover other circumstances in which the Crown used its lawmaking or governing powers in a manner that interfered with tino rangatiratanga: Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Ancillary Claims Report 1995 (Wellington: Brooker's Ltd, 1995), p 11; Waitangi Tribunal, The Turangi Township Report 1995 (Wellington: Brooker's Ltd, 1995), pp 285–286; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 2, p 671.

13. Waitangi Tribunal, The Turangi Township Report, p 285.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 578, 580. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, pp 64–65.

their free and informed consent.<sup>15</sup> In Te Urewera and other reports, the Tribunal has found the Crown in breach of the Treaty principle of active protection when it bypassed community leaders to purchase from individuals.<sup>16</sup> Tribunals have also found that the Crown's obligation to protect Māori interests was heightened whenever it granted itself exclusive purchasing rights.<sup>17</sup>

11.2.2 Crown concessions

The Crown made concessions in respect of the laws that supported its land purchasing programme, and the purchasing programme itself.

In respect of the laws, the Crown acknowledged that in 1885 it had led Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to believe that (in return for their consent to the railway) it would provide a mechanism for a measure of self-government with respect to land, establish a new system for Māori land administration under which owner committees would control alienation, and provide for any sales or leases of Māori land to occur in a free market.<sup>18</sup> The Crown conceded 'that it failed to consult or re-engage with Rohe Pōtae Māori when it departed from representations', and therefore breached the Treaty and its principles 'by not acting in good faith and by failing to respect their rangatiratanga'.<sup>19</sup>

With respect to land purchasing, the Crown made the following concession:

The Crown concedes that when it purchased approximately 700,000 acres of land in Te Rohe Pōtae during the 1890s it misused its monopoly by:

Often paying prices which Māori and other observers considered unreasonably low;

Preventing Rohe Pōtae Māori, who had expended large sums of money having their lands surveyed and subdivided, from paying these costs by the leasing of their lands; and Using aggressive purchasing tactics, including threats to compulsorily acquire land, in order to pressure Rohe Pōtae Māori to sell their land to the Crown.

Through these cumulative acts and omissions the Crown breached its duties to act in good faith and actively protect the interests of Rohe Pōtae Māori in lands they wished to retain, and breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.<sup>20</sup>

---

15. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, p 104; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 617, 625. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 206; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report, p [831]; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua: Report on the Turanganui-a-Kiwa Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 2, p 456.

16. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp 1185–1186; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 784–785; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 617.

17. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993 (Wellington: Brooker's Ltd, 1993), pp 240–242; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 2, pp 386–388, 418. Also see submission 3.4.119, pp 2–3.

18. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

19. Submission 3.4.307, p 25.

20. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26; also see pp 1–2.

The Crown also conceded that it used its exclusive purchasing powers in a manner that left some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori ‘with little option but to sell their land or shares in land even when they, and other observers, considered that the prices offered represented less than the market value’. In this, the Crown conceded that its conduct of land purchase negotiations ‘did not always meet the high standards of good faith and fair dealing required of the Crown as a privileged purchaser of Māori land.’<sup>21</sup>

With respect to the Joshua Jones lease (section 11.6), the Crown acknowledged that it had not consulted Mokau Mohakatino block landowners before enacting the Mokau Mohakatino Act 1888, which validated the lease against owners’ wishes. The Crown therefore conceded that it had ‘failed to accord the Māori owners of Mokau-Mohakatino equality of treatment, and failed to respect their rangatira-tanga over their land, and this constituted a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>22</sup>

The Crown also acknowledged that the Act gave ‘an extraordinary degree of support for the claims of a settler against the rights of Māori landowners.’<sup>23</sup> The Crown conceded that its failure to protect owners’ interests had contributed to the sale of the land and breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.<sup>24</sup>

11.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

Over 70 claims in this inquiry contain grievances related to Crown purchasing in the years 1890 to 1905.<sup>25</sup> Claimants saw the Crown’s purchasing programme as being fundamentally at odds with its Treaty obligations, and with the commitments and obligations enshrined in Te Ōhāki Tapu. According to Tom Bennion, who represented many of the claimant groups on this issue:

---

21. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1–2.

22. Document 3.4.296, p 34.

23. Document 3.4.296, p 40.

24. Document 3.4.296, p 40.

25. Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 457 (submission 3.4.238); Wai 784 (submission 3.4.147); Wai 847, Wai 993, Wai 1015, Wai 1095, Wai 1115, Wai 1586, Wai 1608, Wai 1612, Wai 1965, Wai 2335 (submission 3.4.140); Wai 972 (submission 3.4.134); Wai 1469, Wai 2291 (submission 3.4.288); Wai 1482 (submission 3.4.154); Wai 1593 (submission 3.4.230); Wai 1599 (submission 3.4.153); Wai 1944 (submission 3.4.233); Wai 2014 (submission 3.4.208); Wai 2313 (claim 1.1.259); Wai 2314 (claim 1.1.260); Wai 556, Wai 616, Wai 1377, Wai 1820 (submission 3.4.279); Wai 586, Wai 753, Wai 1396, Wai 1585, Wai 2020, Wai 2090 (submission 3.4.204); Wai 1361 (claim 1.2.95); Wai 1386 (submission 3.4.93); Wai 1500 (submission 3.4.160); Wai 1806 (claim 1.1.177); Wai 1824 (submission 3.4.181); Wai 729 (submission 3.4.240); Wai 762 (submission 3.4.170); Wai 1309 (submission 3.4.220); Wai 1640 (submission 3.4.191); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 845 (submission 3.4.166); Wai 987 (submission 3.4.167); Wai 1147, Wai 1203 (submission 3.4.151); Wai 1230 (submission 3.4.168); Wai 1299 (submission 3.4.234); Wai 1447 (submission 3.4.187); Wai 1962 (submission 3.4.172); Wai 870 (submission 3.4.202); Wai 1112, Wai 1113, Wai 1439, Wai 2353 (submission 3.4.226); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai, 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1499 (submission 3.4.171); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.237).

Throughout the 1880s Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consistently attempted to protect the district from the rampant alienation and loss of governance and control they had seen elsewhere. A key provision of Te Ōhākī Tapu was an express assurance that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would retain control of their lands and would benefit greatly from their increased value if they permitted the [North Island Main Trunk Railway] to proceed.<sup>26</sup>

Instead, claimants submitted, the Crown pursued a programme that deliberately undermined the authority, autonomy, and property rights of Māori communities, with the express goal of acquiring as much land as possible at the lowest possible cost. The Crown pursued this course, claimants submitted, in order to fund infrastructure from profits on land sales, and more generally to control settlement and establish ‘practical sovereignty’ over the district.<sup>27</sup>

In addition to these general points, the claimants raised three principal issues, which are discussed below, along with claimant and Crown arguments about the Jones lease.

11.2.3.1 *The Crown’s use of its legislative powers to support its land-buying programme

Claimants submitted that the Crown misused its legislative powers to support its land purchasing goals, at the expense of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities. They submitted that the Crown, in breach of its promises and obligations under Te Ōhākī Tapu, and in spite of consistent protests from Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and landowners, granted itself exclusive rights to deal in the district’s land, thereby excluding private competitors and denying incomes and economic sovereignty to Māori landowners.<sup>28</sup> The Crown imposed these restrictions ‘to prevent other uses of the land, to keep prices low, and to coerce sales.’<sup>29</sup> Claimants told us that the Crown’s actions were coercive, were destructive for those who sought to retain land, and were ‘characterised by broken promises and missed opportunities for the Crown to act honourably and in good faith.’<sup>30</sup> Those actions reflected the Crown’s goal, which, they submitted, was to establish ‘practical sovereignty . . . through the process of land acquisition.’<sup>31</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that it broke its promise that Te Rohe Pōtae would be able to sell or lease land in a competitive market, and conceded that it breached the Treaty by failing to consult Te Rohe Pōtae communities before breaking this promise.<sup>32</sup> It also conceded that on occasions it had breached the Treaty by using

---

26. Submission 3.4.119, p 49.

27. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 51–52; claim 1.5.4, p 7; claim 1.2.102, pp 36, 42; submission 3.4.204, p 35; submission 3.4.170(a), pp 119, 120, 124; submission 3.4.151, pp 36–38; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21; submission 3.4.199, pp 41–42.

28. Claim 1.5.4, pp 6–8; submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 6, 11, 14–15, 53; submission 3.4.170(a), p 118; submission 3.4.251, pp 16, 18–20; submission 3.4.174, pp 11–12; submission 3.4.250, p 7.

29. Submission 3.4.119, p 50.

30. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4.

31. Submission 3.4.119, p 52.

32. Submission 3.4.293, p 3; submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

aggressive negotiating tactics to persuade Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to make land available for settlement.<sup>33</sup> But it did not regard restrictions on the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as being in themselves in breach of the Treaty.<sup>34</sup> It acknowledged that the restrictions that applied from 1887 through to 1910 were put in place to support a land purchasing programme. The ‘core rationale’ for the policy was to exclude private speculators, so it could meet its goal of funding the railway and other infrastructure by buying, developing, and onselling the district’s lands.<sup>35</sup> But the Crown submitted that it had a ‘legitimate role’ in controlling land speculation, and more generally in ‘controlling and regulating settlement for the benefit of the colony as a whole’.<sup>36</sup>

The Crown and claimants agree on the core facts, but disagree to some extent on the Crown’s motivations, and to a greater degree on the Crown’s right under the Treaty to restrict Māori property rights without consent in order to pursue broader policy goals. We will consider these issues in section 11.3.

11.2.3.2 The Crown’s land purchasing methods

Claimants submitted that the Crown, having restricted the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners, then exploited the lack of competition to coerce Māori landowners into selling land. Claimants submitted that the Crown also used a range of methods to coerce sales. These included taking advantage of poverty and indebtedness; purchasing from individual shareholders without the knowledge or consent of the wider community; using aggressive tactics including threats of compulsory acquisition if landowners refused to sell; purchasing before title or surveys were completed, in breach of earlier promises; and purchasing from minors.<sup>37</sup> Though sales were ‘technically voluntary’,<sup>38</sup> claimants submitted that they were really forced because the Crown’s actions left Māori landowners with no way of developing their lands and no means of clearing court-imposed debts other than sales to the Crown.<sup>39</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that it used its privileged market position in a manner that left some landowners with little option but to sell their land or shares in land. It also conceded that it used aggressive tactics (including threats to acquire land by compulsion) to pressure Māori to sell. In both respects, it conceded that its

---

33. Submission 3.4.307, p 1.

34. Submission 3.4.307, p 21.

35. Submission 3.4.307, pp 8, 16–17, 28, 31.

36. Submission 3.4.307, p 21.

37. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 21, 25, 27–28, 30–33, 36–37, 38, 53; claim 1.5.4, pp 7, 9–15, 23; submission 3.4.174, p 11; submission 3.4.226, pp 37, 39–40, 41, 44; submission 3.4.154(a), pp 34–35; submission 3.4.181, p 32; submission 3.4.204, pp 34, 37; submission 3.4.147, pp 16, 58; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21, 27–28; submission 3.4.175, p 41; submission 3.4.167, pp 30–31; submission 3.4.151, pp 5, 34–39; submission 3.4.199, pp 46–47; submission 3.4.171, pp 4, 16; submission 3.4.160, p 38; submission 3.4.181, p 32; claim 1.1.272(c), pp 13–15; claim 1.2.102, pp 35–41.

38. Claim 1.5.4, p 38.

39. Claim 1.5.4, pp 23, 38; submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 27–28, 53–54; submission 3.4.250, p 17; submission 3.4.295, p 11; submission 3.4.220, pp 20–21; submission 3.4.171, pp 13–15; submission 3.4.169, para 40; submission 3.4.174, pp 12–15.

actions fell short of the standards of good faith, fair dealing, and active protection required of it in performing its duties under the Treaty.<sup>40</sup> In addition, previous chapters have discussed the Crown's concessions that it breached the Treaty by requiring landowners to give up unreasonably large amounts of land to pay for survey costs,<sup>41</sup> and by failing to provide for a form of title that enabled communities to manage land collectively.<sup>42</sup> The Crown has therefore conceded that several of its key purchasing methods were in breach of Treaty principles.

However, the Crown did not accept the claimant view that its entire purchasing programme was coercive. It submitted that Māori landowners sold for a range of reasons, including to clear debts, and to raise funds for land development. It also submitted that others were able to retain their lands or hold out for higher prices.<sup>43</sup> The Crown also submitted that there was no direct evidence of Crown purchasing before title had been determined.<sup>44</sup> It submitted that purchases from minors were not in themselves evidence of sharp practices or bad faith.<sup>45</sup> And it submitted that the number and area of reserves meant it had assessed whether Māori were retaining sufficient lands, as required under the Native Land Court Act 1894.<sup>46</sup>

We will consider land purchasing methods, and the purchasing programme as a whole, in section 11.4.

11.2.3.3 The Crown's purchasing prices

Claimants submitted that the Crown denied Māori landowners opportunities to determine the value of their lands on an open market, and that the Crown misused its privileged market position to acquire land at below-market prices.<sup>47</sup> Claimants submitted that the Crown's methods for determining prices were unfair and that market prices were on average 5.7 times higher than the Crown paid.<sup>48</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that it had 'misused its monopoly' by '[o]ften paying prices which Māori and other observers considered unreasonably low', and that some landowners had been left with little option but to accept those prices. The Crown therefore conceded it had breached the Treaty and its principles.<sup>49</sup>

While this concession is welcome, we note that the Crown did not explicitly acknowledge that the prices it paid were below market; nor did it concede that its method for determining prices was unfair.<sup>50</sup> On the contrary, the Crown submit-

---

40. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

41. Submission 3.4.11, p 4; submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26, 37.

42. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

43. Submission 3.4.307, pp 35–36.

44. Submission 3.4.307, pp 37–38.

45. Submission 3.4.307, p 9.

46. Submission 3.4.307, p 39.

47. Submission 3.4.119, pp 6–7, 37–45, 53–54; claim 1.5.4, pp 23–24, 27–33; submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 51–52; submission 3.4.204, p 35; submission 3.4.170(a), pp 119, 120, 124; submission 3.4.151, pp 36–38; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21; submission 3.4.199, pp 41–42; submission 3.4.107, pp 16, 59–60; submission 3.4.135(c), p 32.

48. Submission 3.4.119, pp 53–54; also see pp 39–45.

49. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

50. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 11–12.

ted that in its 1890–1905 land purchases it had operated in a fiscally responsible manner, and that the Government at the time had believed it was fair for Māori to contribute to the costs of development.<sup>51</sup> It therefore remains to be determined whether the prices were in fact below market rate, and if so by what magnitude. We will consider those issues in section 11.5.

11.2.3.4 Claimant and Crown arguments about the Jones lease

Several claims in the this inquiry contained grievances in relation to the Joshua Jones lease.<sup>52</sup> The claimants did not think the Crown's concessions over the Jones lease went far enough. They argued that the Crown had also breached the Treaty by legislating in 1885 to allow Jones to complete negotiations for his lease and failing to ensure that the lands that were subject to the transaction were properly identified. They argued that a commission of inquiry established to consider claims made by Jones against the Government had refused to consider evidence that supported the Māori understanding of their arrangement with Jones. And they argued that the Crown's failings reflected its determination to break down the aukati at all costs.<sup>53</sup>

The Crown did not specifically answer the claim that the 1885 legislation had breached the Treaty.<sup>54</sup> Crown counsel did disagree with the claimants' view that its handling of the Jones lease had been motivated by a 'relentless pursuit of breaking the aukati.'<sup>55</sup> 'Rather', counsel submitted, 'there were cautious overtures on both sides towards rebuilding relationships.'<sup>56</sup>

11.2.4 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry<sup>57</sup> and briefly summarised the parties' arguments, three substantive issues remain for us to determine with respect to the Crown's purchasing programme:

- Why did the Crown restrict the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during this period? More specifically, were the laws granting the Crown exclusive purchasing rights a Treaty-compliant use of the Crown's lawmaking powers?
- How did the Crown buy Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land? More specifically, was the entire purchasing programme coercive?
- Did the Crown pay fair prices for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land?

With respect to the Jones lease, we will address a number of issues, as further set out at section 11.6.

---

51. Submission 3.4.11, pp 15–16; submission 3.4.307, pp 41–42.

52. Wai 535 (submission 3.4.243); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submission 3.4.246).

53. Submission 3.4.122, p 4; submission 3.4.366, p 5.

54. Submission 3.4.296, pp 14–21.

55. Document 3.4.296, p 4.

56. Document 3.4.296, p 4.

57. Statement 1.4.3.

11.3 WHY DID THE CROWN RESTRICT THE PROPERTY RIGHTS OF TE ROHE PŌTAE MĀORI?

11.3.1 Introduction

Between 1888 and 1894, the Crown enacted a series of laws restricting the property rights of Māori landowners, either within specific areas surrounding the railway route or in New Zealand as a whole. Local restrictions applied between 30 August 1888 and 1 January 1894. At that point, nationwide restrictions came into force, and remained in place until 1910. The specific provisions are explained in table 11.1. In all, five separate statutes were enacted between 1888 and 1894, each applying to different territories (as shown in map 11.1) but covering most of the land in this district. These were: the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888; the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889; the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892; the Native Land Purchases Act 1892; and the Native Land Court Act 1894. At times, two sets of restrictions were in force at once.<sup>58</sup>

The effect of these laws was that Māori living within the restriction zones could not sell or lease their lands privately, or raise mortgages, or undertake any other private dealings. They could, however, sell or lease to the Crown. This gave the Crown a highly privileged market position. As it pursued its goal of buying land along the railway route and in surrounding territories, it faced no competition from other buyers or lessees. The only obstacle to its purchasing goals was resistance from landowners, who had very limited options for raising money from their lands by means other than sales to the Crown. Between 1890 and 1905, the Crown made use of its exclusive purchasing right to acquire just under 640,000 acres of Māori land in this district.<sup>59</sup>

In Treaty terms, the broad question claimants have asked us to consider is whether these laws were legitimate uses of the Crown's power of kāwanatanga and, in particular, its lawmaking power. As discussed in section 11.2, the claimants saw the Acts that granted the Crown exclusive purchasing rights, and the purchasing that occurred under them, as fundamental betrayals of Te Ōhākī Tapu. In their view, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders agreed to open their territory on the condition that they would retain control of their lands, allowing them to determine the pace and nature of any settlement and to benefit from it.<sup>60</sup> Claimants said the Crown imposed statutory restrictions on their rights to sell and lease land privately in breach of promises that Māori would be able to sell or lease on an open market as they wished. Claimants saw the statutory restrictions as being intended

---

58. In addition, as discussed in chapter 8, between November 1884 and December 1886, restrictions were applied to a 4.5 million acre zone covering almost all of the inquiry district (with the exception of the area north of and including the Wharaurua block), and significant parts of Whanganui and Taupō areas: Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, ss3–4, sch; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park Inquiry District Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 2, p385; doc A67, pp64–65.

59. Document A21, p131, table B5. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, Crown purchases totalled 639,815 acres during the calendar years 1890–1905.

60. Submission 3.4.119, p49.

to coerce sales at below-market prices, and as an attack on the sovereignty of Te Rohe Pōtae communities. They submitted that the restrictions were in breach of the Treaty principles of autonomy, partnership, active protection, equity, and equal treatment.<sup>61</sup>

The Crown did not claim that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consented to these laws, nor to the land purchasing programme they served. Nor has it denied that it broke its promises. Nor, furthermore, did it claim that its intention during this period was to protect Māori land interests.<sup>62</sup> Rather, it acknowledged that its purpose was to acquire land for settlement along the railway route and to fund the railway and other infrastructure by developing and onselling that land at a profit.<sup>63</sup> It sought to achieve that purpose ‘by directly intervening in the market for land and imposing regulatory controls’ that would ‘exclude speculative behaviour that might be destructive to . . . development.’<sup>64</sup>

In the Crown’s view, imposing these laws was not in itself a breach of the Treaty. It presented the laws as a reimposition of the previously abandoned pre-emptive right contained in article 2 of the Treaty’s English text,<sup>65</sup> and argued that it ‘had a legitimate role to play in minimising the risk to Māori and the colony that land speculators posed and in controlling and regulating settlement for the benefit of the colony as a whole.’<sup>66</sup> More generally, the Crown submitted that Crown purchasing of Māori land for settlement was ‘inherent in the Treaty relationship.’<sup>67</sup> The Crown did not address the findings of previous Tribunals (section 11.2.1) that it could not reimpose pre-emption without consent.

Notwithstanding the Crown’s view that the statutory restrictions on Māori landowners’ rights to engage in private land dealings were not in breach of the Treaty, the Crown did concede that it had breached the Treaty by preventing Māori landowners from paying survey costs by leasing their land.<sup>68</sup> We will consider each Act of Parliament in turn.

11.3.2 The 1888–91 restrictions

11.3.2.1 The Stout–Vogel Government’s land-buying policy up to September 1887

During their 1883–85 negotiations with the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought to preserve Māori communal control over Māori lands. They had asked

61. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 6, 11, 14–15, 52–53; claim 1.5.4, pp 6–8; submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 6, 11, 14–15, 53; submission 3.4.170(a), p 118; submission 3.4.251, pp 16, 18–20; submission 3.4.174, pp 11–12; submission 3.4.250, p 7.

62. The exception is mentioned briefly in submission 3.4.307, pp 7–8. The Crown submitted that the 1888–91 restrictions imposed by the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 were partly motivated by a request from Māori landowners for protection against harassment while their lands were before the court, though it acknowledged that its main objective in imposing the restrictions had been to protect its purchasing position.

63. Submission 3.4.307, pp 22–23, 27–28. Also see pp 13–20, 33–34.

64. Submission 3.4.307, p 28.

65. Submission 3.4.307, pp 2–4, 21–22, 32–33.

66. Submission 3.4.307, p 21; submission 3.4.11, pp 2–3.

67. Submission 3.4.11, p 2.

68. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26.

Laws granting the Crown exclusive or privileged purchasing rights in Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district 1888 to 1910

1888–1891 RESTRICTION AREA

Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888

Dates of application: 30 August 1888–29 August 1891

On 30 August 1888, the Crown re-established free trade in Māori land throughout New Zealand. However, the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 made an exception for ‘Rohe-Potae’ – that is, the 1886 Rohe Potae block, which the court had awarded to the five tribes in 1886 and was, in 1888, in the process of subdividing. The Act prohibited all private dealings in Māori land within ‘Rohe–Potae’ for the period from 30 August 1888 to 30 August 1891, granting the Crown an exclusive right to purchase, lease, or negotiate to occupy land within that block.<sup>1</sup>

1890–1892 NORTHERN TARGET AREA

North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889

Dates of application: 1 January 1890–11 October 1892

This Act prohibited all private dealings in Māori land within two land purchasing target areas, one covering the northern part of the inquiry district and the other to the south of Lake Taupō. The provision meant that the Crown had an exclusive right to enter arrangements for the ‘purchase, conveyance, transfer, lease, exchange, or occupation’ of any Māori land within these areas. The prohibition on private land alienation was originally to apply from 1 January 1890 to 1 January 1892. However, subsequent Acts extended the ban and, from 11 October 1892, enlarged the restriction area (as explained below).<sup>2</sup>

---

1. Native Land Act 1888, ss 3–5; Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, ss 3, 15; Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act 1881 Amendment Act 1888, ss 5, 7. Though the restrictions expired on 29 August 1891, the Native Land Court Amendment Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 continued in force until 23 October 1894, when it was repealed by the Native Land Court Act 1894. Also see doc A68, pp 90–93; doc A67, pp 79–80; doc A146, p 60; submission 3.4.307, pp 7–8, submission 3.4.119, p 9.

2. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, s 5, sch 2; Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act 1881, s 5; Native Land Frauds Prevention Act 1881 Amendment Act 1888, s 5; North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1891, s 2; North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892, s 3. Also see doc A67, pp 140–141; doc A68, pp 93–94; submission 3.4.307, pp 9, 27.

1892–1893 RESTRICTION AREA*North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892Dates of application: 11 October 1892–1 January 1894*

This Act greatly expanded the restriction zone created by the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1889, making it almost as large as the original 1884 restriction zone. The Act also provided that the restrictions would remain in place until 1 January 1894.<sup>3</sup>

1893–1894 RESTRICTIONS ON SPECIFIED LAND BLOCKS*Native Land Purchases Act 18928 October 1892–31 March 1910*

This Act allowed the Crown to prohibit private dealings in any block of Māori land in New Zealand that it was negotiating to purchase. In those blocks, no one but the Crown could ‘purchase or acquire . . . any right, title, share or interest’ in that land. During 1893 and 1894, the Crown proclaimed substantial areas of Te Rohe Pōtae subject to this provision, thereby preventing private dealings.<sup>4</sup>

1894–1910 NATIONWIDE RESTRICTIONS*Native Land Court Act 189423 October 1894–31 March 1910*

This Act prohibited all private purchases of Māori land throughout New Zealand, except in limited circumstances. It also prohibited private leases in the North Island, while allowing them in the South Island.<sup>5</sup>

The Native Land Court Act 1894 was amended in 1895 to allow private purchasing or leasing of blocks up to 500 acres, but this provision did not apply to the area covered by the 1884–1886 restrictions. In 1896, the law was further amended to allow private purchasing or leasing of blocks up to 640 acres of first class land or 2,000 acres of second class land. Again, the 1884–1886 restriction area was excluded.<sup>6</sup>

---

3. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892, ss 2, 3, sch; North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, s 5.

4. Native Land Purchase Act 1892, s 16. Also see doc A79, pp 231–232, 423, 478, 488; doc A67, pp 149–150; doc A68, p 197 n; submission 3.4.307, pp 15–16, 24, 29; submission 3.4.119, pp 7, 35; Native Land Act 1909, s 431, sch.

5. Native Land Court Act 1894, ss 117–120. Also see doc A67, pp 153–154; submission 3.4.307, pp 9, 17; Native Land Act 1909, s 431, sch.

6. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, ss 3–4; Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896, s 27.

From 24 October 1899 to 31 October 1900, the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1899 prohibited all sales of Māori land to the Crown, but allowed the Crown to complete purchases it had already begun.<sup>7</sup> The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1899 was repealed on 20 October 1900 by the Maori Lands Administration Act 1900, which prohibited new Crown and private purchases while allowing the Crown to complete purchases that were already under way.<sup>8</sup> For purchases that were already under negotiation, the Crown's exclusive right to purchase Māori land remained in force until 31 March 1910, when the Native Land Court Act 1894 was repealed.

7. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1899, ss 3, 5. Also see submission 3.4.307, pp 9–10, 18 n, 28; doc A67, p166; doc A55, p127.

8. Maori Lands Administration Act 1900, ss 22, 34. Also see doc A73, pp 59–60; submission 3.4.307, pp 9–10, 19, 24, 28; Native Land Act 1909, ss 1, 431, sch.

that the Native Land Court be kept out of the district, that Māori be empowered to determine land titles among themselves, and that Māori communities retain control decisions about land management and alienation. As discussed in chapter 8, the Crown failed to empower Māori to determine land titles or to manage communal lands as they wished. With respect to land administration, the Native Land Administration Act 1886 fell well short of what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had sought, providing for a very limited form of communal decision-making about land sales and leases, and placing the sale and leasing process in the hands of a Crown-appointed commissioner. Māori who did not place their lands under the Act were effectively prevented from dealing in their land by any means other than sale or lease to the Crown.<sup>69</sup>

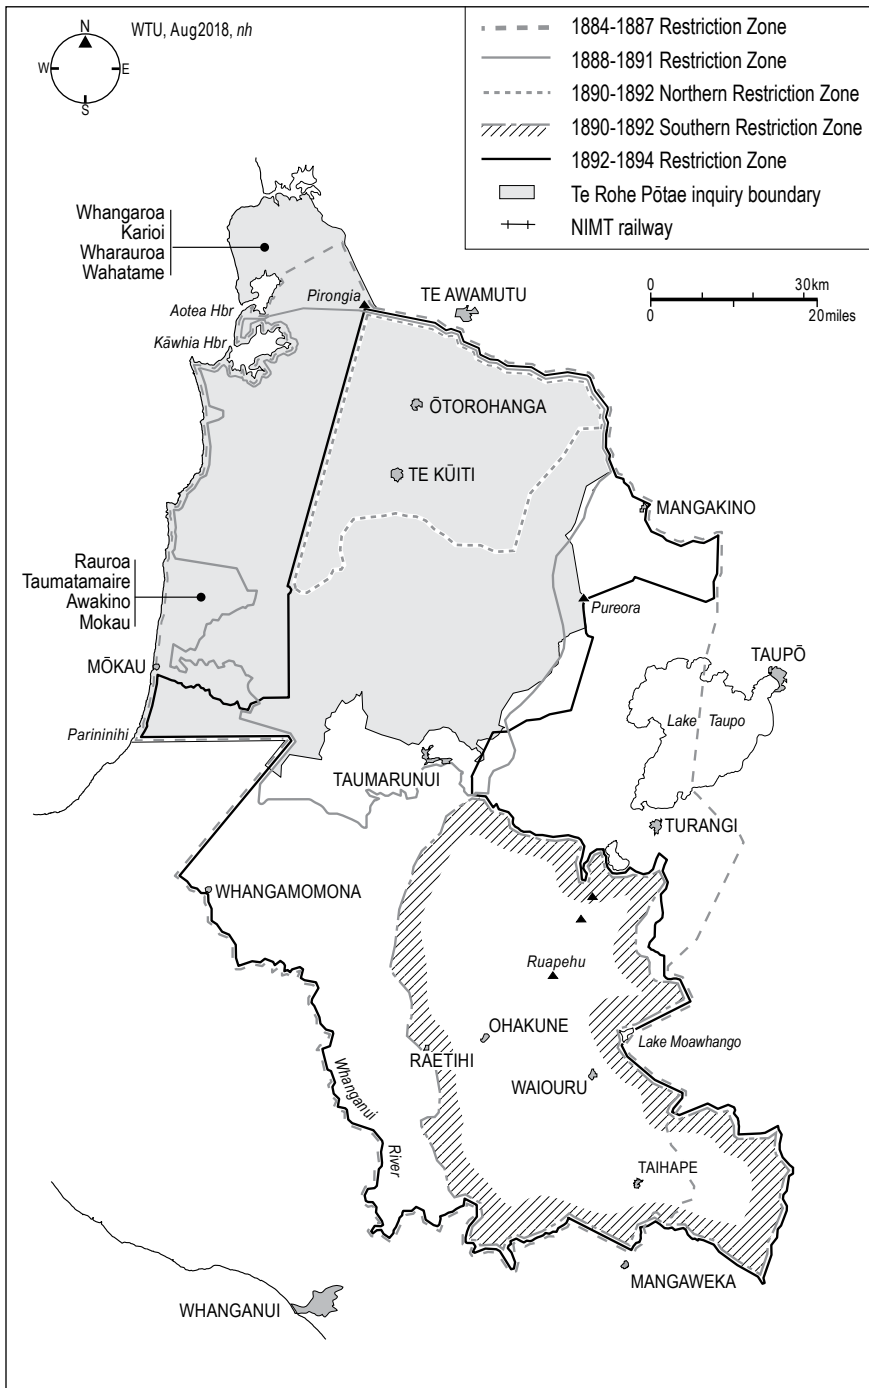

In spite of Ballance's high hopes,<sup>70</sup> Māori throughout the North Island refused to make their land available for sale or lease under the Act.<sup>71</sup> Previous Tribunals have given two possible reasons for this. One was that Māori communities simply did not want to sell their land.<sup>72</sup> The other was that they were unwilling to trust a 69. Native Land Administration Act 1886, ss 4–5, 16–20, 32–33; doc A67, p75; doc A41, pp 197–202; doc A68 (Loveridge), pp 42–43, 181; doc A20 (Cleaver and Sarich), p90; submission 3.4.119, p 8; submission 3.4.307, pp 4, 7. Also see 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws', AJHR, 1891, G–1, pp xvi–xvii.

70. 'Native Land Administration Bill', 8 June 1886, NZPD, vol 54, pp 327–329; doc A41, pp 198–199.

71. Document A67, pp 77–79; doc A68, pp 85, 90; submission 3.4.307, pp 4–6. The Act was in effect from 1 January 1887 to 30 August 1888.

72. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 786–787.

Map 11.1: Restriction zones affecting land in the inquiry district, 1884-1910 system that placed authority in the hands of a Crown-appointed commissioner, with few safeguards for landowners.<sup>73</sup>

In this district, individual block titles had not yet been determined, so land could not be placed under the Act. Even if it could have been, Wahanui was implacably opposed to any Māori land being placed under the Act, which he and other Māori leaders regarded as ‘working solely for the benefit of the Government against the interests & very independence of the Maori race’, and as ‘professing to put an end to Land Sharking’ while ‘virtually creat[ing] the Native Department into the most dangerous and greatest Land Shark that ever existed in New Zealand.’<sup>74</sup> Not only had the Act granted the Crown a privileged market position, but the Crown had publicly expressed its intention to use that advantage. In August 1885, Ballance had said he wanted to buy two million acres out of the 4.5 million acres in which private purchasing was prohibited,<sup>75</sup> and the Crown had set aside purchasing funds.

The Stout–Vogel Government did not have a clear policy on who should benefit from rising land prices along the railway area. The treasurer, Julius Vogel, wanted the Government to open up the land along the railway route, with the proceeds from onsale of land ‘specifically tied down for the proper purposes of the railway’. In other words, he wanted the railway to be funded through the profits from the purchase and onsale of Māori land.<sup>76</sup> But Ballance had argued for Māori to retain the profits, in return for their agreement to open their district. He had promised Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at Kihikihi in February 1885 that their communities would benefit ‘enormously’ from growth in land prices along the railway route.<sup>77</sup> And he had consistently told his Parliamentary colleagues that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would make land available for settlement if they were treated fairly with respect to land prices. As discussed in chapter 8, his Native Land Administration Act 1886 prohibited direct private transactions in Māori land. The Act provided for the election of owner committees (known as block committees) which could sell land directly to the Crown or direct that it be placed before a Crown-appointed commissioner for private sale or lease.<sup>78</sup>

By 1887, title to the Aotea-Rohe Potae block had been determined, and the court was beginning to turn its attention to subdivision. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders met Ballance at Ōtorohanga in January (he travelled there by train) and once again raised their concerns about the Crown’s failure to honour the terms of their

---

73. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 286, 348, 352–353; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 232–233. Also see ‘Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws’, AJHR, 1891, G–1, pp xvi–xvii.

74. Richard Duncan to Sir George Grey, 15 March 1887 (doc A67, p 78; doc A67(a) (Boulton document bank), vol 1, p 24).

75. ‘Want of Confidence’, 28 August 1885, NZPD, vol 53, pp 354–355; doc A90 (Loveridge), pp 54–57, 69–71; doc A68, pp 31–32, 210–211; doc A41 (Loveridge), p 170 n; doc A78 (Marr), pp 1183–1187; doc A146 (Hearn), pp 54–55.

76. ‘North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Bill’, 28 July 1886, NZPD, vol 56, p 314; doc A67, p 121. Also see doc A20, p 91.

77. ‘Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February 1885’, AJHR, 1885, G–1, p 24.

78. Native Land Administration Act 1886, ss 6, 19, 20.

1883 petition or the February 1885 Kihikihi agreement. Several of their concerns were about breaches of previous agreements about railway construction (chapter 9) and the operation of the land court (chapter 10). They also raised concerns about the Crown's failure to complete its survey of the Rohe Pōtae boundary (due to its decision to carve off the Tauponuiatia block), and about the Native Land Administration Act, which they said took mana over land transactions from them and gave it to the Government. Their specific concern was that the Government could bypass hapū committees and buy land directly from individuals or groups of owners.<sup>79</sup> Ballance said the law provided that no Crown purchase could take place unless a meeting of owners was first called.<sup>80</sup> This was true, although the Act did not specifically provide that the meeting had to take place, or that owners had to consent to the transaction; so long as it was called, that appeared to be sufficient.<sup>81</sup>

The Kawhia Committee chairman, John Ormsby, told Ballance that the Aotea-Rohe Pōtae block had passed through the court and the next step was to have it subdivided, 'first amongst the tribes and then amongst the hapus' (he made no mention of subdivision or award of shares to individuals).<sup>82</sup> Ormsby said the law allowed the Government to 'send an agent to buy the land before it was subdivided'.<sup>83</sup> Ballance promised that '[t]he Government would not purchase any land until the sub-divisions had been made'. But he advised Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'in their own interest, to set aside blocks of land for European settlements, and thus advance the value of the remainder'.<sup>84</sup>

11.3.2.2 The Atkinson Government's land-buying policy for Te Rohe Pōtae, 1887–90

In September 1887, following a general election, a new government was formed under the leadership of Premier Harry Atkinson, with Edwin Mitchelson as Native Minister. The new Government inherited a rapidly deteriorating economy, and the Government's finances had been a major election issue. Revenue was falling, and the previous Government had cut spending in many areas – but railway costs were spiralling far beyond the £1 million originally budgeted.<sup>85</sup>

Another major election issue was settler demand for Māori land, which the new Government was determined to meet.<sup>86</sup> The Atkinson Government saw these

---

79. 'The Native Minister at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 27 January 1887, p 3; 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

80. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

81. Native Land Administration Act 1886, s 20.

82. 'The Native Minister at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 27 January 1887, p 3.

83. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

84. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

85. 'Financial Statement', New Zealand Herald, 23 May 1887, p 12; Editorial, Waikato Times, 22 September 1887, p 2; 'The Budget', Evening Post, 30 May 1888, p 2; 'Public Works Statement', Waikato Times, 13 December 1887, p 2. Also see 'The Acting Premier', New Zealand Herald, 8 November 1890, p 5; 'The Financial Statement', Waikato Times, 15 November 1887, p 2; see also Brian Easton, 'Economic History – Boom and Bust, 1870–1895', Te Ara – the Encyclopedia of New Zealand, <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/en/economic-history/page-5>, accessed 28 November 2017.

86. Alan Ward, A Show of Justice: Racial 'Amalgamation' in Nineteenth Century New Zealand (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1973), p 298.

issues as two parts of a whole. In general, it favoured individualisation of Māori land titles, and free trade once title had been determined, as the best and quickest means of making Māori land available for settlement.<sup>87</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae, however, was to be treated as a special case, due to the Crown's investment in the railway. Whereas the previous government had been divided on the extent to which Māori should retain the benefit of rising land prices along the railway route, this government was not. It intended to buy Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land and onsell it at a profit, using the proceeds to repay its railway borrowings. From its point of view, the Crown, not Māori landowners or private Europeans, should benefit from rising land prices.<sup>88</sup>

One of the new Government's first acts, therefore, was to announce that it was halting all new construction of the railway 'until the lands along the route . . . are purchased.'<sup>89</sup> Construction was to continue for a few more years on sections that had already begun, but, according to Cleaver and Sarich, was 'almost at a standstill' by 1889.<sup>90</sup> The decision to halt new construction remained Government policy throughout the rest of the 1880s and much of the 1890s.<sup>91</sup> The Government also introduced legislation (the Native Land Act 1888) to repeal the Native Land Administration Act 1886, though it did not pass during 1887.<sup>92</sup> When it was enacted in 1888, the legislation also re-established free trade in Māori land – but not for Te Rohe Pōtae, as we will discuss below in section 11.3.2(6).<sup>93</sup>

11.3.2.3 The local economic context

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were in no way opposed to land development. On the contrary, the district's leaders were eager to pursue development opportunities in a manner that was consistent with their mana whakahaere. This meant ensuring that hapū retained control over their own lands and received the benefits from any development.

Even while the aukati remained in force, Te Rohe Pōtae communities in the late 1870s and early 1880s had begun to acquire sheep and cattle, along with farm machinery and new crops such as hops. These were added to the pre-war trading staples pork, potatoes, and flax, and supported a flourishing cross-border trade with European settlements in the Waikato and Taranaki. The district's Māori also began to take cash jobs as farm labourers and gum diggers, and (in Mōkau) to develop agreements to exploit coal and timber resources, including the Jones lease discussed in section 11.6.<sup>94</sup>

87. Document A68, pp 88–89.

88. 'Native Land Bill', 11 July 1888, NZPD, vol 61, pp 668–671; doc A68, p 90.

89. 'The Trunk Railway', Auckland Star, 7 November 1887, p 5; doc A68, p 85.

90. According to Cleaver and Sarich, construction was 'almost at a standstill' between 1889 (when the line was completed as far as Puketutu) and 1897, though some work was done: doc A20, pp 93, 116–117, 291.

91. Document A68, pp 85, 153. Construction of the line resumed in 1897: doc A20, pp 93, 116, 291.

92. Document A68, p 86.

93. Native Land Act 1888, s 4.

94. Document A146, pp 34, 36, 37–38; doc A67, pp 227–230; doc A60, p 1139.

According to the historian Andrew Francis, the aukati protected the autonomy of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, but was ‘porous’ in respect of economic opportunities, with rangatira ‘moving their cultivations and their bases up close to the confiscation line to take full advantage of rejuvenated trading opportunities’. Francis concluded that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during the 1860s and 1870s were ‘among the healthiest and most economically successful’ in New Zealand, principally because they ‘[c]ontrolled engagement with Europeans’ and had retained their traditional lands.<sup>95</sup> Other historians have reached similar conclusions.<sup>96</sup> Francis also noted that the success of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during this time was ‘all the more remarkable’ because of the district’s greatly increased population after the war, the impact of which we explored in section 7.3.1(2).<sup>97</sup>

This economic success depended on Te Rohe Pōtae communities retaining possession of and control of their lands, and investing what cash they could acquire into development. The acquisition of farm machinery such as ploughs suggested considerable confidence in future success.<sup>98</sup> As discussed in chapter 10, that confidence was not well placed: once the court became active in the district, individualisation of title made land susceptible to alienation, and other court processes such as partitioning left owners with uneconomic blocks, further contributing to land alienation and economic marginalisation. We will return to these points later in the chapter.

11.3.2.4 April 1888 negotiations

Notwithstanding the Crown’s 1885 promises that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would share in the benefits of the railway (through all of construction contracts, resource payments, and rising land prices) the Government by this time was expressing very little interest in Māori economic aspirations. It wanted to control the district’s land for its own purposes. In April 1888, the Native Minister Edwin Mitchelson travelled to Ōtorohanga as part of a tour of several central North Island towns. One of his purposes was to discuss proposals for new Māori land laws. He met Rewi Maniapoto, Wahanui, Taonui, Wetere, Te Ranganini, Hauāuru, Herekieke, John Ormsby, and other leaders.<sup>99</sup>

By that time, the Crown had purchased significant amounts of land from individuals in the Waimarino and Tauponuiatia blocks, including lands within the 1883 petition area,<sup>100</sup> and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were well aware of the Crown’s

---

95. Document A26 (Francis), p122.

96. Document A146, p35; doc A26, p122. Francis noted that the historians Keith Sorrenson and Keith Sinclair, and the demographer Ian Pool, had previously come to the conclusion that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were healthier and more economically successful than Māori in other areas affected by loss of land and authority.

97. Document A26, pp108–109.

98. Document A146, p35.

99. For accounts of the meeting, see: ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p2; ‘The Native Meeting – Mr Mitchelson at Otorohanga’, New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p6; doc A67, p96; doc A68, pp87–89. Also see Waikato Times, 10 April 1888, p2.

100. Document A90, pp60–61; doc A41, p202. Also see doc A119 (Massey), plates 7–9, 38.

land purchasing intentions, as well as its core tactics: exploiting survey liens; buying from individuals; and denying owners the right to sell or lease on an open market.<sup>101</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were clearly aware that such tactics were likely to visit their district soon. In March, the Native Land Court had begun the process of subdividing the Rohe–Pōtae land block, which had been awarded to the five tribes in 1886. As Mitchelson arrived, the district's leaders had been negotiating among themselves over subdivision of the block into iwi and hapū blocks.<sup>102</sup>

Whereas previously Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had presented clear demands in their negotiations with Ministers, at this meeting they appeared uncertain about how to respond to the circumstances they now faced as a result of the harmful impacts of the court on their internal cohesion, and the likelihood that Crown purchasing would soon begin. Wahanui opened the hui by telling Mitchelson that he had six things to discuss: the Native Land Administration Act; the rating of Māori land; Crown purchasing; a request for a telegraph line to Ōtorohanga; the appointment of a Māori stationmaster for the railway; and the correction of railway station names.<sup>103</sup> He then handed over to Ormsby, who presented a series of requests for amendments to court processes and land laws. Ormsby said that previous Ministers had come to persuade Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to accept the railway and the court. With the Government having succeeded in introducing those things, he now asked that it protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'from some of the workings of the law.'<sup>104</sup>

He said the Native Land Administration Act 1886 had been passed at the request of Māori from other districts (as discussed in chapter 8, Wahanui had opposed it), but that times had since changed. He was quoted as saying that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had previously asked for title to be awarded to hapū, but now 'we wish our land [to be] individualised.'<sup>105</sup> At first glance, this appears to be a significant departure from the previous preference for hapū title. However, as we will see below, Ormsby appears to have been acknowledging that individualisation was now inevitable and that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori needed to make the best of it, rather than expressing a preference. As we will see, other leaders continued to favour hapū title. Ormsby's essential point, in any case, was that any new law should 'bear lightly on all,'<sup>106</sup> by removing the negative elements of the Native Land Court and by restoring the right of Māori landowners to deal with their lands as they wished.

---

101. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit: Meeting with Wahanui and the Ngatimaniapoto Chiefs', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2; 'The Native Meeting – Mr Mitchelson at Otorohanga', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p 6.

102. Document A79 (Husbands and Mitchell), pp 161–165.

103. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit: Meeting with Wahanui and the Ngatimaniapoto Chiefs', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2; 'The Native Meeting – Mr Mitchelson at Otorohanga', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p 6.

104. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit: Meeting with Wahanui and the Ngatimaniapoto Chiefs', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2; 'The Native Meeting – Mr Mitchelson at Otorohanga', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p 6.

105. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

106. 'Mr Mitchelson's Visit', Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

He said that the new Government was proposing changes to Māori land laws but had not yet consulted Māori.<sup>107</sup> He then described the Act he would like. First, he asked that ‘the Native Land Court Act should be adjusted so that we can easily bring our claims before the court, so that each shall know his piece’. Previously, ‘after the court the case was worse than before’. Secondly, he asked that ‘no one should be allowed to sell till he knew his piece to a certainty’. But ‘when that has been done, let each do as he likes with his own’. Thirdly, he asked that ‘no lawyers be allowed in court’, adding that ‘we are very strong on this point.’<sup>108</sup>

Ormsby continued:

The only troubles about land before the court is among ourselves, but immediately it is adjudicated on, the Government get liens on it. Some lands so done are still in a state of trouble, and the natives do not know how to extricate them. From the first the law seems to be the same till now. The whole cause of the trouble is by Europeans trying to buy the land and they make laws to suit themselves; that is the cause of the difficulty.<sup>109</sup>

Other speakers expressed concern about court processes, objecting to the Native Land Court’s refusal to allow rehearings of Maraeroa, Hurakia, and other Taupouiatia blocks on which Ngāti Maniapoto claims had been excluded (see chapters 8 and 10). Whereas Ormsby had spoken about individualisation of title, Te Herekiekie made a fresh call for the Crown to provide for hapū to have full control over their lands:

What I said to Ballance was, do things properly between the two races, Now there is a fresh Minister, and I tell him the same. Let buying cease from one or two persons. If all the people agree it will be good[.] Taupo and Waimarino are dead (purchased by Government) owing to sales by single individuals. That is how that place has suffered. The lists of names were not conducted properly, neither the subdivisions. I wish all these matters rectified.<sup>110</sup>

Ormsby said he had called for individualisation not because Ngāti Maniapoto wanted it, but because others did. According to the Waikato Times report:

Mr Ormsby, in stating that it was desirable to alter the old state of affairs, wished it understood that the alteration from hapu titles to individual ones was because the ideas of the natives had changed on the matter, and however much the natives round here were satisfied with the hapu titles, if the majority outside desired it, it would be better to bow to their wishes and have them individualised.<sup>111</sup>

---

107. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

108. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

109. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

110. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

111. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2.

But Ormsby also said that ‘trouble’ would follow if title was awarded with ‘a number of names’ on it. The difficulty Ormsby appeared to be grappling with was that the Native Land Court awarded title not to hapū as a whole, or to their acknowledged leaders in accordance with tikanga, and nor did it grant individuals their own plots of land which they could use as they wished. Rather, it awarded individuals shares in jointly owned land. As we will see, this hybrid form of title meant neither hapū nor individual owners had full authority, and neither could therefore make use of the land.

What he urged, essentially, was that owners have their own plots, and be able to deal with those as they wished, without the Crown having an exclusive purchasing right. This was not a preferred position, as Ormsby himself indicated. Nor was it a unanimous position among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Rather, it was Ormsby’s response to the prospect of the Crown individualising title and then buying individual shares in circumstances where there was no market. In other words, it was his response to the difficulties that had arisen for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori because of the Crown’s failure to honour previous promises.

Responding to Ormsby and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, Mitchelson said the Native Land Administration Act 1886 had to be repealed because of Māori opposition. The Government, Mitchelson said, ‘intend giving the Natives the control of their own lands, for the time has arrived for it’. By this, he appears to have meant that Māori as individuals would have control over their own individual shares, as we will see below.<sup>112</sup>

Mitchelson also said that no Māori would be permitted to sell land until three months after ownership was determined, but at that point ‘anyone wishing to sell can do so’ as long as they retained enough land for their ongoing support, ‘and those who don’t want to sell can keep their land.’<sup>113</sup> There was, however, one caveat: the Crown would retain an exclusive purchasing right during the three months after ownership was determined; after that, land could be offered for sale to others. Ormsby responded that ‘the Government preemptive right should be altogether done away with’ – his clear wish was for an open market, as Ballance had promised.<sup>114</sup> As Mitchelson was unwilling to meet this condition, no agreement was reached.

11.3.2.5 Wahanui’s objection to the Government’s plans

About two months after that meeting, Mitchelson introduced a Bill repealing the Native Land Administration Act 1886 and instead granting all Māori landowners the right to alienate land or shares in land in the same manner as other New Zealanders. The Bill also proposed that Māori lands be subject to taxes, rates, and other charges applying to freehold land.<sup>115</sup> While it granted Māori landowners the same rights as Europeans, the effect of this Bill would have been to allow any 112. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2; doc A68, pp 89–90.

113. ‘Mr Mitchelson’s Visit’, Waikato Times, 12 April 1888, p 2; doc A68, pp 89–90.

114. ‘The Native Meeting’, New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p 6; doc A68, p 89.

115. ‘Native Lands Bill’, Poverty Bay Herald, 2 June 1888, p 2; doc A68, pp 89–91.

individual to sell shares in Māori land, irrespective of the wishes of other members of the hapū or other owners in a block. Prior to the April 1888 negotiations, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought to preserve the rights of Māori communities to make collective decisions about land. They had initially opposed individualisation of title and continued to oppose sales by individual shareholders, as well as opposing any privileged market position for the Crown.

