

TE MANA WHATU AHURU

TE MANA WHATU AHURU

Report on Te Rohe Pōtae Claims

---

PRE-PUBLICATION VERSION

---

PARTS I AND II

WAI 898

WAITANGI TRIBUNAL REPORT 2018

CONTENTS

Letter of transmittal . . . . .	xxxii
Preface . . . . .	xxxiii
TE WHAKARĀPOPOTOTANGA: SUMMARY OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATION . . . . . xxxvii
Summary of findings . . . . .	xxxvii
An opportunity to put things right . . . . .	xl
Recommendation . . . . .	xli
CHAPTER 1: HE KUPU WHAKAMĀRAMA I TĒNEI PŪRONGO:
INTRODUCTION . . . . .	1
1.1 Te Mana Whatu Ahuru . . . . .	1
1.2 The Te Rohe Pōtae district inquiry . . . . .	2
1.2.1 Planning and research . . . . .	2
1.2.2 Determining the inquiry boundary . . . . .	3
1.2.3 Previous district inquiries in neighbouring areas . . . . .	5
1.2.4 Appointment of the panel . . . . .	7
1.2.5 Determining the claim issues . . . . .	7
1.2.6 Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, hearings, and site visits . . . . .	8
1.2.7 Shaping the report . . . . .	9
1.2.8 Prioritised reporting . . . . .	11
1.3 Scope of the pre-publication report . . . . .	12
1.4 Jurisdictional issues . . . . .	12
1.4.1 Settlement legislation affecting the Tribunal's jurisdiction . . . . .	12
1.4.2 Jurisdiction to hear raupatu claims . . . . .	13
1.4.2.1 The inquiry boundary and the Waikato raupatu settlement . . . . .	14
1.4.2.2 The jurisdictional test . . . . .	16
1.4.2.3 Threshold for establishing non-Waikato affiliation . . . . .	17
1.4.2.4 Our approach . . . . .	18
1.4.3 Ngāti Paretekawa . . . . .	18
1.4.4 Ngāti Apakura . . . . .	21
1.4.5 Ngāti Wehi Wehi . . . . .	25
1.5 Te Kōrero a Rawiri . . . . .	26

CONTENTS

PART I

CHAPTER 2: HE KURA WHENUA, HE KURA TANGATA: THE TRIBAL

LANDSCAPE . . . . .	31
2.1 Introduction . . . . .	31
2.1.1 The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	32
2.1.2 Sources . . . . .	32
2.2 Te ao Māori . . . . .	33
2.2.1 Mana Taketake . . . . .	34
2.2.1.1 Tapu . . . . .	34
2.2.1.2 Mana . . . . .	35
2.2.1.3 Whanaungatanga, manaakitanga, and utu . . . . .	37
2.2.1.4 Tuku . . . . .	38
2.2.1.5 Tikanga . . . . .	39
2.2.2 Te Taiao te Tai Tangata . . . . .	40
2.3 Landing and early settlement . . . . .	45
2.3.1 Hoturoa and Rakataura . . . . .	46
2.3.2 Whatihua and Tūrongo . . . . .	47
2.3.3 Raukawa and Rereahu . . . . .	50
2.3.4 Paerangi, Ruatipua, and Ngatoroirangi . . . . .	51
2.4 Te mana o Maniapoto . . . . .	52
2.4.1 Maniapoto . . . . .	54
2.4.2 Other lines of Tainui descent . . . . .	58
2.4.3 From Maniapoto to Te Kanawa . . . . .	62
2.4.4 Te Kanawa Whatupango: ancestor of chiefs . . . . .	64
2.5 Conflict and realignment . . . . .	68
2.5.1 1700–1800: rising conflict . . . . .	69
2.5.1.1 Change in authority at Kāwhia . . . . .	70
2.5.1.2 The emergence of Paretekawa . . . . .	70
2.5.1.3 Te Horangapai . . . . .	71
2.5.1.4 Peace at Mōkau . . . . .	72
2.5.2 1800–40: realignment, exodus, and peace . . . . .	74
2.5.2.1 Battle of Hingakākā . . . . .	75
2.5.2.2 The emergence of Ngāti Hikairo . . . . .	76
2.5.2.3 Stability in the north . . . . .	76
2.5.2.4 The departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira . . . . .	78
2.5.2.5 Te Amiowhenua . . . . .	81
2.5.2.6 Ngāpuhi arrive . . . . .	82
2.5.2.7 Ngāti Raukawa migrations . . . . .	84
2.5.2.8 Taranaki and Mōkau . . . . .	85
2.5.2.9 Return to peace . . . . .	86
2.6 The tribal landscape in 1840 . . . . .	87
2.6.2.1 North: Pūniu to Hangatiki . . . . .	89
2.6.2.2 East: Wharepūhanga to Ōngarue . . . . .	92
2.6.2.3 South: Ōngarue to Mōkau . . . . .	93

CONTENTS

	2.6.2.4 Harbours and Pirongia . . . . .	95
2.7	Ngā rangatira o te Rohe Pōtae . . . . .	97
	2.7.1 Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira . . . . .	97
	2.7.1.1 Peehi Tūkōrehu . . . . .	97
	2.7.1.2 Te Ngohi Kāwhia . . . . .	98
	2.7.1.3 Te Pakarū . . . . .	98
	2.7.1.4 Te Waraki (Nūtoni Te Waraki) . . . . .	98
	2.7.1.5 Tāriki . . . . .	99
	2.7.1.6 Haupōkia Te Pakarū . . . . .	99
	2.7.1.7 Taonui Hikaka I . . . . .	100
	2.7.1.8 Ngāmotu . . . . .	100
	2.7.1.9 Takerei Waitara . . . . .	100
	2.7.1.10 Te Rangituatea . . . . .	101
	2.7.2 Ngāti Apakura rangatira . . . . .	101
	2.7.2.1 Te Waru . . . . .	101
	2.7.2.2 Pungarehu . . . . .	101
	2.7.3 Ngāti Hikairo rangatira . . . . .	101
	2.7.3.1 Kikikoi . . . . .	101
	2.7.3.2 Pikia Haurua . . . . .	102
	2.7.3.3 Hōne Te One . . . . .	102
	2.7.4 Waikato-affiliated rangatira . . . . .	102
	2.7.4.1 Pōtatau Te Wherowhero . . . . .	102
	2.7.4.2 Te Kanawa Te Ikatu . . . . .	102
	2.7.4.3 Kiwi Te Roto . . . . .	103
	2.7.4.4 Hoana Riutoto . . . . .	103
	2.7.4.5 Te Mokoroa, Te Pūata, and Peehi . . . . .	103
	2.7.4.6 Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia . . . . .	104
	2.7.4.7 Kiwi Ngārau, Tūnui Ngāwaka, and Kāmura Whareroa . . . . .	104
	2.7.4.8 Te Whata . . . . .	104
	2.7.4.9 Muriwhenua . . . . .	104
	2.7.4.10 Te Aoturoa . . . . .	105
	2.7.4.11 Hako and Te Noke/Te Moke . . . . .	105
	2.7.5 Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Raukawa, and Whanganui rangatira . . . . .	105
	2.7.5.1 Te Heuheu Tūkino Mananui . . . . .	105
	2.7.5.2 Te Whatanui . . . . .	105
	2.7.5.3 Te Peehi Tūroa . . . . .	106
2.8	Conclusion . . . . .	106
 CHAPTER 3: TE TIRITI O WAITANGI I TE ROHE PŌTAE . . . . .		 107
3.1	Introduction . . . . .	107
	3.1.1 The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	108
	3.1.2 How the chapter is structured . . . . .	110
3.2	Issues . . . . .	110
	3.2.1 What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	110
	3.2.2 The parties' positions . . . . .	110

CONTENTS

	3.2.2.1 The claimants’ position on the Treaty’s meaning and effect . . . . .	110
	3.2.2.2 The Crown’s position on the Treaty’s meaning and effect	113
	3.2.3 Issues for determination . . . . .	116
3.3	The Treaty and its signatories . . . . .	116
	3.3.1 The arrival of Europeans in Te Rohe Pōtae . . . . .	116
	3.3.1.1 Early trade . . . . .	116
	3.3.1.2 The arrival of missionaries . . . . .	117
	3.3.1.3 Early attempts at land transactions . . . . .	119
	3.3.2 Britain’s intentions and the first Treaty signings . . . . .	120
	3.3.2.1 Background to the Treaty signing . . . . .	120
	3.3.2.2 Normanby’s instructions . . . . .	121
	3.3.2.3 The Treaty’s texts and the signings in the north . . . . .	123
	3.3.2.4 The differences between texts . . . . .	124
	3.3.3 The signings at the Waikato Heads and Kāwhia . . . . .	128
	3.3.3.1 The signings at the Waikato Heads . . . . .	129
	3.3.3.2 The signings at Kāwhia . . . . .	131
	3.3.4 Who among the signatories were from Te Rohe Pōtae? . . . . .	132
	3.3.4.1 Ngāti Maniapoto . . . . .	136
	3.3.4.2 Ngāti Raukawa . . . . .	137
	3.3.4.3 Ngāti Hikairo . . . . .	137
	3.3.4.4 Ngāti Apakura . . . . .	137
	3.3.4.5 Waikato-affiliated groups . . . . .	138
	3.3.4.6 Ngāti Tūwharetoa . . . . .	138
	3.3.4.7 Northern Whanganui groups . . . . .	139
	3.3.5 Conclusions about the Treaty signings . . . . .	139
3.4	The Treaty’s meaning and effect . . . . .	140
	3.4.1 How should the Treaty be interpreted? . . . . .	141
	3.4.1.1 Approaches to Treaty interpretation . . . . .	141
	3.4.1.2 The legal approach to interpreting treaties . . . . .	141
	3.4.1.2.1 A tikanga approach to interpreting treaties . . . . .	143
	3.4.1.2.2 The approach of other Tribunals . . . . .	144
	3.4.1.2.3 Our approach . . . . .	144
	3.4.1.3 Limitations on the evidence . . . . .	145
	3.4.1.4 Does it make a difference that the Waikato–Manukau sheet was signed in English? . . . . .	145
	3.4.1.5 The Treaty’s application to non-signatories . . . . .	146
	3.4.2 What rights were guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty? . . . . .	148
	3.4.2.1 The guarantees of undisturbed possession and tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	148
	3.4.2.1.1 The views of other Tribunals . . . . .	150
	3.4.2.1.2 The claimants’ views of tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	151
	3.4.2.1.3 The Crown’s views of tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	153

CONTENTS

	3.4.2.1.4	Our view of the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	155
	3.4.2.2	Tino rangatiratanga and the exercise of tikanga . . . . .	156
	3.4.2.3	Royal protection and the rights of British subjects . . . . .	158
	3.4.2.4	Our conclusions on the rights guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty . . . . .	158
3.4.3		What rights did the Crown acquire through the Treaty? . . . . .	159
	3.4.3.1	The text of article 1: sovereignty and kāwanatanga . . . . .	160
	3.4.3.2	How Te Rohe Pōtae Māori understood 'kāwanatanga' . . . . .	162
	3.4.3.2.1	Māori wanted laws that would protect their autonomy and interests . . . . .	164
	3.4.3.2.2	The Crown had a responsibility to preserve chieftainship . . . . .	164
	3.4.3.2.3	The Māori world would continue to be governed by tikanga . . . . .	165
	3.4.3.2.4	Māori sought ongoing protections for their rights and mana . . . . .	167
	3.4.3.2.5	Our conclusions on Māori understandings of kāwanatanga . . . . .	168
	3.4.3.3	Sovereignty: its acquisition and its form . . . . .	169
	3.4.3.3.1	Dr McHugh's opinion in the Te Paparahi o Te Raki inquiry . . . . .	170
	3.4.3.3.2	The legal opinion of Dr Alex Frame . . . . .	171
	3.4.3.3.3	Our views on the process by which the Crown sought to acquire sovereignty . . . . .	173
	3.4.3.4	The views of other Tribunals . . . . .	174
	3.4.3.5	Our conclusions on the Crown's right of kāwanatanga . . . . .	177
3.4.4		What was the relationship between Crown and Māori authority? . . . . .	181
	3.4.4.1	Tino rangatiratanga and kāwanatanga have distinct functions . . . . .	181
	3.4.4.2	The Treaty involved reciprocal recognition of rights for mutual benefit . . . . .	182
	3.4.4.3	The Treaty established a partnership subject to ongoing dialogue . . . . .	183
	3.4.4.4	The Crown has a duty of active protection of Māori rights, interests, and taonga . . . . .	183
	3.4.4.5	The Crown has a duty of equitable and equal treatment . . . . .	185
	3.4.4.6	Māori have the right to pursue options . . . . .	185
	3.4.4.7	The Crown has a duty to provide redress . . . . .	185
	3.4.4.8	The Treaty's application to non-signatories . . . . .	186
3.4.5		Conclusions on the Treaty's meaning and effect . . . . .	186
	3.4.5.1	The Treaty's meaning and effect . . . . .	187
	3.4.5.2	The principles and duties we apply . . . . .	189
	3.4.5.3	The Treaty in Te Rohe Pōtae after 1840 . . . . .	190

CHAPTER 4: NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA O MUA: OLD LAND CLAIMS	193
4.1 Introduction	193
4.1.1 The purpose of this chapter	197
4.1.2 How the chapter is structured	198
4.2 Issues	198
4.2.1 What other Tribunals have said	198
4.2.2 Crown concessions and acknowledgements	201
4.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments	201
4.2.4 Issues for discussion	203
4.3 Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions	203
4.3.1 Early interactions with manuhiri	204
4.3.2 Evidence of Māori understandings	207
4.4 The operation of the Land Claims Commissions	211
4.4.1 The Wesleyan mission claims (OLC 946, OLC 947, OLC 948, and OLC 1040)	212
4.4.1.1 The Godfrey and Richmond commission	212
4.4.1.2 Background to the claims	214
4.4.1.2.1 Nihinihi, Whāingaroa (OLC 946)	215
4.4.1.2.2 Ahuahu, Kāwhia (OLC 947)	216
4.4.1.2.3 Awaroa, Kāwhia (OLC 948)	217
4.4.1.2.4 Kinohaku, Kāwhia (OLC 1040)	217
4.4.1.3 The commission investigates, June 1843	219
4.4.1.4 Outcomes of the investigation	220
4.4.2 George Charleton's claim at Pouewe (OLC 1353)	221
4.4.2.1 The Bell commission	221
4.4.2.2 Background to the claim	222
4.4.2.3 The commission investigates, July 1858	227
4.4.2.4 Outcomes of the investigation	229
4.5 Land granted through other mechanisms	229
4.5.1 Raoraokauere pre-emption waiver (OLC 76)	229
4.5.1.1 The application to waive pre-emption	230
4.5.1.2 The Crown's response	233
4.5.1.3 Outcomes of the process	234
4.5.2 Ōhaua/Nathan's Point (OLC 400)	234
4.5.3 Rangitahi (OLC 118)	235
4.6 Treaty analysis and findings	235
4.6.1 Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions	236
4.6.2 The operation of the commissions	237
4.6.2.1 The Wesleyan mission claims	237
4.6.2.2 George Charleton's claim at Pouewe	238
4.6.3 Other alienation mechanisms	239
4.6.4 Prejudice	240
4.7 Summary of findings	241

CONTENTS

CHAPTER 5: NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA I, 1840–65: CROWN
PURCHASING, 1840–65 . . . . .	243
5.1 Introduction . . . . .	243
5.1.1 The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	247
5.1.2 How the chapter is structured . . . . .	249
5.2 Issues . . . . .	250
5.2.1 What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	250
5.2.2 Crown concessions and acknowledgements . . . . .	252
5.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	253
5.2.4 Issues for discussion . . . . .	255
5.3 The Mōkau–Awakino transactions . . . . .	256
5.3.1 The parties' positions . . . . .	258
5.3.2 Background to the transactions . . . . .	259
5.3.3 Negotiation and opposition, 1852–57 . . . . .	261
5.3.3.1 Crown efforts to secure land on the Mōkau River, 1852 . . . . .	261
5.3.3.2 The Awakino purchase, March 1854 . . . . .	263
5.3.3.3 The Mokau purchase, May 1854 . . . . .	267
5.3.3.4 The Taumatamaire purchase, January 1855 . . . . .	271
5.3.3.5 The Rauoa purchase, July 1857 . . . . .	273
5.3.3.6 Delays in selling the land to settlers . . . . .	273
5.3.4 The administration of reserves . . . . .	276
5.3.4.1 Awakino block reserves . . . . .	276
5.3.4.1.1 Rangitoto, Waikato, and Ounutae . . . . .	278
5.3.4.1.2 Ketekarino . . . . .	278
5.3.4.1.3 Reihana's and Weter's reserves . . . . .	279
5.3.4.2 Mokau block reserves . . . . .	280
5.3.4.2.1 Te Kauri, Te Waipuna, and Tokowhaiti . . . . .	280
5.3.4.2.2 Te Mahoe and Te Mangeo . . . . .	280
5.3.4.3 The Piripiri reserve (Taumatamaire block) . . . . .	281
5.3.4.4 The Otiao reserve (Rauoa block) . . . . .	282
5.3.5 Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	282
5.3.5.1 Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure? . . . . .	282
5.3.5.2 Did the Crown establish free and informed consent? . . . . .	283
5.3.5.3 Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land? . . . . .	285
5.4 The western harbours transactions . . . . .	286
5.4.1 The parties' positions . . . . .	289
5.4.2 Background to the transactions . . . . .	291
5.4.3 The Horea and Whaingaroa purchases . . . . .	293
5.4.3.1 The Crown's intervention at Horea, May 1850 . . . . .	293
5.4.3.2 The Whaingaroa purchase, March 1851 . . . . .	297
5.4.3.2.1 The purchase negotiations . . . . .	297
5.4.3.2.2 Crown sales to settlers: disputes and further payments . . . . .	299
5.4.3.2.3 Reoccupation by Ngāti Māhanga . . . . .	300
5.4.3.2.4 Later inquiries over payment . . . . .	300

CONTENTS

5.4.4	Further purchases in the north-west after 1854 . . . . .	301
5.4.4.1	McLean's initial payments . . . . .	302
5.4.4.2	Further purchases around Whāingaroa Harbour . . . . .	304
5.4.4.2.1	The Karioi purchase, November 1855 . . . . .	304
5.4.4.2.2	The Ruapuke purchase, February 1856 . . . . .	306
5.4.4.2.3	The Wharauoa purchase, December 1857 . . . . .	308
5.4.4.2.4	The Wahatane purchase, August 1857 . . . . .	310
5.4.4.2.5	The Te Mata purchase, June 1859 . . . . .	311
5.4.4.3	Purchases near Kāwhia and Aotea . . . . .	312
5.4.4.3.1	The Harihari purchase, August 1857 . . . . .	313
5.4.4.3.2	The Oioroa purchase, 1855 . . . . .	316
5.4.4.4	Other alienations . . . . .	317
5.4.5	The administration of reserves . . . . .	318
5.4.5.1	Whāingaroa block reserves . . . . .	318
5.4.5.1.1	Te Mata, Takapaunui, and Ohiaopoko . . . . .	320
5.4.5.1.2	Te Uku . . . . .	321
5.4.5.2	Karioi block reserves . . . . .	321
5.4.5.2.1	Te Kopua and Papahua . . . . .	322
5.4.5.2.2	Whaanga and Rakaunui . . . . .	322
5.4.5.3	Ruapuke block reserves . . . . .	323
5.4.5.3.1	Wharauoa block reserves . . . . .	323
5.4.5.3.2	Mowhiti and Te Rape . . . . .	323
5.4.5.3.3	Kihorewaru . . . . .	324
5.4.6	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	324
5.4.6.1	Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure? . . . . .	325
5.4.6.2	Did the Crown establish free and informed consent? . . . . .	326
5.4.6.3	Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land? . . . . .	327
5.5	The Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions . . . . .	328
5.5.1	The parties' positions . . . . .	330
5.5.2	Background to the transactions . . . . .	330
5.5.3	Crown purchases and subsequent grants to Church organisations . . . . .	332
5.5.3.1	Purchases at Ōtāwhao . . . . .	332
5.5.3.1.1	Ōtāwhao mission station lands, March 1850 . . . . .	332
5.5.3.1.2	Moeawha block . . . . .	333
5.5.3.1.3	Ōtāwhao school lands and Awamutu pā, July 1850 . . . . .	334
5.5.3.1.4	Te Tomo and Paiaka, July 1855 . . . . .	334
5.5.3.1.5	Te Taruna, April 1856 . . . . .	334
5.5.3.2	Purchases at Rangiaowhia . . . . .	335
5.5.3.2.1	Rangiaowhia church lands, January 1854 . . . . .	335
5.5.3.2.2	Karangapaihau, January 1857 . . . . .	335
5.5.4	Subsequent developments . . . . .	336
5.5.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	337
5.6	The Waipa–Waitetuna transaction . . . . .	338
5.6.1	The parties' positions . . . . .	340

CONTENTS

5.6.2	Background to the transaction . . . . .	340
5.6.3	Negotiation and purchase, 1862–64 . . . . .	342
5.6.4	The administration of reserves . . . . .	346
5.6.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	346
5.7	Prejudice . . . . .	347
5.8	Summary of findings . . . . .	349
CHAPTER 6: TE TOHERIRI TE RAUPATU: WAR AND CONFISCATION . . . . .		355
6.1	Introduction . . . . .	355
6.1.1	The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	356
6.1.2	How the chapter is structured . . . . .	358
6.2	Issues . . . . .	358
6.2.1	Historiography of the causes of war . . . . .	358
6.2.2	What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	360
6.2.3	Crown concessions and acknowledgements . . . . .	365
6.2.3.1	Treaty settlement legislation . . . . .	365
6.2.3.2	Crown concessions in this inquiry . . . . .	366
6.2.4	Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	366
6.2.4.1	The Taranaki war . . . . .	367
6.2.4.2	The Waikato war . . . . .	368
6.2.4.3	The Crown's conduct of the Waikato war . . . . .	369
6.2.4.4	Confiscation and compensation . . . . .	370
6.2.4.5	Prejudice . . . . .	371
6.2.5	Issues for discussion . . . . .	371
6.3	The establishment of the Kīngitanga . . . . .	372
6.3.1	The establishment and purposes of the Kīngitanga . . . . .	372
6.3.2	The Crown's attitudes towards the Kīngitanga prior to the Taranaki war . . . . .	376
6.3.3	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	379
6.4	Why did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori go to fight in Taranaki and what were the consequences? . . . . .	381
6.4.1	How did the war in Taranaki begin? . . . . .	383
6.4.2	How and why did some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (and other Kīngitanga groups) intervene in Taranaki in 1860–1861? . . . . .	386
6.4.2.1	Fighting in defence of the Kīngitanga . . . . .	386
6.4.2.2	Careful investigation followed by consensus . . . . .	389
6.4.2.2.1	The Crown seeks support among Māori for its position . . . . .	389
6.4.2.2.2	How did the Kīngitanga tribes come to a decision? . . . . .	391
6.4.2.2.2	Customary kinship obligations . . . . .	399
6.4.2.3	Strategic considerations . . . . .	401
6.4.2.4	Military assistance to Te Ātiawa in Taranaki, 1860–61 . . . . .	408
6.4.2.4.1	Puketakauere . . . . .	408
6.4.2.4.1	Māhoetahi, Huirangi, Redoubt 3, Te Ārei . . . . .	409

CONTENTS

	6.4.2.5 The making of peace in 1861 . . . . .	411
6.4.3	What were the consequences of the Taranaki war for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori? . . . . .	415
	6.4.3.1 Te Rohe Pōtae participation and casualties . . . . .	415
	6.4.3.1 Impact on the Crown's relationship with the Kīngitanga generally and Ngāti Maniapoto in particular	416
6.4.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	421
6.5	Did the Crown seek to avoid war in Waikato? . . . . .	423
6.5.1	Were there opportunities for the Crown to recognise Kīngitanga authority in 1861? . . . . .	425
	6.5.1.1 Why did war not break out in 1861? . . . . .	425
	6.5.1.2 Grey's mandate from the Colonial Office . . . . .	430
	6.5.1.3 Grey's choice of native policy: the 'New Institutions' . . . . .	431
	6.5.1.4 Discussion of the New Institutions in the Waikato, December 1861 . . . . .	432
6.5.2	Preparing for war: roads, redoubts, and armed steamers . . . . .	436
6.5.3	Were there opportunities for the recognition of Kīngitanga authority in 1862–63? . . . . .	438
	6.5.3.1 Growing fear of attack in the Waikato . . . . .	438
	6.5.3.2 The Peria hui, October 1862 . . . . .	439
	6.5.3.3 Grey's visit to the Waikato, January 1863 . . . . .	440
6.5.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	444
6.6	Was the Waikato war partly caused by Māori? . . . . .	447
6.6.1	Were there 'moderates' and 'extremist Kingites', one side wanting peace and the other war? . . . . .	448
6.6.2	The expulsion of Gorst . . . . .	449
6.6.3	How did the Kīngitanga respond to the Crown's resumption of war in Taranaki? . . . . .	452
6.6.4	Was there a credible threat of an attack on Auckland? . . . . .	454
6.6.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	460
	6.6.5.1 Myth making . . . . .	460
	6.6.5.2 Treaty findings . . . . .	461
6.7	Was the Crown's conduct of the war disproportionate or egregious? . . . . .	463
6.7.1	Rules of engagement . . . . .	464
6.7.2	Camerontown, Pukekohe East, Meremere . . . . .	468
6.7.3	Rangiriri . . . . .	469
	6.7.3.1 The white flag . . . . .	469
	6.7.3.2 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae? . . . . .	472
	6.7.3.3 Attempt to negotiate peace . . . . .	473
	6.7.3.4 Treatment of prisoners . . . . .	475
	6.7.3.5 Smallpox allegations . . . . .	476
6.7.4	Ngāruawāhia . . . . .	477
6.7.5	Te Rore . . . . .	480
6.7.6	Waiari . . . . .	485
	6.7.6.1 What happened? . . . . .	485

CONTENTS

	6.7.6.2 Casualties . . . . .	486
	6.7.6.3 Issues about Waiari . . . . .	487
6.7.7	Rangiaowhia . . . . .	489
	6.7.7.1 What happened? . . . . .	489
	6.7.7.2 Casualties and prisoners . . . . .	489
	6.7.7.3 What are the claims about? . . . . .	490
	6.7.7.4 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori? . . . . .	491
	6.7.7.5 Nature of the settlements . . . . .	492
	6.7.7.6 Why was Rangiaowhia attacked? . . . . .	492
	6.7.7.7 Was Rangiaowhia a sanctuary? . . . . .	495
	6.7.7.8 Military conduct (egregious Crown actions) . . . . .	500
	6.7.7.8.1 Attack on an undefended and unfortified village . . . . .	500
	6.7.7.8.2 Deliberate burning of a whare . . . . .	501
	6.7.7.8.3 Lack of leadership . . . . .	502
	6.7.7.8.4 Attacks on women, children, and the elderly . . . . .	503
	6.7.7.8.5 Destruction of property . . . . .	508
	6.7.7.9 Māori response to Rangiaowhia . . . . .	508
6.7.8	Hairini . . . . .	509
	6.7.8.1 What happened? . . . . .	509
	6.7.8.2 Casualties . . . . .	510
	6.7.8.3 Issues about Hairini . . . . .	510
6.7.9	Kihikihi . . . . .	511
	6.7.9.1 Did the looting and destruction have a military purpose? . . . . .	511
	6.7.9.2 Another attempt to negotiate peace . . . . .	514
6.7.10	Ōrākau . . . . .	515
	6.7.10.1 The Māori strategy for Ōrākau . . . . .	516
	6.7.10.2 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori? . . . . .	517
	6.7.10.3 Rejecting the offer of surrender . . . . .	520
	6.7.10.4 The flight from Ōrākau . . . . .	522
	6.7.10.4.1 A massacre? . . . . .	522
	6.7.10.4.2 Casualties . . . . .	524
	6.7.10.4.3 Care of the dead . . . . .	525
	6.7.11 The end of the war? . . . . .	526
	6.7.12 Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	527
6.8	The involvement of Ngāti Tūwharetoa in the Waikato war . . . . .	529
	6.8.1 Ngāti Tūwharetoa involvement in the Waikato war . . . . .	530
	6.8.2 Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	531
6.9	Confiscation and compensation . . . . .	533
	6.9.1 What interests and manawhenua did Te Rohe Pōtae hapū and iwi hold in Taranaki in 1865? . . . . .	535
	6.9.1.1 What was the situation when war broke out? . . . . .	535
	6.9.1.2 Was there an exclusive interest? . . . . .	536
	6.9.1.3 Conclusions on interests in Taranaki . . . . .	538

CONTENTS

6.9.2	What interests and manawhenua did Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū hold in Waikato? . . . . .	538
6.9.2.1	Ngāti Paretekawa . . . . .	539
6.9.2.2	Ngāti Apakura . . . . .	542
6.9.2.3	Other hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto . . . . .	542
6.9.2.4	Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi . . . . .	544
6.9.2.5	Conclusions on interests in the Waikato raupatu district . . . . .	544
6.9.3	Why and by what process did the Crown confiscate Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū lands? . . . . .	546
6.9.3.1	Why did the Crown decide on confiscation? . . . . .	546
6.9.3.2	How was the confiscation scheme established? . . . . .	550
6.9.3.2.1	Suppression of Rebellion Act 1863 . . . . .	551
6.9.3.2.2	New Zealand Settlements Act 1863 . . . . .	551
6.9.3.2.3	New Zealand Loan Act 1863, and Loan Appropriation Act 1863 . . . . .	552
6.9.4	How were the confiscations carried out? . . . . .	553
6.9.4.1	The Waikato confiscation districts . . . . .	554
6.9.4.2	The Taranaki confiscation districts . . . . .	558
6.9.5	Was the Compensation Court's process adequate, insofar as it affected Te Rohe Pōtae groups? . . . . .	561
6.9.5.1	How was the compensation process established? . . . . .	561
6.9.5.1.1	Amending legislation, 1864–1866 . . . . .	562
6.9.5.1.2	Rules and practice of the Compensation Court . . . . .	564
6.9.5.2	In Taranaki . . . . .	566
6.9.5.3	In Waikato . . . . .	568
6.9.6	Were the Crown's attempts to return land to 'rebels' adequate? . . . . .	572
6.9.6.1	Land set aside for 'rebels' in 1879 . . . . .	573
6.9.6.2	The Waikato Confiscated Lands Act 1880 . . . . .	575
6.9.6.3	Twentieth century petitions and claims . . . . .	576
6.9.7	Did the Crown establish proper processes for investigating raupatu grievances? . . . . .	578
6.9.7.1	The Ngāti Kauwhata claims commission . . . . .	579
6.9.7.2	The Sim commission . . . . .	579
6.9.8	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	582
6.9.8.1	Taranaki . . . . .	583
6.9.8.2	Waikato . . . . .	584
6.10	Prejudice . . . . .	587
6.10.1	The parties' arguments . . . . .	587
6.10.2	The main aspects of prejudice . . . . .	589
6.10.3	Immediate socio-economic effects . . . . .	589
6.10.4	Death and injury of combatants and non-combatants . . . . .	591
6.10.5	Immediate impacts of hosting refugees . . . . .	593
6.10.6	The impact of disease . . . . .	595
6.10.7	Long-term impacts of hosting refugees . . . . .	597

CONTENTS

6.10.8	The impact of dispossession . . . . .	599
6.10.8.1	Ngāti Paretekawa . . . . .	599
6.10.8.2	Ngāti Apakura . . . . .	600
6.10.8.3	Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Unu, and Ngāti Huiao . . . . .	601
6.10.9	Labelling: Loyal, friendly, kūpapa, rebel . . . . .	602
6.10.10	Remembering . . . . .	605
6.10.11	Forgetting . . . . .	608
6.10.12	Kore whenua kore mana . . . . .	611
6.11	Summary of findings . . . . .	613

PART II

CHAPTER 7: KA TŪ TE AUKATI: THE FORMATION AND ENFORCEMENT

OF THE AUKATI . . . . .	619
7.1	Introduction . . . . .	619
7.1.1	The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	620
7.1.2	How this chapter is structured . . . . .	621
7.2	Issues . . . . .	621
7.2.1	What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	621
7.2.2	Crown concessions . . . . .	622
7.2.3	Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	622
7.2.3.1	The assertion of the aukati and the Crown's response . . . . .	622
7.2.3.2	Negotiations 1875–82 . . . . .	623
7.2.4	Issues for discussion . . . . .	623
7.3	The formation of the aukati and the Crown's response: 1866–74 . . . . .	624
7.3.1	The Kingitanga in the wake of the wars . . . . .	624
7.3.1.1	Political relationships between hapū and iwi . . . . .	625
7.3.1.2	Social, cultural, and economic life of communities . . . . .	629
7.3.2	The aukati and the territory it contained . . . . .	632
7.3.2.1	The 'inner' aukati and beyond . . . . .	633
7.3.2.2	Adjustments in the aukati to the 1880s . . . . .	634
7.3.3	The aukati in operation . . . . .	640
7.3.3.1	Markers and patrols . . . . .	641
7.3.3.2	Selective enforcement . . . . .	641
7.3.3.3	King Tāwhiao's peace policy . . . . .	643
7.3.3.4	Challenges to peace: Taranaki and Mōkau . . . . .	645
7.3.3.5	Challenges to peace: Te Kooti's arrival in the district . . . . .	651
7.3.3.6	Policing the aukati in the context of a peace policy . . . . .	657
7.3.4	The formation of Crown policy on the aukati . . . . .	662
7.3.4.1	The Crown's initial response to the aukati . . . . .	663
7.3.4.2	The opening of dialogue at Te Pahiko, 1869 . . . . .	669
7.3.4.3	The confirmation of Crown policy after Te Pahiko . . . . .	670
7.3.5	The implementation of the Crown's policy, 1870–75 . . . . .	673
7.3.5.1	The Crown's response to Todd's killing . . . . .	673
7.3.5.2	Parris meets with Wetere, 1871 . . . . .	675

CONTENTS

	7.3.5.3 Attempts to provide measures for tribal self-government	677
	7.3.5.4 Ongoing attempts to engage with the Kingitanga . . . . .	681
7.3.6	Treaty analysis and findings: the formation of the aukati and the Crown's initial response, 1866–74 . . . . .	682
	7.3.6.1 The Treaty of Waitangi and Te Rohe Pōtae after the Waikato war . . . . .	683
	7.3.6.2 Was the enforcement of the aukati a legitimate action? . . . . .	684
	7.3.6.3 What did the Crown do to establish a resolution with the Kingitanga? . . . . .	687
	7.3.6.3.1 Section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act 1852 . . . . .	687
	7.3.6.3.2 Other means of providing for Kingitanga authority . . . . .	689
	7.3.6.3.3 The Native Councils Bills . . . . .	691
	7.3.6.4 The need for meaningful negotiation . . . . .	692
7.4	Negotiations, 1875–early 1883 . . . . .	693
	7.4.1 Negotiations with McLean and Pollen . . . . .	695
	7.4.1.1 The Waitomo hui, February 1875 . . . . .	696
	7.4.1.2 The Kaipiha hui, May 1876 . . . . .	699
	7.4.1.3 Pollen meets with Kingitanga leaders, January 1877 . . . . .	701
	7.4.1.4 Pollen meets with Rewi and other leaders, February–March 1877 . . . . .	702
	7.4.2 Negotiations with Sheehan and Grey . . . . .	707
	7.4.2.1 The hui at Whakairoiro, February 1878 . . . . .	709
	7.4.2.2 The hui at Hikurangi, May 1878 . . . . .	712
	7.4.2.3 The hui at Waitara, June 1878 . . . . .	716
	7.4.2.4 The hui at Te Kōpua, May 1879 . . . . .	720
	7.4.2.5 Outcome of negotiations with Grey . . . . .	724
	7.4.3 Suspension of negotiations, 1879–81 . . . . .	727
	7.4.3.1 The policies of the Hall Ministry . . . . .	728
	7.4.3.2 Areas of concern on the border, 1880–81 . . . . .	732
	7.4.3.3 Tāwhiao's friendship campaign . . . . .	734
	7.4.4 Negotiations with Bryce, 1882 . . . . .	742
	7.4.4.1 Bryce meets Rewi at Kihikihi, February 1882 . . . . .	743
	7.4.4.2 Rewi advances plans for making use of the Native Land Court . . . . .	746
	7.4.4.3 The pile-driving ceremony and the fall of the Hall Ministry . . . . .	748
	7.4.4.4 The Whatiwhatihoe Maehe, 11–17 May 1882, and Tāwhiao's proposals . . . . .	749
	7.4.4.5 The Mōkau Native Land Court hearing, June 1882 . . . . .	753
	7.4.4.6 The Government's legislative measures, 1882 . . . . .	756
	7.4.4.6.1 The Native Reserves Act 1882 . . . . .	757
	7.4.4.6.2 The North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act 1882 . . . . .	758