In June 1888, Wahanui wrote to Ballance, then an opposition member of the House of Representatives, asking him to convey the opposition of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to the new Bill. Wahanui explained that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders wanted to retain the parts of the Native Land Administration Act 1886 which ‘nearly correspond with what we would like ourselves’. Here, he seems to have been referring to the provisions empowering block committees, which were elected from among owners, to make decisions about land. The Act, as currently worded, ‘serves now as a check on these corrupt practices’, since individual owners could not be manipulated into selling their shares.<sup>116</sup>

Wahanui said he had previously expressed his concern about some parts of the Act, and continued to want amendments. He singled out section 19, which provided for commissioners to administer sales and leases on owners’ behalf; section 20, which allowed the Crown to bypass block committees and purchase directly from individual owners; and section 37, which provided for expenses to be deducted before owners were paid rent or purchase money.<sup>117</sup> But, since the Act had come into force, he had not asked for its repeal. If the Government now pressed ahead with its free trade plans, Wahanui wrote, Māori would be subjected to the ‘old corrupt practices’ which had been raised in the 1883 petition (that is, that land laws failed to protect Māori rights under articles 2 and 3, and instead enabled private land speculators to exploit court processes and debt to gain possession of Māori land).<sup>118</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, Wahanui wrote, had only consented to the survey of their land in 1883 because Native Minister John Bryce had promised that ‘he would give due respect to our land, and . . . would prevent all evil practices from being done in our district’. And they had only consented to the railway because they had relied on Crown promises that it ‘would give due respect to our land’, and ‘would prevent all evil practices from being done in our district’. They would not have placed their lands before the court if they had known of the free trade in individual interests the Crown now intended to introduce.<sup>119</sup>

11.3.2.6 1888–91 restrictions enacted

On 30 August 1888, two new laws came into effect. The Native Land Act 1888 repealed the Native Land Administration Act 1886 and restored free trade in Māori land for most of New Zealand. Under the Act, Māori were able to 116. ‘Letter from Wahanui’, Wanganui Herald, 11 June 1888, p 2. Also see submission 3.4.307, p 7.

117. ‘Letter from Wahanui’, Wanganui Herald, 11 June 1888, p 2.

118. ‘Letter from Wahanui’, Wanganui Herald, 11 June 1888, p 2.

119. ‘Letter from Wahanui’, Wanganui Herald, 11 June 1888, p 2.

‘alienate and dispose of land or of any share or interest therein as they think fit’<sup>120</sup> Mitchelson, explaining this legislation in the House of Representatives, echoed Ormsby’s words. Māori, he said, ‘thought the time had now arrived when they should be permitted to take charge of their own affairs’. They were ‘no longer children’ and ‘ought to be placed in exactly the same position as Europeans’, that is, ‘they should be allowed to sell and lease their own land without the intervention of Government’.<sup>121</sup>

Also on 30 August 1888, the Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 came into effect. The Act’s effect was that no one other than the Crown could negotiate to buy, lease, or otherwise deal with any part of ‘Rohe-Pōtae’ until 30 August 1891.<sup>122</sup>

The Act did not define the boundaries of ‘Rohe-Potae’, and witnesses gave a range of views about what was intended.<sup>123</sup> In our view, the Act was plainly referring to the 1886 Rohe Potae block, which the Native Land Court had awarded to the five tribes in October 1886, and which remained before the court in 1888 as subdivisions were completed. As well as prohibiting private purchasing within that block, section 15 also referred to the court’s interlocutory orders and decisions regarding ownership of the block and provided that they would have the effect of orders under the Native Land Court Act 1886.

The 1886 Rohe Potae block, to which restrictions were now being applied, covered a much smaller area than the 1884–86 restriction zone. It comprised most of the 1.6 million-acre Aotea-Rohe Potae block, with the removal of five small blocks (Korakonui, Taharoa, Awaroa, Kawhia, Kaipiha) which the court had awarded in 1886 to other claimants.<sup>124</sup>

The premier, Harry Atkinson, told the House that the restrictions had been put in place at the urging of Wahanui and the Western Maori Member of the House of Representatives Hoani Taipua. He claimed they had sought a five-year restriction, but the Government had decided on a shorter period which would ‘give [it] time

120. Native Land Act 1888, ss 3–5.

121. ‘Native Land Bill’, 11 July 1888, NZPD, vol 61, p 669 (doc A41, p 201).

122. Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s15; Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act 1881 Amendment Act 1888, s5.

123. Boulton’s view was that ‘Rohe-Potae’ under the Native Land Court 1886 Amendment Act 1888, referred to the Aotea-Rohe Potae block. Husbands and Mitchell said it referred to the smaller Rohe Potae block as defined in October 1886. Hearn’s view was that it referred to the 1884 restriction zone. Loveridge’s view was also that it was ‘almost certainly a reference to the 1884 restriction area’, albeit with some amendments. Loveridge’s view was based on the definition of ‘Rohe Potae’ given in the Native Land Bill 1888. In that Bill, ‘Rohe-Potae’ was defined as being the restriction area defined in the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, with the addition of ‘Mokau Riding’ and some Rotorua land. However, the House removed all references to ‘Rohe Potae’ from that Bill before it was enacted, and the definition was not included in the Native Land Court 1886 Amendment Act 1888. Loveridge, however, said elsewhere that he was ‘fairly certain that the reference was meant to be to the Aotea block alone’: see doc A67, pp 14 n, 79, 150–151, 301, 397; doc A79, pp 25, 478; doc A146, p 60; doc A68, pp 92 n, 190–192, 202 n

124. Document A79, pp 25, 478; doc A60, pp 82–86, 87–89. Specifically, according to Husbands and Mitchell, the ‘Rohe Potae’ block in 1888 referred to the 1.6 million-acre Aotea-Rohe Potae block excluding the Korakonui, Te Taharoa, Te Awaroa, Kawhia, and Kaipiha blocks: doc A79, p 25.

to deal with the land for the railway'.<sup>125</sup> In fact, as discussed above, what Wahanui had sought was amendments to the existing law to provide for Māori to exercise communal control over their land, and to remove any privileged Crown purchasing rights, so that Te Rohe Pōtae communities could avoid the harm that would inevitably arise from free trade in or Crown purchasing of individual interests. Wahanui had explicitly opposed any exclusive purchasing right for the Crown, as he had on previous occasions.<sup>126</sup> Other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought a prohibition on all land dealings before title was determined, but had likewise opposed any exclusive purchasing right for the Crown.<sup>127</sup> As Ballance had in 1885, Atkinson was reinterpreting Māori leaders' requests for protection from settlers' predatory buying tactics as support for the Crown to keep the market to itself.<sup>128</sup>

While claiming Māori support for this measure, Atkinson and other Ministers also acknowledged that the Crown's true purpose was to exclude competition along the railway until it could achieve its land buying objectives. As Mitchelson told the House, his preference was for the Crown to buy and settle all Te Rohe Pōtae land 'other than what would be sufficient for . . . [Māori] use and occupation', and his intention was therefore to protect the land from private sale until the court could complete its work and the Crown could acquire what it needed.<sup>129</sup> Mitchelson had not discussed this ambition with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during his visit in April. It was a marked departure from anything Crown representatives had discussed with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders at any time, though not so different from what Bryce had been telling Pākehā audiences and politicians years earlier (see chapter 8). In January 1887, Ballance had recommended that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders 'set aside blocks of land for European settlements', without specifying how much. As noted earlier, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders showed no sign of consenting to that proposal. We cannot see that they would have consented to Mitchelson's new proposal, under which they were expected to give up almost all of their land.<sup>130</sup>

11.3.3 The 1890–1910 restrictions

11.3.3.1 The Crown decides to begin purchasing

Even with the restrictions in place, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to pursue economic development opportunities. The amount of land devoted to traditional cultivation appears to have declined during the 1880s as more Māori engaged in wage labour on the railway (chapter 9) and other government projects such as road

125. 'Native Land Court Bill', 27 August 1888, NZPD, vol 63, p 456 (doc A68, p 93).

126. Loveridge was also of this view: doc A68, p 93.

127. 'The Native Meeting', New Zealand Herald, 12 April 1888, p 6.

128. Hoani Taipua also sought protection from predatory buying practises. See Angela Ballara, 'Hoani Taipua Te Puna-i-rangiriri' in 1870–1900, vol 2 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed Claudia Orange (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books / The Department of Internal Affairs, 1994), pp 496–497.

129. 'Native Land Bill', 11 July 1888, NZPD, vol 61, p 670 (doc A68, p 90).

130. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3.

building and rabbit culling,<sup>131</sup> and as they pursued entrepreneurial activities. The number of Māori engaging in sheep farming grew rapidly from the late 1880s, led by people such as the Ormsby brothers and Wahanui. By 1890, Wilkinson estimated there were 6,000 sheep in the district, most of them owned by Māori.<sup>132</sup> Māori in Ōtorohanga, Rangitoto Tuhua, and elsewhere entered arrangements allowing Europeans to cut and mill timber, taking advantage of the railway and its capacity to carry timber to markets outside the district.<sup>133</sup> Similarly, limestone was quarried at Te Kumi from 1888 on.<sup>134</sup> In some areas, such as Te Kopua, extensive cultivation continued.<sup>135</sup>

But the restrictions nonetheless affected the district's economy. The district's leaders had consistently expressed a desire to make land available for settlement by leasing, thereby bringing incomes to their communities without placing the land itself at risk. The general effect of the restrictions was to prevent such arrangements and potentially deny incomes to Te Rohe Pōtae communities. Māori did occasionally enter agreements allowing Europeans to run stock on their land, to lease land for sheep farming, and to take flax for milling, but such arrangements were not sanctioned by the law and carried ongoing risks that the Crown might step in and terminate them – as it began to do in the early 1890s.<sup>136</sup>

While Māori communities continued to pursue development opportunities, they also became increasingly drawn into Native Land Court processes. By mid-1889, the court had identified tribal boundaries within the Rohe-Pōtae block, and had gone a considerable way towards creating subdivisions and identifying owners (although it did not begin to define owners' relative interests for most blocks until 1892 or later).<sup>137</sup>

The district's leaders were also aware that survey costs would have to be paid. As discussed in chapter 10, they explored various options to avoid or minimise these costs, and in particular to avoid liens which would force them to give up land to repay survey charges. This appears to have been one of the reasons for the increase in sheep farming in the late 1880s – leaders were hoping to be able to earn sufficient income from that and other economic activities to pay off their liens when they fell due.<sup>138</sup>

Wilkinson attended the court hearings, gathering detailed information about land blocks, owners, survey status, and desirability, and reporting it back to the

131. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 3; doc A67, pp 227–228, 230; doc A35 (Ward), p 92; doc A146, pp 37–38; doc A20, p 92.

132. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, pp 4–5; doc A67, pp 228–229.

133. Document A146, pp 229–232; doc A67, pp 311–314.

134. Document A146, pp 498–499; doc A67, pp 314–315, 318–322.

135. Document A26, pp 47–48, 54, 58, 103, 109; doc A146, p 35.

136. Document A79, pp 512–513; doc A146, pp 126, 185; doc A67, pp 225, 227, 309–310, 324; doc A55 (Marr), p 91.

137. Document A79, pp 162–167.

138. Document A55, p 102. Also see doc A67, pp 229, 231–232, 253–254; 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5. Ngāti Maniapoto leaders had reached an agreement with the Crown under which it would initially cover survey costs, which owners would repay two years after survey had been completed: doc A79, pp 300–302, 309; doc A55, p 51.

Native Department.<sup>139</sup> By June 1889, court processes were sufficiently far advanced for the Government to decide it would soon begin purchasing.<sup>140</sup> It is not clear whether there was any consultation over this decision – according to Boulton, the Native Under-Secretary did visit Kihikihi in early June, where he had a long meeting with Wilkinson and also saw Wahanui and others, but there is no record of what was said.<sup>141</sup>

On 19 June, Wilkinson wrote to the Native Department that ‘[in] view of the proposed commencement of purchase’ he was sending details of which blocks were close to the railway line and had title and survey processes complete.<sup>142</sup> Then, on 24 June the Native Minister (Mitchelson) wrote to Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauāuru giving them ‘early information’ of the Crown’s intention to begin purchasing as soon as titles were determined. Mitchelson promised to set aside reserves and expressed hope that Māori would not be ‘denuded of their lands’, but he also urged the rangatira to help the Crown as much as possible.<sup>143</sup> Ignoring Māori attempts to develop their lands, and the effects of restrictions that were designed to prevent any private sale or lease, Mitchelson argued that it was not in their interests to leave land ‘waste and unoccupied’. Like Ballance before him, he claimed that any land Māori did retain ‘will be greatly increased in value by the progress of settlement.’<sup>144</sup>

Over the next few months, the Crown turned its attention to practical questions: which blocks to buy, how to buy them, and how much to buy and sell for. Wilkinson continued to prepare and update lists of blocks which were close to the railway line, of sufficient quality to be attractive to settlers, and for which boundaries and titles had been determined and were unlikely to be relitigated. All of the blocks Wilkinson identified were in the highly fertile Waipā Valley, close to the railway route in the north of the district.<sup>145</sup> By any estimation, these were prized lands. All had been identified in an 1885 Crown survey as first-class agricultural land (whereas much of the district was second-class pastoral land or broken country). And most were already heavily used for Māori agriculture and horticultural activities. Indeed, the Waipā Valley had first become a significant agricul-

139. Document A67, pp 182–184.

140. Document A67, p185.

141. Document A67, p185.

142. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 19 June 1889 (doc A67, p185; doc A67(a), vol 1, p90).

143. Lewis for Mitchelson, draft letter to Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauāuru, 24 June 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p103; doc A67, pp185–186, 216).

144. Lewis for Mitchelson, draft letter to Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauāuru, 24 June 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p104; doc A67, pp185–186, 216).

145. Document A67, pp186–199, 209–210, 219, 493. By October, a shortlist of 10 blocks had been identified for immediate purchase. They included Mangauika, Kaipiha, Whakairoiro, Ngamahanga, Te Kopua 1, Parihoru 1, Takotokoraha, Waiwhakaata, and Maungarangi. Several other blocks in the north of the district were considered attractive but were not included because of outstanding surveys or legal claims. They included Kakepuku, Tokanui, Ouruwhero, Puketarata, Otorohanga, Orahiri, Hauturu, and Kinohaku East. Also see doc A67(a), vol 1, p128; doc A91 (Waitangi Tribunal document bank), vol 2, pp313–314; doc A95(q)(i) (Parker appendixes).

tural centre in the late 1830s, and one of the reasons Te Rohe Pōtae leaders signed the Treaty was to increase access to European technology so they could further develop these lands for the benefit of their people.<sup>146</sup>

If Crown officials paid little heed to Māori economic aspirations, they paid even less heed to ancestral relationships, recent or distant. The preferred blocks included lands that Ngāti Maniapoto had, several decades earlier, defended from Ngāpuhi and Ngāti Raukawa incursions, where leaders such as Peehi Tūkorehu and Te Wherowhero had lived. They were rich in traditional food sources – one of them, Ouruwhero, included Te Kawa Swamp. And they were of deep importance to Tainui and Ngāti Maniapoto identity. The early Tainui explorers Rakataura and Kahurere had traversed some of the targeted blocks and named their maunga. Tūrongo and Mahinārangi had settled lands near Ōtorohanga, which had become the cradle from which Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa emerged; these, too, were on Wilkinson's lists.

11.3.3.2 Early discussions about purchasing tactics

Just as the Crown had to determine what to buy, it had to determine how. On this, Wilkinson and other Europeans advised that Māori communities would be very unlikely to sell, having little need of money and a considerable motivation to develop land on their own account. Therefore, the only method that was likely to succeed was to target individual owners in the hope that communal resistance could eventually be broken down.<sup>147</sup>

In October 1889, Wilkinson advised the Under-Secretary for the Native Department, T W Lewis, that it would be best to target owners across a wide range of land blocks. Such a strategy would be unlikely to yield the whole of any block, but it might allow the Crown to acquire a substantial portion. The Crown could then go to court, forcing non-sellers to agree to partition the blocks they had interests in. The process could then begin again, with Wilkinson targeting the remaining non-sellers' individual shares.<sup>148</sup>

In December, Lewis wrote to Mitchelson recommending that the Crown immediately begin to buy individual shares in all of the blocks for which titles were secure. Lewis stressed that the intent behind the policy was to break down communal resistance. If individuals in one block would not sell, he said, those in another might; and once non-sellers saw that others had cash, they would be more likely to part with their shares.<sup>149</sup>

On the question of price, the surveyor-general had recommended the Crown pay prices ranging from 2 shillings to 3 shillings per acre (for hillier blocks to the west of the railway) up to 10 shillings an acre (for prime land close to the railway). He advised that land in most blocks could be onsold for at least 2.5 times the purchase price, yielding a profit (once development costs were taken into account)

---

146. Document A67, pp 196–198.

147. Document A67, pp 187–188, 206–207 doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 121–132; doc A55, p 53.

148. Document A67, pp 206–207; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 121–132; doc A55, p 53.

149. Document A67, p 211; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 133–141.

of seven-eighths of the purchase price.<sup>150</sup> Lewis's advice to Mitchelson was that the Crown should never pay more than 5 shillings per acre, along with a 10 per cent reserve as 'an incentive to sell', and should begin by offering 3 to 4 shillings per acre. Lewis said that Māori owners would probably expect prices five or six times these amounts, and it would probably take some time to break down their resistance and get them to sell, 'but . . . once the ice is broken they will come in, especially when they learn that their unreasonable expectations are not likely to be met.'<sup>151</sup> Mitchelson responded with an instruction to start purchasing, with 5 shillings per acre as the outer limit.<sup>152</sup> The Crown's explicit policy, in other words, was to deliberately break down communal resistance to land selling, with the goal of persuading individuals to sell at prices that were considerably less than the Crown's own experts said the land was worth.

The policy of individual purchasing, furthermore, was in breach of an earlier promise. Throughout the 1880s, Ministers had consistently told Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that it intended to purchase only 'surplus' land.<sup>153</sup> According to Boulton, the Crown regarded land as 'surplus' if it was unoccupied and uncultivated, a definition that Māori were unlikely to have shared.<sup>154</sup> Even allowing for the differing views of the Crown and Māori over what might be considered surplus or unused, it is clear that the Crown had by this time abandoned any idea of negotiating with communities over what they might consider surplus, and had instead determined to acquire whatever it could within the targeted blocks.

11.3.3.3 1890–92 restrictions enacted

For the Crown's purchasing policy to work as intended, the Crown had to control the land market; it could not allow Māori to sell land to anyone other than itself. When the Crown instructed Wilkinson to begin purchasing in December 1889, the 1888–91 restrictions remained in effect, and covered most of the district (as

---

150. Document A67, pp 209–210, 219, 493; doc A91, vol 2, pp 313, 340–341; doc A67(a), p 128; doc A95(q)(i); doc A95(q) (Parker), p 4; doc A95(h)(1) (Parker), pp 6–7; doc A95(h) (Parker), pp 2–3; doc A95(q), p 4. The surveyor-general recommended that Hauturu West be sold for 3.5 times the maximum purchase price, and Wharepuhunga be sold for twice the maximum purchase price. For Wharepuhunga, the estimated profit was 50 per cent of the purchase price, and for Hauturu West the estimated profit was 181.25 per cent of the purchase price: doc A95(h)(1), pp 6–7; doc A67, p 210 tbl 14, 493.

151. Lewis, Under-Secretary, Native Department, to Native Minister, 18 December 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 133–141; doc A67, p 211). In 1890, Lewis reported to the Native Minister that sales were slow, both because Māori did not want to sell and because of 'the exaggerated idea' they had of the value of their land: doc A67, p 226. The Crown had also asked the merchant JW Ellis, who was operating in Te Rohe Pōtae, for information on land prices and preferred blocks. His view was that Māori had 'very extravagant ideas of the value of their lands close to the [railway] line'. He therefore recommended purchasing elsewhere at lower prices, to lower price expectations: Ellis to Mitchelson, 26 September 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 110; doc A67, pp 203–204).

152. Document A91, vol 2, p 327.

153. Lewis, draft letter to Wahanui, Taonui, and Hauauru, 24 June 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 103–104); doc A67, pp 185–185, 216–217, 403–404; doc A68, pp 82–83, 101, 148. Also see doc A41, p 184 n shown in map 11.1). Nonetheless, as part of legislation funding the land purchase programme, the Crown also imposed new restrictions.

154. Document A67, pp 185–186.

The North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889 was enacted on 16 September 1889 and came into effect on 1 January 1890.<sup>155</sup> It established two new restriction zones. One covered a substantial area in the north and centre of the inquiry district surrounding the railway route and Waipā Valley. This is hereafter referred to as the ‘northern target area’.<sup>156</sup> According to Boulton, it coincided almost exactly with the area described in Wilkinson’s land purchasing recommendations.<sup>157</sup> The other new restriction zone (the ‘southern target area’) covered a substantial area outside this inquiry district, broadly from the Tongararo area south to just beyond Taihape.<sup>158</sup>

Within these two target areas, the Crown was granted exclusive rights to enter arrangements for the ‘purchase, conveyance, transfer, lease, exchange, or occupation’ of any Māori land, for a period of two years, from 1 January 1890 to 1 January 1892.<sup>159</sup> For the period from 1 January 1890 to 30 August 1891, therefore, two sets of restrictions were in place – one covering the 1886 Rohe Potae block and its subdivisions,<sup>160</sup> and another covering the northern and southern target areas.<sup>161</sup>

These new restrictions were the initiative of the Native Minister, Mitchelson, and were inserted during the legislative process without any prior public announcement or consultation. Initially, Mitchelson wanted them to apply for five years, but accepted a reduction to two years under pressure from other members of the House.<sup>162</sup> The target areas defined locations where the Crown wanted to purchase land, as distinct from the broader area that it wanted to protect from private speculation. It is not clear, however, why Mitchelson felt the need to impose new restrictions on the northern target area, when the entire 1886 Rohe Potae block was already covered by the 1888–91 restrictions.<sup>163</sup> He gave no explanation when the Bill was introduced to the House, saying only that the areas defined in the le-

155. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, s 5.

156. Document A68, p 94. According to Loveridge, this area included ‘most of the land within the Waipa Valley lying between the mountain ranges to the east and west, from a point south of Te Kuiti northwards to the Punui River’.

157. Document A67, pp 140, 189–193, 195–198, 203–206, 211.

158. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, sch 2.

159. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, s 5, sch 2; Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act 1881 Amendment Act 1888, s 5. Also see doc A67, pp 140–141; doc A68, pp 93–94; submission 3.4.307, pp 9, 27.

160. Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 15.

161. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886 Amendment Act 1889, s 5, sch 2; North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Amendment Act 1891, s 2; North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892, ss 2–3, sch.

162. Document A68, pp 93–95; doc A67, pp 140–142, 300–301.

163. None of the witnesses in this inquiry addressed Mitchelson’s reasons for imposing new restrictions on land where restrictions already applied. According to Boulton, the main focus of the House of Representatives debate was on ensuring that money was not spent in the Taranaki land district, since it was feared that the New Plymouth Harbour Board would claim 25 per cent of the revenue from sales: doc A67, pp 460–461. This explains why funding was allocated to purchasing in the northern target area, but not why new restrictions were also imposed. Also see doc A68, pp 93–95.

gislation 'comprise for the most part first-class land, which, when acquired, will be made available for settlement purposes as rapidly as possible'.<sup>164</sup> Nor was there any debate on the matter, except that Ballance noted the proposed areas differed from the much broader area defined in the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act and asked the Government to provide a map.<sup>165</sup>

By the time the Act was passed, the Native Land Court had completed the subdivision of much of the 1886 Rohe Potae block (though, for most blocks, surveys were still to be completed).<sup>166</sup> The Crown had already made a decision in principle to begin purchasing, and had received advice from its agent in the King Country, George Wilkinson, about which blocks to prioritise.<sup>167</sup>

As well as defining new restriction zones, the Act authorised the use of £120,285 for land purchasing within the two new restriction zones.<sup>168</sup> This was in addition to the £100,000 authorised in 1886,<sup>169</sup> much of which had been spent on Waimarino and Tauponuiatia block purchases outside this district.<sup>170</sup> Of the remaining lands that the Crown saw as important to its settlement plans, the northern target area was one of the highest priorities.<sup>171</sup> Not only did the Crown intend to use these new restrictions to support its land purchasing programme, it also explicitly intended to control land prices. Mitchelson told a delegation from Auckland that the Crown would offer between 3 and 7 shillings per acre for land in the Aotea-Rohe Potae block and hoped to sell to settlers at 15 shillings. It was necessary for the Crown to control the market, he argued, because settlers would not be able to obtain land so cheaply from private speculators.<sup>172</sup> In respect of the Crown profiting from these transactions:

[It] had already spent large sums on the central line of railway, and it had opened up a good deal of country. As this had advanced the value of the land, the Government considered that whatever value had been given to the land ought to belong to the State, and not to any private persons who now wished to acquire the land.<sup>173</sup>

Mitchelson did not remind his audience that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had only consented to the railway on the basis of Crown promises that they would retain possession and control of their land and would benefit from rising land values.

---

164. 'North Island Main Trunk Railway Bill', 27 August 1889, NZPD, vol 66, p 119.

165. 'North Island Main Trunk Railway Bill', 27 August 1889, NZPD, vol 66, p 120.

166. Document A60, pp 87–89; doc A79, p 166.

167. Document A67, pp 185–189, 206.

168. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act Amendment Act 1889, ss 2–4.

169. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886, s 4.

170. Document A90, pp 60–61; doc A67, p 170.

171. Document A67, pp 167, 460–461.

172. Document A68, pp 98–99.

173. 'The Acting Premier', New Zealand Herald, 8 November 1890 (doc A68, p 98).

11.3.3.4 The Crown's initial frustration

In spite of Wilkinson's determined efforts, land sales were initially very slow. Early in 1890, he wrote to the Native Department pointing out that Māori landowners saw little point in selling at the prices the Crown was willing to pay.<sup>174</sup> According to the land purchase officer William Grace, some Māori landowners said they could 'get more money for a pig' than the Crown was willing to pay for a share in their land.<sup>175</sup> Others were reported to be 'highly amused' by the Crown's offers, and one old man reportedly told the assistant land purchasing officer: 'The Govt don't wish to buy or else they would not offer such a price.'<sup>176</sup>

In April 1890, Wilkinson was granted discretion to offer 5 shillings an acre for the best land, though it was made clear he should offer no more than was needed to get Māori to sell.<sup>177</sup> His first individual share purchases occurred that month, and were a source of considerable shame for the sellers. As Wilkinson described it, two (out of 110) owners in the Mangauika block rode for 12 miles under cover of darkness to meet him and complete the transaction; they then banked the proceeds in Te Awamutu rather than cashing them at the local store.<sup>178</sup> These were 'the first shares within any of the Rohepotae blocks that have yet been sold by the Natives.'<sup>179</sup>

No further progress was made before June 1890, when Wilkinson reported to the House of Representatives on his land purchasing activities. Wilkinson gave five reasons for Māori refusing to sell. First, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had other sources of income (such as flax sales, roading and rabbit culling contracts, sheep farming, and grazing and timber contracts, as discussed above). Secondly, they saw little benefit in encouraging settlement. Thirdly, they did not trust the Crown's intentions, regarding it as acting from self-interest. Fourthly, they believed the prices the Crown was offering were too low. Fifthly, they believed they should have access to a competitive market.<sup>180</sup>

Wilkinson did not recommend that the Crown further increase its purchase prices, let alone that it remove the restrictions. Rather, he echoed the Native Department view that resistance must be broken down, just as the Crown had previously broken communal resistance to the Native Land Court and to surveys.<sup>181</sup> The fundamental problem, Wilkinson reported, was that the district's Māori did not yet need money. That would change if their labour contracts dried up and their sheep farming operations failed – which Wilkinson saw as inevitable. Another factor in the Crown's favour was that attempts at sheep farming would in

174. Document A67, pp 210–211, 223–224; doc A91, vol 2, pp 298–302.

175. Wilkinson to Lewis, 10 March 1890 (doc A67, p 225; doc A67(a), vol 1, p 167).

176. Grace to Wilkinson, not dated, attached to Wilkinson to Lewis, 10 March 1890 (doc A67, p 225; doc A67(a), vol 1, p 169). Also see doc A68, pp 96–97.

177. Document A67, pp 226, 228, 252; doc A67(a), vol 1, p 188.

178. Document A67, p 222.

179. George Wilkinson to T W Lewis, 7 April 1890 (doc A67, p 222).

180. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, pp 3–6; doc A67, pp 227–228; doc A20, p 92. Also see Wilkinson to Lewis, 27 March 1890 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 174–177).

181. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5; doc A67, p 230; doc A55, p 47.

Wilkinson's view inevitably lead to conflict between those who owned the stock and other landowners.<sup>182</sup> Together, jealousy and want of money would 'bring about a complete disintegration of their policy of anti-land-selling'.<sup>183</sup> As that occurred, those in need of cash could be induced to sell 'at almost any price'.<sup>184</sup>

Wilkinson characterised resistance to Crown purchasing as the last of several stages in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had attempted to protect their territories and authority from Crown attempts to secure those lands for European settlement.<sup>185</sup> In the first stage, Wilkinson wrote, the five tribes had defined their territories and proclaimed their ownership, believing that this alone was sufficient to have their ownership acknowledged by the Government and the law.

In the second stage, they had submitted to the Native Land Court 'much against their wish' to have the external boundary defined, so they could be awarded legal title. They did this only because the Crown refused to recognise and respect their ownership of their territories without this step. In the third stage, they had consented to the railway, 'most likely' because 'they could see that Government were determined to put it through'.<sup>186</sup>

In the fourth stage, they had named the individual owners of the Aotea-Rohe Potae block. They objected to this 'for a long time', preferring that title be awarded to tribes and hapū, not to individuals. This, Wilkinson wrote, 'was for the purpose of preventing sales, &c, and to keep the power in the hands of the chiefs.' But because the court had no power to award iwi or hapū titles, they were forced to name individuals. In the fifth stage, the naming of individuals caused 'jealousy, ill-feeling, bickerings, and quarrelling' which led to the subdivision of the Aotea-Rohe Potae block into smaller blocks with separate lists of owners.<sup>187</sup>

The sixth stage was the surveying of the boundaries of each block. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders objected to this step, 'as they saw plainly that, as soon as that was done and the area known, there was nothing to prevent those of the owners from selling who wanted to do so, a proceeding that it was almost unanimously considered should not be allowed if it could possibly be avoided'. During this stage, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders did everything in their power to prevent the Government from obtaining survey liens, first by attempting to avoid surveys altogether, then by attempting to arrange for private surveys which they hoped to pay for in cash, before they gave in after being told that Crown surveys would be as cheap and more accurate (and also after being promised that no charges would be made against their land for two years after survey).<sup>188</sup>

Wilkinson had been intimately involved in each of these stages, interpreting at meetings between Cabinet ministers and Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and communicating with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders directly between Ministerial visits. In essence, his

182. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5; doc A67, p 230; doc A55, p 47.

183. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5 (doc A67, p 230)

184. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5; doc A67, p 228; doc A55, p 47.

185. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5.

186. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5.

187. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5.

188. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5.

report amounts to a clear admission by the Crown's agent in the district that the Crown had never intended to meet the demands made by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in their 1883 petition or honour the pledges that Ministers made during their 1883–85 visits to the district.

With the completion of the first six stages, Wilkinson wrote, 'the seventh or last stage is now being entered upon—namely, parting with their land by sale.'<sup>189</sup> By describing the strategy in these terms, Wilkinson was acknowledging that this was not merely a land purchasing operation – it was part of a larger and highly deliberate assault on communal control of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land and on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori territorial authority and economic aspirations, using tactics that had served the Crown in other districts<sup>190</sup> and, in this district, had been endorsed by the Native Department and the Native Minister.<sup>191</sup> This was exactly what Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had sought to avoid when they protested over the Crown's exclusive purchasing right.

11.3.3.5 Early sales to cover survey costs: Te Kopua and Waiaraia

Over the rest of 1890, Wilkinson's progress remained very slow. After his initial purchase of two shares in Mangauika he succeeded in acquiring only a small number of shares in the fertile northern parts of the district.<sup>192</sup> The district's leaders were, however, aware that survey costs would sooner or later have to be repaid. As discussed earlier, they had known that survey liens could open the door to land alienation and had sought to avoid that outcome. Some had sought to raise funds by other means, including sheep farming, but had also been hampered in those efforts by restrictions on leasing, which prevented them from forming arrangements with Europeans of their choosing. In discussions with Wilkinson, Wahanui, Taonui, and Ormsby indicated that they might be willing to sell some of their lands in order to pay those costs, in the hope that this would mean they could retain and develop other lands. In particular, Ormsby indicated a willingness to sell a small part of Te Kopua 1 in the north of the district, so long as he and his whānau could determine the subdivision boundaries.<sup>193</sup>

In December, Wahanui indicated to Wilkinson that he would be willing to sell land in the Waiaraia and Taorua blocks in the south of the district, also to cover survey liens. He had not sold earlier, he said, because title had not been awarded.<sup>194</sup>

189. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5.

190. Alan Ward, National Overview, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahau Whānui Series, 3 vols (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), vol 1, pp 8–10, 18–21, vol 3, pp 4–15, 22–28, 41–45, 122–127, 154–158, 172–175, 227–233, 250–252, 267–269.

191. Lewis to Native Minister, 18 December 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 133–141); Mitchelson to Lewis, 20 December 1889 (doc A91, vol 2, p 327). Also see doc A55, pp 53, 73.

192. Wilkinson's reports on 1890 and early 1891 share purchases are in doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 192–215, 239–253. Also see doc A67, pp 227–228, 395–396; doc A20, p 92; doc A21, p 131; doc A95(i) (Parker spreadsheet), 'Crown Purchases'; 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, pp 3–6.

193. Document A67, pp 232–233, 240; doc A55, pp 89, 103–104; doc A79, pp 169, 228, 315–316. Also see doc A67(a), pp 212–215.

194. Document A67, pp 393, 395–396, 403–404; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 265–269; doc A60, pp 1079–1080, 1157–1159, 1167.

This offer appears to have been an assertion of mana: Whanganui Māori had also laid claim to these blocks, and in August – while the blocks remained before the court – had offered to sell them to the Crown.<sup>195</sup> The fact that Wahanui and Whanganui leaders were now competing over these blocks was an indication of how much things had changed since 1885, when the Government encouraged Whanganui Māori to break the five tribes alliance and instead take their Waimarino claims to court.<sup>196</sup>

In January 1891, a new Liberal Government was sworn in, with Ballance as Premier and Alfred Cadman as Native Minister. As we saw in chapter 8 and in earlier parts of this chapter, Ballance's stance on Māori land had hardened during the course of his 1884–87 tenure as Native Minister. Before Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had consented to the railway, he had sought their agreement on land laws and had expressed the view that the Crown need not buy land so long as Māori were prepared to lease some for settlers.

As discussed earlier, during his previous term in government Ballance had committed to a policy of large-scale Crown purchasing and, in order to further the Government's land settlement goals, had become far less responsive to Māori demands and far more willing to leverage divisions among the five tribes to encourage them into court. But he nonetheless continued to promise that Māori would benefit from rising land prices on the lands they did not sell. When Ballance returned to office in 1891 as Premier, his stance had hardened further. He had seen his 1886 legislation fail to meet its settlement objectives and began his new term in office determined to take a much more aggressive approach. As we will see, his new government considered that the Crown should control the pace and cost of settlement, and should use profits from Crown purchases of Māori land to fund the railway.<sup>197</sup>

In the Government's view, Māori were positively obliged to make land available for settlement in the interests of the colony's economic development. As Richard Boast wrote in 2008, 'All politicians, save the four Maori members of Parliament, agreed that Maori had far more land than they needed and that the decent and progressive thing for them to do was to part with most of it.'<sup>198</sup> Underlying this view was a cultural assumption that people who did not use the land (that is, farm it using European methods) had little or no moral right to it. The Liberals opposed large-scale landholding, instead favouring 'close settlement', in which rural areas

195. In August 1890, while the Taorua parent block (from which Waiaraia and several other blocks were subdivided) was still before the court, the Whanganui rangatira Paiaka Te Pīkikōtuku wrote to Wilkinson offering to sell land there. Paiaka subsequently offered to sell land at Umukaimata, north of Waiaraia, also while it remained before the court. The block was subsequently awarded to hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto: doc A67, pp 395–396, 401; doc A60, pp 1149–1159; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 220–223, 228–232.

196. Document A78, pp 1247–1249.

197. Document A68, pp 101, 109, 119. Also see Ward, A Show of Justice, p 304; Richard Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land: Governments and Maori Land in the North Island 1865–1921 (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 2008), ch 3.

198. Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land, p 124 would be farmed by numerous smallholders. The view that land rights were contingent on close settlement ran directly counter to Treaty guarantees and to the English common law concept of customary title.<sup>199</sup>

The new Government was formed on 24 January. A week later, Wahanui wrote with an offer to sell 10,000 acres in the Waiaraia and Taorua blocks. The offer was addressed to the Native Minister, but it appeared to be intended for Ballance. Wahanui wrote that the Government had been saying he was delaying land sales, but that could not be true – he was offering land for sale and was doing so because the Minister had been a friend during his previous term of office. Here, Wahanui was reminding the Government of the promises made at Kihikihi: that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would control their own lands, and would be able to sell or lease in a free market.<sup>200</sup>

The land Wahanui offered lay outside the northern target area, which meant the Crown had no purchasing budget and could not therefore make any immediate offer. But Crown officials nonetheless regarded Wahanui's gesture as an important opportunity to break the general resistance to land sales.<sup>201</sup> Wilkinson advised that Māori continued to sell only as individuals and 'as secretly as possible'. The Waiaraia purchase was important, he said, to take away the 'shame or dread of being known as land sellers'. Turning it down, on the other hand, would make the Crown seem as if it did not really want to settle the district.<sup>202</sup> The Government agreed. Money was found from the public works budget, and Wilkinson was given approval to negotiate.<sup>203</sup> The surveyor-general had valued the land at 3s 6d per acre, and that was what Wahanui sought; the Crown resolved to pay no more than 2s 6d.<sup>204</sup>

11.3.3.6 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori appeal for the restrictions to be lifted

In April, before any negotiations over Waiaraia were concluded, Cadman visited the district to discuss the Crown's land purchasing objectives. He met representatives of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Tuwharetoa

199. The Liberals' land policies have been discussed in many publications. See: Tom Brooking, "Busting Up" the Greatest Estate of All: Liberal Maori Land Policy, 1891–1911, in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 26, no 1 (1992), pp 78–98; Tom Brooking, 'Use it or Lose it. Unravelling the Land Debate in Late Nineteenth-Century New Zealand', in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 30, no 2 (1996), pp 141–162; Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land, chs 3–4; Ward, A Show of Justice, p 304; Tom Brooking, Richard Seddon: King of God's Own: The Life and Times of New Zealand's Longest-serving Prime Minister (Auckland: Penguin Books, 2014), ch 9.

200. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 253–258; doc A67, pp 392–401.

201. Document A67, pp 392–399; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 253–290, vol 2, pp 371–374; doc A55, pp 107–109, 111.

202. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 27 February 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 371–374).

203. Document A67, p 399; doc A55, pp 107–109, 111.

204. Document A55, pp 109–110; doc A67, p 399; doc A79, p 228.

at Ōtorohanga.<sup>205</sup> During this meeting, Ormsby, according to a newspaper report, ‘strongly urged the removal of all restrictions’ on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land that had passed through the court. This, the report pointed out, ‘means the Government’s withdrawal from pre-emptive right to purchase, and practical reversion to free trade’. Other leaders present were reported to have ‘entirely’ endorsed Ormsby’s views on this point.<sup>206</sup> As discussed in section 11.3.2(4), Ormsby had in April 1888 urged the removal of all restrictions, including those on sale – his principal concern by this time was that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori be able to sell or lease to the highest bidder.

Wahanui also wanted the Crown’s exclusive purchasing right removed:

He did not object to protection [of the] native interest, but the horse was his, also the rope, and he wanted to tie the horse himself. If he tied the horse himself with his own rope he would know how to untie him.<sup>207</sup>

Cadman, in response, was unwilling to remove the Crown’s exclusive purchasing rights. From his point of view, their purpose was not to protect Māori land interests, but to protect the Crown’s fiscal position. As he explained, it was Crown spending on public works that made Te Rohe Pōtae lands valuable, and it was unfair for ‘favoured individuals’ (that is, Māori landowners) to profit when the interest on public works debt ‘was paid by all’. He did, however, make a general commitment that the existing laws would be repealed and ‘a new start’ made.<sup>208</sup>

Soon afterwards, to the 1891 Native Land Laws Commission, Ngāti Maniapoto leaders again expressed their opposition to the Crown’s exclusive purchasing right. Pepene Eketone told the commission:

The evil in that law is this: that the Government will not allow the Natives to lease or sell or deal with land with private parties. The Government assume the absolute control of those lands. The evil to the Natives in that is that the Government will offer but small sums of money for that land. The Government will not allow private individuals to lease any portion of that land.<sup>209</sup>

Whitinui Hohepa said the restrictions should be lifted so that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could lease land in a competitive market. ‘To a man like myself, who does

---

205. Document A68, pp108–109.

206. ‘The Native Minister at Ōtorohanga’, New Zealand Herald, 2 April 1891, p 5.

207. ‘The Native Minister at Ōtorohanga’, New Zealand Herald, 4 April 1891, p 5; doc A68, pp108–110; doc A67, p 261. Those present, according to the report, included Wahanui, Taonui, Te Kanawa, Te Aroa, and Te Naunau of Ngāti Maniapoto; Hone Kaore Ta[?]nua of Ngāti Hikairo; Hitiri Te Paerata, Hauraki Hapapa, and Kerekeha of Ngāti Raukawa; and Te Heuheu of Ngāti Tūwharetoa.

208. ‘The Native Minister at Ōtorohanga’, New Zealand Herald, 3 April 1891 (doc A68, pp109–110).

209. ‘Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws: Minutes of Meetings with Natives and Others’, 24 March 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p 3 (doc A68, p 112).

not sell,' he said, 'it is simply a waste of time attending the Court, for no benefit results.' To further clarify his position, Whitinui said that Ngāti Maniapoto would not have objected to restrictions that prevented selling but allowed leasing in an open market; their concern was 'that we cannot lease or sell, except we sell to the Government.'<sup>210</sup>

Taonui told the commission that Ngāti Maniapoto 'wish the restrictions removed from that land,' as Māori could not manage their land as they wished while the restrictions were in place.

Should the restrictions be taken off, I am not one who is in favour of land-selling, but I am in favour of leasing the land. If the restrictions of the Government are removed, I should be in favour of leasing; but I ought to have in my own hands the making of the arrangements with respect to the leasing of my land . . .<sup>211</sup>

Taonui also argued that, if individuals were to be allowed to sell land, 'the hapu or the tribe should consent.'<sup>212</sup> Once again, the clearly expressed wish was for communal control, coupled with the right to lease in a free market.

Henry Edwards told the commission that individual ownership was 'a rather new thing to us.' His tentative position was that, if an individual wanted to sell land, he should be allowed to, but the principal owners of a land block should determine where his estate lay. In general, however: 'With regard to individual or collective sales, our fixed opinion is that we do not approve of them. We have no desire for individual or collective sales.'<sup>213</sup>

The commission, in turn, reported that Māori throughout the country were unanimous in their desire for laws that allowed them to determine land titles among themselves; in their opposition to individuals having any rights to deal in hapū and tribal lands; in their opposition to selling in general; and in their desire for hapū and iwi to be able to lease their lands.<sup>214</sup>

11.3.3.7 Limited purchasing, 1891

The Crown did not respond to these requests by removing restrictions, but rather by increasing pressure on Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to make land available for sale. As Cadman left the district, Wilkinson resumed negotiations over the Waiaraia

210. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws: Minutes of Meetings with Natives and Others,' 15 April 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p 34; doc A79, p 479; doc A67, p 269.

211. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws: Minutes of Meetings with Natives and Others,' 15 April 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p 31 (doc A68, pp 112–113).

212. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws: Minutes of Meetings with Natives and Others,' 15 April 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p 31 (doc A53, vol 2, p 1466).

213. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws: Minutes of Meetings with Natives and Others,' 15 April 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, pp 32–33 (doc A67, p 268).

214. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of Native Land Laws,' AJHR, 1891, G-1, p xix.

purchase. Rather than accepting the 10,000 ‘or more’ acres Wahanui had offered, Wilkinson pressured him and other leaders to also offer the entire 12,360-acre Waiaraia block, along with all of Taorua (10,500 acres) and several other southern blocks.<sup>215</sup> Wilkinson noted in his report to the Native Department that this accorded with his instructions. But he said that Wahanui ‘seemed rather astonished’ at this proposal, which he said would leave some owners with nowhere to live.<sup>216</sup> Nonetheless, Wilkinson pressed Wahanui to accept, and said that if he did not the Crown would reject the offer outright, and leave the owners with outstanding survey liens.<sup>217</sup> Wahanui said he could offer some Taurangi land and parts of the Ratatomokia block, but no more.<sup>218</sup>

In his annual report to the House of Representatives, Wilkinson indicated that some progress was being made, with a little over 10,000 acres acquired and negotiations under way for a further 30,000 acres, much of it in these southern blocks. Nonetheless, progress was still slow, not only because most landowners remained reluctant to sell, but also because of incomplete titles and surveys.<sup>219</sup> One of the reasons for incomplete titles was that owners had continued to delay court processes where they could – and, in particular, some had delayed the naming of owners, or the definition of individual owners’ relative interests, in order to prevent purchasing.<sup>220</sup> The court, in turn, had not pressed this issue, tending to respect the owners’ wishes. As discussed in chapter 10, Wilkinson complained to the Native Minister, and the department then pressed the court to speed up the process of naming owners and defining their relative interests, which the chief judge committed to doing.<sup>221</sup> Wilkinson also proposed that the Crown begin to call in survey liens. This, he wrote to Lewis in June 1891, would be ‘very likely’ to cause owners to sell part or all of the blocks under lien or to sell other blocks in order to pay the costs.<sup>222</sup> The Native Department, following the Minister’s instructions, also took immediate steps to follow this recommendation, beginning with a schedule of surveys completed and money owed.<sup>223</sup>

By August, Wilkinson had completed the negotiation for the Waiaraia block,<sup>224</sup> with an estimated area of 12,360 acres.<sup>225</sup> Over the next few months, he continued to press for further sales, both from tribal leaders selling land to cover survey costs

---

215. Document A67, pp 400–401; doc A60, p1080.

216. Wilkinson to Lewis, ‘Re proposed purchase of Taorua sub divisions and Waiaraia block’, 10 April 1891 (doc A67, p 400).

217. Document A67, pp 401, 442; doc A55, p109.

218. Document A67, pp 401, 442; doc A55, p109.

219. ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts’, AJHR, 1891, G–5, p 4.

220. Document A67, pp 234–242, 259.

221. Document A79, p 219.

222. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 23 June 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 311; doc A67, p 232).

223. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 308–311.

224. Document A60, p 1157.

225. This was a slight underestimate. The GIS area of the block was 12,532 acres: doc A67, p 393; doc A21, p 131.

and from individuals. The Government continued to increase pressure on Te Rohe Pōtae leaders.

While Wilkinson was negotiating in Te Rohe Pōtae, the Government was settling its policy towards Māori land. Under Cadman's watch, the Government was willing to continue free trade in most of the country, but with two caveats. First, it wanted land laws amended so that no individual could buy large tracts of land. Secondly, it did not want any private trade until three months after title was determined. These measures, it reasoned, would provide for a functioning land market that served its close settlement policy, while also protecting Māori and the Crown from aggressive or speculative purchasing activity.<sup>226</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae, however, was to remain a special case. In September, Cadman took steps to secure the Crown's purchasing position by introducing legislation to keep the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act 1886 Amendment Act 1889 in force for an additional year. This meant that the restrictions would now expire on 1 January 1893.<sup>227</sup> Māori members of the House of Representatives opposed the measure on the grounds that Ngāti Maniapoto wished to lease their lands and were being prevented from developing land and joining the modern economy.<sup>228</sup> The member for Western Maori, Hoani Taipua, described the Bill as 'A Bill to steal the Natives' Land from them.'<sup>229</sup> Cadman's response was that the Crown was doing Māori 'a very good turn', since Māori land was 'utterly valueless' until it could be settled, at which point it would increase in value by '400 or 500 per cent.'<sup>230</sup> His one compromise was to shorten the period the restrictions would apply for. His original intention was to keep them in place for two more years, until 1 January 1894, but he settled on a one-year extension.<sup>231</sup>

11.3.3.8 Cadman and Ballance raise the threat of compulsory purchasing

Late in 1891, the Crown reopened negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. By this time, almost all of the western half of the 1886 Rohe Potae block had been subdivided, and most of the ownership lists had been completed, though relative interests had not yet been defined for most blocks.<sup>232</sup> Most Te Rohe Pōtae Māori remained reluctant to sell, and the Crown's acquisitions were limited to blocks that hapū sold to pay off survey debts and the fairly small amounts it had been able to acquire from individuals.<sup>233</sup> Construction of the railway remained at a halt,<sup>234</sup> with 226. Document A68, pp 120–121. In July 1891, the Government introduced a Bill to Parliament to enact these measures, but it did not pass.

227. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Amendment Act 1891, s2; doc A68, pp 120–121.

228. Document A68, pp 122–125.

229. 'North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Bill', 18 September 1891, NZPD, vol 74, p 771 (doc A68, p 122).

230. 'North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Bill', 18 September 1891, NZPD, vol 74, p 774 (doc A68, p 125).

231. Document A68, pp 122, 125.

232. Document A79, pp 219–220, 283–284; also see doc A60, pp 87–89; doc A67, pp 234–242.

233. Document A67, pp 221–230; doc A68, pp 202–203; doc A21, p 131, tbl B5.

234. Document A20, p 116.

the Ballance Government continuing its predecessor's policy of not completing the line until sufficient land had been obtained.<sup>235</sup>

In December, as Cadman was due to go to Ōtorohanga for a meeting with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, more than 1,000 people attended a hui at Te Kumi (Te Kūiti), where they expressed their displeasure at the Crown's actions 'in first inducing them to put their lands through the Court, and afterwards refusing to allow them to deal with their property as they liked, and only allowing them to sell to the Government at the price the Government chose to pay'.<sup>236</sup> The meeting reportedly resolved to boycott the court, oppose all surveys, and place their lands under Tāwhiao's authority.<sup>237</sup>

Cadman arrived at Ōtorohanga on 18 December and met Wahanui, Taonui, Ormsby, and other Ngāti Maniapoto leaders the following day, making it clear that the Crown would not be content to limit itself to blocks in the south of the district. Newspapers did not record whether Cadman was told the results of the Te Kūiti hui. Wahanui opened the hui, asking that Cadman inform those gathered about the Government's intentions, particularly with respect to laws 'which press heavily on the people'. Cadman observed that Te Rohe Pōtae appeared to have a healthy economy, with sawmills, stores, and other businesses operating in apparent violation of the restrictions. He said that Europeans objected to their money being spent on public works such as roads and railways on Māori land, and also objected to competing with Māori producers whose lands were untaxed.<sup>238</sup>

These settler 'grievances' had to be addressed, he said, which meant that 'land must be made to contribute towards the interest and cost' of the railway. The solution, he argued, was for Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to 'hand to the Government' sufficient land for settlement purposes. Restrictions could then be removed on remaining land that had passed through the court, subject to reasonable limits on the amount of land that any individual settler could buy.<sup>239</sup> If Māori did not agree to his proposals, Cadman said, consequences were 'inevitable'. First, Parliament would legislate to impose property taxes on unimproved land owned by both Māori and Europeans, thereby forcing the owners to bring the land into production. Secondly, the Government would act to close down businesses that had been established in the district, including sawmilling and other arrangements that made use of Māori land.<sup>240</sup>

Very soon afterwards, Ballance gave an interview in which he made the same threats: if Te Rohe Pōtae Māori did not make land available, the restrictions would

235. Document A68, p153.

236. 'The Ngatimaniapoto Lands – The Ngatimaniapoto return to Tawhiao', New Zealand Herald, 19 December 1891 (doc A68, p129).

237. Document A68, p129.

238. 'The King Country: Mr Cadman and the Natives: An Important Proposal', New Zealand Herald, 21 December 1891, p5 (doc A68, pp127–128, 131–134).