CONTENTS

	7.4.4.6.3 The Amnesty Act 1882 . . . . .	758
	7.4.4.6.4 The 1882 legislation as a foundation for renewed negotiations . . . . .	760
	7.4.4.7 Bryce's meeting with Tāwhiao at Whatiwhaitohoe, October–November 1882 . . . . .	761
7.4.5	Treaty analysis and findings: negotiations, 1875–82 . . . . .	766
	7.4.5.1 The approach of the parties to the negotiations . . . . .	766
	7.4.5.2 Did the Crown place undue pressure on Ngāti Maniapoto to separate from the Kingitanga? . . . . .	767
	7.4.5.2.1 The Crown's policy of non-interference . . . . .	768
	7.4.5.2.2 The effect of the native land system and Rewi's response . . . . .	769
	7.4.5.2.3 The Government's response to Rewi's concerns . . . . .	770
	7.4.5.2.4 The decision to allow the Native Land Court at Mōkau . . . . .	771
	7.4.5.2.5 Finding on Crown pressures . . . . .	773
	7.4.5.3 Did the Crown make sufficient efforts to accommodate the Kingitanga . . . . .	775
	7.4.5.4 Outcome of negotiations to 1882 . . . . .	778
7.5	Summary of findings . . . . .	780
 CHAPTER 8: TE PŪTAKE O TE ŌHĀKĪ TAPU . . . . .		781
8.1	Introduction . . . . .	781
	8.1.1 The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	783
	8.1.2 How the chapter is structured . . . . .	784
8.2	Issues . . . . .	784
	8.2.1 What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	785
	8.2.2 Crown concessions . . . . .	786
	8.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	787
	8.2.3.1 Te Ōhāki Tapu as a sacred compact for Te Rohe Pōtae self-government . . . . .	787
	8.2.3.2 Te Ōhāki Tapu as a constitutional agreement . . . . .	791
	8.2.3.3 The 16 March 1883 agreement . . . . .	792
	8.2.3.4 The June 1883 petition and the Government's response . . . . .	792
	8.2.3.5 The December 1883 external boundary survey agreement . . . . .	792
	8.2.3.6 The 1885 railway agreement . . . . .	793
	8.2.3.7 The Crown's responses to the 1883–85 agreements . . . . .	794
	8.2.4 Issues for discussion . . . . .	795
8.3	The March 1883 agreement . . . . .	795
	8.3.1 Amnesty and the external boundary . . . . .	798
	8.3.1.1 Discussions about amnesty, December 1882 to January 1883 . . . . .	798
	8.3.1.2 Bryce's arrival in Kāwhia, February 1883 . . . . .	800
	8.3.1.3 Declaration of the amnesty, February 1883 . . . . .	802

CONTENTS

	8.3.1.4	The marking of the external boundary, January to April 1883 . . . . .	805
	8.3.2	The exploratory railway survey, February–March 1883 . . . . .	808
	8.3.2.1	Te Rohe Pōtae Māori stop the attempted exploratory railway survey . . . . .	810
	8.3.2.2	The hui at Taonui’s house, 15 March 1883 . . . . .	812
	8.3.3	The 16 March 1883 agreement . . . . .	815
	8.3.3.1	The meeting with Bryce . . . . .	815
	8.3.3.2	The letters between Bryce and the rangatira . . . . .	819
	8.3.3.3	What did the Crown and the chiefs agree to? . . . . .	820
	8.3.3.3.1	The views of Marr, Loveridge, and Meredith . . . . .	820
	8.3.3.3.2	Our conclusions . . . . .	822
	8.3.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	831
8.4		The June 1883 petition and the Government’s response . . . . .	833
	8.4.1	The railway survey begins and Hursthouse is stopped, March 1883 . . . . .	834
	8.4.1.1	Te Mahuki and his seizure of Hursthouse . . . . .	836
	8.4.1.2	The hui to decide Te Mahuki’s fate . . . . .	837
	8.4.2	Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agree to petition the Government, April 1883 . . . . .	839
	8.4.2.1	Wahanui’s ‘manifesto’ . . . . .	841
	8.4.2.2	The decision to send a petition . . . . .	843
	8.4.3	Bryce’s journey to Mōkau, April–May 1883 . . . . .	846
	8.4.3.1	Bryce meets Wahanui and Taonui . . . . .	846
	8.4.3.2	Bryce at Mōkau . . . . .	848
	8.4.4	Petition preparations continue . . . . .	850
	8.4.5	The petition of the ‘four tribes’, June 1883 . . . . .	851
	8.4.5.1	The content of the petition . . . . .	851
	8.4.5.2	Challenges to the petition . . . . .	858
	8.4.6	The Government’s response to the petition, July–September 1883 . . . . .	865
	8.4.6.1	The Native Land Laws Amendment Act 1883 . . . . .	865
	8.4.6.2	The Native Committees Act 1883 . . . . .	867
	8.4.6.3	The response of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to the Government’s reforms, August–September 1883 . . . . .	870
	8.4.7	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	872
	8.4.7.1	Were the demands of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori consistent with the Treaty? . . . . .	872
	8.4.7.2	Was the Government’s response adequate? . . . . .	875
	8.4.7.3	The effect of the Crown’s response on the negotiations . . . . .	879
8.5		The December 1883 external boundary agreement . . . . .	880
	8.5.1	Further steps to open Kāwhia, September–October 1883 . . . . .	880
	8.5.1.1	The opening of Kāwhia Harbour and preparations for land sales, September 1883 . . . . .	881
	8.5.1.2	The arrival of Bryce and the armed constabulary, October 1883 . . . . .	882
	8.5.2	Ongoing issues with the exploratory surveys, March–June 1883 . . . . .	885
	8.5.2.1	Opposition and stoppages . . . . .	885

CONTENTS

	8.5.2.2 Obstacles to Rochfort's survey . . . . .	887
8.5.3	The hui at Kihikihi, November-December 1883 . . . . .	888
	8.5.3.1 Bryce's address to the rangatira . . . . .	889
	8.5.3.2 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders propose an external boundary survey . . . . .	891
	8.5.3.3 Outcome of discussions . . . . .	893
	8.5.3.4 Further discussions among the iwi . . . . .	897
8.5.4	Confirmation of the agreement to survey the external boundary, December 1883 . . . . .	898
	8.5.4.1 The confirmation of Ngatai's inclusion in the amnesty . . . . .	899
	8.5.4.2 Confirmation of the survey arrangements . . . . .	900
	8.5.4.3 Exchange of letters . . . . .	901
8.5.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	905
	8.5.5.1 What did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori seek in making the application? . . . . .	905
	8.5.5.2 What did the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori agree to? . . . . .	906
	8.5.5.3 Did Bryce knowingly mislead Te Rohe Pōtae Māori? . . . . .	908
	8.5.5.4 What was the effect of the agreement? . . . . .	911
8.6	The implementation of the 1883 agreements to mid-1884 . . . . .	912
8.6.1	Implementation of survey work, late 1883 to early 1884 . . . . .	913
8.6.2	Rewi withdraws from the application, January 1884 . . . . .	914
8.6.3	Rewi and Tāwhiao assert right of self-government, January– February 1884 . . . . .	916
8.6.4	The implementation of the native committees regime, March 1884 . . . . .	918
	8.6.4.1 The election of the Kawhia Native Committee . . . . .	918
	8.6.4.2 Bryce's views on title determination . . . . .	921
	8.6.4.3 Tāwhiao's preparations for travelling to England . . . . .	923
	8.6.4.4 Wilkinson's views on Tāwhiao's petition . . . . .	924
8.6.5	Wahanui's ongoing efforts to implement the 1883 agreements, March–May 1884 . . . . .	924
	8.6.5.1 Further opposition to Cussen's trig surveys, March– April 1884 . . . . .	925
	8.6.5.2 Wahanui and Taonui attempt to assuage concerns, March–April 1884 . . . . .	926
	8.6.5.3 The 'blue ribbon' petition, April 1884 . . . . .	927
	8.6.5.4 Ongoing opposition to the surveys, May 1884 . . . . .	928
8.6.6	The Government's new land policy and Māori responses, April–June 1884 . . . . .	929
	8.6.6.1 The Government's land buying policy, April–May 1884 . . . . .	929
	8.6.6.2 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori respond to the new policies, May–June 1884 . . . . .	932
	8.6.6.3 The early work of the Kawhia Native Committee, May–June 1884 . . . . .	933
	8.6.6.4 Ngāti Raukawa oppose surveys, June 1884 . . . . .	935
8.6.7	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	937

CONTENTS

8.7	The first land reforms of the Stout–Vogel Government, July–December 1884 . . . . .	941
8.7.1	The Stout–Vogel Government’s land settlement objectives, August–November 1884. . . . .	942
8.7.1.1	The governor’s speech about the railway, August 1884 . . . . .	942
8.7.1.2	Determining the railway route, August–September 1884 . . . . .	943
8.7.1.3	Wahanui’s negotiations with Ballance, August–September 1884. . . . .	944
8.7.1.4	Proposal to provide for Māori authority, September 1884 . . . . .	947
8.7.1.5	The railway route and new land policy, October–November 1884. . . . .	949
8.7.2	The Native Land Alienation Restriction Act 1884, October–November 1884 . . . . .	951
8.7.2.1	Wahanui’s speech to the House of Representatives, 1 November 1884. . . . .	952
8.7.2.2	Ballance’s response to Wahanui, 1 November 1884 . . . . .	955
8.7.2.3	Views of other members, 1 November 1884 . . . . .	957
8.7.2.4	Wahanui’s continued objection, 6 November 1884 . . . . .	958
8.7.2.5	The Legislative Council’s response, 7–8 November 1884. . . . .	960
8.7.2.6	The railway and Ballance’s land legislation proceed, 7–10 November 1884. . . . .	961
8.7.2.7	The Crown grants Te Rohe Pōtae Māori requests for a liquor ban – September–November 1884 . . . . .	963
8.7.3	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	965
8.7.3.1	The meaning of mana whakahaere. . . . .	966
8.7.3.2	The opportunity to provide for mana whakahaere . . . . .	968
8.7.3.3	The Government’s railway and land policies . . . . .	970
8.8	The railway agreement, February–April 1885 . . . . .	971
8.8.1	The Government’s land settlement plans and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns . . . . .	972
8.8.1.1	Ballance outlines the Government’s new policies, November 1884. . . . .	972
8.8.1.2	Te Rohe Pōtae Māori concerns about the railway, December 1884–January 1885 . . . . .	974
8.8.2	Ballance seeks agreement to the railway, February 1885 . . . . .	975
8.8.2.1	The Whanganui hui, January 1885 . . . . .	976
8.8.2.2	The Kihikihiki hui, February 1885 . . . . .	977
8.8.2.2.1	What Te Rohe Pōtae leaders sought . . . . .	977
8.8.2.2.2	Ballance’s response . . . . .	982
8.8.2.2.3	Further discussions . . . . .	986
8.8.2.2.4	Conditional agreement to the railway . . . . .	987
8.8.2.3	The hui at Whatiwhatihoe, February 1885. . . . .	990
8.8.2.4	Ballance’s meetings in other districts, February–March 1885 . . . . .	992

CONTENTS

8.8.3	The tribes give their final agreement to the railway, February– March 1885 . . . . .	993
8.8.4	The turning of the sod ceremony, April 1885 . . . . .	994
8.8.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	996
8.8.5.1	The nature of the February 1885 agreement . . . . .	996
8.8.5.2	What was agreed? . . . . .	998
8.8.5.3	Was Ballance fully open about the Crown’s policies? . . . . .	1002
8.8.5.4	Was the Crown obliged to honour Ballance’s promises? . . . . .	1004
8.9	Land settlement and the end of the aukati, 1885–86 . . . . .	1005
8.9.1	The Government’s amended land settlement policy . . . . .	1006
8.9.1.1	Initial Government and settler responses to Ballance’s promises – February–March 1885 . . . . .	1007
8.9.1.2	The Government rejects Tāwhiao’s petition, March 1885 . . . . .	1009
8.9.1.3	The Native Land Disposition Bill, June 1885 . . . . .	1012
8.9.1.3.1	Initial Māori and settler views . . . . .	1014
8.9.1.3.2	The Government’s defence of the Bill’s land purchasing provisions . . . . .	1016
8.9.1.3.3	Debate on the role of native committees . . . . .	1017
8.9.1.3.4	Rating of Māori land . . . . .	1018
8.9.1.4	The Native Affairs Committee considers the Bill, August 1885 . . . . .	1018
8.9.1.5	The Government commits to large-scale land purchasing, August 1885 . . . . .	1021
8.9.1.6	The Government’s handling of the Joshua Jones lease . . . . .	1024
8.9.2	The end of the aukati . . . . .	1024
8.9.2.1	Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Waimarino Native Land Court applications, October–December 1885 . . . . .	1025
8.9.2.2	The Kawhia Native Committee and further meetings with Balance, November–December 1885 . . . . .	1032
8.9.2.3	The lifting of the aukati, December 1885 . . . . .	1035
8.9.3	The end of Te Rohe Pōtae autonomy . . . . .	1036
8.9.3.1	Further preparations for Crown purchasing, late 1885 to early 1886 . . . . .	1037
8.9.3.2	The Kawhia Native Committee’s consideration of land title applications, April 1886 . . . . .	1038
8.9.3.3	Ballance’s visit to Te Rohe Pōtae, April 1886 . . . . .	1039
8.9.3.4	Te Rohe Pōtae Native Land Court application, April 1886 . . . . .	1040
8.9.3.5	The Native Land Administration Act 1886, August 1886 . . . . .	1042
8.9.3.6	The decline of the Kawhia Native Committee, 1886–87 . . . . .	1044
8.9.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1045
8.9.4.1	Did the Crown breach its agreement to confirm the external boundary before considering tribal divisions? . . . . .	1049

CONTENTS

8.9.4.2	Did the Crown honour the commitments Ballance made at Kihikihi in February 1885? . . . . .	1052
8.9.4.2.1	Increasing the powers of the Kawhia Native Committee to inquire into land titles	1052
8.9.4.2.2	Ballance's promised system for administering Māori land . . . . .	1052
8.9.4.2.3	Rating of Māori land . . . . .	1053
8.9.4.2.4	The Crown's land purchasing intentions . . . . .	1054
8.9.4.2.5	Railway construction . . . . .	1055
8.9.4.2.6	Powers of native committees . . . . .	1055
8.9.4.2.7	Control of liquor . . . . .	1056
8.9.4.2.8	Participation in Parliament and lawmaking	1056
8.10	Conclusion . . . . .	1057
8.10.1	Te Ōhāki Tapu . . . . .	1057
8.10.1.1	The declaration of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	1057
8.10.1.2	Opportunities for the Crown to give effect to the terms of the Treaty . . . . .	1059
8.10.1.3	The Crown's failure to recognise Te Rohe Pōtae Māori tino rangatiratanga . . . . .	1061
8.10.1.4	Te Ōhāki Tapu – a demand to give practical effect to the terms of the Treaty . . . . .	1062
8.10.2	The Crown's Treaty breaches and the prejudice suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori . . . . .	1065
8.10.2.1	The Crown's response to the June 1883 petition . . . . .	1065
8.10.2.2	The Stout–Vogel Government's initial approach to the railway and Māori land reforms . . . . .	1066
8.10.2.3	The effect of Ballance's promises at the Kihikihi hui . . . . .	1067
8.10.2.4	The Crown's failure to keep its promises . . . . .	1067
8.10.2.5	The Crown's failure to give effect to the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori . . . . .	1069
8.11	Prejudice . . . . .	1069
8.12	Summary of findings . . . . .	1070
CHAPTER 8 APPENDIX I: THE 1883 PETITION OF THE FOUR TRIBES . . . . .		1073
CHAPTER 8 APPENDIX II: WAHANUI'S SPEECHES TO PARLIAMENT . . . . .		1079
CHAPTER 9: TE TUARA O TŪRONGO: THE NORTH ISLAND MAIN TRUNK RAILWAY . . . . .		1083
9.1	Introduction . . . . .	1083
9.1.1	The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	1084
9.1.2	How the chapter is structured . . . . .	1086
9.2	Issues . . . . .	1086
9.2.1	What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	1087

CONTENTS

9.2.2	Treaty standards for public works takings . . . . .	1088
9.2.3	Crown concessions in this inquiry . . . . .	1089
9.2.4	Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	1089
9.2.5	Issues for discussion . . . . .	1092
9.3	NIMTR negotiations . . . . .	1092
9.3.1	Introduction . . . . .	1092
9.3.2	The NIMTR in historical context . . . . .	1093
9.3.3	Further NIMTR negotiations, 1885–87 . . . . .	1096
9.4	The construction of the NIMTR . . . . .	1100
9.4.1	Introduction . . . . .	1100
9.4.2	Land takings for the initial construction of the NIMTR . . . . .	1106
9.4.2.1	The legislative framework . . . . .	1107
9.4.2.2	Takings by proclamation . . . . .	1108
9.4.3	Gifted lands and compensation agreements . . . . .	1111
9.4.4	Fairness and payment of compensation . . . . .	1119
9.4.5	Labour contracts . . . . .	1122
9.4.6	Resource use and payment . . . . .	1125
9.4.7	Damage to the environment and wāhi tapu . . . . .	1130
9.4.8	Fencing of the NIMTR . . . . .	1136
9.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1139
9.5.1	The legislative framework . . . . .	1140
9.5.2	Land takings for the initial construction of the NIMTR . . . . .	1141
9.5.3	Gifting of land . . . . .	1144
9.5.4	Compensation . . . . .	1145
9.5.5	Labour contracts . . . . .	1147
9.5.6	Resource use and payment . . . . .	1148
9.5.7	Damage to the environment and wāhi tapu . . . . .	1149
9.5.8	Fencing of the NIMTR . . . . .	1149
9.5.9	Conclusion . . . . .	1150
9.6	Prejudice . . . . .	1151
9.7	Summary of findings . . . . .	1152

CHAPTER 9 APPENDIX: GIFTINGS AND LAND TAKINGS . . . . . 1155

CHAPTER 10: TE KOOTI WHENUA MĀORI / THE NATIVE LAND COURT,

1886–1907 . . . . .	1167
10.1 Introduction . . . . .	1167
10.1.1 The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	1168
10.1.2 How the chapter is structured . . . . .	1169
10.2 Issues . . . . .	1169
10.2.1 What other Tribunals have said . . . . .	1169
10.2.2 Crown concessions . . . . .	1172
10.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	1172
10.2.4 Issues for discussion . . . . .	1176

CONTENTS

10.3	How did the native Land Court operate and what form of title was issued by 1886? . . . . .	1177
10.3.1	The origins of the Native Land Court and early Māori views . . .	1178
10.3.2	Māori engagement with the court . . . . .	1182
10.3.3	Native Land Court process and title by 1886 . . . . .	1184
10.3.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1186
10.4	How was title to the initial parent blocks and the definition of relative interests determined? . . . . .	1189
10.4.1	Determining ownership of the Aotea–Rohe Potae block, 1886–87	1190
10.4.1.1	The parties open their cases . . . . .	1192
10.4.1.2	The parties present their evidence . . . . .	1193
10.4.1.2.1	The claims to the block's northern and eastern portions . . . . .	1194
10.4.1.2.2	The claims to Kāwhia . . . . .	1195
10.4.1.2.3	Mihi Pepene's claim . . . . .	1196
10.4.1.3	The court's judgment . . . . .	1197
10.4.1.4	Approving the lists of owners . . . . .	1198
10.4.2	Deciding on next steps . . . . .	1200
10.4.3	Defining the iwi and hapū subdivisions . . . . .	1201
10.4.3.1	Overview . . . . .	1202
10.4.3.2	Role of the Kawhia Native Committee . . . . .	1203
10.4.3.3	Out-of-court arrangements . . . . .	1207
10.4.3.4	Location and timing of hearings . . . . .	1210
10.4.3.5	Role of judges . . . . .	1211
10.4.3.6	Role of assessors . . . . .	1212
10.4.3.7	Recognition of customary interests . . . . .	1213
10.4.3.8	Restrictions on alienation . . . . .	1216
10.4.4	Defining relative interests and the commencement of Crown purchasing . . . . .	1219
10.4.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1221
10.5	What was the effect of subsequent partition and succession on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori landowners? . . . . .	1226
10.5.1	Overview: the court and native land title in Te Rohe Pōtae, 1892–1907 . . . . .	1227
10.5.1.1	Continued subdivision . . . . .	1227
10.5.1.2	Increasing Crown presence . . . . .	1227
10.5.1.3	Administration of existing blocks . . . . .	1230
10.5.1.4	Law changes and the provision for incorporations . . .	1230
10.5.1.5	Judges and assessors . . . . .	1231
10.5.1.6	Timing, notification, and location of hearings . . . . .	1234
10.5.2	Partitioning and title fragmentation . . . . .	1236
10.5.3	Succession and the fractionation of interests . . . . .	1241
10.5.4	Effects on economic development . . . . .	1242
10.5.5	Effects on tribal organisation and society . . . . .	1245
10.5.6	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1247

CONTENTS

10.6	What were the costs associated with the court process? . . . . .	1251
10.6.1	Court fees . . . . .	1251
10.6.2	Survey costs . . . . .	1253
10.6.2.1	The scale of survey costs in Te Rohe Pōtae . . . . .	1253
10.6.2.1.1	Factors influencing the cost of surveys . . . . .	1253
10.6.2.1.2	The cumulative impact of survey costs . . . . .	1255
10.6.2.1.3	The impact of interest on survey liens . . . . .	1255
10.6.2.1.4	Crown attempts to reduce survey costs . . . . .	1256
10.6.2.2	What payment facilities were available to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori for survey charges? Did survey costs lead to land alienation? . . . . .	1257
10.6.2.2.1	Paying with cash . . . . .	1257
10.6.2.2.2	Paying with land . . . . .	1257
10.6.2.2.3	Survey charges and Crown purchasing . . . . .	1260
10.6.2.3	Case study: Rangitoto–Tuhua survey costs . . . . .	1261
10.6.3	Other court-related costs . . . . .	1265
10.6.4	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1267
10.7	To what extent did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori protest the court and what redress was available? . . . . .	1270
10.7.1	Protest and opposition . . . . .	1271
10.7.1.1	The court's response to protest by participants . . . . .	1271
10.7.1.2	The court's response to opposition by non-participants . . . . .	1273
10.7.2	Redress . . . . .	1275
10.7.2.1	Rehearings and appeals . . . . .	1275
10.7.2.1.1	1886–94: Rehearings . . . . .	1275
10.7.2.1.2	Native Appellate Court, 1894–1910 . . . . .	1277
10.7.2.2	Petitions . . . . .	1279
10.7.2.3	Remedying survey errors . . . . .	1281
10.7.2.3.1	Overview . . . . .	1281
10.7.2.3.2	Case study: Umukaimata survey error . . . . .	1285
10.7.3	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1290
10.8	Prejudice . . . . .	1294
10.9	Summary of findings . . . . .	1297

CHAPTER 11: NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA I, 1890–1905: CROWN

PURCHASING, 1890–1905 . . . . .	1299
11.1	Introduction . . . . .	1299
11.1.1	The purpose of this chapter . . . . .	1301
11.1.2	How the chapter is structured . . . . .	1302
11.2	Issues . . . . .	1302
11.2.1	What previous Tribunals have said . . . . .	1302
11.2.2	Crown concessions . . . . .	1304
11.2.3	Claimant and Crown arguments . . . . .	1305
11.2.3.1	The Crown's use of its legislative powers to support its land-buying programme . . . . .	1306

CONTENTS

11.2.3.2	The Crown's land purchasing methods . . . . .	1307
11.2.3.3	The Crown's purchasing prices . . . . .	1308
11.2.3.4	Claimant and Crown arguments about the Jones lease . . . . .	1309
11.2.4	Issues for discussion . . . . .	1309
11.3	Why did the Crown restrict the property rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori? . . . . .	1310
11.3.1	Introduction . . . . .	1310
11.3.2	The 1888–91 restrictions. . . . .	1311
11.3.2.1	The Stout–Vogel Government's land-buying policy up to September 1887 . . . . .	1311
	1888–1891 Restriction Area . . . . .	1312
11.3.2.2	The Atkinson Government's land-buying policy for Te Rohe Pōtae, 1887–90 . . . . .	1317
11.3.2.3	The local economic context . . . . .	1318
11.3.2.4	April 1888 negotiations . . . . .	1319
11.3.2.5	Wahanui's objection to the Government's plans . . . . .	1322
11.3.2.6	1888–91 restrictions enacted . . . . .	1323
11.3.3	The 1890–1910 restrictions . . . . .	1325
11.3.3.1	The Crown decides to begin purchasing . . . . .	1325
11.3.3.2	Early discussions about purchasing tactics . . . . .	1328
11.3.3.3	1890–92 restrictions enacted . . . . .	1329
11.3.3.4	The Crown's initial frustration . . . . .	1332
11.3.3.5	Early sales to cover survey costs: Te Kopua and Waiaraia. . . . .	1334
11.3.3.6	Te Rohe Pōtae Māori appeal for the restrictions to be lifted. . . . .	1336
11.3.3.7	Limited purchasing, 1891 . . . . .	1338
11.3.3.8	Cadman and Ballance raise the threat of compulsory purchasing . . . . .	1340
11.3.3.9	The impact of Ministers' threats . . . . .	1343
11.3.3.10	Further restrictions and increased funds for purchasing, 1892–93 . . . . .	1345
11.3.4	The Crown grants itself exclusive purchasing rights nationwide . . . . .	1347
11.3.4.1	Purchasing accelerates during 1893 . . . . .	1347
11.3.4.2	Seddon raises the prospect of compulsory purchasing . . . . .	1349
11.3.4.3	Selective restrictions and further acceleration in land purchasing, 1894 . . . . .	1351
11.3.4.4	Restrictions are applied to the whole country . . . . .	1353
11.3.4.5	Māori protest and continued Crown purchasing, 1895–1905 . . . . .	1356
11.3.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1359
11.4	How did the Crown buy Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land? . . . . .	1364
11.4.1	Introduction . . . . .	1364
11.4.2	The Ngāti Raukawa settlement and the Wharepuhunga block . . . . .	1369
11.4.3	Did the Crown use survey debt to leverage land sales? . . . . .	1371

CONTENTS

11.4.4	Did the Crown buy shares before boundaries or title had been determined? . . . . .	1375
11.4.4.1	Purchasing before title was determined or survey was complete . . . . .	1375
11.4.4.2	Purchasing before relative interests were defined . . .	1378
11.4.5	What methods did the Crown use to acquire shares from individuals? . . . . .	1379
11.4.5.1	The Wharepuhunga block: absentee sellers and those with lesser interests . . . . .	1381
11.4.5.2	Sellers in need of cash . . . . .	1383
11.4.5.3	Minors' shares . . . . .	1383
11.4.6	Did the Crown buy land that the court had declared inalienable? . . . . .	1385
11.4.7	Did the Crown establish reserves, and did it later buy reserve land? . . . . .	1388
11.4.8	Did the Crown protect Māori landowners' interests when it partitioned land? . . . . .	1390
11.4.9	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1394
11.5	Did the Crown pay fair prices for the land it purchased? . . . . .	1399
11.5.1	Introduction . . . . .	1399
11.5.2	How did the Crown determine the prices it would pay? . . . . .	1403
11.5.2.1	Were purchase prices influenced by the Crown's settlement and financial goals? . . . . .	1403
11.5.2.2	Did the Crown use independent valuations? . . . . .	1405
11.5.2.3	Did the Crown negotiate with owners? . . . . .	1406
11.5.2.4	Did the Crown account for the value of timber and other resources? . . . . .	1407
11.5.3	How much was Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land worth? . . . . .	1408
11.5.4	Did the Crown underpay when it bought shares before relative interests were defined? . . . . .	1411
11.5.5	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1412
11.6	The Joshua Jones lease . . . . .	1414
11.6.1	The terms of the Jones lease . . . . .	1417
11.6.2	The Special Powers and Contracts Act 1885. . . . .	1421
11.6.3	The 1888 royal commission of inquiry. . . . .	1424
11.6.4	The Mokau-Mohakatino Act 1888 . . . . .	1426
11.6.5	Subsequent inquiries and permanent alienation . . . . .	1428
11.6.6	Treaty analysis and findings . . . . .	1431
11.6.7	Prejudice . . . . .	1434
11.7	Prejudice . . . . .	1434
11.7.1	Denial of land rights . . . . .	1435
11.7.2	11.7.2 Denial of opportunities to earn incomes from land . . . . .	1435
11.7.3	Destruction of communal authority and development opportunities . . . . .	1437
11.7.4	Fragmentation of land holdings . . . . .	1439
11.7.5	Loss of land. . . . .	1440

CONTENTS

11.7.6 Payment of below market prices . . . . . 1441

11.7.7 Conclusion . . . . . 1442

11.8 Summary of Findings . . . . . 1443

CHAPTER 11 APPENDIX I: THE 1897 PETITION OF THE FIVE TRIBES . 1447

CHAPTER 11 APPENDIX II: TABLES . . . . . 1451

Waitangi Tribunal
Te Rōpū Whakamana i te Tiriti o Waitangi
Kia puta ki te whai ao, ki te mārama

The Honourable Nanaia Mahuta
Minister for Māori Development

The Honourable Andrew Little Minister for Treaty of Waitangi Negotiations

The Honourable Kelvin Davis
Minister for Crown and Māori Relationships

Parliament Buildings
WELLINGTON

5 September 2018

E ngā Minita, tēnā koutou. Haere e te pūrongo, te kaikawe i te whakaaro o te hunga kua manehurangitia, i te kupu a te hunga ora. Haere hei mātakitaki mā te matahuhua, hei kōrerotanga mā te tini tangata. He hinengaro ka manahau, he hinengaro e manaoho. He oi koia te hua o te pūrongo.

We present to you parts I and II of our report on claims submitted under the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 in respect of the Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district. This district extends from Whāingaroa Harbour to northern Taranaki, and inland to the Waikato River and Taumarunui.

The report addresses 277 claims that have been brought to the Waitangi Tribunal on behalf of a diverse range of groups and individuals. The claims are brought on behalf of iwi, hapū, and whanau, people representing their tupuna, and current-day entities such as trusts, boards, incorporations, and owners of certain land blocks.

Our findings are drawn together, along with the sole recommendation we make at this stage of our inquiry, in the summary at the beginning of the report.

The Tribunal reserves the right to make further recommendations concerning parts I and II once the complete report is finalised.

Nāku noa, nā

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read 'C. R. Fox', written in a cursive style.

Deputy Chief Judge Caren Fox
Presiding Officer
Nā Te Rōpū Whakamana i te Tiriti o Waitangi

PREFACE

This is a pre-publication version of parts I and II of the Waitangi Tribunal's Te Mana Whatu Ahuru: Report on Te Rohe Pōtae Claims. As such, all parties should expect that in the published version, headings and formatting may be adjusted, typographical errors rectified, and footnotes checked and corrected where necessary. Maps, photographs and additional illustrative material may be inserted. The Tribunal reserves the right to amend the text of these parts in its final report, although its main findings will not change. It also reserves the right not to address certain issues in these parts of the report, and further parts, until the final report is released. The Tribunal reserves the right to make further recommendations on the matters addressed in parts I and II up to and including in the final published report. The Tribunal reserves the right to refuse any applications to exercise its resumptive powers based on this pre-publication report until the final report is released.

In preparing this pre-publication report, the Tribunal has noted variation in spelling and in the use of macrons for a number of words and phrases referred to in evidence on the record of inquiry, particularly in regard to the names of people and places. Parties are therefore invited to submit corrections to these, or any other words and phrases used in the report. Parties must indicate where in the report the term is used, their desired spelling or macron use, and any relevant explanation or evidence. The Tribunal will consider parties' submissions and incorporate any resulting changes into the final published version of the report.

HE MAIMAI AROHA

E kui mā, e koro mā i te pō, whakarongo mai!

Koutou ngā Manu Ariki Whakataka Pōkai o Maniapoto, o Te Rohe Pōtae.

Te Rāngai Rangatira ka taka ki tua i ō koutou maunga kārangaranga, te Kawau Mārō i taki i te kawa a Uenuku-kai-tangata ki ngā umupokapoka o te riri, te Pōkai Kura i mau i te kawa whatu ahuru ki ngā whare whakaiaia o Pōneke.

*I te rā nei, ka rangona ā koutou kupu, ka rangona ā koutou tangi ki ō koutou whenua, ki tō koutou rangatiratanga me tō koutou mana whakahaere i murua atu nei
e te mana o te wā.*

*Nō reira tukua te parekawakawa ki raro, kia au tā koutou moe.
E moe i te moe tē whita,
i te okiokinga uruhau
i te urunga tē taka,
i te moenga tē whakaarahia.*

HE MAIMAI AROHA

Esteemed elder-women and elder-men of the Night, Listen!

You, the principal birds who orchestrated the evening dance of the flocks of Maniapoto and Te Rohe Pōtae.

The company of chiefs who have gone to the unseen side of your famous mountains, the order of the cormorant, bearers of the lore of Uenuku-the-man-eater on the fields of war, the noblemen who argued the wisdom of reason in the power houses of Wellington.

*Your laments for your lands will now be heard for your chiefly rights and for your right to administer your affairs, stripped from you
by the authority of time.*

*Now, you may remove the green leaves of grief, let your rest be unencumbered.
Sleep the repose of peace,
the sweet slumber,
on the softened pillow that moves not and on the bed from which there is no rising.*

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The Tribunal wishes to acknowledge all the claimants and other participants who passed away during the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry, including Dr Tui Adams, Piripi Crown, Te Aue Davis, Mataroa Frew, Rangi Harry Kereopa, Barbara Marsh, Tā Archie Te Atawhai Taiaroa, the Honourable Koro Wetere and Hoane Titari John Wi. We treasure the kōrero that these individuals, as well as those not listed, shared during the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui and hearings.

We also wish to acknowledge our sadness at the passing of Rangi McGarvey, who provided live English translations of te reo Māori spoken at our hearings, as he did at the hearings for many other Waitangi Tribunal inquiries.

The Tribunal further acknowledges the passing of legal counsel Campbell Duncan and Kathy Ertel, who represented claimants in the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry.

The Tribunal was deeply saddened by the passing of its presiding officer, Judge David Ambler on 11 November 2017 at the age of 50. Judge Ambler was a respected colleague who brought a dedicated work ethic and passion for the law, tikanga Māori, and te reo Māori to all that he did. His loss continues to be felt among his whānau and friends, the Māori Land Court, Waitangi Tribunal, the legal profession, and the many clients and claimants he served as a lawyer and judge over his quarter century of service. The Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry was his major contribution to the Waitangi Tribunal, in which, amongst other innovations, he pioneered the early hearing of claimant traditional and oral evidence in the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui.

Nō reira e koutou, haere atu rā ki te wāhi whakamutunga mō te tangata. Moe mai, moe mai.

TE WHAKARĀPOPOTOTANGA: SUMMARY OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATION

Titiro ia ki te wati kei toku ringa e mau ana, noku tenei wati. Mehemea ka pakaru, maku e mau atu ki te watimeke kia mahia, me toku tohu atu hoki nga mate ki a ia, a mana e mahi i runga i taku i tohu ai.<sup>1</sup>

Te Mana Whatu Ahuru: Report on Te Rohe Pōtae Claims addresses claims concerning Crown actions in Te Rohe Pōtae after 6 February 1840, when the Treaty was first signed at Waitangi. The title of our report is taken from the term ‘te mana whatu ahuru’, which Ngāti Maniapoto use to denote the power of rangatira to rally their people for shared purposes.

This is a pre-publication version of parts I and II of the Tribunal’s report. The Tribunal reserves the right to amend the text of these parts in its final report, although its main findings will not change. It also reserves the right not to address certain issues in these parts of the report, and further parts, until the final report is released. The Tribunal reserves the right to refuse any applications to exercise its resumptive powers based on this pre-publication report until the final report is released. Later parts of the report will address issues of twentieth-century land and politics, health, education, and environmental management, as well as claims relating to particular takiwā.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The report describes the inquiry district and the peoples who came to occupy it. During the inquiry, we heard how the people of the Tainui waka arrived in the region and settled along the coast from Whāingaroa in the north to south of Mōkau. Many iwi and hapū in this inquiry claim descent from the Tainui voyagers, including Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Raukawa. When they travelled further inland they met with people of the Tokomaru, Aotea, and Te Arawa waka, including Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui iwi. From these groups, a dynamic society developed and flourished in the region. It was into this society that the Treaty was brought in 1840.

---

1. ‘Nga Korero Paramete: 1881–1885’, He Reo Tūre No te Taha Kāwana/Language of the Crown, New Zealand Electronic Text Collection, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-NZPaVo1N-gaK-t1-g1-t4-body1-d3-d2-d1.html>, accessed 22 February 2018; ‘Native Lands Settlement Bill’, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p556. This was translated as ‘This watch which I hold in my hand is mine; and, if it requires repairs, let me take it to the watchmaker and have it repaired. I will explain to the watchmaker what requires to be done to it, and then he can repair it according to my direction.’ Wahanui Huatare, 1 November 1884, NZPD, vol 50, p556.