239. 'The King Country: Mr Cadman and the Natives: An Important Proposal', New Zealand Herald, 21 December 1891, p5 (doc A68, pp131–134).

240. 'The King Country: Mr Cadman and the Natives: An Important Proposal', New Zealand Herald, 21 December 1891, p5 (doc A68, pp131–134).

continue and their lands would be taxed. 'It will not be permitted,' Ballance told the New Zealand Herald, 'that the natives should continue to hold the keys of the country, and block settlement – waiting till their lands were enhanced enormously in value by the labour and the exertions of the colonists.' The Government, he continued, 'would see that the rights of the public in these lands in the King Country were duly conserved.'<sup>241</sup> This was not the bargain Ballance had put to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at Kihikihi: that had included free trade, a considerable degree of communal control over Māori land, and the right to profit from rising prices.

Two days later, the Herald carried another report of Cadman's meeting, recording that he had made it 'unmistakably clear' that land adjacent to the railway 'must . . . be handed over for settlement' and 'must also be made to contribute towards the taxation of the country'. If the district's Māori could not agree, they would be forced to comply by legislation. This, Cadman said, was what the European population wanted and 'was determined to force the Government to do'. Māori, he said, should 'accept the inevitable.'<sup>242</sup> It is worth reiterating that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not asked for the railway. As Wahanui had said in his 1885 appearance before the House's Native Affairs Committee: 'If the railway is being made for the benefit of the Maoris, then, I say, it is better to stop it.'<sup>243</sup>

After the December 1891 meeting with Cadman, Wahanui and Taonui responded to the Crown's proposals by offering to sell land for settlement: (i) if the price was determined by arbitration; (ii) if all restrictions were removed from land the Crown did not purchase, allowing Māori to sell to the highest bidder if they chose to; (iii) if all restrictions on leasing were removed; and (iv) if Native Land Court processes were made simpler and less expensive.<sup>244</sup>

There was no immediate agreement, however, and Cadman returned to Ōtorohanga in May 1892 to continue negotiations.<sup>245</sup> There, he met Wahanui, Henry Edwards, possibly Taonui, and also some other Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa leaders.<sup>246</sup> The meeting, according to one report, was 'not largely attended', with about 100 people present.<sup>247</sup> At that meeting, the Crown's bottom line remained that land must be made available for settlement, in order that it contribute to the tax base and the cost of the railway. Cadman appeared to accept most of what Wahanui and Taonui had proposed, with two caveats: first, the restrictions on leasing would not be removed until the Crown had purchased the land it wanted; and, second, before any agreement could be reached, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders would be required to identify the lands they would sell.<sup>248</sup>

241. 'Native Land Proposals. – Interview with the Premier', New Zealand Herald, 21 December 1891 (doc A68, pp 133–134).

242. 'The Opening of the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 23 December 1891 (doc A68, p 133).

243. Native Affairs Committee, 'Report on the Native Land Disposition Bill, Together with Minutes of Evidence and Appendix', 9 September 1885, AJHR, 1885, I-2b, p 8; doc A78, pp 1174–1175.

244. Document A68, p 137. Also see pp 134–135.

245. Document A68, pp 134–135, 137, 141.

246. Document A68, p 141 n

247. 'Native Meeting at Otorohanga', New Zealand Herald, 4 May 1892; doc A68, p 141.

248. Document A68, pp 141–142.

The Te Rohe Pōtae leaders responded with two caveats of their own. First, they continued to press for the removal of all restrictions on leasing. Secondly, they pointed out that they no longer had power to alienate particular blocks of land, 'as the owners were so numerous, and interests so diversified'. The best they could do was to 'assist' the Crown to buy individual shares.<sup>249</sup> As the Crown's purchasing officer, Wilkinson, put it, they promised to 'use their influence' to persuade others to sell, and to 'do away with the stigma and public condemnation' that inevitably befell those who did sell their shares.<sup>250</sup>

At that point, negotiations broke down. Cadman flatly refused to allow private leasing, and furthermore made it clear that the Crown's proposal had to be taken as a whole – it could not be negotiated part by part.<sup>251</sup> He warned that, if the Te Rohe Pōtae leaders did not agree to the Crown's proposals, 'the question of taking their lands would have to be faced'.<sup>252</sup> In other words, compulsory acquisition was now potentially on the table.

In evidence to this inquiry, the historian Donald Loveridge expressed the view that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had made a realistic and practical proposal, and that Cadman's refusal to accept it was neither: he was asking Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to guarantee the sale of lands they did not own. He was threatening confiscation unless they met an impossible condition.<sup>253</sup>

In respect of the statements by Cadman and Ballance during these 1891–92 negotiations, the Crown conceded:

The Crown considers that these statements amounted to aggressive tactics that placed undue pressure on those negotiations. The statements left Rohe Pōtae Māori in no doubt as to the Crown's determination to put the main trunk railway through the Rohe Pōtae district. However, the Crown acknowledges the option of possible compulsion may have remained an element in Rohe Pōtae Māori decision-making. The Crown has conceded that this was a factor in the Crown's land purchase negotiations breaching the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.<sup>254</sup>

11.3.3.9 The impact of Ministers' threats

The threats appear to have had the desired effect. From early 1892, sales of land blocks and individual shares began to increase, albeit from a very low base. Wilkinson, in his annual report to the House of Representatives in June, wrote that he had acquired a total of 52,000 acres. Of that, just under half was in 'sale' blocks offered by tribal leaders to cover survey costs, and the rest was in individual shares which had not yet been partitioned out. Of the 'sale' blocks, it was common for tribal leaders to arrange that only a small number of people were named

---

249. 'The Native Meeting at Otorohanga – The Reply of the Maoris', New Zealand Herald, 5 May 1892 (doc A68, p 142).

250. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, p 5 (doc A68, p 143).

251. Document A68, pp 142–143.

252. 'Interesting Native Meeting', Poverty Bay Herald, 4 May 1892 (doc A68, p 142).

253. Document A68, p 145.

254. Submission 3.4.307, p 1.

on the title, in order to facilitate sale; this was done at Wilkinson's suggestion.<sup>255</sup> Wilkinson also referred to various obstacles which prevented further purchasing. These included continued delays in completing surveys, awarding titles, and defining relative interests, some of which were caused by officials' errors. Nonetheless, the threats had had their intended effect. Indeed, Wilkinson reported:

Since the last meeting that the Hon. Mr Cadman had with the Natives here there has been a decided impetus given to land-purchase proceedings in the King-country, and I have every reason to believe that it will increase; and that, although it may be, for a time, of an intermittent nature, I am of opinion that we have now 'turned the corner', and that, so far as the Natives are concerned, the worst of our difficulties have been overcome.<sup>256</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders certainly recognised the gravity of the threat, and, according to Wilkinson, were willing to make some concessions. He reported that considerably more land might have been acquired up to that point if the Crown had not 'almost entirely destroyed' rangatira influence by individualising land titles.<sup>257</sup> The district's leaders presumably hoped that if some land could be made available, Cadman would honour his commitment – and that of previous Native Ministers – to lift the restrictions and allow them to develop their land.

The restrictions were having an undoubted effect on their economic fortunes. Where it could, the Crown had enforced the restrictions and warned off Europeans who sought to enter economic arrangements with Māori.<sup>258</sup> It was not always successful. It could shut down land leases but not grazing arrangements.<sup>259</sup> Nor could it close sawmilling operations, so long as they applied to the timber and not the land.<sup>260</sup> These loopholes created limited and isolated opportunities for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to obtain some cash from their land. But, without access to capital from leasing or mortgage, both of which were prohibited, Māori landowners could not develop their own lands, and nor could they take shares in the businesses that exploited their resources.<sup>261</sup> Timber production continued to grow during the 1890s,<sup>262</sup> but horticulture was already declining by the late 1880s, and sheep farming by Māori landowners reached its peak in 1892; thereafter, the industry was gradually transferred into European hands.<sup>263</sup> One of the effects was that most Māori landowners had no way to pay survey liens except through sale of land.<sup>264</sup>

---

255. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, pp 5-6.

256. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, p 6.

257. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, p 5.

258. Document A67, pp 303-315, 317-350 (especially pp 317, 324); doc A146, pp 126-129; doc A55, p 91. Also see doc s21(b) (Jensen), pp 31-32.

259. Document A67, pp 309-310, 324; doc A55, p 91.

260. Document A146, pp 229-232. Also see doc A67, pp 311-314.

261. Document A67, pp 254, 279, 306, 310; doc A146, pp 177, 186, 337, 363-364.

262. Document A25 (Clever), pp 38-44; doc A146, pp 229-236.

263. Document A79, pp 512-514; doc A67, p 229.

264. Document A67, pp 306, 428.

Crown officials were perfectly open about the intended effects: they did not want competition that would raise land prices and prevent the Crown from acquiring the land it wanted. As Lewis had told Wilkinson before purchasing began, competition from private lessees would ‘much hamper our land purchase operations and tend to increase price beyond what is reasonable.’<sup>265</sup> As Wilkinson’s report indicated, the combination of Ministerial threats and economic pressure were, by mid-1892, having the effect desired by the Crown. Māori, in need of cash, were beginning to sell. To use Lewis’s metaphor, the ice was beginning to break.<sup>266</sup>

11.3.3.10 Further restrictions and increased funds for purchasing, 1892–93

Sensing that a decisive breakthrough was close, the Crown continued to increase the pressure on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners. On the ground, its principal means of securing sales were survey liens and the targeting of individual owners, including absentees and others with little relationship to the land. Wilkinson was beginning to acquire individual shares in greater quantities, though he did not yet have enough in most blocks to justify applications to partition out the Crown’s interests. His purchasing ambitions were assisted by the Native Land Court, which from mid-1892 turned its attention from subdividing the Aotea-Rohe Potae block to defining owners’ relative interests, allowing Wilkinson to target individual owners with confidence that he was paying what he considered to be the right price; between July and the end of October, the court defined relative interests in more than 100 blocks.<sup>267</sup>

The success of the purchasing programme continued to depend on Māori landowners not having other sources of ready income – which meant that restrictions had to remain in force. The 1888–91 restrictions which covered the entire Aotea-Rohe Potae block had expired on 1 January 1892. The 1890–92 restrictions remained in force, but (within this district) covered only the ‘northern target area’ – the fertile Waipā Valley plains in the north of the district, and were due to expire at the end of the year. The Government addressed this by introducing new legislation, which would not only extend the restrictions for a further period, but also greatly expand the area covered.

The North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892 was introduced to the House in August of that year,<sup>268</sup> and came into effect on 11 October. Its restriction zone included all of this district with the exception of – in Boulton’s words – ‘a slice . . . west of a line from Pirongia to the northern tip of the Mokau Mohakatino block.’<sup>269</sup> The Crown had already purchased some parts of the excluded area prior to 1865, including the Mokau, Awakino, Taumatamaire,

---

265. Lewis to Wilkinson, 14 October 1889 (doc A67, p324). Also see doc A55, p91. Where private competition existed, it did tend to drive up prices, leaving the Crown unwilling to buy. For example, see doc A146, pp 229–230.

266. Document A55, p111.

267. Document A79, pp 238–239.

268. Document A68, p149.

269. Document A67, pp 146, 300.

and Rauroa blocks.<sup>270</sup> The Act provided for the restrictions to remain in place until 1 January 1894.<sup>271</sup> In the House, many members – Māori and European – questioned the need for restrictions over such a large area, and the Western Maori member Hoani Taipua argued that these new restrictions were ‘tantamount to confiscation.’<sup>272</sup>

According to Cadman, the restriction area was being expanded both to accelerate the Crown’s land purchasing, and to ensure that it got the best land. He told the House that the land close to the railway line was of ‘inferior’ quality and the expanded restriction zone would give the Crown ‘an opportunity of getting good land as an endowment for this line.’<sup>273</sup>

The measure appeared to signal the end of any serious attempt by the Crown to negotiate with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders collectively over the district’s settlement or to offer any kind of bargain in which the restrictions might be lifted. It appears that the Crown now believed that its purchasing goals could be accomplished without further engagement – and so long as its purchasing goals were achieved there was nothing left to talk about. In August, at a meeting in Wellington called by Cadman, a ‘large number of chiefs’ from different parts of the country passed resolutions opposing Cadman’s proposal to extend the restrictions<sup>274</sup> and ‘urging that the Maoris should have full control over their own land’ and that the court be abolished. The Crown disregarded these protests and passed the measure nonetheless.<sup>275</sup>

The Native Land Purchases Act 1892 also came into effect on 8 October. Its short title described it as an Act ‘for facilitating the Acquisition of [Māori] Lands by or on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen.’ It authorised the Government to borrow up to £50,000 each year (or more if appropriated by Parliament) for that purpose.<sup>276</sup> The Act also allowed the Government to make proclamations unilaterally granting itself exclusive purchasing rights over any block of Māori land it was negotiating to purchase. Such proclamations would remain in effect for a maximum of two

270. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

271. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892, ss 2, 3, sch.

272. ‘North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892’, 24 August 1892, NZPD, vol 77, pp 344, 346; doc A68, pp 149–150; doc A67, p 148.

273. ‘North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Bill’, 24 August 1892, NZPD, vol 77, p 358. Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell (doc A21, p 131) listed 310.5 acres as having been purchased in 1889: Kahakaharoa A, and Hauturu East 1A1, 1A2, and 1A3. However, Parker (doc A95(i)) and Berghan (doc A60, p 144) both recorded the Crown purchasing these blocks a decade later in 1899. Wilkinson recorded that his first purchases did not occur until 1890 (doc A67, p 222). The 1899 figures have been adjusted accordingly.

274. North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Acts Amendment Act 1892, ss 2, 3, sch.

275. ‘The Views of the Maori – Meeting of Native Minister and Leading Chiefs’, Poverty Bay Herald, 3 August 1892; doc A68, p 155 n

276. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s 3.

years, unless withdrawn earlier.<sup>277</sup> These were used extensively in Te Rohe Pōtae during 1893 and 1894, as we will see below.<sup>278</sup>

Soon afterwards, the Government abolished the Native Department, which – in spite of its principal role as a land purchasing agency – was regarded by settlers as hampering settlement. Responsibility for purchasing of Māori land was instead given to the Department of Lands and Survey.<sup>279</sup> As Loveridge explained to this inquiry, by the end of 1892 ‘there was little reason for anyone to think that Ballance’s Government had any intentions for the King Country other than an accelerated programme of purchasing under the impenetrable shield of pre-emption.’<sup>280</sup>

11.3.4 The Crown grants itself exclusive purchasing rights nationwide

11.3.4.1 Purchasing accelerates during 1893

Despite the abolition of the Native Department, George Wilkinson continued in his role as land purchase officer for the district. By the end of March 1893, he was beginning to experience some success. Returns of land purchasing for that year show that Wilkinson and other purchase officers had completed purchases in just seven blocks, with areas acquired ranging from a single acre to just over 400 acres. He had acquired individual shares in another 26 blocks, with areas ranging from almost 30,000 acres in the Wharepuhunga block to two acres in Puketarata 14.<sup>281</sup>

Ballance died in April 1893, and was replaced as premier by Richard Seddon. Seddon regarded the settlement of ‘unoccupied’ Māori lands as one of the most important issues facing the country. He took on the Native Affairs portfolio himself.<sup>282</sup> His Government’s first attempt to resolve this issue came in the form of the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act 1893. The Act’s preamble left no doubt about the Government’s intentions: it said that millions of acres of Māori land were ‘lying waste and unproductive’, slowing the progress of colonisation and causing ‘great injury’ to the colony and its settlers.<sup>283</sup> In the House, the Minister of 277. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s16; submission 3.4.119, pp 7, 35; submission 3.4.307, pp 15–16; doc A68, pp 151–152, 197.

278. These were restrictions applied by proclamation under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892: ‘Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty’, 7 March 1893, New Zealand Gazette, no 17, p 304; ‘Negotiations for acquiring Native Lands entered into by Her Majesty’, 2 January 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 4, p 57; ‘Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty’, 9 February 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 12, pp 265–266; ‘Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty’, 12 March 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 23, p 457; ‘Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty’, 6 September 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 67, pp 1422–1423; ‘Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty’, 1 October 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 72, p 1511.

279. Ward, A Show of Justice, p 302; Brooking, “‘Busting Up” the Greatest Estate of All”, p 84.

280. Document A68, p 153.

281. ‘Lands Purchased and Leased from Natives in North Island: to 31st March 1893’, AJHR, 1893, G–4, pp 2, 4–5.

282. Document A68, p 179.

283. Document A68, p 169 n

Lands, John McKenzie, referred to Māori land 'lying idle, useless to the Europeans, and yielding nothing to the Natives themselves'.<sup>284</sup>

The Act provided for a form of compulsory negotiation over Māori land, though it stopped short of compulsory acquisition. It allowed the Crown to select areas of land it wanted for settlement and require Māori landowners to vote on whether to sell to the Crown or lease under Crown management, or refuse either option. A simple majority could decide to sell or lease, irrespective of the wishes of remaining owners. If the owners refused to sell to the Crown or lease under Crown management, the Act provided no mechanism by which they could lawfully deal with their land. The Act did make one concession to Māori land rights by providing for owners and the Crown to jointly appoint valuers who would determine any purchase price.<sup>285</sup>

Almost as soon as the Act was passed, the Government turned its attention to the forthcoming election. By this time many politicians and settler newspapers were pressing for compulsory acquisition of Māori land, and the Government soon adopted a new policy, as we will see below. As a result, the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act was never applied in Te Rohe Pōtae or elsewhere.<sup>286</sup>

In spite of the Government's concerns, it is clear that by 1893 the Crown's tactics were working. As Wilkinson had explained in 1890, each element of the Crown's purchasing tactics was important. The individual, geographically undefined shares awarded by the Native Land Court had undermined traditional relationships and made it very difficult for Māori landowners to manage their lands, either individually or collectively, since no individual had his or her own plot of land, but collective effort required agreement among tens or even hundreds of individual owners.<sup>287</sup> The restrictions further impeded landowners' attempts to develop land and made it almost impossible for them to raise capital. Survey liens then created the 'want of money' that Wilkinson saw as a necessary precondition to sale.<sup>288</sup> Wilkinson was then able to negotiate with the few hapū leaders who were willing to voluntarily sell land to repay survey debts,<sup>289</sup> while also targeting vulnerable individuals and persuading them to sell their shares.

In some land blocks, Wilkinson was ready by 1893 to start applying to the court for partition of the Crown's interests. In all, the Crown was awarded title to just over 27,000 acres of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land during the 1893 calendar year.<sup>290</sup> Purchasing of individual shares was continuing. The annual return of Māori land purchases for the year to 31 March 1894 shows Wilkinson acquiring shares in more

---

284. 'Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Bill', NZPD, 31 August 1893, vol 81, p 512 (doc A68, pp 171–172).

285. Document A68, pp 169–173, 175–176, 186; doc A67, pp 151–153. Also see Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act 1893, ss 4, 5–9, 26, 35.

286. Document A68, pp 179–186.

287. Document A79, pp 241–242.

288. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 4; doc A67, p 228; doc A55, p 47.

289. Document A67, pp 221–231, 384–386, 392, 405–407; doc A20, p 92; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

290. Document A21, p 131, tbl B5.

than 50 subdivisions. The vast majority of these purchases amounted to just a few hundred acres, but each gave the Crown a foothold which could be used to leverage further sales.<sup>291</sup> As Husbands and Mitchell described it, Wilkinson ‘criss-crossed’ the district, acquiring signatures ‘in ones or twos’, until gradually, over months or even years, he had acquired enough shares to justify an application to the court to partition out the Crown’s interests.<sup>292</sup> That was the final stage in acquisition, and it explains the sudden major lift in Crown purchasing in the district during 1894, as we will discuss below.

11.3.4.2 Seddon raises the prospect of compulsory purchasing

In November 1893, a general election was held. During the campaign, Seddon and other Ministers emphasised the Government’s intention to satisfy settler demand for land, both by purchasing more from Māori and by breaking up the large South Island estates. Opposition parties were generally supportive of these goals, and the Liberals won the election comfortably.<sup>293</sup> During the election, Seddon argued that the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act 1893 would solve the problem of Māori land settlement, but early in 1894 – as he faced considerable pressure from settlers and settler media – he began to speak openly about the possibility of acquiring Māori land by compulsion.<sup>294</sup>

By that time the Liberal Government was already making plans to grant itself power to purchase large South Island estates by compulsion. Seddon told reporters he would tour Te Rohe Pōtae and other areas where Māori retained significant amounts of land and attempt to persuade them to sell or lease land using the provisions of the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act 1893.<sup>295</sup> Seddon was reported as saying that if he found Māori ‘inaccessible to reason’ he would explain that European landowners would soon be required to compulsorily give up land for settlement ‘and . . . the Maoris cannot complain if by refusing to part with the surplus lands they cannot use they are placed in the position of European land holders.’ Seddon expressed his intention to press his case by meeting with Māori leaders, ‘and if his efforts fail he must perforce be driven to further legislative powers.’<sup>296</sup>

During March and April 1894, Seddon toured the North Island, meeting Māori leaders and seeking to persuade them to offer land for sale.<sup>297</sup> During this tour, Seddon informed an audience of Waikato Māori at Hukanui that there were by then 600,000 settlers in New Zealand, and only 40,000 Māori. Settlers were demanding that land not remain ‘unpeopled’, and it was of no use for Māori to

---

291. ‘Lands Purchased and Leased from Natives in the North Island: to 31st March 1894’, AJHR, 1894, G-3, pp 2-3, 5-6.

292. Document A79, pp 248, 249–250.

293. Document A68, pp 179–180.

294. Document A68, pp 179–180.

295. Document A68, pp 180–182.

296. ‘Maori Lands: Policy of the Government’, Auckland Star, 10 February 1894, p 2; doc A68, p 181. The same report was carried in several other newspapers.

297. Document A68, p 182.

think that things could remain as they were. He likened the settlers to a rising lake and Māori to the banks of that lake. If nothing was done, the banks would inevitably burst and Māori would be swept away.<sup>298</sup> Here, Seddon was signalling to Māori leaders that they had no choice but to offer land for settlement, but he was not specifically threatening to take it through compulsory acquisition. In this district, Seddon met Māori communities at Taumarunui, Mōkau, Te Kūiti, Ōtorohanga, Kihikihi, and Te Awamutu. According to one newspaper account, Seddon told Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that ‘he was determined to have the native country opened’:

It must no more be locked up from settlement than must the large runs of the South, and while recognising their rights to the land, and to a fair price for it, still the time had arrived when they [the Government] could not allow settlement to be retarded, and they must deal with the natives’ land the same as with that of the Europeans.<sup>299</sup>

Again, Seddon did not explicitly threaten to take land by compulsion, but his comment that the Government ‘could not allow’ land to remain closed to settlement suggested as much.<sup>300</sup>

There is no evidence that Seddon gave any serious consideration to concerns raised by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders about land laws. By this time, they had long since given up hope that they would be granted any of the rights sought in their 1883 petition; now, all they wanted was free trade, so owners could make use of their lands as they wished. According to the Ōhaupo-based real estate agent Hungerford Roche, Ormsby and other Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders at Ōtorohanga had asked Seddon to lift the restrictions so Māori landowners would have the same rights as Europeans to sell or lease. Ormsby, Roche said, told Seddon that the railway was ‘of little or no benefit’ to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Instead of increasing the value of their lands, the railway had decreased the value, because the Government compelled Māori to sell only to the Crown at prices that were far below the market value.<sup>301</sup> Roche said that, in order to prevent speculation and monopolistic behaviour, the district’s leaders were happy for limits to be placed on the amount of land any individual could acquire. They were willing to make land available for settlement, but not under the Crown’s system, in which it excluded competition and paid 6 shillings an acre for land that its own valuers regarded as being worth 20 to 50 shillings per acre. If anyone was to blame for the lack of settlement in Te Rohe Pōtae, Roche opined, it was the Crown.<sup>302</sup>

---

298. ‘Mr Seddon and the Natives’, New Zealand Herald, 13 March 1894, p 5. Also see ‘Pakeha and Maori: A Narrative of the Premier’s Trip through the Native Districts of the North Island’, AJHR, 1895, G-1, p 12.

299. ‘The Premier’s Tour’, New Zealand Herald, 14 March 1894, p 5; doc A68, pp 182–183.

300. ‘The Premier’s Tour’, New Zealand Herald, 14 March 1894, p 5; doc A68, pp 182–183. Also see ‘The Premier: His Visit to Waikato’, Waikato Times, 13 March 1894, p 7.

301. ‘The Native Lands in the Waikato’, letter to the editor, New Zealand Herald, 26 March 1894, p 3 (doc A68, p 183).

302. ‘The Native Lands in the Waikato’, letter to the editor, New Zealand Herald, 26 March 1894, p 3 (doc A68, p 183).

11.3.4.3 Selective restrictions and further acceleration in land purchasing, 1894

While Seddon was attempting to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to part with their lands, he also acknowledged that they were already beginning to do so in much larger quantities than previously. He told Pākehā in Te Awamutu that Wilkinson had just acquired a 10,000-acre block and soon hoped to complete the purchase of another 26,000 acres.<sup>303</sup>

Whereas the 1891–93 restrictions had expired, the Crown had continued to protect its purchasing position in the district by selectively applying restrictions on individual blocks, using the mechanisms provided in the Native Land Purchases Act 1892. On 7 March 1893, it had prohibited private alienation of 48 Te Rohe Pōtae subdivisions (as shown in map 11.2), mostly in the Hauturu and Kinohaku blocks. These orders were to last for two years, giving the Crown protection until March 1895.<sup>304</sup> Between January and October 1894, it imposed restrictions on more than 70 other subdivisions or land blocks, thereby prohibiting private dealings in extensive areas of the district's north (including all remaining Māori lands in the Wharepuhunga block and most of the land from Ōtorohanga north to Kakepuku and west to Pirongia) and south (including all of Mohakatino Parininihi 1, and all or most of the Umukaimata, Taurangi, Ratatomokia, Mangakahikatea, Taorua, and Te Karu o te Whenua blocks).<sup>305</sup> According to the Waikato Times, by August 1894 'most of the King Country is now thus proclaimed', and this was essentially true for the entire district other than the Rangitoto and Rangitoto Tuhua blocks for which title determination had not yet been completed.<sup>306</sup>

Up to 1894, most of Wilkinson's purchasing had been in the form of geographically undefined individual shares. Although the Crown had acquired shares, ownership was not formally transferred until Wilkinson applied to the court to have the Crown's interests partitioned out. In 1894, Wilkinson began this process. During March and April 1894, he brought 40 land blocks before the court, where Crown interests were partitioned out.<sup>307</sup> Through a combination of partitioning and ongoing purchase, 1894 became by far the Crown's most successful year for land purchasing. Altogether, it completed the acquisition of 122,640 acres – 6.3 per cent of the district's land area – during the calendar year.<sup>308</sup>

---

303. 'The Premier: His Visit to Waikato', Waikato Times, 13 March 1894, p 7; doc A68, pp 182–183.

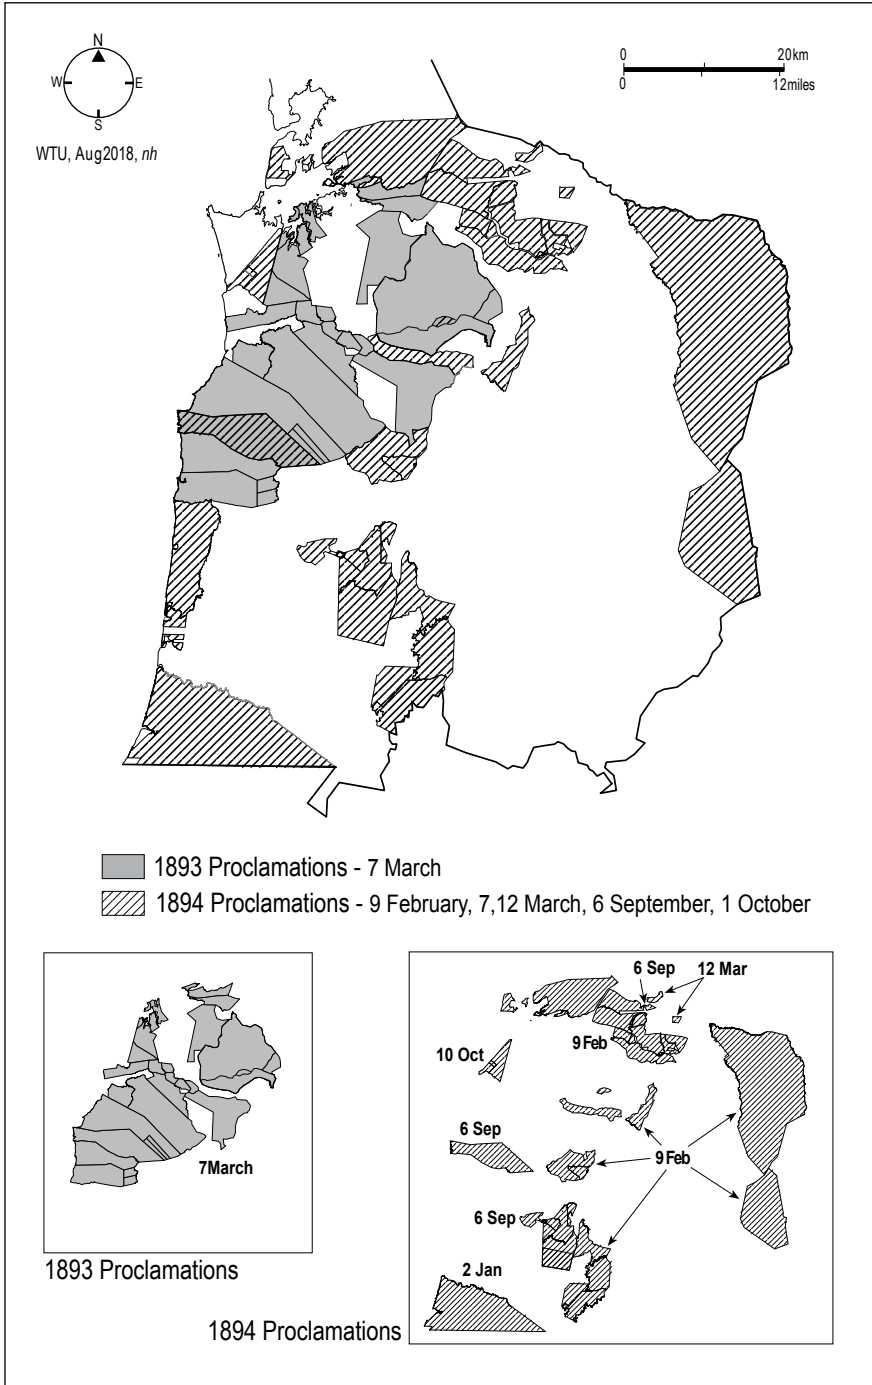

304. 'Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty', 7 March 1893, New Zealand Gazette, no 17, p 304.

305. 'Negotiations for acquiring Native Lands entered into by Her Majesty', 2 January 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 4, p 57; 'Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty', 9 February 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 12, pp 265–266; 'Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty', 12 March 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 23, p 457; 'Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty', 6 September 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 67, pp 1422–1423; 'Notice of Entry into Negotiations for Acquisition of Native Lands by Her Majesty', 1 October 1894, New Zealand Gazette, no 72, p 1511. Also see doc A79, pp 232–233, 423, 478, 488; doc A67, pp 149–150; doc A68, p 197 n; submission 3.4.307, pp 15–16, 24, 29.

306. 'Native Lands', Waikato Times, 21 August 1894, p 6 (doc A68, p 197 n).

307. Document A79, p 251; doc A67, p 218; doc A55, p 120.

308. Document A21, p 131.

Map 11.2: Land blocks subjected to purchasing restrictions under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892

11.3.4.4 Restrictions are applied to the whole country

Nonetheless, Seddon returned from his tour determined to bring the question of ‘surplus’ Māori lands to a definite conclusion. Though acquiring Māori land by compulsion was clearly one of the options he considered, it was not the route he took. Instead, Seddon’s approach was to extend the Crown’s exclusive purchasing rights to ultimately cover the whole country, while also dramatically increasing funds for land purchasing.

After the House resumed in June 1894, the Government introduced three major pieces of land legislation. The Land for Settlements Act 1894 was aimed at large South Island landowners, and allowed the Crown to compulsorily acquire private land, if attempts to negotiate with the owners did not lead to sale. It provided that any land taken by the Crown must be independently valued. The Act did not give the Crown powers over Māori land.<sup>309</sup> In October 1894, the Lands Improvement and Native Land Acquisition Act 1894 authorised the Government to raise up to £250,000 for purchasing Māori land. This replaced the £50,000 annual borrowing authorised by the Native Land Purchases Act 1892 and greatly increased the resources available for land purchasing.<sup>310</sup>

Also in October, the Native Land Court Act 1894 made it illegal for anyone other than the Crown to ‘acquire any estate or interest in any land owned or held by a Native or Natives’. There were three exceptions. First, leasing would be allowed in the South Island. Secondly, the Act allowed pre-existing contracts for lease or sale to be completed with the approval of the chief judge, though this exception did not apply in the 1884–86 Te Rohe Pōtae restriction zone.<sup>311</sup> Thirdly, the Act allowed Māori landowners to incorporate, and nominate a committee which could alienate land – but only with Crown consent, and only if the proceeds were paid to the Public Trustee.<sup>312</sup> In the view of Husbands and Mitchell, the Act anticipated that owners would incorporate only for the purpose of alienating their land: there was no provision for ongoing land management or development.<sup>313</sup>

The Act also weakened Māori landowners’ property rights in other ways. The Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 had allowed the court to declare subdivisions inalienable if they were needed for the owners’ ongoing support.<sup>314</sup> In this district, the entire 1886 Rohe Pōtae block had been declared inalienable when it was created. This was done at Wahanui’s request, apparently in response to fears about the Crown’s purchasing intentions. Not only had the Crown been purchasing in neighbouring districts, but, according to Wahanui, Wilkinson had

---

309. Land for Settlements Act 1894, ss 4–18; doc A68, p188; Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land, p182.

310. Lands Improvement and Native Land Acquisition Act 1894, ss 12, 18; doc A68, p188.

311. Native Land Court Act 1894, ss 117–121, sch 2; Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, sch; doc A68, p189.

312. Native Land Court Act 1894, ss 122–128; doc A68, p189.

313. Document A79, pp 492–493.

314. Native Land Court 1886 Amendment Act 1888, ss 6, 13.

been asking owners if they might be willing to sell.<sup>315</sup> Court minutes record that the block would be subject to ‘restrictions against sales, mortgages etc’, leaving it unclear as to whether leasing would be permitted.<sup>316</sup> Wahanui’s intention appears to have been that leasing would be permitted, consistent with Ballance’s February 1885 commitment that the Crown would be content if land was made available for settlement by leasing. In a private letter, Judge Mair explained: ‘These people will not be hurried. They wish to get their land questions all settled and then they will set apart some for sale some for lease and make permanent reserves for their own use.’<sup>317</sup> Subsequently, the court made case-by-case decisions. In all, 50 Te Rohe Pōtae land blocks or subdivisions were declared inalienable, with a total area of 148,407 acres. These blocks (and subsequent Crown purchasing in them) are listed in table 11.4.

These provisions had been progressively weakened as the Crown pursued its land purchasing agenda. The Native Land Laws Act Amendment Act 1890 allowed the court to remove restrictions if a simple majority of owners agreed; previously, the consent of all affected owners had been needed.<sup>318</sup> The Native Land Purchases Act 1892 then allowed the governor to unilaterally remove restrictions on any land the Crown wanted to buy.<sup>319</sup> The Native Land Court Act 1894 allowed the court to remove restrictions with the consent of just one-third of the owners. But, more importantly, the Act provided that no court-ordered restrictions would apply to Crown purchases.<sup>320</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal concluded that the Act’s incorporation provisions were similar to those in Ballance’s 1886 legislation (discussed in chapter 8), but with even fewer safeguards for Māori. In theory, they provided for hapū to manage land collectively, but in practice the ‘heavy and controlling role of the Government . . . and especially the Public Trustee’ made them deeply unattractive to Māori landowners, and the provisions themselves were ‘so deficient as to render them useless as a vehicle for the collective tribal management of tribal lands.’<sup>321</sup> For these reasons, very few Māori landowners attempted to use the provision. In Te Rohe Pōtae, the provision was used only once, in 1895, by owners of the Mangaora block. On that occasion, the owners had an agreement with a European to lease their land privately, but could not do so as the survey was incomplete and title had not been issued. Neither the Public Trustee nor the Survey Office would advance the cost of the survey, and so the deal fell through.<sup>322</sup>

315. Document A79, pp 151–152; ‘Editorial’, Waikato Times, 13 November 1886, p2; doc A35, pp 80–81.

316. Otorohanga Native Land Court, minute book 2, 4 November 1886, fol 80 (doc A79(a), vol 7, p3705); doc A79, pp 151–152.

317. W G Mair to Gilbert Mair, 22 October 1886 (doc A35, pp 80–81).

318. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1890, s3.

319. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s14.

320. Native Land Court Act 1894, ss 52, 76.

321. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 380–381. Also see Brooking, “‘Busting Up’ the Greatest Estate of All”, p 83.

322. Document A79, pp 493–494.

In the House, Seddon presented the Native Land Act 1894 as being intended to frustrate ‘the land-grabber’ and ‘protect the Natives against fraud where they have not received fair value, or where improper influence has been brought to bear.’<sup>323</sup> Other members argued that there were better ways to prevent land speculation and that Te Rohe Pōtae would be settled quickly if the Crown did as the district’s leaders asked and granted them power to manage their lands as they wished and sell to the highest bidder. The Northern Maori member Hone Heke also argued that the Crown was breaching the Treaty by unilaterally reimposing an exclusive right to purchase.<sup>324</sup> Much of Te Rohe Pōtae was, of course, already subject to restrictions under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892, as discussed above.<sup>325</sup>

It is not altogether clear why Seddon abandoned his threat to acquire Māori land by compulsion. In this inquiry, the historian Donald Loveridge speculated that the Act was the result of a compromise within Cabinet. According to this theory, James Carroll agreed to support the nationwide imposition of ‘pre-emption’ in return for Seddon abandoning compulsion and granting Māori the right to incorporate. In support of this view, Loveridge noted that the tenor of Carroll’s public statements changed during 1894. He had been an outspoken opponent of previous Crown attempts to grant itself exclusive purchasing rights, but in 1894 began to make public comments in favour of such a measure.<sup>326</sup> Another possible explanation is that the Government realised that compulsory acquisition was not necessary and that existing tactics – purchasing from individuals under cover of restrictions on alienation, while taking advantage of debt – were working. As Seddon had acknowledged during his visit to the Waikato, existing purchasing tactics were by 1894 having the desired effect. A few days after the Act was passed, Seddon boasted that 1894 would be a ‘record’ year for Crown purchasing of Māori land.<sup>327</sup> As we noted above, it was indeed a record year in this district.

Loveridge further observed that the Native Land Court Act 1894 signalled an end to ‘any lingering possibility that the Crown would permit Māori landowners in the Aotea [Rohe Potae] block to sell and lease their lands – or even a portion of their lands – on an open market’. During negotiations in 1891–92, the Crown had at least considered lifting the restrictions if Te Rohe Pōtae Māori opened some of their land for settlement. From 23 October 1894, with restrictions now in place nationwide and Te Rohe Pōtae land purchasing well under way, ‘the Seddon Government showed no further interest in any such arrangement.’<sup>328</sup> In this respect, Seddon’s biographer Tom Brooking has argued that Seddon’s 1894 tour differed from previous ones. It had not been a consultation or negotiation exercise, but ‘a highly calculated exercise in public relations,’ aimed at persuading settlers

---

323. ‘Native Land Court Bill’, 28 September 1894, NZPD, vol 86, p 374 (doc A68, p 192).

324. Document A68, pp 193–194.

325. Document A21, p 131. The Crown purchased 122,640.01 acres of Māori land in the inquiry district during the year – approximately 6.3 per cent of the district’s total area (excluding extension areas).

326. Document A68, pp 189–192.

327. Brooking, “‘Busting Up’ the Greatest Estate of All”, p 82.

328. Document A68, p 197.

in North Island electorates that they would soon get their hands on Māori land.<sup>329</sup> In effect, the Crown no longer saw a need to consult or negotiate – it was getting what it wanted.

11.3.4.5 Māori protest and continued Crown purchasing, 1895–1905

The Native Land Court Act 1894, and the associated land purchasing programme, aroused strong opposition from Māori throughout the country. In 1895, three of the four Māori members of the House of Representatives began urging Māori to boycott the court and all land sales to the Crown.<sup>330</sup> In Te Rohe Pōtae, Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Mahuta boycotted the court at Ōtorohanga for several months, saying they would not return until satisfactory land laws were passed. They applied to withdraw a total of 336 claims that had been scheduled for hearing, and – though the court declined their applications – returned to their homes and refused to attend.<sup>331</sup>

By this time, the court had awarded title for many of the original Aotea-Rohe Potae subdivisions west of the railway, but had still to complete that process for lands in the east. It was otherwise mainly concerned with further subdivision (at owners' request), applications for partition (at Crown request), and granting survey orders.<sup>332</sup> The boycott was a partial success – the court did little for the rest of the year other than hear applications by the Crown. Similar boycotts occurred in other North Island towns and cities.<sup>333</sup>

Ormsby circulated a petition, yet again asking the Crown to remove all restrictions and allow Māori to deal with their lands as Europeans did. In May and September, meetings were held at which resolutions were passed opposing all land sales, though these bans were impossible to enforce.<sup>334</sup> Attempts to unify Māori politically gained new impetus in response to the restrictions, and for Ngāti Maniapoto this meant a renewed willingness to explore its relationship with the Kīngitanga. Many Ngāti Maniapoto attended a Kīngitanga hui in 1895 which called for the establishment of a federation of Māori people 'to take united action with regard to legislation' affecting Māori and their lands.<sup>335</sup> The Crown did, with the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, relax the restrictions a little, allowing private sales or leases of land blocks smaller than 500 acres and also allowing the governor to make other exceptions. Once again, Te Rohe Pōtae was singled out. The Act specified that the provision allowing private sales or leases of small land

---

329. Brooking, Richard Seddon, p 198.

330. Document A79, pp 16, 281–282; doc A68, pp 145 n, 196–198; doc A71 (Robinson and Christoffel), p 74; doc A67, pp 157, 170–171; doc A35, pp 94–95.

331. Document A79, pp 482–483; doc A68, pp 198–199.

332. Document A79, pp 282–285, 304–307, 482–483.

333. Document A79, pp 482–483.

334. Document A68, pp 199–200; doc A93 (Loveridge), p 7 n

335. Hawkes Bay Herald, 4 May 1895 (doc A79, p 483).

blocks would not apply to the 4.5 million-acre 1884–86 restriction area, which covered all of this district except for Whaingaroa.<sup>336</sup>

For all Māori land in the inquiry district, therefore, the Crown remained the only purchaser unless the governor decided otherwise. Private buyers had acquired 733 acres of land in the district, and acquired a further 12,496 acres in 1894 (including the 7,482-acre Puketiti 1, the 4,000-acre Mahoenui 6, and two Mangapapa blocks). All of these purchases were in the Mōkau area, which was not always subject to restrictions between August 1888 and October 1894.<sup>337</sup> After the Native Land Laws Act 1894, there were no further private purchases until 1898, when private buyers acquired 3,566 acres. A further 1,002 acres was sold privately in 1899, and thereafter private sales accounted for a few hundred acres a year until 1907, when more liberal land laws were in force.<sup>338</sup> We have very little evidence about these transactions. According to Boulton, the vast majority also concerned Mōkau land.<sup>339</sup> It is possible that the sales were to settler farmers who had acquired leases when Mōkau was not covered by restrictions, and had been able to have their transactions ratified under native land fraud prevention legislation.<sup>340</sup>

In this district, the Crown's main response to Māori protests about the Native Land Act was to continue its land purchasing programme. By this time, according to Husbands and Mitchell, the court's main business had shifted 'away from the investigation and definition of tribal and hapu interests' and 'towards the facilitation and administration of the Liberal Government's land purchasing effort'. Wilkinson 'began to increasingly occupy centre stage' as the court's business came to be dominated by applications for partition and award of survey costs.<sup>341</sup>

Crown purchasing was by now following a familiar pattern, in which Wilkinson purchased individual shares over a period of months or years, applied to the court to have the Crown's interests partitioned out, and then – as soon as the process was complete – began to target those who had refused to sell. Over time, Māori landholdings became increasingly fragmented and difficult to manage, making owners more vulnerable to Wilkinson's overtures.<sup>342</sup> During 1895, Wilkinson brought 44 partition applications to the court – forcing owners to break the boycott, lest the court determine the land division without their involvement. A further 122

---

336. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895, ss 3, 4. The Act was amended again in 1896 to allow private purchasing of blocks not exceeding 640 acres of first-class land and 2,000 acres of second-class land. Again, the provision did not apply to the Rohe Pōtae area: Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896, s 27.

337. Document A21, pp 46, 131; doc A67, pp 315–317, 335–336; submission 3.4.307, p 44.

338. Document A21, p 131.

339. Document A67, pp 316–317.

340. Wilkinson listed these leases in an 1895 memo to the Native Department: doc A60, pp 1276–1277. Also see submission 3.4.119, p 10; doc A67, pp 338–339.

341. Document A79, pp 252–253.

342. Document A146, pp 406–411; doc A67, pp 356, 424, 478, 490; doc A79, p 251. Also see submission 3.4.305, pp 9, 78.

applications followed in 1897, just over 100 in 1898, and 136 in 1900.<sup>343</sup> Following this pattern, total Crown purchasing fluctuated from year to year, as shown in table 11.2. In all, the Crown completed acquisitions of 368,000 acres of Māori land in the inquiry district during the years 1895–99 (just over 19 per cent of the district).<sup>344</sup> It acquired a further 81,500 acres in 1900 and 1901 before purchasing slowed.<sup>345</sup>

In this way, the Crown's purchasing programme in fact worked against settlement. It prevented Māori leaders from inviting settlers into their lands and establishing farms, while delaying settlement of lands it had purchased because it wanted to benefit from rising land prices. And it turned the district into a patchwork of fragmented properties, some in Crown ownership and some in Māori ownership, many of which were too small to be usable.<sup>346</sup>

Māori protests continued for the rest of the 1890s. In 1897, Eketone and 163 others of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui petitioned Parliament saying they had 'continually by petition and in other ways' attempted to point out 'the magnitude of the injustice under which we suffer through the Government alone having the right to purchase our lands.' The petitioners were 'entirely certain' that the restrictions were not intended to protect them from 'land grabbers', but instead reflected 'the intense desire of the Government that we should speedily sell to them our land for whatever price they please to give.'<sup>347</sup> The petition – set out in full in Appendix 1 – asked that restrictions be removed from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands on which title had been determined and the relative interests of each owner determined. It also asked that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori be permitted to lease or sell their lands to whoever they pleased. The House of Representatives, they said, wanted there to be one law for Māori and Europeans, yet the law that prevented Māori from selling or leasing land in a competitive market was hardly a sign of that equality before the law.<sup>348</sup>

Faced with the loss of much of their land, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders turned back to the Kīngitanga, supporting the Maori Constitution Bill, which was brought before the House in 1898 by the Western Maori member Henare Kaihau, who was the principal advisor to the new Māori King Mahuta Tāwhiao. The Bill proposed a national Māori council to administer Māori lands and granted all Māori the same rights as Europeans to deal with their lands. As with all other efforts to provide

343. Document A79, pp 252–253.

344. Document A21, p 131.

345. Document A21, p 131.

346. These effects were widely discussed in settler media and in the report of the Native Land Commission's 1907 report on Te Rohe Pōtae: 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District: An Interim Report', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, pp 1–4, 6–7, 8–9.

347. Pepene Eketone and 163 others, petition 217 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 33–47; doc A146, p 193); doc A67, pp 157, 299, 374, 479–480; doc A93, p 7. According to Boulton, the other signatories included Taonui and Ormsby: doc A67, p 351.

348. Document A67, p 299; doc A73(a), vol 5, pp 286–290.

Māori with meaningful power over their own lands during this period, the House rejected it.<sup>349</sup>

By the late 1890s, having already acquired a large portion of the district's land, the Crown began to consider alternative policies. One option was a halt to the purchasing of Māori land, to be replaced by a system that would make land available for settlement by leasing. This system was proposed in a Kōtahitanga petition to Queen Victoria in 1897.<sup>350</sup> Witnesses have suggested various possible reasons for the Government's change of heart. Nationwide Māori opposition to the Crown's existing policies was clearly a factor, and, as Richard Boast and others have pointed out, having already acquired vast amounts of Māori land, the Government could afford to consider concessions. Boulton and Marr suggested that the Government may also have become concerned about Māori landlessness and, more particularly, the prospect of landless Māori becoming a burden on the State. And Boulton speculated that the Government may also have been confronting the reality that it could not easily sell all of the land it had bought.<sup>351</sup>

In October 1899, the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1899 temporarily prohibited all sales of Māori land to the Crown. The following year, the Maori Lands Administration Act 1900 prohibited all sales of Māori land except with the governor's consent. Leasing was allowed, but only when conducted through district Maori councils (which will be discussed in future chapters of our report).<sup>352</sup> Both of these Acts allowed the Crown to complete purchases that were already under negotiation. The exclusive purchasing provisions of the Native Land Court Act 1894 continued to apply to these transactions.<sup>353</sup> That Act was finally repealed on 31 March 1910.<sup>354</sup> By then, just 50 per cent of this district's land remained in Māori possession.<sup>355</sup>

11.3.5 Treaty analysis and findings

In their 1883 petition to the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had been very clear that they had no interest in the railway, or in roads, or in the Native Land Court, if these things were to become the means by which their land was taken from them.

---

349. Document A93, pp 11–12; doc A71, p 126. Also see Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, 'Henare Kaihau', in 1870–1900, vol 2 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed Claudia Orange (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books / Department of Internal Affairs, 1993), pp 250–251.

350. Document A71, p 49; doc A67, pp 163–166; Donald Loveridge, Maori Land Councils and Maori Land Boards: A Historical Overview 1900–1952, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahau Whānui Series (Wellington, Waitangi Tribunal, 1996), pp 6, 12; Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land, p 214.

351. Document A71, p 49; doc A67, pp 163–166; Loveridge, Maori Land Councils and Maori Land Boards, pp 6, 12; Boast, Buying the Land, Selling the Land, p 214.

352. Maori Lands Administration Act 1900, s 22. Also see doc A73 (Hearn), pp 59–60; submission 3.4.307, pp 9, 19, 24, 28.

353. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1899, s 3; Maori Lands Administration Act 1900, s 34; submission 3.4.307, pp 9–10, 28.

354. It was repealed by the Native Land Act 1909: ss 1, 431, sch.

355. Document A21, p 129.

They had seen how, in other districts, the court's arrival had been a precursor for individualisation of title and large-scale alienation of land.<sup>356</sup>

The fundamental precondition of the Crown's entry into this district was that things would be done differently here, in order that the land be protected. In return for this district being opened for settlement and for their consent to the railway, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders said, the Crown would have to pass laws with two effects. First, all land title decisions would be left to iwi and hapū, with the Crown's only role being to confirm and add legal protection to what Māori had decided among themselves. Secondly, the petition asked that Te Rohe Pōtae lands be protected forever from sale. Leasing would be allowed, but only if the negotiation were a public one.

In the negotiations that followed (discussed in chapter 8), Te Rohe Pōtae leaders modified some of their conditions. They appeared willing to allow for sale under some circumstances, so long as hapū made all decisions about alienation and so long as any sales or leases occurred in an open market. They consistently opposed the Crown having any exclusive purchasing right.