When rangatira from the district signed the Treaty, they did so on the understanding that they would retain their tino rangatiratanga, their full chieftainship and right to self-government. Māori understood that both parties would mutually benefit from the terms of the Treaty and that the Crown would protect them from incoming settlers and settlement, and from foreign threats. The Tribunal has found in Chapter 3 that the Treaty established a partnership where the kāwanatanga or governing power of the Crown was limited by the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga to Māori. Likewise, the former absolute authority of Māori encapsulated in the term tino rangatiratanga was limited by the grant of kāwanatanga. Each would operate in their own sphere of influence and negotiate how their chosen institutions would operate where their authorities overlapped. The Crown also accepted a duty to actively protect Māori interests, and Māori acquired all the rights and privileges of British subjects. The practical details of these arrangements were to be worked out over time. In Te Rohe Pōtae, such discussions did not take place until the early 1880s, when Te Rohe Pōtae Māori engaged with the Crown in a series of negotiations and agreements now known by the claimants as Te Ōhāki Tapu.

In the decades prior to the signing of the Treaty, tangata whenua of the inquiry district entered into a range of transactions over land with various Europeans. Māori understood pre-Treaty transactions to be traditional arrangements established in accordance with Māori custom. After the signing of the Treaty, land claims commissions were established to investigate and confirm titles for those transactions. However, these did not account for these understandings and the tikanga associated with them. Furthermore, there were numerous aspects of procedure adopted by the commissions which should have highlighted to the Crown that the system was flawed. In chapter 4, the Tribunal has found that as the Crown was responsible for the legislation, its failure to rectify these issues breached the principles of the Treaty.

Through the Treaty, the Crown acquired a monopoly over the purchase of Māori land. From the 1850s, the Crown purchased approximately 140,000 acres of Māori land in the inquiry district, mainly around Mōkau and the Whāingaroa and Aotea Harbours. In chapter 5, the Tribunal has found that in negotiating these transactions, Crown agents failed to comply with the Crown's own standards of conduct for such purchases. These Crown agents failed to fully investigate customary tenure to the land the Crown sought to purchase, neglected to establish the free and informed consent of the sellers, and failed to ensure that Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs. In doing so, the Crown breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi.

Between 1856 and 1858 rangatira from the district, including many who signed the Treaty in the hope of forging a partnership with the Crown, came together to join the Kīngitanga. For Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the Kīngitanga served as a way of protecting their lands. It was not opposed to the existence of Crown authority but rather was understood as a way of forming a more equal relationship with Queen Victoria and thus the colonial Government. The Crown had the opportunity to recognise the Kīngitanga, and to incorporate it into the machinery of the state through, for example, Section 71 of the Constitution Act, but such an option was rejected. In 1863, the Crown invaded the Waikato to suppress the Kīngitanga by force. This resulted in the Waikato War of 1863–64, the exile of the Māori King, and the confiscation of 1.2 million acres of land north of the Pūniu River. The Tribunal has found in chapter 6 that the Kīngitanga was consistent with the institutional arrangements envisaged by the Treaty. Thus, the Crown acted in breach of the principles of the Treaty when it attacked Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and confiscated their land for settlement as punishment.

Chapter 7 describes the assertion and enforcement of the aukati, the border mechanism that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori deployed in conjunction with the Kīngitanga to protect their lands and authority from further Crown aggression. With an uneasy stalemate in place, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Kīngitanga sought to bring the Treaty of Waitangi into effect in the region through negotiations with the Crown. The Crown, however, placed increasing pressure on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori during negotiations and failed to address their specific concerns, and their demands for self-government. The Tribunal has found that these actions were in breach of the principles of the Treaty.

From 1883 to 1885, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to engage in a process of negotiation and agreement with the Crown, collectively known by claimants as Te Ōhākī Tapu. In their June 1883 petition to Parliament, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori demanded that the Crown use its kāwanatanga to give effect to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori's article two guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. From the Crown, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also sought 'mana whakahaere', the right to autonomy and self-determination over their rohe. It was the practical application of tino rangatiratanga that they sought. Te Ōhākī Tapu was an opportunity provided to the Crown by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to advance the Treaty to a new level. However, Crown agents throughout this period acted with dishonest and misleading negotiation tactics and promises, which in turn led to breakdowns in iwi relationships, land loss, and massive prejudice across the district, the impacts of which last to this day. The Tribunal has found in chapter 8 that due to these actions the Crown breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi.

The construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway in the nineteenth century is considered in chapter 9. The Tribunal has found that many of the agreements made during the negotiations of the 1880s with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not adhered to. Some of these concerned the initial construction of the railway, including what, how much and by which means the Crown took land from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Also at issue was the Crown's failure to pay compensation for those affected by the takings, its lack of consultation with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori about local details of the land taken, including ensuring that sites of significance were avoided, and its delay in fencing the railway line. These actions also breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi.

In chapter 10, the Tribunal examines the operations and outcomes of the Native Land Court in Te Rohe Pōtae between 1886 and 1907. The Tribunal has found that, while there were some improvements in the court's process in Te Rohe Pōtae, there remained a lack of Māori control and input into title determination, contrary to the express wishes of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Moreover, it has found that Native Land Court titles were awarded to individuals rather than hapū, and in this way the titles neither reflected custom nor provided for Māori engagement in the colonial economy. Added to that, the costs of gaining Native Land Court titles could be excessive and unreasonable, and were unfairly placed on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Finally, the options for Māori who wished to challenge court decisions were inadequate. As the Crown was responsible for this system, the Tribunal has found that it breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi in several respects.

In chapter 11, the last chapter of this report, the Tribunal discusses Crown purchasing in the district from 1890 to 1905. Purchasing began as the Native Land Court started to define individual owners' interests on land titles. For the most part, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were collectively opposed to land sales but were forced into making deals with the Crown. The Tribunal has found that the Crown breached the Treaty on numerous occasions when implementing its purchasing programme, including using its legislative powers to support purchasing objectives, its purchasing methods and tactics, and the prices it paid to acquire as much land as possible at the cheapest possible prices. This resulted in the alienation of some 640,000 acres of Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae.

The Tribunal has found the claims covered in these parts of the report to be well founded. In summary, the Crown chose not to give practical effect to the Treaty principle of partnership in Te Rohe Pōtae from 1840–1900. It failed to recognise or provide for Te Rohe Pōtae tino rangatiratanga before and during the negotiations collectively described as Te Ōhākī Tapu. This failure resulted in multiple breaches of the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi, and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori have suffered significant and long-lasting prejudice as a result.

AN OPPORTUNITY TO PUT THINGS RIGHT

While the Crown may have chosen not to give effect to the Treaty at the time of the negotiations in the 1880s, or since, the Crown could not and cannot divest itself of its Treaty responsibilities. What is required is for the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to work together to determine how the Treaty can be given practical effect in this district. We understand that the Crown's intention has been to address these matters through these proceedings and by arriving at Treaty settlements with the hapū and iwi of the district.

To put matters right, the Tribunal considers the Crown must now take steps to provide for the exercise by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of their tino rangatiratanga and mana whakahaere within their rohe. (In this context, we understand mana whakahaere to mean the practical exercise of authority in accordance with the principles of autonomy and self-determination.) Through these means Te Rohe Pōtae Māori will be relieved of the prejudice they have suffered arising from the Crown's Treaty breaches, and the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae will be able to move forward in a manner that reflects the original Treaty agreements, which recognised the authority of both Treaty partners and provided for them to move forward together in a manner that brought mutual benefit.

The Tribunal acknowledges that the circumstances of the district have changed significantly since the 1880s. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori are no longer the owners of all the land in the district. They now hold a small proportion of that land. A sizeable number of people now call the region home, as well as a range of local councils and Crown agencies that exercise specific functions in the district. At the very least, to compensate for the prejudice that has been suffered from the Crown's actions, any settlement legislation negotiated by the parties should explicitly recognise the rights of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to tino rangatiratanga and mana whakahaere. It should also impose a positive obligation on the Crown and all agencies acting under Crown authority to recognise and provide for those rights.

In providing for the practical exercise of the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities, the negotiations between the parties and any settlement legislation should address how their right of mana whakahaere should be institutionalised. Negotiations will also need to address the varying forms of authority that exist among the Māori groups of Te Rohe Pōtae, particularly hapū and iwi, and seek to find an appropriate balance between them. Any institutions that are agreed upon should be able to exercise functions alongside other Crown agencies and local authorities that currently exercise authority in the district. Settlement legislation may also need to outline the mechanisms by which appropriate relationships can be formed.

RECOMMENDATION

The Tribunal recommends that the Crown acts, in conjunction with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori or the mandated settling group or groups in question, to put in place means to give effect to their rangatiratanga. For Ngāti Maniapoto or their mandated representatives, this will require the Crown to take into account and give practical effect to Te Ōhākī Tapu. How this might be achieved will be for the parties to decide in negotiations. However, the Tribunal considers that for the Crown to relieve the prejudice suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the following minimum conditions must be met:

- ▶ First, that the rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (or the settling group or groups in question) be enacted in legislation in a manner which recognises and affirms their rights of autonomy and self-determination within their rohe, and imposes a positive obligation on the Crown and all agencies acting under Crown statutory authority to give effect to those rights. For Ngāti Maniapoto or their mandated representatives, this will require legislation that recognises and affirms Te Ōhākī Tapu, and imposes an obligation on the Crown and its agencies to give effect to the right to mana whakahaere.
- ▶ Secondly, subject to negotiations between the parties, that the legislation makes appropriate provision for the practical exercise of rangatiratanga by

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (or the settling group or groups in question). For Ngāti Maniapoto or their mandated representatives, this will require legislation that gives practical effect to Te Ōhāki Tapu, and provides for the practical exercise of mana whakahaere.

The Tribunal reserves the right to make further recommendations on the matters addressed in parts I and II up to and including in the final published report.

ABBREVIATIONS

AJHR	Appendix to the Journals of the House of Representatives
app	appendix
AUC	Auckland Crown purchase deed
CA	Court of Appeal
ch	chapter
cl	clause
CMS	Church Missionary Society
comp	compiler
doc	document
ed	edition, editor
GIS	geographic information system
GNA	got no address
ltd	limited
MB	minute book
memo	memorandum
n	note
no	number
NIMTR	North Island Main Trunk Railway
NZCA	New Zealand Court of Appeal
NZLR	New Zealand Law Reports
OLC	old land claim
p, pp	page, pages
para	paragraph
pt	part
PWD	Public Works Department
ROI	record of inquiry
RUP	recorded under parent
s, ss	section, sections (of an Act of Parliament)
SC	Supreme Court
v	and
vol	volume
Wai	Waitangi Tribunal claim
WMS	Wesleyan Missionary Society

Unless otherwise stated, footnote references to briefs, claims, documents, memoranda, papers, submissions, and transcripts are to the Wai 898 record of inquiry. A copy of the index to the record is available on request from the Waitangi Tribunal.

CHAPTER 1

HE KUPU WHAKAMĀRAMA I TĒNEI PŪRONGO: INTRODUCTION

‘Kia mau tonu ki tēnā; kia mau ki te kawau mārō. Whanake ake! Whanake ake!’<sup>1</sup>

1.1 TE MANA WHATU AHURU

The title of this report is Te Mana Whatu Ahuru: Report on Te Rohe Pōtae Claims. Claimant Tom Roa explained this concept as follows: ‘mana’ refers to the self-made or inherited power and authority of individuals or groups; ‘whatu’ has three meanings: a stone that perseveres against all obstacles, an eye, and the act of weaving; and ‘ahuru’ means peace and the warmth of an embrace.<sup>2</sup> The term is also associated with whatu-ahuru-manu, which were sacred, inscribed stone emblems brought from Hawaiki on the Tainui waka and used in tapu ceremonies to promote food abundance.<sup>3</sup> We understand te mana whatu ahuru to be an authority specific to Ngāti Maniapoto. As Tom Roa explained, the term denotes the power of rangatira to unite their people to achieve a joint purpose through peaceful means.<sup>4</sup> For these reasons, we consider Te Mana Whatu Ahuru to be an appropriate analogy for the claims and histories addressed in this report.

The purpose of this pre-publication report is to address the claims of Māori concerning Crown actions in Te Rohe Pōtae after 6 February 1840, when the Treaty was first signed at Waitangi. Te Rohe Pōtae is a part of Aotearoa New Zealand often referred to as the ‘King Country’. The term ‘Te Rohe Pōtae’ refers to oral traditions associated with the second Māori King, Tāwhiao, who was said to have placed his hat on a map of the district to indicate the territory over which the Kīngitanga held sway. Wahanui Huatare, an influential rangatira from the district, is also said to have used the hat as a metaphor for the territory.

Ngāti Maniapoto evolved as an iwi from the landing of the Tainui waka. To the north, where the great forest Te Nehenehenui met the southern Waikato plains, and to the north-west in the harbours of Kāwhia and Whāingaroa, the many hapū associated with Ngāti Maniapoto intermingled with hapū now commonly

---

1. Document A110 (Meredith and Joseph), p18. This is a well-known Ngāti Maniapoto pepeha attributed to the ancestor Maniapoto that translates to: ‘Stick to that, the straight-flying Cormorant!’

2. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 42–45 (Tom Roa, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 5 November 2012).

3. Document A83 (Te Hiko), p 50.

4. Document H9(c) (Roa document bank), pp [4]–[5].

associated with Waikato-Tainui. To the north-east, those hapū intermingled with Ngāti Raukawa. All of these groups shared ancestral links to the Tainui waka.

Iwi who did not descend from those on the Tainui waka shared overlapping spheres of influence with Ngāti Maniapoto in other parts of the district. To the south-east were lands occupied by hapū of Ngāti Tūwharetoa. Further to the south, around modern-day Taumarunui, were hapū associated with the peoples of upper Whanganui. To the south-west, in the Mōkau region, were the people of northern Taranaki. Although they differed in their origins, all of these groups shared close associations with each other in the territories where their customary interests overlapped.

By 1840, when the Treaty of Waitangi was brought to the coastal edges of the district, most of these hapū and iwi had come to be settled in their respective territories.

The claims in this report allege that the Crown breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi through a range of actions that resulted in significant prejudice to claimants and their tūpuna, from 1840 through to the present day. While these claims bear some similarities with those in other inquiries heard by the Waitangi Tribunal, the claimants placed significant emphasis on Te Ōhāki Tapu, something entirely unique to the rohe. Te Ōhāki Tapu is a term used by claimants to describe a series of negotiations and agreements that took place in the 1880s between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders. Taken together, these negotiations and agreements represented a declaration by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori of their tino rangatiratanga, as well as an opportunity for the Crown to give practical effect to the Treaty of Waitangi and to advance the Treaty relationship.

The negotiations of the 1880s occurred against the backdrop of war and raupatu on the margins of Te Rohe Pōtae. They followed the period when King Tāwhiao and his people retreated to Te Rohe Pōtae beyond the aukati, the boundary which the Kīngitanga tried to enforce in order to keep colonial troops out of their territory prior to the Waikato War of 1863–64. A 20-year period of defended independence ensued. The negotiations took place as the Crown became more insistent that the district be opened up to aid the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway.

These events, and others, are the subject of claims in this inquiry. The remainder of this chapter provides a brief overview of the procedural history of the inquiry. It then addresses certain general and specific jurisdictional issues concerning the Tribunal's ability to hear particular claims.

1.2 THE TE ROHE PŌTAE DISTRICT INQUIRY

1.2.1 Planning and research

The first judicial conference for the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry was held on 2 and 3 October 2006 at Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae in Te Kūiti. Judge David Ambler was appointed presiding officer by the then Waitangi Tribunal chairperson, Chief Judge Joseph Williams, as per clause 8(2) of schedule 2 to the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975.<sup>5</sup> He was joined by Professor Tā Hirini Mead as kaumātua. Following this judicial conference and because of the large number of claimants who indicated a wish to proceed with an inquiry, the Tribunal confirmed that the King Country was an active inquiry district and began preparations for the inquiry on 7 November 2006.<sup>6</sup>

At this early stage, the Tribunal encouraged the claimants to work with the Crown Forestry Rental Trust in compiling tangata whenua research.<sup>7</sup> At the same time, historian Dr Vincent O'Malley was contracted by the Tribunal to carry out a pre-casebook review to establish how much research was already available and whether additional research was required.<sup>8</sup> It was decided that the inquiry would be run under the Tribunal's 'standard new approach' model for district inquiries, which meant that the research programme and inquiry processes would be designed in such a way as to enable comprehensive coverage of historical and contemporary claims to occur.<sup>9</sup> Broad consensus on the research programme was reached at the third judicial conference convened on 1 October 2007.<sup>10</sup>

1.2.2 Determining the inquiry boundary

On 4 September 2007, Judge Ambler confirmed the interim boundary of the inquiry and named it the 'Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry', as it 'fully captured' the essence of the district.<sup>11</sup> The boundary approximated the boundary of the Aotea block as defined in 1886 (except for the Ōhura South block) and also included the area between the north-west of the Aotea block and the Waikato claim area.<sup>12</sup>

Judge Ambler subsequently granted a number of boundary extensions. The boundary was extended to include the raupatu claims of various iwi and hapū within the Waikato claim area identified in the Waikato-Tainui Deed of Settlement and Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995.<sup>13</sup> The boundary extensions also included certain non-raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area.<sup>14</sup> The whole of the Whāingaroa Harbour area was included.<sup>15</sup> Finally, the boundary was extended south into the Taranaki district to ensure all the Ngāti Maniapoto raupatu claims could be heard.<sup>16</sup>

A comprehensive discussion of the Tribunal's jurisdiction to inquire into raupatu claims is found in section 1.4. The boundary extensions granted by the Tribunal are outlined in full in the following sidebar and are also set out in map 1.1.

---

5. Memorandum 2.5.14.

6. Memorandum 2.5.6, p 2.

7. Memorandum 2.5.6, p 3.

8. Memorandum 2.5.6, pp 3–4.

9. Memorandum 2.5.16, p 2.

10. Memorandum 2.5.23, p 5.

11. Memorandum 2.5.21, p 19.

12. Memorandum 2.5.21, p 4.

13. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 8–16.

14. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 16–17.

15. Memorandum 2.5.23 p 2.

16. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 17–18.

The Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry Boundary Extensions

The boundary of the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry is based on the interim boundary with the following extensions:

- (a) The Tribunal will hear relevant evidence on the wider historical context outside of the inquiry district, including relevant evidence of traditional relationships with neighbouring iwi and hapū, particularly in relation to the 1883 Rohe Pōtae petition area;
- (b) The Tribunal will hear claims relating to the Rohe Pōtae pact from iwi involved, but will not hear the claims of those iwi to lands outside the boundary of this inquiry;
- (c) West 20 miles out to sea from the mouth of the Tauterei Stream in the north of the inquiry district, and southward 20 miles from the coastline (including Kārewa island) to a point 20 miles west of the Taranaki raupatu line in the south of the inquiry district;
- (d) East to include the Ketemaringi, Hurakia and Maraeroa blocks;
- (e) North to include the whole of the Whaingaroa Harbour and the following claims within the Waikato claim area:
  - (i) The Raupatu claims of Ngāti Maniapoto and hapū affiliated with Ngāti Maniapoto (which may include hapū who also affiliate to Ngāti Raukawa);
  - (ii) The Raupatu claims of Ngāti Kauwhata in relation to Rangiaowhia;
  - (iii) The non-Raupatu claims of Ngāti Hikairo to Ngāti Hikairo land within Pirongia Parish, Ngāroto Parish, Mangapiko Parish, the town of Alexandra (east and west) and Whatiwhatihoe (being Parish of Pirongia lots 329 and 330);
  - (iv) The non-Raupatu claims of Ngāti Koata (ki Whaingaroa), Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Tahau, Ngāti Te Kore, Ngāti Pukoro, Ngāti Te Ikaunahi, Ngāti Tira, Ngāti Heke, Ngāti Rua Aruhe, Ngāti Hounuku, Paetoka, and Ngāti Te Karu within the area south of Tauterei Stream within the Te Akau Block;
  - (v) The non-Raupatu claims of the Ngāti Maniapoto hapū, being Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Paretekawa, and Ngāti Ngutu . . . ; and
- (f) South to include the Raupatu claims of Ngāti Maniapoto and affiliated hapū within the Taranaki district . . .
- (g) The Tribunal will hear all aspects of river claims from those groups which are participating in this inquiry where rivers form or cross the district boundary, including rivers that enter the Whaingaroa Harbour. However, claims will not be heard in cases where these groups' issues have been heard in full by another inquiry or where the Tribunal's jurisdiction to hear them has been explicitly removed by legislation.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Memorandum 2.5.53, pp 2–3.

Map 1.1. Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry final physical boundary including extensions

1.2.3 Previous district inquiries in neighbouring areas

The Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry is one of the last district inquiries to be heard by the Waitangi Tribunal. Since the early 1990s, the Tribunal has grouped claims into geographic areas, including several in the regions surrounding Te Rohe Pōtae. The reports resulting from these inquiries have included contextual discussion or preliminary findings on issues relating to the claims heard in the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry. In addition, a number of settlements of Treaty claims have been reached that have impacted on the Tribunal's jurisdiction.

To the north is the Waikato district. Very early in the Treaty claim settlement process, Waikato-Tainui opted for direct negotiations with the Crown instead of a Tribunal inquiry. Therefore no Tribunal report on the Waikato issues has been produced. However, the 1995 Waikato deed of settlement informs this inquiry in respect of the Crown's settlement of Waikato raupatu claims (see section 1.4.1). It records the Crown's acknowledgement and formal apology concerning the raupatu that followed the Waikato War of 1863–64. The southern boundary of that district is also the northern boundary of our inquiry.

To the north-east is the south-east Waikato district. Both groups with predominant interests in this district – Ngāti Hauā and Raukawa – opted to proceed straight to settlement. However, Raukawa also participated in the proceedings for much of this inquiry, mainly concerning traditional interests in the Wharepuhunga block in the north-eastern corner of the Te Rohe Pōtae district. In 2014, they concluded a Treaty settlement with the Crown (see section 1.4.1).

To the east is the central North Island region, which combined three separate inquiry districts. The Tribunal convened a limited inquiry in 1993 concerning the Pouakani block, which sits outside the Te Rohe Pōtae district and lies north-east of the Maraeroa block. The Pouakani Report (1993) focused on the alienation of land interests of the Tūwharetoa, Maniapoto, Raukawa and Te Arawa peoples. It also made findings on the Crown's purchasing practice in the region, as well as offering contextual discussions of the negotiations leading to the opening of the Te Rohe Pōtae district and Crown surveying of eastern areas of Te Rohe Pōtae in the 1880s.

The main inquiry for the central North Island district resulted in He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One (2008). The report considered issues relevant to this inquiry such as Māori autonomy, raupatu, land alienation, the operations of the Native Land Court, the environment, and economic development. It also included a discussion of the 1880s negotiations over the opening of Te Rohe Pōtae and their implications for Māori autonomy, but the Tribunal said its findings on these matters should be considered preliminary as it had not heard from Ngāti Maniapoto. In 2015, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, one of the main central North Island claimant groups, who also participated in the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry, signed a deed of settlement with the Crown (see section 1.4.1).

To the south-east is the National Park inquiry district. Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report (2013) discussed Crown-Māori political engagements between 1870 and 1886, including the Te Rohe Pōtae negotiations.

To the south is the Whanganui inquiry district. The claims there were heard in two stages, the first concerning the river and the second concerning the land. The issues discussed in the Whanganui River Report (1999) relate to our inquiry insofar as tributaries of the Whanganui River system, such as the Ōngarue River, flow through the Te Rohe Pōtae district. Further, the Te Awa Tupua (Whanganui River Claims Settlement) Act 2017 also provides some contextual understanding to the rohe. In the Whanganui land inquiry, Ngāti Maniapoto held a watching brief and sought leave to present two briefs of evidence to assist that Tribunal to understand Ngāti Maniapoto whakapapa and the history and concepts relating to the Kīngitanga and the Te Rohe Pōtae negotiations between 1883 and 1885.<sup>17</sup> Claimants from Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Hari (two Ngāti Maniapoto hapū who participated in the Whanganui inquiry) agreed to provide some of the time allocated to their claims for these briefs. The presiding officer, Judge Carrie Wainwright, confirmed that the evidence would be treated only as context for these hapū, and any findings made would not be determinative.<sup>18</sup> He Whiritauonoka: The Whanganui Land Report (2015) contained discussions of the 1880s negotiations and the Waimarino land block.

To the south-west is the Taranaki inquiry district. The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (1996) largely dealt with issues arising from the Taranaki confiscation, but included some discussion of Ngāti Tama's interests in the Mōkau region (part of this inquiry). A separate urgent inquiry was later convened concerning a claim brought on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto, who objected to the Crown's proposed settlement with Ngāti Tama. In the Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Cross-Claims Settlement Report (2001), the Tribunal found that the Crown's revised settlement package would not breach the Treaty. Te Kawau Pā was excluded from the settlement and the Tribunal recommended that attempts be made to mediate a form of co-management of this site.

1.2.4 Appointment of the panel

Judge Ambler was appointed presiding officer for the inquiry on 21 April 2007.<sup>19</sup> On 23 December 2009, Dr Robyn Anderson, John Baird, Dr Aroha Harris, and Professor Tā Hirini Mead were appointed members of the panel.<sup>20</sup> However, Dr Anderson recused herself on 23 March 2011.<sup>21</sup> The chairperson then appointed Professor Pou Temara to the panel on 22 February 2012.<sup>22</sup>

Following the passing of Judge Ambler, Deputy Chief Judge Caren Fox was appointed as the replacement presiding officer on 24 November 2017.<sup>23</sup>

1.2.5 Determining the claim issues

Claims were brought to the Waitangi Tribunal on behalf of a diverse range of groups and individuals. These encompassed various whānau, hapū and iwi groups, as well as those representing particular tūpuna. Furthermore, claims were made on behalf of current-day entities such as trusts, boards, incorporations and owners of particular land blocks. The Tribunal also received many localised claims or

---

17. Wai 903 ROI, memo 2.3.73, p 5.

18. Wai 903 ROI, memo 2.3.73, pp 5–6.

19. Memorandum 2.5.14, p 1.

20. Memorandum 2.5.50, p 1.

21. Memorandum 2.5.93, p 1.

22. Memorandum 2.5.112, p 1.

23. Memorandum 2.7.10, p 2.

claims relating to particular actions or events. In total, the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry addresses 277 consolidated and aggregated claims.<sup>24</sup>

The first claim that eventually came to be part of the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry was submitted to the Tribunal on 31 March 1987 by Margaret Makariti Poinga on behalf of herself and members of Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>25</sup> The Tribunal continued to receive Te Rohe Pōtae claims over subsequent years until 1 September 2008, which was the deadline for all historical Treaty claims that concerned Crown actions prior to 21 September 1992. During the course of the inquiry, two claims were received concerning Māui's dolphin and their threat of extinction. These were the claims of Davis Apiti, submitted on 1 September 2008 and amended further on 31 July 2014, and Angeline Greensill, submitted on 1 September 2014.<sup>26</sup> These claims were addressed in a priority report, further discussed in section 1.2.8.

The claimants produced a combined claimants' statement of issues, which was filed on 23 December 2011.<sup>27</sup> In response, the Crown filed its statement of position and concessions on 22 March 2012.<sup>28</sup>

The Tribunal took these documents into account in preparing its draft statement of issues, which it released to the parties for feedback at a judicial conference in Wellington on 14 and 15 August 2012.<sup>29</sup> The final Tribunal statement of issues was released on 6 September 2012.

1.2.6 Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, hearings, and site visits

On 16 June 2009, Judge Ambler presented the parties with a proposal for kōrero tuku iho hui. The proposal received overwhelming support.<sup>30</sup> The purpose of these hui was to provide a forum that could complement formal hearings and so assist in fulfilling the Tribunal's aim of receiving evidence 'in a manner that maintains the cultural and legal integrity of the claims resolution process'.<sup>31</sup> These hui focused solely on oral traditions and the tikanga behind them. They were intended as a dynamic platform for claimant witnesses, where Kōrero on different take could be recited, added to, corrected, and contradicted by knowledge-holders, speaking in turn.<sup>32</sup> The benefits of this approach included: hearing from kuia and kaumātua at an early stage of the inquiry; allowing researchers to take oral traditions into

---

24. Memorandum 2.6.53, pp [8]–[13]. 'Consolidated' means all of the claim is heard in the inquiry. 'Aggregated' means the claim may participate in a number of inquiries. An appendix to the final report will contain a full list of the claimants and their claims, as well as the number of claims that actively participated in the inquiry and detail on the process of aggregation and consolidation.

25. Claim 1.1.1.

26. Statement of claim 1.1.286; statement of claim 1.1.286(a); statement of claim 1.1.287. Ms Greensill did not present evidence in support of her claim during the inquiry's evidential hearings.

27. Statement of issues 1.4.1.

28. Statement of response 1.3.1.

29. Statement of issues 1.4.3, pp 11–12.

30. Discussion paper 6.2.15; memorandum 2.5.42, p 4.

31. Discussion paper 6.2.15, p [1].

32. Discussion paper 6.2.15, pp [1]–[2].

Week	Date	Venue
Week 1	1–2 March 2010	Te Kotahitanga Marae, Ōtorohanga
Week 2	29–30 March 2010	Waipapa Marae, Kāwhia
Week 3	12–13 April 2010	Poihākena Marae, Raglan
Week 4	26–27 April 2010	Ngāpūwaiwaha Marae, Taumarunui
Week 5	17–18 May 2010	Maniaroa Marae, Mōkau
Week 6	9–11 June 2010	Te Tokanganui-a-Noho Marae, Te Kūiti

Table 1.1: Ngā kōrero tuku iho hui account in their research; and bridging the preparatory and hearing inquiry phases to enable early panel engagement with claimant kōrero.<sup>33</sup> At the conclusion of each hui, the kōrero in te reo Māori was translated and transcripts were produced and placed on the record of inquiry.

Six of these hui were held in locations throughout Te Rohe Pōtae from March to June 2010.

Following the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, the Tribunal held 17 weeks of hearings. They began in late 2012 and were held at various marae and centres around the Te Rohe Pōtae district. The hearings concluded in Wellington in early 2015.

In total, the Tribunal heard from approximately 350 witnesses across both the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui and hearings.<sup>34</sup>

1.2.7 Shaping the report

Following the conclusion of hearings in 2015, the Tribunal commenced writing its report.

In a memorandum dated 20 June 2014, Judge Ambler called for submissions from counsel on the question of how the Tribunal should approach its report in light of the Supreme Court decision Haronga v Waitangi Tribunal [2011] NZSC 53.<sup>35</sup> In its decision, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the Tribunal's obligation to inquire into every claim before it, as outlined in section 6(2) of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975.<sup>36</sup>

In response to the submissions of the parties, the Tribunal decided that it would address as many specific claims as possible in the substantive kaupapa chapters of the report. However, the Tribunal noted that specific claims were also being addressed in a distinct part of the report known as the Take a Takiwā chapters.

33. Discussion paper 6.2.15, p [2].

34. Some witnesses did not get to present their briefs of evidence at hearings and some witnesses pulled out of hearings at the last minute.

35. Memorandum 2.6.76, p 5.

36. Haronga v Waitangi Tribunal [2011] NZSC 53, para 80.

TE MANA WHATU AHURU

1.2.7

Week	Date	Hearing venue	Site visits
Week 1	4–9 November 2012	Te Tokanganui-ā-noho Marae, Te Kūiti	—
Week 2	10–14 December 2012	Te Tokanganui-ā-noho Marae, Te Kūiti	—
Week 3	3–8 March 2013	Maketu Marae, Kāwhia	Te Ahurei, Tainui waka, Kāwhia Harbour, Te Puna o Rona
Week 4	7–12 April 2013	Te Wananga o Aotearoa, Glenview	Ōrākau, Rewi's Reserve (Kihikihi), Rangiaowhia/Hairini, Ngāhinapouri, Pāterangi and Pikopiko, Waiari, Whatiwhatihoe, Te Karaka, Otawahao Mission School site, Moeawha Pā and mission station site, St John's CMS church (Te Awamutu), Hui te Rangiora, runanganui and council house site (Kihikihi)
Week 5	5–10 May 2013	Te Ihingārangi Marae, Waimiha	Tihikārearea, Ongarue Stream Road Bridge, Waimiha Urupā, Wai-miha awa, Ōngarue Urupā, Ōngarue, Pukepoto Pā and maunga, Tūhua maunga, Te Koura, Waimiha Pā
Week 6	8–13 September 2013	Aramiro Marae, Raglan	Te Rape Pā, Te Aramiro (Te Kaharoa) Marae, Ohautira, Waitetuna River mouth, whitebait farm and resource consent site 1, Puketutu, Te Uku landing, Accorn Farm, Huripopo, Whāingaroa Harbour, Manu Bay
Week 7	6–11 October 2013	Waipapa Marae, Kāwhia	Mokai Kainga Marae, Te Papa o Whatihua (urupā), Okapu F2 Farm, Nohinohi Whare, Hawaiiiki-Iti, Hourouere (Morrison subdivision)
Week 8	3–8 November 2013	Te Kotahitanga Marae, Ōtorohanga	—
Week 9	8–13 December 2013	Parawera Marae, Kihikihi	—
Week 10	3–7 March 2014	Maniaroa Marae, Mōkau	—
Week 11	31 March–4 April 2014	Wharauoa Marae, Taumarunui	Matapuna Bridge, Te Umutoi, Takaputiraha o Tutetawha, Te Kohunu, Petania, Te Arawahine, Te Kopani, Papawaka Pā

Week	Date	Hearing venue	Site visits
Week 12	4–9 May 2014	Oparure Marae, Te Kūiti	Te Korapatu Marae, aerodrome, oxidation ponds, Te Ana Ureure, Motakiora, Taupiri o te Rangi, Mangaokewa Stream
Week 13	9–13 June 2014	Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, Te Kūiti	—
Week 14	7–11 July 2014	Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, Te Kūiti	—
Week 15	2–7 November 2014	Napinapi Marae, Piopio	—
Week 16	8–12 December 2014	Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, Te Kūiti	—
Week 17	11–13 February 2015	James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington	—

Table 1.2: Waitangi Tribunal hearings

The regional groupings of the Take a Takiwā chapters take into consideration the discrete hapū and whānau claims and are organised regionally. They are: Waipā-Pūniu; Te Kūiti-Hauāuru; Waimiha-Ōngarue; Taumarunui; Mōkau; Kāwhia-Aotea; and Whāingaroa. The Take a Takiwā chapters will be included in the final report.

1.2.8 Prioritised reporting

In 2015, Judge Ambler prioritised two claims concerning the Crown's actions in respect of the Māui's dolphin due to the dolphins' increased risk of extinction. The Tribunal released The Priority Report concerning Māui's Dolphin in pre-publication format in May 2016.

On Friday 22 December 2017, Matanuku Mahuika, counsel for the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board, and Geoff Melvin, counsel for the Crown, filed a joint memorandum requesting the Tribunal to prioritise certain topics for early reporting to assist with settlement negotiations between Ngāti Maniapoto and the Crown.<sup>37</sup> At its meeting in December 2017, prior to receiving the joint memorandum, the Tribunal had already discussed a plan to progress and release the report.<sup>38</sup>

After a judicial conference on 26 February 2018, the Tribunal confirmed it would release parts I and II of the report in pre-publication format in August of that year.<sup>39</sup>

37. Memorandum 3.5.14.

38. Memorandum 2.7.14, p 2.

39. Memorandum 2.7.14, pp 2, 3.

1.3 SCOPE OF THE PRE-PUBLICATION REPORT

This part of the pre-publication report includes chapters on the following topics: tribal landscape; te Tiriti o Waitangi; old land claims; Crown purchasing 1840–65; war and confiscation; the formation and enforcement of the aukati; Te Ōhākī Tapu; the North Island Main Trunk Railway; the Native Land Court 1886–1907; and Crown purchasing 1890–1905.

1.4 JURISDICTIONAL ISSUES

Before addressing the claims in the chapters, there are jurisdictional issues that need to be addressed due to the effect of Treaty settlements in surrounding districts, and the extent to which they remove our ability to report on particular claims in our inquiry. In this section, we discuss the effect of these settlements in general. We then discuss particular jurisdictional issues which arise in respect of raupatu claims.