At Kihikihi in February 1885, the Native Minister, John Ballance, assured Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that the Crown did not intend to be a large-scale purchaser of Māori land, and only sought what it needed for railway purposes, for which it would pay a fair price. He said that the Crown wanted Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to make land available for settlement (which they had said they were willing to do), but would be content if they offered land for lease under a system that allowed for prices to be determined by public competition. He also assured them that all decisions about land alienation would be made by hapū representatives.<sup>357</sup> In summary, he assured them:

not a single Native right will be prejudiced . . . greater powers will be placed in the hands of the Natives to deal with their own land, when their land will be enormously increased in value through the construction of this railway and roads.<sup>358</sup>

It was on the basis of these and other assurances given at Kihikihi that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consented to the railway.

As discussed in chapter 8, the Crown was obliged to respect the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and enact laws that they had sought for the protection of their land. It was also obliged to use its lawmaking powers to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in possession of their lands. And it was obliged to honour any conditions they imposed in return for their consent to the railway, and to keep its promises, in accordance with its duty to act honourably and in good faith. The Crown did none of these things. Instead, the Māori land laws enacted under Ballance's

356. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

357. 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 14-16, 20.

358. 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 24.

stewardship fell short of what was sought and promised; and the Crown was never willing to relinquish the power to determine land titles. Even during Ballance's tenure, the Crown began to make plans for large-scale land purchasing in this district.

Ballance was, however, willing to see Māori enjoy some of the benefits of rising land prices along the railway; in his view, this was fair in return for Te Rohe Pōtae communities consenting to the railway and to the opening of the district to settlement.<sup>359</sup> From 1888, the Crown adopted a new policy. Not only did it intend to purchase large areas of land for on-sale to settlers, it intended to do so before the railway was completed, so that it and not Māori would benefit from rising land prices. It adopted this policy partly in response to settler pressure and partly as a means of addressing its growing financial difficulties. The Crown therefore enacted a series of laws that removed the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to sell, lease, or mortgage land privately. The Crown had exclusive rights to deal in Māori land. This, and subsequent restrictions, were imposed in order to eliminate private competition, giving the Crown control of the land market, so it could profit from the purchase, development, and onsale of Māori land.

During the next 22 years, Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae was almost continuously subject to restrictions of one form or another. Aside from one brief period between October 1894 and October 1895 when Māori in the North Island were unable to sell or lease their lands,<sup>360</sup> the severest restrictions applied only to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, not to other Māori or Europeans. The laws were fundamentally at odds with the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the active protection of land, and with the equality of property rights guaranteed under article 3. In terms of general Treaty principle, the right of tino rangatiratanga fetters the Crown's right of kāwanatanga; the Crown can interfere with that right only with the consent of the affected communities, or otherwise in exceptional circumstances and as a last resort in the national interest. The Crown's right of kāwanatanga, furthermore, must be exercised in a manner that actively protects Māori rights and interests.

The Crown argued that the laws it enacted were a simple reimposition of the pre-emptive right provided for by article 2.<sup>361</sup> But, as the Tribunal found in He Maunga Rongo, the Crown 'fully and absolutely' required the consent of affected Māori landowners before granting itself exclusive purchasing rights, and any

---

359. Ballance explained his views to the House of Representatives that the Crown intended neither to permit 'land sharks' nor to be one itself: 'Native Lands Settlement Bill, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, pp 312–317 (doc J25 (Crown document bank), pp 145–147); doc A78, pp 1078–1083, 1105–1106. Also see 'Banquet to the Hon John Ballance', The Yeoman, 5 December 1884 (doc A78(a) (Marr document bank), vol 6, pp 2921–2922); doc A41, p 161.

360. From 23 October 1894 to 31 October 1895, section 117 of the Native Land Court Act 1894 prohibited private sales of Māori land throughout the country, and prohibited private leases throughout the North Island. On 31 October 1895, sections 3 and 4 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1895 allowed Māori in other districts but not Te Rohe Pōtae to privately sell or lease up to 500 acres. Section 27 of the Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896 extended these provisions, allowing Māori in other districts to privately sell or lease up to 640 acres of first class land and 2,000 acres of second class land.

361. Submission 3.4.307, pp 2–4, 21–22, 32–33.

failure to obtain that consent was a breach of the principles of active protection, autonomy, and partnership.<sup>362</sup> The Crown has acknowledged that it did not obtain consent for any of these laws, or even seek it.<sup>363</sup>

By 1888, the Crown had imposed individual titles on most of the land blocks in this district. The effect of the restrictions in combination with the land title regime was that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori possessed neither their full rights over land as guaranteed by article 2, nor the individual rights of British subjects as guaranteed by article 3. In effect, the law treated them as aliens in their own lands, possessing neither full rights as indigenous people nor equal rights as British subjects.

Other inquiries have also found that the Crown was obliged to use the preemptive right in a manner that actively protected Māori interests, consistent with the article 2 guarantee that Māori communities would retain possession of and authority over land for so long as they wished.<sup>364</sup> The Crown acknowledged that, after 1887, it imposed these laws for the purposes of supporting a land purchasing programme and profiting from the purchase, development, and onsale of Māori land.<sup>365</sup> Colonial politicians were quite open about these purposes and about the fact that they were bowing to pressure from settlers who wanted access to Māori land and did not want Māori to benefit from rising land prices. The Crown therefore had no protective intent. On the contrary, its intention was to use these laws to separate Māori from their land, irrespective of their wishes about the timing and manner in which their district would be settled, and irrespective of their legitimate expectation that they would receive economic benefit from the railway. Other Tribunals have found that, where the Crown granted itself exclusive purchasing rights for the purposes of opening up land for settlement, and more specifically for the purposes of controlling land prices so it could profit from land transactions and repay debt, it was in breach of the Treaty principle of active protection.<sup>366</sup> We agree entirely.

We can see no exceptional circumstances that might have justified the enactment of these laws as a last resort. The Crown's view was that it had a legitimate role in controlling settlement, which included restricting speculative behaviour. We acknowledge the Crown's Treaty obligation to control settlement in order to protect Māori interests, and we also acknowledge its legitimate role in controlling speculative behaviour that might impede national development goals. If these were the Crown's only goals, it might have adopted different policy settings that more closely aligned with the express wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. But these were not the Crown's only goals.

---

362. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 578, 580. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, pp 64–65.

363. Submission 3.4.293, p 3; submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

364. Waitangi Tribunal, The Report on the Orakei Claim, p 137; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 78–79; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, pp 64–65.

365. Submission 3.4.307, p 28.

366. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 236; Waitangi Tribunal, Tauranga Moana 1886–2006, vol 1, p 145; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 580.

The Crown wanted to advance settlement for the sake of the colony's economy, but that could in no way justify a policy that sought to deny Te Rohe Pōtae Māori their land rights and transfer land into the hands of European farmers. Indeed, the district's leaders were entirely willing to open the district for settlement if the Crown would protect their land, leave the decisions to them, and allow them to benefit from the resulting economic development.

The Crown wanted to prevent private speculation in order to support settlement by European smallholders, but it could have achieved this by allowing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to make land available for lease as they wished, and also by limiting the areas of land that could be sold or leased as it did in other parts of the country. Honouring the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for hapū to make all decisions about land alienation and for negotiations to be conducted on their behalf by iwi leaders might also have mitigated against speculation by giving them greater market power.

The Crown also wanted to address its own financial difficulties, but again, that in no way justified a policy that was aimed at transferring land and wealth from Māori to the Crown. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had not asked for the railway and were not responsible for the colony's debts. They had very clearly said they did not want the railway if it were to be the means of depriving them of their land. Yet depriving them of their land in order to fund the railway was the exact policy the Crown adopted. These, in any case, were policy preferences, not cases of national emergency. At the heart of the Crown's policy was its decision to advance settler wishes and interests at the expense of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, in contravention of their clearly expressed wishes and also of the promises the Crown itself had made.

We therefore find that when it enacted the laws imposing the 1898–91 restrictions, the 1890–92 restrictions, the 1892–93 restrictions, and the 1894–1910 restrictions, and when it imposed restrictions on selected land blocks under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892, the Crown breached the Treaty and its principles in the following ways:

1. By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions without first consulting or obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of autonomy and partnership.
2. By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions in breach of its promises that any sales or leases would occur in an open market, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the principle of partnership, and its obligation to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith. The Crown conceded this breach.<sup>367</sup>
3. By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions in a manner that treated Te Rohe Pōtae Māori differently from other Māori landowners and from Europeans, and to their detriment, the Crown breached the principles of equity and equal treatment.

---

367. Submission 3.4.307, pp12, 25.

4. By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions for the express purposes of transferring large areas of Māori land into Crown ownership and ensuring that the Crown benefited from rising land prices along the railway, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga.

11.4 HOW DID THE CROWN BUY TE ROHE PŌTAE MĀORI LAND?

11.4.1 Introduction

As the preceding sections explained, the Crown imposed restrictions on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land rights in order to support its land purchasing programme. Its objective was to obtain Māori land for development and onsell to settlers at a profit that would be sufficient to cover the costs of the railway and other settlement infrastructure. The Crown's representatives knew that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders and communities wanted to retain control and possession of their land and would therefore resist any large-scale purchasing programme. The Crown adopted a deliberate policy of breaking down that opposition by exploiting indebtedness (including survey debts), targeting individual shares across a wide range of land blocks, forcing owners into court to partition their interests and threatening to take land by compulsion.

Acts of Parliament and the Native Land Court created the preconditions in which these tactics could be effective, by breaking down communal land title, imposing survey costs on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners, and denying them opportunities to raise capital by selling, leasing, or raising mortgages on an open market.

As we described in section 11.3.3, the Crown's purchasing of Te Rohe Pōtae land unfolded in stages, with the Crown adopting different tactics to suit the circumstances. During the initial period (1890–92), while Māori were resisting sale, it focused on creating and leveraging 'want of money', not only by prohibiting private transactions but also by leveraging survey debts. By the end of 1892, George Wilkinson, the Crown's land purchase officer, had succeeded in completing the purchase of land blocks totalling just 13,229 acres, and acquiring shares in a handful of others.<sup>368</sup> By then, however, the 'ice' was beginning to break and Wilkinson's tactic of targeting individuals began to pay off.<sup>369</sup>

From 1893 on, he was essentially free to adopt the approach he would pursue from then until the end of the century: buying individual shares, applying to the court to have them partitioned out, and starting the process all over again. Altogether, during the years 1893–99, the Crown acquired 517,591 acres.<sup>370</sup> New Crown purchasing was prohibited in 1900, but Wilkinson continued to complete the purchase of blocks where he had already acquired shares. During the years

---

368. Document A21, p 131.

369. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 133–141; doc A67, p 211.

370. Document A21, p 131.

George Wilkinson

George Thomas Wilkinson (1845–1906) was born and raised in India, where his father served as a Baptist missionary. As an adult, he trained as a surveyor and migrated to New Zealand in 1864, working as a surveyor. He learned te reo Māori in the 1870s and served as an interpreter and land purchase officer in Hauraki before moving to Alexandra in 1882 to take up an appointment as native officer. He advised and interpreted for Ministers during their negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders during the 1880s. In 1889, he moved to Ōtorohanga to take up his position as native land purchase officer. Between 1902 and 1905, Wilkinson was president of the newly established Maniapoto-Tuwharetoa Maori Land Council. As part of that role, in 1903 he was authorised to exercise all the powers of a Native Land Court judge, and occasionally sat on Native Appellate Court cases. Throughout his time in this district Wilkinson lived with a Ngāti Maniapoto woman. A former partner was also of Ngāti Maniapoto. He died in 1906.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. 'The Late Mr GT Wilkinson: An Eventful Career', Taranaki Herald, 8 February 1906; 'Death of Mr GT Wilkinson: An Interesting Career', New Zealand Herald, 6 February 1906; Philip Hart, 'Merea Wikiriwhi and George Thomas Wilkinson', Waikato University Historical Research Unit, Te Aroha Mining District Working Papers 20, 2016, pp 39–131; doc A60 (Berghan), pp 1301–1303; doc A67 (Boulton), pp 178–179; doc A73 (Hearn), p 63 n; Dr Bryan Gilling, 'The Nineteenth-Century Native Land Court Judges: An Introductory Report' (commissioned research report, Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1994) (Wai 64 RO1, doc G5), p 4.

1900–1904, he acquired another 104,682 acres. Table 11.2 and map 11.3 give further detail on the scale and trajectory of Crown purchasing.

Claimants regarded the Crown's purchasing programme as a direct betrayal of the conditions imposed by Māori leaders, and the undertakings given by the Crown, as part of the 1883–85 negotiations and agreements which claimants refer to as Te Ōhākī Tapu. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had opened their district on the understanding that hapū would retain possession of and authority over their lands, would not be subjected to the destructive land purchasing policies that had affected other districts, and would be left to develop their lands as they wished, and to reap the promised benefits of the railway and of settlement.<sup>371</sup>

Instead of honouring these conditions, the claimants submitted, the Crown coerced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into selling land. It did so by taking advantage of the lack of competition, exploiting indebtedness, purchasing from individuals to undermine communal decision-making, and using aggressive tactics including threats of compulsory acquisition. We have already discussed some of these tactics in the previous section.<sup>372</sup> Claimants argued that the Crown took little or no account of Māori interests, instead pursuing an aggressive policy aimed at purchasing as much land as possible, and in particular aimed at separating Māori from the district's best land, while failing to ensure that sufficient land was set aside to meet the needs of Māori communities. They also argued that the Crown purchased land from minors and purchased before title was determined.<sup>373</sup>

---

371. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 6, 10, 49.

By pursuing this programme, the claimants submitted, the Crown not only breached the commitments it had as part of Te Ōhākī Tapu, but also breached subsequent promises to purchase only 'surplus' or 'waste' land, to reserve sufficient land for Māori use, and to purchase only after title was finally determined.<sup>374</sup> Though sales were 'technically voluntary',<sup>375</sup> claimants submitted that they were really forced because the Crown's actions left Māori landowners with no way of developing their lands and no means of clearing court-imposed debts other than by sales to the Crown.<sup>376</sup>

The Crown conceded some of these points. Previous chapters have discussed the Crown's concession that 'in a number of instances' iwi and hapū 'had to give up unreasonably large amounts of land to pay for survey costs', in breach of the Treaty.<sup>377</sup> The Crown also conceded that it breached the Treaty by preventing Māori landowners 'who had expended large sums of money having their lands surveyed and subdivided, from paying these costs by the leasing of their lands'.<sup>378</sup>

Previous chapters have also discussed the Crown's concession that it breached the Treaty by failing to provide for a form of title that enabled communities to manage land collectively.<sup>379</sup> The Crown also conceded that individualisation of

372. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 21, 25, 27–28, 30–33, 36–37, 38, 53; claim 1.5.4, pp 7, 9–15, 23; submission 3.4.174, p 11; submission 3.4.226, pp 29–31; submission 3.4.154(a), pp 30–35; submission 3.4.181, p 32; submission 3.4.204, pp 34, 37; submission 3.4.147, pp 16, 58; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21, 27–28; submission 3.4.175, pp 18, 27–30; submission 3.4.167, p 30; submission 3.4.151, pp 5, 34–39; submission 3.4.199, pp 39–41; submission 3.4.171, p 4; submission 3.4.160, p 38; submission 3.4.181, p 32; claim 1.1.272(c), pp 14–15; claim 1.2.102, pp 38–40, 41.

373. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 21, 25, 27–28, 30–33, 36–37, 38, 53; claim 1.5.4, pp 7, 9–15, 23; submission 3.4.174, p 11; submission 3.4.226, pp 29–31; submission 3.4.154(a), pp 30–35; submission 3.4.181, p 32; submission 3.4.204, pp 34, 37; submission 3.4.147, pp 16, 58; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21, 27–28; submission 3.4.175, pp 18, 27–30; submission 3.4.167, p 30; submission 3.4.151, pp 5, 34–39; submission 3.4.199, pp 39–41; submission 3.4.171, p 4; submission 3.4.160, p 38; submission 3.4.181, p 32; claim 1.1.272(c), pp 14–15; claim 1.2.102, pp 38–40, 41.

374. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3–4, 21, 25, 27–28, 30–33, 36–37, 38, 53; claim 1.5.4, pp 7, 9–15, 23; submission 3.4.174, p 11; submission 3.4.226, pp 29–31; submission 3.4.154(a), pp 30–35; submission 3.4.181, p 32; submission 3.4.204, pp 34, 37; submission 3.4.147, pp 16, 58; submission 3.4.251, pp 20–21, 27–28; submission 3.4.175, pp 18, 27–30; submission 3.4.167, p 30; submission 3.4.151, pp 5, 34–39; submission 3.4.199, pp 39–41; submission 3.4.171, p 4; submission 3.4.160, p 38; submission 3.4.181, p 32; claim 1.1.272(c), pp 14–15; claim 1.2.102, pp 38–40, 41.

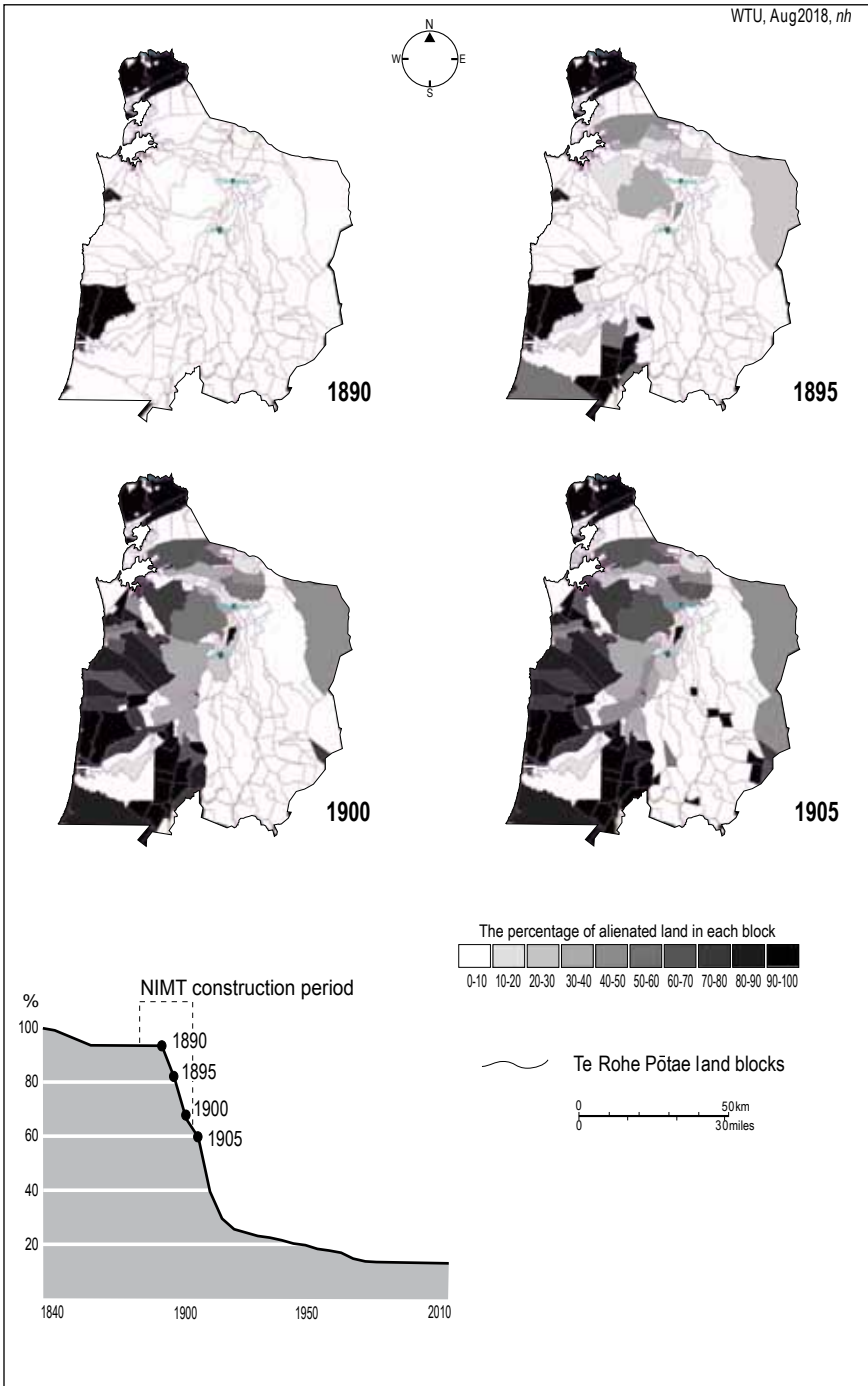

375. Claim 1.5.4, p 38.

376. Claim 1.5.4, pp 23, 38; submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 27–28, 53–54; submission 3.4.250, p 17; submission 3.4.295, p 11; submission 3.4.220, pp 20–21; submission 3.4.171, pp 13–15; submission 3.4.169, para 40; submission 3.4.174, pp 12–15.

377. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26, 37; submission 3.4.305, p 9; submission 3.4.11, p 4.

378. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26; submission 3.4.11, p 4.

379. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26, 37; submission 3.4.305, p 9; submission 3.4.11, p 4.

Map 11.3: Crown purchasing of Māori land in the inquiry district, 1890-1905 land interests had made land ‘more susceptible to fragmentation, alienation and partition’, which undermined tribal structures and was therefore a breach of the Treaty and its principles.<sup>380</sup> These concessions were made in respect of the Native Land Court, and do not directly address the more specific question of whether the Crown took advantage of survey costs and individual titles to advance its purchasing programme.

As discussed in section 11.3.3(2), the Crown’s policy was to break down communal resistance to land sales by taking advantage of survey debt, and by targeting individuals. It remains for us to determine how much these tactics were in fact used. In respect of land purchasing, the Crown acknowledged that it used its privileged market position in a manner that left some landowners with little option but to sell their land or shares in land, and it conceded that it used aggressive tactics to pressure owners to sell. In both respects, it conceded that its actions fell short of the standards of good faith, fair dealing, and active protection required of it under the Treaty.<sup>381</sup> But the Crown did not accept the claimant view that its entire purchasing programme was coercive. It submitted that Māori landowners sold for a range of reasons, including to clear debts, and to raise funds for land development. It also submitted that others were able to retain their lands, or hold out for higher prices.<sup>382</sup>

In respect of the claim that it failed to take account of Māori interests, and failed to set aside reserves, the Crown submitted that it set aside 24 reserves, which together ‘made up ten per cent of the area sold in the 1890s’, and it therefore argued that it had taken steps to ensure that Māori who sold retained sufficient land.<sup>383</sup> The Crown also submitted that there was no direct evidence of Crown purchasing before title had been determined;<sup>384</sup> and it submitted that purchases from minors were not in themselves evidence of sharp practices or bad faith.<sup>385</sup>

We begin by addressing our jurisdiction to consider claims in the Wharepuhunga block in light of the 2014 Raukawa settlement. We then consider each of the Crown’s purchasing methods in turn. First, we will address its use of survey debts to leverage the first significant sales in the district. Secondly, we will consider whether it purchased shares before the process of determining title had been completed. Thirdly, we will consider the methods it used to acquire shares from individuals, including targeting vulnerable and absentee owners. Fourthly, we will consider whether it acquired land that had been set aside for reserves. Fifthly, we will consider the Crown’s approach to the partitioning of its interests.

---

380. Submission 3.4.305, p 9.

381. Submission 3.4.307, pp 1, 25–26.

382. Submission 3.4.307, pp 35–36.

383. Submission 3.4.307, pp 39–40.

384. Submission 3.4.307, pp 37–38.

385. Submission 3.4.307, p 39.

Year	Crown	Private	Total
While local restrictions applied
1891	12,532.58	0	12,532.58
1892	696.03	733.00	1,429.03
1893	27,195.00	0	27,195.00
1894 <sup>1</sup>	122,640.01	12,496.38	135,136.39
While national restrictions applied
1895	52,160.70	0	52,160.70
1896	4,056.35	0	4,056.35
1897	47,822.18	0	47,822.18
1898	195,226.08	3,565.83	198,791.91
1899	68,801.12	1,002.00	69,803.12 <sup>2</sup>
While new purchasing was prohibited
1900	14,974.97	552.06	15,527.03
1901	66,528.41	321.47	66,849.88
1902	198.16	300.00	498.16
1903	5,388.00	0	5,388.00
1904	17,592.48	0	17,592.48
1905	4,003.00	192.79	4,195.79
Total	639,815.07	19,163.53	658,978.60

1. National restrictions were imposed from 23 October 1894.

2. Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell (doc A21, p 131) listed 310.5 acres as having been purchased in 1889: Kahakaharoa A, and Hauturu East 1A1, 1A2, and 1A3. However, Parker (doc A95(i)) and Berghan (doc A60, p 144) both record the Crown purchasing these blocks a decade later in 1899. Wilkinson recorded that his first purchases did not occur until 1890 (doc A67, p 222). The 1899 figures have been adjusted accordingly.

Table 11.2: Crown and private land alienation in Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district 1890–1905

Source: Document A21, p 131, table 85. Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell based their land purchasing data on titles issued by the Native Land Court, and other contemporary sources such as purchase deeds.

11.4.2 The Ngāti Raukawa settlement and the Wharepuhunga block

In its 2012 deed of settlement with Ngāti Raukawa, the Crown acknowledged that Ngāti Raukawa territorial interests centred in the Waikato River basin, from Te Pae o Raukawa (Taupō Moana) in the south, to Maungatautari in the north, west into Wharepuhunga in the Rangitoto Ranges and Waipā Valley, and east to Te Kaokaoroa-o-Patetere in the Kaimai and Mamakū Ranges. Ngāti Raukawa and the Crown also acknowledged that other iwi also had interests in parts of these lands.<sup>386</sup> As discussed in chapter 2, the lands in the north-eastern corner of this district, including the Wharepuhunga block, were heavily contested during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and many of the competing groups were closely related. The tribal landscape in Wharepūhunga and the lands between Maungatautari and Kihikihi is therefore highly complex, with many groups able to trace important ancestral associations to those lands.

The Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014 settled claims over traditional Ngāti Raukawa territories by claimants identifying as Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Mōtai, Ngāti Mahana, Ngāti Whāita, Ngāti Āhuru, Ngāti Te Apunga, and Ngāti Wairangi, as well as claimants representing specific areas or land blocks.<sup>387</sup> In this inquiry, we received many claims regarding Wharepūhunga lands from groups which claimed affiliation with Ngāti Raukawa and/or the hapū listed in the 2014 settlement Act.<sup>388</sup> We have not inquired into these claims. But we also received several claims over Wharepuhunga from claimants who did not identify with Ngāti Raukawa, or who claimed dual affiliation with Ngāti Raukawa and other iwi. These claims were:

- Wai 651 – Ngāti Matakore and Ngāti Rangatahi of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Waewae of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Pīkiahū of Ngāti Raukawa;<sup>389</sup>
- Wai 784 – Ngāti Kauwhata;<sup>390</sup>
- Wai 972 – Ngāti Kauwhata;<sup>391</sup>
- Wai 1004 – Mike Taitoko and others of Ngāti Maniapoto;<sup>392</sup>
- Wai 1482 – Ngāti Wehi Wehi;<sup>393</sup>
- Wai 1944 – Ngāti Hinemata;<sup>394</sup>
- Wai 2014 – Ngā Uri o Peehi Tūkorehu; the Ngāti Paretekawa section of Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>395</sup>

Each of these groups identified interests in Wharepuhunga (or parts of the block) which were distinct from the Ngāti Raukawa interests in the block and 386. Raukawa and the Raukawa Settlement Trust and the Crown, Deed of Settlement of Historical Claims, 2 June 2012, pp 6–7, 9, 48. Also see Raukawa and Raukawa Settlement Trust and the Crown, Deed of Settlement: Attachments, 2 June 2012, p 4.

387. Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014, s14(3)

388. Specifically, these are Wai 255 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Mahana); Wai 389 (Ngāti Raukawa); Wai 1340 (Ngāti Raukawa); Wai 538 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Whāita); Wai 1472 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Kauwhata, Ngāti Wairangi, Ngāti Whakatere ki te Tonga); Wai 1473 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Āhuru); Wai 1474 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Mōtai, Ngāti Te Ahunga); Wai 1602 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Te Koherā); Wai 1615 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Takihiku, Ngāti Whāita); Wai 1769 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Āhuru, Ngāti Huri, Ngāti Tūkorehe); Wai 1887 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Kikopiri, Ngāti Whāita); Wai 2019 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Huri); Wai 2076 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūkorehe); Wai 2077 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Rahurahu); Wai 2078 (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Āhuru): see submission 3.4.158.

389. Claim 1.1.272(c), pp 2–3, 14–16.

390. Submission 3.4.147, pp 10–12, 16. Also see submission 3.4.147(a).

391. Submission 3.4.134, pp 7, 11, 26–27, 57–59; also see submission 3.4.134(b).

392. Claim 1.1.59(a).

393. Submission 3.4.154(a), pp 4, 8–9, 15.

394. Submission 3.4.233, paras 4, 12–17, 19–31.

395. Submission 3.4.208, pp 2–5, 22–24.

therefore not covered by the 2014 settlement. We will therefore include them as part of our consideration of Crown purchasing methods below.

11.4.3 Did the Crown use survey debt to leverage land sales?

As discussed in section 11.3.3(4), Wilkinson's first individual share purchases were from two owners of the Mangauika block, who rode out from their community under cover of darkness and met him at night to hide their shame at what they were doing.<sup>396</sup> Those purchases occurred in April 1890. Wilkinson continued to attempt to pursue individual shares over the coming months, but with very little success. It was not until Wilkinson began to discuss survey costs with owners later in the year that they began to sell on a larger scale, and then the lands offered were not the prime Waipā Valley real estate that the Crown sought, but more marginal border lands where mana had been contested before the Native Land Court.<sup>397</sup>

Chapter 10 has considered the scale of land sold or taken to cover survey costs – our concern here is with their use as a means to break the ice on land purchasing. When Ngāti Maniapoto leaders agreed in 1889 to pay survey costs, it appears that their leaders believed they would be able to do so while also protecting the bulk of their land.<sup>398</sup> While they had hoped to pay as much as possible of the survey costs in cash by developing their land, their efforts were severely limited by both the prohibition on private leasing and mortgaging, and the land title regime.<sup>399</sup> As discussed in chapter 10, this form of title was not intended to support land development, only to facilitate alienation.<sup>400</sup>

Nor could Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners expect the Crown to offer any assistance for their attempts to farm the district, even though turning the land to productive use was the Crown's stated aim. In a letter to Lewis in March 1890, Wilkinson appeared almost enthusiastic at the prospect of sheep farming operations falling into difficulty through lack of technical expertise, disputes among landowners, or sheep dying of exposure or being killed by wild pigs.<sup>401</sup>

Just as the land title regime was intended to facilitate alienation, so was the imposition of survey charges. Wilkinson was perfectly open about his intention to use survey liens as a means to pressure the district's landowners into selling. Early in 1890, as his land purchasing efforts were getting under way, he lamented the two-year grace period that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were being given before survey costs would be charged against their lands and begin to incur interest. Because they had not yet been forced to pay up front for the surveys, he advised the Native

---

396. Document A67, p 222.

397. Document A67, pp 393, 395–396, 403–404; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 265–268; doc A60, pp 1157–1159.

398. Document A79, pp 300–301.

399. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 174–177; doc A67, pp 229, 231–232, 253–254; 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, vol 1, G–2, pp 3–6.

400. Other Tribunals have also discussed this: see doc A79, pp 12–15.

401. Document A67, pp 229–230; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 174–177.

Department, they were not yet ‘in want of money’, and therefore under no pressure to sell.<sup>402</sup>

Nonetheless, it is clear that Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were aware of these costs, and knew they would have to either pay or accrue interest once the two-year period elapsed. As we described earlier, on two occasions in 1890 Te Rohe Pōtae leaders offered land – Te Kopua 1U and Waiaraia – to pay off survey debt, and both were important for the Crown’s purchasing programme.<sup>403</sup>

The Crown accepted such offers, but saw them only as a foot in the door. When Wilkinson paid for Te Kopua 1U, he did not tell the sellers that he had also been buying individual shares in other parts of the block. His intention was to use those shares to force a partition that would favour the Crown, thereby allowing it to begin the process of breaking up the block and allow the Crown to buy the most fertile land closest to the railway.<sup>404</sup> Wilkinson similarly saw the Waiaraia offer as an opportunity to break wider resistance to land purchasing. He hoped that Wahanui’s involvement would remove the ‘shame or dread’ which Māori landowners felt about selling their shares.<sup>405</sup>

In the event, it was not Wahanui’s actions that broke the resistance to land selling, but further pressure from the Crown. Following Wilkinson’s recommendation, the Crown in 1891 began to take steps to impose survey charges on the land and begin to charge interest.<sup>406</sup> The following year, at the surveyor general’s request, the Native Land Court issued orders imposing charges totalling some £6,348 on more than 60 blocks of the district’s land.<sup>407</sup> In the absence of effective means to raise these funds, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners could either sell their shares, or watch as interest accumulated on the charges. Many took the former option.<sup>408</sup>

Following Waiaraia, tribal and hapū leaders sold several more blocks to cover survey liens for their remaining lands. Husbands and Mitchell listed these blocks as: Taurangi (10,000 acres, sold by Wahanui in August 1891 as part of the Waiaraia negotiation); Umukaimata 4A (5,000 acres, sold by Taonui in November 1892; Hauturu West F1 (6,000 acres, sold in May 1895); Hauturu East A (6,000 acres, sold in May 1895); Hauturu East D (5,000 acres, sold in May 1895); and Mangarapa 3 (400 acres, sold in December 1892). Together with Te Kopua 1U, the total area of 402. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 27 March 1890 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 174–177); doc A67, pp 227–228; doc A79, p 243.

403. For the sale of Te Kopua 1U, see doc A67, pp 232–233, 240; doc A55, pp 103–104; doc A79, pp 169, 227–228; doc A60, pp 377–378. The transactions and further Crown purchasing in Te Kopua 1 are also discussed in detail in Beryl Woolford Roa, ‘“Less than a Pig”: The Alienation of Māori Land in The Northwest King Country’ (PhD thesis, University of Auckland, 2008), fols 34–62 (doc 03(a), pp 34–62). For the sale of Waiaraia, see doc A67, pp 393, 395–396, 403–404; doc A60, pp 1157–1159; doc A79, p 228. The court hearing and land transactions are also discussed in detail by Husbands and Mitchell, see doc A79, pp 557–599.

404. Document A55, pp 103–104, 109; doc A79, p 169; doc A67, pp 232–233, 240, 400–401, 442.

405. Document A67, pp 400–401, 442; doc A55, p 109.

406. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 309–310; doc A67, p 232.

407. Document A79, pp 242–244.

408. Document A79, pp 244–245.

these blocks comes to 33,438 acres.<sup>409</sup> It is not clear why Husbands and Mitchell did not include the Waiaraia sale (10,000 acres). They also separately mentioned Ratomokia 2A (5,626 acres, sold in March 1894) as having been sold to cover survey costs,<sup>410</sup> and Boulton referred to Umukaimata 4 (11,000 acres) as having been set aside by Taonui in order to cover survey costs.<sup>411</sup> If these blocks are included, the total area comes to 50,064 acres. More than half of that was in the southern border areas where Whanganui hapū also had claims.

Even though tribal or hapū leaders negotiated these sales, there was a coercive element to all of them, since (as the Crown has conceded) they could not readily raise the substantial funds involved by means other than land sales.<sup>412</sup> This difficulty was summed up by Te Moerua Natanahira, one of the owners of Kinohaku West, who wrote to the Native Minister in 1893 that the Crown would have to take land because ‘we have no money . . . to pay the surveyor.’<sup>413</sup> Direct pressure was also applied in most cases. Wahanui offered parts of Taurangi and Ratomokia only after Wilkinson threatened to withdraw from negotiations and leave him with no means of repaying survey liens on remaining hapū lands. The Ratomokia, Umukaimata, Hauturu, and Mangarapa sales all occurred after the Crown had begun to charge interest on the survey liens, and after Cadman and Ballance had threatened to take land by compulsion if it was not offered voluntarily.

On a small number of occasions, Māori landowners were able to find cash to pay survey liens, but only where the amounts involved were relatively small. Husbands and Mitchell listed one such occurrence in 1892 (in Hauturu East), two in 1894, and three in 1895. The number increased later in the decade, possibly as a result of owners applying the proceeds of sales of other blocks to pay off their debts on land they were keeping. In all, only 22 such instances were recorded between 1892 and 1901, and the amounts involved were typically fairly small, rarely exceeding £50.<sup>414</sup> But the total amount levied for survey charges in the inquiry district up to 1907, according to Husbands and Mitchell, was £23,728.<sup>415</sup> In ‘a cash poor region,’ they wrote, ‘even relatively modest charges could place a significant burden upon owners.’ Charges of hundreds and sometimes even thousands of pounds that were in fact levied on many Te Rohe Pōtae blocks ‘inevitably entailed . . . large-scale alienation.’<sup>416</sup>

Even where tribal and hapū leaders did not sell blocks to cover survey liens, survey costs were a significant motivation for sales by individuals. When the Crown acquired a block, its policy was to also take on the survey costs. It adopted this practice in acknowledgement that Māori landowners had no option but to sell 409. Document A79, p 351; doc A67, pp 400–402; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

---

410. Document A79, p 247; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

411. Document A67, p 402; doc A60, pp 1157–1158.

412. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26.

413. Te Moerua Natanahira and 33 others to the Native Minister, 6 February 1893 (doc A79(a) (Husbands and Mitchell), vol 1, p 186); doc A79, p 245.

414. Document A79, p 349.

415. Document A79, p 307.

416. Document A79, p 244.

to the Crown, and that it alone was determining the price. Any individual who retained his or her land therefore faced ongoing debt and interest costs, whereas anyone who sold would get cash immediately and also have the debt cleared.<sup>417</sup>

From 23 October 1894, the Crown granted itself a further means of using survey debt to acquire land. The Native Land Court Act 1894 allowed the court to order that survey debts be repaid in land, regardless of owners' wishes. In practice, whenever Wilkinson applied to the court to be granted title over land he had purchased, he also applied for a portion of the non-sellers' land to cover their survey debts. In effect, Māori landowners were being removed from involvement in determining which of their lands would be taken in repayment of survey costs.<sup>418</sup> By this means, according to Husbands and Mitchell, the Crown acquired 16,704 acres of non-sellers' land up to 1901, in 123 subdivisions, most of which were no larger than a few hundred acres.<sup>419</sup> The land taken by this mechanism was 'particularly significant', Husbands and Mitchell concluded, 'because it involved land that Maori would otherwise not have alienated'.<sup>420</sup>

In 1896, the Crown extended this principle further. The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896 allowed the court, when it was awarding title, to vest a portion of the land in trust for the purpose of selling it to cover survey charges. By this mechanism, 34,340 acres of Rangitoto Tuhua land was taken for survey costs. The proportions taken ranged from 5.7 per cent of the original block up to 54 per cent for Rangitoto Tuhua 37.<sup>421</sup> The Crown conceded that the amounts taken were at times excessive.<sup>422</sup>

Altogether, Husbands and Mitchell calculated that Māori landowners sold 33,438 acres to cover survey costs, and a further 51,870 acres was taken to pay for survey charges under the Native Land Court Act 1894 or Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1896.<sup>423</sup> Boulton arrived at different estimates, but agreed that in excess of 80,000 acres was either sold or taken in order to pay survey liens.<sup>424</sup> The impacts varied widely from block to block.<sup>425</sup> According to Boulton's estimates, more than one-third of the 423-acre<sup>426</sup> Rapaura block was alienated to repay survey liens, as was 28.8 per cent of the 34,508-acre<sup>427</sup> combined area of the Taurangi blocks. Māori owners also lost 15 per cent of Hauturu West and 10.8 per cent of

---

417. Document A79, pp 311–312.

418. Native Land Court Act 1894, s 65; doc A79, pp 317–322; doc A67, p 428.

419. Document A79, pp 317–318, 352–357.

420. Document A79, p 318.

421. Document A79, pp 283, 316, 323, 351–352.

422. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26.

423. Document A79, p 370.

424. Document A67, pp 429–430.

425. Document A67, pp 428–431; doc A79, pp 311–325.

426. Document A21, p 123. At the time of purchase, the Crown believed the block to be 456 acres: doc A67, p 431.

427. Document A21, annex 7, Taurangi and Taurangi 1A, 1B, 2, 3A, 3B, 4, and 5. At the time of purchase, the Crown believed the overall area of the Taurangi blocks to be 34,671 acres: doc A67, p 431.

Hauturu East. More than 37,000 acres of Rangitoto Tuhua land, 8 per cent of the total, was sold or taken for liens.<sup>428</sup>

The restrictions on alienation affected these amounts in two ways. First, as the Crown has conceded, the restrictions meant that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could not pay survey charges by leasing land.<sup>429</sup> Secondly, the amount of land sold or taken to repay survey costs depended entirely on what the Crown was willing to pay in the absence of competition. Witnesses referred to several examples of Māori land-owners protesting at the prices the Crown was offering for sale blocks, and several in which owners offered sale blocks only to find that the proceeds did not cover the entire survey debt and that, therefore, more land had to be sold.<sup>430</sup> We will discuss the fairness of the prices offered in section 11.5.

11.4.4 Did the Crown buy shares before boundaries or title had been determined?

As outlined in section 11.2.1, other Tribunal reports have described the conditions that must be met for Crown purchases of Māori land to be Treaty compliant: the rightful owners must be identified, and their relative interests known; all disputes over mana or ownership must be resolved before the Crown enters negotiations; the whole community must be involved in the decision, not just individuals; the area of land must be clearly defined; the nature of the transaction must be clearly explained; the price must be fair; the transaction must not cause harm to the owners, for example by leaving them without sufficient land for their needs; and the owners must give their free and informed consent.<sup>431</sup>

11.4.4.1 Purchasing before title was determined or survey was complete

On occasions during its first few years of purchasing, the Crown did purchase individual shares before boundaries or ownership had been settled. Claimants argued<sup>432</sup> that this occurred in breach of Ballance's 16 January 1887 promise to Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that '[t]he Government would not purchase any land until the sub-divisions had been made.'<sup>433</sup> As discussed in section 11.3.2, this promise was made in the context of questions from Ormsby and others in which they argued

---

428. Document A67, p 431. Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell did not provide a GIS area for the Rangitoto-Tuhua parent block.

429. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26. Also see doc A67, pp 306, 428.

430. Document A79, pp 324–326.

431. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, p 104; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 617, 625; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 206; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report, p [831]; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, p 456.

432. Submission 3.4.119, p 30.

433. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3; doc A68, p 82; doc A67, p 131. Also see doc A55, p 83; doc A35, p 81.

that no purchasing should take place until the Aotea Rohe Pōtae block had been subdivided along hapū lines and titles individualised.<sup>434</sup>

During 1889, Wilkinson had advised the Native Department that purchasing should occur only in blocks where the survey had been completed and title had been determined with no appeal likely. This advice was reflected in the instructions Wilkinson received in December 1889, with one exception.<sup>435</sup> In its eagerness to get hold of the Waitomo Caves, the Crown authorised Wilkinson to begin purchasing in Hauturu East 1A and 3 in December 1889, in spite of his advice to the Native Department that surveys had not been completed and that it was possible that some owners might seek a rehearing over title.<sup>436</sup>

During 1890, Crown officials grew frustrated at the lack of progress, not only with purchasing but with readying the land for purchase by completing surveys. Hauāuru evidently protested that the Crown should not be purchasing at all, as the land had not yet been subdivided along hapū lines in accordance with Ballance's promise.<sup>437</sup> Wilkinson claimed that the Government had made no such promise, and now began to advocate for purchasing in advance of survey. The Government was initially uncertain about how to proceed, but by August 1890 the Native Department had formed the view that sketch maps were sufficient evidence of boundaries, and could be used as a basis for purchasing.<sup>438</sup>

According to Boulton, Wilkinson did purchase land in advance of survey.<sup>439</sup> However, she gave only two specific examples. The Crown proceeded with the purchase of Waiaraia in August 1891 despite having received clear warnings that the survey boundaries were wrong. Taonui, in July, had written to Wilkinson asking for the sale to be delayed until the boundaries of two neighbouring blocks, Umukaimata and Mohakatino Parininihi (which Taonui referred to as 'Poutama'), were finalised.<sup>440</sup> On the basis of advice from the surveyor general and instructions from the Native Department, Wilkinson proceeded with the purchase. A subsequent survey of Umukaimata found that 6,000 of Waiaraia's 12,360 acres belonged to the neighbouring blocks.<sup>441</sup> The owners of Umukaimata subsequently 434. 'Mr Ballance at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 29 January 1887, p 3; 'The Native Minister at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 27 January 1887, p 3; doc A68, p 82; doc A67, p 131.

435. Document A67, pp 201, 206–209, 214.

436. Document A67, p 201.

437. Document A67, p 241.

438. Document A67(a), vol 1, pp 174–177; doc A67, pp 241, 245–246; doc A79, pp 220–221; doc A55, p 83.

439. Document A67, p 246.

440. Document A79, pp 564–582; doc A28 (Thomas), pp 400–401; doc A67, p 404; doc A55, pp 111–112. Also see Gudgeon to chief judge regarding Mohakatino Parininihi surveys, Native Land Court, Otorohanga Minute Book 13, p 49 (doc A28(a) (Thomas document bank), vol 2, p 657); doc A60, pp 1157, 1167; doc A95(i), Crown purchases; doc A21, annex 7, Waiaraia block.

441. Document A79, pp 564–582; doc A28, pp 400–401. Also see Native Land Court, Otorohanga Minute Book 13, p 49 (doc A28(a), vol 2, p 657).

petitioned Parliament in 1907, and six years later received 2,500 acres to compensate for the error. Owners sought more land in 1925 and 1936, without result.<sup>442</sup>

In Wharepuhunga, Wilkinson was instructed to start buying individual shares in August 1890, even though the court had not yet formally issued the title, let alone considered owners' relative interests or ordered any subdivision along tribal lines. Furthermore, the external boundary was disputed by one of the owners.<sup>443</sup> The court did not issue its final judgment on the block until May 1892, by which time Wilkinson and other purchasing officers had succeeded in acquiring some or all of the shares owned by three of the four claimant groups.<sup>444</sup>

Boulton also discussed alleged irregularities in court processes, which had led Wilkinson to buy shares from owners whose rights to the land were not clear. She described a report from Wilkinson to Lewis in 1892, referring to three owners appearing on the title to Hauturu East 3 who had not appeared on the title to the Hauturu East parent block. One of those three had sold her share to the Crown before Wilkinson became aware of the issue. Similarly, the title to Hauturu East 2A named 10 people who had not been on the title to Hauturu East 2.<sup>445</sup>

According to Wilkinson, Judge Gudgeon of the Native Land Court had confirmed that no one should be listed on a subdivision title who had not been on the title to the parent block. Wilkinson was clearly concerned: he regarded it as 'unfortunate' that he had purchased one of the questionable shares. He recommended that the Native Department check all Te Rohe Pōtae subdivision lists to ensure that any irregularities could be resolved. It is not clear how the department responded, if at all.<sup>446</sup>

Boulton also referred to 1892 allegations of irregularities on the titles to the Puketarata, Puketarata 6, Tokanui 1, and Pokuru blocks. According to her, a settler claimed that some of the owners were missing from the titles to these blocks, while others appeared on the title without having any legitimate interest. The settler claimed that these matters would soon be put before the court, though it is not clear whether that occurred.<sup>447</sup> The Crown had been actively purchasing in the Puketarata blocks since 1890, and in 1894 partitioned its interests in 15 Puketarata blocks.<sup>448</sup> It purchased Pokuru 2E in 1898. There is no record of it purchasing shares in Tokanui during the 1890s.<sup>449</sup>

---

442. Document A28, pp 400–401; doc A79, pp 582–594.

443. Document A60, pp 1208–1224, 1227–1233; doc A79, pp 236–237, 248–249, 254; doc A55, pp 112–113; doc A67, p 210; 'The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3.

444. Document A60, pp 1227–1228; 'The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3.

445. Document A67, pp 239–240; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 316–318.

446. Document A67, p 239; Wilkinson to Sheridan, 29 January 1892 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 316–318).

447. Document A67, p 239; doc A67(a), vol 1, p 314.

448. Document A79, p 265.

449. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

11.4.4.2 Purchasing before relative interests were defined

Many of the blocks in Te Rohe Pōtae had large numbers of owners, sometimes numbering in the hundreds. Each of those owners had different connections to the land. Some had deep ancestral connections which had been kept alive through continuous occupation over many generations. Others had ancestral connections, but they and their immediate forebears lived in other parts of the district. Others had left the district entirely some generations earlier, following Te Rauparaha to Kapiti or emigrating elsewhere, and were included on the title out of ‘aroha’ (often translated at the time as ‘affection’). Some men were on titles only through marriage to women with rights in the land.<sup>450</sup> Hone Kaora of Ngāti Hikairo, explaining ownership lists for Kāwhia subdivisions, told the court that each had ‘the largest owners’, ‘the smaller’, and ‘those admitted through “aroha”’.<sup>451</sup> The exact picture varied from one land block to the next, but it was common for each block to have a number of owners who were on the title through distant ancestral connection that was not supported by ahi kā – that is, by active occupation or use.<sup>452</sup>

The inclusion of owners with differing interests could have significant implications for the Crown’s land purchasing operations. First, it meant that some blocks contained owners with little connection to the land, who were therefore vulnerable to selling. Secondly, until relative interests were defined, no one could be certain of the relative value of any owner’s shares. If the Crown purchased on the basis that all shares were equal, those with lesser interests would be overpaid and those with greater interests would be underpaid.<sup>453</sup> From August 1888, whenever the Native Land Court awarded title to a block of land it was required also to determine relative interests.<sup>454</sup> But, prior to 1892, the court in Ōtorohanga typically neglected this requirement, possibly at the request of owners who were reluctant to complete the process of title determination and therefore render their land vulnerable to sale.<sup>455</sup>

During 1889, Crown officials considered how to handle this issue, and decided to start purchasing anyway and to assume that all shares were of equal value. By doing this, Lewis reasoned, the owners with greater interests would realise they were likely to miss out and would quickly return to the court seeking definition of relative interests.<sup>456</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae leaders expressed their clear opposition to this approach. Hauāuru, as noted above, regarded it as a breach of Ballance’s 1887 promise that purchasing would not begin until the title determination and

450. Document A79, pp 193–194, 217–218; doc A67, pp 234–236. Also see ‘The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court’, New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3; ‘Reports from Officers in Native Districts’, AJHR, 1891, G-5, p 4.

451. 9 Otorohanga MB 86 (doc A79, p 194). Also see Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 10 June 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-5, p 4; doc A67, p 236.

452. Document A67, pp 236, 240–241; doc A79, pp 236–242; ‘The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court’, New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3.

453. Document A67, pp 236–241; doc A79, pp 236–242, 248–249.

454. Document A79, pp 219–220; doc A67, p 212.

455. Document A79, pp 236–242; doc A67, pp 234–245.

456. Document A67, pp 207–209.

subdivision processes were complete.<sup>457</sup> Owners of Puketarata, Takotokoraha, Maungarangi, and Ouruwhero wrote to the Native Minister in May 1890 warning that Crown purchases before relative interests were defined would inevitably become the subject of grievances or disputes, and asking that the Crown hold off.<sup>458</sup> Likewise, some of the Ngāti Raukawa owners of Wharepuhunga wrote to Wilkinson in February 1891 with the same warning.<sup>459</sup> Owners of Te Kopua and other blocks expressed similar misgivings.<sup>460</sup> The Crown's response was not to hold off purchasing. Rather, it sought to persuade owners to return to the court to define relative interests, and it also pressured the court to give priority to this work, which it did from 1892. In the last six months of that year, relative interests were defined for more than 100 land blocks or subdivisions.<sup>461</sup>

None of the witnesses provided a definitive list of blocks in which purchasing progressed before relative interests were known. The relatively small number of individual shares purchased during 1890 and 1891 probably meant it was not a major issue in most blocks. Boulton did describe examples of owners being underpaid in Te Kopua<sup>462</sup> and of absentee owners being overpaid in Wharepuhunga.<sup>463</sup> We will discuss these in section 11.5.