1.4.1 Settlement legislation affecting the Tribunal's jurisdiction

Schedule 3 to the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 lists sections in settlement legislation prohibiting the Tribunal from further investigating those settled historical claims. Several of those pieces of legislation have the potential to affect this inquiry's scrutiny of issues:

- ▶ Section 9 of the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995 removed the Tribunal's jurisdiction to inquire into most Waikato raupatu claims. Some claims were exempted, including claims to the Waikato River, though the river claims were later settled by the Waikato-Tainui Raupatu Claims (Waikato River) Settlement Act 2010.
- ▶ The Ngāti Tama Claims Settlement Act 2003 settled the raupatu claims of Ngāti Tama. No raupatu claims were made in this inquiry by Ngāti Tama or affiliated groups.
- ▶ Section 15(8) of the Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014 removed the Tribunal's jurisdiction to inquire into or to make recommendations or findings on settled Raukawa claims. Raukawa participated in the initial stages of this inquiry, with the Ngāti Raukawa Claim (Wai 443) serving as an 'umbrella' for 17 claims.
- ▶ Clause 15(6) of the Ngāti Tūwharetoa Claims Settlement Bill preserves the Tribunal's jurisdiction to inquire into, or make findings or recommendations in respect of, Ngāti Tūwharetoa claims insofar as they relate to the steps that are necessary for the Tribunal to complete the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry. At the time of writing, the Bill has passed its second reading having been reported on by the Māori Affairs Select Committee, which did not comment on clause 15(6) and the Tribunal's jurisdiction. It is now before the Committee of the whole House. It is likely that once the Bill is enacted, it will preserve the Tribunal's jurisdiction, though the Bill is still subject to change. There is an argument that the Tribunal is technically unable to report for Ngāti Tūwharetoa due to the restrictions imposed on its jurisdiction under section 6(6) of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, which prevents it from examining a bill before Parliament. However, this Tribunal considers that section 6(6) of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 should be interpreted narrowly, and while the provision prevents the Tribunal from examining a bill, it does not preclude us from reporting on the claims before us. In determining whether section 6(6) applies, the Tribunal notes that reporting on the claims before it in this inquiry does not require an examination of the Bill itself. The claims before us are not about the adequacy of the settlement process and the resulting Bill, but about the Crown's historic breaches. In issuing this report, the Tribunal is not seeking to interfere with the powers of Parliament to enact legislation, nor is it attempting to examine and comment on the Bill.

1.4.2 Jurisdiction to hear raupatu claims

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori are the last major claimant group to have their raupatu claims heard by the Tribunal. Most of the iwi and hapū affected by the Waikato and Taranaki wars have settled their Treaty claims through various Acts of Parliament, beginning with the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995.<sup>40</sup> The effect of these settlement Acts determines the extent to which this Tribunal can inquire into and report on particular claims.

By and large, most of the claimant groups in our inquiry that brought raupatu claims were unaffected by these Acts. However, by the end of our hearings, questions remained over whether the Tribunal had jurisdiction in respect of three claimant groups bringing raupatu claims: Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura, who were listed as 'hapū of Waikato' in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act; and Ngāti Wehi Wehi, who the Crown said were caught by the Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014.<sup>41</sup>

Several other 'hapū' listed in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act also brought claims in this inquiry. These included Ngāti Māhanga, Ngāti Tamainupō, Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Te Wehi and Tainui Hapū o Tainui Waka. However, none of them pursued raupatu claims. Ngāti Tahinga did set out to pursue a raupatu claim but by the time of closing submissions had withdrawn it.

Ngāti Hikairo had similarly indicated they were pursuing raupatu claims.<sup>42</sup> However, by the time of closing submissions, they had elected not to pursue those claims and sought neither findings nor recommendations from the Tribunal in that regard.<sup>43</sup> The Crown accepted that this approach was possible by reason of section 7(1A) of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, though it did not necessarily accept that 40. We use the general term 'Waikato' to refer to the iwi or confederation of iwi and hapū that settled with the Crown under the 1995 and 2010 settlements. The term is for present purposes synonymous with 'Waikato-Tainui'.

---

41. Ngāti Ngutu are affected in a similar way as Ngāti Paretekawa as they are also named in the 1995 Act, however the Crown did not separately identify their claims for consideration. Accordingly, our views on Ngāti Paretekawa also apply to Ngāti Ngutu.

42. The Te Rohe Pōtae Land Alienation Claim (Wai 1113) and the Ngāti Hikairo Lands and War (Thorne) Claim (Wai 2351).

43. Submission 3.4.226, p 17.

Ngāti Hikairo could avoid the jurisdictional bar in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act.<sup>44</sup>

Ngāti Kauwhata – who are connected to Waikato and Raukawa and are closely related to Ngāti Wehi Wehi – also brought raupatu claims, but the Crown did not argue that settlement legislation prevented them from bringing such claims.

The following sections focus on whether the Tribunal has jurisdiction to inquire into the claims of Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Apakura, and Ngāti Wehi Wehi in light of the provisions in the 1995, 2010, and 2014 Acts. We look first at the jurisdictional test that was set at the beginning of the inquiry, then we analyse the relevant evidence and submissions of each group.

1.4.2.1 *The inquiry boundary and the Waikato raupatu settlement

The question of the Tribunal's jurisdiction to hear the raupatu claims of hapū listed in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act first arose at an early stage of the inquiry, in the context of a decision on the extension of the boundaries of the inquiry district.

During the second judicial conference in April 2007, claimant counsel sought to extend the inquiry boundary north, across the Pūniu River, into the Waikato claim area. A full panel had not then been appointed, so Judge Ambler concluded that in its absence he did not have jurisdiction to make a decision on what claims had or had not been settled by the Waikato raupatu settlement.<sup>45</sup> However, he noted that the boundary served to define 'which claims will be heard by this Tribunal and (to a large degree) what evidence will be relevant'.<sup>46</sup>

All parties, including the Crown, accepted that the Waikato raupatu settlement did not prevent Ngāti Maniapoto from bringing raupatu and non-raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area. But two questions remained: whether hapū defined as 'Waikato' could bring non-raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area and whether hapū defined as 'Waikato' by the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995 could bring raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area based on a separate ancestral identity. The answer to the first question was that the hapū could bring non-raupatu claims; the answer to the second question was to be determined by the Tribunal at a later stage.<sup>47</sup> In his decision on these matters, Judge Ambler noted:

the Crown has conceded that 'Ngati Maniapoto' can bring non-Raupatu and Raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area. That, in my view, is the deciding point as far as boundaries are concerned. It will be for the Tribunal to then determine whether any of such hapū are otherwise expressly barred from bringing Raupatu claims by reason of being 'Waikato' for the purposes of the Act.<sup>48</sup>

---

44. Submission 3.4.313, p 21.

45. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 3–4.

46. Memorandum 2.5.21, p 4.

47. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 8–9, 15.

48. Memorandum 2.5.21, p 15.

The final inquiry boundary was set out in the direction of 22 January 2010. The boundary was extended to include the whole of Whāingaroa Harbour and brought the the raupatu claims of Ngāti Maniapoto and affiliated hapū (including Ngāti Raukawa), as well as Ngāti Kauwhata in relation to Rangiaowhia, within the Waikato claim area.<sup>49</sup>

In a further direction on 15 November 2010, Judge Ambler stated that the outstanding jurisdictional issue was:

Whether the Tribunal can inquire into the ‘raupatu’ claims within the ‘Waikato claim area’ of certain hapū listed within the definition of ‘Waikato’ in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995, but on the basis of other, non-‘Waikato’, affiliations.<sup>50</sup>

The judge directed the Crown to identify for the Tribunal and claimants which claims it said were barred from inquiry by the Tribunal.<sup>51</sup> Rather than provide a list of claims, the Crown retreated from its earlier position, advising:

The Crown accepts that raupatu claims within the Waikato claim area of those hapū listed under the 1995 Act, can be inquired into by the Tribunal on the basis of another (non-Waikato) tribal affiliation. To put this another way, the fact that those hapū are constituents of Waikato-Tainui for the purposes of the 1995 Waikato-Tainui raupatu settlement, does not deny their members the right to assert their whakapapa affiliations to iwi other than Waikato-Tainui.<sup>52</sup>

Thus, the Crown accepted that raupatu claims on behalf of hapū listed in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act could be brought on the basis of a non-Waikato affiliation. In subsequent submissions, the Crown expressed its position this way:

Accordingly, the Crown submits that claimants in the Rohe Pōtae district inquiry who come within the definition of ‘Waikato’ in the 1995 Act and who are making a ‘Raupatu claim’ will have to satisfy the Tribunal on the balance of probabilities that they are properly making that claim on the basis of some other (non-Waikato) affiliation. To put it colloquially, they will have to present satisfactory evidence that they can and do wear another tribal hat (other than a Waikato hat) and that it is appropriate for them to do so.<sup>53</sup>

---

49. Memorandum 2.5.53, p 3.

50. Memorandum 2.5.84, p 4.

51. Memorandum 2.5.84, p 4.

52. Submission 3.1.333, pp 1–2.

53. Memorandum 3.1.527, p 3.

The Crown and claimants therefore agreed on the jurisdictional test for whether claims on behalf of hapū listed in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995 could be inquired into by this Tribunal.

1.4.2.2 The jurisdictional test

The Tribunal's jurisdictional test was subsequently set out in Judge Ambler's September 2012 decision on the inquiry's scope:

It is common ground that in respect of the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995, where claimants who come within the definition of 'Waikato', as defined in section 7 of the Act are making a 'raupatu claim', the Tribunal may only inquire into such claims where the claimants can establish that they are making a claim on the basis of some other non-Waikato affiliation.

Similarly, in respect of the Waikato-Tainui Raupatu Claims (Waikato River) Settlement Act 2010, where claimants who come within the definition of 'Waikato-Tainui', as defined in section 6 of the Act, and are bringing a 'raupatu claim', the Tribunal may only inquire into such claims where the claimants can establish that they are making a claim on the basis of some other non-Waikato-Tainui affiliation.<sup>54</sup>

The question of the ability of Ngāti Wehi Wehi to pursue raupatu claims in light of the Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014 was not actively contested by the Crown until closing submissions were filed. For this reason, Ngāti Wehi Wehi's ability to bring claims was not discussed by the parties at the time Judge Ambler set the jurisdictional test in 2012.

In closing submissions, the Crown referred to the relevant provisions of the 1995 and 2010 Acts, and adopted the jurisdictional test referred to above. However, the Crown did not accept that satisfying the jurisdictional test meant that the claimants can obtain 'multiple' Treaty settlements on the basis of different tribal affiliations. In the Crown's submission, hapū whose raupatu claims were settled by the 1995 and 2010 Acts could not seek additional redress.<sup>55</sup>

In its closing submissions, the Crown identified a number of 'further factors' against which it said the Tribunal should assess raupatu claims made by hapū listed in the 1995 and 2010 Acts.<sup>56</sup> The factors were restated as follows:

- ▶ Are the claimants' raupatu claims separate and distinct from those settled through the Waikato settlements (which might be demonstrated, for example, by evidence that the group is not a beneficiary of the settlements)?
- ▶ Does the traditional area of interest of the claimant group/hapū, or part of that area, fall outside the Waikato confiscation area?
- ▶ Can the claimant group/hapū assert customary interests within the Waikato confiscation area on the basis of distinct non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui whakapapa?

---

54. Memorandum 2.5.132, p 2.

55. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 23–28.

56. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 30–31.

- ▶ Is the group functioning as such, ‘on the ground’ and on the basis of its non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui affiliation?
- ▶ What marae does the group affiliate to?
- ▶ Are these the same marae as represented by the Waikato-Tainui Te Kauhanganui or any other post-settlement governance entity responsible for administering redress provided through the 1995 or 2009 raupatu settlements?
- ▶ Are they considered by others, including Waikato-Tainui, to be part of Waikato-Tainui?<sup>57</sup>

The Crown clarified, however, that these factors did not add a ‘gloss’ to the jurisdictional test; rather, they related to assessing whether a claim was ‘well-founded’ and whether the Tribunal should make recommendations.<sup>58</sup>

Consequently, we do not seek to revisit the 2012 test set by Judge Ambler, which in our view stands. We therefore apply the test that was set in respect of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura, and we apply the same test in respect of Ngāti Wehi Wehi (in their case, the question being whether they can establish a non-Raukawa affiliation).

1.4.2.3 Threshold for establishing non-Waikato affiliation

Before looking at the evidence and the submissions of the three groups in question, we need to address the question raised by the Crown about what is needed for the claimants to establish a non-Waikato affiliation. The Crown suggests that the legal burden to establish jurisdiction is a civil one – the claimants must prove ‘on the balance of probabilities’ that they have a non-Waikato affiliation and they must present satisfactory evidence that the claim comes within the Tribunal’s jurisdiction and is not barred.<sup>59</sup> That is, the claimants must have a distinct and separate non-Waikato raupatu claim on the basis of a non-Waikato affiliation.<sup>60</sup>

Generally speaking, the Waitangi Tribunal – in the context of considering the merits of a claim – does not require any of the parties to prove their case to the conventional civil standard. Rather, the Tribunal must have regard to the totality of the evidence before it and make a decision. It is then appropriate to do so on the balance of probabilities.<sup>61</sup>

In this context, however, we are asked to establish whether we have jurisdiction to inquire into specific claims. The Crown asked us to place the onus on the claimants to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that they have a non-Waikato affiliation in order to exempt their claims from settlement. This, in our view, places the bar too high. We are guided by the principle that the Tribunal’s jurisdiction to hear claims cannot be removed by general or ambiguous legislation. In this case,

---

57. Submission 3.4.313, pp 20–21.

58. Submission 3.4.313, pp 19–20.

59. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 30.

60. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 30.

61. Waitangi Tribunal, The Turangi Township Remedies Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1998), pp 4–6.

all parties have accepted that the Acts in question do not unambiguously remove the Tribunal's jurisdiction in respect of the three groups.

In its further closing submissions, the Crown submitted that it understood the Tribunal's use of 'affiliation' to mean whakapapa. On this understanding, the test would be whether the claimants could establish a raupatu claim on the basis of some non-Waikato whakapapa.<sup>62</sup> We agree that whakapapa is a key determinant of tribal affiliation. But whakapapa also encompasses important historical and cultural factors. The matter of tribal affiliation needs to be understood on a case-by-case basis in terms of all the available evidence.

Therefore, in determining whether the groups in question have established that they affiliate to groups other than those that have settled their raupatu claims, we looked for evidence that they have an affiliation that is demonstrated by whakapapa and reinforced by historical and cultural contexts.

1.4.2.4 Our approach

In light of this, we set out the evidence presented by each of the groups and present our conclusions first on whether Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura have demonstrated a non-Waikato affiliation and then whether Ngāti Wehi Wehi have demonstrated a non-Raukawa affiliation.

1.4.3 Ngāti Paretekawa

Two claimant groups brought raupatu claims on behalf of Ngāti Paretekawa. First were the claims brought by Harold Maniapoto and others (Wai 2014 and Wai 2068). These claimants belong to a branch of Ngāti Paretekawa, being Ngā Uri o Peehi Tukōrehu. The claim relates to the territory around the Pūniu River, extending both north and south of the confiscation line. The claim is also closely related to that brought by Harold Maniapoto and others on behalf of Ngā Uri o te Whakataute (Wai 1593), being a whānau within Ngāti Paretekawa. Secondly was the claim by Robert Te Huia and others on behalf of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Paea (Wai 440), the specific section of Ngāti Paretekawa being Ngāti Paretekawa ki Napinapi.

The position of the Ngāti Paretekawa claimants was that they brought their claims to the Tribunal on the basis of their Ngāti Maniapoto whakapapa, because Ngāti Maniapoto's raupatu grievances had been neither acknowledged nor settled by the Crown.

Harold Maniapoto said Ngāti Paretekawa is a hapū of the Te Kanawa section of Ngāti Maniapoto. Paretekawa was the hapū of Pēhi Tukōrehu, who during the early 1800s established his people on the ancestral lands of his tūpuna Te Momo o Irawaru and Paretekawa in Mangatoatoa Pā on the Pūniu River, and nearby on Kakepuku maunga and around the Mangapiko Stream. Mr Maniapoto, a direct descendant of Tukōrehu, told the Tribunal 'Tukōrehu's mana was "mana

---

62. Submission 3.4.313, p 20.

rangatira”, chieftainship, his claim to the land was through [m]ana to hold the land and through the tupuna Motai (Father of Unu) and Te Kanawa.<sup>63</sup>

Mr Maniapoto and other Ngāti Paretekawa claimants also described Paretekawa connections with Waikato. In the early 1800s, Tukōrehu established an aukati at his pā at Mangatoatoa on the Pūniu River, and ‘he enforced it against all transgressors, all tribal groups seeking passage southward into Maniapoto and likewise the other way’.<sup>64</sup> In order to achieve this, he married his daughter Ngawaiata to Te Wherowhero and settled his son-in-law, with his people, at Kaipaka and Taurangatahi Pā, and on the Moeāwhā lands between Otāwhao and the Pūniu River. A second daughter, Ngāwaero, also later married the Waikato leader. Thus, ‘Waikato had permanent occupation in the district through the action of Tukōrehu in placing them there, they had no real claim beyond that’.<sup>65</sup>

While the death of Tukōrehu in the mid-1830s may have lessened the influence of Maniapoto in the district for a time, by the late 1850s a new generation of Ngāti Paretekawa leaders were asserting themselves, including Te Winitana Tupotahi, Raureti Paiaka, Te Kohika and the prominent Ngāti Maniapoto leader Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>66</sup>

Mr Maniapoto explained the status of Ngāti Paretekawa as a constituent hapū of the Waikato raupatu settlement. He described Ngāti Paretekawa’s inclusion in the settlement legislation as a consequence of Ngāti Maniapoto’s consistent struggle to have their raupatu grievances properly acknowledged by the Crown. In 1946, when the Tainui Māori Trust Board was established to administer the settlement reached as a result of the Sim commission’s inquiry, Ngāti Paretekawa were not originally included. After the board first met, Ngāti Paretekawa sent a delegation along with Raukawa ki Panehakua ‘to remind them that part of the area that was being settled in that particular settlement had Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Raukawa interests and lands on it’. It was then that they gained representation on the board. We note that Ngāti Paretekawa are also represented on the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board and that Mangatoatoa Marae is one of that board’s marae.<sup>67</sup>

When negotiations commenced prior to the eventual 1995 Waikato raupatu settlement, Mr Maniapoto said there were ‘close liaisons’ between Te Kotahi Mahuta for Waikato, Rongo Wetere for Maniapoto, and Wally Papa for Raukawa:

So we have these three trust boards sitting together talking about a settlement for Tainui. Now the Tainui they talked about was the waka. The Tainui that the Crown

---

63. Document K35 (Maniapoto), p 4; see also transcript 4.1.10, pp 327, 411–413 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku Campus, 9 April 2013).

64. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 280–281 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 6 November 2012).

65. Document K35 (Maniapoto), pp 4–6; see also transcript 4.1.1, pp 39–44 (Harold Maniapoto, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

66. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 411–412, 667 (Maniapoto).

67. Transcript 4.1.10 (Maniapoto), pp 674–675; see also doc A2 (Meredith).

saw was Waikato – quite, quite different. And so the settlement that they settled was for the interests of Waikato and in Waikato’s interests.<sup>68</sup>

Mr Maniapoto acknowledged that Waikato did what they had to do to reach a settlement, and that they could not settle on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto. However, he said Rongo Wetera, the chair of the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board at the time, was ‘incensed with them having to be removed from that circle of negotiation.’<sup>69</sup>

Once again, Ngāti Paretekawa were included in what was essentially a Waikato settlement. That the Crown’s intention was to limit the settlement to Waikato must have been made clear to all during the debate on the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Bill in 1995, when the Minister in Charge of Treaty of Waitangi Negotiations, Douglas Graham, told the House: ‘The real rebels, Ngati Maniapoto, lost nothing.’<sup>70</sup>

Mr Maniapoto said the fact that Ngāti Paretekawa consider themselves to be Ngāti Maniapoto has made it difficult to be part of the Waikato settlement: ‘it’s not a nice feeling to go – knowing that you don’t have that entitlement because of your whakapapa.’<sup>71</sup> In essence, Mr Maniapoto told the Tribunal: ‘It is the Ngāti Maniapoto part that has not been addressed. It’s the Ngāti Maniapoto part that we want to address at this hearing.’<sup>72</sup>

Bringing raupatu issues before this Tribunal, Mr Maniapoto acknowledged, had not been an easy decision. Maintaining the integrity of the Waikato settlement, and good relations with Waikato, had been an important consideration:

When we first raised this issue with the Tribunal it was a quandary for us as Ngāti Paretekawa, and once [Crown counsel] Donna Llewellyn issued her submissions, the first thing I did was went and saw Waikato, and I said to Waikato, ‘We are now looking at an opportunity of readdressing raupatu in the Waikato region. I’m aware that we have settled – part of our hapū have settled under Waikato Raupatu Settlement. What happens if we get to the end of ours and we have another settlement for the same region?’ Their response to me was this, ‘Harold that is our koha to Ngāti Maniapoto.’<sup>73</sup>

Crown counsel asked Mr Maniapoto what Ngāti Paretekawa wants that the 1995 settlement does not provide. In response, he said:

It does not re-establish our tūrangawaewae and our ancestral lands. It does not return our customary interests back to the hapū who lost it. It returned it instead to another iwi. It does not provide the basis, the foundation from which Ngāti Paretekawa can develop its past, its present and its future. It does not provide for Ngāti

---

68. Transcript 4.1.10, p 680 (Maniapoto).

69. Transcript 4.1.10, p 681 (Maniapoto).

70. Douglas Graham, 19 October 1995, NZPD, vol 551, p 9922.

71. Transcript 4.1.10, p 683 (Maniapoto).

72. Transcript 4.1.10, p 680 (Maniapoto).

73. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 686–687 (Maniapoto).

Paretekawa as a hapū anything whatsoever except acknowledgement through a third-party system of marae. Virtually it doesn't do anything for Ngāti Paretekawa as a hapū. If it did we would be well ensconced north of Pūniu River now, and here I am arguing about Manga's single acre that he still hasn't even got title to. We don't have any customary rights north of the Pūniu River. We have no base on which to build our infrastructure or structure for the future of our generations to come. We haven't even got a base in which to secure the generations of the past on now, and I'll give you a good example of this. That man back there, his name is Te Winitana Tūpotahi. When he died in 1905 they had a big hui for him, and my mum's uncle out of his generosity gave up his interests at Te Rewatu so that he could be buried there. Such is the pōhara of my people. They don't even have a place to be buried when they die. If the '95 settlement was what is purported to have been, then we would never ever be in that position again, but we're still there.<sup>74</sup>

The primary closing submission by counsel for the two claimant groups maintained that Ngāti Paretekawa had presented clear evidence of the hapū's affiliation to Ngāti Maniapoto and had therefore satisfied the jurisdictional test that allows this Tribunal to inquire into and report on their claims.<sup>75</sup> Counsel emphasised that Ngāti Paretekawa's claims before this Tribunal 'lie within the rubric of their Maniapoto heritage and whakapapa' and that the 1995 Act did not extinguish Ngāti Maniapoto's claims. Furthermore, according to Ngāti Apa ki Te Waipounamu Trust v The Queen,<sup>76</sup> the right to bring a claim in accordance with the law cannot be extinguished except by clear and precise statutory language. Counsel further submitted that the definition of 'Waikato' in section 7 excludes those persons who are not descendants of Waikato, such as Ngāti Maniapoto. Counsel also said the fact that a hapū has more than one iwi affiliation should not deprive that hapū of the benefits from the separate settlements of the iwi to which it affiliates.

We agree that there is substantial evidence of Ngāti Paretekawa's whakapapa links to Ngāti Maniapoto. Therefore, we conclude that Ngāti Paretekawa have established, for the purpose of this inquiry, that they have raupatu claims that derive from their affiliation to Ngāti Maniapoto and that, as a result, we are able to inquire into those claims.

1.4.4 Ngāti Apakura

Two claimant groups brought raupatu claims on behalf of Ngāti Apakura (Wai 1469 and Wai 2291). Counsel notes that Ngāti Apakura can be viewed as a hapū of Waikato, a hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto and an iwi in their own right, with between five and 17 hapū. The disruption and complication of Ngāti Apakura's identity due to the positioning of the confiscation boundary means that they do not fit easily within the Crown's Treaty settlement policies. Dr Robert Joseph explained:

---

74. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 678–679 (Maniapoto).

75. Submission 3.4.208, p 6.

76. Ngāti Apa ki te Waipounamu Trust v The Queen [2000] 2 NZLR 659 (CA).

that raupatu boundary is an arbitrary line that appeared to cut right through Ngāti Apakura, right through their whenua, right through their identity as a group and so they're on both sides and other sides of that raupatu boundary. And so in coming back to negotiating, some Ngāti Apakura had settled. Branches of Ngāti Apakura but not all of Ngāti Apakura had settled their grievances and including the grievances that occurred at Rangiaowhia.<sup>77</sup>

For the purposes of the inquiry, Ngāti Apakura see themselves as a distinct group, 'Ngāti Apakura te iwi', that has affiliations other than solely to Waikato, and on these grounds they argued their raupatu claims have not been settled by the 1995 and 2010 Acts.<sup>78</sup>

The Crown disputes Ngāti Apakura's ability to bring raupatu claims on the grounds that Ngāti Apakura te iwi cannot be distinguished from the Ngāti Apakura mentioned in the 1995 and 2010 settlements and that they have not established, 'on the balance of probabilities', that they have a separate non-Waikato affiliation. The Crown submitted that 'it would be instructive to consider whether the claimants (as Ngāti Apakura te iwi) would be excluded as beneficiaries of the 1995 and 2009 [Waikato raupatu] settlements.'<sup>79</sup> The Crown discussed a 1947 inquiry by the Native Land Court into a petition from members of Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Puhiaue. Representing the petitioners, Pei Te Hurinui Jones told the Court that 'no other tribe in the Waikato, or no other section of the Waikato tribe, suffered so severely [from the raupatu] as these people.'<sup>80</sup> The Crown argued that this statement 'tends to confirm' that Apakura were part of 'a wider Tainui-Waikato confederation.'<sup>81</sup> In relation to the matter of whakapapa, the Crown maintained that customary evidence shows that Ngāti Apakura are essentially a people largely descended from the Tainui waka, which places them within the Waikato confederation (at least to the extent their traditional area is located within the Waikato region). While the evidence is that the eponymous ancestor, Apakura, was herself of another iwi (descending from Te Arawa waka), her marriage to a descendent of Hoturoa, captain of the Tainui waka, would constitute Ngāti Apakura a member of the broader Waikato confederation.<sup>82</sup>

Ngāti Apakura supplied extensive testimony as to their distinct whakapapa lines. The submissions of Ngāti Apakura focused mainly on how they maintain an identity in their own right, but they also acknowledged that they can connect to Ngāti Maniapoto, Waikato, and Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>83</sup> Counsel for the claimants maintained that the Crown's submission that Ngāti Apakura are a people largely descended

---

77. Transcript 4.1.10, p 273 (Robert Joseph, 8 April 2013).

78. Submission 3.3.269, pp 3, 5-7.

79. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 32.

80. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 33-34.

81. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 33.

82. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 33.

83. Submission 3.4.405, p 4.

from the Tainui waka and are therefore members of the Waikato confederation is too broad. Taken to its logical conclusion, such an assertion would in fact mean that Ngāti Maniapoto is also of the Waikato confederation. Fundamentally, claimant counsel said, the Waikato raupatu settlement accounted only for ‘the component of Apakura that fled north to seek refuge with their Waikato kin, following the war.’<sup>84</sup> However, in counsel’s submission, Ngāti Apakura, ‘in and of their own whakapapa, identity and constituent hapū’, are not included in that settlement.<sup>85</sup>

Countering Ngāti Apakura’s claim, the Crown referred to Waikato-Tainui information which it said showed that six marae listed among those that authorised the 1995 settlement were Ngāti Apakura marae situated in the north of Te Rohe Pōtae district: Mōkai Kāinga, Hiona, Pūrekireki, Te Kōpua, Kahotea, and Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho. While other Apakura marae were mentioned by claimants, such as Tanehopuawai and Mangarama, the Crown disputed Ngāti Apakura’s claim on the basis that ‘they have not shown how the Apakura people affiliating to those marae have raupatu claims separate and distinct from the Apakura marae included in the 1995 and 2009 Waikato-Tainui settlements.’<sup>86</sup>

In response, Ngāti Apakura argued that they have longstanding affiliations with marae in Te Rohe Pōtae, exemplified by the Maniapoto Māori Trust Board list, which records Ngāti Apakura as being affiliated with eight marae. Counsel for the claimants listed 10 marae with which Ngāti Apakura affiliate that were included in the Te Kawau Mārō draft Ngāti Maniapoto mandate strategy, and pointed out that only three of them were also listed in the Waikato-Tainui Te Kauhanganui trust deed.<sup>87</sup> Counsel argued that Ngāti Apakura have interests both within and outside the Waikato claim area and that they can claim interests within the claim area on the basis of a non-Waikato affiliation. This was because, firstly, Apakura identity was distinct from Waikato and, secondly, because the boundary of the Waikato confiscation area was arbitrary and ‘cut right through’ both that identity and their lands. Furthermore, counsel argued that Ngāti Apakura does function on the basis of that separate affiliation, as is exemplified by their involvement in Ngā Iwi Topu o Waipā, in resource consent issues in the Te Awamutu area, and through the Apakura Rūnanga Trust.<sup>88</sup>

While Ngāti Apakura maintain that they are affiliated with Ngāti Maniapoto, they interpret affiliated as ‘not necessarily entirely defined as being part of Ngāti Maniapoto.’<sup>89</sup> In this sense they state that their interests cannot be fully accommodated under a purely Ngāti Maniapoto structure. Those of Ngāti Apakura who retreated south following the confiscations and became more closely affiliated with Ngāti Maniapoto had not settled their claims. While the Crown suggests that affiliation with Ngāti Maniapoto came about as a consequence of the wars, Ngāti Apakura maintain that, ‘[a]lthough the affiliation of Apakura to these areas was

84. Submission 3.4.405, p 5.

85. Submission 3.4.405, p 5.

86. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 32–33.

87. Submission 3.4.405, pp 6–8.

88. Submission 3.4.405, p 10.

89. Transcript 4.1.22, p 745 (Tom Bennion, hearing week 15, Napinapi Marae, 5 November 2014).

certainly strengthened because of the wars, Apakura in fact already held mana whenua deep within Te Rohe Potae prior to the war.<sup>90</sup>

Counsel said that Ngāti Apakura te iwi were particularly affected by the confiscation line at the Pūniu River, which was drawn through their ancestral rohe. Ngāti Apakura claimants based their raupatu claim on the assertion that when the Crown invaded the centre of their rohe at Rangiaowhia in February 1864, they were an independent and prosperous iwi that was both affiliated to and independent of Waikato and Maniapoto. Tom Roa said that, before raupatu, ‘Ngāti Apakura were an iwi of mana; with a wealth shared by Waikato-Maniapoto’ and that ‘[t]hese iwi possessed a burgeoning economy of some substance.’<sup>91</sup> He also explained that ‘Ngāti Apakura has had the strength to be able to retain its identity, and as such is claimed by both Waikato and Maniapoto as a hapū of these respective iwi.’<sup>92</sup>

Mr Lennox recounted the efforts of his tūpuna to assert their ownership at Rangiaowhia. He told the Tribunal: ‘I would like to see the restoration of our connections to our core traditional lands and our Ngāti Apakura te iwi identity.’<sup>93</sup>

Counsel for Ngāti Apakura described the raupatu as ‘permanently severing parts of the iwi from each other and their whenua.’<sup>94</sup> Their traditional history report states:

Ngāti Apakura was also referred to as a hapū of both Waikato and Maniapoto at other times in official lists between 1840 and 2010 . . . Still, it is noted here that Apakura were a distinct iwi but due to the colonial process among other events, some Apakura whānau and hapū came to view themselves as part of the closely connected Maniapoto and Waikato iwi while others kept alive their Apakura iwi affiliations.<sup>95</sup>

The Crown submitted that ‘undue focus can be put on the use of the term “hapū” in the definition of “Waikato” in the 1995 and 2009 settlements.’ The Crown told us that it understands hapū and iwi identities are not fixed but a question of ‘time, place, and custom.’ It said:

The Crown understands the term ‘Waikato’ in the 1995 and 2009 settlements as it is commonly understood, namely as referring to those descendants of the Tainui waka who resided or reside in the Waikato region (that is, the ‘Waikato’ peoples take their name from the district to which they belong).<sup>96</sup>

It appears that Ngāti Apakura remain fragmented. Claimants from one end of the inquiry district to the other told us of their Apakura heritage. We do not doubt that similar ties exist within Waikato.

---

90. Submission 3.4.405, p 6.

91. Document H9(c) (Roa document bank), para 80.

92. Document K38 (Roa), p 7.

93. Document K22 (Lennox), p 41.

94. Submission 3.4.228, p 50.

95. Document A97 (Borell and Joseph), pp 60–61.

96. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 30.

We find it significant that descendants of Ngāti Apakura – whether they identify today as that or not – now reside throughout Te Rohe Pōtae as a direct result of the raupatu. This is reflected by the large number of Ngāti Apakura-affiliated marae across both this inquiry district and in the Waikato claim area. It is difficult to see how the Waikato raupatu settlement was intended to provide redress for all these people.

Irrespective of the way that they present their claim, Ngāti Apakura clearly have pre-war whakapapa ties to Ngāti Maniapoto, as well as closer affiliations that arose from their dispersal and adoption by Ngāti Maniapoto as a consequence of the raupatu.

For the purpose of this inquiry, then, Ngāti Apakura have established that they have raupatu claims that derive either through their affiliation to Ngāti Maniapoto, or through their existence as an iwi in their own right.

1.4.5 Ngāti Wehi Wehi

Richard Orzecki and others brought claims on behalf of Ngāti Wehi Wehi (Wai 1482). In reply to the Crown's closing submissions that Ngāti Wehi Wehi were caught by the Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014, counsel submitted that the Crown was plainly wrong, that Ngāti Wehi Wehi's raupatu claims were not based on affiliation to Raukawa, and that Ngāti Wehi Wehi had an entirely different line of descent from that of Raukawa.

Ngāti Wehi Wehi are closely connected to Ngāti Kauwhata by whakapapa and share similar customary land interests in Waikato. They sought to stand 'strongly beside' Ngāti Kauwhata 'to challenge the confiscations of their lands.' They are also 'closely affiliated' with Raukawa, but maintain an identity distinct from either.<sup>97</sup>

The Crown submitted that Ngāti Kauwhata were not prevented from bringing raupatu claims by the settlement legislation but that Ngāti Wehi Wehi were. The Crown's position in relation to Ngāti Wehi Wehi is puzzling and we reject it.

Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi are intimately related, with the eponymous ancestor Kauwhata being the father of the eponymous ancestor Wehi Wehi.<sup>98</sup> It appeared to us contradictory for the Crown to argue that Ngāti Kauwhata could bring raupatu claims but that Ngāti Wehi Wehi could not.

At hearing week 4, the Crown put to Jeremiah Jacobs that Ngāti Wehi Wehi were included as a hapū of Raukawa in the deed of settlement between the Crown and Raukawa dated 2 June 2012. Mr Jacobs was confused by the question because he was not aware of Ngāti Wehi Wehi having been included in that deed.<sup>99</sup> In fact, neither the 2012 deed of settlement nor the 2014 Act contain any reference to Ngāti Wehi Wehi or, for that matter, Ngāti Kauwhata.

By the time of the closing submissions the Crown's argument had changed. The Crown submitted that, to the extent that the raupatu claims of Ngāti Wehi Wehi were based on descent from Raukawa and affiliation to a Raukawa marae in the

---

97. Submission 3.4.154(a), pp 6–7.

98. Document A120 (McBurney), p 30.

99. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 1551–1554 (Jeremiah Jacobs, 12 April 2013).

Waikato area, those claims were settled.<sup>100</sup> However, claimant counsel pointed out in submissions in reply that Ngāti Wehi Wehi's raupatu claims were not based on affiliation to Raukawa. Counsel said the whakapapa evidence was clear that the eponymous ancestor Wehi Wehi was from a different line of descent than that of Raukawa: Raukawa descends from Tūrongo, being one of the sons of Tāwhao, whereas Kauwhata, the father of Wehi Wehi, descends from Whatihua, being a different son of Tāwhao.<sup>101</sup>

We therefore conclude that there is no legislative impediment to either Ngāti Kauwhata or Ngāti Wehi Wehi bringing raupatu claims concerning the Waikato wars. Nevertheless, whether either of those iwi or hapū has 'well founded' claims is a matter to which we will return in chapter 6.

1.5 TE KŌRERO A RAWIRI

To conclude this introductory chapter, it is appropriate to set out some of the views of the late presiding officer Judge David Ambler on the key themes relevant to the Te Rohe Pōtae District Inquiry.

For Judge Ambler, the principal theme of the inquiry was the struggle by Māori to retain and exercise authority using new institutions in response to the expansion of Crown authority and European settlement in the district. As is discussed in chapter 8, rangatira such as Rewi Maniapoto and Wahanui Huatare referred to the authority that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori asserted as 'mana whakahaere', or full control and power over their lands and their people. Judge Ambler saw the broader tension between Māori striving to maintain their mana whakahaere and the Crown's failure to provide for that mana whakahaere as the central story of this inquiry.