11.4.5 What methods did the Crown use to acquire shares from individuals?

Once Wilkinson had used survey charges to break Te Rohe Pōtae Māori resistance to sales, he was able to purchase by the usual Crown method of acquiring geographically undefined shares from individuals. This was the method by which he completed the vast majority of Crown purchases in the district. Husbands and Mitchell described the process:

Armed with pre-prepared purchase deeds that appear to the casual eye like modern day petitions with pre-printed lines and columns for the names and signatures of 'the vendors' and 'attesting witnesses,' the land purchase officer [Wilkinson] actively pursued the interest of every owner. In return for the owner's signature on the deed agreeing to 'surrender, convey and assure unto her Majesty the Queen' their share of the land in question, the land purchase officer provided the seller with a cheque for his or her proportion of the block's purchase price calculated according to their relative interest.<sup>464</sup>

The success of this approach depended on Wilkinson's tireless pursuit of individual signatures. As Husbands and Mitchell described it, he criss-crossed the

---

457. Document A55, p 83.

458. Document A67, p 240.

459. Document A60, pp 1217–1218, 1221–1222. Also see doc A55, p 113.

460. Document A67, pp 240–241.

461. Document A79, pp 238–239.

462. Document A67, pp 237–238. Also see doc A55, pp 103–104.

463. Document A79, p 237; doc A60, pp 1217–1218, 1229–1230, 1233–1234.

464. Document A79, pp 247–248.

region seeking the handful of individuals in each block who might be persuaded to sell their shares, despite rangatira and communal opposition and despite their own sense of shame.<sup>465</sup>

Success also depended on Wilkinson's success at identifying owners who were most vulnerable to his efforts at persuasion, including those with least interest in the land and those most in direct need of cash. As already discussed, creating and exploiting 'want of money' was an important element of the Crown's programme for the whole district. The hybrid land title system introduced in this and other districts made it difficult for Māori landowners to manage land collectively and therefore mitigated against development. The restrictions on alienation further hampered development by preventing owners from leasing or borrowing to raise capital. And the Crown conspicuously failed to offer either financial or technical assistance.

The Crown was fully aware of the effects of this system, from its own previous purchasing experience and from the disastrous effects of private purchasing from individuals that had occurred since the 1860s. During the 1880s, some members of the House of Representatives had warned against further individualisation of title or purchasing from individuals. Even if the Crown had not been aware, it was certainly reminded in May 1891 when the Native Land Laws Commission issued its report. The commission described the 'confusion, loss, demoralisation, and litigation without precedent' that had followed individualisation of Māori land titles, and the inevitable results: leaders could no longer manage land transactions or collective economic endeavours. Instead, individuals could sell in secret, enticed by purchase officers who deliberately created want of money.<sup>466</sup>

The alienation of Native land under this law took its very worst form and its most disastrous tendency. It was obtained from a helpless people . . . The strength which lies in union was taken from them. The authority of their natural rulers was destroyed.

Parliament had passed other disastrous laws, the commission reported, 'but it is difficult to find a parallel to the evil consequences which have resulted'.<sup>467</sup> As noted earlier, the commission also reported that Māori throughout the country were unanimous in their opposition to individuals having rights to sell tribal and hapū lands.<sup>468</sup> The Crown seems to have taken the commission's report not as a warning but as a template. Throughout the 1890s, Wilkinson systematically purchased shares from individuals. As part of this general approach, Wilkinson actively sought opportunities to target individuals who might be particularly vulnerable to persuasion and only very rarely turned down such opportunities. We will consider

465. Document A79, p 248.

466. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws', AJHR, 1891, G-1, pp ix-xix.

467. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws', AJHR, 1891, G-1, p x.

468. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the Native Land Laws', AJHR, 1891, G-1, p xix.

three categories of vulnerable seller: those who had little connection to the land; those who were in debt or urgent need of money; and minors.

11.4.5.1 *The Wharepuhunga block: absentee sellers and those with lesser interests

When the Native Land Court considered the Wharepuhunga block during the early 1890s, ownership was heavily contested. The block had traditionally been Ngāti Raukawa territory, but its pattern of occupation had been heavily influenced by the conflicts and migrations that occurred in the 1810s and 1820s. Most Ngāti Raukawa had migrated south to Kāpiti, and some had gone elsewhere such as Taupō, Rotorua, and Heretaunga (Hawkes Bay).<sup>469</sup> According to the court's 1892 judgment, the block was protected by Peehi Tūkorehu, who was of Ngāti Raukawa descent but had declared his affiliation to Ngāti Maniapoto, and was occupied by two of his nephews, Te Kohika (Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Te Koherā) and Te Ngohi Kāwhia (Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Maniapoto, but also of senior Ngāti Raukawa descent; Kāwhia was a Treaty signatory and the father of Rewi Maniapoto). In turn, they were joined by others of Ngāti Raukawa who returned from Taupō and other places with Peehi's permission.<sup>470</sup> When the court finally awarded title for the Wharepuhunga block in 1892, Judge Gudgeon found that the block had 954 owners. Of those, the judge assessed that 572 had been placed on the title out of aroha, which meant (by his definition) they had ancestral connections to the land but neither they nor their recent ancestors had lived there.<sup>471</sup>

The Crown had begun purchasing in the block in August 1890, without waiting for title to be issued or relative interests defined. Armed with lists of owners from an initial court hearing in 1890, Wilkinson and the Taupouuiatia block land purchase officer William Grace targeted owners who did not live on the block.<sup>472</sup> This purchasing allowed the Crown to gain a foothold in the block. As Husbands and Mitchell observed, absentee owners were 'particularly susceptible to government offers to alienate their shares' as they were '[r]emoved from the sanction of the local community, and [had] no immediate use for the land themselves.'<sup>473</sup> It occurred despite protests from Ngāti Raukawa occupants of Wharepuhunga. In one letter, the rangatira Te Wehou Rangitutia, acknowledged as one of the block's principal owners, objected to land being sold by those whose 'fires never burned on the block.'<sup>474</sup> In another, 70 Ngāti Raukawa women informed the Native

469. 'The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3; doc A60, pp 1212–1228; doc A12 (Hearn), pp 280–285.

470. 'The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3; doc A60, pp 1212–1228; doc A12, pp 280–285. Also see doc A83 (Te Hiko), pp 215–218, 228–230; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, vol 1, p 148.

471. 'The Wharepuhunga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3; doc A60, pp 1212–1228; doc A12, pp 280–285.

472. Document A60, pp 1217–1232.

473. Document A79, p 248.

474. Wehou to Wilkinson, 3 February 1891 (doc A60, pp 1217–1218). Also see doc A55, p 113. Some sources named Te Wehou as Rangitutia Wehou.

Minister that '[t]his is the only block of land we have', and that continued Crown purchasing would leave 'the greater part of us . . . landless'.<sup>475</sup>

By the time relative interests were defined in May 1892, the Crown had already purchased shares from 159 owners, mainly from Ngāti Te Kohera, Ngāti Parekāwa, Ngāti Ngārongo, Ngāti Paretekawa, and Ngāti Whakatere.<sup>476</sup> For some of these purchases, the Crown paid a 2s 6d inducement to the Ngāti Te Koherā and Ngāti Parekāwa rangatira Ngahuru (aka Ngakuru) Te Rangikaiwhiria for each signature obtained. This occurred at Grace's suggestion – he had used similar tactics in the Tauponuiatia block. Wilkinson opposed it, but the Native Department overruled him.<sup>477</sup>

Purchasing continued after relative interests were defined. Wilkinson put a particular focus on the 200 Ngāti Raukawa whose forebears had moved to Kāpiti and who had been placed on the title out of aroha. In July 1892, the Native Department entered into an agreement with the Ōtaki postmaster, offering him a commission of 2 shillings for every signature on the Wharepuhunga sale deed. The Crown also acquired shares from sellers in Taupō, Hawkes Bay, Whakatāne, and Whanganui.<sup>478</sup> By 1894, the Crown had acquired well over one-quarter of the block's shares, almost all from people who did not live there. On 3 April, the court awarded the Crown 37,767 acres from the block's total area of 133,449 acres. The Crown continued to purchase in the block, though it is not clear who from, eventually acquiring another 20,805 acres by 1899.<sup>479</sup>

Other than Wharepuhunga, Husbands and Mitchell record that Wilkinson purchased interests from owners based in 'Porirua, Otaki, the Rangaitikei, Parihaka, Auckland and even Australia'.<sup>480</sup> These owners had interests in blocks including Hauturu West, Kawhia, Orahiri, Taharoa, Mangawhero, and Kinohaku East and West.<sup>481</sup> While the evidence is less conclusive, Paul Thomas, in his Mōkau history report, reports that the Crown purchase officers obtained signatures for the Mohakatino Parininihi block from owners based in Rotorua, Coromandel, Ōtaki, Wellington, and Auckland sold their interests.<sup>482</sup>

475. Document A60, p 1234; doc A55, pp 116–117.

476. Document A60, pp 1232–1233.

477. Document A60, pp 1220–1224; doc A67, p 246; doc A55, p 115. On one occasion in the Tauponuiatia block, Grace sought permission to reduce purchase prices and use the money saved to pay inducements to rangatira, and on another occasion he offered a rangatira 100 acres of Crown land in return for him procuring signatures. In that block, Grace had also bribed witnesses to falsify evidence before the court, and arranged with shopkeepers to provide goods to Māori on credit, in order to force them into selling their shares: doc A55, p 64; doc A67, pp 177–178, 246, 359–360; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, pp 490–491.

478. Document A79, pp 248–249; doc A60, pp 1232–1242.

479. Document A21, annex 7, Wharepuhunga block, p [3]; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

480. Document A79, p 248.

481. Document A79(a), vol 1, pp 57–59, 81–84, 208–210.

482. Document A28, p 406.

11.4.5.2 Sellers in need of cash

As well as targeting absentee sellers in the Wharepuhunga block, and using survey debts to leverage sales more generally, Wilkinson also sometimes targeted individuals who were considered vulnerable to sale because of want of money. This was not mere opportunism. In his 1890 annual report to the House of Representatives, Wilkinson had indicated that he intended to target Māori landowners who became indebted to European storekeepers or who fell into debt when farming operations failed.<sup>483</sup> Later, in 1897, he encouraged the Crown to build more roads so that Māori would buy wagons and buggies, thereby getting themselves into debt.<sup>484</sup>

Witnesses provided some examples of Māori landowners who offered shares for sale after they had (in the words of Husbands and Mitchell) ‘fallen upon hard times’.<sup>485</sup> Marr recorded that Wilkinson obtained his first shares in Kakepuku only after finding an owner who had fallen into debt.<sup>486</sup> Husbands and Mitchell referred to an elderly man who had fallen ill and sold his shares in a Kāwhia subdivision in December 1892 in order to obtain enough money to support him through the final months or years of his life; a kuia who sold shares in Mangauika 1 in 1896 because she was in urgent need of money; another kuia who sold shares in three Kinohaku East subdivisions because she needed money to visit a sick relative in Auckland.<sup>487</sup> Finally, Thomas provided evidence of a man trying to sell his brother’s interests in Mohakatino Parininihi due to his ‘great need of the cash.’<sup>488</sup>

11.4.5.3 Minors’ shares

The Maori Real Estate Management Act 1888 empowered the Native Land Court to appoint trustees for any minors (people under the age of 21) who held land interests. Trustees were empowered to sell or lease land interests, but only with the approval of a Supreme Court judge. The Act required that the proceeds from any sale or lease must be held in trust by the Public Trustee, and could be paid out only with a judge’s consent.<sup>489</sup> It appears to have been routine in this inquiry district for minors to be named on the title,<sup>490</sup> and for their interests to be vested in trustees.<sup>491</sup> Te Kopua 1, for example, had 37 adults and 49 minors.<sup>492</sup>

483. Document A67, pp 228–229; doc A55, pp 75–76.

484. Document A67(a), vol 2, p 618. Wilkinson recommended roads linking Ōtorohanga with Kihikihi and Te Kūiti, and with the Kāwhia–Alexandra road.

485. Document A79, p 249.

486. Document A55, pp 122–123.

487. Document A79, p 249; doc A79(a), vol 1, pp 221–222.

488. Document A28, pp 405–406.

489. Maori Real Estate Management Act 1888, s 6. Also see doc A79, p 416; doc A67, p 247.

490. Document A67, p 247; doc A79, pp 1, 3, 149, 151, 213, 286–287.

491. Document A79, pp 1, 286–287.

492. Document A67(a), vol 1, p 212. Similarly, in the Puketarata block there were 111 minors listed on the title: doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 202–205; doc A67, pp 247–248, 418. The proportion of minors’ interests also appears to have been significant in Pirongia West: doc A67, p 164.

When the Crown began purchasing, it was reluctant to purchase minors' shares if the court had not yet defined relative interests. This was not because it opposed purchases from minors in principle, but because it was afraid of losing out if it paid full price and the Native Land Court subsequently found that the minors owned only part-shares, as was often the case. In Puketarata and Waiwhakaata in 1890, Wilkinson refused to buy minors' shares for this reason.<sup>493</sup> He showed much less reluctance once relative interests had been defined. In 1891, for example, he purchased the shares of three minors in Te Kopua 1Q. Wilkinson forwarded the proceeds to the Public Trustee, and also sent an affidavit to Wellington so the purchase could be confirmed by the Supreme Court.<sup>494</sup>

Soon afterwards he wrote to the Native Department arguing that, for small purchases of minors' shares, judicial approval should not be required, and that the payments should be made directly to the minor's trustee instead of to the Public Trustee. He gave two reasons. First, he said, the sums involved were typically very small, providing only enough to buy some clothes or blankets, and under those circumstances there was little need for 'stringent inquiry' by a judge. Secondly, that Māori adults who held minors' shares in trust were refusing to sell, because they would not receive the purchase money. Some owners were reluctant to sell for another reason: they expected land prices to increase, and wanted their children to have the benefit.<sup>495</sup> The Government quickly enacted Wilkinson's suggestions. In 1892, the law was amended to provide that minors' shares worth less than £10 could be sold without judicial approval; larger sales would still require judicial approval. That year, Wilkinson purchased six minors' shares in the Wharepuhunga block.<sup>496</sup>

In 1893, the law was amended again to allow the proceeds from sales of minors' shares worth less than £10 to be paid directly to their trustee, who was usually a parent or guardian, rather than being held in trust by the Public Trustee.<sup>497</sup> And from 1894, according to Husbands and Mitchell, 'the Crown's land purchase officers appear to have been largely uninhibited in their acquisition of minors' interests in blocks that were under purchase.'<sup>498</sup> They gave two examples. One was Mahoenui A, which was owned by 19 minors; by 1899, the Crown had purchased the shares of 16.<sup>499</sup> The other was Pirongia West, where the Crown purchased 163 individual shares in the three years to November 1897, of which 38 belonged to

493. Document A67, pp 217, 237, 247–248; doc A79, pp 417–418; doc A55, p 82.

494. Document A67, pp 248–249; doc A79, p 418; Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 27 May 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 300–302); Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 28 May 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 304–307).

495. Wilkinson to Under-Secretary, Native Department, 27 May 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 301); doc A79, pp 416–418; doc A67, p 249; doc A55, p 61.

496. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s15; doc A67, p 249; doc A79, pp 417–419.

497. Maori Real Estate Management Act 1888 Amendment Act 1893, s 4; doc A67, p 249; doc A79, pp 417–419.

498. Document A79, p 419.

499. Document A79, pp 419–420.

minors. Twenty of those were acquired within the first month of purchasing.<sup>500</sup> 'If the Pirongia West deed is any indication, by the middle of the 1890s the Crown land purchase officer was making little distinction between adults and minors when acquiring interests in a block, purchasing from both as the occasion arrived.'<sup>501</sup>

11.4.6 Did the Crown buy land that the court had declared inalienable?

The Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888 directed the court, when awarding title, to determine whether each owner had sufficient land for his support. If an owner did not have sufficient land, the court was required to determine how much land the owner needed for his support and declare that land inalienable.<sup>502</sup> The court could also remove the restrictions, but only if a majority of owners applied to the court and all owners agreed, and then only if the owners would continue to have sufficient land for their occupation and support.<sup>503</sup>

In practice, as land blocks were going through the court, Māori owners frequently asked for restrictions to be imposed under which specific subdivisions would be inalienable. At Wahanui's request, the entire 1886 Rohe Pōtae block was declared inalienable when it was created, apparently to protect owners from any attempts to purchase before the block was divided into tribal and hapū subdivisions.<sup>504</sup> Subsequently, as the subdivisions were created, the court declared a significant number of blocks inalienable. A schedule prepared by the Native Department for the year ending 31 December 1889 listed 24 blocks that had been declared inalienable, ranging in size from 12 acres for Kakepuku 8 to 36,288 acres for Pirongia West. Together, these blocks covered an area of 74,345 acres (see table 11.4).<sup>505</sup> Husbands and Mitchell identified a further 19 blocks with a combined area of 15,537 acres,<sup>506</sup> and Berghan identified another seven blocks with a combined area of 58,525 acres.<sup>507</sup> Most of these blocks were declared inalienable after Wilkinson's October 1889 memorandum.

The Tribunal in Te Urewera regarded these court-ordered restrictions as important safeguards, ensuring that communities retained sufficient land and, at least in theory, giving communities some degree of collective control over alienations. 'In reality,' however, the restrictions offered no protection at all, as 'the Crown purchased individual interests as if there were no restrictions on titles.'<sup>508</sup> In this district, the Crown appears to have shown some initial reluctance to purchase land that had been declared inalienable. In October 1889, when he was identifying

---

500. Document A79, p 419.

501. Document A79, p 427. Also see pp 419–420.

502. Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 13.

503. Native Land Court Act 1886 Amendment Act 1888, s 6.

504. Document A79, pp 151–152. Also see doc A60, p 86.

505. Document A91, vol 2, pp 315–319.

506. Document A79, pp 194–195, 267–268, 422, 452.

507. Document A60, pp 304–305, 382, 525, 530, 561, 579–580, 775, 1045.

508. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp 1272–1273.

blocks for purchase, Wilkinson informed the Native Department that he '[took] it for granted that such restrictions would not interfere with Govt purchases.'<sup>509</sup> But, a year later, the Native Department instructed him not to buy shares in the Pukeroa Hangatiki block, which the court had declared inalienable except by lease.<sup>510</sup> This did not mean that the Crown opposed purchasing in such blocks; rather, it was not certain of its legal position. Its response to this was to change the law, weakening the protection offered to land that had been declared inalienable.

The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1890 allowed the Native Land Court to remove restrictions if a simple majority of owners agreed; the consent of all owners was no longer needed.<sup>511</sup> Then in 1892, the Native Land Purchases Act allowed the governor to remove or declare void any court-ordered restrictions on alienation of Māori land 'for the purposes of a sale to Her Majesty'.<sup>512</sup> During 1892, Wilkinson completed the purchase of the 200-acre Whakairoiro 4 and the 400-acre Mangarapa 3. In both cases, the court had declared the parent blocks inalienable except by lease or with the governor's consent. In 1893, Wilkinson made his first share purchases in the Te Kuiti block, which was subject to similar restrictions. We do not have evidence that the governor had removed the court-ordered restrictions, though that seems likely.<sup>513</sup>

In 1894, the Crown exempted itself from court-ordered restrictions. Section 76 of the Native Land Court Act 1894 provided that:

Nothing in this Act contained shall limit or affect the power of the Crown to purchase or acquire any estate, share, right, or interest in any land or Native land, nor the power of any Native to cede, sell, or transfer any such estate, share, rights, or interest to the Crown.

Section 52 of the Act also empowered the court to remove restrictions with the consent of at least one-third of the owners – the consent of a majority was no longer required, let alone the consent of all owners.

From 1895 onwards, Crown purchasing in formerly restricted blocks accelerated.<sup>514</sup> In all, as shown in table 11.4, during the calendar years 1890 to 1904 the Crown completed purchases in 25 of the 50 blocks that had been declared inalienable. Its purchases during that period amounted to 36,489 acres from the 148,407 acres that had been declared inalienable. These figures include only completed

---

509. Wilkinson to Lewis, Under-Secretary, Native Department, 24 October 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 125; doc A67, p 215). Wilkinson expressed disregard for the restrictions on other occasions: see doc A60, p 1292.

510. Document A79, p 424.

511. Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1890, s 3.

512. Native Land Purchases Act 1892, s 14.

513. Document A79, pp 424–425, 452; doc A95(i), Crown purchases; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 129–131.

514. Document A79, pp 424–425, 452; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

purchases; the Crown may have acquired shares in many more blocks during this period.<sup>515</sup>

The total area of Crown purchases in inalienable blocks might also be much larger. Berghan recorded that the Ngāti Raukawa owners of the 133,449-acre<sup>516</sup> Wharepuhunga block asked in 1888 for it to be declared inalienable. However, if the order was made, it appears to have been lifted when Ngāti Raukawa leaders later asked for the block to be vested in King Tāwhiao.<sup>517</sup> Between 1890 and 1905, the Crown purchased 58,572 acres in this block, against the clear wishes of some of the principal owners.<sup>518</sup> Berghan also noted that ‘several’ Rangitoto Tuhua blocks had been declared inalienable but did not specify which blocks or the dates on which the orders were made.<sup>519</sup> The titles were typically issued for the Rangitoto Tuhua blocks between 1897 and 1900.<sup>520</sup> As shown in table 11.7, the Crown purchased just under 25,000 acres in Rangitoto Tuhua blocks during 1900–1905.

The significance of these purchases is that Māori landowners had expressed clear wishes to the court that their lands be made inalienable (or, in some cases, that their lands be made inalienable by sale or mortgage, while leasing was permitted). Whereas the Crown’s restrictions prohibited only private transactions, the owners intended these restrictions to also apply to the Crown and to protect land for future generations.

One measure of owners’ opposition to sales in these blocks is the relatively slow progress Wilkinson typically made. In Kinohaku East 5, for example, he purchased the first share in April 1896, but four years later had succeeded in acquiring only 15 shares from the block’s 54 owners.<sup>521</sup> Similarly, in several of the Puketarata blocks, Wilkinson succeeded in acquiring only a small proportion of the individual shares.<sup>522</sup>

Owners also directly expressed their opposition to Crown purchasing in these blocks. In 1894, Hotutaua Pakukohatu and 11 other rangatira appealed to Seddon to ‘give full effect’ to the court’s restrictions over Kinohaku East 1 (Ototoika). The land, they said, had been occupied by themselves and their forebears for seven generations. It ‘should be reserved permanently for us and our descendants’, and should ‘remain as a whole for the people.’<sup>523</sup> This appears to have been a response to Wilkinson’s activities: in the same month, he purchased the Crown’s first four

---

515. Husbands and Mitchell recorded the timing of individual share purchases for some of the blocks: doc A79, p 452. Berghan recorded that almost all of Orahiri 3 was partitioned and awarded to the Crown in 1907. However, other sources do not record Crown purchases in this block at this time: doc A60, p 616; doc A95(i), Crown purchases; doc A21, annex 7, Orahiri block.

516. Document A21, annex 7, Wharepuhunga blocks.

517. Document A60, pp 1209, 1212–1216; doc A79, p 178.

518. Document A21, annex 7, Wharepuhunga blocks.

519. Document A60, p 914.

520. Document A79, p 282.

521. Document A79, pp 424–425.

522. Document A79, pp 267, 424–425; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

523. Hotutaua Pakukohatu and 11 others to premier, 20 March 1894 (doc A79, pp 270–271, 425).

shares in Ototoika.<sup>524</sup> We do not know if they received any response from Seddon. The Crown continued with its purchasing plans. In 1895, Wilkinson dismissed the owners' claims to the land through ancestral connection and continuous occupation as 'mere sentiment'. He acknowledged that Pakukohatu and the other writers were 'leading members of the tribe', but advocated that each of the block's 187 owners 'might be left to decide themselves whether he will or will not sell his interest'.<sup>525</sup> Wilkinson continued purchasing and by 1898 had 16 more shares, enough for a Crown subdivision of 153 acres.<sup>526</sup>

Similarly, Hoani Haereiti told the court in 1899 that, when the title was investigated in 1889, he had 'asked that the [Marokopa block] land be made inalienable so that the land be retained for the people'. The court had made such an order, and he could not understand why the Crown was now applying to have the block partitioned. The judge responded that, under the law, a court order could not prevent the Crown from buying. The Crown was awarded almost half of the 5,000-acre block.<sup>527</sup>

11.4.7 Did the Crown establish reserves, and did it later buy reserve land?

Before the Crown began to buy land in the district, the Native Minister (Mitchelson) had promised that reserves would be set aside to ensure that Māori could retain sufficient land for their needs.<sup>528</sup> Soon afterwards, the Native Department advised the Minister that 10 per cent of all land the Crown purchased should be set aside as reserves, not to protect Māori from landlessness, but as 'an incentive to sell'.<sup>529</sup> Wilkinson's instructions subsequently gave him discretion to offer reserves on 'large blocks', on condition that the Crown selected their location, they did not include any railway land, and they were not offered if Wilkinson considered them 'undesirable or unnecessary'.<sup>530</sup> These exchanges revealed much about the Crown's approach. When Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had agreed to place their land before the Native Land Court, their intention was that they would manage the settlement process, including deciding which lands might be offered for sale or lease, and which would be retained. The Crown's approach was that it should make those decisions.

In practice, relatively few reserves were made. Boulton identified 23,<sup>531</sup> all created as part of early purchases. Most were very small, ranging from half an acre

524. Document A79, pp 271–272.

525. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 14 May 1895 (doc A79, p 271).

526. Document A79, p 271.

527. 34 Otorohanga MB 170–171 (doc A79, pp 425–426). Also see doc A79, pp 271–272; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

528. Document A67, pp 185–186, 216; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 102–104.

529. Lewis to Mitchelson, 18 December 1889 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 137). Also see doc A55, p 89; doc A67, pp 249–250.

530. Lewis to Wilkinson, 17 January 1890 (doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 157–159); doc A91, vol 2, pp 303–305; doc A67, pp 219–220, 223–224.

531. Thirteen were in Puketarata, three were in Te Kopua, two were in Mangauika, others were in Maungarangi, Ouruwhero, Takotokoraha, Waiwhakaata, and Wharepuhunga: doc A67, pp 432–433. The Crown submitted that 24 reserves were made but did not identify them: submission 3.4.307, p 39.

to 190 acres. The exception was the Wharepuhunga Reserve, created as part of the Crown's initial purchases from that block.<sup>532</sup> From 1891, Wilkinson began to offer higher prices (typically, an extra sixpence per acre) to sellers who agreed to forego reserves. Wilkinson explained to the Native Department that the few owners who were willing to sell typically did not live on the land and had little connection to it, and therefore preferred cash to reserves. Those who did live on a block would not sell.<sup>533</sup> Two years later, he advised the Native Department:

A large number of owners have, when selling their shares to me, expressed a wish to get the cash represented by the area of reserves they were entitled to as they never intend to live on the block and therefore set no store on the reserves. It is a pity they were ever made.<sup>534</sup>

It appears that, after 1894, reserves were only rarely created.<sup>535</sup> In all, the Crown acquired just under 640,000 acres<sup>536</sup> of Māori land in this district during 1890–1905, and appears to have set aside only 5,009 acres in reserves, three-quarters of that in the Wharepuhunga Reserve block.<sup>537</sup> We note that the Crown submitted that the reserves 'made up ten per cent of the area sold in the 1890s'.<sup>538</sup> We assume that this submission was made in error. The Crown purchased 531,130 acres during the 1890s; the reserves amounted to less than one per cent.<sup>539</sup>

Of the 23 reserves created, three ended up in Crown ownership. The first of those was the 30-acre Puketarata 2D Reserve, which had been created in 1897. Two years later, two of the owners offered to sell it, saying they had land elsewhere. Wilkinson sought advice about the proposal, and the surveyor general responded that small reserves of the nature of Puketarata 2D were of 'no practical use' to Māori, and should be acquired wherever possible. Their existence in the midst of Crown lands inevitably interfered with the subdivision process and created a need for special road access.<sup>540</sup> The sale went ahead.<sup>541</sup> In 1910, the Crown purchased the 118-acre Te Kopua 1Q Reserve.<sup>542</sup> In 1917, it purchased the 3,769-acre

532. Document A67, pp 432–433, 472. Berghan identified another five purchases in which 10 per cent reserves were supposed to be returned to sellers. However, we could find no evidence that reserves were set aside: doc A60, pp 1274–1275.

533. Document A67, pp 371–372, 381, 484; doc A55, p 89; doc A60, pp 1139–1140, 1199, 1205–1206.

534. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 2 October 1893 (doc A60, p 1241).

535. Document A60, pp 378, 452, 531, 68, 826–828, 1075, 1241.

536. Document A21, p 131 tbl B5.

537. Document A67, pp 432–433, 472. Berghan identified another five purchases in which 10 per cent reserves were supposed to be returned to sellers. However, we could find no evidence that reserves were set aside: doc A60, pp 1274–1275.

538. Submission 3.4.307, p 39.

539. Document A21, p 127. Douglas, Innes and Mitchell incorrectly recorded 310.5 acres of 1899 purchases as 1889. Those purchases have been included in the 1890s purchasing figures.

540. Chief surveyor to Sheridan, 3 December 1898 (doc A67, pp 433–434).

541. Document A67, pp 432–433; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

542. Document A21, annex 7, Te Kopua blocks (Pirongia SD), p [4].

Wharepuhunga Reserve block.<sup>543</sup> In total, the Crown purchased 3,917 acres – or 78 per cent – of the small area set aside for reserves between 1890 and 1905.

11.4.8 Did the Crown protect Māori landowners' interests when it partitioned land?

As we have seen, the Crown used various tactics to break down communal resistance to land sales. The Crown leveraged survey debt. It bypassed communities and their leaders, buying shares in secret from individual sellers. It targeted owners with little connection to the land, including absentees in Kāpiti and elsewhere. It sometimes targeted owners who had fallen on hard times – some of whose 'hard times' it may have intentionally contributed to by creating 'want of money'. It threatened to take land by compulsion if community leaders did not sell. And it bought indiscriminately, acquiring shares wherever it could, seeking to strangle commercial opportunities while encouraging more cash-commodity consumption and related debt, relievable only through further land sales.

It supported these on-the-ground tactics with legal and economic mechanisms that tended to break down communal authority, hamper land development, and undermine economic well-being. The land title regime destroyed centuries-old communal relationships with land, replacing them with individual tradeable shares. It was the worst of all worlds, in that individuals could sell whenever they chose, which undermined any attempt to develop land collectively, but no individual had a plot of his or her own.<sup>544</sup> As other Tribunals have found, this was a system that led inevitably towards alienation and was designed to do so.<sup>545</sup>

Alongside this land title regime, the restrictions on alienation meant that Māori communities could not lease or mortgage land. While a few were able to raise capital by selling timber rights or entering other resource arrangements which were not covered by the restrictions, most had no means of obtaining capital other than sale and no one they could sell to except the Crown. This, too, undermined development and made owners vulnerable to sale.

The collapse of the negotiations with Cadman at the end of 1891 marked the end of any effective communal resistance to the Crown's purchasing plans. Less than a decade earlier, the district had been governed autonomously under the mana of its hapū and the guidance of senior leaders such as Taonui and Wahanui; now, to use Wilkinson's words, their influence had been 'almost entirely destroyed', to the point where they could no longer determine which lands would be retained and which would be sold.<sup>546</sup>

As discussed earlier, from 1892 the pace of purchasing increased. Taonui died suddenly towards the end of that year, aged 50.<sup>547</sup> There was a further upswing

543. Document A60, p 1256; doc A21, annex 7, Wharepuhunga blocks, p 4.

544. Document A79, p 242.

545. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 2, pp 443–444; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 3, pp 1272–1273; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 784–785.

546. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, p 5. Also see doc A68, p 144; doc A79, pp 185–186.

547. 'Death of Taonui', Evening Post, 6 December 1892, p 3.

in Crown purchasing in 1893 and a dramatic increase in 1894, when the Native Land Court awarded the Crown title to 122,640 acres.<sup>548</sup> Rewi Maniapoto died in June of that year,<sup>549</sup> and he was followed in August by his comrade-in-arms King Tāwhiao.<sup>550</sup> We cannot know if the passing of this generation of leaders contributed to the breakdown of communal resistance to land sales, or merely coincided with it, but by 1894 it was clear that the Crown's purchasing tactics were working. They were working, furthermore, precisely because they had systematically broken down the influence of rangatira over people and land.

One of the measures of this was the extent to which Crown purchasing occurred in spite of opposition from Māori communities and their leaders. Aside from the survey blocks described above, almost all of the purchasing in this district was completed by way of individual shares and without general community involvement.<sup>551</sup> We are aware of only two exceptions. One was the sale of an 85-acre subdivision of Kakepuku in December 1892, which followed a community meeting in Ōtorohanga.<sup>552</sup> The second was the sale of 15,392 acres<sup>553</sup> of Pirongia West land in 1895, which was brokered by the Ngāti Hikairo rangatira Hone Kaora, who persuaded the Crown to increase its price from 3s 6d to 5 shillings per acre in return for delivering more than half of the block's shares.<sup>554</sup>

Other than those isolated examples, the general approach was for Wilkinson to pick off individual shares one or two at a time until he felt he was not likely to be able to get any more. He would then apply to the Native Land Court to have the Crown's interests in the block defined and partitioned off. This purchasing process was slow and painstaking. In the 10,104-acre Ouruwhero, for example, Wilkinson obtained his first signature on 29 May 1890 and a further 10 during the rest of that year. They were followed by four in 1891, 20 in 1892, 10 in 1893, and three in 1894. The block had 205 owners, so in nearly four years of trying he had acquired the shares of just one-quarter of the owners. Wilkinson then applied to the Native Land Court for partition. This resulted in the block being split, with the Crown awarded a 1,761-acre portion in March 1894.<sup>555</sup> Wilkinson then began another round of purchasing from individuals, and in 1899 the owners' remaining land was split 25 ways, with the Crown acquiring four portions totalling 2,518 acres.<sup>556</sup> In all, the Crown acquired 4,289 out of 10,104 acres – or 43 per cent – over 10 years.

---

548. Document A21, p131 tbl B5.

549. 'Death of Rewi: A Famous Chieftain of the Olden Time', New Zealand Herald, 23 June 1894, p3.

550. 'Death of Tawhiao', Waikato Times, 28 August 1894, p3.

551. Document A79, pp 247–250; doc A67(a), vol 2, pp 349, 358–359, 370–371, 397, 416, 421, 464, 513, 525, 634, 652.

552. Document A79, p 247; doc A60, p 206.

553. The subdivisions sold were Pirongia West 1C1 (1,459 acres) and 3A (13,933 acres): doc A21, annex 7, Pirongia West blocks; doc A95(i), Crown purchases.

554. Document A79, p 247; doc A60, pp 753–756.

555. Document A79, pp 249–250; doc A95(i), Crown purchases; doc A60, pp 688–689; doc A21, annex 7, Ouruwhero.

556. Document A60, pp 689–690.

Similarly, in the Puketarata block, Wilkinson obtained signatures from 27 owners (out of 397) during 1890, nine in 1891, 61 in 1892, 51 in 1893, and seven in January 1894, coming to a grand total of 155 or 39 per cent of the owners.<sup>557</sup> During 1893 and 1894, the Crown was awarded title to no fewer than 16 separate Puketarata blocks, with a combined land area of 4,671 acres or 26 per cent of the total block.<sup>558</sup> Again, this was followed by further purchasing. The Crown acquired title to five more subdivisions in 1897, six more in 1898, and two in 1899.<sup>559</sup>

The same pattern was repeated throughout the district, with most blocks subjected to successive waves of purchasing and partitioning. According to Husbands and Mitchell, other than judges and assessors, Wilkinson was the principal actor in the court from 1892 through to the early decades of the following century, largely due to his repeated applications for land to be partitioned.<sup>560</sup> He applied for partitions 'at least 300 times' between March 1894 and December 1901.<sup>561</sup> The peak years for partitioning occurred in 1894 and 1898, with smaller spikes in 1895, 1897, 1899, and 1901, but Wilkinson remained highly active in the years between, acquiring individual shares.<sup>562</sup>

This pattern of purchasing had two important implications for Māori land-owners. First, each share transaction was between the seller and the Crown, and many took place in secret. Non-sellers could not know whether the Crown had bought shares in their land, and if so how much. Secondly, at the time of sale no one involved – the Crown, sellers, and non-sellers – could know exactly which area of land was being sold. It was only when the Crown applied to the court to partition its interests that the shares were converted to actual land.<sup>563</sup>

Wilkinson described his standard approach to partitioning in a memorandum to Sheridan in November 1900. There, Wilkinson explained how, after acquiring shares, he checked the signatures on the deeds, calculated how much land each seller owned, calculated the survey liens and interest outstanding on the land that was being sold. Having determined how much land the Crown had acquired, either by purchase or survey lien, Wilkinson then held meetings with the non-sellers, 'with a view to settling outside the Court how we are to divide the land.'<sup>564</sup>

On most occasions, Wilkinson reported, he and the owners reached agreement out of court. He would then appear in court and apply for the agreed partition.<sup>565</sup> This appears to have occurred for almost all of the Crown's purchases. In 1894, for example, Wilkinson reported that he had reached out of court agreement with the non-sellers of 40 blocks he was placing before the court for partition.

557. Document A79, p 250.

558. Document A95(i), Crown purchases. Also see doc A60, pp 826–827; doc A21, annex 7, Puketarata.

559. Document A60, pp 831–832.

560. Document A79, p 253.

561. Document A79, p 251.

562. Document A79, pp 256–269.

563. Document A67, pp 217–218.

564. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 24 November 1890 (doc A79(a), vol 1, p 116); doc A79, pp 253–254.

565. Document A79(a), vol 1, p 116; doc A79, pp 253–254.

Similarly, in 1898 he reported that he had reached agreement in a single day over the partitioning of 11 Kinohaku West subdivisions, three Kinohaku East subdivisions, as well as Taharoa B and Taorua 2.<sup>566</sup>

Where agreement could not be reached, he pursued the Crown's interests in court. In 1898, for example, he defended the Crown's proposed partitioning of Umukaimata 1, arguing that it would be inequitable if the non-sellers – led by Tangihaere – were to get 'all the good land'.<sup>567</sup> The court only partially accepted his arguments, giving Tangihaere a single block instead of the two that Wilkinson had proposed, but giving Wilkinson some of the land that he wanted.<sup>568</sup>

Wilkinson was similarly unyielding in his 1893 negotiations with Wharepuhunga non-sellers. Having made one small adjustment to his proposed boundary, he told non-sellers he would compromise no more, and would 'fight the matter out in Court if necessary'. Only when faced with that threat had the owners 'finally agreed to an amicable subdivision'.<sup>569</sup> Wilkinson reported to the Native Department that he had 'obtained for the Crown . . . some of the best (if not the very best) part of the block'. Because most of his purchasing was from absentee sellers, he had in effect obtained the best land in the block from people who did not live there.<sup>570</sup>

Each round of partitioning drew Māori landowners back into court, and it was common for them to subdivide their remaining lands, as occurred in the Puketarata example above.<sup>571</sup> Husbands and Mitchell suggested that owners may have been seeking to protect their land from further purchasing, since '[I]and owned by long lists of owners was . . . much more vulnerable to the advances of land purchasing agents'.<sup>572</sup> They also suggested that owners partitioned in order to make their lands easier to manage and develop.<sup>573</sup>

Even where owners did not subdivide, the effect of successive rounds of Crown purchasing and partitioning was to progressively divide each land block up into smaller and smaller subdivisions. In the most extreme cases, what had begun as a single block could, over a period of 10–15 years, become well over 100 individual subdivisions, in which Māori and the Crown each held scattered holdings.<sup>574</sup> According to Boulton, the result was that the district became 'a patchwork of Crown and Maori owned subdivisions', in which 'larger blocks that might have been suitable for large-scale pastoral farming were rapidly broken up by areas of

566. Document A79, p 254.

567. 33 Otorohanga MB 77–78 (doc A79, p 255); doc A79, pp 254–255.

568. Document A79, pp 254–255.

569. Wilkinson to Premier and Native Minister, 13 April 1894 (doc A67, p 218; doc A60, pp 1272–1273).

570. Wilkinson to Premier and Native Minister, 13 April 1894 (doc A67, p 218; doc A60, pp 1272–1273).

571. Document A79, pp 250–269, 411, 494–501; doc A146, pp 411–417. Regarding initial subdivision of the Aotea-Rohe Potae block, see doc A79, pp 186–212.

572. Document A79, p 147. Dr Hearn made the same point: doc A146, p 409.

573. Document A79, p 500.

574. Document A73, pp 92–95, 149; doc A79, pp 250, 258–263, 306; doc A146, pp 409, 411; doc A67, pp 424–425.

Crown land.<sup>575</sup> Individual owners or whānau could be left with small numbers of shares in multiple blocks, but no single block of land that they could use and develop, and could be left with little or no interest in land that was of spiritual significance to them.<sup>576</sup> For these reasons, in Boulton's view, each round of partitioning became a kind of 'tipping point', which increased owners' willingness to sell.<sup>577</sup> There is evidence that Wilkinson was aware of this effect and sought to exploit it. In 1891, he encouraged one of the owners of Wharepungunga to apply for a partition of the block in the hope that this would encourage 'a general burst up' of the block, which would make it easier to purchase.<sup>578</sup>

Another reason that partitioning contributed to sale was that, as land became more fragmented, it ultimately lost its economic value to either Māori landowners or the Crown. Crown officials were aware of the potential for harm arising from this system of land purchasing, both for Māori and for the Crown's own objectives, and at times expressed concern that the purchasing and partitioning of ever smaller subdivisions was leaving the Crown with land that could not easily be used.<sup>579</sup> In late 1898 and early 1899, there was brief correspondence between Wilkinson and the Native Department about reducing the prices offered for more fragmented land. Officials showed no concern for Māori landowners who were often left with small, fragmented, and in some cases unusable holdings.<sup>580</sup>

11.4.9 Treaty analysis and findings

When Te Rohe Pōtae Māori entered negotiations with the Crown over the opening of their district, their essential precondition was that the Crown use its lawmaking and governing power to protect their authority over and possession of land. In the 1883 petition, they asked that land title decisions be left to them to arrange and that laws be passed to protect their lands from sale, while allowing leasing in an open market.<sup>581</sup> In chapter 8 we found that the demands Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made of the Crown were consistent with the Treaty.

Over time, in response to the Crown's actions and negotiation positions, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders modified some of what they sought. They had entered negotiations fearful of private buyers, but by 1885 they were equally fearful of the Government's intentions. At the February 1885 hui at Kihikihi, their position on land title determination remained unchanged. But the Kawhia Committee chairman John Ormsby did indicate that they were willing to contemplate the possibility that some land might be sold, so long as all decisions were made by hapū, and so long as sales or leases were negotiated by the Kawhia Committee with no Crown or settler involvement. The clear position of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders was

---

575. Document A67, pp 37, 424–425.

576. Document A67, pp 37, 289, 356, 424–425, 478; doc A79, p 259; doc A55, pp 56–57; doc A146, pp 405–411.

577. Document A67, p 437.

578. Wilkinson to Lewis, 28 August 1891 (doc A60, p1222). Also see doc A60, pp1223–1228.

579. Document A67, p 356; doc A67(a), vol 2, p 640.

580. Document A67(a), vol 2, p 640.

581. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

that they did not want the Crown to take control of the buying and selling of their land.<sup>582</sup>

As we saw in chapter 8, the Crown did not give Te Rohe Pōtae leaders most of what they wanted. In particular, it was never prepared to relinquish its powers to determine Māori land titles or to control land transactions. But the Native Minister, John Ballance, did make several commitments at the Kihikihi hui. He assured Te Rohe Pōtae leaders that the Government did not intend to become a large purchaser of their land, and sought only enough for the railway, for which it would pay a fair price. He explained that the Crown did expect to see land made available for settlement, but would be content if owners would lease their lands. He gave assurances that hapū committees would make all decisions about sales or leases, that all sales or leases would occur in an open market, and that they would have the right to retain their lands and benefit from growth in land values as the railway and roads were completed.<sup>583</sup>

Having received these and other assurances, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders consented to the railway. We have already described how the Crown swiftly broke these promises, committing first to a large-scale land purchasing programme and secondly to ensuring it – and not Māori landowners – would retain the benefit from rising land prices. The laws enacted after 1888 denied Te Rohe Pōtae Māori the ability to sell or lease on an open market.

The Crown's purchasing programme, once it got under way at the end of 1889, marked a further departure from these commitments and from the wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. Having assured them that it did not intend to become a large-scale purchaser, and that they could lease land in preference to selling, the Crown became a large-scale purchaser. Having assured them that hapū representatives would make all decisions about sales or leases, the Crown did all that it could to buy from individuals.

The Crown's purchasing tactics were intended to leverage sales, and did so. Having given in to its settler constituency, the Crown sought to separate Te Rohe Pōtae Māori from their lands by a range of means, all of which had been tried and proven in other districts. The Crown deliberately used survey debts to break resistance to land sales. It created pressure on communities to sell their land, initially by imposing survey debts and charging interest while simultaneously denying landowners the right to lease or arrange other ways of financing the debts. The Crown quite openly used survey debts as a means of breaking resistance to land sales and drawing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into a cash economy which would create further need to sell land. From 1894, it allowed the Native Land Court to partition land as payment of survey costs, thereby effecting a compulsory purchase.

---

582. 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihi, on the 4th February 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 15–16; 'The Native Minister in Waikato: Visit to Alexandra', Waikato Times, 5 February 1885, p 2. Also see 'Evidence of Wahanui before the Native Affairs Committee on the Native Land Disposition Bill, 19 August 1885, AJHR, 1885, I-2B, p 5.

583. See 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and Te Kooti and his People at Kihikihi, on the 3rd February, 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 12–24, especially p 24.

Having promised that hapū would make all decisions about land alienation, the Crown engaged with hapū leaders only when they were willing to sell land. Otherwise, it focused its purchasing effort on individuals, picking off their interests one by one in a manner that was entirely corrosive of collective rights. It targeted individuals who were considered most vulnerable to selling, including absentees, those on the title out of aroha, those who did not live on the land in question, and those who were indebted or in need of money. It did so with the clear intention of bypassing and breaking down communal resistance to land sales. In doing so, it actively broke down traditional relationships with land and among hapū, and deliberately undermined communal authority and leadership.

Having promised that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would retain their lands for as long as they wished, it pressured them to sell and threatened to take land by compulsion if they did not. Having promised that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would be able to make land available by leasing, the Crown actively prevented leasing by enforcing the restrictions on alienation and warning settlers and Māori against such arrangements. The restrictions were intended to further the Crown's land purchasing programme by eliminating competition and denying Māori economic opportunities, and achieved their desired effect.

The Crown initially sought to purchase land in the north of the district which it considered the most productive and suitable for settlement. Those lands contained significant Māori settlements and food sources, and had been at the centre of efforts by Māori to cultivate land and engage with the settler economy. When Māori in those lands proved unwilling to sell, the Crown sought to break resistance throughout the district by purchasing land whenever and wherever it could.

It purchased from individuals without regard for the wishes of hapū and iwi leaders, and without regard for the potential effects on the prosperity or well-being of Māori communities. It made no effort to determine which lands hapū and iwi leaders wished to retain for their communities, other than to negotiate over partition boundaries. It purchased minors' shares without apparent regard for their future needs.

It actively purchased land in blocks that the Native Land Court had declared inalienable at the owners' request. It continued to pressure leaders and purchase from individuals even in blocks where it had been warned that some owners would be left landless. It initially set aside reserves but quickly ceased to do so, and then repurchased most of the area reserved. The Crown's claim that 10 per cent of the land purchased in the 1890s was reserved is quite incorrect;<sup>584</sup> the true figure is less than one per cent.<sup>585</sup>

The vast bulk of its purchases were of individual undefined shares. In these circumstances, neither sellers nor non-sellers could know which land would be subject to the transaction, and therefore none could fully understand the nature of the transaction. Under those circumstances, sellers could not give free, prior, informed consent; non-sellers could have land taken which they had shares in against their express wishes.

---

584. Submission 3.4.307, p 39.

585. The Crown set aside just over 5,000 acres of reserves, almost all of that in the Wharepunga block. The Crown's total purchasing during the 1890s amounted to 530,819.55 acres: doc A67, pp 432–433, 472; doc A21, p 127.

Having acquired some shares in a block, the Crown used partitioning to further break down traditional relationships and leverage further sales. It managed partitioning with the aim of acquiring the best land for itself, without regard for the well-being or interests of the remaining owners.

On some occasions, it made purchases where surveys were incomplete, or there was uncertainty about ownership, or where relative interests had not yet been determined, and those involved in the transaction therefore cannot have been certain as to what was being sold. Again, informed consent is not possible under such circumstances.

Each of these purchasing methods was individually in breach of the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and of the Crown's obligation to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in possession of their land. Where the Crown broke promises or failed to comply with the conditions of entry to the district, it breached the partnership principle and failed in its duty to act honourably and in good faith.

But it is not enough to consider the individual purchasing methods. This was a programme in which the Crown used its lawmaking powers and purchasing tactics together, with the express purpose of breaking communal relationships with land and achieving its transfer to Crown ownership. Individual titles, limited land rights, survey debts, purchasing from individuals while bypassing hapū and iwi leaders, and partitioning were all parts of a whole, in which each element worked together to separate communities from their land.

The purchasing programme was coercive in its entirety. As other Tribunals have found, there can have been no free, informed consent by individuals, because they were not the proper rights-holders. There can be no free, informed consent where the land was subject to restrictions, because those restrictions created want of money and militated against other uses of the land. Even where there was some element of volition on the part of hapū or iwi leaders, their choices were made in conditions that the Crown had created in order to pressure them into selling. In its entirety, the Crown's purchasing programme was conducted in a manner that was coercive.

The purchasing programme was also a deliberate and systematic attack on the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae communities and therefore an extremely serious breach of the Crown's duty of active protection. It was a fundamental betrayal of the conditions made and assurances given as part of Te Ōhākī Tapu, which reflected very poorly on the Crown's honour and trustworthiness. In its entirety, it was a breach of the partnership principle and the duty to act honourably and in good faith. It was explicitly designed to transfer wealth from Māori to the Crown and settlers. In its entirety it was a breach of the principles of equity and equal treatment.

To the extent that the Crown wanted to see land settled, it certainly had alternatives. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were entirely willing to settle the land, if only the Crown would enact laws that preserved their mana whakahaere and then left them to manage the settlement programme themselves. The Crown did not make any attempt during the 1890s to leave settlement to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori or even involve them in decisions about how settlement should progress. The Crown's programme in fact worked against settlement. It prevented Māori leaders from inviting settlers into their lands and establishing farms, while delaying settlement of purchased lands to benefit from rising land prices, and fragmenting landholdings in the district. To the extent that the Crown wanted Māori to pay for the railway and used purchasing as a means to achieve this, it did not have obvious alternatives, but nor did it have any right under the Treaty to impose railway costs on Māori landowners. They had made it entirely clear that they did not want the railway if it became the means to deprive them of their land.

The intentions, methods, and effects of the Crown's purchasing programme were well understood at the time, by the Crown's representatives, settlers, and Māori alike. The Crown ignored waves of Māori protest during the 1890s. It began to consider modifying its purchasing targets only in 1898, not because it was responding to protest but because Ministers were becoming aware that continued Crown purchasing would leave increasing numbers of Māori landless and therefore, in Seddon's words, 'a burden to the colony'.<sup>586</sup> Even then, it took four more years and over 345,000 acres of land lost to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori before the Crown ceased active purchasing.<sup>587</sup>

In all, the Crown acquired 639,815 acres during the 1890–1905 calendar years – slightly over one-third of the inquiry district.<sup>588</sup> The amounts varied from block to block and region to region. In the south-west of the district, very little land remained in Māori possession outside of the Mokau Mohakatino block. Purchasing had also been heavy in the Kinohaku and Hauturu blocks, and in other parts of the north such as Puketarata, Te Kopua, Pirongia West, Ouruwhero, Otorohanga, Mangauika, and Mangarapa (see tables 11.5–11.7). None of these Crown purchases was conducted in a manner that was consistent with the Treaty and its principles. All occurred in conditions that were coercive.

In conclusion, we find that:

- By purchasing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land under cover of restrictions on alienation, by using survey debts to leverage sales, by purchasing geographically undefined shares from individuals without regard for community wishes and interests, by targeting individuals who were vulnerable to selling, by using partitioning to further leverage sales, by using aggressive tactics such 586. Seddon, 2 August 1898, NZPD, vol 102, pp 186–187 (doc A67, p 164).

587. Document A21, p 131 tbl B5.

588. Document A21, p 131 tbl B5. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, the Crown purchased a total of 639,815.07 acres during the years 1890–1905. The inquiry district totals 1,931,136 acres (excluding extension areas). All of the Crown's purchases during the period 1890–1905 occurred within the original inquiry district. Wherever we mention land sales as a proportion of the inquiry district, we are referring to the original district. In all, the Crown's purchases amounted to 33.13 per cent of the original district during this period: submission 3.4.309(a), p 2; submission 3.4.130(g), pp 2–3; doc A21, pp 7, 34. Also see doc A67, pp 11, 28; doc A95, p 4.

as threats of compulsory acquisition, by failing to take reasonable steps to ensure that Te Rohe Pōtae communities retained land they wished to retain, by purchasing land that had been declared subject to alienation, by purchasing in spite of community opposition and in spite of warnings that some owners might be left landless, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga.

- By using these methods to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to sell land in spite of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' requests that their land be protected if the district was opened to the railway and to settlement, and in spite of the conditions imposed and promises made as part of Te Ōhākī Tapu, the Crown breached the partnership principle and failed in its obligation to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith.
- By using these methods to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae to sell land for the express purposes of transferring land and wealth to the Crown and settlers, and thereby ensuring that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori did not enjoy the benefit of rising land prices along the railway route, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection and breached the partnership principle, and breached the principles of equity and equal treatment.

11.5 DID THE CROWN PAY FAIR PRICES FOR THE LAND IT PURCHASED?

11.5.1 Introduction

When the Crown began to purchase Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land in 1890, Wilkinson was instructed to offer 3s 6d per acre, with discretion to go up to 5 shillings if owners would not sell. The Native Department acknowledged that Māori landowners would probably expect five or six times this price, but saw no reason to offer more. In its view, Māori landowners would eventually come to accept what the Crown was prepared to offer.<sup>589</sup>

As discussed above, most owners initially refused to sell their land,<sup>590</sup> but from 1892 onwards that resistance began to give way. In the first few years of purchasing, Wilkinson typically paid between 2s 6d and 4 shillings per acre, occasionally paying 5 shillings and exceeding that on one occasion.<sup>591</sup> Over time, the prices gradually increased, but typically remained within a range of 3 to 7 shillings per acre.<sup>592</sup> The rare exceptions were for small subdivisions close to towns or the rail-

---

589. The Under-Secretary for the Native Department set out the policy in a memorandum to the Native Minister on 18 December 1889, and in a letter to Wilkinson on 21 December. Wilkinson initially misinterpreted his instruction as meaning he should offer 3s 6d per acre for 'broken bush country' and 5 shillings per acre for good agricultural land close to the railway. The exchanges are discussed in doc A67, pp 209–211, 223–224. Also see doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 133–142; doc A91, vol 2, pp 297–305, 309–312, 327; doc A95(n), pp 5–12, 16–21.

590. Owners typically wanted to retain their land, but also regarded the Crown's prices as very low: see doc A67, pp 223–226, 228, 252; doc A68, pp 96–97.

591. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

592. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

way line.<sup>593</sup> Overall, throughout 1890–1905, Parker (see table 11.3) calculated the average purchase price at 4.79 shillings per acre,<sup>594</sup> and Dr Hearn calculated it at 4.36 shillings per acre.<sup>595</sup> The 1907 Native Land Laws Commission's average purchase price was 4.23 shillings per acre for the Aotea-Rohe Potae block.<sup>596</sup>

In 1894, Wilkinson acknowledged that the Crown alone determined the purchase price.<sup>597</sup> It was able to do so because it faced no competition, and therefore faced no pressure to match the prices that others might offer and no risk of missing out if competitors offered more.

Throughout the 1890s and beyond, Māori landowners consistently sought higher prices than the Crown was offering, and were generally reluctant to sell unless circumstances compelled them to do so. The district's leaders also protested that the prices were too low, and were effectively forced on landowners. In their 1891 negotiations with Cadman, those leaders asked for prices to be determined by arbitration.<sup>598</sup> In 1894, John Ormsby told a visiting member of the House of Representatives that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were paying 'the worst form of taxation', meaning 'the difference between what the Government pays us for our land (from 2s 6d to 6s per acre) and the market value (from 10s to 20s per acre).'<sup>599</sup> In their 1897 petition, Eketone and other leaders said that Māori landowners had no input on sale prices.<sup>600</sup> They referred to 'the intense desire of the Government that we should speedily sell to them our lands for whatever price they please to give.'<sup>601</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae leaders regarded the Crown's approach to pricing as a clear betrayal of the undertakings the Crown had given the previous decade, when they were told that the value of their lands would grow if they consented to the 593. The exception was the purchase of Kinohaku East 1B2A, 1B3B, and 1B4A, which together totalled of 3,101 acres, for 10 shillings an acre: doc A95(i), line 129.

594. Document A95(o) (Parker), para 7.4.

595. Document A146, p189 tbl 4.2. Dr Hearn's calculations were based on fiscal years ending 31 March.

596. 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 4; doc A146, p194; doc A68, pp 202–203. The commission's figures referred to the Aotea-Rohe Potae land block, which had boundaries that were broadly similar but not identical to this inquiry district. Specifically, the Aotea-Rohe Potae block excluded the pre-1865 purchase blocks, the inquiry district extension areas, and the Mohakatino Parininihi, Mokau Mohakatino, Maraeroa, Ketemaringi, Maraeroa, and Moerangi-Matakowhai blocks. It included some areas that are not within the inquiry district, including the Ohura South block and other blocks to the south of the district: doc A67, p 14 n

597. See Wilkinson to Sheridan, 7 September 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, pp 488–493); doc A67, p 369. Also see Editorial, Waikato Times, 16 January 1892, p 2; 'Native Land Court Bill', 2 October 1894, NZPD, vol 86, p 477 (doc A68, pp 194–195).

598. Document A68, pp 134–135, 137.

599. The visiting member of the House of Representatives was Major Benjamin Harris, who said he had come to learn about Māori grievances regarding land laws: 'Major Harris at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 17 April 1894 (doc A68, p 183). Also see 'The Native Land Question', New Zealand Herald, 19 April 1894.

600. Document A67, p 351.

601. Pepene Eketone and 163 others, petition 217 (doc A67, pp 299, 480); doc A93, p 7. According to Boulton, other signatories included Taonui and Ormsby: doc A67, p 351.

railway.<sup>602</sup> They were far from alone in objecting to the Crown's purchase prices. In 1891, the surveyor Oliver Creagh reported that the Crown was offering Māori owners 3 shillings per acre for land at Kinohaku East, when the owners 'know that they can get £1 an acre from private parties.'<sup>603</sup> Settlers in lands bordering Te Rohe Pōtae sometimes expressed the view that the district's land could be worth in excess of £2 per acre in an open market, and was certainly worth more than £1.<sup>604</sup> The New Zealand Herald and Waikato Times expressed similar views about the value of the district's land. Both at times characterised the Crown's purchasing as a form of confiscation.<sup>605</sup> Opposition politicians expressed similar views.<sup>606</sup> The Member of the House of Representatives for Waipa, FW Lang, described the Liberal Government as New Zealand's greatest land shark, compelling Māori to sell for a few shillings land they 'could easily have got pounds for.'<sup>607</sup>

For any Crown purchase of Māori land to comply with the Treaty, a fair price must be paid.<sup>608</sup> Claimants argued that the Crown did not meet this requirement and instead used the restrictions so it could buy 'as cheaply as possible', in breach of previous assurances that Māori landowners would benefit from rising land prices if they agreed to the railway. Claimants, based on evidence from Dr Hearn, submitted that the true value of the land may have been about 5.7 times higher than the Crown paid.<sup>609</sup>

The Crown accepted that, where the Crown had an exclusive purchasing right, 'it was under additional Treaty duties . . . to apply high standards of good faith and fair dealing, and . . . to purchase reasonably and fairly.'<sup>610</sup> It conceded that it misused its exclusive purchasing right by 'often paying prices which Māori and other observers considered unreasonably low,'<sup>611</sup> and that its purchasing practices left 'some Rohe Pōtae Māori . . . with little option but to sell their land or shares in land even when they, and other observers, considered that the prices offered

602. 'Major Harris at Otorohanga', Waikato Times, 17 April 1894, p 6; doc A68, p 183.

603. 'Report of the Commission Appointed to Inquire into the Subject of the New Zealand Native Land Laws', 23 May 1891, AJHR, 1891, G-1, p 27; doc A146, p 185; doc A67, pp 225, 227.

604. 'The Ministry and the King Country', New Zealand Herald, 29 November 1893, p 3; doc A146, pp 76–78; 'The Native Lands in Waikato', letter to the editor, New Zealand Herald, 26 March 1894; doc A68, p 183.

605. Editorial, Waikato Times, 16 January 1892, p 2; 'Natives and their Lands', New Zealand Herald, 18 June 1895; Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 26 April 1895, p 4; Editorial, New Zealand Herald, 2 May 1896, p 4. Also see 'Unjust Government Dealing with Maori Land', New Zealand Herald, 3 September 1894, p 3; 'Government dealing with native lands', New Zealand Herald, 3 September 1894, p 4; doc A146, pp 80, 185; doc A68, p 199.

606. Document A68, pp 193, 198, 221.

607. 'Native Land Court Bill', NZPD, 1895, vol 86, p 475 (doc A68, pp 194–195).

608. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, p 418. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, p 106; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 617, 625.

609. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 6–7, 11, 14–15, 17, 37–45, 51, 53–54; claim 1.5.4, pp 23–24, 27–33.

610. Submission 3.4.307, pp 24, 29. Also see submission 3.4.11, pp 2–3.

611. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26.

Parker's calculations				Hearn's Calculations		Native Land Commission (Aotea-Rohe Potae block)
Calendar year Decimal shillings	Number of transactions	Average price (decimal shillings)	Range (decimal shillings)	Fiscal year	Average price (decimal shillings)	Period	Price range
1891	2	2.51	2.50 to 2.52	1890/91
1892	0	–	–	1891/92	2.97	To December 1892	2.50 to 6.00
1893	12	3.25	2.00 to 6.00	1892/93	3.00
1894	37	4.03	2.00 to 5.00	1893/94	4.30	To August 1894	2.50 to 5.00
1895	15	5.27	2.50 to 7.00	1894/95	4.31	To May 1895	3.50 to 6.00
1896	5	4.40	3.00 to 5.00	1895/96	5.38	To July 1896	3.00 to 5.00
1897	17	6.37	3.75 to 20.00	1896/97	4.92	To September 1897	3.75 to 7.50
1898	69	5.27	3.00 to 10.00	1897/98	5.36	To June 1898	3.00 to 10.00
1899	36	5.14	2.50 to 8.00	1898/99	5.78	To June 1899	2.50 to 8.00
1900	11	6.27	4.00 to 8.00	1899/00	5.04	To July 1900	4.00 to 8.00
1901	169	5.49	1.50 to 35.00	1900/01	2.61	To April 1901	1.50 to 8.00
1902	2	6.00	6.00	1901/02	–		–
1903	0	–	–	1902/03	5.35		–
1904	7	4.76	3.83 to 5.50	1903/04	4.14		–
1905	2	3.50	3.00 to 4.00	1904/05	4.00		–
TOTAL	384	4.79	1.50 to 35.00

Table 11.3: Calculations of prices the Crown paid for Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district 1890–1905

Sources: Document A95(o), para 7; doc A95(i), Crown purchases; doc A146, p 189, Table 4.2; 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District: An Interim Report', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, vol 1, G-18, p 4. We note that, for 1901, the 35 shillings at the upper end of the range is an error in Parker's database; the actual figure for the Crown's purchase of Pirongia West 1 Sec 2C1 was 5 shillings per acre. We have not modified the figures as provided by Parker for this table, but note that, with the error rectified, the average price per acre for 1901 is 5.31 shillings.

represented less than the market value.<sup>612</sup> The Crown also acknowledged that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had subsidised the cost of the railway, because the Crown was able to buy land at low prices and sell at higher prices.<sup>613</sup>

612. Submission 3.4.307, pp1–2

613. Transcript 4.1.24(a) (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel, Wellington, 11 February 2015), p164.

These concessions and acknowledgements are helpful, but limited. They address the question of whether prices were perceived to be fair, but they do not address the question of whether prices were actually fair. On that, the Crown submitted that its nineteenth century view had been that the prices were ‘fair in the absence of development’.<sup>614</sup> But it is not clear to us how the Crown might have known what was fair in the absence of a functioning land market. That depends on how it determined the prices it would pay. We will consider that question first.

11.5.2 How did the Crown determine the prices it would pay?

11.5.2.1 Were purchase prices influenced by the Crown’s settlement and financial goals?

When the Crown began to purchase Māori land in this district in 1890, it had two related objectives. It wanted to see the land settled by small farmers. And it wanted to earn a profit from land transactions which could be used to fund the railway and other infrastructure.<sup>615</sup>

Achieving these objectives required it to exclude competition and to control purchase and sale prices. Its settlement objective required it to acquire land, subdivide and develop it, and onsell at a price that was sufficiently low to be attractive for settlers. In its estimation, this goal could not be achieved if it allowed private buyers into the market; doing so would fuel speculative activity, which would push land prices out of reach of aspiring small farmers.<sup>616</sup> Its financial objective required that it make a substantial profit from the development and onsale of land. This could only be achieved if the Crown could purchase land at low prices. This, too, required it to exclude competition.<sup>617</sup>

It was these policy objectives that led the Crown to keep restrictions in place in Te Rohe Pōtae even when Māori in other districts had access to an open market. It was also these objectives that led the Government to halt work on the railway in 1887. It knew that land prices would rise once the railway was completed, and it did not want that to occur while the land remained in Māori possession.<sup>618</sup> These measures were in breach of the Crown’s earlier promise that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would benefit from growth in land values along the railway route. Ministers had made this promise in order to entice Te Rohe Pōtae leaders to consent to the railway, and it was on this basis that consent was given. But as we saw in section 11.3.3, the 1887–91 Atkinson Government reversed this commitment and decided that the Crown should benefit from rising land values.

During 1890 the Native Minister, Edwin Mitchelson, explained the Crown’s policy with respect to Te Rohe Pōtae land prices in some detail. In October of that year, he told a group from the chamber of commerce:

---

614. Submission 3.4.307, p 12.

615. Submission 3.4.307, pp 28, 31.

616. Document A68, pp 98–99.

617. Document A68, pp 98–99.

618. Document A68, p 85. According to Cleaver and Sarich, construction was ‘almost at a stand-still’ between 1889 (when the line was completed as far as Puketutu) and 1897, though some work was done: doc A20, pp 93, 291.

The object of the Government in not withdrawing the restrictions on the native land was that small settlers would not be able to acquire the land from private purchasers at anything like so cheap a rate as they could if the Government first bought it.<sup>619</sup>

The Government's aim, he said, was to buy land along the railway route for 3s to 7s 6d per acre, and sell it to settlers for 15 to 20 shillings per acre – whereas if private speculators were allowed into the market the price would rise to £3 per acre. Mitchelson also explained that the Crown's purchasing programme was being held back by Māori, who had 'unreasonable' expectations as to the value of their land and regarded it as a 'veritable goldmine', partly because they were making incomes from illegal leases, which the Government intended to put an end to.

Mitchelson gave further explanation in a public meeting in Auckland the following month, saying the Government wanted land for settlement, but faced difficulties because Māori landowners thought that private buyers would pay them more. The New Zealand Herald reported his remarks thus:

The Government . . . considered that it would be unwise to allow any large blocks of land suited for settlement to pass into the hands of private speculators, to be doled out again at fabulous prices to intending settlers. (Applause.). They considered the first duty of the Government was to obtain the land at such a price as would enable settlers to pay interest upon it, and make themselves comfortable homes, and live without getting into difficulties. (Applause.)

He [Mitchelson] thought it a great mistake that the colony had ever abandoned its right of pre-emption. (Hear, hear) As regards the King Country, the Government had been frequently urged to withdraw the proclamation from it, but they considered it would be unwise to do so. They had already spent large sums on the central line of railway, and it had opened up a good deal of country. As this had advanced the value of the land, the Government considered that whatever value had been given to the land ought to belong to the State, and not to any private persons who now wished to acquire the land. (Loud applause.)<sup>620</sup>

The Crown's approach to purchasing, and to determining purchase prices, must be seen in this context.

When the Crown began purchasing, prices were determined through discussion among Crown officials, in particular those responsible for land purchasing, survey, and land development. Ministers were also sometimes involved.<sup>621</sup> Typically, the surveyor-general or another surveyor would be asked to provide an initial estimate, and purchasing officials would offer Māori landowners a little less.<sup>622</sup> In November 1889, for example, the surveyor-general provided advice to 619. 'Deputation to Mr Mitchelson', New Zealand Herald, 9 October 1890, p5; doc A68, pp98–99.

620. 'The Acting Premier', New Zealand Herald, 8 November 1890, p5; doc A68, pp98–99.

621. Document A67, p361.

622. Document A67, pp361, 366–368.

the Native Department about 17 subdivisions the Crown wanted to buy. As well as listing maximum purchase prices and minimum sale prices, the surveyor-general also estimated development costs (for survey, subdivision and roading) and profits.<sup>623</sup> Typically, the sale price was 250 per cent of the purchase price, and the estimated profit was 87.5 per cent of the purchase price. The proposed sale prices were all in the range of 10 to 25 shillings per acre – very close to the prices Mitchelson believed would make settlers comfortable and far below the £3 per acre that Mitchelson estimated subdivided land would fetch in a free market.<sup>624</sup> As the Crown Law Office's historian Brent Parker noted, officials were not making a calculation of market value; they 'were deciding what the Crown should pay'.<sup>625</sup>

As time wore on, the Crown relied less on surveyors and more on Wilkinson's advice. Typically, he suggested a purchase price, which more senior officials (and occasionally Ministers) approved.<sup>626</sup> Wilkinson took into account various factors, including terrain, vegetation, proximity to the railway and to towns, road access, outstanding survey liens (which the Crown would inherit) and prices paid for other subdivisions in the same block.<sup>627</sup> He also discounted for blocks with large numbers of owners, to reflect the time he would have to put into purchasing.<sup>628</sup> His overriding criterion, according to Boulton, was to set the purchase price at the lowest level consistent with still being able to persuade 'a good portion of the owners to sell'.<sup>629</sup> Wilkinson acknowledged, at various times, that the Crown was not paying the 'actual market value',<sup>630</sup> and advised that Māori landowners might feel that some 'wrong or injustice is being done to them by compulsor[il]y confining them to selling their land to the Crown only, and at prices fixed by the Crown'.<sup>631</sup>

11.5.2.2 Did the Crown use independent valuations?

It follows from the discussion above that the Crown was not greatly interested in determining the value of Te Rohe Pōtae land on an open market. During the period covered by this chapter, the Crown had access to various mechanisms which it could have used to arrive at independent estimates of market values for Māori land.

---

623. Document A91, vol 2, pp 313–314, 340–341. Also see doc A67, pp 209–210, 219, 493; doc A95(n), pp 2–4; doc A95(q), p 4; doc A95(q)(i).

624. Document A91, vol 2, pp 313–314, 340–341. Also see doc A67, pp 209–210, 219, 493; doc A95(n), pp 2–4; doc A95(q), p 4; doc A95(q)(i).

625. Document A95(j), p 8.

626. Document A67, pp 361, 366–368.

627. Document A67, pp 361, 366–368, 370–371.

628. Document A67(a), vol 2, pp 490–491; doc A67, pp 369–370.

629. Document A67, p 361.

630. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 7 September 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, pp 490–491); doc A67, pp 369–370.

631. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 7 September 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, p 493); doc A67, p 369. Also see Wilkinson to the Premier and Native Minister, 13 April 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, pp 466–472); Wilkinson to Sheridan, 1 January 1894, on back of letter in Māori from Rawiri Te Rangitaurua and others to Wilkinson, 20 Tihema 1893 (doc A67, p 354).

In the 1880s, the Crown used independent valuers for various purposes, such as determining compensation for public works takings. From 1893, the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act provided a mechanism for the independent valuation of Māori lands, though the purchasing system established under the Act was never put into use (see section 11.3.3). In 1894, the Crown established a system of independent valuation for lands taken under the Land for Settlements Act. And in 1896 the Government Valuation of Land Act established a national system for the valuation of lands.<sup>632</sup> The Crown acknowledged that it did not use independent valuations for its land purchases in the inquiry district until 1905. Its submissions gave no reason for this.<sup>633</sup>

On at least two occasions, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori asked the Crown to use the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act 1893 provisions for independent valuation (section 6). The first occasion was in 1893, when a small group of owners of Kinohaku West K offered to sell land if it was independently valued using the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act provisions.<sup>634</sup> The surveyor-general refused, because 'I feel sure that Govt would have to pay a much larger price if the land is dealt with under the Act quoted. It is a question of policy perhaps more than anything else.'<sup>635</sup> During their negotiations with Cadman in 1892, Te Rohe Pōtae leaders also asked that independent valuations be used for Crown purchases. Loveridge believed this was one of Cadman's reasons for walking away from the negotiations. Using arbitration, in Loveridge's view, would 'undoubtedly have led to the Crown paying significantly higher prices.'<sup>636</sup>

On several occasions during 1894, Wilkinson recommended that independent valuations be used. He was partly concerned (as noted above) that the prices being offered were unfair. He also believed that he could purchase more land if the Crown was offering prices that were determined by independent valuation.<sup>637</sup> His Native Department superiors took no action.<sup>638</sup>

11.5.2.3 Did the Crown negotiate with owners?

Some owners responded to the Crown's offers by asking for a higher price,<sup>639</sup> and occasionally the Crown was willing to increase its offer by a small amount if this would induce more sales,<sup>640</sup> and if owners agreed to forego reserves.<sup>641</sup> Most often,

632. Submission 3.4.307, pp 24–25, 41; doc A146, p 209. Also see doc A67, p 352.

633. Maori Land Settlement Act 1905, s 25; submission 3.4.307, p 25.

634. Document A67, pp 353–354.

635. S Percy Smith to Sheridan, 6 February 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, p 463); doc A67, p 354.

636. Document A68, p 146.

637. Document A67(a), vol 2, pp 466–472. Also see doc A67, pp 351–354, 369, 488–493.

638. Document A67(a), vol 2, p 488; doc A67, p 369. As noted above, by 1897 Wilkinson had returned to his previous position that Māori would sell 'at almost any price' if they wanted the money badly enough: 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, p 5; doc A67, p 228.

639. Document A67, pp 223–226, 247, 353, 355–360, 365–366; doc A60, pp 753–756; submission 3.4.307, pp 35–36.

640. Document A67, pp 355–360.

641. Document A67, pp 371–372.

however, the Crown rejected or simply ignored Māori counter-offers.<sup>642</sup> In 1895, for example, Wilkinson sought permission to raise his offer for a block of high quality agricultural land from 5 to 7 shillings per acre after most owners refused to sell, but his Land Purchase Department superiors refused.<sup>643</sup> The Crown appears to have simply ignored the owners of another block who said they would sell their shares if the Crown raised its offer from 3s 6d per acre to 10 shillings.<sup>644</sup>

Wilkinson's correspondence with more senior officials illustrates the tensions at work between the Crown's desire to buy land and its reluctance to pay above predetermined prices. At times, he recommended increasing the Crown's offer by modest amounts in order to 'hurry up the purchase'.<sup>645</sup> Also, as noted above, he argued that independent valuations would increase sales.<sup>646</sup> But on other occasions he cautioned against showing too much enthusiasm to buy land, since it could encourage owners to hold out.<sup>647</sup> Correspondence between Wilkinson, Lewis, and other officials reveals that they did not see price as the main factor determining whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would sell land. Rather, they believed that many Māori did not want to sell at all and would make land available only when they needed cash, at which point they would sell at almost any price.<sup>648</sup>

On the rare occasions when the Crown did not have exclusive purchasing rights, it showed more willingness to negotiate. The Mahoenui block provides one example. In early 1894, there were no restrictions in place other than those imposed by proclamation on specific blocks under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892. Under those circumstances, the Crown was prepared to increase its offer from 3s 6d to 5 shillings per acre, but only so it could acquire enough shares to issue a proclamation and prevent any private purchases.<sup>649</sup>

11.5.2.4 Did the Crown account for the value of timber and other resources?

Many of the land blocks in the inquiry district were heavily forested in kahikatea, tōtara, rimu, and matai.<sup>650</sup> Private Europeans recognised the value of these resources. During the 1890s, two Waikato sawmillers (JW Ellis and H Burnand) entered an agreement with the owners of the Mangawhero block under which they were allowed to cut kahikatea, paying royalties to the owners.<sup>651</sup> On the face of it, this would appear to have been a breach of the restrictions, but the sawmillers had obtained legal advice to the effect that their business was lawful so long as they were not leasing land but only extracting timber from it.<sup>652</sup>

---

642. Document A67, pp 355–360.

643. Document A67, p 365.

644. Document A67, pp 353–354, 355–356.

645. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 7 September 1894 (doc A67(a), vol 2, p 492); doc A67, p 365.

646. Document A67, pp 351–354, 369, 488–493; doc A67(a), vol 2, pp 466–472.

647. Document A67(a), vol 2, p 618; doc A67, pp 370–371.

648. Document A67, pp 188, 203–204, 210–211, 226–228, 370; doc A67(a), vol 2, p 618.

649. Document A67, pp 343–349, 381; doc A67(a), vol 2, p 515. Also see doc A146, p 196.

650. Document A25, p 46 (and throughout).

651. Document A67, pp 311–312.

652. Document A146, p 231.

After 1900, when private leasing was allowed through Māori land boards, several other timber milling operations opened up.<sup>653</sup> The Crown was certainly aware of the timber resources and the demand from timber merchants for their use; at times it attempted to sell timber resources on land it had bought. From 1900 on, the Crown began to take advantage of this demand, licencing sawmillers to cut timber from lands it had purchased from Māori during the preceding decade.<sup>654</sup> But we have seen no evidence that the Crown took any account of the value of this timber when it determined the prices it would offer for land. In 1907, the Stout-Ngata commission concluded that the Crown had determined prices based only on 'the surface value' of the land, reflecting its potential for farming, and the evidence in this inquiry supports that conclusion.<sup>655</sup>

11.5.3 How much was Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land worth?

The Crown has acknowledged that the prices it paid for Māori land in this district were 'considered unreasonably low' by Māori and other contemporary observers. But it did not concede that prices were in fact unreasonably low.<sup>656</sup> Crown counsel also submitted that there was 'no simple formula' for determining the price that should have been paid, especially after so much time has passed, and that any assessment should take into account 'the location and quality of the land . . . the specific circumstances at the time of the sale, and the wider context of any particular transactions.'<sup>657</sup> Claimants argued that prices were in fact unreasonably low.<sup>658</sup> Their view was based on evidence provided by Dr Hearn about purchase and lease prices in the district after 1905, when independent valuations were required and private leasing was allowed.<sup>659</sup>

Between 1900 and 1905, purchase prices in Te Rohe Pōtae typically ranged between 4 shillings and 6 shillings per acre, though some higher prices were paid (see table 11.3).<sup>660</sup> Dr Hearn provided evidence that showed a substantial increase in prices after 1905:

- The 1907 Native Land Commission recorded that the Crown paid an average price of 9.87 shillings per acre for 65,446 acres purchased during 1905 and 1906 in the Aotea-Rohe Potae block, after the new valuation rules were in place.<sup>661</sup>

653. Document A25, pp 46, 57.

654. Document A25, pp 19, 46. Also see doc A67, p 325; doc A60, p 457; doc A146, p 230.

655. 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 4; doc A146, p 242.

656. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26; also see pp 1–2.

657. Submission 3.4.11, pp 14–15.

658. Submission 3.4.119, pp 3, 6–7, 11, 23, 37–45, 51, 53–54; claim 1.5.4, pp 23–24, 27–33.

659. Maori Land Settlement Act 1905, ss 16, 25. The Act provided that the capital valuation would be assessed under the Government Valuation of Land Act 1896.

660. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

661. 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 4; doc A146, pp 195, 202; doc A67, p 373.

- A 1905–1908 return of Crown purchasing revealed that it paid an average price of 19s 10d per acre for 121,776 acres in the Auckland land district. Of the 201 transactions listed, 153 were in this inquiry district.<sup>662</sup>
- The same 1905–1908 return revealed that the Crown paid an average of 8s 9d for 127,821 acres in the Taranaki land district. Of the 29 purchases, 27 were in this inquiry district (almost all of them in Rangitoto Tuhua).<sup>663</sup>

Dr Hearn also provided evidence of prices paid by private buyers and lessees in the ‘King Country’ in the five years to 30 September 1909. During that time:

- Private purchasers<sup>664</sup> bought 3,748 acres of ‘King Country’ Māori land for £7,362 at an average price of £1.96 (that is, just under 40 shillings) per acre.<sup>665</sup>
- Private lessees leased 177,544 acres at average annual rents of just over 1.2 shillings per acre. With rents commonly set at 5 per cent of unimproved capital value, this implied the land was worth an average of 2.4.1 shillings per acre. Dr Hearn argues that this is a reasonable proxy for the market value of the land.<sup>666</sup>

Claimants, in generic submissions, noted that Hearn’s 2.4.1 shillings figure was 5.7 times the 4.23 shillings per acre average Crown purchasing price which Dr Hearn calculated from 1907 Native Land Commission data, and submitted that ‘[m]arket prices were on average 5.7 times what the Crown paid.’<sup>667</sup> The Crown also acknowledged that prices paid after 1905 were ‘substantially higher than the 4s per acre average for the 1890s purchases.’<sup>668</sup> Dr Hearn noted that land prices had been rising during the early 1900s, and this offered one possible explanation for rising purchase prices, but not for the sudden increase after 1905.<sup>669</sup>

Witnesses provided other evidence which would support the view that the Crown paid less than market value. Parker provided evidence that, while the Crown was buying Te Rohe Pōtae land at prices averaging less than 5 shillings per acre, it was onselling land from its pre-1865 purchases with asking prices ranging

662. ‘Maori Land Purchase Operations: Report under the Maori Land Settlement Act 1905 for the year ended 31 March 1908’, 1 June 1908, AJHR, 1908, G-3A, pp 1–3; doc A93, p 77; submission 3.4.307, pp 20–21. The transactions in this district were Rangitoto A (44 purchases), Rangitoto Tuhua (31), Tokanui (14) Kakepuku (9), Taumatotara (7), Kinohaku West (6), Otorohanga (5), Kinohaku East (4), Hauturu East (4), Hauturu West (4), Te Kuiti (4), Pirongia West (3), Te Kopua (2), Manguika (2), Parihoru (2), Pukenui (2), Takotokoraha (2), Waiwhakaata (2), Korakonui (1), Maungarangi (1), Pehitawa (1), Pukeroa-Hangatiki (1), Taharoa (1), and Turoto (1).

663. ‘Maori Land Purchase Operations: Report under the Maori Land Settlement Act 1905 for the year ended 31 March 1908’, 1 June 1908, AJHR, 1908, G-3A, pp 1, 3; doc A93, p 77; submission 3.4.307, pp 20–21. The transactions in this district were Rangitoto Tuhua (25 transactions), Tauroa (1 transaction), Taumatamahoe (1 transaction).

664. Private alienation was allowed with Māori land council approval under section 4 of the Maori Lands Administration Amendment Act 1901.

665. ‘King-Country Native Lands’, 8 October 1909, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 15; doc A146, p 197.

666. Document A146, pp 197–198.

667. Submission 3.4.119, pp 40 n, 42, 53; doc A146, pp 194–198.

668. Submission 3.4.307, p 20.

669. Document A146, p 207.

between 90 to 720 shillings per acre.<sup>670</sup> Parker also provided evidence of the prices the Crown sought when it on-sold land it purchased between 1890 and 1905. Overall, the Crown made very little land available at less than 8 shillings per acre, and the vast majority was offered at prices exceeding 20 shillings. Typically, the land was offered at 2–6 times the purchase price, with the margins increasing as time wore on.<sup>671</sup> This data does not necessarily indicate what actual market prices might have been, as the Crown was the only buyer, and also the only seller. It could set prices to suit its policy objectives, but that did not mean they reflected market value. Nonetheless, Parker's figures are broadly in line with Dr Hearn's lease-based estimates, adding a degree of corroboration to them.

Much of the other evidence we were provided with about purchase prices was inconclusive. Private purchasers bought a small amount of land in this district during 1890–1905, presumably in areas that were not covered by restrictions. But, according to Dr Hearn, the prices for most of these transactions are not known.<sup>672</sup> Dr Hearn also provided evidence of Crown purchase prices in the North Island as a whole during the 14 years to 31 March 1905. This data showed the North Island average as slightly above the average in this district. But comparisons are statistically futile because a large proportion of the North Island purchases were in this district, and because the Crown had exclusive purchasing rights over the whole island for most of the period covered.<sup>673</sup>

Overall, we are persuaded that the Crown did in fact pay below market values, at least on average, for the land it purchased in this district during 1890–1905. As described above, this was the consistent view of Māori and settlers alike throughout the 1890s. And it is confirmed by the sudden and significant increase in purchase prices after independent valuations were introduced in 1905. Indeed, the premier, Seddon, acknowledged that Māori had been underpaid, telling the House of Representatives in 1905 that 'Maori landowners suffered, inasmuch as they did not get the same value for their lands as would have been obtained if the land had been held by Europeans.'<sup>674</sup> By introducing independent valuations, he said, 'the Government and Parliament were prepared to give the market value for the land'. The inevitable inference is that they previously had not.<sup>675</sup>

The Stout-Ngata commission also expressed this view, reporting in 1907 that the Crown 'bought on its own terms' with 'no competition to fear', and with the

670. Document A95(i), Crown purchases.

671. Document A95(a); doc A95(i).

672. Document A146, p 196.

673. Document A146, pp 187–189, 196. Hearn drew his data from Innes's report, Te Rohe Pōtae Crown Purchase Deed Document Bank, which provided data about Crown purchasing in the inquiry district, including the extension areas: doc A141 (Innes), pp 27–28.

674. Richard Seddon, 13 October 1905, 'Native Land Settlement Bill', NZPD, vol 135, p 710 (doc A146, p 206).

675. Richard Seddon, 17 October 1905, 'Native Land Settlement Bill', NZPD, vol 135, p 785 (doc A146, p 206).

owners having ‘no standard of comparison’ such as rents from leased land or profits from farming. Under these circumstances, they had been ‘reduced by cost of litigation and surveys, by the lack of any other source of revenue, to accept any price at all for their lands’.

The price was, in our opinion, below the value. It was the best possible bargain for the State. It was in accordance with the will of Parliament, and it opened up a vast territory to the land-seekers. The Executive, no doubt, conceived it was furthering the interests of general settlement, [but] it rated too low the rights of the Maori owners and its responsibility in safeguarding their interests.<sup>676</sup>

This was the view of a commission established by the Crown to advance settlement, whose members were a senior public service official and the chief justice.

11.5.4 Did the Crown underpay when it bought shares before relative interests were defined?

As discussed earlier, prior to 1892 the Native Land Court did not typically define relative interests in Te Rohe Pōtae subdivisions. According to Husbands and Mitchell, this occurred at the request of the owners, who took the view that land should be subdivided along hapū lines before any attempt was made to define the value of individual interests.<sup>677</sup> This caused both Wilkinson and Lewis much frustration, as it created risks for the Crown: if it purchased before relative interests were defined, it might find itself paying for shares from owners who later turned out to have very little real interest in the land.<sup>678</sup> The other side of this equation, as Boulton noted, was the risk of unfairness to sellers: owners with large interests might be underpaid, and those with small interests might be overpaid.<sup>679</sup>

From early 1890, Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa leaders urged the Crown not to proceed with purchases when relative interests were unknown, but they were not heeded.<sup>680</sup> Wilkinson was instructed to go ahead with purchases even when relative interests were unknown. He was told, furthermore, to assume that all owners had equal shares and to warn sellers that they would have no claim on the Crown if it turned out they were underpaid.<sup>681</sup>

Witnesses provided definitive evidence of the Crown acquiring individual shares in seven blocks before relative interests were defined. They were: Hauturu East 3; Mangauika; Ouruwhero; Puketarata; Takotokoraha; Turoto; and

---

676. ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District’, 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 4; doc A68, pp 17, 202–203; doc A67, p 381; doc A73, pp 104–105; doc A79, p 487; doc A146, p 195.

677. Document A79, pp 160, 214, 215–221, 239–240.

678. Document A67, pp 208–209, 211–212, 236.

679. Document A67, pp 217–218, 236–239.

680. Document A67, p 240; doc A79, p 237.

681. Document A67, pp 206–209, 211–212, 236–240.

Wharepuhunga.<sup>682</sup> It is possible that there are more, but we do not have definitive lists of dates on which shares were acquired for all blocks. In two of these blocks, the risk of purchasing before relative interests were known did not pay off for the Crown. In Wharepuhunga, the Crown bought 159 individual shares before relative interests were known. The vast majority of those were from absentees or others with minor interest in the land. The Crown paid full price for these shares, but when relative interests were defined the court awarded one-quarter shares to 121 of the owners who had sold. Wilkinson estimated that the Crown had paid for 12,454 acres and only acquired 8,038. In financial terms, this amounted to a loss of £552.<sup>683</sup>

In Takotoraha, the Crown paid full price for 17 shares before relative interests were known. Of those, four of the owners had received lower payments (by about one-third) than their shares had entitled them to, and another 13 owners had received higher payments (also by about one-third). Altogether, in Wilkinson's calculation, the Crown had overpaid by £9 12s 11d. Wilkinson seemed to give no thought to the possibility that those who had been underpaid should be compensated.<sup>684</sup>

In Te Kopua 1, Wilkinson acquired seven shares before relative interests were defined. If all shares had been equal, the seven sellers would have together owned 763 acres, but when relative interests were defined they were awarded shares totaling 1,165.5 acres. The Crown acquired more than 400 acres it had not paid for, or in financial terms it paid £133 10s 6d for shares that (based on its own price per acre) were worth £203 19s 3d.<sup>685</sup> Again, there is no evidence of the Crown giving any consideration to paying the shortfall. Instead, Wilkinson 'noted with satisfaction' that the money the Crown had saved by underpaying would cover the costs of developing the land for settlement.<sup>686</sup> Boulton reported that there were other blocks in which the Crown acquired more land than it had paid for, but did not name the blocks.<sup>687</sup>

11.5.5 Treaty analysis and findings

For any Crown purchase of Māori land to comply with the Treaty, a fair price must be paid. When the Crown grants itself exclusive purchasing rights, this obligation is heightened. By excluding private purchasers, the Crown acquires an obligation

---

682. Regarding Takotokoraha and Wharepuhunga, see doc A79, pp 236–237. Regarding the other blocks, Boulton provided evidence that relative interests were not determined until mid-1892. Boulton provided evidence of purchasing prior to that date in Hauturu East 3 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 317), Mangauika (doc A67, p 222), and Turoto (doc A67, pp 366–367). Husbands and Mitchell provided evidence of purchasing prior to that date in Ouruwhero and Puketarata (doc A79, p 250). In Ouruwhero, relative interests were not defined until late in 1892, by which time the Crown had acquired the shares of at least 20 owners, see doc A79(a), vol 1, pp 376–378.

683. Document A79, p 237.

684. Document A79, p 237; doc A79(a), vol 1, pp 61–62.

685. Document A67, pp 210, 237–238; doc A55, pp 103–104.

686. Document A67, pp 237–238; doc A55, pp 103–104.

687. Document A67, pp 237–238, 256.

– sometimes likened to a fiduciary duty – to use its power to protect Māori interests.<sup>688</sup>

In this district, during the years 1890–1905 the Crown showed very little interest in what a fair price might have been. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had asked that all decisions about alienation be made by hapū, and Ballance had promised that that would be the case. They had asked that all transactions be negotiated by the Kawhia Committee, and Ballance had promised that some form of body with owner representatives would conduct the negotiations. Owners had asked that sales or leases take place in an open and competitive market, and Ballance had promised that would occur. Ballance had also held out the expectation that, as a result of the railway, prices of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land would rise from ‘three or four shillings an acre’ to ‘as many pounds per acre’, and that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would receive the benefit from those price increases.<sup>689</sup> The Crown subsequently renege on all of these promises. Instead, it established a land purchasing system in which sellers had very little access to money by means other than selling to the Crown, in which there were no competitors, in which it actively pressured owners to sell, and in which it targeted individual sellers, many of whom were vulnerable and none of whom had bargaining power to compare with that of the Crown.

The Crown established this system in order to coerce sales while also controlling prices, in accordance with its financial and settlement goals. Officials showed no interest in obtaining independent valuations and little interest in negotiating with owners. Their approach, in block after block, was simply to determine a price that suited the Crown and wait until owners were compelled by force of circumstance to sell their shares.<sup>690</sup> Wilkinson acknowledged that the Crown itself fixed the price, with minimal input from owners. This was a highly cynical purchasing operation, which was specifically intended to transfer wealth from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the Crown, and did so.

It is difficult to determine what a fair price would have been if Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had been able to manage their lands as they wished, to obtain income from means other than land sales, to negotiate collectively in a competitive market, and to do so without threats or coercion from the Crown. It is possible that very little land would have been sold at all, and it is very likely that owners would have driven a harder bargain on any land that was sold. Others were telling them that their lands were typically worth well over £1 per acre and sometimes considerably more; and Ballance had suggested £3 or £4. We see no reason to disagree with Seddon’s conclusion that the district’s Māori were not paid a market value, nor

---

688. ‘While the purchase monopoly was enacted in part to protect Māori from land speculation, the Crown assumed a serious obligation to protect Māori interests when conducting its operations. It assumed a responsibility to pay Māori a fair price for their land.’: Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga, vol 2, p 418. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, p 104; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 580–581, 617, 625; submission 3.4.307, p 29. Also see submission 3.4.11, pp 2–3.

689. ‘Notes of a Meeting between the Hon Mr Ballance and the Natives at the Public Hall at Kihikihī, on the 4th February 1885’, AJHR, 1885, G-1, p 17; doc A78, p 1129.

690. Document A67, pp 188, 203–204, 210–211, 226–228, 370.

with the view of the Native Land Commission that the prices paid were ‘the best possible bargain for the state.’<sup>691</sup> Based on the views of contemporary observers, on the growth in prices once valuations were required, and on the leasehold returns provided by Dr Hearn, it seems likely that the underpayment was considerable.

The Crown made two concessions about the prices it paid. First, it acknowledged that it had breached the Treaty during the 1890s by using its ‘pre-emptive powers’ in a manner that left some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori with ‘little option but to sell their land or shares in land even when they, and other observers, considered that the prices offered represented less than the market value of their land.’<sup>692</sup> It also conceded that when it purchased Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land during the 1890s it misused its monopoly by ‘[o]ften paying prices which Māori and other observers considered unreasonably low.’<sup>693</sup>

We welcome these concessions, not least for their acknowledgement that Māori were effectively pressured or coerced into selling at whatever price the Crown offered. But we also note that the Crown did not concede that prices were in fact too low; it conceded only that Māori (along with others) perceived them to be too low, but had little choice but to sell anyway. In our view, the prices were in fact too low. Wilkinson and other Crown officials acknowledged on several occasions that the prices were below what private buyers would have offered.

We therefore find that:

- By denying Te Rohe Pōtae Māori the right to sell or lease land in an open market, by pressuring Māori landowners to sell at prices the Crown determined, and by failing to take reasonable steps to determine a fair market value for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands in the absence of a functioning market, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee in article 2 of tino rangatiratanga. By failing to respect the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as provided for in article 3, the Crown breached the principle of equal treatment.
- By breaking its February 1885 promise that Māori communities would have the right to sell or lease land in an open market, the Crown breached the partnership principle and its duty to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith.
- By paying prices that were by the admission of its own officials less than private purchasers were prepared to pay, the Crown breached the principle of partnership and its duties of active protection and to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith.

11.6 THE JOSHUA JONES LEASE

The story of Joshua Jones’ lease of lands in the Mōkau area is one of the clearest examples of the consequences of the Crown’s failure to give effect to Māori authority. As we saw in chapter 7, Mōkau was a particular site of attention for the Crown in its efforts to open Te Rohe Pōtae to European settlement. The area, also known

---

691. ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District’, 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 4.

692. Submission 3.4.307, p 1.

693. Submission 3.4.307, pp 25–26.

as Poutama, stretched roughly from the Mōkau River to Parininihi.<sup>694</sup> During the early 1880s, the Mōkau rangatira Wetere Te Rerenga, with Rewi Maniapoto's assistance, sought to manage engagement with various influences coming to bear on the Mōkau lands at the time by obtaining title to the land through the Native Land Court.

At that time, the settler Joshua Jones was seeking to establish a mining venture on the Mōkau lands. In 1882, after the Native Land Court hearings in Waitara determined the title for the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block, Jones negotiated with Wetere and the other owners of the block to enter into a lease.<sup>695</sup>

Over the following years the terms of the lease became contested. In 1885, the Government passed special legislation confirming Jones' right to complete negotiations to lease Mokau Mohakatino 1. In 1888, it established a royal commission of inquiry to look into the situation, which found in favour of Jones. Ten days after the commission returned its findings, and without consulting with Māori, the Government passed the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888, which allowed Jones' lease to be confirmed later that year. In the early twentieth century, the situation was revisited by a series of Government inquiries, but these did not result in the lease being overturned. Finally, in 1911, virtually the whole 56,500-acre Mokau Mohakatino 1 block was alienated by private purchase.

The Crown acknowledged that the Joshua Jones saga is a longstanding grievance for the people of Mōkau. The Crown made several key concessions of Treaty breaches in respect of its handling of the Jones lease.

The Crown conceded that it failed to consult with Māori prior to passing the 1888 Act. The Crown said that 'despite a long period of protest by the owners of Mokau Mohakatino against Joshua Jones' attempt to lease the block, it did not consult the owners before promoting the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888, which validated a lease over the block that the owners had not consented to.' In this, the Crown admitted that it 'failed to accord the Māori owners of Mokau-Mohakatino equality of treatment, and failed to respect their rangatiratanga over their land, and this constituted a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.'<sup>696</sup>

The Crown also conceded that the provision in the 1888 Act that allowed the lessee the monopoly power to lease additional land in Mokau Mohakatino 1 gave 'an extraordinary degree of support for the claims of a settler against the rights of Maori landowners.'<sup>697</sup> The Crown therefore conceded that its failure to protect the owners' interests in land they wished to retain breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.<sup>698</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that the protections given to Jones by the 1888 Act were a major factor in the eventual permanent alienation of the land to private

694. Document A28, p 15.

695. The main part of the block was designated Mokau Mohakatino 1. Mokau Mohakatino 2 was the name given to the Government's township site which was abandoned upon the court's refusal of this application in 1882: doc A28, p 282.

696. Submission 3.4.296, p 34.

697. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

698. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

purchasers in 1911. It said that ‘the Mokau-Mohakatino block was alienated first through lease and later through sale largely because the owners did not have alternative options other than expensive litigation’. The Crown also acknowledged that ‘[p]rior to the sale of Mokau-Mohakatino, despite requests for assistance and recommendations of support from two Native Land Commission reports, the Crown did not intervene to help the owners.’<sup>699</sup>

The Crown concluded ‘that its failure to protect the owners’ interests, when the lessees did not meet their obligations under the lease, contributed to the sale of Mokau Mohakatino, and this failure to protect the owners’ interests in land they wished to retain breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>700</sup>

The claimants did not think the Crown’s concessions went far enough. They considered, in particular, that the cause of the Crown’s failings in respect of the Jones saga was rooted in its determination to break down the aukati at all costs. The Crown’s attitude was most apparent in its introduction of the Native Land Court into Mōkau in 1882.<sup>701</sup> This occurred after the Crown entered into ‘secret negotiations’ with Ngāti Tama, pressuring Ngāti Maniapoto and Mōkau Māori to apply to have their lands come before the court (as discussed in chapter 7).<sup>702</sup> Claimants argued that ‘the Crown used as leverage the wishes of Rohe Potae Maori to engage with settlers on their own terms.’<sup>703</sup> The Crown did this, claimants said, in pursuit of a policy that had three broad aims: to undermine the Kīngitanga and traditional authority structures; to break the aukati; and to substitute Crown authority, including the Native Land Court, in their place.

For claimants, the Crown’s goal of breaking the aukati was reflected in the way that it protected Jones’ interests over those of the Māori owners, not just in validating the lease through the 1888 legislation, but also when it passed the Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885, which gave Jones special dispensation to complete negotiations for the lease of Mokau Mohakatino 1.<sup>704</sup> These actions, the claimants contended, constitute further Treaty breaches above and beyond what the Crown has conceded.

The Crown did not agree with the claimants’ view that its handling of the Jones lease had been motivated by a ‘relentless pursuit of breaking the aukati’, and submitted instead that ‘there were cautious overtures on both sides towards rebuilding relationships.’<sup>705</sup>

In this section, therefore, we address the following questions:

- What terms of lease did Jones propose and did the owners of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block agree?
- What effect did the Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885 have on negotiations for the lease and how was it viewed by the owners?

699. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

700. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

701. Submission 3.4.122, pp 3–4.

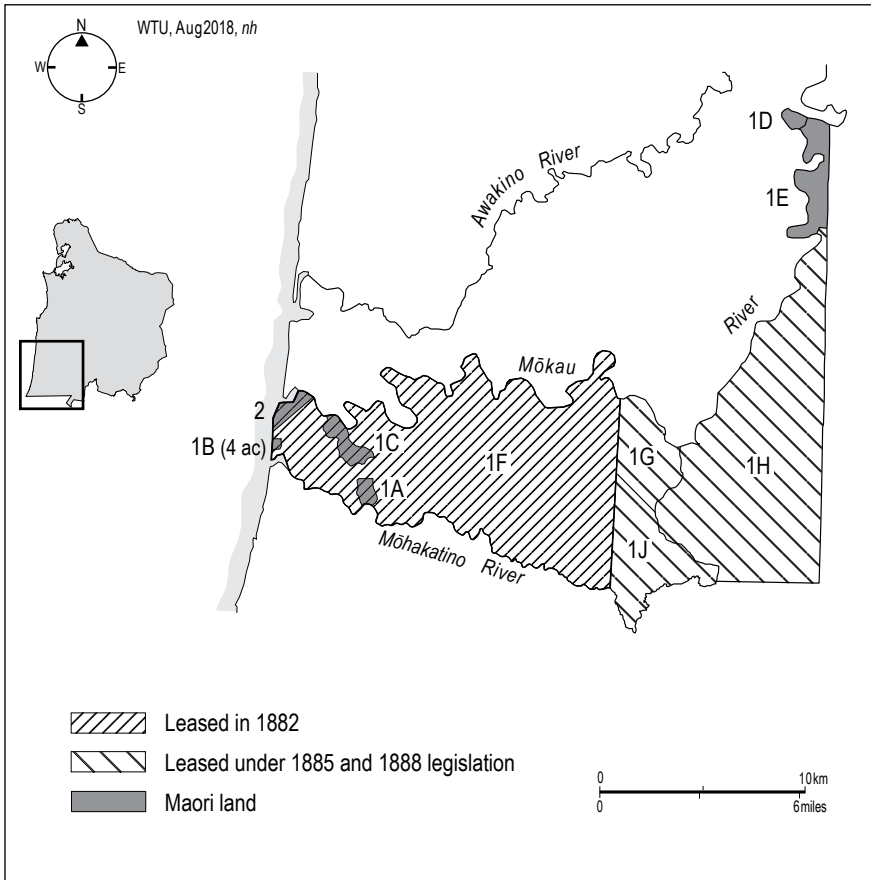

702. Submission 3.4.122, p 3.

703. Submission 3.4.366, p 4.

704. Submission 3.4.243, p 99; submission 3.4.246, pp 53–57, 60–64.

705. Submission.3.4.296, p 4.

Map 11.4: Mokau–Mohakatino block: leases to Joshua Jones, 1882–88

- What were the terms of the royal commission and were its recommendations reasonable?
- How did the Crown come to pass the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888 without the owners' consent?
- What was the Crown's role in subsequent inquiries into the lease and the eventual alienation of the land by private purchase in 1911?

11.6.1 The terms of the Jones lease

Joshua Jones, an Australian miner and speculator, arrived in New Zealand in 1876 'looking out for land' and opportunities. Based in New Plymouth, Jones sensed opportunities for coal mining and timber milling in Mōkau soon after his arrival.<sup>706</sup>

706. Document A28, p 192.

Jones first tried to purchase the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block during the Native Land Court hearing in Waitara in June 1882. Though the ownership of the block was yet to be confirmed by the court, Jones and his land agent William Grace anticipated that Wetere Te Rerenga and other Mōkau-based Ngāti Maniapoto would be named as the owners. Wetere and Rewi Maniapoto declined the offer, but signalled that they would be open to 'some form of lease or business arrangement'.<sup>707</sup>

Immediately following the hearing, Jones began negotiating the lease of the block with Wetere and other Mōkau leaders (though not Rewi), as representatives of the owners of Mokau Mohakatino 1.<sup>708</sup> Jones had a solicitor in Waitara draw up a deed in English, which Grace then translated into Māori.<sup>709</sup> We note that neither the Māori nor the English deed have survived into the present day. Our knowledge of the deeds' terms, disputed and otherwise, comes from the fact that signed copies of the deeds were presented before the royal commission in 1888 and described in the report from that inquiry.<sup>710</sup>

Joshua Jones was seeking a 56-year lease over the entirety of Mokau Mohakatino 1, right up to its unsurveyed boundary near Totoro. Jones' proposal included mining rights to the land, while the lessors would be paid £25 per annum in rental plus 10 per cent of the coal-mining proceeds.<sup>711</sup> A covenant was attached to the proposed lease agreement, with stringent conditions for Jones to meet as lessee. Jones had to pay for the survey of the block, removing a major expense for Māori. He had to establish a company with at least £30,000 in initial capital. Jones was required to continue to invest £3,000 per annum in the mine to increase the enterprise's viability. If a township was required to house and support the mine's workforce, Jones was to pay for that too. Jones was also responsible for keeping the cleared land on the block in good condition, including sowing it in good pasture and keeping it well fenced.

In addition, the lease provided formal mechanisms for the block owners to retain some control over and participate in the development of their land. Of the company directors, two would be representatives of the owners, voted in by a majority of owners.

There were other, more idiosyncratic, conditions not included in the deeds. Jones was to buy a steamer, to be piloted by Wetere, for the transportation of the coal. Finally, when Jones and Wetere travelled together, Jones would meet Wetere's expenses, including providing him with clothes.<sup>712</sup>

707. Document A28, p 288.

708. Document A28, p 289.

709. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau: report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau, made by the native owners to Mr Joshua Jones', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 13; doc A28, p 289.

710. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau: report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau, made by the native owners to Mr Joshua Jones', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 1.

711. For details of the negotiations and the lease terms see doc A28, pp 289-91; AJHR, 1909, G-11, pp 3-5.

712. Document A28, p 290.

The terms of the written lease were, however, ambiguous in one crucial respect. There was a significant difference between the English and Māori versions of the written deeds, which would prove important to later investigations into the agreement between Jones and Mōkau Māori. WJ Butler, a Native Land Court official and translator and witness at the 1888 royal commission, examined the deeds at the time of the negotiations in 1882, and found that under the English version, the Māori lessors would receive 10 per cent of profits from the mining operation less deductions for expenses. In the te reo Māori version, it was a flat 10 per cent with no deductions.<sup>713</sup>

The lease symbolised Mōkau Māori ambitions. Later, at the 1888 royal commission hearings, Wetere describing Māori motivations for entering the lease. He said that the people of Mōkau were willing to enter into business relationships with mutual responsibilities and benefits.<sup>714</sup> As historian Paul Thomas explained, under this arrangement Mōkau Māori would open up their land and the resources contained within them in return for economic benefit and ‘real partnership’.<sup>715</sup> In particular, the opportunity to lease the land rather than sell it outright offered an opportunity for Māori to access the benefits of economic development while also retaining some control over their lands.

Wetere and Rewi refused to agree to the lease until they had taken it to the other Mokau Mohakatino 1 owners for debate. This took place at Wetere’s settlement of Te Rainga in early July 1882. Around 120–130 Māori were present at the height of the gathering, though not all were owners, nor did every owner attend.<sup>716</sup> Jones was present in Mōkau by 1 July seeking agreement to his lease, but he struggled to gain signatures. On 9 July came a turning point in the negotiations with the arrival of Heremia and other Upper Mōkau Māori. Heremia opposed the deed, but declared that he would support it if it met three conditions.<sup>717</sup>

The first was that the lease could not last 56 years; instead, the owners should have the power to terminate the lease at any point.<sup>718</sup> Heremia’s reasoning was that once the survey and court costs Mōkau Māori had incurred through the recent court process were repaid, the owners could then resume full control of the lands.

Heremia’s second condition was that the lease should only give Jones rights to mineral and coal extraction – it should not be an absolute lease over the whole block. Local Māori would be able to continue living on the block, using and cultivating the land, while Jones would be able to mine the coal, taking whatever timber he needed for the mining operations.

713. ‘Native Lands and Native-Land Tenure: Interim report of Native Land Commission, on Native lands in Mokau-Mohakatino block’, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 4; doc A28, p 289.

714. Document A28, pp 289–291.

715. Document A28, p 291.

716. ‘Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau: report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease of land at Mokau, made by the Native owners to Mr Joshua Jones’, AJHR, 1888, G-4C, pp 15–6, 22; doc A28, pp 291–292.

717. Document A28, pp 292–293.

718. Document A28, p 292.

Heremia's third condition limited the area that Mōkau Māori were willing to lease to Jones. Instead of the lease applying up to Totoro, it would be for land reaching to Mangapohue, which was around 30 miles up the Mōkau River.

According to Te Ohu, a previously staunch opponent of the lease, Heremia's intervention swung the support of the hui behind the lease.<sup>719</sup> Of the 100 registered owners, not all of whom were present, allegedly 81 signed.<sup>720</sup> The deeds were signed on 13 July 1882, just over a month after the Waitara Native Land Court hearing. The question becomes, then, to what did the parties agree?

We regard it as unlikely that Mōkau Māori would have agreed to the terms of the lease unless they thought Heremia's conditions were enshrined in the written document. In particular they almost certainly would not have agreed to the lease if it ran for 56 years or extended to the whole block. Indeed, contrary to the terms of the deed, Jones himself appears to have accepted the Mangapohue boundary during the 1882 negotiations, after being told by William Grace that that was the best he could hope for. Jones later told the 1888 royal commission that he had agreed to this boundary.<sup>721</sup> This would not, however, stop him from repeatedly asserting a legal interest in the whole block over the next three decades.

Major W B Messenger, head of the armed constabulary at Pukearuhe, also gave evidence to the 1888 royal commission about the lease negotiations. According to Messenger, he, Grace, and other interpreters had assured Māori that 'it was a mineral and timber lease' only, in line with Heremia's second condition.<sup>722</sup> He also said that Māori from that region were advised they could continue to live on the block and cultivate and use the land.<sup>723</sup> Messenger told the commission that this was central to the negotiations of the lease. He said:

I do not believe they [local Māori] understood that it was a lease to give exclusive possession of the whole of the lands. I certainly did not understand it. I should think Mr Grace was two hours explaining the deed to them, but there had been talk between the Natives and Mr Grace about it for two or three days previously.<sup>724</sup>

The 1888 royal commission ultimately rejected Messenger's evidence on the basis that it was not his role to explain the nature of the lease.<sup>725</sup> It does appear, however, that there were fundamental differences between what Mōkau Māori told Jones that they would accept and the signed deeds. Messenger told the com-

719. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau: report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease of land at Mokau, made by the Native owners to Mr Joshua Jones', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 21; doc A28, p 293.

720. Document A28, p 295.

721. Document A28, p 294.

722. Document A28, p 295.

723. Document A28, p 295.

724. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau: report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease of land at Mokau, made by the Native owners to Mr Joshua Jones', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 16; doc A28, p 295.

725. Submission 3.4.296, p 17.

mission that both English and Māori language versions clearly stated that the agreement was for an absolute lease of the land for 56 years, even though the signatories had spent several days arguing for a lease covering mining and mining rights only, which Mōkau Māori had the right to terminate.<sup>726</sup>

In his evidence before this inquiry, Paul Thomas argued that the only reasonable conclusion to draw was that Mōkau Māori signed the deeds on the understanding that they reflected what they had voiced over the preceding several days.<sup>727</sup> We agree.

11.6.2 The Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885

In September 1885, the Government passed the Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885. The legislation included a special provision by which Joshua Jones was given the legal right to complete negotiations for the lease of land in the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block. The Act also referred to the whole of Mokau Mohakatino 1 rather than the confined area that Mōkau Māori had argued for the lease to cover in the 1882 negotiations.<sup>728</sup> The previous year, the Government had passed the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, which had reintroduced the Crown's right of pre-emption over Māori land. The Special Powers Act clarified that Jones's lease could operate as an exception to the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act.<sup>729</sup>

Jones himself provided much of the impetus for the inclusion of the Mokau Mohakatino provision in the Special Powers Act. In 1885, he had petitioned Parliament calling for an inquiry into his lease. He was a persistent pain to parliamentarians, constantly pushing them to support his case. He was described around parliament as the most 'indefatigable lobbyist' and as a 'bore' and crank.<sup>730</sup> He was also provocative, levelling significant allegations against the Government. The most serious, according to Thomas, was Jones's claim that the then Native Minister John Bryce 'had deliberately undermined his efforts to gain a land lease, in particular through preventing the survey of the Poutama blocks in 1882.'<sup>731</sup> There was an element of truth to this claim, in that in 1883 the Government had agreed to hold back applications to lands within the aukati until further discussions were held with Te Rohe Pōtae leaders (see chapter 8, section 8.3.3). It is, however, hard to argue this was directed at Jones specifically. Jones also claimed that the Crown's reassertion of pre-emption in 1884 had 'completely confiscated the interests acquired by him' and had rendered the money he had spent pursuing the lease a waste.<sup>732</sup>

---

726. Document A28, p 296.

727. Document A28, p 296.

728. Document A28, pp 343–344.

729. Document A28, p 343.

730. Document A28, pp 339–340.

731. Document A28, p 339.

732. Petition 17, 'Report of Public Petitions Committee', AJHR, 1885, I-1, p 4 (doc A28, p 339).

Jones' tactics proved effective. In July 1885, Parliament's Public Petitions Committee inquired into his claim.<sup>733</sup> During the inquiry, Bryce denied deliberately trying to interfere with Jones's lease and his affairs in Mōkau.<sup>734</sup> Bryce told the committee that he regarded Jones as 'dangerously intemperate and prone to wild allegation.'<sup>735</sup> Private transactions between Māori and Europeans were for the law to decide, he said, not the Government. However, John Ballance, who had succeeded Bryce as Native Minister, took a different view. Ballance believed that the Government had a general obligation to assist Jones's efforts, not least due to his contribution towards, in Ballance's words, 'opening up the aukati'.<sup>736</sup> He explained that the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884 had not been intended to restrict the interests of Europeans who already had interests in Te Rohe Pōtae, and that legislating an exemption for Jones would not be an ethical or legal problem.<sup>737</sup>

The committee did not seek testimony from Mōkau Māori and gave only minimal consideration to the concerns they had previously raised with the Government. On 17 July 1885, the committee recommended the Government remove 'any prejudicial effect' which the Alienation Restriction Act could have on Jones's Mōkau interests.<sup>738</sup> As a result, a special provision was inserted into the Special Powers and Contracts Act affirming Jones's rights to the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block; he could now complete negotiations for his lease. The Act also exempted Jones's interest in Mokau Mohakatino 1 from the maximum 21-year period one could lease land from Māori: he could now pursue a 56-year term.<sup>739</sup>

In a wider context, Ballance's testimony also signalled a new Crown approach to Te Rohe Pōtae. As Ballance put it, here was an opportunity to support a settler's efforts towards 'opening up the Aukati'. Before 1885, the Government had been reluctant to support Jones's claim in case, as Bryce had told the committee, it inflamed relations between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown.<sup>740</sup> By mid-1885, the Government had become less cautious, and it saw less of a risk in provoking Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Of course, the Government had long wanted to open up Te Rohe Pōtae; but now, it was prepared to act openly in pursuit of this. (For more on this period, see chapter 8).

Thomas thought it doubtful whether Mōkau Māori even knew of the legislative support given in 1885 for Jones and his lease.<sup>741</sup> Without doubt, most, if not all, would have bitterly opposed it. Relations between Jones and Mōkau Māori had begun to sour less than a year after the signing of the deeds. Around May 1883, word reached Mōkau that Jones claimed to have in his possession an absolute

---

733. Document A28, p 339.

734. Document A28, p 340.

735. Document A28, p 340.

736. Document A28, p 340.

737. Document A28, pp 340–341.

738. Document A28, p 343.

739. Special Powers and Contracts Act; document A28, pp 339, 343.

740. Document A28, p 340.

741. Document A28, p 344.

land lease for 56 years over Mokau Mohakatino 1, signed by Mōkau Māori.<sup>742</sup> This alarmed the owners of the block, as it contradicted what they had agreed to with Jones during negotiations at Te Rainga in July 1882. Weterere, in possession of copies of the deeds, asked Major W B Messenger, who was still stationed nearby at Pukearuhe, to examine them. Messenger informed Weterere that they did not reflect the negotiations; the documents did not specify that they were only for mineral and coal rights, but were for an absolute 56-year land lease over the whole of the block.<sup>743</sup>

Weterere travelled to Mōkau and explained the situation to other chiefs, including Heremia. The chiefs, Te Oro Watihi would later testify, were shocked that the deeds did not reflect Heremia's three conditions. Heremia, upon hearing the lease read aloud, apparently said: "These are not my words; there is a fixed term in the lease and it must be broken from to-day."<sup>744</sup> At a later hui, Mōkau Māori decided on a general course of action. Wahanui wrote to Bryce, informing him of the situation; Jones was presented with a written notice, including a trespass warning; and Mōkau Māori began sharing their views on the Jones affair with the Taranaki Herald, which published a series of articles on the matter.

Jones responded, telling his version of events through the press and demanding Government support. In the next few months, Jones, Heremia, and Wahanui continued to exchange views on the situation in the Taranaki Herald and other colonial newspapers.<sup>745</sup>

Heremia also took more direct action. Heremia reasoned that because Jones could not be trusted with the leasing arrangement he could not be trusted with the coal. By February 1884, Jones had mustered enough capital to start a small-scale mining operation on the south bank of the Mōkau River with a small crew of Europeans.<sup>746</sup> In early 1884 Heremia and five others, including his nephew Te Huia Te Rira, rowed to the mine, threw the coal in the river, and escorted the miners to the river mouth where they were put on the first ship back to Auckland.<sup>747</sup> After a week, the miners returned, as did Heremia in late March, with the same result: coal in the river, and the miners given orders to leave.

Weterere Te Rerenga, by contrast, continued to support a relationship between Mōkau Māori and Jones. Weterere's support was, however, narrowly defined. He was primarily interested in the coal partnership and the prospect of commercial gain for his people. Weterere was nonetheless prepared to go to some lengths to support Jones, including committing to settle some of his supporters by the mine at Mōkau to prevent further disruption by Heremia.<sup>748</sup> According to Thomas, Weterere main-

742. Document A28, p 327.

743. Document A28, p 327.

744. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease of land at Mokau, made by the Native owners to Mr Joshua Jones)', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 16; doc A28, p 328.

745. Document A28, p 328.

746. Document A28, pp 331–332.

747. Document A28, pp 331–332.

748. Document A28, p 332.

tained this position till around 1887, when it became apparent Jones would not keep to his side of the bargain by paying rent and mining coal.<sup>749</sup>

By mid-1884 Jones's coal-mining operations in Mōkau had ceased. Jones had attempted to complete the lease by gaining the signatures of the approximately 20 owners who had not originally signed the deeds. However, this strategy was unsuccessful, and by July 1884 Jones had abandoned his efforts to gain further signatures.<sup>750</sup> Mōkau Māori remained opposed to further land leases or sales, and Jones' poor conduct had ended most local's willingness to cooperate in restarting his mining enterprise. Frustrated, Jones turned to Parliament for help.

Under the law of the time, Jones needed to meet three further preconditions to finalise his lease. He needed it legally validated by a court, for the land to be surveyed, and for his interests to be partitioned out.<sup>751</sup>

The Crown carried out a covert survey of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block in February 1888. The survey was conducted without the approval or indeed the knowledge of local hapū. The surveyor had commenced his work while around 600 Māori were gathering in Mōkau, several miles to the south, for a hui. With most local Māori elsewhere, there were few to protest or disrupt the survey.<sup>752</sup> In late June 1888, the Native Land Court displayed the survey plan in New Plymouth and Ōtorohanga and issued a public notice saying Māori had 14 days to object to the boundaries.<sup>753</sup> Given the lack of notice, it is not surprising the court received only four letters of protest. The court considered these objections at a hearing in New Plymouth on 7 November 1888, as well as hearing from other owners. The court disregarded the voices of protest and ordered the survey to be officially registered, with Totoro as the eastern boundary.

11.6.3 The 1888 royal commission of inquiry

Political agitation had worked well for Joshua Jones in 1885, and after his efforts to complete the lease and establish coal mining were frustrated by Māori opposition, he again turned to it as a tactic for control of Mokau Mohakatino 1. From late 1887, Jones and his supporters in Parliament pressured the Government to declare him the legal lessee of the block without any investigation. This ploy failed, but the Government did agree to a royal commission of inquiry to consider the validity of Jones's claims.<sup>754</sup>

Politicians of the time were aware of the tensions between Jones and Mōkau Māori, and some saw the royal commission as a way of mitigating the situation. Oliver Samuel, the member for New Plymouth, was concerned that resistance to Jones was at breaking point. He feared that any attempt to contrive an inquiry in Jones's favour would be easily detected by Māori and that the outcome could

---

749. Document A28, pp 363–364.

750. Document A28, pp 332–333.

751. Document A28, p 358.

752. Document A28, p 375.

753. Document A28, p 375.

754. Document A28, pp 359–360.

be violent.<sup>755</sup> Some of the Māori members of Parliament were concerned that the royal commission had been established for Jones's interests alone. Mōkau Māori, for their part, appear to have put their faith in the commission as an opportunity to set forth their views and to seek resolution from Parliament.<sup>756</sup>

The royal commission was appointed in June 1888. It consisted of G B Davy, registrar-general of Lands and Deeds, Lieutenant-Colonel J M Roberts, and Hamuera Tamahau Mahupuku, an assessor of the Native Land Court.<sup>757</sup> The commission opened on 22 June 1888. Its terms of reference were to inquire into whether Jones had been prevented from fulfilling his land lease by Government action or 'the unwillingness of the Native owners'; or, 'on the other hand, [whether] the said Joshua Jones has not taken reasonable steps to enable advantage to be taken by him of enactment.'<sup>758</sup> The commission's investigations lasted two months, with hearings held in Wellington, Auckland, New Plymouth, Ōtorohanga, and Waitara.<sup>759</sup>

The commission heard from 13 Mōkau Māori witnesses, with the aid of translators. In Thomas's words, '[n]ot a single Maori witness backed Jones' claim of a land lease, vouched for his probity, or professed a desire to see him granted any legal rights over the land.'<sup>760</sup> Mōkau Māori were unanimous in testifying that they did not agree to a 56-year lease of the whole block. The lease was for coal and mineral rights, and it was for a flexible term to be determined by them. Major Messenger, who had witnessed the 1882 negotiations, corroborated the statements of the Mōkau witnesses. He, like local Māori had understood it to be a lease for coal mining only and not for exclusive land rights.<sup>761</sup>

Jones' testimony took a week and he reaffirmed the 56-year exclusive land lease. The only other witness supporting his version of events was William Grace, who had acted as Jones's agent during the 1882 negotiations.

The commission reported back to the Government on 20 August 1888. The report was 44 pages long, but the actual findings were brief, limited to a little over a page. The rest of the report comprised mostly the minutes of evidence. The commission affirmed Jones' account and his right to lease the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block. In doing so, the commission rejected the suggestion that Mōkau Māori did not properly understand the terms of the lease, calling this idea an 'inherent improbability'. The lease, the commission said, 'was understood by the Natives according to its actual purport and effect – viz., as an absolute lease for fifty-six years.'<sup>762</sup>

755. Document A28, pp 359–360.

756. Document A28, p 360.

757. Document A28, p 360.

758. Case of Mr Joshua Jones (papers relative to), AJHR, 1888, G-4, pp 2–3.

759. Document A28, pp 361–362.

760. Document A28, p 362.

761. Document A28, p 362.

762. 'Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau, made by the Native owners to Joshua Jones)', AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 2.

The commission, in explaining its decision, emphasised that they viewed those Māori witnesses who had appeared before it as ‘of unreliable character.’<sup>763</sup> Wetere Te Rerenga and Hone Pumipi Kauparera received special mention. The commission said that the testimony of Wetere and Pumipi contradicted their previous support for Jones when he had applied to the Native Land Court to have the block partitioned in 1887. Wetere, however, explained to the commission that he and Pumipi had supported Jones’ mineral rights only.<sup>764</sup> This was supported by Judge John Wilson, the land court judge who had heard Jones’ partition application. Wilson told the commission he did not believe that Wetere and Pumipi’s evidence in support of the partition provided valid proof of a land lease for Jones. Nevertheless, the commission did not accept Wetere’s account.

The commission also rejected Jones’s claims that the Government, among other parties, had deliberately interfered with his Mōkau interests. The commission ‘[could not] identify any act of the Legislature or of the Government, or any improper action, mistake, or neglect of any officer thereof, as having prevented, or materially hindered, the said Joshua Jones from completing his title.’<sup>765</sup> The Government was absolved of responsibility for Jones’s situation. As Thomas pointed out, this meant that the Crown was exempt from paying Jones any compensation.<sup>766</sup>

The commission concluded that ‘[c]onsidering the exceptional nature and circumstances of the case, the said Joshua Jones is, in our opinion, entitled to any assistance which the Legislature can accord, having regard to the just rights and interests of the Natives.’<sup>767</sup> Other than legislative assistance, the commission did not recommend any specific actions. Instead, it recommended that shape of ‘the specific form of assistance’ should come from ‘Mr Jones himself.’<sup>768</sup> In response, the Crown moved quickly to legally grant Jones the lease for which he had been fighting – against significant Māori opposition – since 1882.

11.6.4 The Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888

On 30 August 1888, a mere 10 days after the royal commission returned its findings, the Government passed the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888.<sup>769</sup> Section 2 of the

---

763. ‘Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau made by the Native owners to Joshua Jones)’, AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 2.

764. Document A28, p 363.

765. ‘Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau made by the Native owners to Joshua Jones)’, AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 4.

766. Document A28, p 365.

767. ‘Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau made by the Native owners to Joshua Jones)’, AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 4.

768. ‘Lease of Certain Lands at Mokau (report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the circumstances of a lease at Mokau made by the Native owners to Joshua Jones)’, AJHR, 1888, G-4C, p 4.

769. Document A28, p 369.

Act ordered the Native Land Court to issue a certificate of title forthwith. Section 3 ordered the Native Land Court to proceed with the partition of the block and allocate the interests of the lease's signees to Joshua Jones. Section 3 also explicitly said Jones could continue to gather any of the remaining signatures to complete the lease.

Parliament only took three days to consider the Bill before making it law. It did meet some resistance, particularly from Māori members of Parliament, who succeeded in having the Bill referred to the Native Affairs Committee. As a result some clauses were removed, including one that would have given Jones the power to request partitions or court hearings over any part of the block whenever he liked.<sup>770</sup> Still, these changes were minor. The Act, as passed, remained a bad outcome for Mōkau Māori. They had lost legal control of the block; the land was about to be allocated to Jones against their will and there was nothing they could do about it.

There was no attempt to consult with or gain the consent of the block's Māori owners, even though the Government would have been aware of the accounts given by Mōkau Māori to the royal commission earlier in 1888. The Crown in this inquiry, as noted, conceded that this was a failure of process, in breach of Treaty principles. The Crown also acknowledged that the provision in the Act granting monopoly powers for Jones to lease additional land in Mokau Mohakatino 1 gave 'an extraordinary degree of support for the claims of a settler against the rights of Maori landowners'. The Crown conceded on this basis that the 1888 Act failed to protect the owners' interests in land they wished to retain, further breaching Treaty principles.<sup>771</sup>

In Thomas's view, the Government's passing of the 1888 Act 'exhibited a hardening of its attitude towards local Maori, and arguably showed a new confidence that the protests of the hapu of Te Rohe Potae could be safely dismissed'.<sup>772</sup> As previous chapters have shown, by late 1888, construction of the railway had begun; the region had been further exposed to the Native Land Court; and purchasing officers were preparing to exert pressure on Māori to sell land to the Crown. The Government's long-held aim of opening up the aukati was being realised. The validation of Jones' lease was another means to achieving this; hence, the Crown's concession that it gave Jones 'extraordinary support'.

Jones' forceful and disagreeable personality, and his years of lobbying, provided further motivation for the Government's swift action over Mokau Mohakatino 1. He had made himself a constant irritant to politicians and Crown officials for the better part of a decade, and this was the chance to placate him. Attorney-General Frederick Whitaker spoke to this feeling in Parliament when appealing to the Legislative Council to pass the Act quickly: '[I]t was desirable that they should now finally dispose of this matter, and put Mr Jones in a position in which he could no longer have any complaint . . . Having given him this, he hoped that the

---

770. Document A28, p 373.

771. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

772. Document A28, p 370.

Assembly would have heard the last of Mr Jones of Mokau.<sup>773</sup> George Beetham, the member for Masterton, said it was ‘very unpleasant to see [Jones] . . . year after year’ and urged the premier to settle his ‘vexed question.’<sup>774</sup>

After the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888 had confirmed the certificate of title and the survey of the block had been officially registered in November 1888, one obstacle remained for Jones to validate his lease. This involved certification by the trust commissioner (a position created to ensure against fraud in Māori land dealings, generally held by a judge of the Native Land Court) that the land lease was a ‘fraud-free transaction.’<sup>775</sup> In theory, this process could offer some protection for Māori involved in land transactions, but in reality it was rare for the commissioner to decline certification.<sup>776</sup> The Jones lease was duly certified in late 1888, leaving Jones free to seek partition of his interests in Mokau Mohakatino 1, which he did at the Native Land Court hearing in Mōkau in May 1889.<sup>777</sup>

The court heard further protest from owners about the lease, but it was too late. The court partitioned 26,480 acres (out of 56,500 total) of the western area of the block, right up to Mangapohue, as Jones had long sought.<sup>778</sup> This became Mokau Mohakatino 1F and was allocated to the 80 owners who had signed the lease. Jones’s lease to this land was ‘almost immediately’ registered. It never returned to Māori control.

By the end of the hearing, Mokau Mohakatino 1 had been partitioned into nine subdivisions, named 1A to 1J. Jones had the largest partition; the smallest was four acres.<sup>779</sup> Mōkau Māori lost customary control of their land. Remaining owners were given undefined shares to land which, according to Thomas, ‘they owned but could not effectively use, and indeed, in the areas placed under Jones’ control, could not legally use at all.’<sup>780</sup> The share distribution made the owners easy targets for Jones, and he began seeking signatures to the lease for the eastern half of the block. By September 1889 Jones had leased 53,285 of 56,500 acres and controlled almost the whole block.<sup>781</sup>

11.6.5 Subsequent inquiries and permanent alienation

Soon after the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888 was passed, Joshua Jones left for England, heavily indebted. In 1890 Jones mortgaged the leases (as each partition required its own lease, the number of agreements had multiplied) to his lawyer, John Plimmer. A series of transactions saw the leases eventually end up with the settler Herrman Lewis.<sup>782</sup> Though Jones continued to bemoan his fate to politicians

---

773. Mokau-Mohakatino Bill, 30 August 1888, NZPD, vol 63, p 530; doc A28, p 371.

774. Beetham, 28 August 1888, NZPD, vol 63, p 496; doc A28, p 371.

775. Document A28, p 368.

776. Document A28, p 369.

777. Document A28, p 378.

778. Document A28, p 382.

779. Document A28, p 382.

780. Document A28, pp 382–383.

781. Native Lands and Land Tenure, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 5.

782. ‘Native Lands and Land Tenure’, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 3.

and the courts in both New Zealand and England, he never reclaimed possession of the rights to lease Mokau Mohakatino 1.

In the first decade of the twentieth century, the Mokau Mohakatino leases were investigated by two different Government-established Māori land commissions (more details on these commissions will be included in later chapters of this report).

The Native Lands Commission, later known as the Stout–Ngata commission, after commissioners Chief Justice Robert Stout and Māori member of Parliament Apirana Ngāta, was established to identify Māori land for European purchase and settlement. In July 1907, the commission found that the owners of Mokau Mohakatino 1, after land taxes, received only £8 net per annum in rent; that the leases could not be altered, ‘as Parliament will not venture to disturb the undoubted right of a European’; and finally, that ‘the tenant cannot be compelled to make any improvements’.<sup>783</sup> The land mostly lay idle.

The Stout–Ngata commission recommended that no further land be purchased in Mōkau.<sup>784</sup> As with a number of leases granted in the late nineteenth century, the Mokau Mohakatino leases had proven ‘not beneficial to the Maori owners nor to the people of the colony’.<sup>785</sup> The commission therefore recommended that Mokau Mohakatino lands not already leased or purchased should be reserved for the owners. In a separate recommendation, Stout and Ngata also recommended that no further Māori land be purchased in the Mōkau area.<sup>786</sup>

A second commission comprising Robert Stout and the chief judge of the Native Land Court, Jackson Palmer, was established at about the same time to look into longstanding Māori complaints over Pākehā control of their lands.<sup>787</sup> The Stout–Palmer commission also investigated the Mokau Mohakatino leases and reported back to the Government in 1908, not long after the Stout–Ngata commission had published its recommendations.<sup>788</sup>

In short, the Stout–Palmer commission found Jones’s leases for the Mokau Mohakatino 1F block to be invalid. This was for two reasons. The first reason was highly technical, but essentially required Jones to have been already in possession of the land in 1882 at the time the lease was first negotiated. This alone, in the commission’s view, was enough to invalidate the lease. The second reason is easier to understand. The commission noted that there were significant inconsistencies between the Māori and English language versions of the original lease. As discussed, the Māori version stated that the owners were entitled to 10 per cent of the proceeds derived from the coal mining operations; in the English language version, the lease said 10 per cent minus expenses. The commission said:

---

783. ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District’, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 11.

784. Document A28, p 409.

785. ‘Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District’, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, p 11.

786. Document A28, p 409.

787. Document A28, p 410.

788. Document A28, p 410.

The mistake is no slight or trifling one: the difference between 10 per cent before or after expenses have been deducted is most important, and no business man requires the difference to be pointed out. The law necessary to the validity of the deed in this respect has not therefore been complied with.<sup>789</sup>

The Stout–Palmer commission found, further, that the covenant attached to the lease was unfulfilled. Jones was obligated to reside upon and develop the land and had not done so. Nor had he formed a coal company with at least £30,000 in capital, or invested £3,000 or more per annum, as required in the deeds. The commission ruled that the ‘covenant has never been fulfilled, and it is a continuing covenant’, and the ‘lessors can proceed, after the proper and necessary legal steps are taken for the ejection of the present tenant.’<sup>790</sup> The commission also found the leases – signed between 1888 and 1890 – for Mokau Mohakatino 1G, 1H, and 1J invalid, for reasons which included violating the Native Lands Prevention Act 1888 and an 1889 amendment to the same Act.<sup>791</sup>

However, the Stout–Palmer’s commission’s findings were only recommendations and were not legally binding. The commission expressed sympathy for the owners and their position, as opposed to Jones, for whom they did not think ‘any sympathy is required.’<sup>792</sup> However, as Thomas pointed out in his evidence, the commission did not propose that the Government assist the Māori owners to regain control of the land. The holder of the leases from 1908 was Herrman Lewis, who wanted £14,000, and perhaps even more, to be bought out.<sup>793</sup> The commission suggested that the owners sell 10,000 acres of the block to meet Lewis’s price, leaving the remainder for Māori occupation or further leases. Understandably, the owners chose not to do this, being reluctant to part with more land in order to buy out what they had long argued to be an invalid lease.<sup>794</sup>

The commission’s findings placed the owners of Mokau Mohakatino 1 in a difficult situation. Though their legal position was strong, litigation was expensive and they could not afford to take the necessary action to break the lease. Meanwhile, the Government itself attempted to purchase the land. In 1910, the Crown offered the owners £25,247 for the entire block, which measured 50,495 acres after subtracting land to be transferred to the Crown for survey debts.<sup>795</sup> Once again, Mōkau Māori declined to sell, and the Government abandoned its purchase plan later that year.

Mokau Mohakatino 1 was eventually sold to a private coal firm headed by Herrman Lewis in 1911 after a long and disputed alienation process. The sale took place under the complex regime governing the purchase of Māori land in the early twentieth century, which will be examined in detail in later chapters of this report.

---

789. ‘Native Lands and Native-Land Tenure’, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 4.

790. ‘Native Lands and Native-Land Tenure’, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 4; doc A28, p 411.

791. Document A28, p 412.

792. ‘Native Lands and Native-Land Tenure’, AJHR, 1909, G-11, p 11; doc A28, p 412.

793. Document A28, p 412.

794. Document A28, pp 412–413.

795. Document A28, p 414.

Though the sale was between the Māori owners and a private coal firm, the Government still played a critical role. As Thomas observed, the Native Lands Act 1909 enabled a quorum of owners to be reached with only five ‘present or represented.’<sup>796</sup> A sale could be made if those voting for the sale had a larger aggregate of shares than those voting against.<sup>797</sup> In the case of Mokau Mohakatino 1, the land was alienated by unanimous vote, even though, in Thomas’s estimate, no more than 40 of the estimated 108–200 owners of the Mokau Mohakatino subdivisions were present at any one meeting of owners.

Questions were also raised at the time about the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Land Board, which approved the sale, and the role of the land board president, W H Bowler. A particular focus was whether the land board satisfied the legal condition that it would not leave owners landless. The role of land boards in the alienation of Māori land will be examined in more detail in later chapters of this report.

In 1911, William Massey, then leader of the opposition, called for an inquiry into the alienation of Mokau Mohakatino 1. While concerned to establish the propriety of the sale, his main complaint was that the sale had been made to a ‘gang of speculators’ and not the Government.<sup>798</sup> The Native Affairs Committee found that the transaction was neither improper nor illegal, and any concerns about the role of Bowler and the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Land Board in the sale had been ‘entirely disproved.’<sup>799</sup>

11.6.6 Treaty analysis and findings

We begin this section by restating the Crown concessions in respect of the Joshua Jones lease.

The Crown conceded that it breached the Treaty of Waitangi in passing the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888. In doing so, the Crown ‘failed to accord the Māori owners of Mokau-Mohakatino equality of treatment, and failed to respect their rangatiratanga over their land, and this constituted a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>800</sup> The Crown further acknowledged that ‘the Mokau-Mohakatino block was alienated first through lease and later through sale largely because the owners did not have alternative options other than expensive litigation.’<sup>801</sup> This was done despite requests of assistance from the owners and two Native Land Commission reports that recommended support for the owners. The 1888 legislation, the Crown conceded, ‘provided an extraordinary degree of support for the claims of a settler against the rights of Māori landowners,’ and constituted a failure to protect their interests. The Crown conceded that ‘this failure to protect the owners’ interests in land they wished to retain breached the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>802</sup>

796. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, pp 688, 692; doc A28, pp 418–419.

797. Document A28, p 419.

798. ‘Mokau-Mohakatino Block’, AJHR, 1911, G-1, p 1; doc A28, p 425.

799. ‘Native Affairs Committee: Mokau-Mohakatino Block’, AJHR, 1911, I-3A, p iii; doc A28, p 425.

800. Submission 3.4.296, p 34.

801. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

802. Submission 3.4.296, p 40.

The Crown was right to make these concessions. The Crown failed to protect the owners' interests in lands they wanted to retain. It did not allow Māori to retain rangatiratanga over their land and this was a breach of the plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty. The Crown failed to deliver equality of treatment when it privileged the interests of a settler over the interests and rights of Māori, which was a breach of article 3 of the Treaty. These breaches were a significant and consistent contributor to the alienation of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block.

Nonetheless, we consider that the Crown's concessions about its role in the history of the Mokau Mohakatino block between 1885 and 1911 do not go far enough. In the case of the Jones lease, the 1888 legislation alone cannot account for the Crown's misconduct: rather, that legislation was part of a broader series of Crown actions and negligence that enabled and exacerbated the negative impacts of the whole Jones lease affair on the owners of Mokau Mohakatino 1.

We note that the Crown made no specific concessions over the Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885. Much like the 1888 legislation, in respect of which the Crown did make concessions of Treaty breach, the 1885 Act also lent Jones a considerable amount of support. Similarly, while the Crown conceded that it did not consult the owners before promoting the 1888 legislation, it made no such concession over the 1885 legislation, which was also passed without consultation.

The Crown's actions in passing the 1885 Act were also significant in the validation of Jones's lease and the eventual alienation of Mokau Mohakatino 1. The Act provided Jones with two major, bespoke, legal exemptions. One was from the Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, which had reintroduced the Crown right of pre-emption over Māori land. The second allowed Jones to pursue a lease of 56 years, above the maximum term of years settlers could lease Māori land.

The 1885 Act expanded the area of land subject to Jones's lease over the whole of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block. This increased the acreage subject to the lease from 26,480 acres (as allocated by the Native Land Court in 1888 to the owners who had signed the lease) to 56,500 acres.<sup>803</sup> Jones was now allowed to pursue a lease over almost the entire block beyond Mangapohue, right up to Totoro. Jones himself admitted to the 1888 royal commission that he had agreed to the Mangapohue boundary in the original 1882 negotiations.<sup>804</sup> This also meant that Jones could lease land from people who had not signed the original lease. As the Crown acknowledged, the 1885 Act 'interfered with the rights of owners who had not signed the lease. Jones now had exclusive rights to lease land from owners who had not signed the original lease, or even ever negotiated with Jones.'<sup>805</sup>

We consider that the 1885 Act was an important step in the eventual alienation of the land. The additional acreage greatly increased the stakes of the lease for the owners and later intensified their loss to a significant degree.

As it has conceded, the Crown clearly failed to protect the Mokau Mohakatino owners' interests when it passed the Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888. The Crown

---

803. Document A28, p 382.

804. Document A28, p 294.

805. Document 3.4.296, p 23.

conceded that it breached the Treaty when it failed to consult the owners over the legislation and when it gave ‘extraordinary support’ to Joshua Jones in passing the legislation.<sup>806</sup> The Crown failed to give equal treatment to the Mokau Mohakatino owners, instead privileging and legislating for the interests of a settler at a significant cost to those owners. The eventual sale of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block was similarly marked by Crown failure. As the Crown admitted, it ignored requests for assistance from owners to help rectify the situation as well as two Native Land Commission reports that recommended support. As the Crown acknowledged, the sale came about because the owners were no longer in control of their land, and the only option for them to potentially regain control over the block was expensive litigation.<sup>807</sup> Despite this, there was no clear majority support for the sale, and many owners were surprised when news of the block’s sale reached them. Some owners were left landless as a result of the alienation.

We find that the Crown’s role in the sale of Mokau Mohakatino breached the Treaty. The Crown failed to take the opportunity to rectify the ongoing effects of the 1885 and 1888 Acts after it was clear that the Crown had erred in supporting Jones during the 1880s. The sale was allowed to proceed despite years of requests for support from Mōkau Māori and after two separate Native Land Commissions had found that the original lease was invalid and recommended the land not be sold. The Crown argued that ‘the Mokau-Mohakatino block was alienated first through lease and later through sale largely because the owners did not have alternative options other than expensive litigation.’<sup>808</sup> But there was another option: Crown intervention. The Crown had intervened before by legislating in 1885 and 1888. After the land commissions’ reports in 1907 it had the opportunity and the rationale to do so again. The Crown’s failure to act at this point to prevent the sale of Mokau Mohakatino, when it knew there was clear and significant opposition from the owners, was a further breach of its article 2 duty to protect the owners’ interests in their land.

The Crown’s willingness to privilege the interests of Pākehā over those of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori is a theme that runs through our report. In our view, the saga of the Jones lease is a glaring example. For an individual settler to receive repeated Government backing to overcome the express preferences of the rightful owners is indicative of the pressure placed on Māori by the Crown at this time to give over their lands for Pākehā settlement and Pākehā economic development. The Crown’s response to the issues raised by the lease showed a lack of regard for the rights of Māori landowners. Beyond this, however, the Crown’s actions undermined Māori efforts to control Pākehā activity in the district and benefit from interaction with the settler economy through a mechanism other than outright sale. For these reasons, we regard the Crown’s Treaty breaches in the Jones lease affair as some of the most brazen acts of bad faith identified in this inquiry.

---

806. Document 3.4.296, p 40.

807. Document 3.4.296, p 40.

808. Document 3.4.296, p 40.

11.6.7 Prejudice

The owners of the Mokau Mohakatino block were severely prejudiced by the Crown's actions in respect of the Joshua Jones lease. They had expected that, by entering into a commercial arrangement with Jones, they would enjoy economic benefits from their land while also retaining control and ownership of that land. Instead, as a result of the Crown's Treaty breaches, they lost ownership of their land entirely. Approximately 56,000 acres were alienated from their ownership, leaving some owners effectively landless as a result.

11.7 PREJUDICE

As we detailed in chapter 8, in their 1883 petition,<sup>809</sup> the five tribes had been very clear: they wanted no railway, no roads, and no court, if those things became the means to deprive them of their lands. Wahanui and the other rangatira who signed the petition referred to the consistent failure of the Crown to protect Māori lands. Māori land laws, they said, 'all tend to deprive us of the privileges secured to us by the second and third articles of the Treaty', and any attempt to secure title by going to court tended to result in the loss of land.

In return for opening their land to the railway and settlement as the Crown desired, Māori in this district wanted the Crown to try a new approach, which would free them of the 'evils' of previous land laws. They asked for the Crown to use its lawmaking powers to allow them to determine title to their land themselves, and to make their lands 'absolutely inalienable by sale'. So long as these conditions were met, Wahanui and other signatories indicated, they had 'no desire' to keep their land 'locked up from Europeans', nor to prevent leasing, or construction of roads or other public works. Their desire was 'to keep our lands'.

The five tribes were perfectly entitled under the Treaty to make these requests, and to expect the Crown to carry them to fruition. But that is not what occurred. As discussed in chapter 8, during their negotiations with the Crown, the Crown was willing to go only as far as was necessary to obtain Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' consent for the railway. It was never willing to fully relinquish control over land titles, and it was never willing to give up its own right to buy Māori land.

While Ballance was Native Minister, the Crown made some important concessions regarding the process for determining land titles and the conditions on which land would be alienated.<sup>810</sup> But Ballance's arrangements satisfied neither Māori nor settlers. They represented an attempt to reconcile interests that were fundamentally opposed. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori wanted to retain possession of their land, in accordance with their guaranteed rights under the Treaty; settlers wanted to acquire that land for themselves, and saw no reason why Māori should benefit from a railway that was funded through general taxation.

---

809. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa and Whanganui Tribes', AJHR, 1883, J-1.

810. 'Notes of a Meeting between the Hon. Mr Ballance and Te Kooti and his People at Kihikihi, on the 3rd February, 1885', AJHR, 1885, G-1, pp 12-24, especially p 24.

From 1887, the Crown chose to disregard the promises that Ballance had made and the conditions that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had imposed in return for their consent to the railway. From then onwards, the Crown's policy was to acquire large areas of Te Rohe Pōtae land at sufficiently low prices to allow it to onsell at a considerable profit. By these means, the railway could be funded and a portion of the colony's debt problems could be resolved.<sup>811</sup>

To achieve these goals, the Crown established a ruthlessly efficient land purchasing operation. The fundamental precondition was that communal authority be broken down. As discussed in chapter 8, and analysed in detail in chapter 10, the Crown insisted on title being individualised by the Native Land Court in spite of Māori landowners' misgivings. As the Hauraki Tribunal commented, individualisation 'fundamentally changed Maori social relationships and relations with land'. In itself, this rendered it more susceptible to alienation.<sup>812</sup>

11.7.1 Denial of land rights

But the Crown did not stop with individualisation. It granted itself exclusive purchasing rights within the district, and it did so with the express intention of eliminating private competition so it could control the market and thereby acquire the land that it wanted at prices it could determine. Even without any harmful downstream effects, the laws that granted the Crown exclusive purchasing rights and eliminated private competition were prejudicial in themselves. They denied Māori landowners their communal and individual land rights, preventing them from selling, leasing, mortgaging, or otherwise dealing with land as they pleased – or, indeed, at all. And they denied Māori landowners access to a market in which the value of their lands could be determined – even if, as discussed earlier, that market and land value would still be far less than optimal due to the destruction of communal control.

As the Crown acknowledged, the ability to alienate land is a fundamental right of land ownership.<sup>813</sup> It was inherent in article 2, which provided for Māori communities to retain possession of and authority over land for so long as they wished, but also allowed for sales; and it was inherent in article 3, which provided Māori individuals with the same rights and privileges as British subjects. The ability to alienate land is also a fundamental requirement of a functioning economy. For an extended period, covering most of the time between 1884 and 1910, Māori in this inquiry district were denied the full enjoyment of that right in a way that differed from most European landowners and Māori.

11.7.2 Denial of opportunities to earn incomes from land

As discussed earlier, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were occasionally able to bypass the restrictions, entering timber milling or resource arrangements that did not

---

811. The Native Minister, Edwin Mitchelson, discussed the 1887–90 debt in a public meeting in Auckland in 1890: 'The Acting Premier', New Zealand Herald, 8 November 1890, p 4.

812. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 2, pp 784–785.

813. Submission 3.4.298, p 1.

constitute leases or sales of land and so were not affected by the law.<sup>814</sup> But these arrangements, in Boulton's words, were 'small-scale, scattered and based almost entirely on extraction of natural resources', and could not in themselves provide sufficient income for long-term economic development.<sup>815</sup> In general, the Crown was highly vigilant in enforcing restrictions whenever owners sought to lease or sell land, and was also vigilant in warning Europeans and Māori alike against attempts to bypass the restrictions. Ministers, officials, and land purchase officers all made it their business to emphasise the illegality of any land lease that brought income to Māori landowners.<sup>816</sup>

The immediate effect was to deny Māori access to incomes. At times, this had effects that would seem absurd if they were not also tragic. For a period in the early 1890s, for example, restrictions applied to almost all of the land in the inquiry district, but Parliament had granted funding for purchasing only within the northern and southern target areas. In the significant areas of the district that fell outside the northern target area (see map 11.1), therefore, Māori could not sell, lease, or mortgage their land to anyone at all.<sup>817</sup> Similarly, in 1890, John Ormsby and John Hetet offered to sell the Crown a half-acre section beside the railway station in Ōtorohanga, complete with several buildings including the Temperance Hotel and a butcher shop, but were told that the Crown was only interested in purchasing large, unimproved blocks. As Marr noted, Crown officials showed no interest in the fact that Ormsby and Hetet had no other possible market. If the Crown was not buying, no one could.<sup>818</sup>

It is not possible to quantify the direct economic impacts of the restrictions. It is clear, however, that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori fared much better when restrictions were not in place. During 1891–94, several of the inland Mokau blocks were not subject to restrictions, and economic activity (including sheep farming, mining, flax cutting, and limestone extraction) was significantly greater there than in other parts of the district.<sup>819</sup> And after 1905, when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could lease land directly to Europeans without the intervention of the Crown or a Māori land board (as the land councils had by then been renamed), the area under lease expanded rapidly.<sup>820</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners also fared better on those occasions when they were able to circumvent the restrictions, such as when Mangawhero owners were able to sell timber or other resources, or enter grazing arrangements.<sup>821</sup>

---

814. Document A146, p 231; doc A55, p 91.

815. Document A67, p 306.

816. Document A67, pp 275, 303–304, 306, 317, 339–340; doc A146, pp 126–129; doc A68, pp 133–134, 142. Also see doc S21(b), pp 31–32.

817. Document A67, pp 397–399.

818. Document A55, p 104.

819. Document A146, pp 127, 495–496. Also see doc A67, pp 329–340.

820. Document A146, pp 128–134. Also see doc A67, pp 350–351.

821. Document A146, pp 229–232, 498–499; doc A67, pp 320–322.

11.7.3 Destruction of communal authority and development opportunities

Alongside the statutory limits it had imposed on Māori rights, the Crown added a suite of purchasing methods that were designed to break down Māori communities' resistance to land sales. Those methods included leveraging survey debts; bypassing community leaders and meetings to purchase in secret from individuals; targeting individuals who had little connection with the land or were in great need of money or were jealous of other owners; pursuing as much land as possible irrespective of Māori interests or wishes; and using partitioning processes to further break down resistance to sales.

The targeting of individuals was especially corrosive, both of traditional relationships with land and of efforts by Māori leaders to manage land for the benefit of their people. In spiritual terms, individualisation broke centuries-old relationships between people and land. As Husbands and Mitchell explained:

This process of turning something that was real, tangible and – from a Maori perspective in particular – living, into abstract shares whose value could be calculated and traded on paper, was of great importance. . . . [I]t represented a fundamental shift in the relationship between human and nature as something whose value had been hitherto local and specific, defined by history and geography, was transformed into a commodity whose worth was calculated primarily in terms of acres and pounds, shillings and pence.<sup>822</sup>

In 1892, Wilkinson explained that individualisation had 'almost entirely destroyed the influence that the chiefs formerly had over their people in the matter of the disposal of land'. Whereas previously rangatira could negotiate with Crown officials and set land aside for settlement, now each individual could make his own decisions. As Wilkinson put it, 'Jack is now as good as his master.'<sup>823</sup>

In economic terms, the effect of individualised title was that all owners had paper shares in a communal property. No individual or whānau had a plot of land of their own which they could develop, even if they could find the funds. And any effort to manage the land collectively required the agreement of tens or even hundreds of owners, including many who did not live on the land. Each of those individuals could sell his or her shares at any time.<sup>824</sup>

The Crown's practice of targeting individuals, and (initially at least) purchasing in secret, created considerable uncertainty for landowners who wished to retain land. None could know who had sold, and until Wilkinson applied to the court for a partition of the Crown's interests, none could know which land might be lost as a result of sales. The practice of taking land for survey debt had similar effects. Again, none could know when land might be taken, nor which land, until Wilkinson applied for a partition.