In a thesis statement prepared for initial report writing purposes, Judge Ambler summarised his understanding of the early history of Te Rohe Pōtae:

The pre-Treaty period, when traders and missionaries first came to the district, was a time of relatively benign relations between Māori and Pākehā. In the years following the Treaty, the Pākehā presence in the district increased, but was still limited. In the early 1850s, the Crown began acquiring land, mainly in the areas around Mōkau and the Whāingaroa and Aotea Harbours. From the late 1850s through to the mid-1860s, tensions increased over land transactions and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori support for the Kingitanga, resulting in the well-documented Waikato and Taranaki wars and the confiscation of large parts of those districts. Ngāti Maniapoto were at the centre of this conflict and were significantly affected by confiscation in both districts, as well as by the long-term effects of the influx of refugees primarily from the Waikato. The subsequent period of the aukati that stretched to the mid-1880s saw relative peace and varying attempts by the Crown and Māori to negotiate an ongoing relationship.

The 1880s marked a persistent Crown policy of opening up Te Rohe Pōtae. This resulted in high-level negotiations giving rise to a series of agreements that have since

---

100. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 37.

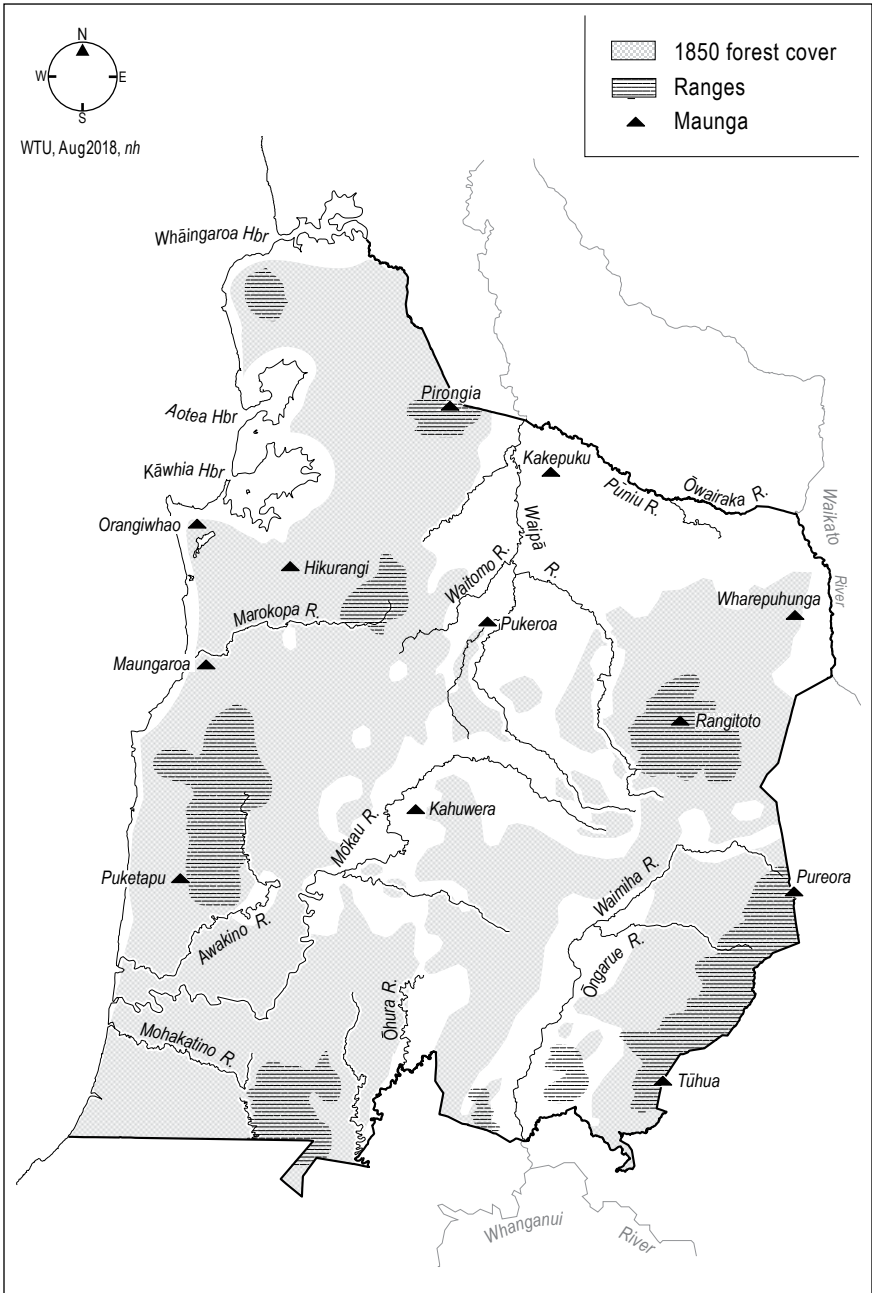

101. Submission 3.4.324, pp 2–4.

come to be known by Māori as Te Ōhākī Tapu. These negotiations are of great historical and constitutional significance. But what Te Rohe Pōtae Māori sought reflected no more than what the Treaty contemplated. Clearly the Crown missed the critical opportunity to provide for new Māori institutions during and following the negotiations in the mid-1880s, and that failure goes to the heart of the prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the decades following the lifting of the aukati.

In the chapters that follow, we address the arguments of the claimants and the Crown in respect of these and other events, in order to assess whether the Crown breached the principles of the Treaty and caused prejudice to Māori in the inquiry district.

PART I

Map 2.1: Significant natural features of the inquiry district

CHAPTER 2

HE KURA WHENUA, HE KURA TANGATA: THE TRIBAL LANDSCAPE

Mana whenua, mana tangata, ki te kore he whenua o te tangata, kua kore te mana taihoa koa.<sup>1</sup>

2.1 INTRODUCTION

This report is concerned with relationships between the Māori people of Te Rohe Pōtae and the Crown from the signing of the Treaty in 1840 to the present. To understand this relationship, it is necessary to understand the rangatira who signed the Treaty and the people they represented in the context of Te Ao Māori. Who were they, how did they live, and how did they manage relationships with each other and with the world around them? By answering these questions we can see what the Treaty might have meant to them, and what they might have expected of their relationship with the Crown.

Māori had lived in this district for many hundreds of years before Europeans arrived.<sup>2</sup> Over many generations, the people of the Tainui waka had explored, named, settled, cultivated, and defended lands from Tāmaki in the north to the upper Whanganui and Poutama regions in the south. In the south and the east, they met the people descended from the Tokomaru, Aotea, and Te Arawa waka. Tribal traditions refer to ariki and rangatira who embodied and protected the mana of their people, and whose lives were punctuated by epic journeys, great battles, intense rivalries, famous marriages, and unbreakable familial bonds.

Pre-colonial Māori in general, and this district's people in particular, had their own distinct understandings of the universe and how it was made; their own histories and identities; their own systems of social organisation, law, and political authority; their own values and systems for determining right and wrong; their own methods of determining rights and interests in land and other resources; their own ways of understanding and managing relationships with the environment; and their own methods for managing interpersonal and inter-group relationships.

---

1. The words of claimant Tom Roa at the first Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui: 'If there is no land there is no mana': transcript 4.1.1, p 31.

2. Tainui probably landed at Kāwhia sometime during the mid- to late 1200s: Atholl Anderson, Judith Binney, and Aroha Harris: Tangata Whenua: An Illustrated History (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books, 2015), pp 27–29, 55, 58, 63–66.

At a fundamental level, they saw their lives as being shaped by spiritual as well as physical and human forces. They understood their world through a lens of whanaungatanga, or kinship, through which all people and things were connected – past and present, animate and inanimate, living and dead. All rights, interests, laws, duties, and values, and all authority to lead or act, derived from the realm of ancestor-gods and ultimately from Te Korekore, the original nothingness from which all life and matter emerged. All relationships – human and environmental – were mediated through this spiritual realm.

2.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

This chapter is concerned with understanding the district's people. It addresses questions of history and identity, law and values, rights and interests, social and political organisation, economic and environmental management, leadership, and relationships both within and between groups. Each of these matters is fundamental to the Treaty promise that Māori would retain tino rangatiratanga (full chieftainship or full authority) in respect of their lands, resources, homes, and other treasures.

It is important to see these matters in the context of their time. All societies change: technologies develop; economic activities change; social and political structures evolve; groups come and go. This chapter first sets out to explain the dynamic world, Te Ao Māori, as it was understood and engaged with by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. It goes on to take a broad narrative approach to our topic, from the Tainui making landfall, up to the nineteenth century.

This chapter then describes the district's rich and complex history, involving multiple lines of descent, and many waves of settlement through periods of conflict and realignment, as well as times of peace. It concludes with a description of the tribal landscape as it was at 1840, with a particular focus on border territories and hapū and rangatira of the region. The story here concerns all people of this district, and all claimant groups. But, inevitably, it focuses most on the descendants of Maniapoto, who came to occupy almost all lands of this district and have interests in some of the lands beyond. It therefore omits much. While this chapter aims to avoid unnecessary controversy, it is inevitable that the details of some traditions will be contested.

2.1.2 Sources

The Tribunal received a large number of oral testimonies and other tangata whenua evidence. Together these have played an important role in shaping this chapter.

Between February and June 2010, prior to hearings commencing, the Tribunal convened Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho o te Rohe Pōtae hui on six marae. The purpose of these hui was to provide a forum in which kaumātua could present their oral traditions in a manner that was sympathetic to the tikanga of those traditions. It also allowed the panel to engage with claimants far earlier in the inquiry process than would otherwise have been the case, and reduced the need for some claimants to produce lengthy written briefs. The Tribunal continued to hear this kind of evidence throughout subsequent hearings.

This chapter also draws on more than 20 oral and traditional history reports produced by iwi and hapū from the district. These reports set out and describe, amongst other things, kinship relationships, tribal groupings, and tūpuna and their deeds regarding specific tribal territories.

A number of secondary texts, including previous Tribunal reports, have also been drawn on in this chapter. These texts added to and helped to contextualise much of the history described in the above sources.

2.2 TE AO MĀORI

Te Rohe Pōtae was one part of Aotearoa in which a dynamic society developed with social, political, and economic systems that facilitated and included the arts, science and theory, knowledge, theology and religion, cosmology, mobility, political alliances (and tensions), history, labour, architecture, resource management and distribution, and more. This society had as its originating point particular traditions, which in themselves were forms of knowledge representing this dynamic world.

Tainui traditions refer to Te Korekore, an absolute stillness or nothingness, which existed before time.<sup>3</sup> All of creation, natural and supernatural, is said to have emerged from that void, powered by a supreme energy and consciousness known as Io – the endless, unchanging, parent and origin of all knowledge and all things, often referred to as Io-matua-kore, the parentless one.<sup>4</sup>

From that first consciousness emerged Papa-tū-ā-nuku, the earth mother, and Ranginui, the sky father, locked together in a tight embrace from which no light could emerge.<sup>5</sup> In that cramped darkness lay their children, who conspired to separate their parents so that they might live in the light. The children were successful and became Atua, the progenitors and guides for every aspect of the natural world.<sup>6</sup>

From Rongomātāne, the first-born, came cultivated foods and peace. From Tāne-mahuta came trees, plants, birds, insects, rocks, and all other aspects of the forest. From Tangaroa's line came the oceans and aquatic life. From Tāwhirimātea came the winds. From Haumiatiketike came plants that could be gathered for

---

3. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 173, 218–219, 234–235.

4. Pepene Eketone and others, 'Ko te Kawenata o Ngāti Maniapoto me ona hapu maha', 1 January 1904 (doc s19(a) (Te Kanawa appendixes), app H, p 29, app I, p 37); transcript 4.1.5, pp 173, 213, 218–219, 234, 238; transcript 4.1.1, p 104; transcript 4.1.4, pp 2, 124–125, 130; doc M5 (Watene, Pihama, and Watene), pp 3, 5; doc A110 (The Ngāti Maniapoto researchers), pp 27–48; transcript 4.1.3, pp 41, 198–200.

5. Sean Ellison provided a different whakapapa, in which Tangaroa married Papa-tū-ā-nuku but then left her alone. Only then did Ranginui appear: transcript 4.1.3, pp 198–199.

6. Document A110, pp 27–48; Eketone and others, 'Ko te Kawenata' (doc s19(a), app H, p 29).

food. Rūaumoko returned to the earth and became the source of earthquakes, volcanoes, and seasons.<sup>7</sup>

Humanity descends from Tūmatauenga, also the god of war. But, in Tainui traditions, it was Hani (the male essence) and Puna (the female essence) who provided the spark of life, fashioning Tiki-i-āhua-mai-i-Hawaiki (Tiki-who-was-fashioned-in-Hawaiki) and Tiki-apoa from limestone clay.<sup>8</sup>

From them came Whiro, and from Whiro came the explorer Toi, and from Toi came Whatonga. More than 20 generations then passed before the Tainui landed in Aotearoa, and another 50 or so generations are said to have passed from then to the present day.<sup>9</sup>

The essential point is that the original Tainui explorers saw themselves and all other elements of creation as being descended from atua, who in turn were descended from the original consciousness Io-matua-te-kore.<sup>10</sup> Every element of creation was therefore related, and all relationships were ordered through whaka-papa, lines of genealogical progression. Every human was a representative and servant of all who had gone before – their human tūpuna, and distant ancestor-gods, back to their common source.<sup>11</sup>

2.2.1 Mana Taketake

This system of thought created a network of interwoven relationships – and a network of rights and obligations – among all people, all elements of the environment, and all ancestors. Māori society was guided by its own system of law and authority and a series of organising principles. Here we discuss tapu, mana, whanaungatanga, manaakitanga, utu, tuku, and tikanga. In doing so, we reflect claimant kōrero on aspects of these concepts specific to Te Rohe Pōtae while also detailing aspects that were and are shared across Māoridom.

2.2.1.1 Tapu

For Māori, to be tapu was to be set apart by atua for a particular purpose, and therefore to be placed off limits to other purposes. Tapu defined the roles and functions of every person, place, being, word, or thing in existence. A tree was set aside to be a tree, and could only be put to other purposes with the gods' permission. Hence, karakia (incantations) were used to seek permission for any change of use. Similarly, when a person stepped into a tapu space the change of states was immediate and so were the attributed obligations. To then leave a tapu space required a ritual act, such as sprinkling oneself with water.

7. Document A110, pp 27–48; Eketone and others, 'Ko te Kawenata' (doc s19(a), app H, p 29).

8. Document A110, pp 27–48; Eketone and others, 'Ko te Kawenata' (doc s19(a), app H, p 29).

9. Document A110, pp 27–48; Eketone and others, 'Ko te Kawenata' (doc s19(a), app H, p 29); transcript 4.1.1, p104. Gordon Lennox referred to 100+ generations from Io to the present, lasting 2,500–3,000 years: transcript 4.1.2, p134.

10. Document A110, pp 27–48.

11. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei: A Report into Claims concerning New Zealand Law and Policy Affecting Māori Culture and Identity, Te Taumata Tuatahi (Wellington: Legislation Direct), 2011, p 23.

Likewise, people and families might be set aside for particular functions or specialities – spiritual, political, or economic leadership; diplomacy and warfare; cultivation; hunting and fishing; rongoā; artistic endeavours; and so on – and would therefore inherit or acquire tapu commensurate with those roles, and would need ancestral blessing for any change.

Every person was born with tapu commensurate with his or her lines of descent and expected role in life. To be in a state of tapu was to be under a ritual obligation to behave in a manner that would not offend the atua and as such tapu could be gained or lost through events in the physical world. Tohunga, spiritual leaders, were in constant communion with the gods, seeking to maintain the purity of tapu associated with their lines of descent. Though it was a spiritual force, tapu had practical purposes. Those accorded tapu status maintained specialist knowledge and performed important functions. By setting aside parts of the environment, the use of tapu also ensured that resources were used wisely.<sup>12</sup>

2.2.1.2 Mana

Like tapu, mana was handed down from atua through lines of descent, often, though not always, to the eldest son. An example is the story of Maniapoto inheriting his father's mana over his older brother, as discussed in section 2.4.1. 'Mana' is usually translated as authority, but it is not limited to political power. It is a spiritual authority or power to act in the world as agents of atua. Just as tapu sets a person aside for particular purposes, mana is the authority and ability to fulfil those purposes.<sup>13</sup>

Throughout Māoridom, mana is generally said to be acquired in any of three ways. First, mana tūpuna is authority inherited from ancestors at birth. As the claimant Piripi Crown told us: 'Ko te kōrero mai rānō ka whānau mai te tangata me tōna ake mana, nā Io i hōmai' (When a man is born he has his own individual mana given to him by Io).<sup>14</sup> As with tapu, some inherit more than others. Traditionally, mana tūpuna was highest among those who were descended from chiefly lines.<sup>15</sup>

---

12. Document A102 (Meredith, Nankivell, and Joseph), pp 79–80; doc M5 (Watene, Pihama, and Watene), pp 3–6; Hirini Moko Mead, Tikanga Māori: Living by Māori Values, revised ed (Wellington: Huia Publishers, 2016), pp 34–35, 36–38, 43–44, 49–56; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, p 23; Māori Marsden, The Woven Universe: Selected Writings of Rev. Māori Marsden, ed Te Ahukaramū Charles Royal (Masterton: The Estate of Rev Māori Marsden, 2001), pp 5, 40, 69; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, Study Paper 9 (Wellington: New Zealand Law Commission, 2001), pp 36–38.

13. Document M5, pp 3–6; E T Durie, Custom Law (Wellington: Victoria University of Wellington Treaty of Waitangi Research Unit, 2013), pp 36–37; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 33–34, 43–44, 49–51, 55–57; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, p 23; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 32–36; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, pp 109–110.

14. Transcript 4.1.6, p 362.

15. New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, p 33.

Secondly, mana tangata is the influence or authority acquired through actions and events in the world. A person whose actions, expertise, or service enhance the well-being of their kin group will enhance his or her mana, as will a person who rights a wrong.<sup>16</sup> Thirdly, mana atua is the authority derived from direct contact with atua, as shown by tohunga and sometimes by matakite (prophets or seers).<sup>17</sup>

Each of these sources can reflect different functions or roles – mana tangata being of considerable importance to someone whose roles include leadership in warfare or economic matters, and mana atua being important to a tohunga, whose roles are concerned with ritual and spiritual matters. Mana tūpuna is typically important for all leadership roles, as will be evident from the histories later in this chapter.<sup>18</sup>

However mana was acquired, it was derived from atua and tūpuna, and could be used only to serve them and the kin groups descended from them. It was not the same as personal power. Any leader, no matter how great, could not act against communal interests or without communal consent (either implicit or explicit) and still retain his or her mana.<sup>19</sup>

Claimant Thomas Roa also spoke of ‘an authority specific to Ngati Maniapoto, known by the people of this region as mana whatu ahuru. He described how this form of mana emphasised the ability of rangatira to unite groups ‘to achieve a joint purpose’ while promoting peace and security for their people.<sup>20</sup>

Te mana whatu āhuru, Mr Roa explained, represented the strength and peace that arose from unity. Each person inherited his or her own mana, and so did each element of the environment. Greater leaders unified the mana of each individual, in ways that allowed sharing and peaceful co-existence, and so enhanced the mana of all.<sup>21</sup>

He further noted that whatu can refer to a stone that perseveres against all odds, and to the eye of a visionary or seer, and to the action of weaving together (which is an essential function of a rangatira or weaver of people). Āhuru, he said, was a term for peace, which also implied a blessing handed down through generations.<sup>22</sup>

Historian James Cowan recorded Tainui and Maniapoto traditions of ‘whatu-ahuru-manu’, which were talismanic stone emblems, also sometimes called ‘mauri kohatu’ or ‘mauri-manu’. He noted that these emblems were ‘small stones, probably 16. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 111; Durie, Custom Law, pp 36–37; Marsden, The Woven Universe, pp 4, 40, 151, 154; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 32–36.

17. New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, p 35.

18. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 109–111; Durie, Custom Law, pp 36–37; Marsden, The Woven Universe, pp 4, 40, 151, 154; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 32–36.

19. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 80–81; doc M5, pp 3–6; Waitangi Tribunal, The Muriwhenua Land Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), pp 4, 26, 28, 29; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 110–111; Durie, Custom Law, pp 36–40; Marsden, The Woven Universe, pp 40, 151; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 33, 34.

20. Document H9(c), para 14.

21. Transcript 4.1.7, p 46.

22. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 43–45.

carved, which had been charmed by the high priest in Tahiti before the departure of the Tainui.<sup>23</sup> These emblems were planted by Tainui tūpuna throughout Te Rohe Pōtae in order to 'ensure a permanent abundance of forest birds for food'.<sup>24</sup>

Ngāti Maniapoto scholar Pei Te Hurinui Jones also recorded the use of sacred, inscribed stone emblems, but he called them 'papa tatau'. Jones described how these stones were used to elevate young tohunga into the highest echelons of priesthood.<sup>25</sup> This extremely tapu ceremony was only performed at Te Ahurei, Te Papa o Rotu, and Rangiatea.<sup>26</sup>

Jones suggested that the Battle of Hingakākā, discussed in section 2.5.2.1, was linked to the alleged theft of papa tatau from the whare wānanga Te Ahurei. According to Tainui tradition, the stones had been brought to Aotearoa from Hawaiki and were thus of great cultural and spiritual significance.<sup>27</sup>

The Ngāti Maniapoto concept of mana whatu ahuru as a form of mana emphasising their particular form of authority has endured as a central tenet of Ngāti Maniapoto to this day. It appeared, for example, in the 1904 Kawenata – a Ngāti Maniapoto unification statement discussed further in chapter 3 – where it was described as a divine mana handed down through generations which unified hapū and iwi under leaders such as Rereahu, Maniapoto, and their descendants.<sup>28</sup> It was further discussed by a number of witnesses during the hearings of this inquiry.<sup>29</sup>

2.2.1.3 Whanaungatanga, manaakitanga, and utu

Closely associated with mana are three fundamental values which define how authority should be used. Whanaungatanga (kinship) emphasised the value of whakapapa, not only as a way of tracing connections between people, but as a way of understanding and ordering rights and interests. Fostering kinship connections was one of the fundamental duties of leaders in pre-colonial times.<sup>30</sup> Kevin Amohia told us how, following an internal split within Ngāti Tūwharetoa, 'many of the Tūwharetoa people came across and they actually ended up living in and around Kauriki and that particular area. They were left in peace by our people. The reason for that is, he whanaungatanga'.<sup>31</sup>

Manaakitanga (hospitality) emphasised the value of supporting and providing for others, and thereby building relationships based on mutual obligation and

23. Sir Maui Pomare, Legends of the Maori, ed James Cowan, 2 vols (1930, reprinted Papakura: Southern Reprints, 1987), vol 1, p 45.

24. Pomare, Legends of the Maori, vol 1, p 45.

25. Pei Te Hurinui Jones, King Pōtatau: An Account of the Life of Pōtatau Te Wherowhero, the First Māori King (Wellington: Huia, 2010), p 35.

26. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 33–37.

27. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 35–36, 42–43; doc A98 (Thorne), pp 81–82.

28. Document s19(a) (Te Kanawa), pp 37–39, 48.

29. Document H9(b) (Roa); doc H9(b)(1) (Roa), pp [1]–[3]; doc H16 (Jensen), p 7; doc A117 (Jackson), p 11; transcript 4.1.21, p 1394.

30. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 5, 22–23; Waitangi Tribunal, The Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 21, 24–25; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 33, 227–228.

31. Transcript 4.1.4, p 16.

interest.<sup>32</sup> Following raupatu of lands north of the aukati (discussed in chapter 7), for example, Ngāti Maniapoto demonstrated their commitment to manaakitanga, hosting thousands of Māori refugees who had been displaced following the confiscations.<sup>33</sup>

Kaitiakitanga (guardianship) emphasised the value of sustaining and providing for each element of the natural world. As we will see, by fostering these values, leaders and their kin groups could keep peace, build alliances, enhance security, ensure a supply of food and other resources, and create economic interdependence which could be vital during times of scarcity.<sup>34</sup>

Underlying these values was the principle of utu, which can be seen as reciprocity or balance, the essence of which was that anything taken – including mana or tapu – must be returned. Utu could work in constructive ways, creating cycles of reciprocal obligation which brought people together, supporting collective effort and enhancing their joint mana. It could also work in destructive ways, such as when the killing of a senior leader created cause for retribution.<sup>35</sup> In the Ngā Korero Tuku Iho hui, for example, Wikiwera Henskes of Ngāti Mutunga told us how her whanaunga Te Hikaka challenged Pōtatau Te Wherowhero, who had written a song that insulted Ngāti Maniapoto, and demanded utu. She explained that Pōtatau responded by giving him the suit of armour which King George the fifth had given to Hone Heke in England, which Hone had given to Pōtatau.<sup>36</sup>

2.2.1.4 Tuku

Tuku describes the idea of transferral, generally within a social context.<sup>37</sup> It embraces the notions of releasing or letting go, though is often interpreted as the act of gift-giving. The Muriwhenua Land Tribunal, for example, noted the link between the concepts of tuku and manaakitanga. In its report, the Tribunal said that ‘the underlying purpose of gift exchange, as we see it, was not to obtain goods but to secure lasting relationships with other hapu. This was consistent with Maori

32. Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 33, 103–104; Durie, Custom Law, p 6.

33. Document K35 (Maniapoto), pp 37–38.

34. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 115; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 5, 23; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 205–210.

35. This district's histories show many examples of utu acting in ways that deepened and reinforced relationships. One example was in the tradition of resource sharing in which coastal groups offered seasonal access to fishing grounds and inland groups offered similar access to territories for eeling or bird snaring; transcript 4.1.1, pp 67–68; transcript 4.1.7, pp 46–47; transcript 4.1.5, pp 225–226; doc L14(a) (Kereopa), p 28. Utu also worked in destructive ways, as in the escalating cycle of conflict between Ngāti Toa-rangatira and the Waikato-Maniapoto coalition in the first two decades of the 1800s. For general discussions of utu, see Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 31, 35, 178, 197, 213–215, 399, 401; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 108–109, 113–114; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti/The Declaration and the Treaty: The Report on Stage 1 of the Te Paparahi o Te Raki Inquiry (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2014), pp 19, 25; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 38–40.

36. Transcript 4.1.5, p 120.

37. Richard Benton, Alex Frame, Paul Meredith, Te Mātāpunenga: A Compendium of References to the Concepts and Institutions of Māori Customary Law (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 2013), p 441.

views of reciprocity.’ It continued that ‘It cannot be presumed, either, that in bartering with Europeans, Maori valued only the goods and not a personal trading relationship. There is evidence that a personal and continuing relationship was still sought.’<sup>38</sup> Those receiving tuku were also expected to uphold any obligations or duties that were associated with it.<sup>39</sup>

During hearings for this inquiry, claimants also spoke about tuku of land or ‘tuku whenua.’<sup>40</sup> The Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal described tuku of land as ‘a traditional practice where land was given in exchange for other benefits, and in the context of an ongoing and mutually beneficial relationship between the parties. Tuku was fundamentally different from sale, where land is permanently transferred from one party to another, and there is no enduring relationship between them.’<sup>41</sup> While the responsibilities or permissions to the land could vary between tuku, it was generally understood that if the land was no longer needed for the purpose for which it was given, it should be returned to the original owner.<sup>42</sup>

2.2.1.5 Tikanga

Together, these values and principles were essential elements of a system of tikanga – which can be understood as law, and more broadly as referring to what is right, correct, and just in accordance with mātauranga Māori (Māori knowledge and systems of thought).<sup>43</sup>

Tikanga cannot be understood merely as customs. Rather, tikanga was a system of law, and also as a system of social controls and norms, of personal morals and ethics, of rules and guidelines for managing relationships, and of rituals for mediating relationships between people and atua. In the words of former Tribunal chair Justice Williams, it was ‘essentially the Māori way of doing things – from the very mundane to the most sacred or important fields of human endeavour.’<sup>44</sup>

Tikanga in pre-European times applied to all areas of life and all relationships. There were tikanga for family and kin relationships, social and economic exchanges, marriage, warfare, peacemaking, migration, social and political organisation, group decision-making, leadership, relationships with land and the environment, and so on.

Because tikanga was a principles-based system it could be applied flexibly to different circumstances. The underlying principles were well understood, and

---

38. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 28.

39. Submission 3.4.121, pp 13–14.

40. Submission 3.4.121, pp 13–14, 43; submission 3.4.293, p 42; transcript 4.1.9, pp 41, 142–144, 286, 309–310.

41. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, p 120.

42. Transcript 4.1.9, pp 309–310, 315–318.

43. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 6, 22–23; Waitangi Tribunal, The Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 58, 216.

44. J Williams, ‘He Aha Te Tikanga Māori’, unpublished paper for the Law Commission, 1998 (New Zealand Law Commission, ‘Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law’, p 16).

guidance was provided in the form of stories, sayings, songs, and other information handed down from generation to generation.

How tikanga was applied depended on circumstances. For public events, tikanga typically involved rituals which invoked atua. The peacemaking at Te Horangapai (section 2.5.1.3) is an example, in which tohunga invoked the gods Uenuku and Maru to bind Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hāua together in peace.

Following periods of war, tikanga was similarly a means of dictating who could claim mana whenua over areas of land, which was often then realised through the use of pou whenua (boundary markers). Ngāti Maniapoto researcher Anthony Tawhiwhi Barrett described how 'Iwi Māori determine mana whenua through a tikanga-based practice of placing pou whenua in an area to identify and acknowledge the tangata whenua of the land.'<sup>45</sup> We describe examples of this practice in sections 2.4.1 and 2.4.2.

Though unwritten, tikanga contained the essential elements of law, including predictable rules for behaviour and predictable responses to transgression.

As the New Zealand Law Commission has noted, early settlers in New Zealand understood that tapu had legal effect, as did Māori systems of land tenure. Nor did they have any difficulty recognising utu and muru as aspects of law enforcement. In the commission's view, it was only through changes in British legal doctrine after 1840 that law came to be associated with western institutions.<sup>46</sup>

In Treaty terms, tikanga and tino rangatiratanga cannot be separated, because tikanga guides all relationships with people, the environment, and atua, and because the actions of rangatira are legitimate only if they are tika.

In a world without written language, tikanga were handed down from generation to generation through histories, stories, songs, sayings, place names, carvings, and other knowledge. By describing the actions of atua and tūpuna, these kōrero also provided guidance on how to act in this world.

In the time of gods, for example, Tūmataunga's defeat of his siblings gave humankind some measure of dominion over forests and oceans. Likewise, the histories of this district's ancestors – their journeys, discoveries, battles, and marriages, and the names and taonga they left behind – helped determine who had rights and how they could be used.<sup>47</sup>

2.2.2 Te Taiao te Tai Tangata

Te Rohe Pōtae is a region of great geographical diversity. Flanked by mountain ranges to the east and the coast to the west, it is 'an area of steep rolling hills and valleys dissected by rivers and streams'.<sup>48</sup> Much of the area was also once covered in

45. Document A110, p 258.

46. New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 19–20, 23.

47. For discussions of the nature of tikanga, see: doc 12 (Crown), pp 5–6; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 16–29; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 3, pp 819, 865, 890; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 22–23, 33–34, 87, 254; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 101–123; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 15–18; Durie, Custom Law, pp 3–5, 7–9.

48. Document A110, p 306.

dense forest, and as such many claimants referred to the rohe as Te Nehenehenui, the great forest.

To the east lies the Rangitoto Range and the headwaters for many of the great awa in the district. From Rangitoto maunga, the Waipā and Pūniu awa flow north-west, tracking around the Ouruwhero (Te Kawa) wetlands, before joining east of Pirongia, a significant northern maunga.

South of the Rangitoto Range lie the Hauhungaroa Ranges, which make up much of the district's eastern boundary. Bordered at the north and south by the Pureora and Tūhua maunga respectively, the ranges form the catchment for the Waimiha, Ōngarue, and Taringamotu awa, all of which flow through the south of the district.

The Mōkau awa, beginning between the Rangitoto and Hauhungaroa Ranges, flows south-west across the breadth of the district, emptying into the sea near the district's southern boundary. Along with the Awakino, Mōhakatino, and Marokopa awa, it forms one of several river mouths on the southern and central west coast. These acted as small harbours and key transport links for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

Along the northern coast are the three major harbours of the district: Whāingaroa/Raglan, Aotea, and Kāwhia. It was here that the earliest Te Rohe Pōtae settlements were established, with the district's network of awa allowing iwi and hapū to spread throughout the region over time.

Within their dynamic, principled world, shaped and regulated by tikanga, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori established and maintained meaningful relationships with the district's lands, waterways, mountains, and other parts of te taiao. In the oral and traditional history volume of Ngāti Maahanga, researchers explained that Māori:

had (and have) a comprehensive world view about the environment, which was synonymous in traditional times with our entire way of life. The key to understanding this world view is to accept its holistic nature, ie that it is a view of the essential interconnectedness of all things.<sup>49</sup>

Te taiao was also a source of identity: each mountain, river, lake, swamp, or other landform being part of the web of ancestral relationships that were established in the earliest migrations and explorations and sustained throughout the generations since.

Just as people were connected to each other through whakapapa, so too were they connected to land, and to bodies of water, flora and fauna, and other elements of the natural environment. Land, a source of life, is also central to identity – ancestral connections creating a place where each individual can live and belong.<sup>50</sup>

In Te Rohe Pōtae, early Tainui tūpuna established connections with the land by naming maunga and other landforms, and by building altars or whare wānanga. Names, according to former Waitangi Tribunal chairperson Judge Edward Taihakurei Durie, 'are imprints on the land, demonstrative of past association', and

---

49. Document A94 (Collins, Turner, and Kelly-Hepi Te Huia), p 323.

50. Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 285–289; Durie, Custom Law, pp 61–63.

for that reason were ‘significant declarations of entitlement’.<sup>51</sup> Some names – such as Rangiaitea and Hawaiki-iti – link back to the ancestral homeland in Hawaiki.<sup>52</sup>

Marae, altars, and whare wānanga are similar assertions of spiritual connection. This continued a tradition originally from the Cook Islands, as scholar Hirini Moko Mead notes: ‘When an early voyager landed, one of the first things he did was to erect a marae to give thanks to his Gods and to establish his claim to the land occupied. The building of a marae was equivalent of a flag when foreign powers took possession.’<sup>53</sup>

Each subsequent generation reasserted the relationships established by their forebears, and established new ones, which in turn were handed down through generations in names, waiata (songs), pepeha and whakataukī (sayings), and other kōrero linking the territory to significant tūpuna.<sup>54</sup> For example, Miki Apiti referred to the waiata ‘Tērā te uira e hiko i te rangi’ (the lightning strikes from the sky), which describes the ancestral connections of Ngāti Te Wehi to the Aotea Harbour.<sup>55</sup>

By these means individuals understood and could describe in detail their ancestral connections to maunga (mountains), lakes, rivers, swamps, rocks and caves, trees, coastal areas, birds, fish, eels, and other elements of the environment, and therefore understood what occupation and usage rights they had, and how these parts of the environment should be managed.<sup>56</sup>

Throughout the hearings, claimants described in intimate detail their relationships with tūpuna, and their relationships to the lands on which their tūpuna walked. We heard of where tūpuna had lived, of their marriages, their homes, their gardens, their hunting and fishing grounds, their relationships with neighbours, and so on. And we heard also of how claimants had kept those traditions alive into the present, to the extent that was possible in a very changed environment.

Each of these kōrero, Harold Maniapoto reminded us, concerned mana tangata (authority over people) and mana whenua (authority over land). By describing ancestral relationships, claimants placed themselves in the landscape and explained what rights and interests they retained, and what obligations they had to the land and other taonga.<sup>57</sup>

Rovina Maniapoto of Ngāti Paretekawa, for example, spoke of her ancestral relationships with Pirongia-o-te-araro-o-Kahupeka, abode of patupaiarehe (fairy

51. Durie, Custom Law, pp 75, 86, 88.

52. Document A110, pp 120–121; doc A104 (de Silva), pp 53, 71–72, 183; doc A101 (Young), p 19; doc A77 (Kahotea), pp 25, 40; doc A76 (M Belgrave, D Belgrave, Procter, Bennett, Joy, Toghler, Young, Anderson, Kiddle, and Lilley), p 59; doc A94, pp 109, 114.

53. Mead, Tikanga Māori, p 114.

54. Document 12, p 5; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 31; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 22–23; Durie, Custom Law, pp 61–63, 84–89.

55. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 44–46.

56. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 30–31; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, pp 22–23; Durie, Custom Law, pp 61–63, 84–89; see also transcript 4.1.3, pp 198–200; transcript 4.1.4, pp 124–125.