---

822. Document A79, p 241.

823. 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, p5. Also see doc A68, p144.

824. Document A67, pp 217–218.

Under such circumstances, land development was impossible on blocks with more than a few closely related owners. For larger blocks, at any given time neither sellers nor non-sellers could know how many shares the Crown possessed in their land block, nor when the Crown might apply for a partition, nor which land the court would ultimately grant to the Crown. Unless owners could be certain that others would not sell, there was little point in them attempting to develop the land.<sup>825</sup> Owners felt these effects almost continuously from 1892 onwards. Each time Wilkinson applied to have the Crown's portion partitioned out, he inevitably began a new round of purchasing. In all, Wilkinson applied for more than 300 partitions between 1894 and 1901. There was never a point at which non-sellers could be certain the process had ended.<sup>826</sup>

These effects combined with the restrictions to ensure that most Māori land-owners could earn little from their land. As they were being drawn into the cash economy (principally by survey costs), they were simultaneously being denied the means to put their land to productive use and were therefore being drawn into a cycle of poverty. These effects in turn were exacerbated by the Crown's failure to offer financial<sup>827</sup> or technical<sup>828</sup> assistance for Māori farmers, and by its decisions to delay work on the railway (which would otherwise have been a source of jobs) and to delay settlement of the district until it had completed its purchasing programme.<sup>829</sup> All of these decisions reflected the greater priority it gave to land purchasing and settlement goals over Māori interests.

One measure of these effects is the decline in the district's sheep farming ambitions. In 1892, Māori in the district owned 15,643 sheep, and Europeans owned 2,277. That was the year in which the Crown 'broke the ice' on Māori resistance to land sales, and it also marks the high water mark for Māori sheep farming. From that year on, the number of sheep in Māori ownership steadily declined, and the number in European ownership grew correspondingly. By 1901, Māori in the district owned only 2,314 sheep, and Europeans owned 13,424.<sup>830</sup> As Husbands and Mitchell noted: 'The fall in Maori sheep ownership within the district ran more or less parallel with the large scale alienation of individually-owned interests in Maori land to the Crown.'<sup>831</sup> Other economic effects have been discussed in chapter 10.

825. Document A146, p 409; doc A67, p 425.

826. Document A79, p 251.

827. Document A25, p 170; doc A146, p 173.

828. Crown officials were aware of Māori aspirations to develop sheep and dairy farming operations, but made no attempt to offer technical assistance. They regarded such efforts as potential obstacles to their land purchasing operations: 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1890, G-2, pp 4-5; 'Reports from Officers in Native Districts', AJHR, 1892, G-3, pp 2-3; doc A67, pp 228-229.

829. Document A68, p 206; submission 3.4.307, pp 17-18.

830. Document A79, pp 512-513; doc A67, p 229.

831. Document A79, p 514.

11.7.4 Fragmentation of land holdings

Economic deprivation was not the only effect of the Crown's individual purchasing partitioning practices. Each new round of partitioning also occupied owners' time and resources. They were dragged into negotiations with Wilkinson over which land would be given up, both for sellers' shares and for survey costs. They may also have been required to attend court and bear the associated costs.<sup>832</sup>

Each round of partitioning also meant that original land blocks were progressively divided into smaller and smaller sections. In the most extreme cases a single block could, over a period of 10–15 years, become well over 100 individual subdivisions, in which Māori and the Crown each held scattered holdings.<sup>833</sup> The result, according to Boulton, was that the district became 'a patchwork of Crown and Maori owned subdivisions', in which 'larger blocks that might have been suitable for large-scale pastoral farming were rapidly broken up by areas of Crown land'.<sup>834</sup>

Individual owners could be left with small numbers of shares in one or more blocks, but no single block that was large enough for them to use and develop. As Husbands and Mitchell explained, they might 'find themselves cut off in a small corner of their former block surrounded by what was in effect an ocean of Crown-owned land'.<sup>835</sup> Nor was there any guarantee that the plot of land they were left with contained their settlements or other sites of spiritual importance.<sup>836</sup> Under such circumstances, and especially if the sites of greatest significance had already been lost, it was easier to join the sellers than to make any attempt to develop or earn an income from the land.<sup>837</sup>

Crown officials were aware of the potential for harm arising from excessive partitioning, but showed no concern for its impact on Māori landowners; rather, their concern was that the creation of ever smaller subdivisions was leaving the Crown with land that could not easily be used.<sup>838</sup> The 1907 Stout–Ngata commission reported that it was not aware of any district where Māori land had been subdivided as much as in the Aotea-Rohe Potae block. It gave the specific examples of Kinohaku East and West, Hauturu East and West, Pirongia, and parts of Rangitoto Tuhua.<sup>839</sup>

We acknowledge that Māori landowners also made applications to subdivide land, and that this contributed to overall land fragmentation in the district. When the Crown applied to partition, non-selling owners frequently subdivided the remaining land among themselves, but owners also sometimes applied to partition

832. Document A79, pp 253–256.

833. Document A73, pp 92–96, 149; doc A79, pp 250, 258–263, 306; doc A146, pp 409, 411; doc A67, pp 424–425.

834. Document A67, pp 37, 424–425.

835. Document A79, pp 259–260.

836. Document A79, pp 259–260; doc A67, pp 37, 289, 356, 424–425, 478; doc A55, pp 56–57; doc A146, pp 405–411.

837. Document A79, pp 259–263, 490–491, 494–501; doc A146, pp 405–417.

838. Document A67, p 356; doc A67(a), vol 2, p 640.

839. 'Native Lands in the Rohe-Potae (King Country) District: An Interim Report', 4 July 1907, AJHR, 1907, G-1B, pp 2–3; doc A67, p 385.

their land even when there was no Crown application. This seems to have occurred as a means of resolving disputes that arose over definition of relative interests.<sup>840</sup>

But even if there was some element of volition, fragmentation was only possible because of the land title system, and it was principally driven by successive rounds of Crown purchasing. Where owners did subdivide land of their own choice, witnesses told us they did so as a means of reducing the uncertainty and risks arising from continued Crown purchasing. With the Crown relentlessly buying individual interests, the only way to protect land from sale and to manage it collectively was to eliminate owners who might be vulnerable to selling.<sup>841</sup>

11.7.5 Loss of land

The ultimate effect of the Crown's purchasing programme was that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori alienated a large proportion of their ancestral lands. In the period under consideration, the Crown's purchasing methods were entirely coercive and contrary to the principles of the Treaty. The Crown deliberately and systematically undermined hapū and tribal authority by individualising land titles. It deliberately denied Māori their land rights and economic opportunities. And then it exposed them to a relentless and systematic purchasing programme in which Crown agents exploited debt, targeted vulnerable individuals, and used court processes to pressure Māori landowners into selling. The programme was quite explicitly intended to transfer wealth from Māori to the Crown, and it achieved its desired effect. Under these circumstances, when Māori landowners elected to sell their lands or shares in land, they were not doing so of their own free will. None of the Crown purchases in this district during this period was compliant with the Treaty.

In all, the Crown acquired 639,815 acres during the 1890–1905 calendar years – slightly over one-third of the inquiry district.<sup>842</sup> The amounts varied from block to block and region to region. The Rangitoto Tuhua block, at 461,277 acres, accounted for almost one-quarter of the district's land area. There, the process of subdividing blocks from Aotea-Rohe Potae and awarding titles was not completed until the late 1890s, and purchasing began later. By the end of 1904, the Crown had completed the purchase of just 24,319 acres (though it had acquired shares in other blocks).<sup>843</sup> Elsewhere, purchasing was much further advanced. In the south-west of the district, very little land remained in Māori possession outside of the Mokau Mohakatino block. Purchasing had also been very heavy in the Kinohaku 840. Document A79, pp 250–269, 411, 494–501; doc A146, pp 411–417. Regarding initial subdivision of the Aotea-Rohe Potae block, see doc A79, pp 186–212. Also see submission 3.4.305, p 81.

---

841. Document A146, p 409; doc A79, pp 147, 494–496, 500–501.

842. Document A21, p 131 tbl B5. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, the Crown purchased a total of 639,815.07 acres during the years 1890–1905. The inquiry district totals 1,931,136 acres (excluding extension areas). All of the Crown's purchases during the period 1890–1905 occurred within the original inquiry district. Wherever we mention land sales as a proportion of the inquiry district, we are referring to the original district. In all, the Crown's purchases amounted to 33.13 per cent of the original district during this period: submission 3.4.309(a), p 2; submission 3.4.130(g), pp 2–3; doc A21, pp 7, 34. Also see doc A67, pp 11, 28; doc A95, p 4.

843. Document A21, annex 7, Rangitoto Tuhua blocks.

and Hauturu blocks, and in some parts of the north such as Puketarata, Te Kopua, and Pirongia West (see tables 11.5–11.7). Substantial proportions of other blocks had also been sold, and none of the district's original subdivisions remained untouched.

11.7.6 Payment of below market prices

The Crown purchased this land during a period in which there was no land market. By law, the Crown had no competitors, and this, combined with the Crown's purchasing tactics, meant that the Crown effectively fixed the price. Wilkinson acknowledged as much on several occasions, and also acknowledged that the purchasing programme relied on 'want of money' forcing Māori landowners to take any price they were offered. By denying Te Rohe Pōtae Māori access to a functioning land market, the Crown not only breached their rights, but also made it impossible for them to determine the true value of their land.

While it is difficult to determine how much the Crown would have paid if it had faced competition in a functioning and Treaty-compliant land market, we think the evidence is clear that the Crown paid less, on average, than a market value would have been. The 1907 Stout-Ngata commission and numerous contemporary observers believed the district's land to be worth considerably more than even the Crown's highest purchase prices. Crown officials conceded that prices would have to rise if independent valuations were used. The premier, Richard Seddon, admitted in 1905 that the prices paid were less than they would have been in a free market. The increase in prices after 1905 would tend to suggest that in the preceding 15 years the Crown typically paid a quarter to a half of the true value. This conclusion is corroborated by Dr Hearn's lease-based estimates and Parker's evidence about the prices the Crown sought when it on-sold land.

The direct impact of underpayment was that landowners received less for their land or shares than they should have. The downstream effects were much greater. Underpayment meant that more land was taken in payment of survey liens than should have been, and that owners had less capital with which to develop their remaining lands. With higher prices, those in want of money might have had to sell less to meet their needs.

Overall, the Stout-Ngata commission calculated that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori received £145,384 from land sales up to 1900.<sup>844</sup> This might seem like a very substantial sum, even after court (at least £1 per day)<sup>845</sup> and survey costs (£23,728)<sup>846</sup> had been deducted. However, Dr Hearn calculated that during the 1890s more than half of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori individuals who sold shares in land did not receive more than £10, and more than three-quarters did not receive more than £30.<sup>847</sup> To put these amounts in perspective, Wilkinson in 1891 wrote that the £3 10s he was paying some shareholders in Te Kopua 1 'about represents the cost here of a suit

844. Document A93, p 21.

845. Document A79, pp 289–300.

846. Document A79, p 307.

847. Document A146, pp 215–217. Also see doc A28, p 405.

of clothes, or a pair of blankets'. At five shillings per acre, a suit was worth 12 acres of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land.<sup>848</sup> The New Zealand Official Yearbook 1893 recorded that a general labourer in Auckland typically earned 5 shillings or more per day – the equivalent of an acre of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land. A lamb was worth 10 shillings, or two acres, and a ton of potatoes was worth 50 shillings, or 10 acres.<sup>849</sup>

The Native Land Commission acknowledged that most of the purchase money had gone towards basic needs or to housing. Some money had been squandered, but in the commission's view this reflected the insurmountable challenges that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori faced in developing land.<sup>850</sup> Dr Hearn's view was that, at the prices paid, very few Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would have been able to accumulate enough capital to invest in farms or other viable economic activities.<sup>851</sup>

11.7.7 Conclusion

One of the more remarkable features of the period under review is the pace and scale of change. In 1883, Te Rohe Pōtae had been a Māori territory. Within the aukati, the people of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui had retained possession of their land and control over their territories. By engaging with the Crown, they hoped to have laws put in place that would ensure they retained their lands, and did not fall victim to the rapacious land speculation that had affected other districts. What in fact occurred was the opposite of what they had intended. Once they had opened the door, the Crown walked through.

The Crown achieved its purchasing goals. It acquired one-third of the district's land and was able to onsell at a considerable profit, which it used to fund the railway and other infrastructure. By altering relationships with land and destroying their resource base, the Crown also broke down the authority of the region's iwi and hapū, and instead asserted its own laws. Māori got none of what they had sought. Wahanui, Taonui, John Ormsby, and others had engaged with the Crown because they saw both threats and opportunities arising from the growing settler population and the assertiveness of its Government. These were the leaders regarded by Europeans as 'progressives' – those who sought to advance Māori interests by engaging with the Crown instead of turning their back on it as the Kingitanga and many others in Te Rohe Pōtae would have preferred.<sup>852</sup>

In their 1897 petition, Eketone and other leaders referred to 'the magnitude of the injustice' visited on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori by the Crown's decision to deny them their land rights. Crown purchasing, they said, was 'quite as bad or worse than purchases by private Companies of which we were at first afraid'. The Crown did not negotiate over price; it did not listen to protests; it took no care to ensure that sellers were not left landless or destitute; it did not even give Te Rohe Pōtae

---

848. Wilkinson to Lewis, 27 May 1891 (doc A67(a), vol 1, p 301).

849. Document A79, pp 290–291.

850. Document A67, p 310.

851. Document A146, p 337.

852. Document A67, pp 437, 447.

Māori the advantage of the same land laws as other Māori landowners. Its sole purpose was ‘that we should speedily sell to them our lands for whatever price they please.’<sup>853</sup>

The impacts of the Crown’s actions during this period can be measured only partly in land and in purchase prices. They can also be measured in the wilful destruction of the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae people in relation to their land and the betrayal of the promises made under Te Ōhākī Tapu so soon after those promises had been made.

11.8 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

We found that the Crown breached the Treaty and its principles when it enacted the laws imposing the 1898–91 restrictions, the 1890–92 restrictions, the 1892–93 restrictions, and the 1894–1910 restrictions, and when it imposed restrictions on selected land blocks under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892, in the following ways:

- By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions without first consulting or obtaining the consent of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection and breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of autonomy and partnership.
- By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions in breach of its promises that any sales or leases would occur in an open market, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the partnership principle, and its obligation to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith. The Crown conceded this breach.<sup>854</sup>
- By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions in a manner that treated Te Rohe Pōtae Māori differently from other Māori landowners and from Europeans, to their detriment, the Crown breached the principles of equity and equal treatment.
- By enacting these laws and imposing these restrictions for the express purposes of transferring large areas of Māori land into Crown ownership and ensuring that the Crown benefited from rising land prices along the railway, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and its duty of active protection.

We found that none of the Crown’s purchases of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land during the years 1890 to 1905 were conducted in a manner that was consistent with the Treaty and its principles:

- By purchasing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land under cover of restrictions on alienation, by using survey debts to leverage sales, by purchasing geographically undefined shares from individuals without regard for community wishes and interests, by targeting individuals who were vulnerable to selling, by

---

853. Pepene Eketone and 163 others, petition 217 (doc A73(a), vol 5, pp282–290; doc A146, pp290–291).

854. Submission 3.4.307, pp12, 25.

using partitioning to further leverage sales, by using aggressive tactics such as threats of compulsory acquisition, by failing to take reasonable steps to ensure that Te Rohe Pōtae communities retained land they wished to retain, by purchasing land that had been declared inalienable, by purchasing in spite of community opposition and in spite of warnings that some owners might be left landless, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and its duty of active protection.

- By using these methods to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to sell land in spite of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders' requests that their land be protected if the district were opened to the railway and to settlement, and in spite of the conditions imposed and promises made as part of Te Ōhākī Tapu, the Crown breached the partnership principle and failed in its obligation to act fairly, honourably, and in good faith.
- By using these methods to pressure Te Rohe Pōtae to sell land for the express purposes of transferring land and wealth to the Crown and settlers, and thereby ensuring that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori did not enjoy the benefit of rising land prices along the railway route, the Crown breached its duty of active protection, the partnership principle, and the principles of equity and equal treatment.

We found that the Crown paid unfair prices for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land:

- By denying Te Rohe Pōtae Māori the right to negotiate collectively in an open market, by pressuring Māori landowners to sell at prices the Crown determined, and by failing to take reasonable steps to determine a fair market value for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lands in the absence of a functioning market, the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga.
- By breaking its promises with respect to the manner in which land prices would be negotiated, the Crown breached the partnership principle and its duty to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith.
- By paying prices that were by its own admission less than private purchasers were prepared to pay, the Crown breached the principle of partnership and the duties of active protection and to act honourably, fairly, and in good faith.

In respect of the Joshua Jones lease, we found that:

- By failing to protect the owners' interests in Mokau Mohakatino lands they wished to retain, the Crown did not allow Māori to retain tino rangatiratanga over their land, in breach of the plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty.
- By privileging the interests of a settler over the interests and rights of Māori, the Crown breached article 3 of the Treaty.
- By failing to intervene to prevent the sale of Mokau Mohakatino 1, the Crown breached its article 2 duty to protect the owners' interest in their land.
- The owners of the Mokau Mohakatino 1 block were severely prejudiced by the Crown's actions in respect of the Joshua Jones lease.

We found that the Crown's Māori land laws and purchasing practices during 1890–1905, in combination with the land title changes discussed in chapter 10, had profound prejudicial effects on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities, including their traditional relationships with land, their communal systems of authority, and their ability to retain and use resources for communal well-being, both at the time and for future generations. More specifically:

- Māori landowners were unable to exercise their communal and individual rights to manage and use land as they wished. They were severely hampered in their efforts to develop farms and to raise funds by other means such as leasing, entering grazing and resource-use arrangements, and selling some land in an open market. As a result, their ability to participate in new economic opportunities was drastically undermined.
- Lack of economic opportunities, combined with the Crown's coercive tactics, meant that Māori communities struggled to retain their traditional lands. They were pressured or coerced into selling some 640,000 acres, often at prices the owners considered unfair, undermining communities' ability to provide for present or future needs. This amounted to a direct transfer of wealth and resources from Māori communities to the Crown, undermining their ability to provide for their current and future well-being either by traditional means or by taking advantage of new economic opportunities. The lack of a functioning land market denied communities opportunities to obtain fair market prices for the lands they sold. Owners who did retain land were often left with plots that were inaccessible and unusable, further contributing to the cycle of selling.
- Māori communities' traditional relationships with land had already been undermined by changes in land title. As land was sold and remaining holdings became fragmented, those traditional relationships were further undermined, denying communities their rights to sustain important whakapapa ties and to exercise tikanga governing relationships with land and resources.
- The relationships of rangatira to their communities, also already undermined by land title changes, further eroded as land was sold and remaining holdings became fragmented. Rangatira continued to play some roles as community leaders and representatives, but were unable to coordinate land and resource use as they once had, and nor were they able to manage the pace and nature of settlement. They were therefore unable to fulfil their responsibilities to protect community well-being.
- As these economic and social effects were felt, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities became increasingly impoverished and demoralised. Having entered a relationship with the Crown in the hope that they could control their own futures, they found they could not. It was the Crown, not Māori, who controlled the settlement of this district.

CHAPTER 11 APPENDIX I

THE 1897 PETITION OF THE FIVE TRIBES

In October 1897, Pepene Eketone petitioned the House of Representatives on behalf of himself and 163 others of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui descent.<sup>1</sup> The petition is an extremely clear explanation of the grievances of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about the Crown's nineteenth-century land-purchasing practices. It is set out here in full.

Ki Te Tunuaki

Me nga Mema Honore o te Runanganui e noho huihui ana i roto i te Whare Paremata kei Poneke

Tena koutou,

Ko matou nga Kaipitihana ka tuhia iho nei ki raro nga ingoa he tangata no nga iwi me nga hapu o N Maniapoto, N Hikairo, N Raukawa, N Tuwharetoa, me Whanganui e noho ana i runga, e whaipaanga ana hoki ki te whenua e mau na nga rohe i te kupu apiti Tuarua ki te Ture Kooti Whenua Maori 1894. Ko taua whenua nei hoki kei te rahuitia e taua Ture me ona Whakatikatika kia kore matau e whaimana ki te hoko ki te reti ranei ki etehi tangata ke atu engari ki te Kawanatanga anake.

Ko matou hoki ko a koutou Kaipitihana he iwi e whakaatu tonu ana i ia wa i ia wa ki to Koutou Whare Honore, i runga i te ara pitihana me etehi atu huarahi o te ture, i te nui o nga mate e pa ana ki a matou i raro i te tikanga e here nei ki te Kawanatanga anake te hokonga o matou whenua.

E tino whakaaro ana matou ko te ture a te Kawanatanga e arai nei kia kua matou e hoko e reti ranei ki nga pakeha waho, apiti ki te hiahia nui o te Kawanatanga kia tere tonu ta matou hoko atu i o matou whenua mo te utu e pai ana ratou ki te homai[;] kaore ratou e pupuru ana i taua here i runga i te whakaaro tiaki. Kei pau o matou whenua te hokohoko e nga Horo Whenua, engari i runga ke i te whakaaro kia watea ai, ratou te mahi i ta ratou i pai ai mo o matou whenua.

Ko nga hoko a te Kawanatanga e rite tonu ana, e neke atu ana ranei te kino i nga hoko a nga Kamupene i wehingia nei e matou i te tuatahi, na te mea, ki te tupu he raruraru ki waenganui i a matou ko te Kawanatanga i runga i ana hokohoko, kaore he tirohanga atu ma matou, e, ko wai hei kai-titiro i te tika raua ko te he, i te mea kua riro tonu mai ko te Kawanatanga he hoa totohe.

---

1. Pepene Eketone and 163 others, petition, 5 October 1897 (doc A73(a), vol 5, pp286–290; doc A67(a), vol 1, pp33–36, 37–48.)

I raro ano hoki i aua hoko a te Kawanatanga kaore matou e whaireo ana ki te whakarite tahi me te apiha a te Kawanatanga i te utu ano te eka o matou whenua e hokona ana[;] kaore hoki e tiakina nga tangata e hoko ana, kei hoko katoa i o ratou whenua, a, ka noho manene, ara, tiaki pera me nga hoko o mua ki nga pakeha waho, me tino whakaatu rawa ki te aroaro o tetehi Tiati e te tangata e hoko ana i tona whenua, he whenua ano tona kei tua atu hei oranga mona, katahi tana hoko ka whakamana. Otiia, ko enei tikanga tupato kei te ngaro katoa i runga i nga whakahaerenga hoko a te Kawanatanga tona tukunga iho, he nui o matou tangata e kore e ora ki te noho i runga i nga toenga whenua e toe ana ki a ratou, a, he tokomaha ano hoki kua kore rawa atu he wahi whenua e toe ana ki a ratou.

Ko tana tikanga here a te Kawanatanga e pa ana ki a matou whenua anake, kaore ki o te pakeha, a, i runga i te whai a to koutou Whare Honore kia kotahi ture mo nga iwi e rua tau atu ki nga whenua, ehara taua tikanga motuhake e mahia nei ki to matou takiwa i te tohu kei te kotahi te ture mo nga iwi e rua.

Ahako ano matou te iwi Maori kaore i te kotahi te ture mo o matou whenua, na te mea,

(1) I raro i te rarangi 117 o te Ture Kooti Whenua Maori 1894 e whaimana ana nga Maori o te Waipounamu ki te reti i o ratou whenua.

(2) I raro i te rarangi 27 o te “Ture Whakatikatika i nga Ture Whenua Maori 1896” e ahei ana nga Maori o waho atu i to matou takiwa, kua rohea nei e te Ture, ki te reti ki te hoko ranei i etahi whenua wehe mutu iho i to 640 eka whenua pai i te 2000 eka whenua tuarua.

I runga i tenei ahua ka ui matou he aha i tika ai kia motuhake rawa te whakahaere mo matou i era atu Maori o te motu nei, i kore ai hoki e tika kia whiwhi tahi matou i nga painga, ahako pewhea te iti e hoatu ana ki o matou hoa Maori i era atu waahi o te motu nei.

He nui nga raruraru e pa ana ki o matou whenua i runga i nga whakawakanga me nga ruritanga, a, ko to matou hiahia kia whakamahia te whenua kia whaihua kia riro ma te whenua ano e utu ona raruraru.

Otiia i te mea kua whaipaa te Kawanatanga i runga i ana hoko ki te nuuinga o nga Poraka whenua o to matou takiwa, a, i te mea hoki e whakamana ana e te Ture ko nga mahi a te Karauna hei matamua mo nga mahi i te aroaro o te Kooti e tino waiho ana taua tikanga hei arai haere i te hiahia o nga tangata e tono ana kia wehea o ratou toenga whenua i roto i nga whenua kua hoko te Kawanatanga, kia wawe to mohio ia tangata ki tona waahi i pa ai, kia ngakaunui ai ki te whakapai i o ratou whenua nga tangata e ahei ana ki te whakapai.

Na runga i enei ahua ka oti nei te whakararangi iho, me te tirohanga hoki ki te takoto noa o nga waahi whenua e toe ana, kaore e homai painga ana ki a matou ki te koroni hoki, koia matou ka inoi atu ki to koutou Runanga Honore kia whakamana mai nga take e whai ake nei:

(1) Kia unuhia te here i runga i nga whenua katoa o to matou takiwa kua oti nei te whakawa, kua mohiotia hoki te nui o te paanga o ia tangata o ia tangata,

(2) Kia whaimana matou ki te reti, ki te hoko ranei i o matou whenua takoto kau ki o matou tangata i pai ai ahako he whenua kua motuhake ki te tangata kotahi, e mau tonu ana ranei ki nga tangata tokomaha atu,

(3) Kia whakaarotia paitia e to koutou Runanga Honore te Pire mea ake nei tukua atu e Henare Kaihau, Mema o te Tai Hauaauru, hei whakatu “Runanga Kaunihera Maori” i raro ano i nga Tikanga o te rarangi 71 – o te Ture Whakapumau Kawanatanga mo Niu Tireni 1852.

A ko a koutou Kaipitihana ka inoi tonu atu

Koia tenei o matou ingoa ka tuhia iho nei ki nga wharangiri e piri mai nei ki tua.

This was signed by Pepene Eketone and 163 others. It was translated as:

Greetings,

We your petitioners whose names are hereunder signed are members of the tribes and hapus of Ngati Maniapoto, Ngati Hikairo, Ngati Raukawa, Ngati Tuwharetoa and Whanganui who are living upon and have a right to the land the boundaries of which are given in the second schedule to the Native Land Court Act 1894.

The said land is reserved by that Act and its Amendments in such a manner as to prevent us from either selling or leasing to any other person than the Government.

We your petitioners are a people who have continually by petition and in other ways pointed out from time to time to your Hon[ourable] House the magnitude of the injustice under which we suffer through the Government alone having the right to purchase our lands.

We are entirely certain that in the matter of the law of the Government which prevents us from selling or leasing our lands to private Europeans, and the intense desire of the Government that we should speedily sell to them our lands for whatever price they please to give, they are not maintaining this restriction with a view to preserve and prevent our lands from all being purchased by land grabbers but for the purpose of enabling them to do whatever they like with our lands. The Govt land purchases are quite as bad or worse than purchases by private Companies of which we were at first afraid. Inasmuch as that in the event of trouble arising between us and the Government in connection with its purchases there is no one to whom we can turn, to decide the rights and wrongs of the matter as the Government itself becomes our antagonist.

Also in these Government land purchases we are given no voice (are not permitted) to arrange & agree together with the Government Officer upon the price to be paid per acre for our lands when purchased, neither is any care taken or provision made to ascertain that persons selling have not sold all the land which they possessed and become destitute, that is to say there is no similar provision to that formerly in force in cases where land was sold to private persons, when a person selling was compelled to declare in the presence of a Judge that he had other lands remaining, sufficient for his occupation and support, before such sale would be given effect to, but all these precautionary measures have been dispensed with in the case of the Government purchases, with the result that many of our people have not enough land left for their support, and many others have no land whatever remaining in their possession.

This restriction by Government obtains over our lands only, not over lands the property of Europeans, and as your Hon[ourable] House desires that there shall be but one law for both races & their lands, this unique proceeding which is being practised in our district is not a sign of the existence of only one law for the two races.

Even in the case of the Maori race alone there is not one universal law in the matter of our lands. For instance, under Section 117 of the Native Land Court Act 1894 the South Island Maoris are enabled to lease their lands.

Under Section 27 of the Native Land [Laws] Act Amendment Act 1896 it is competent for Maoris outside of our district the boundaries of which have been defined by law, to lease or sell certain lands up to 640 acres of first class land or 2000 acres of second class land.

This then being the position of affairs, we ask: – Why is it right that we should be treated differently from the other Maoris of New Zealand, and why is it not right that we should participate equally in the benefits however small they may be which are accorded to our fellow Maoris in other parts of New Zealand.

Our lands are saddled with many expenses arising from Courts and Surveys and we desire to so employ the land that it may pay its own expenses.

But as the Government has by purchase acquired an interest in the majority of the blocks of land in our district, and as by law the Crown business takes precedence [over] all the other business before the Native Land Court for hearing and as this practice is the means of absolutely preventing the attainment of the desire of the people who apply to have the balance of the land remaining to them cut out of the Government purchases, so that each man may know where his own particular piece is situate that those of them who are in a position to do so may each take heart to improve his own land.

Therefore for the reasons above set out and described, and looking at the fact that the balance of the lands remaining are now lying idle & bringing in no profitable return either to us or to the Colony. We pray you Hon[ourable] House to give effect to our requests set out hereunder:

(1) That the restrictions may be removed from off all our lands in our district, which have passed through the Court, and in which the relative interest of each individual owner has been defined.

(2) That we may be permitted to lease or sell our unoccupied lands to whomsoever we please, whether such lands be the property of one owner or of more than one.

(3) That you Hon[ourable] House will favourably consider the Bill to be presently introduced by Henare Kaihau Member for the Western Maori District providing for the Constitution of a Maori Council under the provisions of section 71 of the Constitution Act of New Zealand 1852.

And your petitioners will ever humbly pray

Pepene Eketone & 163 others

CHAPTER 11 APPENDIX II

TABLES

Table 11.4: Crown purchasing in land blocks that the Native Land Court declared inalienable 1890–1904

This table shows land blocks that the Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district which the Native Land Court declared inalienable by sale (some could be leased whereas others were inalienable by any means). The table also shows when the Crown completed its first purchase in each block (if at all) and the scale of Crown purchasing in the block during the years 1890–1904.

The table does not include Crown purchases in the Wharepuhunga or Rangitoto Tuhua blocks. Combined, these blocks account for 31% of the inquiry district. As discussed in section 11.4.6, in Wharepuhunga owners had asked for the land to be declared inalienable, but the court may have later lifted the order. In Rangitoto Tuhua, we do not have details of which blocks were declared inalienable.

Table 11.5: Alienation of Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district, by land block, 1890–1905

The data in this table are drawn from Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, annex 7, individual block summaries. The land area of the parent block was drawn from GIS data, and sometimes yields different block areas to those in table 11.4. The data about Crown alienations was also drawn from GIS data where that was possible, but in many cases relied on nineteenth century Crown sources, such as Native Land Court records, survey plans, and Crown purchase deeds, which were sometimes inaccurate.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. For example, at the time of purchase, the Crown calculated the Taurangi block at 10,000 acres, but according to the GIS system the total block was only 9,852.6 acres. The column giving the percentage remaining in Māori possession by 1905 compares the original block size with the alienation data based on both GIS data and nineteenth century Crown calculations. It is therefore only an approximation. See doc A21, pp 24–26. Table B1 provides data on the extent of the ‘overs’ and ‘unders’ – that is, the amount the Crown overestimated or underestimated when it was purchasing the block: doc A21, pp 115–126.

Table 11.4: Blocks listed in the Native Department's schedule to 31 December 1889

Block	Acres	Declared inalienable	First completed	Crown purchase	Crown purchases 1890–1905 (acres)
Hauturu East 3	635	24 Aug 1889	1901	218	34%
Hikurangi	1,844	15 Feb 1889	n/a	0	0%
Kaingapipi	2,692	5 Nov 1889	1901	1,070	40%
Kinohaku East 6 (Te Ngarara)	561	20 Nov 1888	1901	156	28%
Korakonui	2,000	30 Aug 1888	n/a	0	0%
Mangamahoe	949	8 Jun 1889	1901	283	30%
Mangarapa	2,760	5 Nov 1889	1892	1,894	69%
Mangaora	4,600	4 Feb 1889	1901	854	19%
Mangawhero (Kawhia SD)	25	23 Mar 1889	n/a	0	0%
Marokopa	5,000	15 Feb 1889	1899	2,334	47%
Motukotuku	195	23 Mar 1889	n/a	0	0%
Ngamahanga	69	30 Aug 1888	n/a	0	0%
Orahiri 3 (Te Kopuha)	622	7 Dec 1888	n/a	0 [1]	0%
Parihoru	355	30 Aug 1888	n/a	0	0%
Pirongia West	36,288	12 Feb 1889	1895	24,104	66%
Pukeroa Hangatiki	6,179	5 Nov 1889	1899	1,128	18%
Takotokoraha 1	1,000	7 Dec 1888	1894	927	93%
Tapuwaeohounuku	4,768	15 Feb 1889	n/a	0	0%
Tapuiwahine	551	24 Oct 1888	n/a	0	0%
Tokanui 1	1,366	21 Oct 1889	n/a	0	0%
Tokanui 1A (Te Waiaruhe)	290	21 Oct 1889	n/a	0	0%
Tokanui 1B (Pukaioakaioa)	539	1 Nov 1889	n/a	0	0%
Waikowhitiwhiti	28	7 Dec 1888	n/a	0	0%
Whakairoiro	1,029	30 Aug 1888	1892	258	25%
Subtotal	74,345			33,226

Additional blocks identified by Husbands and Mitchell: 1889–1894

Block	Acres	Declared inalienable	First completed	Crown purchase	Crown purchases 1890–1905 (acres)
Kakepuku 8 (Ngarauiri)	12	13 Jan 1894	n/a	0	0%
Kinohaku East 1 (Ootoika)	1,347	18 Aug 1890	1898	Unknown [2]
Kinohaku East 1A (Te Uira)	607	18 Aug 1890	n/a	0	0%
Puketarata 2D5	191	29 Mar 1894	1899	48	25%
Puketarata 2D6	591	29 Mar 1894	1898	591	100%
Puketarata 4D	192	27 Mar 1894	1901	35	18%
Puketarata 4F	120	28 Mar 1894	n/a	0	0%
Puketarata 4G	2,617	28 Mar 1894	1898	1,107	42%
Puketarata 5C	318	26 Mar 1894	1898	318	100%
Puketarata 8C	36	26 Mar 1894	1898	36	100%
Puketarata 8D	302	29 Mar 1894	1901	195	65%
Puketarata 13B	50	14 Mar 1894	1901	21	42%
Puketarata 10	144	Dec 1890	n/a	0	0%
Puketarata 19D	80	22 Mar 1894	1897	81	100%
Puketarata 19E	60	22 Mar 1894	n/a	0	0%
Puketarata 19F	650	22 Mar 1894	1897	61	9%
Puketarata 19H	390	22 Mar 1894	1901	61	17%
Puketarata 19I	750	22 Mar 1894	1901	504	67%
Te Kuiti	7,080	25 Nov 1889	1899	20	0.3%
Subtotal	15,537			3078

Additional blocks identified by Berghan: 1882–1896

Maketu (Kawhia)	984	12 Mar 1889	n/a	0	0%
Marokopa Reserve	123	15 Mar 1889	n/a	0	0%
Mohakatino Parininihi 3	500	22 Jun 1882	n/a	0	0%
Mokau Mohakatino 1	56,500	22 Jun 1882	1899	185	0.3%

Block	Acres	Declared inalienable	First completed	Crown purchase	Crown purchases 1890–1905 (acres)
Te Kopua (Whaingaroa)	148	21 Feb 1896	n/a	0	0%
Te Rete	135	21 Mar 1889	n/a	0	0%
Te Pukenui 3	1	9 Jan 1893	n/a	0	0%
Subtotal	58,525			185
TOTAL	148,407			36,489

Sources:

Lands declared inalienable (Native Department schedule): Native Department, 'Rohe Potae Block: Schedule of Orders made for the period ending 31st Dec 1889' (doc A91, vol 2, pp 315–319). Also see doc A79, pp 423–425, 452; doc A60, pp 420, 430–431, 437, 525, 749, 752, 1288–1289, 1292.

Lands declared inalienable (Husbands and Mitchell): Document A79, pp 194–195, 267–268, 422, 452.

Lands declared inalienable (Berghan): Document A60, pp 304–305, 382, 420, 525, 530, 561, 579–580, 775, 1045

Land areas: Document A60, pp 143, 171, 189, 305, 385, 387, 430, 437, 443, 465, 525, 589, 594, 608, 711, 807, 825, 829–831, 1075, 1085, 1087, 1117, 1172, 1197. The Pirongia West area is from doc A21 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell), annex 7, Pirongia West Blocks. Also see doc A67(a), vol 1, pp 129–131. Document A60 was used as the other sources did not provide complete information for these blocks and subdivisions. The areas may therefore differ from the areas in other tables giving Crown purchase areas, which relied on doc A21.

Date of first alienation: Document A95(i), Crown purchases. Parker's evidence from doc A95(i) was checked against doc A21, annex 7, Individual Block Summaries and doc A60, pp 144, 171, 189, 309–310, 338, 431, 440, 447, 525–526, 756–758, 807, 831–833, 1075–1076, 1085–1086, 1199–1200. For most blocks, the sources were in agreement. Where there were differences about first purchase date, doc A95(i) was preferred.

Areas alienated: Document A95(i), Crown purchases. Parker's evidence was checked against doc A21, annex 7, Individual Block Summaries; doc A60, pp 144, 171, 189, 309–310, 338, 431, 440, 447, 525–526, 581, 756–758, 807, 831–833, 1075–1076, 1085–1086, 1199–1200. Where there were differences about area purchased, doc A95(i) was preferred.

Notes:

[1] The Crown had purchased almost all of Orahiri 3 by 1907: doc A60, p 616.

[2] The extent of Crown purchasing in Ototoika was not clear from the sources. Parker (doc A95(i)) referred to Crown purchases exceeding 3,000 acres, which is larger than the reserved area.

Table 11.5: Alienation of Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district, by land block, 1890–1905

Parent block	Land area (decimal acres) <sup>1</sup>	Land alienated to the Crown (decimal acres) <sup>2</sup>			Approximate % remaining in Māori ownership by end of 1905 <sup>3</sup>
		1890–1894	1895–1899	1900–1905
Aorangi	13,352.4	0	4,981.5	61.0	62.2
Hauturu East	56,615.3	0	32,406.8	6,411.6	30.9
Hauturu West	42,072.4	0	29,707.0	1,498.0	25.8
Hurakia	5,185.8	0	0	3257	37.2
Kahakaharoa <sup>4</sup>	615.4	0	600.0	0	2.5
Kahuwera	3,931.6	0	1,385.8	467.5	52.9
Kaingapipi	2,716.5	0	0	1,070.0	60.6
Kakepuku	12,376.1	95.1	1,799.3	452.5	81.0
Kawhia	5,372.8	0	4.2	1,351.2	74.8
Ketemaringi	5,971.0	0	4,610.0	0	22.8
Kinohaku East	52,403.2	0	16,832.3	4,161.0	60.1
Kinohaku West
See table 11.6.
Mahoenui <sup>5</sup>	27,853.3	0	16,301.5	1,453.0	21.9
Mangakahikatea	10,935.0	0	9,150.0	1,752.0	0.3
Mangamahoe	934.3	0	0	283.0	69.7
Mangarapa	2,663.0	400	1,192.5	115.0	35.9
Mangaroa	4,560.6	0	0	854.0	81.3
Mangauika	5,472.6	2,586.8	0	432.0	44.8
Maraeroa	41,689.8	0	4,000.0	14,725.2	55.1
Maraetaua	8,594.6	0	0	3,462.0	59.7
Marokopa	5,004.1	0	2,334.0	0	53.4
Maungarangi	701.9	166.7	302.0	0	33.2
Mohakatino Parininihi <sup>16</sup>	62,632.6	34,945.5	13,134.0	0	18.2
Mokau Mohakatino	56,384.2	0	185.0	0	99.7
Ngakokiri	103.7	0	96.0	0	7.4
Orahiri <sup>7</sup>	8,163.6	1.0	2,564.0	1,102.0	55.1
Otorohanga	10,326.1	0	1,330.0	2,872.2	59.3

TE MANA WHATU AHURU

Ch11 App11

Parent block	Land area (decimal acres) <sup>1</sup>	Land alienated to the Crown (decimal acres) <sup>2</sup>			Approximate % remaining in Māori ownership by end of 1905 <sup>3</sup>
		1890–1894	1895–1899	1900–1905
Ouruwhero	10,103.9	1,761.5	2,518.0	0	57.6
Pehitawa	2,901.4	0	829.0	0	71.4
Pirongia West	36,288.8	0	22,922.8	444.3	35.6
Pokuru	3,200.0	0	282.1	251.0	83.3
Pukenui	13,448.5	0	1,761.8	66.1	86.4
Pukeroa Hangatiki	6,247.5	0	1,228.3	0	80.3
Puketarata <sup>8</sup>	17,900.3	4,672.8	4,750.6	1,828.8	36.7
Pukeuha	2,777.4	0	0	642.0	76.9
Rangitoto Tuhua	See table 11.7
Rapaura	422.6	0	0	210.8	50.1
Ratatomokia	9,551.3	5626.1	0	4,034.9	0
Tahaia	2,784.4	0	0	522.0	81.3
Taharoa blocks <sup>9</sup>	24,208.4	0	6,358.0	353.0	72.3
Takotokoraha	2,794.6	549.1	378.5	0	66.8
Taorua	10,405.0	1,591.9	5,608.0	1,591.0	15.5
Taurangi blocks <sup>10</sup>	34,508.8	27,792.0	1378.0	5,064.0	1.8
Te Awaroa	8,547.0	0	0	2,060	75.9
Te Karu o te Whenua	24,450.8	0	5,420.3	5,017.0	57.3
Te Kauri (Kawhia)	5,207.8	1,951.1	0	0	62.5
Te Kopua (Pirongia)	9,372.1	2,946.8	3,350.0	0	32.8
Te Kuiti	6,977.6	0	1,902.0	0	72.7
Te Kumi	2,711.4	0	377.5	0	86.1
Te Tiutiu	347.3	0	289.0	0	16.8
Turoto	2,672.2	727.5	0	576.0	51.2
Umukaimata blocks <sup>11</sup>	46,485.9	20,834.2	20,057.4	382.0	11.2
Waiaraia	12,532.6	12,532.6	0	0	0
Waikaukau	4,695	4,695	0		0
Waiwhakaata	11,071.2	1,221.1	3,048.5	0	61.4
Whakairoiro	1,037.3	200.0	0	58.0	75.1
Whangaingatakupu	5,274.3	0	4,908.6	130.0	4.5
Wharepuhunga	133,449.4	37,767	20,805	0	56.1

Notes:

1. Document A21, annex 7.
2. Document A21, annex 7.
3. Document A21, annex 7.
4. For the 1890–1894 period, Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell recorded the Crown purchasing Kahakaharao A (16.5 acres) in 1889. However, this appears to be an error. The Crown's land purchase officer, George Wilkinson, recorded his first share purchases in the block as having taken place in 1893, and both Parker and Berghan record the Kahakaharao A purchase as having been completed in 1899: doc A21, annex 7, Kahakaharao Blocks; doc A60, pp 178–179; doc A95(i), Crown purchases, line 160.
5. For the 1890–1894 period, the 4,000-acre Mahoenui 6 block was sold to a private purchaser in 1894, before restrictions were imposed on the block under the Native Land Purchases Act 1892. There were no completed Crown purchases in Mahoenui prior to 1897: doc A21, annex 7, Mahoenui, pp 3–4. The Mahoenui alienations include 17,754.5 acres alienated to the Crown during the years 1890 to 1905, and 4,000 acres alienated privately in 1894: doc A21, annex 7, Mahoenui, pp 3–4.
6. During the years 1890–1905, the Crown purchased in Mohakatino Parininihi 1 only. The Mohakatino Parininihi 1 alienations include 48,079.5 acres alienated to the Crown during the years 1890 to 1905, and a 3,178.8-acre private purchase in 1898: doc A21, annex 7, Mohakatino Parininihi 1. The 705.1-acre Mohakatino Parininihi 2 had been sold privately in 1881: doc A21, annex 7, Mohakatino Parininihi 2. The 503.7-acre Mohakatino Parininihi 3 remained entirely in Māori ownership until 1916 when just under half of the block was sold to a private buyer: doc A21, annex 7, Mohakatino Parininihi 3.
7. The Orahiri alienations include 3,667 acres (GIS area) alienated to the Crown during the years 1890 to 1905, and a 2-acre private purchase in 1899: doc A21, annex 7, Orahiri Blocks.
8. The Puketarata alienations include 11,146.7 acres (GIS area) alienated to the Crown during the years 1890 to 1905, and two private purchases: 74.5 acres in 1901 and 99.9 acres in 1905: doc A21, annex 7, Puketarata Blocks.
9. The Puketarata alienations include 11,146.7 acres (GIS area) alienated to the Crown during the years 1890 to 1905, and two private purchases: 74.5 acres in 1901 and 99.9 acres in 1905: doc A21, annex 7, Puketarata Blocks.
10. The land area is the combined area of all Taurangi blocks, as given in doc A21, annex 7, Taurangi, Taurangi 1A, 1B, 2, 3A, 3B, 4, and 5. The areas were: Taurangi, 9,852.6 acres; Taurangi 1A, 5,699.4 acres; Taurangi 1B, 374.1 acres; Taurangi 2, 2,495 acres; Taurangi 3A, 213.4 acres; Taurangi 3B, 5,005.4 acres; Taurangi 4, 997 acres; and Taurangi 5, 9,871.9 acres. For the 1890–1894 period, the Crown appears to have overestimated the area of the Taurangi blocks at the time of purchase. It estimated the Taurangi block to be 10,000 acres at the time of purchase in 1893, but Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell give the block's area as 9,852.6 acres (based on GIS data). Similar discrepancies occur for other blocks: Taurangi 1B (Crown purchase deed 378 acres, GIS 374.1 acres) Taurangi 2 (Crown purchase deed 2,500 acres, GIS 2,495 acres), Taurangi 3B (Crown purchase deed 5,064 acres, GIS 5,005.4 acres), Taurangi 5 (Crown purchase deed 10,000 acres, GIS 9,871.9 acres): doc A21, annex 7, individual block summaries. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, 620.8 acres remained in Māori possession at the end of 1905, comprising 407.4 acres of Taurangi 1A, and the entire 213.4-acre Taurangi 3A block: doc A21, annex 7, Taurangi 1A, Taurangi 3A.
11. The land area is the combined area of all Umukaimata blocks, as given in doc A21, annex 7, Umukaimata 1A, 1B, 1C, 1D, 2, 3A, 3B, 4, 4A, 5. The areas were: Umukaimata 1A, 2,093.9 acres; Umukaimata 1B, 2 acres; Umukaimata 1C, 1.9 acres; Umukaimata 1D, 7,383.9 acres; Umukaimata 2, 438.3 acres; Umukaimata 3A, 1,871.6 acres; Umukaimata 3B, 2,478.2 acres; Umukaimata 4, 11,107.1 acres; Umukaimata 4A, 4,934.3 acres; Umukaimata 5, 16,174.7 acres. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, 5,212.3 acres of the original 46,485.9 acres remained in Māori possession at the end of 1905: doc A21, annex 7, Umukaimata 1A, 1B, 1C, 1D, 2, 3A, 3B, 4, 4A, 5.

Table 11.6: Alienation of Kinohaku West land by subdivision, 1890–1905

Subdivision	Land area (decimal acres)	Land alienated to the Crown (decimal acres)			Approximate % remaining in Māori ownership by end of 1905
		1890–1894	1895–1899	1900–1905
Kinohaku West 1	5,822.8	0	3,277.0	0	43.7
Kinohaku West 3	1,319.2	0	964.0	0	26.9
Kinohaku West 11	6,743.2	0	3,129.0	1,406.0	32.7
Kinohaku West 12	4,277.9	0	3,805.0	116.0	8.3
Kinohaku West 12A	33.3	0	0	0	100
Kinohaku West 12B	84.8	0	0	17.0	79.9
Kinohaku West 12C	578.7	0	0	352.0	39.2
Kinohaku West A	1,450.5	0	0	1,350.0	6.9
Kinohaku West C	1,499.9	0	1,291.0	0	13.9
Kinohaku West D	1,532.6	0	1,532.6	0	0
Kinohaku West E	13,526.3	0	8,162.0	1,390.0	29.4
Kinohaku West F	14,449.5	0	11,323.5	911.3	15.3
Kinohaku West G	22,189.2	0	14,993.0	1,945.0	23.7
Kinohaku West H	28,591.5	0	21,110.0	3,112.0	15.3
Kinohaku West K	35,981.7	0	31,281.0	998.1	10.3
Kinohaku West L	1,310.4	0	520.0	200.0	45.1
Kinohaku West M	2,457.9	0	2,292.0	66.0	4.1
Kinohaku West N	1,350.7	0	1,030.5	0	23.7
Kinohaku West O	1,526.0	0	1,197.0	0	21.6
Kinohaku West P	416.8	0	159.0	0	61.9
Kinohaku West R	512.8	0	512.8	0	0
Kinohaku West S	9,551.3	0	7,249.0	0	24.1
Kinohaku West T	5,804.5	0	3,888.0	0	33
TOTAL	161,011.5	0	117,716.4	11,863.4	19.5

Source: Doc A21, annex 7, block summaries. According to Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell, 31,431.7 acres remained in Māori possession in 1905 out of the original 161,011.5-acre Kinohaku West block.

Table 11.7: Alienation of Rangitoto Tuhua land by subdivision, 1890–1905

Subdivision	Land area (decimal acres)	Land alienated to the Crown (decimal acres)			Approximate % remaining in Māori ownership by end of 1905
		1890–1894	1895–1899	1900–1905
Rangitoto Tuhua 4	1,784.9	0	0	1,770.0	0.3
Rangitoto Tuhua 10	6,056.7	0	0	6,070.0	0
Rangitoto Tuhua 46	1,002.4	0	0	1,002.0	0
Rangitoto Tuhua 47	3,028.0	0	0	3,028.0	0
Rangitoto Tuhua 48	4,037.6	0	0	4,000.0	0.9
Rangitoto Tuhua 56	1,993.6	0	0	1,988.0	0.3
Rangitoto Tuhua 63	1,527.7	0	0	1,500.0	1.8
Rangitoto Tuhua 65	4,961.4	0	0	4,961.4	0
Other Rangitoto Tuhua blocks	436,885.3	0	0	0	100.0
TOTAL	461,277.6			24,319.4	94.7

Source: Doc A21 (Douglas, Innes, Mitchell), annex 7, Rangitoto Tuhua blocks.

Dated at Wellington this 7th day of September 2018

Deputy Chief Judge Caren Fox, presiding officer

John Baird, member

Dr Aroha Harris, member

Professor Sir Hirini Mead, member

Professor Pou Temara, member