57. Transcript 4.1.1, p 5.

people); with Te Kawa, where eels were distributed to thousands who gathered for annual tuna heke; to the Pūniu and Waipā Rivers, ‘ngā wai tuku kiri ēnei o aku kuia, o aku koroua’ (the waters where my elders bathed); to the taniwha Waiwaia and Tūheitia, who lived in the Waipā; the marae of her tūpuna, Whatiwhatihoe, where Te Wherowhero lived and married Peehi’s daughter Ngāwaero; and Mātakitaki, where the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition was defeated.<sup>58</sup>

She referred to Mōkau, where the anchor of the Tainui waka now rests at Hingamutu urupā on Maniaroa marae, and her connections with Ngāti Tū and Ngāti Rungaterangi through her ancestor Te Rerenga Wetere; and to Kahuwera, where the god Uenuku lived until called upon to give aid at Hingakākā; and to Hikurangi and Tūhua, explored by her ancestor Tukawekai (brother of Te Kanawa Whatupango); and to the river Ōngarue, home of her ancestor Te Pikikōtuku, from which comes the saying ‘ko au te awa, ko te awa ko au’ (I am the river, the river is me).<sup>59</sup>

Ms Maniapoto also referred to connections to Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Raukawa, Apakura, Ngāti Māhanga, and Ngāti Te Wehi as she traversed the district, arriving back at Kāwhia, resting place of Tainui and home of the sacred altar Te Ahurei.<sup>60</sup>

Harry Kereopa (Ngāti Te Ihingārangi) referred to punawai (springs) of pure water ‘i taka mai rā e Io Matua Kore’ (falling from Io Matua te Kore) into the mountains at Pureora; and from each spring another forms, then another, representing the hapū of Rereahu flowing outwards into the district, creating and in turn sustaining its hapū.<sup>61</sup>

Sean Ellison (Tainui Awhiro) referred to the ancestral relationships of Tainui Awhiro hapū to Karioi, on the southern entrance to Whāingaroa Harbour – and to the adulterous relationship of Karioi to Pirongia.

Koinei tū kōrero he paki waitara noa iho pea ki ētehi ēngari ki ōku pakeke ki te kōrero koe mō ngā maunga e kōrero ana koe mō te iwi. Kāore he rerekētanga. Ko te whakapapa tēnei o te maunga e tū nei o Karioi. Ko mātou te hunga e noho nei ki ōnā tahataha ki raro anō ki tōnā maru. Ko mātou āna tamariki.

These types of stories are just fanciful stories to some, but to my elders, if you are talking about the mountains, you are talking about the people. There is no difference. This is the genealogy of this mountain standing here, Karioi. We are the people who are inhabiting its slopes beneath its shelter. We are its children.<sup>62</sup>

---

58. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 7–10. Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

59. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 7–10.

60. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 7–10.

61. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 130–131.

62. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 196–197, 199–201, 205–206. For other kōrero about maunga, see transcript 4.1.6, pp 15, 26, 263–264; transcript 4.1.4, pp 107–108; doc E2 (Bell), p [2].

Claimants described the food sources their ancestors relied on – the ‘great food bowl’ of the Waipā Valley<sup>63</sup> and the ‘pātaka kai’ (food store) of Te Kawa;<sup>64</sup> Te Mārā Kai o Maniapoto (the Garden of Maniapoto) near Ruakurī Cave in the Waitomo Valley;<sup>65</sup> the birding and berry gathering grounds at Pureora; the fishing grounds at Marokopa and Mōkau; and the plentiful eel supplies in streams throughout the district.<sup>66</sup>

They described kāinga, such as those along the Mōkau River or encircling the Kāwhia Harbour;<sup>67</sup> caves in which famous ancestors such as Maniapoto and Uekaha lived;<sup>68</sup> and pā whawhai such as Arapae, sited on the Mōkau River to defend against war parties invading from the south, and Puketoa in southern Kāwhia, where Ngāti Urunumia based themselves during the wars against Ngāti Toa-rangatira.<sup>69</sup>

They described transport routes to and through the district – the network of rivers and river valleys converging around Te Kūiti and Ōtorohanga and connecting the interior to the coast, providing passage for explorers, migrants, refugees, warriors, and seasonal hunting and fishing parties. Ngāti Maniapoto settlements and pā were located to maximise control of these strategic routes.<sup>70</sup>

The claimant Jim Taitoko also referred to a series of tracks linking key settlements with each other, and inland areas with the coast. For example, he described Tapu-i-wāhine, which linked Taumarunui to Aria, and could then be followed south-west to Mōkau or north-east to Te Kūiti. Other tracks linked Kāwhia to Ōtorohanga, and Taumarunui to Whanganui, and traversed the coast.<sup>71</sup>

Claimants also described the waves of migration, seasonal and permanent, which meant hapū could have interests in many different parts of the district;<sup>72</sup> and the network of relationships criss-crossing the district, uniting neighbouring hapū and providing ties between distant ones.<sup>73</sup> They referred to places of refuge,

63. Transcript 4.1.1, p 91.

64. Transcript 4.1.1, p 67.

65. Transcript 4.1.6, p 272. The whare at Te Kūiti where we heard this evidence was Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho, said to mean ‘The Stayer home of the Full Basket’: transcript 4.1.6, p 16.

66. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 15, 33–34, 67, 91; transcript 4.1.6, pp 15, 26, 84, 119, 185–187, 190, 233–235, 263–264, 272–273, 290–291, 302–304, 348; transcript 4.1.2, pp 162–164, 168–169, 172–173, 195–196; transcript 4.1.4, pp 107–108; doc E2, p [2].

67. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 97, 146–147, 200–201, 264, 274; transcript 4.1.2, pp 162–165, 168–169.

68. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 117, 190, 208–209, 231, 275; transcript 4.1.5, pp 74, 103–104; see also doc A110, p 125.

69. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 9, 14, 31, 91, 176, 241, 249; transcript 4.1.2, pp 46, 162–166, 168–169; transcript 4.1.6, pp 60, 97–98, 113, 186–189, 225–227, 231–232; doc Q11 (Wirepa-Davis), pp 3–5; doc R20 (Tūwhangai), p 10; doc S14 (Morgan), p [2]; doc G14 (Koroheke), p [3]; doc E2, p [2].

70. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 69–70, 91, 118, 264; transcript 4.1.1, p 135; transcript 4.1.5, pp 9, 14, 18, 46–47, 91, 97, 200–201, 249, 264.

71. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 243–244.

72. For example, Ngāti Huiao, which is most closely associated with Pukeroa and Hangatiki, also had kāinga further north at Pōkuru: doc A60 (Berghan), pp 175, 198–204.

73. For a handful of the numerous examples of inter-hapū and inter-iwi relationships which claimants described, see transcript 4.1.1, pp 62–63, 66–68, 70, 89; transcript 4.1.2, pp 94–95; transcript 4.1.6, p 205; transcript 4.1.5, pp 223–226.

such as Te Marae o Hine, Te Horangapai, and Ōrongokoekoeā, as well as locations where shelter was provided after the Waikato war.<sup>74</sup>

They referred to burial caves and urupā where their tūpuna rested.<sup>75</sup> Even rocks, which marked boundaries, or places of birth and death, were recalled in detail.<sup>76</sup>

Many claimants referred to their own childhoods, and the intimate relationships they experienced with land, rivers, streams, and areas of bush as they were growing up. Many also pointed out major environmental changes that have taken place over the years, which have continued to profoundly alter the landscape and so interfered with or destroyed entirely many of their ancestral relationships.

As relationships with land and other environmental taonga have broken down, so too have relationships among people. In turn, the very identity of claimant peoples is threatened. Without the relationships that define them and give them mana, who are they? Claimant Taohua Te Huia referred to the words of his tūpuna:

Ko te ingoa ko te hapu e kore e kiia he hapu ki te kore he marae. Ko te marae e kore e kiia he marae kite kore he whare. Kote whare e kore e kiia he whare kite kore he tangata. Kote tangata e kore e kiia he tangata kite kore he whenua.

Concerning this term hapū, a hapū is not said to be a hapū if there is no marae. A marae is not termed a marae if there is no House. The House is not termed a house if there is no Man. A man is not said to be a Man if there is no land.<sup>77</sup>

This report – like other Tribunal district reports – is a history of the breakdown of ancestral relationships in the face of colonisation, and an analysis of the consequences of that breakdown. Whether the Crown bears any responsibility for these changes is a matter that will be considered in later chapters.

2.3 LANDING AND EARLY SETTLEMENT

The Tribunal heard a wealth of kōrero regarding the arrival and settlement of the Tainui waka, from which most iwi and hapū in the district trace their descent. It also heard traditions relating to peoples who occupied the land long before the great migrations, as well as how the descendants of some of these earliest ancestors met and intermarried with the new arrivals from Tainui and other waka.

---

74. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 102–103, 177, 189–190, 209; transcript 4.1.3, pp 112, 136; transcript 4.1.4, pp 120, 215; transcript 4.1.5, pp 15, 38, 51; transcript 4.1.6, pp 31, 72–73, 76–77, 93, 132, 365, 393; transcript 4.1.7, pp 86, 97; transcript 4.1.11, p [63]; transcript 4.1.10, pp 706–707.

75. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 141, 144, 161, 163, 178, 202, 228; transcript 4.1.3, pp 96, 137; transcript 4.1.5, pp 46, 271; transcript 4.1.6, p 103, 264–265, 273. Regarding Ruakuri, see transcript 4.1.6, pp 264–265.

76. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 162–165.

77. Document A63(a), part 2 (Alexander), p 1267; transcript 4.1.14, p 355; doc P16 (Te Huia), p 10. Also see transcript 4.1.1, pp 12, 38; Mr Te Huia was quoting his grandfather, Te Whakataute Raureti, who wrote these words in a letter to the Native Minister in 1910: doc A63 (Alexander), p 600. Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

2.3.1 Hoturoa and Rakataura

According to one tradition, Tainui left Hawaiki to escape a great war.<sup>78</sup> Hoturoa was in command, with his nephew Rakataura as navigator.<sup>79</sup> As Tainui was crossing the ocean, Rakataura fell in love with Hoturoa's daughter – who is known in different traditions as Kahurere, Kahukeke, or Kahupeka – and the two leaders fell out.<sup>80</sup>

After Tainui landed at Tāmaki Makaurau,<sup>81</sup> its leaders continued their journeys separately. Hoturoa and Kahurere continued by sea, while Rakataura, accompanied by Rōtū, Hiaroa, and other explorers travelled south on foot, traversing the Waikato River valley and the Waikato coast, uttering incantations to keep Tainui from entering the coastal harbours.<sup>82</sup>

Tainui ventured as far as Taranaki. According to one account, it stopped briefly at Mimi, just north of Urenui,<sup>83</sup> then turned back to the north, anchoring at the mouth of the Mōkau River.<sup>84</sup> Hoturoa and Rakataura met on a beach north of Mōkau and made their peace, and Hoturoa consented to his daughter marrying Rakataura.<sup>85</sup>

Hoturoa then brought the Tainui to Kāwhia, its final resting place.<sup>86</sup> He settled there with his wife Whakaotirangi, who established a garden from kūmara she had carried from Hawaiki.<sup>87</sup> Rakataura and Kahurere, meanwhile, embarked on an epic journey to the interior, traversing Pirongia and travelling south along the Waipā River before exploring the hills to the east.<sup>88</sup>

These new territories were not only colder but also much larger than their island home. Between Pirongia and Wharepūhanga they found flat and fertile land. Further south was the great forest Te Nehenehenui, which at that time would have been rich with moa as well as smaller birds and edible plants. These areas were connected by networks of rivers and streams plump with eels and waterfowl; these waterways would later become the district's pre-colonial equivalent of a state highway network, providing easy passage between hills and coast, north and south.

Rōtū is said to have left the others, settling at Whatawhata on the Waipā River in what is now known as the Waikato district. Hiaroa continued south, settling at Kahuwera on the Mōkau River, south-west of present-day Te Kūiti.<sup>89</sup> Another 78. The war was known as Rātōrua (the twice setting sun): doc A110, p 100.

79. Document A110, pp 110–111; doc A98, p 47; doc A83, pp 34–36.

80. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 201–202; doc A110, pp 111–112; doc A98, p 47; doc A83, pp 49, 55.

81. Tainui had stopped briefly at Whangaparāoa before landing at Tāmaki: doc A110, p 93.

82. Document A110, pp 94–97, 108–109, 111–112; doc A98, pp 48–49; transcript 4.1.5, pp 109–110.

83. This account was given by Rihari Tauwhare to the Native Land Court in 1886: doc A110, pp 108–109.

84. Document A110, pp 108–109; doc A98, p 49; transcript 4.1.5, pp 95–96, 99, 248; doc F15 (Ngāti Maniapoto supporting documents), p 3.

85. Document A110, p 109; doc A98, pp 49–50; transcript 4.1.1, p 15; transcript 4.1.3, pp 201–203.

86. Document A110, pp 95–96, 97–98, 108–109, 192; transcript 4.1.1, p 14.

87. Document A110, pp 48–49, 97–98, 113–114; transcript 4.1.6, p 18; transcript 4.1.1, pp 61, 122.

88. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 14–15, 66, 90–91; doc A83, pp 49–53, 55; doc A110, pp 113, 193, 327, 329, 351–353; doc A98, p 56.

89. Document s19(a), p 38; doc A110, pp 84–85, 95, 112, 319, 337–338; transcript 4.1.8, pp 1065–1066.

early explorer, Hape, settled closer to the coast.<sup>90</sup> And yet another Tainui crew member, Hotunui, is said by some to have settled in the south-east of the district near Tūhua.<sup>91</sup>

As noted in section 2.2, at each stage of their journeys, these early explorers left behind names and physical markers of their presence. Hoturoa planted a pōhutukawa at Mimi, and at Mōkau he placed pou in the ground, which sprouted into trees known as ngā neke o Tainui (the duckboards of Tainui).<sup>92</sup> He also left Tainui's anchor in the river mouth.<sup>93</sup> Tainui itself was left at Kāwhia, at a place known as Te Tumu o Tainui.<sup>94</sup> Rakataura and Kahurere, meanwhile, named places as they travelled. Pirongia, Kakepuku, Wharepūhunga, Rangitoto, Pureora, Hurakia, and many other natural features were named to commemorate their epic journey of exploration.<sup>95</sup>

At every step in their physical journeys, these early explorers were in dialogue with atua, giving thanks for their safe voyage and asking for safety and abundance in the new land. Before leaving Kāwhia, Rakataura established an altar and whare wānanga (house of learning) known as Te Ahurei.<sup>96</sup>

Rakataura, Rōtū, and Hiaroa distributed sacred stones during their journeys. These stones were also from Hawaiki and, as noted in section 2.2.1.2, were known as mauri kōhatu or whatu ahuru manu. They were used to assert their mana and appeal to atua for abundance in the new land. Of these stones, the most famous were those that were planted at significant forest sites with the aim of attracting bird life.<sup>97</sup> Rōtū and Hiaroa also established altars and whare wānanga where they settled.<sup>98</sup>

2.3.2 Whatihua and Tūrongo

It is likely that Tainui descendants lived in relatively small family groups, moving from place to place to take advantage of seasonal hunting, fishing, and food gathering opportunities, as well as sustaining themselves from seasonal kūmara

---

90. Hape's descendants became known as Ngāti Rākei, who lived near the Mōkau river mouth: doc A110, p 85.

91. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 109–114; doc A83, pp 50–51; see also doc A108 (Patete), p 22.

92. Document A110, pp 108–109; doc A98, p 49; transcript 4.1.5, pp 95–96; Yorkie Taylor identified the trees as wekeweke: transcript 4.1.5, p 248. See also doc F15, p 1.

93. Document A110, p 110; transcript 4.1.5, pp 9, 99, 105, 109.

94. Document A110, pp 95–98, 109; transcript 4.1.1, p 14; transcript 4.1.2, p 37.

95. In particular, maunga and other natural features were named to commemorate the state of Kahurere's health. Pirongia, for example, is Pirongia te Aroaro o Kahurere (sometimes shortened to Pirongia-o-Kahu), and Kakepuku is Kakepuku-te-aro-aro-o-Kahu: transcript 4.1.1, pp 14–15, 66, 90–91; doc A83, pp 50–53; doc A110, pp 113, 193, 327, 329, 351–353; doc A98, p 56. Hurakia is the northern part of the range now known as Hauhungaroa: Carolyn King, D John Gaukrodger, Neville Ritchie (eds), The Drama of Conservation: The History of Pureora Forest, New Zealand (Wellington: Department of Conservation/Springer Books, 2015), p vii.

96. Document A110, pp 108–110; also see pp 95, 97–98, 337, 342.

97. Document A83, p 50; see also doc A98, pp 50–51; doc R13 (Tūwhangai), p 8; doc Q3 (Waho), p 6.

98. Document A83, p 50; see also doc A98, pp 50–51; doc R13, p 8; doc Q3, p 6.

gardens. Tribal traditions refer to the adaptation of Hawaiki crops and growing methods to the new land.<sup>99</sup>

The Tainui peoples were not alone in the district. Traditions refer to patu-paiarehe (fairy people) and urukehu (fair-haired people) living on the slopes of Pirongia and Kakepuku, and in the Tūhua and Pureora forests;<sup>100</sup> and to other tribes which had arrived from Pacific homelands before Tainui, in particular to Ngāti Kahupungapunga who occupied lands north of Te Kawa.<sup>101</sup>

There is no record of significant conflict between the Tainui migrants and these earlier settlers during the generations between Hoturoa and Tāwhao. With relatively small populations and ready access to cultivations and abundant large fauna, there appears to have been little rivalry or competition among groups of different descent.<sup>102</sup>

The detailed histories that emerge from about 1500 tell of some of the conflicts that beset the Tainui peoples from about that time.<sup>103</sup> In this respect, Te Rohe Pōtae appears to have followed the same pattern as other North Island districts. As populations of moa and other large fauna crashed, and human populations grew, the focus of economic activity turned to year-round cultivation and to hunting smaller fauna such as fish, shellfish, and tuna (eels). With year-round settlement and greater competition for resources, possession of territory became more important than it had previously been.<sup>104</sup>

Over time, social structures began to change. Family groups began to work together, sharing labour and territorial defence, thereby forming into hapū. A

99. For example, see the tradition of Whakaotiranga and her kete rukuruku (small basket) of kūmara: doc A110, pp 48–49. For general descriptions of Hawaiki people's adaptation to the new environment, see Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, A Report into Claims concerning New Zealand Law and Policy Affecting Māori Culture and Identity, Te Taumata Tuarua, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2011), vol 1, pp 238–239; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 21–22; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; James Belich, Making Peoples: A History of the New Zealanders: from Polynesian Settlement to the End of the Nineteenth Century (Auckland: Allen Lane, 1996), pp 35, 67; Atholl Anderson, 'A Fragile Plenty: Pre-European Māori and the New Zealand Environment', in Environmental Histories of New Zealand, ed Eric Pawson and Tom Brooking (Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 2002), pp 25–26.

100. Transcript 4.1.9, p 412; transcript 4.1.17, pp 44–46, 410, 638–639, 1403–1404; transcript 4.1.11, pp [570], [615]; transcript 4.1.12, pp 39, 136–137, 152–154, 174, 273–274, 499; transcript 4.1.14, p 60; transcript 4.1.21, p 21; transcript 4.1.16, pp 146, 158, 161; doc J23 (Wanikau), pp 8–9; doc A83, p 26.

101. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 63–64, 66–67; see also doc A83, pp 47, 50–51, 68, 90–92; doc A110, pp 82–83; doc A108, pp 302, 363–369. Claimants also referred to other early groups, including Ngāti Hia of the upper Mōkau Valley, and Ngāti Hotu of western Taupō. Some sources give Tainui origins for these groups: specifically, Hiaroa for Ngāti Hia and Hotunui for Ngāti Hotu. Regarding Ngāti Hia, see transcript 4.1.17, p 575. Regarding Ngāti Hotu, see transcript 4.1.4, pp 45–48, 109–114 and transcript 4.1.17, pp 44–46. Some sources also referred to Ngāti Hā, who were descended from Tia of Arawa and invaded Ngāti Hia lands sometime during the 1500s. Ngāti Hia, Ngāti Raukawa, and Tainui people of Kāwhia fought together to see off this invasion: transcript 4.1.4, pp 77, 110; transcript 4.1.6, p 346.

102. Document A83, pp 68, 78–80.

103. Document A83, pp 11, 48.

104. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; Belich, Making Peoples.

pattern emerged in which these groups would occupy a territory, grow, and then divide, with one part of the group moving off to break in new territories and repeat the process. In these early times, rangatira (chiefs) who married more than once frequently divided their lands between the eldest sons from each marriage. Six generations after Hoturoa, his descendant Kākati married twice, dividing Kāwhia between his eldest sons from each marriage – Tāwhao taking the north and Tuhianga taking the south.<sup>105</sup>

In turn, Tāwhao married two sisters. His sons from the different marriages, Whatihua and Tūrongo, grew up as bitter rivals. As they reached adulthood, Whatihua inherited his father's mana to manage lands in northern Kāwhia, while his brother travelled inland to establish a new settlement at Rangiātea, near Ōtorohanga. There, he used some of the soil from Te Ahurei to establish the fourth Tainui whare wānanga.<sup>106</sup> The settlement is recalled as highly prosperous, with a population that grew rapidly.<sup>107</sup>

In spite of the rivalry, the Kāwhia and Rangiātea communities remained in close contact, with Tūrongo visiting his former home regularly – establishing a link between inland and coastal communities that has remained important throughout the district's history.<sup>108</sup> These ties were reinforced through several generations of intermarriage, beginning with that of Whatihua's son Uenukutuwhatu to Tūrongo's daughter Rangitairi.<sup>109</sup>

There are differing views over which of Whatihua and Tūrongo was the senior – Whatihua was the elder; Tūrongo's mother was the elder sister.<sup>110</sup> Regardless, both are regarded as important ancestors for many of the Tainui tribes. Though it is a simplification, the division of land established in their time continued through generations, with Whatihua's descendants (based on senior male lines) typically occupying coastal areas from northern Kāwhia through to Pirongia, and Tūrongo's coming to occupy the lands from Pirongia and Wharepūhanga south to Tūhua.<sup>111</sup>

105. Document A110, p 246. Several traditions also acknowledge a third son, Uetapu (see doc A110, pp 78, 82–83; doc A99 (Tainui researchers), p 34; transcript 4.1.14, pp 391–392), but some sources conflate Uetapu with Ue, Kākati's grandfather (see transcript 4.1.1, pp 30, 61–63; doc K35(a) (Maniapoto), p 47). For general descriptions of the evolution of Māori social organisation, see Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuarua, vol 1, pp 238–239; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 21–22; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; Anderson, Binney, and Harris, Tangata Whenua, pp 77–84.

106. Document A110, pp 116–117, 120–122, 194–195, 120–122, 242, 244, 337, 340; doc A83, pp 59–64, 68–74, 75–78, 89–90, 250, 282; see also doc A97, pp 31–32; doc A98, pp 74–75; doc A99, p 53. In some traditions, Tūrongo carved his house at Rangiātea using the adze Te Toki a Matariki, which Whatihua had used to carve his house and impress Ruapūtahanga: doc A83, pp 78–79.

107. Document A110, p 337; doc A83, pp 68, 78–80.

108. Document A83, pp 79–81; doc A110, pp 54–56; see also doc A99, pp 54–55.

109. Document A83, pp 79–81; doc A110, pp 54–56; see also doc A102 (Ngāti Apakura researchers), p 18.

110. Document A110, pp 52–53.

111. Document A83, pp 64–65, 251; doc A110, pp 195–196; doc A98, p 76; doc A97, p 33; transcript 4.1.1, p 15.

2.3.3 Raukawa and Rereahu

Tūrongo and Mahinārangi had one son, Raukawa, and two daughters, Rangitairi and Hinewai.<sup>112</sup> Raukawa married Tūrongoihi, who was descended from Hoturoa and from Tia of Te Arawa.<sup>113</sup> Most traditions record them as having four children – Rereahu, Whakatere, Kurawari (or Kuiwai), and Takihiku. It is from Rereahu that all who now call themselves Ngāti Maniapoto claim descent; as Piripi Crown put it, ‘ko Rereahu katoa tātou’ (‘we are all Rereahu’).<sup>114</sup> Rereahu’s younger siblings Kurawari and Takihiku are important tūpuna of Ngāti Raukawa.<sup>115</sup>

Whereas the early period of Tainui exploration and settlement was relatively peaceful, several conflicts occurred during Raukawa’s lifetime and in succeeding generations, which had the effect of extending Tainui influence – and in particular the influence of Tūrongo’s descendants – inland and southwards.

Probably around the early to mid-1500s the Kāwhia rangatira Tānetinorau attacked Ngāti Hia, who (according to most sources) were Hiaroa’s descendants<sup>116</sup> and had spread out to occupy significant areas of land from Ōtorohanga south. Tānetinorau then settled near Waitomo.<sup>117</sup>

Soon afterwards, Raukawa sided with another Kāwhia rangatira, Tamaaio (great-grandson of Whatihua), to repel Ngāti Hā, an Arawa hapū from Taupō which had moved into the lands between Pureora and Puketutu. Peace was negotiated, cemented by the marriage of Tamaaio to a Ngāti Hā woman of senior birth.<sup>118</sup> Raukawa and Tamaaio then turned on Ngāti Hia, driving them further southwards.<sup>119</sup>

Rereahu, Raukawa’s eldest son, is said to have lived in various places, from Te Kawa, Mangaorongo, and Hikurangi to Rangiatea, Te Kūiti, and Pureora.<sup>120</sup> He married twice, both marriages reinforcing the bonds between the Kāwhia and Rangiatea branches of Tāwhao’s descendants. His first marriage was to Rangianewa, Tamaaio’s daughter. Their sole child was Te Ihingārangi.<sup>121</sup> A long time later, Rereahu married Hineaupouamu, who was descended from both

112. Document A83, pp 75–79; doc A110, pp 55, 121, 195–196.

113. Document A83, pp 80–81.

114. Transcript 4.1.6, p 362; see also transcript 4.1.6, pp 123–124; doc A83, pp 84–85; doc A110, pp 122, 362.

115. Document A83, pp 86–87; doc A110, p 54.

116. Document A110, pp 339–340, 361–362; doc A83, p 50; transcript 4.1.6, p 17.

117. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 273–274; doc A83, pp 81–82; doc A86, p 51; transcript 4.1.21, p 1038.

118. Document A86, pp 60–62; doc A110, pp 329, 357–358, 361–362; doc A83, pp 50–51, 81–83; transcript 4.1.17, pp 36–37, 39. For Tamaaio’s whakapapa, see doc A110, pp 54–55. For the origins of Ngāti Hā, see Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 69, 72, 76–77.

119. Document A83, pp 83–84; doc A110, pp 358, 362–363. Not long afterwards, some of Raukawa’s relatives aligned with Ngāti Tama of west Taupō and attacked Ngāti Tūwharetoa, but were defeated. Peace was followed by intermarriage which created links between the whakapapa of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa: Pei Te Hurinui Jones and Bruce Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui: The Traditional History of the Tainui People (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 2004), pp 196–214.

120. Document A110, pp 122–125; transcript 4.1.13, pp 23–24.

121. Document A83, pp 55, 84.

Whatihua and Tūrongo. That marriage produced eight children: Maniapoto, Matakore, Tūwhakahekeao, Tūrongo-tapu-ārau, Te Io-wānanga, Kahuariari, Kinohaku, and Te Rongorito.<sup>122</sup>

2.3.4 Paerangi, Ruatipua, and Ngatoroirangi

Other ancestors are important in the traditions of hapū and iwi whose rohe overlapped with the southern and eastern boundaries of Te Rohe Pōtae.

Traditions tell of Paerangi, a great ancestor who settled in the district before the arrival of the great waka migrations. Claimant Tūrama Hawira described how ‘ngā Paerangi i paranī te whenua’, ‘it was Paerangi who branded the land’ and ‘applied the tapatapa rituals of naming.’<sup>123</sup>

Kevin Amohia of Ngāti Hāua told the Tribunal that ‘the beginnings of Ngāti Hāua is that we had no waka, we had no waka’ and described two stories of the potential origins of Paerangi.<sup>124</sup> One tells of how Paerangi reached Aotearoa on his pet bird, Te Rau a Moa, which he ‘had nurtured because it was hurt. As a result, he was able to communicate with, and command the bird.’<sup>125</sup>

The alternative story describing Paerangi’s arrival suggests that he arrived by accident while searching for his children, who had been lost at sea: ‘He was eventually assisted by the winds of Hau, and was carried to the shores of Aotearoa. From this event came the name Haua-a-Paparangi which depicts the journey of Paerangi. Haua-a-Paparangi means, “the winds of our heavenly father” or “the breath of our heavenly father”.’<sup>126</sup>

Ngāti Hāua were traditionally known as Ngāti Ruatipua, named after another tupuna who arrived in the district prior to waka. Te Wainui-a-Ruatipua is also the name of the Whanganui River in Ngāti Hāua traditions.<sup>127</sup> Mr Amohia explained that ‘the Ngāti Hāua whakapapa begins at the [Tongariro] maunga and follows the Whanganui River.’<sup>128</sup>

Unlike Paerangi, it is unclear how Ruatipua first arrived in Aotearoa.<sup>129</sup> Descendants of both tupuna later intermarried with those who migrated to Aotearoa on the Aotea waka and formed the early ancestors of not just Ngāti Hāua, but Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui iwi as well.<sup>130</sup>

Ngatoroirangi is an important tupuna for Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Tūwharetoa. He was first appointed as tohunga for the Tainui waka. However, so sought-after were his talents that Tamatekapua, chief of the Te Arawa waka, kidnapped or lured

122. Document A110, pp 54–56, 122; doc A83, pp 82–84.

123. Transcript 4.1.4, p 152.

124. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 4–5.

125. Document A108, p 249.

126. Document A108, pp 249–250.

127. Document A112, p 13.

128. Document A112, p 13 (cited from Wai 903 ROI, doc K11 (Amohia), p 4).

129. Document A112, p 13.

130. Document A124, p 11.

Ngātoroirangi and his wife Kearoa aboard his waka so that he would be tohunga on the Te Arawa instead.<sup>131</sup>

Oral histories tell that, while sailing, Ngātoroirangi became enraged upon learning that Tamatekapua and Kearoa had slept together. Using sorcery, he drove the Te Arawa waka toward a whirlpool named Te Korokoro-o-Te-Parata but felt sorry for the other people aboard the waka and, citing the appropriate incantations, steered them to safety.<sup>132</sup>

The Tainui and Te Arawa waka both reached Aotearoa at Whangaparāoa, where Ngātoroirangi set free two pet birds he had brought with him.<sup>133</sup> Meto Hopa of Ngāti Hikairo told the Tribunal how Ngātoroirangi then ‘went to explore the land in Te Arawa territory and then travelled into Tūwharetoa territory.’<sup>134</sup> He explained that ‘Ngātoroirangi travelled and explored the land and beyond Ruapehu’, identifying and naming much of it.<sup>135</sup>

When Ngātoroirangi died, Mr Hopa noted, ‘he died in the Waikato River and it was the river that transported his body, floating on the ripples of the water unto the mouth of the Waikato River and out to sea.’<sup>136</sup> His body, however, washed back onto the beach where it was discovered in a decomposing state by Ngāti Hikairo tūpuna Tūmārouru and Tamatea.<sup>137</sup> The couple went on to name their son Hikairo (‘the decomposed loved one’), Ngāti Hikairo’s eponymous ancestor, in memory of Ngātoroirangi.<sup>138</sup>

2.4 TE MANA O MANIAPOTO

Early settlement in the district following the landing of the Tainui waka established the ancestors of many of today’s hapū and iwi on the land. Significant events followed that led to the emergence of one particular tupuna: Maniapoto, the eponymous ancestor of Ngāti Maniapoto. The development of Ngāti Maniapoto as an iwi coincided with other lines of Tainui descent branching out to form new hapū and iwi in their own right. These people continued to engage with others in the borders of the district.

---

131. Document A83, p 36; doc A110, pp 106–107. Other stories say that Ngātoroirangi was aboard the Tainui waka for some time, before being ‘spirited away’ by Tamatekapua onto the Te Arawa waka at Rarotonga, see doc A83, p 37.

132. Document A97, pp 41–42.

133. Document A86, p 30; doc A97, pp 41–42.

134. Transcript 4.1.2, p 277.

135. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 277–278.

136. Transcript 4.1.2, p 278.

137. Transcript 4.1.2, p 279.

138. Document A98, p 55.

Hapū and Iwi

The dominant political and social group from Maniapoto's time through to 1840 and beyond was the hapū.

Hapū typically comprised several whānau living in close proximity, united by common descent, operating under common leadership, and working together for mutual benefit. The common ancestor was typically fairly recent, often extending back little more than two or three generations. In this district, hapū were often named after founders' mothers or grandmothers: for example, Ngāti Rangatahi became established in the time of Rangatahi's son, Tūkawekai.<sup>1</sup>

They maintained cultivations and managed other communal food resources such as birding, eeling, and fishing grounds, as well as pā whawhai (fighting pā), waka, and other communal property.<sup>2</sup>

Hapū territories were well known by members of the hapū and by their neighbours. Typically, hapū members could describe in detail their ancestral relationships with mountains, lakes, rivers, swamps, rocks and caves, trees, coastal areas, and the myriad other elements of the environment, and therefore understood what occupation and usage rights they had, and how these parts of the environment should be managed.<sup>3</sup>

Nonetheless, territorial rights commonly overlapped, with people of neighbouring or related hapū able to assert ancestral connections within a hapū's territory, and therefore to assert rights. Depending on the specific relationships, these might include rights to seasonal occupation; rights to use resources such as food sources, water, and cultivations, either on a seasonal or permanent basis; and rights to safe passage. Sometimes, hapū territories overlapped or were contested.<sup>4</sup>

Claimants described how hapū moved around seasonally, following food sources; how resources were shared among different hapū, with people coming from far and wide for seasonal fishing expeditions and tuna heke. While rivers and streams were

1. For evidence of hapū formation and development in this inquiry district, see doc A110, pp 182, 244–246, 250–251, 258–259; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 224–229. Many publications have discussed the structures and roles of hapū during this period: see, for example, Anderson, Binney, and Harris, Tangata Whenua, pp 87–93, 144; Durie, Custom Law, pp 16–18; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 42–43; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 21–22.

2. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; Durie, Custom Law, pp 15–16, 23; doc A110, pp 224–225; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 42–43; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 221–244.

3. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 198–200; transcript 4.1.4, pp 124–125; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 30–31; Durie, Custom Law, pp 61–63, 84–89.

4. Durie, Custom Law, pp 84–85; also see pp 61–63; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993 (Wellington: Brooker and Friend, 1993), section 2.1.

important transport routes, the district also had an extensive network of walking tracks. Safe passage was regarded as an important right among Tainui peoples.<sup>5</sup>

Claimants also described how neighbouring hapū sometimes clashed over territory or resources, but just as often intermarried, sometimes to a point where they could scarcely be distinguished.<sup>6</sup> Claimants also described how hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto typically shared resources and worked together in common cause, with most hapū looking after domestic affairs while some specialised in territorial security.<sup>7</sup>

In effect, the hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto appear to have operated in an interdependent manner from an early stage in their history. One of the tangible results was security: for hundreds of years, Ngāti Maniapoto heartlands around Te Kūiti and Ōtorohanga were peaceful, even as borderlands became increasingly volatile.

Whether the descendants of Maniapoto operated as an iwi from an early stage in their history depends on how 'iwi' is defined. If it is understood as multiple hapū sharing common descent and routinely acting together for purposes of territorial defence, the descendants of Maniapoto probably were acting as an iwi from a very early stage.<sup>8</sup>

5. Document A108, pp 319–320; transcript 4.1.1, pp 65–68, 95–96; transcript 4.1.7, pp 46–47; transcript 4.1.5, pp 225–226; doc L14(a), p 28; doc A97, pp 57–60; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 22, 113–114.

6. Document s61(d)(Taylor), pp 7–8; transcript 4.1.5, pp 15, 53, 74, 89, 174–176; transcript 4.1.4, p 243.

7. Document L14(a), pp 6–7.

8. Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 229, 233–235.

2.4.1 Maniapoto

Although Te Ihingārangi was his eldest son by a considerable number of years, Rereahu determined that Maniapoto should inherit his mana. The story of how this occurred is famous in Tainui folklore. As Rereahu was nearing death, he sent Te Ihingārangi to complete an errand. Once Te Ihingārangi was gone, Rereahu called Maniapoto to his side, and, anointing the Crown of his head with red ochre, instructed his son to bite it. Maniapoto was thereby imbued with his father's mana, inheriting his responsibility to lead and guide Rereahu's descendants. When Te Ihingārangi returned he saw the red ochre on Maniapoto's lips and knew what had occurred.<sup>139</sup>

139. Document A110, pp 122–123; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 170–175. Te Piko Davis told an almost identical story in which Te Kanawa Whatupango asked his son Tutunui to bite his head and inherit his mana: doc O20(b) (Davis), pp 7–8. Jones and Biggs note that, after the ceremony, the two brothers fought near the Waipā River. Te Ihingārangi was defeated and left with his three children, settling in the Maungatautari district beside the Waikato River: Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, p 174.

Rereahu appears to have made this choice because he regarded Maniapoto as being more capable of uniting and guiding the remaining siblings and protecting their lands. Furthermore, Maniapoto's mother was of a senior line of descent.<sup>140</sup>

Having been overlooked, Te Ihingārangi left the district and went to live among relatives at Maungatautari. Maniapoto, meanwhile, united his remaining siblings under the cloak of Rereahu's mana.<sup>141</sup> The claimant Tom Roa told us that Te Ihingārangi was much older than Maniapoto, and would not have fought over his father's mana. Rather, the older brother's departure was by mutual consent: it was a 'Ki Tapu' (sacred agreement), which secured peace between the brothers' peoples.<sup>142</sup>

Subsequently, Maniapoto married two of Te Ihingārangi's descendants: Hinewhatihua and Paparauwhare.<sup>143</sup> According to some kōrero, Te Ihingārangi returned to Waipā late in life; others say his children either remained behind when he left or returned later, settling in the upper Waipā valley and becoming Ngāti Te Ihingārangi.<sup>144</sup> Some of his descendants remained at Maungatautari where they were incorporated into hapū such as Ngāti Korokī and Ngāti Hauā.<sup>145</sup>

The roles played by Maniapoto and his siblings reveal much about social organisation, territorial relationships, and the nature of rangatiratanga during that period. Although each had their own kāinga and spheres of influence, the boundaries were fluid, resources were shared, and responsibilities overlapped.

The elder siblings also had their own home territories. Matakore's main kāinga lay in the upper Waipā Valley, extending into the Rangitoto Range – an area renowned for its abundant bird life.<sup>146</sup> Maniapoto left him and his younger brother Tūwhakahekeao to hold these lands against any further threat from Arawa peoples to the east (and other descendants of Raukawa to the north).<sup>147</sup> At some stage a whare wānanga was created at Hurakia, known as Te Hunga Tāhere Manu.<sup>148</sup>

Kinohaku, meanwhile, is recalled as exercising influence over an extensive territory from inland Hangatiki and Waitomo to coastal Marokopa and Waikawau.<sup>149</sup>

---

140. Document A110, pp 122–123; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 170–175; transcript 4.1.6, pp 234–235, 362.

141. Document A110, pp 122–123; transcript 4.1.13, pp 23–24.

142. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 45–46.

143. Document A110, pp 71, 123.

144. Document A110, pp 54, 123; transcript 4.1.6, p 134.

145. Document A110, p 123.

146. Document A110, pp 304, 327–328; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 19.

147. Document S1, p 10; doc R13(b) (Tūwhangai), pp 3–4.

148. Document R13(b), p 5.

149. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 233–235, 274; submission 3.1.323, app A, p 2; doc G16 (Davis) p [8]; see also transcript 4.1.6, pp 60, 97–98, 113, 186–188; transcript 4.1.21, pp 19–20, 1630; doc Q11, p 3; doc S37(b) (Jensen), p 2; doc A110, pp 134, 152–153, 320, 333–336; doc A60, pp 301–305; doc A114, p 70; doc A106, pp 9–13; submission 3.4.80, para 9.

Maniapoto's lands lay in between. He and Te Ihingārangi had grown up around Ōtorohanga,<sup>150</sup> but as an adult Maniapoto also kept kāinga in several other parts of the Waipā Valley, including Te Kūiti, Taupirioterangi (south-east of Te Kūiti on the Mangaokewa Stream), Hangatiki, Mohoanui (east of present-day Ōtorohanga), and Tuitahi (west of Ōtorohanga overlooking the Waipā and Waitomo Valleys).<sup>151</sup> Late in life, he lived in a cave, known as Te Ana Ureure, in the Waitomo district.<sup>152</sup>

Each sibling is recalled as contributing special skills and resources to the wider family group. Matakore, befitting his forest homeland, was an expert in gathering and preserving forest food; Kinohaku was an expert in gathering food from the sea and waterways; Tūrongotapuarau's gift was healing; Tūwhakahekeao's was warfare and oversight of the family's shared territories; Te Io-Wānanga was guardian of sacred learning, and of knowledge about the heavens and stars; Kahuariari was an expert in child-rearing; and Te Rongorito was an expert in healing and is also recalled as a peacemaker.<sup>153</sup>

In the social structures of the time, whānau groups typically managed day-to-day economic activities such as food gathering and small-scale cultivation,<sup>154</sup> while hapū managed activities which required more labour, such as cultivation or hunting expeditions.<sup>155</sup> Rangatira led the hapū in managing these activities (see sidebar in section 2.4.4).

But the roles played by members of Maniapoto's family also speak to additional layers of responsibility which were shared between hapū. Matakore's forest food and Kinohaku's food from oceans and rivers contributed to the welfare of their siblings and their hapū.

As one example of this sharing and how it was managed, Maniapoto and Matakore jointly established a village in the Pureora forest for winter bird-snaring. The village lay about 500 metres north of a fortification used to defend the site from Arawa neighbours, and was called Tūturuwhakamate ('hold fast until death') – a clear indication of how highly valued it was.<sup>156</sup> At some point, Maniapoto and Matakore placed a pou whenua to mark their respective harvest territories. The resource, having been jointly developed and defended, was thereby also divided among their respective families. Through this arrangement, which was brokered

---

150. Maniapoto was living at Mohoanui on the Waipā River just south-west of the present-day Ōtorohanga township. Te Ihingārangi was living north of there at Tuitahi, overlooking the Waitomo and Waipā Valleys. Maniapoto moved there after he and Matakore defeated Te Ihingārangi. Tuitahi had been a Ngāti Hia pā before that tribe was conquered by Raukawa and Tamaio. Another Ngāti Maniapoto pā in the township, Kākāmutu, had also belonged to Ngāti Hia: doc A110, pp 357–358. Also see doc A60, p 637.

151. Document 99(b) (Wi), p 4; doc A110, pp 125, 357–359; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 178–179.

152. Transcript 4.1.6, p 22; transcript 4.1.13, p 23; doc A110, pp 125, 361.

153. Document A110, pp 122–125; transcript 4.1.13, pp 23–24.

154. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 30; New Zealand Law Commission, Māori Custom and Values in New Zealand Law, pp 41–42.

155. See doc A110, ch 3.

156. Document A110, p 327.

by Te Rongorito, the peacemaker, the brothers worked together to secure the resource, while avoiding conflict over its allocation.<sup>157</sup>

As the principal leader, Maniapoto was responsible for defence across all the territories of his siblings' hapū. During his lifetime, inter-hapū and inter-waka conflict was becoming more common at the district's northern and southern borders. Yet Maniapoto's strength was rarely tested. On one occasion, Maniapoto and his people killed a group of men who had come 'from the east' of his village Taupiri-o-te-Rangi and challenged his authority.<sup>158</sup> On another occasion, he quickly repelled an attack led by his cousin Wairangi, who was seeking to avenge an insult: Kinohaku's daughter Rangipare had refused to marry him, and instead had run off with her cousin, Maniapoto's son, Tūtakamoana.<sup>159</sup> This conflict planted the seed for the later formal division of Tūrongo's descendants into Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa factions.<sup>160</sup>

Through the combined strength of Maniapoto and his siblings, they were able to maintain peace and security throughout their territories during much of Maniapoto's life and for many generations beyond. Tūwhakahekeao was trained to command warriors and acted, on occasion, as Maniapoto's deputy, but he is also recalled as a man of great gentleness. One of his principal responsibilities, according to Shane Te Ruki and Piripi Crown, was to 'go and check the various hapū, and [i]f food supplies were exhausted, [to] . . . tell them where to move.'<sup>161</sup> Thus, he embodied the combination of military prowess, territorial control, and care for his people's well-being which were hallmarks of rangatiratanga. According to the claimant Tāme Tūwhangai, it was Tūwhakahekeao who founded Ngāti Rereahu.<sup>162</sup>

Te Rongorito's special role as a broker of peace was underlined by Rereahu's decision to give her an area of land east of Ōtorohanga, known as Te Marae o Hine, on which all violence was forbidden. This, not coincidentally, also marked a border zone between the lands of Rereahu and those of his siblings. Many years later, Te Rauparaha's violation of that prohibition would have serious consequences for him and his people.<sup>163</sup>

157. Document A110, pp 304, 327–328; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report, p 28.

158. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 178–182; see also 'Native Land Court Judgment', New Zealand Herald, 2 February 1893, p 3.

159. Document H8 (Maniapoto), pp 3–4; doc A110, pp 179–180. Wairangi was descended from Takihiku, and had kāinga at Wharepūhanga: doc A83, pp 94, 97–105. Wairangi and his close kin had been involved in an aggressive territorial expansion northwards from Wharepūhanga to Maungatautari, in which the Ngāti Kahupungapunga people were all but wiped out: doc A83, pp 95–104; also see pp 89–94; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 138–142.

160. Document A110, pp 179–180, 197–198, 249–250.

161. PN Crown and GS Te Ruki, Te Kete Kōrero, He Kohinga Kōrero Kaumātua, Ngā Tūpuna Taketake a Ngāti Maniapoto: The Founding Ancestors of Maniapoto (Te Kūiti: Kowhai Consulting, 2004) (doc A110, p 124).

162. Document S1, p 10.

163. Her status is commemorated in the pepeha 'Kei hewa ki te marae o Hine' (Do not desecrate the courtyard of Hine [Te Rongorito]): doc A110, pp 125, 191, 249, 385. Also see transcript 4.1.11, p [63]; transcript 4.1.4, p 215; transcript 4.1.6, p 393.

Experiences in the physical world were echoes of experiences in the realm of atua. This was the province of Te Io Wānanga. According to Mr Crown and Mr Te Ruki:

Ko te āhuetanga o te tūpuna nei, kei a ia ngā kōrero hōhonu o te whare wānanga. Ko ia hoki te mea e mōhio ana ki ngā kaupapa e pā ana ki te Atua-nui-o-te-rangi, ērā kōrero katoa kei a ia kei Te Io-wānanga. Mai i te taha-tū o te rangi, mai i te Atua ngā kōrero o te Kete Aro-nui te Uruuru-Matua, ngā kōrero mō ngā whetū, mō te timatanga o te ao. Nō reira te ingoa Te Io-wānanga.

Concerning the circumstances of this ancestor, he was the one who possessed the fundamental teachings of the house of learning. He was also the one who knew the profundities concerning the great God-of-the-heavens; all those teachings were with him, Io-wānanga [Io the Learned]. From the sky's horizon, from the God himself [came] the teachings from the set of directions for the principal chants, teachings concerning the stars, and for the beginnings of the world. From these [came] the name, Io-wānanga.<sup>164</sup>

The combined strength of Maniapoto and his family is reflected in the saying 'Te mana whatu ahuru o Maniapoto', as described in section 2.2.1. This term was used in the 1904 kawenata (covenant) of Ngāti Maniapoto to describe the unified spiritual authority handed down from Io-mātua-te-kore through generations to Hoturoa and on to Rereahu and Maniapoto and their people.<sup>165</sup>

Unity among Maniapoto's siblings is also reflected in Maniapoto's final saying, uttered as he lay dying during a family gathering at Kākāmorea, near Waitomo. After watching them perform a haka he told them: 'Kia mau ki tēnā, kia mau ki te kawau-mārō' (Stick to that, the straight flying cormorant).<sup>166</sup>

Literally, this described the cormorant straightening its neck as it dives into the ocean to capture prey. Figuratively, it referred to a battle formation that Maniapoto had perfected, in which warriors were arranged in the shape of an arrow and darted forward towards their opponents. It referred to numerous people moving as one, led by the strongest and bravest, striking without hesitation.<sup>167</sup>

2.4.2 Other lines of Tainui descent

While Tūrongo's descendants were increasing their influence throughout the district, other branches of Tainui were also moving out from their original Kāwhia home to occupy new lands. These groups, while maintaining close affiliations with their Ngāti Maniapoto kin, established their own identities in territories in the northern parts of the inquiry district.

164. Crown and Te Ruki, Te Kete Kōrero (doc A110, pp 32–33).

165. Document s19(a), app H, pp 28–31, app I, pp 37–39, 48.

166. Transcript 4.1.6, p 231.

167. Transcript 4.1.1, p 16; doc A110, pp 18, 125; see also transcript 4.1.6, p 231; transcript 4.1.5, pp 248–249. 'Te kawau mārō' is sometimes translated as 'the straight-flying cormorant', and sometimes as 'the swoop of the cormorant'.

One branch, descended from Pūhanga (a great-grandson of Hoturoa) and led by Tamapoto,<sup>168</sup> moved inland from Aotea and Whāingaroa to occupy lands north of Pirongia. They became Ngāti Māhanga.<sup>169</sup> Māhanga was also an important ancestor for some of the groups mentioned below.<sup>170</sup>

Another Tainui branch, descended from Tuhianga, brother of Tāwhao and uncle of Tūrongo (see section 2.1.2), occupied much of southern Kāwhia. They expanded their influence to coastal Marokopa. Of particular importance was Tūpāhau, who drove an invading Waikato force from these lands. Some of his descendants became known as Ngāti Mango and then as Ngāti Toa-rangatira. Others intermarried with Ngāti Kinohaku and Ngāti Waiora, becoming part of Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>171</sup> Other descendants of Tuhianga moved inland, marrying descendants of Tūrongo and settling around Hangatiki and Kakepuku, becoming Ngāti Huiao and Ngāti Nguu.<sup>172</sup>

Several other groups descended from Tūrongo's brother Whatihua either occupied or spread out from Kāwhia. Some remained in northern Kāwhia or expanded northwards to Aotea and Whāingaroa. They included Ngāti Tūrirangi, Ngāti Koata, Ngāti Wehi Wehi, and Ngāti Te Wehi, among others.<sup>173</sup> Other descendants of Whatihua moved inland, founding Ngāti Kauwhata, Ngāti Tūkorehe, Ngāti Korokī, Ngāti Hauā, Ngāi Tamainupō, and Ngāti Apakura.<sup>174</sup> A third group of Whatihua's descendants settled east of Pirongia around Te Kawa Swamp, intermarrying with Ngāti Kahupungapunga and becoming Ngāti Mōtai and then Ngāti Unu.<sup>175</sup>

Meanwhile, an Arawa rangatira, Pikiāo, migrated into the district from Rotorua, settling east of the Waikato River and marrying a Tainui chieftainess. Their descendants became Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Pāoa.<sup>176</sup>

168. Most Tainui lines of descent trace to Mōtai, Pūhanga's brother: transcript 4.1.16, p 20; doc A94, p 30; see also doc A83, p 80; doc M3 (Taukiri, King, and Kihī), p 2.

169. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 16–19; 25–26; doc A94, pp 30, 36–38.

170. For example, Māhanga is mentioned in the whakapapa of Ngāti Koata, Ngāti Te Wehi, Ngāti Korokī, Ngāti Hauā, and Ngāti Tamainupō: doc A94, pp 147–149, 158–160; doc A104, pp 77–78.

171. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 154–161; doc A102, p 16; doc A106 (Young), pp 7, 10, 12–13; doc A110, pp 79, 81, 134, 152–153, 335; doc A147 (Stirling), pp 5, 23, 107; transcript 4.1.6, p 188. Tuhianga was Tāwhao's brother and therefore Tūrongo's uncle (doc A99, p 40). Toa-rangatira could also trace descent from Maniapoto (doc A102, p 19) and Whatihua (doc A99, pp 54–55).

172. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 62, 89; transcript 4.1.6, pp 225–227, 230–232, 235, 290–291; doc G14, pp [2]–[4]; doc A110, pp 78–81, 142; doc A60, pp 198–204.

173. Document A104(i) (de Silva), p 30; doc A99, pp 54–55.

174. Document A102, pp 16–17; doc A97, pp 29–31, 34, 101; doc A102, p 18; doc A108, p 303; doc A83, pp 86, 161, 164, 166, 177, 258–259, 276; doc A101, p 6; doc A94, p 48; doc A109, pp 13–14. Ngāti Apakura occupied lands between Ngāroto and the Pūniu River. Moepatu Borrell and Robert Joseph, in their traditional history of Ngāti Apakura, trace a line of descent from Whatihua and Apakura to Pikirangi down to Tamatea, who married Tūmarourou of Ngāti Maniapoto. From there, there are many overlaps between Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Maniapoto lines of descent: doc A97, pp 61–63, 77, 84; doc A110, pp 150, 169, 286.

175. Claim 1.1.118, pp 3–4; transcript 4.1.1, pp 60–70, 126; doc A110, pp 78, 82–83. Ngāti Mōtai was named for Mōtai II or Mōtai Weherua, a descendant of Whatihua, not for Mōtai I or Mōtai Tangatarau, who was Hoturoa's great-grandson.

176. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 106–109, 162–163.

As discussed earlier, Ngāti Hia – descendants of the early Tainui explorer Hiaroa – occupied significant areas in the south-west of the district; and Ngāti Rākei, descended from Hape, occupied lands around the Mōkau River and some distance inland.<sup>177</sup> Another hapū, Ngāti Hotu, occupied the district's south-western corner.<sup>178</sup>

Spheres of Influence: The Nature of Land Interests

Traditionally, the determining factor in land rights and interests was not ownership, but ancestral connection. If a person's ancestors had travelled through the land, named it, left pou whenua (markers), lived or died there, used its resources, and so on – he or she could assert rights to maintain those connections. As a result, rights and interests were typically complex and interwoven, just as whakapapa were.

This way of relating to land has three important implications.

First, different types of right could co-exist within the same territory. A hapū might, through ancestral connection, assert rights to occupy a territory, and that right might be recognised and respected by others. But others could nonetheless assert rights to use resources within the territory.<sup>1</sup> They might, for example, have rights to gather berries, or cultivate kūmara, or harvest birds, tuna, fish or other food, on either a seasonal or a permanent basis. Likewise, others might have rights of seasonal occupation.<sup>2</sup> At the very least, Tainui hapū typically had rights of safe passage to and through others' territories, so long as their purposes were not hostile.<sup>3</sup>

Secondly, among neighbouring groups, rights to occupy were typically overlapping and interwoven. The Ngāti Maniapoto historian Dr Robert Joseph referred to neighbouring hapū having 'spheres of influence' or areas of 'blurred association' which overlapped and were likely to shift according to prevailing circumstances, rather than fixed boundaries.<sup>4</sup>

1. Durie, Custom Law, pp 84–85; also see pp 61–63.

2. Document A108, pp 319–320; Durie, Custom Law, pp 69, 84–87.

3. For example, claimant traditions refer to Te Ngohi Kāwhia of Ngāti Paretokawa in the early 1800s regularly travelling between lands at Napinapi, Kāwhia, and Pūniu to maintain relationship with others and go on fishing expeditions: transcript 4.1.1, p 147.

4. Transcript 4.1.13, pp 31–32; see also Durie, Custom Law, p 88; doc A35 (Ward), p 10; doc A110, pp 134, 218, 224–225, 249–250, 287; doc A97, p 90; doc A108, pp 22–23, 126.

177. Document A28, pp 15, 20; doc A110, p 85.

178. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 45–47, 110–113.

Intermarriage, peace agreements, the formation of alliances, shifts in allegiance among members of a hapū, and shifts in military power could all lead to interweaving of rights, or shifts in the balance between neighbours.<sup>5</sup>

Ngāti Maniapoto has many traditions of neighbouring hapū co-existing without any formal boundaries between them, sometimes because rights and interests overlapped, and sometimes because they were contested.<sup>6</sup>

Typically, formal boundaries were marked only when needed to secure peace following a period of conflict. There are several examples throughout this chapter, including the establishment of ridgeline boundaries between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Tūwharetoa (section 2.4.4), and Peehi Tūkōrehu's use of the Pūniu River as an aukati to prevent conflict between Ngāti Maniapoto and their neighbours, including Ngāti Raukawa (section 2.5.2.3).<sup>7</sup>

On such occasions, natural features were often used, but pou whenua or other physical markers were sometimes put in place. For example, claimants described trenches and other markers used to define boundaries in the heavily populated northern Kāwhia–Aotea area.<sup>8</sup>

Even where fixed boundaries were established, they often related to resources, not to occupation<sup>9</sup> (as in the case of Maniapoto and Matakore dividing their birding grounds),<sup>10</sup> and individuals typically retained ancestral rights on either side of the line.<sup>11</sup> In any case, such boundaries became increasingly blurred over time as peacemaking was followed by intermarriage, as occurred, for example, along the Maniapoto–Tūwharetoa<sup>12</sup> and Maniapoto–Whanganui borders.<sup>13</sup>

As Dr Joseph and other authorities emphasised, what mattered was whakapapa relationships with land and resources, which by their nature crossed physical boundaries.<sup>14</sup>

A third important implication of whakapapa-based relationships with land was that rights were vested in all members of a group, not only its leaders. Within a

5. Transcript 4.1.13, p 31; see also Durie, Custom Law, p 88; doc A35, p 10; doc A110, pp 134, 218, 224–225, 249–250, 287; doc A97, pp 28, 69–70, 90; doc A108, pp 22–23, 126; doc A94, p 54; doc A108, pp 42, 319–320.

6. Document A110, pp 224, 250–251.

7. Document A110, pp 163, 219–220, 251–253, 258–259; transcript 4.1.4, pp 14–16; transcript 4.1.5, pp 95–96; transcript 4.1.3, pp 146–147; transcript 4.1.6, pp 191–192, 317.

8. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 27–28; transcript 4.1.5, pp 95–96; transcript 4.1.4, pp 14–16; transcript 4.1.3, pp 147–148; doc A97, pp 100–101; Durie, Custom Law, pp 86–87.

9. Transcript 4.1.13, pp 31–32; Durie, Custom Law, p 88.

10. Document A110, pp 327–328.

11. Durie, Custom Law, pp 84–89.

12. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 62–69, 147.

13. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka: The Whanganui Land Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2015), vol 1, pp 55–56, 95–96; transcript 4.1.4, pp 14–16.

14. Transcript 4.1.13, p 32; doc A35, p 10; doc A110, pp 134, 224–225; doc A97, p 90; doc A94, p 54; Durie, Custom Law, pp 84–89.

hapū's territories, rights in land and other resources rested with everyone by virtue of their common descent from the founding ancestor. Though a rangatira might allocate land or other resources for individual use, this was a management function: the land was not his, and his actions were tika (valid or correct) only if serving the whole community.<sup>15</sup>

Similarly, rangatira could exercise protective mana over a wide district but only retain land interests in a limited area. Te Kanawa Whatupango (section 2.4.4), for example, played important roles in establishing and protecting Ngāti Maniapoto boundaries with neighbouring iwi, but his people were military specialists, and so possessed little land for themselves.<sup>16</sup>

---

15. Durie, Custom Law, pp 84–89.

16. Document s1, pp 8–9, 14; Durie, Custom Law, pp 75–76.

2.4.3 From Maniapoto to Te Kanawa

According to most sources, Maniapoto had three wives, each of whom bore one son.<sup>179</sup> Over several generations, their descendants extended their influence throughout most of the district. As they did so, they encountered other branches of the Tainui family, and people of neighbouring iwi – Ngāti Tūwharetoa in the east, Ngāti Hāua (as distinct from Ngāti Hauā in the north) and other upper Whanganui people in the south, and Ngāti Tama in the south-west around Mōkau and Parininihi.

Such encounters sometimes led to conflict, and often to intermarriage, creating webs of ancestral connection that became increasingly complex with each successive generation.

Maniapoto's eldest son was Te Kawairangi, who travelled to Maungakiekie and married the twin sisters Mārei and Māroa, who were both of distant Tainui descent.<sup>180</sup> Te Kawairangi and Mārei had one son, Rungaterangi,<sup>181</sup> who married into Ngāti Tama and went from his Ōtorohanga home<sup>182</sup> to live at Mōkau.<sup>183</sup> Their children were Maniāopetini and Uruhina.<sup>184</sup> Te Kawairangi and Māroa also had a son, Tukemata.<sup>185</sup>

---

179. Document A110, pp 57–60, 70–72, 123. Hinemania's son was Te Kawairangi. Hinewhatihua's son was Tūtakamoana. Paparauwhare's son was Rōrā.

180. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 16–17; transcript 4.1.5, p 32; doc A110, pp 59–60, 123–124, 128–129; doc A97, pp 90–91.

181. Some sources name Uekaha as Te Kawairangi's first son from a marriage prior to Mārei and Māroa, but most refer to Uekaha as being from Te Kawairangi's third marriage: doc A110, pp 69–70, 154; transcript 4.1.4, p 200.

182. Document A110, p 358.

183. Document A110, p 60; transcript 4.1.4, p 216; transcript 4.1.5, p 111.

184. Document A110, p 61.

185. Document A110, p 154.

Te Kawairirangi was killed by his wife's family during a visit to Maungakiekie, and Tukemata and Rungaterangi were both killed by Ngāti Tama warriors. Each of these slayings created take (causes) that lasted through several generations.<sup>186</sup> Maniapoto's third son, Rōrā, also married into Ngāti Tama and was killed by his wife's parents, though according to Jones and Biggs this was regarded as justified utu for his own killing of a Ngāti Tama leader.<sup>187</sup>

Maniāopetini, as a young man, set off for Tāmaki to seek utu for his grandfather's death, but drowned along the way. He was found covered in iro (maggots); this is one of several possible explanations for the name of his grandson, Hikairo I.<sup>188</sup>

Maniāopetini's eldest son Taitengāhue married Kaputuhi. Their children were Maniāuruahu I<sup>189</sup> and Parekura. Maniāuruahu is recalled as a great rangatira and tohunga, and as one of the most senior figures in the Tainui network of whare wānanga. He was sometimes known as Te Kauhanganui ('The Great Council'), and sometimes as Te Kanawa Whatuhero.<sup>190</sup> His first marriage to Oneone produced male heirs, who continued the senior line of descent to the nineteenth-century leaders Te Rangituataka I and Te Rerenga Wetere.<sup>191</sup> The claimant Kaawhia Te Muraahi referred to this as a tohunga line.<sup>192</sup>

Te Kawairirangi's second marriage to Māroa produced many descendants, including a grandson, Maniāuruahu I, who married Rangatahi (granddaughter of Maniapoto, and the eponymous ancestor of Ngāti Rangatahi).<sup>193</sup> Rangatahi's marriage produced a son and three daughters, including Urunumia, eponymous ancestor of Ngāti Urunumia. Together, through a combination of intermarriage and military prowess, the descendants of Rangatahi's four children strengthened Ngāti Maniapoto influence throughout the Tūhua district, and extended it into 186. Document Q29(a) (Wetere), paras 5–6; transcript 4.1.5, pp 32, 110–113; transcript 4.1.1, pp 16–17; doc A110, pp 123, 154–155, 358. Also see doc A97, pp 90–91; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 232–235. William Wētere (Ngāti Rungaterangi) gave evidence that Mārei's brothers saw Te Kawairirangi and his son as threatening their power among their Waiohua people.

187. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 182–187.

188. Transcript 4.1.5, p 112; doc F8 (Maniapoto-Anderson and Wetere), pp 6–7; doc A108, pp 316–317. In some traditions, the name Hikairo comes from the drowning of another ancestor, Ngātoroirangi: doc A98, pp 54–55; transcript 4.1.2, p 279; transcript 4.1.4, p 44.

189. Maniāuruahu I was descended from Te Kawairirangi through his second marriage to Māroa. The male line of descent was Te Kawairirangi to Tukemata to Maniāuruahu. Maniāuruahu I (also known as Te Kanawa Whatuhero) was of a senior line but a later generation. He was descended from Te Kawairirangi through his first marriage to Mārei. The male line of descent was Te Kawairirangi to Rungaterangi to Maniāopetini to Taitengāhue to Maniāuruahu I. Many sources refer to Maniāuruahu without distinguishing between the two: see transcript 4.1.4, pp 200, 203–204; doc A110, pp 61–63, 68–69; doc s1, p 7.

190. Document s1, pp 4–5; doc G32, pp 4–5, 7; doc A110, p 62.

191. Document A110, pp 62–63; doc G32, pp 5–6.

192. Document G32, pp 3, 7.

193. Transcript 4.1.4, p 200; doc A110, pp 68–69.

neighbouring areas.<sup>194</sup> According to Rovina Maniapoto, Rangatahi was ‘tūturu Maniapoto’ (properly or really Maniapoto), and from her children came the whakapapa that bound Waikato and Maniapoto. Hekeiterangi provided her link to Waikato and the Kingitanga; Tūmārouru was the mother of Hikairo, providing her link to Kāwhia; Tūkawekai and his Ngāti Rangatahi people provided the link to Ōhura and Taumarunui in the south; and Urunumia bound all of Te Rohe Pōtae. Together, they were ‘the bastions’ of Ngāti Maniapoto, protecting its borders and populating its heartlands.<sup>195</sup>

Urunumia married Te Kawairirangi II, a descendant of Uruhina, and together they had three sons, Te Kanawa Whatupango, Ingoa, and Te Kōrae.<sup>196</sup> Te Kōrae is recalled as a tohunga, and the others as warriors.<sup>197</sup> All were instrumental in establishing the limits of Ngāti Maniapoto influence from Kāwhia and Ngāroto in the north to Ōhura and Parininihi in the south. Of the three, the leader was Te Kanawa Whatupango, who became a highly renowned and feared military and political operator.<sup>198</sup>

He and Maniāuruahu II (Te Kanawa Whatuwhero) were contemporaries, and their shared names were not coincidental. According to Ms Maniapoto, the name Te Kanawa harked back to the establishment of Te Ahurei and the raising of the limestone pillars Hani and Puna on the foreshore below. As the original settlers died off, their mana was handed down to future generations of high priests known as Te Kauhanganui (the name was later used for Te Wherowhero’s Parliament). Each of these high priests had a formal name, along with appropriate clothing and a stone patu used for ceremonial purposes.<sup>199</sup>

2.4.4 Te Kanawa Whatupango: ancestor of chiefs

Prior to about 1700, most of the conflicts that had occurred in the district could be classed as family disputes. There were exceptions, such as the Ngāti Raukawa conquest of Ngāti Kahupungapunga, and Tūpāhau’s reoccupation of Marokopa, but for the most part outbreaks of violence occurred over marital disputes or other personal slights, and did not lead to sustained warfare or significant reallocation of territory.

---

194. Document H8 (Maniapoto-Anderson), p 3; transcript 4.1.4, pp 206, 208; transcript 4.1.13, p 29; doc A44, pp 2, 14; doc A108, pp 79–82, 84; doc A110, pp 68–69. Hekeiterangi appears in Tainui whakapapa as the wife of Hekemaru and mother of Mahuta and Pāoa, and again as the wife of another senior Waikato rangatira, Ngāwaero. The two marriages appear to have been several generations apart. Most traditions refer to Hekeiterangi, daughter of Maniāuruahu I and Rangatahi, as having married Ngāwaero. The earlier Hekeiterangi, mother of Mahuta and Pāoa, was the daughter of Tumanawahoe (Mataatua) and Kahutaramoa (Ngāti Huiāo): see doc E4; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 162, 170, 240–247, 250–253, 295, 297, 301. Also see J B W Robertson, ‘The Significance of New Zealand Tribal Tradition’, Journal of the Polynesian Society, 1958, vol 67, no 1, p 50; doc H8, pp 4–5; transcript 4.1.3, p 139; doc A110, p 88.

195. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 204–208. Also see doc H8, pp 3–5; doc L4 (Wi), p 5.

196. Document A110, pp 63, 68.

197. Document G32, p 6.

198. Document S1, pp 4–5; doc L7 (Tūwhangai), p [19]; doc A114, p 215.

199. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 217–218. Also see doc S1, pp 1, 4–5.

From around Te Kanawa Whatupango's time (late 1600s or early 1700s), that began to change, largely due to population growth and the resulting competition for land and food resources. As we have seen, the familiar pattern of settlement was based on hapū exploring and settling new lands, which were then divided every few generations or so as populations reached a critical mass. That approach reached its natural limit as Maniapoto's descendants pushed out towards territories held by other groups.

As land and resources became scarcer around their Ōtorohanga and Orahiri homelands, Maniāruahu's son Tukawekai led a hapū south to Ōhura, where they settled among and married into Ngāti Hāua and other upper Whanganui tribes. This group became known as Ngāti Rangatahi, in honour of Tukawekai's mother.<sup>200</sup>

At around this time an important development occurred. Te Kanawa Whatupango and the Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira Tūtētēwhā are said to have established the boundary between their two peoples, thereby settling tensions that had remained alive since Raukawa's time. Tradition has it that they raced along the ridgelines from Titiraupenga in the north to Waituhi in the south (via Pureora, Hurakia, and Hauhangaroa), with Te Kanawa blowing his trumpet at Tūhua to signal his victory.<sup>201</sup>

The race – which followed a route very similar to that of Rakataura and Kahurere many generations earlier – is commemorated in various stories and sayings,<sup>202</sup> and in the meeting house Hia Kaitupeka on the Taringamotu River, which has Tūtētēwhā on one ridgepole and Te Kanawa on the other.<sup>203</sup> The two tribes settled peace at Oruaiwi (the place of two tribes) south of Tūhua, and secured it through marriage between Te Kanawa's son Wairakei and Rurupuku of Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>204</sup>

The northern part of these boundaries around Pureora and Hurakia had been settled long ago by descendants of Raukawa, including Ngāti Matakore, Ngāti Rereahu, and Ngāti Te Ihingārangi. Te Kanawa Whatupango left his fighting pā, Ōtūtewehi, on the Mangakahu Stream, in the possession of his Ngāti Urunumia 200. Document A66 (Young and Belgrave), p7; doc A108, pp80–82, 87–91, 127, 138; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauonoka, vol 1, pp94–96. For whakapapa links, also see doc A44, app A, p2; doc A108, pp82, 84–85; transcript 4.1.4, p208. For Ngāti Hāua origins, see doc A108, p23; doc A124 (Young and Belgrave), pp11–18.

201. Document R13, pp15–17; transcript 4.1.4, pp62–63, 67–71, 73–74, 146–147, 254–255; doc A108, pp135–138. Napa Ōtimi (Ngāti Tūwharetoa) gave the boundary as running from Waituhi to Hauhangaroa to Hurakia to Pureora to Titiraupenga: transcript 4.1.4, pp69–70. Harold Maniapoto (Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Maniapoto) gave the boundary running 'along the Rangitoto Ranges to Tūhua including the Hurakia, Pureora, and Titiraupenga ranges, thence to the Whanganui river'.

202. Tāme Tūwhangai referred to a famous Ngāti Maniapoto whakatauki: 'Te Tekō o Tūhua, Te Tekō o Te Kanawa' (The pinnacle of Tūhua, the pinnacle of Te Kanawa): transcript 4.1.4, p147. Napa Ōtimi (Ngāti Tūwharetoa) referred to another traditional saying that the waters flowing from the mountains east to Taupō are reserved for kōura (freshwater crayfish) and kōara (a species of whitebait) – that is, for Ngāti Tūwharetoa – and those flowing to the west are for pīharau (lamprey), tuna (eels), and kokopū (another species of whitebait) – that is, for Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Rereahu, and Ngāti Raukawa: transcript 4.1.4, pp73–74.

203. Transcript 4.1.4, pp254–255; transcript 4.1.17, pp29, 32, 622.

204. Document S1, p10; doc A110, pp158, 181.

relatives, who settled in the districts west of Te Kanawa's boundary, founding Ngāti Hari, Ngāti Huru, and Ngāti Pāhere.<sup>205</sup> As in Ōhura, intermarriage subsequently blurred inter-hapū and inter-tribal boundaries.<sup>206</sup>

According to the Ngāti Huru claimant Tame Tūwhangai, not long afterwards Te Kanawa also saw off an invasion of Hurakia by Ngāti Whakatere and Ngāti Wheoro, once again securing peace through intermarriage.<sup>207</sup> During his lifetime, Te Kanawa was also influential in battles at Kāwhia, and around Pirongia, Waipā, and Ngāroto, which we will discuss below.<sup>208</sup> It was at Pirongia and southern Kāwhia locations that he is said to have mainly lived, though he also sometimes occupied Te Ana Ureure, Maniapoto's cave.<sup>209</sup>

Just as his brother Te Kōrae and his descendants had settled in the south, Te Kanawa's other brother Ingoa settled in the north near Te Kawa Swamp, marrying into Ngāti Unu and asserting Ngāti Maniapoto mana in the district.<sup>210</sup> Te Kanawa's last fight occurred north of there at Lake Ngāroto, where he and his brother Ingoa helped Ngāti Apakura see off a challenge from Ngāti Puhiaue. According to the claimant Martin Morehu McDonald (Ngāti Ingoa), this was the first time Ngāti Maniapoto had asserted mana north of the Pūniu River. After victory had been achieved, Ingoa claimed mana over the district, and some of his kin remained there.<sup>211</sup>

Te Kanawa's role in establishing and protecting Ngāti Maniapoto's boundaries earned him a formidable reputation throughout Te Rohe Pōtae and beyond. Claimants translated his name as meaning 'Te Kanawa of the baleful eye', referring to his eye for war; and also called him 'Te Kanawa ki te ringaringa nui hei whāwhā' (Te Kanawa with the strong hand to reach out and touch).<sup>212</sup>

Mr Tūwhangai described him as sheltering Ngāti Maniapoto under his kahu kura (impervious war cloak), by organising some hapū into specialist border protection forces, leaving others to concentrate on cultivation and harvesting.<sup>213</sup> Ngāti Urunumia, named for Te Kanawa's mother, is regarded as fulfilling this role, and claimants also referred to a 'Te Kanawa confederation' of fighting hapū occupying 205. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 143–147, 257; doc A66, pp 13–17; doc S1, p 12; doc A110, pp 173–174, 316.

206. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 146–147; doc A114, p 70.

207. Document S1, p 11.

208. Document S1, pp 9–13; transcript 4.1.1, pp 52–53, 72–73.

209. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 194–195; transcript 4.1.1, pp 93–94; doc A110, pp 351, 353; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 276–277.

210. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 51–54, 70–73, 114, 126, 133–134.

211. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 52–54; transcript 4.1.4, pp 62, 69–70, 73; doc A110, pp 305, 351.

212. Another epithet was 'Te Kanawa, he waha kai atua' ('Te Kanawa whose mouth devours the gods'), reflecting the regularity with which he called others to war: doc S1, pp 1, 10; see also transcript 4.1.2, p 161; transcript 4.1.4, p 147; transcript 4.1.1, pp 52–54; doc L7, p 19; doc A110, p 316; doc A108, p 135.

213. Document S1, pp 8–9. Mr Tūwhangai and some other sources also referred to Te Kanawa as an ariki or paramount chief of Ngāti Maniapoto, a description that reflected his considerable mana as a fighting chief: doc L7, p 19; doc A110, p 226.

lands in both north and south, and travelling to where they were needed. This legacy was to endure into future generations.<sup>214</sup>

Of equal significance were Te Kanawa's marriages to Waikohika (Ngāti Matakore) and Whaeapare (Ngāti Apakura). Their children continued his legacy, defending Ngāti Maniapoto borders, avenging past causes, and, at times, extending Ngāti Maniapoto mana beyond traditional boundaries. In turn, their marriages established or deepened alliances which linked Ngāti Maniapoto to powerful iwi in the district. His daughters married descendants of Māhanga, Mahuta, Apakura, and Raukawa, among others, thereby establishing links with most of the peoples of Ngāti Maniapoto's northern borders.<sup>215</sup>

Te Kanawa's descendants included the first Māori King, Pōtatau Te Wherowhero and his son Tāwhiao, as well as Peehi Tūkōrehu, Hikairo 11, Rewi Maniapoto, Wahanui Huatare, Taonui Hikaka (1 and 11), and most of the district's other leading rangatira of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The Roles of Rangatira

Within hapū, leadership was provided by rangatira, who were typically people of senior descent who also had proven ability to unite, lead, defend, and provide for their people.<sup>1</sup>

Rangatira fulfilled several functions. Within hapū, they mediated in disputes; guided collective decision-making among whānau leaders; and coordinated communal economic activities such as larger-scale cultivation, hunting, eeling, and fishing expeditions, and the construction of waka, whare, and pā.<sup>2</sup>

Rangatira were also required to manage relationships with other hapū, in a manner that served the interests of their people. This required them to be masters of diplomacy, able to build and maintain social bonds through intermarriage, hospitality, gift exchange, and appeals to common interest and descent. It also required

1. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, vol 1, pp30–31; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp41–42, 44–49; Durie, Custom Law, pp33–34, 36–37.

2. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p30; Durie, Custom Law, pp16–17, 18.

214. Document s1, pp9, 14; doc L7, p19; doc L4, p5. One impact of this system, according to Mr Tūwhangai, was that Ngāti Te Kanawa and other fighting forces held very little land in their own right; their role was not to hold and use land, but to defend it for others.

215. Document A110, pp63–67, 150, 158, 169, 199; doc A94, pp151, 155; doc A98, p142; doc A100, p11; transcript 4.1.3, p3.

them to be masters of politics and warfare, able to build alliances, form tactics, and lead their people into battle.<sup>3</sup>

Depending on its size, each hapū might have a leading rangatira and two or three lieutenants, each fulfilling different functions. In some groups, the eldest male took on the role of spiritual leadership, leaving politics and warfare to younger siblings or cousins. This was the case, for example, in the relationships of Te Kanawa Whatupango and his brother Te Kōrae, and more recently in Te Rerenga Wētere and his brother Te Rangituataka 11.<sup>4</sup>

Maniāuruahu played the role of spiritual leader while his younger cousin Te Kanawa Whatupango organised the tribal military alliance.

In colonial times, divisions of labour can be seen between Rewi Maniapoto (as military leader), Wahanui Huatare (as diplomat), and Taonui Hīkaka 11 (whose mana and whakapapa relationships gave him authority to establish the aukati around Ngāti Maniapoto lands).

Women, too, played important but distinct leadership roles – often acting as mediators or peacemakers, as with Maniapoto's sister Te Rongorito.

Because mana was distributed among all members of a hapū, rangatira could never be absolute rulers. On the contrary, they could lead only so long as they retained the support of their people, which depended on their ability to serve and protect the collective mana.

Within the hapū, they were expected to lead by consent, and to act in ways that served their people's interests.

In external relations, rangatira could speak for their hapū, and their words were regarded as binding on the whole hapū – they were regarded as tapu, and embodied the collective mana. But rangatira were also expected to act in accordance with hapū wishes (whether express or implied). In any matter of major significance they could be expected to consult their people before making a decision, as we will see in chapter 8 when we consider the negotiation of Te Ōhākī Tapu.<sup>5</sup>

3. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 67–68; doc L14(a), p 28; Durie, Custom Law, pp 21, 28–29, 32; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 177–191, 193–204, 233.

4. Document G32, p 6; 'Death of a Chief of Ancient Race', Taranaki Herald, 18 June 1904, p 3.

5. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 109–112; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, vol 1, pp 30–31; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 229–230; Waitangi Tribunal: He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, pp 99–102.

2.5 CONFLICT AND REALIGNMENT

In the generations following Te Kanawa, a series of conflicts broke out that helped reshape and solidify the rights held by hapū and iwi across the district. Following these conflicts, peace agreements were reached, which allowed for new relationships to emerge over rights and resources. During this period, Ngāti Maniapoto were able to cement their position in their respective territories, as were Waikato groups, Ngāti Raukawa, and Ngāti Apakura in the north, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Whanganui groups in the south.

2.5.1 1700–1800: rising conflict

Te Kanawa's lifetime coincided with growing tension around this district's borders, in particular around Waipā and Kāwhia. After his death, the tensions continued to grow, and significant conflicts also erupted in the southern borders. These tensions culminated in the early nineteenth century with a series of major battles that fundamentally realigned the tribal landscape.

Remarkably, even amid all of this conflict, the vast bulk of Ngāti Maniapoto territory remained secure. Geography no doubt played some part in this: the dense forests of Te Nehenehenui were not as easy to invade and conquer as easily accessible harbours or plains further north, and nor were they as economically important. This is not to say, however, that they were inaccessible or unimportant. Five rivers converged at Ōtorohanga, and all were easily navigable.

The continued security of Te Rohe Pōtae was in no small measure due to Te Kanawa's descendants and the defensive system they operated. As tensions grew at the borders, the district's heartlands increasingly emerged as a place of security and refuge, not only for Ngāti Maniapoto but also for other Tainui kin.

We will consider each part of this district in turn, but first we will take a small detour to address an important part of Ngāti Maniapoto history. The death of Te Kawairangi at the hands of Waiohua had remained unavenged for several centuries. His grandson Maniāopetini set off to seek utu, but drowned on the way.<sup>216</sup>

Many generations later, Te Kanawa's son Tutunui led a war party to Maungakiekie, but was goaded into attacking the Waiohua pā alone and was killed. A new generation of leaders was named for this incident: Wahanui 1 (not to be confused with his younger relative Wahanui Huatare<sup>217</sup>) was named for Tutunui's infamously loud voice; Te Whata-karaka for the kāraka platform on which Tutunui's body was laid out; and Peehi Tūkōrehu for the low-lying mist that shrouded Maungakiekie as Tutunui approached.<sup>218</sup> Wahanui 1 and his brother Te Hurinui (later known as Maungatautari<sup>219</sup>) subsequently avenged the deaths of Tutunui and Te Kawairangi.<sup>220</sup>

216. Transcript 4.1.5, p 112.

217. Wahanui 1 was of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Matakore, but could also claim descent on his mother's side from Raukawa. In some accounts, Wahanui 1 and Tutunui are the same person: Te Hurinui, King Pōtatau, p 22; doc A110, pp 66; doc A83, p 115; doc O16 (Henry), p 4.

218. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 206–207; transcript 4.1.6, pp 393–394; doc O16 (Henry), p 4; doc S1, p 16; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 322–323; see also transcript 4.1.6, p 393; doc A110, p 358.

219. Te Hurinui took the name Maungatautari to commemorate the place where his father, Irohanga, who died in battle against a combined Ngāti Raukawa–Ngāti Kauwhata army: doc A83, pp 125–126.

220. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 332–333; doc A110, pp 316, 355; transcript 4.1.4, p 143. For whakapapa of Wahanui 1 and Te Hurinui, see doc A110, pp 65–66, 150. According to some accounts, Wahanui and Te Hurinui were accompanied by Te Kanawa's nephew Hari.

2.5.1.1 Change in authority at Kāwhia

Turning back to this inquiry district, the 1700s were a highly volatile time in the north of the district around Kāwhia–Aotea and Waipā, as well as in the Waikato. The first battles Te Kanawa Whatupango fought in had been at southern Kāwhia, as various Tainui factions sought to assert their dominance over the area. In very broad terms, Ngāti Maniapoto sided with Ngāti Tūirirangi against an alliance involving Ngāti Toa-rangatira, the emerging hapū of Ngāti Koata and Ngāti Te Wehi,<sup>221</sup> and Ngāti Mutunga of Taranaki. Also involved was a faction of Ngāti Māhanga, which sought to push Ngāti Tūirirangi from northern Aotea.<sup>222</sup>

Fortunes wavered, and there were significant deaths on both sides, but the general outcome was to redraft the tribal map of Kāwhia, strengthening the hands of Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Koata, while weakening the position of Ngāti Tūirirangi, who remained at Kāwhia as clients of Ngāti Koata. Ngāti Te Wehi, meanwhile, moved north and occupied Aotea, forming an alliance with Waikato tribes. In some narratives, the Kāwhia battles are presented as contests for possession over a dogskin cloak, Pipitewai, and a greenstone mere, Karioi-mutu, which were said to have belonged to Te Kanawa Whatupango or one of his close kin, and which later found their resting place in the cave Ruakurī.<sup>223</sup>

2.5.1.2 The emergence of Paretekawa

As these battles were occurring, others were also taking place inland around Maungatautari, as Ngāti Raukawa sought to push into lands held by Waikato tribes and, at the same time, fend off incursions by Arawa tribes from the east.<sup>224</sup>

Further south, a series of conflicts took place between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa (in particular its Ngāti Whakaterere branch). On one occasion a Raukawa-led alliance attacked Te Haupeehi, in the south of the district near Tūhua. Several other battles occurred in the lands north of the Rangitoto Range, between the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers. Wahanui I and Te Hurinui were instrumental in leading the Ngāti Maniapoto forces, which emerged victorious after a disastrous Ngāti Whakaterere attack on the Ngāti Maniapoto stronghold at Hurimoana.<sup>225</sup>

221. These hapū were led respectively by the half-brothers Kāwharu and Te Wehi. The names Ngāti Koata and Ngāti Te Wehi were not yet in use, but have been used here for convenience.

222. Document s1, pp 9–10, 14; doc A98, pp 60–69; doc A104, pp 16–17, 40, 76–87, 88–89; doc A94, pp 31–32, 53–54, 104–106, 158–160; doc A99, p 55. Tame Tūwhangai said Te Kanawa's first battle was called Opuatangehe and occurred near Te Maika in the late 1600s. The decisive battle took place on Kāwhia beach and was known as Te Moana Waipū. Also see Robertson, 'The Significance of New Zealand Tribal Tradition', p 52; John White, The Ancient History of the Maori, His Mythology and Traditions, 13 vols (Wellington: Government Printer, 1888), vol 4, pp 99–101.

223. Document s1, pp 9–10; transcript 4.1.6, p 274; doc A98, pp 60–69; doc A104, pp 16–17; doc A99, pp 40, 43, 55; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 260–270.

224. Document A83, pp 109–111; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 252–255, 294–301, 324.

225. Document A83, pp 111–126, 252–253; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 336–347.

The key battle sites included Te Haupeehi, Totorewa, Pukerimu, Tokanui, Whiti-te-marama, Tangimania, and Hurimoana. It was during these conflicts that Te Hurinui adopted the name Maungatautari, apparently commemorating the place where his father, Irohanga, died in battle: doc A83, p 125; transcript 4.1.1, p 40.

By the late 1700s, Ngāti Raukawa had made or was making enemies of Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Apakura, among others. At about this time, the tribe split from within, with several of its emerging leaders – led by Peehi Tūkōrehu and his brother Te Akanui – shifting allegiance from Ngāti Raukawa to their Ngāti Maniapoto kin.<sup>226</sup>

This momentous decision was sparked by the killing of one of their close relatives, either their grandmother Paretekawa or a younger relative of the same name.<sup>227</sup> The original Paretekawa was Te Kanawa Whatupango's daughter; by naming their hapū for her, Peehi and his brother invoked the mana of their famous tupuna.<sup>228</sup>

Ngāti Raukawa retaliated for Peehi's disloyalty, and for the defeat at Hurimoana, by launching another series of raids into Ngāti Maniapoto territory, reaching as far south as Arapae. Ngāti Maniapoto, in turn, gathered a war party which pushed Hape's people out of the Pūniu and Wharepūhanga districts, forcing them north to Maungatautari.<sup>229</sup> We will return to Peehi below.

2.5.1.3 Te Horangapai

Around Taumarunui, a dispute erupted in the late 1700s between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hāua, sparked by tensions between Hari 1 (Te Kanawa Whatupango's nephew, whom we mentioned earlier) and Tūtemahurangi, who was of Ngāti Hāua and Ngāti Rangatahi descent.<sup>230</sup>

According to some accounts, Hari 1 blamed Tūtemahurangi for the death of his brother, and so arranged for him to be killed. A series of battles erupted, involving Ngāti Hāua on one side and the Ngāti Rōrā and Ngāti Urunumia hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto on the other, before Hari was killed at Te Maire on the Whanganui River.<sup>231</sup>

The conflict only ended after the intervention of Hikairo 11, who was related to both Hari 1 and Tūtemahurangi. Hikairo is said to have been part of a taua (war party) which had come to join the hostilities. Seeing that the Whanganui pā was impregnable, he called out to its leader, referring to their shared whakapapa and offering peace.<sup>232</sup>

226. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 42–43, 60; doc A110, pp 161–164, 226–229, 741; doc A83, p 119.

227. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 42–43; doc A110, p 164; doc A83, pp 113–114; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 340–341; see also 'The Wharepūhanga Block: Judgment of the Native Land Court', New Zealand Herald, 18 May 1892, p 3.

228. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 39–40, 175–176. According to Pei Te Hurinui Jones, Peehi also identified with the hapū Ngāti Ngāwaero, Ngāti Kahu, and Ngāti Uru: Jones, King Pōtatau, p 51.

229. Document A83, pp 120–122.

230. For accounts of these battles and their origins, see doc A108, pp 144–146, 193–195, 199–218; doc A44, pp 6–10. For whakapapa of the central figures in the conflict (Hari 1 and his brother Korotā, Tūtemahurangi, and Hikairo 11, all descended from Maniāuruahu and Rangatahi), see doc A108, pp 82, 84, 86, 183–189; doc A44, app A. The conflict is also mentioned in Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, pp 94–96.

231. Document A108, pp 144–146, 202–218; doc A44, pp 6–8.

232. Document A108, pp 150–152; doc A44, p 8; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, pp 55–57.

The peace ceremony took place at the confluence of the Ōngarue and Taringamotu Rivers, and was led by senior tohunga from both sides, invoking the gods Maru and Uenuku to bind all involved to the tapu of the agreement. As was customary, intermarriage followed. The peacemaking is known as Te Horangapai, and the tract of land where the agreement was concluded still bears that name.<sup>233</sup>

The claimant Piripi Crown explained how agreements such as this had the power of law, and were recalled and explained in waiata, haka, pātere, whakataukī, and karakia, as well as in the names of children produced through intermarriage, who therefore became living contracts, preserving the relationships between former foes and ensuring that the intention behind the peacemaking was sustained.<sup>234</sup>

2.5.1.4 Peace at Mōkau

As peace was being made inland, conflicts were occurring in the lands around the Mōkau River. In the generations after Maniapoto, his descendants had spread out along the river in successive waves, intermarrying with Ngāti Hia, Ngāti Te Paemate, and Ngāti Rākei peoples. Rungaterangi and his half-brother Tukemata were the earliest of Maniapoto's descendants to settle in the district, followed some generations later by Te Kanawa's descendants Waiora and Waikōrara.<sup>235</sup>

The lands immediately surrounding the Mōkau thereby became Ngāti Maniapoto territories, and those surrounding the Mōhakatino River further south were traditional territories of Ngāti Tama. The few miles in between were whenua tautohetohe, contested or uncertain lands, in which both tribes sometimes lived and each sometimes claimed the ascendancy.<sup>236</sup>

During times of peace and peace-making, intermarriage was common. Ngāti Rākei, a Ngāti Maniapoto hapū that traditionally lived around the Mōkau river mouth and sometimes as far south as Mōhakatino, was heavily intermarried with Ngāti Tama. Other hapū on both sides could similarly claim descent from the other tribe.<sup>237</sup>

As had occurred in other parts of the district, from the late 1700s the tensions began to grow, with events further north making a direct contribution. Ngāti Mutunga had aided Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Raukawa in their battles against Waikato and Maniapoto forces, giving them cause for retribution. When a combined Waikato–Ngāti Hauā force marched south in about 1780, Ngāti Tama met it at Te Kawau, and turned it back.<sup>238</sup> Subsequently, a Waikato–Maniapoto

233. Document A108, pp 146–154; doc A44, pp 8–11; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, pp 55–57.

234. Document 12, pp 5–6. For more general information about tatau pounamu (peace agreements), see Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 106–108; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 177–191; Durie, Custom Law, pp 42–45.

235. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 216, 243, 245; transcript 4.1.5, pp 12–13, 15, 17–18, 30–31, 53, 74, 89, 108–109, 125, 160–161, 174, 176–177, 191–192; transcript 4.1.6, p 392; transcript 4.1.8, p 1066; doc F9 (Henskens), p 8; doc F12 (White), p 3.

236. Document A28, pp 16–18, 20 see also Wai 143 ROI, doc M21 (Byrnes), pp 3–7.

237. Transcript 4.1.5, p 174; doc A28, pp 15, 20; doc A147, p 4; doc A110, pp 84, 312; see also Wai 143 ROI, doc M21, p 5.

238. Document A110, p 255; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 326–327.

force sought to push southwards, and was again pushed back by Ngāti Tama. The warrior-chief Maungatautari (discussed above) was killed, and his son took the name Poutama in memory of the place where this occurred.<sup>239</sup> We will return to these conflicts below.

Retention and Transfer of Land Rights

Just as human relationships change, relationships with land and other resources could also change during a person's lifetime. A person born with ancestral rights in a territory or resource maintained those rights through membership of the hapū and ongoing use. This did not necessarily mean that he or she had to occupy the territory in question. Continued use, through seasonal visits for fishing or birding, or other temporary occupation, could be enough.<sup>1</sup>

But the principle of ahikāroa (keeping the fires burning) meant that rights could be extinguished through long-term lack of use. How this worked depended on the circumstances. A person who voluntarily moved away from his or her hapū to live with another nonetheless retained an ancestral connection and might be able to return and take up residence with the hapū's consent.<sup>2</sup>

But such rights would be extinguished (ahi mātaotao) if left unused for generations. A whakapapa connection on its own was not enough to establish rights, as the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Hauāuru acknowledged when he told the Native Land Court in 1888: 'I am closely connected with Ngāti Hauā through ancestry but I do not claim their land.'<sup>3</sup>

Such rights could also be extinguished if a hapū or tribe was forced from its lands or left to escape conquest or annihilation (as with Ngāti Toa-rangatira's departure from Kāwhia). We saw in other sections how important it was for hapū to have the ability to defend territory from encroachment, and the importance of relationships (including military alliances) in achieving that.<sup>4</sup>

As well as discovery and ancestral connection, rights in land and resources could be acquired through other means. Migration and conquest could trigger the transfer of rights, but were not sufficient on their own. If a hapū arrived in an area where

1. Document A110, p 282; Durie, Custom Law, pp 64–66, 80–83; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 291–292, 306–307.

2. Document A110, p 282; Durie, Custom Law, pp 64–66, 73; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 291–292; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 30–31; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993, pp 13–14.

3. 'Te Heuheu Tukino – Claim to have his children's names inserted in the Rohe Potae list' (doc A110, p 281); see also Durie, Custom Law, pp 64–66, 76; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 291–292; doc M5, pp 6–7.

4. Durie, Custom Law, p 76.

239. Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 334–335.

it had no kin connections, it had no rights until it could marry into an existing group. Otherwise, its occupation was ‘noho tikanga kore’ (without rights) or ‘poka noa’ (without the sanction of custom), and it could remain only if tolerated by the existing occupants.<sup>5</sup>

Similarly, although military conquest could establish mana over people, it was not alone sufficient to establish mana over land. That came from ancestral connections, and for that reason conquest was typically followed by intermarriage with the women of the conquered group. Such intermarriage, followed by generations of occupation and use, created new layers of ancestral connection and therefore established new rights of occupation and use.<sup>6</sup> Mr Te Ruki referred to the marriages of Ngāti Unu having ‘a claim and a long standing in the land’ due to the marriages of its men to women of the pre-Tainui hapū Ngāti Kahupungapunga.<sup>7</sup> Conquest did not always lead to transfer of land, though it often led to transfer of resource rights such as access to coastal fishing or inland eeling grounds.<sup>8</sup>

Another way in which rights could be transferred was through ‘gifting’ – that is, by a hapū voluntarily transferring rights to another. Where land rights were transferred to another, this was done as part of an ongoing relationship, with expectation of the gift being reciprocated. Peehi Tūkōrehu’s gift of land at Ōtāwhao to Te Wherowhero, for example, reflected the bonds of kinship and mutual obligation forged through wartime alliance and marital relationships.<sup>9</sup>

Such gifts were typically for limited periods – often for life or a more limited timeframe, but the timeframe could be indefinite so long as the relationship continued to be mutually beneficial and involve reciprocal obligations. In chapter 9 we will consider the transfer by Ngāti Maniapoto of land for the North Island Main Trunk Railway, and what mutual obligations that might have created.<sup>10</sup>

5. Durie, Custom Law, pp 64–66, 69; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 291–292; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 30–31; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993, pp 13–14; doc M5, pp 6–7.

6. Durie, Custom Law, pp 64–66; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 291–292.

7. Transcript 4.1.1, p 66.

8. Durie, Custom Law, p 45.

9. Durie, Custom Law, pp 76–80; Mead, Tikanga Māori, pp 186–187; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 30–31; Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993, pp 13–14; doc M5, pp 6–7.

10. Durie, Custom Law, pp 76–80.

2.5.2 1800–40: realignment, exodus, and peace

Although the 1700s had seen numerous battles between the various Tainui factions and their neighbours, none had decisively altered the district’s tribal landscape. The Ngāti Maniapoto hegemony continued throughout most of this district. The southern and eastern borders were secure, due to the peace made at Te Horangapai and the earlier agreement between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Tūwharetoa. Kāwhia, Pirongia, and the lands south of Mōkau remained contested.

2.5.2.1 Battle of Hingakākā

From the 1800s to the early 1830s, a series of battles occurred which decisively altered the tribal makeup of the district. Of those, the most famous was Hingakākā, which took place around the turn of the century, pitting a Waikato–Maniapoto coalition against a huge fighting force gathered from throughout the North Island by the Ngāti Toa–rangatira leader Pikauterangi. Each side is supposed to have numbered in the thousands, and the name of the conflict – translated as ‘fall of the kākā’ – is said to refer to the huge number of rangatira who died.<sup>240</sup>

The battle is usually explained as having arisen from a conflict for control over Marokopa’s lucrative fishing grounds, and more specifically over an insult hurled at Pikauterangi by a group of Ngāti Apakura warriors.<sup>241</sup> As noted in section 2.2.1.2, another explanation given by Pei Te Hurinui Jones is that it was linked to the alleged theft of whatu ahuru – inscribed stones from Hawaiki, which were used to raise tohunga to the highest levels of priesthood – from the whare wānanga Te Ahurei. Jones also described the conflict as a Ngāti Toa–rangatira rebellion against the rest of Tainui.<sup>242</sup> To support their war efforts, Ngāti Maniapoto invoked Uenuku, the ancestor-god brought from Hawaiki and held at Kahuwera.<sup>243</sup>

The Waikato–Maniapoto commander at Hingakākā was Te Rauangaanga, who was the leader of Ngāti Mahuta but could also claim descent from several other Tainui iwi including Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Māhanga, and Ngāti Maniapoto: his great-grandfather was Te Kanawa Whatupango.<sup>244</sup> One of his deputies was Wahanui 1 of Ngāti Maniapoto. Peehi Tūkōrehu also took part on the Ngāti Maniapoto side.<sup>245</sup>

As their enemies converged from the south and east, the hugely outnumbered Waikato–Maniapoto forces refused to engage until they reached their preferred battle site, a narrow ridge between two lakes at Te Mangeo, near Lake Ngāroto, which was then a much larger body of water. Te Rauangaanga famously placed cloaks and albatross feathers over the scrub on one side of the ridge, creating an impression that a large force was being kept in reserve. Exploiting the confusion this caused, his forces then attacked on three fronts, routing Pikauterangi’s army

240. Document A83, pp 123–130; doc A110, pp 247–249; doc A97, pp 103–106; doc A98, pp 81–82, 85, 88; Te Hurinui, King Pōtatau, pp 7–15.

241. Document A83, pp 124, 130, 138.

242. Te Hurinui, King Pōtatau, pp 35–36, 42–43; doc A98, pp 81–82.

243. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 8, 46; transcript 4.1.4, p 220; transcript 4.1.5, pp 104, 214–215. Uenuku is also said to have bound the peace at Te Horangapai: transcript 4.1.4, p 144.

244. For Te Rauangaanga’s whakapapa, see: doc A83, pp 126, 132; doc A94, pp 149–150; doc A97, pp 46–47, 103; doc A101, p 6; doc A110, pp 62–65, 196–197, 374.

245. Document A110, pp 248, 328, 379; doc A83, pp 126–127, 128; doc A97, p 105; doc A98, p 82.

and killing its leader.<sup>246</sup> When the battlefield was cleared, so much of it was red that Te Rauangaanga named his newly born son Te Wherowhero.<sup>247</sup>

The significance of this battle cannot be measured only in its scale. Of lasting importance was its impact on the Waikato–Maniapoto alliance. According to the claimant Tom Roa, Hingakākā ‘was the binding of Waikato and Maniapoto’ – joint military action pulling closer the ties that had already been formed through generations of intermarriage. From Hingakākā on, Waikato and Maniapoto mana would be mentioned in the same breath.<sup>248</sup>

2.5.2.2 The emergence of Ngāti Hikairo

For a time after Hingakākā, tensions in the north of Te Rohe Pōtae were kept alive through a series of smaller conflicts. There were clashes between the Kāwhia-based coalition of Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Koata and their northern neighbours Ngāti Māhanga and Ngāti Te Wehi,<sup>249</sup> and numerous outbreaks of violence between Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Waikato–Maniapoto coalitions, punctuated by periods of uneasy peace.<sup>250</sup>

It was around this time that Ngāti Hikairo began to emerge as an iwi in its own right, under the leadership of Hikairo II and his son Whakamarurangi. Hikairo II was known as a Ngāti Apakura warrior chief, with extensive interests in the Waikato and also Rotorua. He was also closely related to Ngāti Maniapoto, and fought alongside Wahanui I in the conflicts against Ngāti Raukawa. His descendants tell of him splitting from Ngāti Apakura after they attacked and killed his mother’s hapū. He died in about 1810, along with his father Puku, and Wahanui I’s father Irohanga, at a battle known as Pukerimu.<sup>251</sup>

2.5.2.3 Stability in the north

Peehi Tūkōrehu emerged as a key figure soon after Hingakākā. The fertile lands around Kakepuku and the Pūniu River, where Peehi had grown up, lay at the border between Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Apakura, and Waikato iwi, 246. Document A83, pp 123–130; doc A110, pp 246–249; doc A97, pp 103–106; doc A98, pp 81–82, 85, 88; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 1–15.

247. Transcript 4.1.1, p 32; Jones, King Pōtatau, p 4.

248. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 32, 54, 210–211. Also see doc A23 (O’Malley), p 29; transcript 4.1.10, pp 401–402.

249. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 42–43.

250. Document A94, pp 54–55, 120–123, 128, 159–160; doc A83, pp 130–131, 138–139; doc A97, p 35; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 44–49.

251. Document A98, pp 88–89; doc A97, pp 83–86, 88, 234; doc A83, pp 125–126; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 324–325. For Hikairo II’s whakapapa, see doc A98, pp 43–44, 53, 74–76; doc A83, p 166.

and had been contested for decades.<sup>252</sup> Having seen off his Ngāti Raukawa kin, Peehi was able to bring stability to this volatile area, and also strengthen the security of Ngāti Maniapoto's northern borderlands.<sup>253</sup>

A significant aspect of his success was his alliance with the young Waikato leader Te Wherowhero, which played a critical role in the broader Waikato–Maniapoto alliance. As Te Wherowhero reached adulthood, Peehi arranged for him to marry his daughter Ngāwaiata. When that marriage produced no heirs, Peehi offered Te Wherowhero his second daughter, Ngāwaero.<sup>254</sup> In many of the battles to follow, Te Wherowhero and Peehi fought together, just as their descendants would in colonial times.

Peehi based himself at Mangatoatoa, a pā on the Pūniu's northern banks near where he had grown up. From there, he could patrol movements into and out of Maniapoto territories.<sup>255</sup> According to the claimant Harold Maniapoto (Ngāti Paretekawa), he established an aukati (a no trespass boundary: see panel below) at the Pūniu, refusing to let anyone through in either direction if they had aggressive intentions. This line of control was to last through conflicts spanning several decades, including the Waikato War.<sup>256</sup>

Mangatoatoa's significance is reflected in the saying 'Mōkau ki runga, Tāmaki ki raro, Mangatoatoa ki waenganui' (Mōkau is above, Tāmaki is below, Mangatoatoa is in the centre), which refers to the deaths of Te Kawairangi and Rungaterangi (who were killed at Tāmaki and Mōkau respectively) while also broadly setting out the northern and southern boundaries of Tainui peoples.<sup>257</sup>

252. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 90–91; transcript 4.1.1, p 42; doc A110, pp 226–229.

253. Document K16 (Maniapoto), pp 5–8.

254. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 324–325, 401–402, 691; doc K16, p 6; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 128–137. Jones refers to these marriages occurring after Hingakākā and before the departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira in 1821.

255. Document S1, pp 15–16; doc A110, p 227; doc A97, p 104; transcript 4.1.1, p 42; transcript 4.1.6, pp 90–91. Some sources say that Mangatoatoa was built during the time of Te Kanawa's children; others say it was built as part of a network established by the Waikato and Maniapoto alliance in the leadup to Hingakākā. Those pā also included Nukuhau (on the southern outskirts of present-day Hamilton), Waiari (on the Mangapiko Stream south-west of Ngāroto), Ngāroto, and Maniapoto: doc A97, pp 104, 195. Peehi is said to have had other pā at Te Māwhe where the railway now crosses the Pūniu River (the pā was called Haere-awatea or Noho-awatea) and in Wharepūhunga (called Whareraurēkau). He also acquired interests at Ōtāwhao after his defeat of Hape of Ngāti Raukawa: doc A110, pp 227–229, 235, 237, 344, 353, 738; doc A97, p 146; doc K16, pp 5–10; see also doc A60, pp 198–204; doc S1, p 15.

256. Document H17(e) (Maniapoto), p 5; doc A110, pp 164, 227.

257. Eketone and others, 'Te Kawenata', 1904 (doc S19(a)), pp 31–32; doc S1, p 16; doc A110, p 123; doc A97, pp 90–91. In modern times, people sometimes say 'Poutama ki runga' reflecting the extension of Ngāti Maniapoto interests into northern Taranaki during the 1830s: transcript 4.1.5, p 177.

Aukati

An aukati is a notional boundary between two territories, which may not be crossed. Sometimes described as a ‘no-trespass line’, aukati were used to control movement and thereby minimise conflict between neighbouring peoples.

The Tribunal in its Ngāti Awa Raupatu Report explained an aukati as ‘a line that no one may cross with any intention that may be judged as hostile to those on the other side’:

It was a most common custom in Maori law . . . Pakeha called it a ‘cut’ or ‘cutty’ which is how it sounded to their ears, especially because it was sometimes abbreviated in the Maori vernacular to ‘kati’. It was not a declaration of war, as Pakeha often saw it to be. Quite to the contrary, it was usually a declaration in a time of crisis that war was not sought . . . It was like saying ‘we accept that there is trouble about us, but until we can settle the problem and to stave off war in the meantime, we will keep to our side of the line if you will keep to yours.’<sup>1</sup>

The claimant Rovina Maniapoto referred to an aukati boundary being established in Maniapoto’s time on either side of Te Marae o Hine, a mile-wide area of land east of Ōtorohanga where Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa interests met. By prohibiting warriors from entering, the aukati thereby provided others with safe passage.<sup>2</sup>

Later, Peehi Tūkōrehu established an aukati at the Pūniu River, separating Ngāti Maniapoto from the aggression of some northern neighbours. As discussed in the sidebar in section 2.4.2, the river did not mark the northern border of Ngāti Maniapoto interests. It did provide a clear zone of control for purposes of keeping peace.

An aukati was tapu and had the force of law. Where an aukati was breached, enforcement action would follow. A typical first step might be to challenge transgressors and warn them off. If they persisted, they might be met with force. The ultimate sanction for violating an aukati was death. We will see in section 2.5.2 how Te Rauparaha’s violation of Te Marae o Hine was a factor in escalating hostilities between him and the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition.

---

1. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngāti Awa Raupatu Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1999), p35.

2. Transcript 4.1.6, p393.

2.5.2.4 The departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira

Although Hingakākā shifted the district’s power balance, it did not end the fighting. On the contrary, between 1810 and 1821, battles continued to erupt at regular intervals between the Waikato–Maniapoto and Toa-Raukawa coalitions.<sup>258</sup>

Waikato–Maniapoto forces conducted long sieges of Ngāti Raukawa and their Ngāti Kauwhata allies at two pā near Maungatautari: Tangimania in 1812, and Hangahanga (a Ngāti Kauwhata pā) in 1816. The first of these sieges was led by Te Hiakai, a cousin of Te Rauangaanga; and the second was led by Peehi Tūkōrehu and his brother Te Akanui. In both sieges, the defenders were eventually allowed to escape. After Hangahanga, Peehi negotiated a peace settlement with his Ngāti Raukawa kin.<sup>259</sup>

At Motutawa, a small island in the estuary of the Mōkau River, a local conflict erupted between Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Rākei in about 1812. The Ngāti Maniapoto retaliation forced Ngāti Tama to retreat south of the Mōhakatino River.<sup>260</sup> Some time later, a high-ranking Ngāti Urunumia woman was murdered in Ngāti Tama lands. Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Rōrā responded in 1820, pushing Ngāti Tama back almost as far as Parininihi. The battle is known as Tihimanuka. The Ngāti Maniapoto leaders included Tāriki, the Ngāti Rōrā brothers Te Rangituatea II and Taonui Hikaka I, and Maungatautari's grandson Hauāuru.<sup>261</sup>

But the central figure in this new round of fighting was Te Rauparaha, who was Ngāti Toa-rangatira on his father's side and Ngāti Raukawa on his mother's.<sup>262</sup> Much of the conflict seems to have been motivated by unresolved grievances from Hingakākā, as well as by the continued contest for dominance over Kāwhia. Senior rangatira from both sides were killed in the early skirmishes, before Te Rauparaha left Kāwhia to seek support from his Ngāti Raukawa relatives, and from Arawa people at Taupō and Rotorua. It was at Lake Rotoaira that he narrowly escaped capture and death, as described in the famous haka Ka Mate.<sup>263</sup>

On Te Rauparaha's return to Kāwhia, his people became embroiled in several more skirmishes against Waikato iwi. Then, in 1819, Te Rauparaha joined a Ngāpuhi war party which travelled southwards through Taranaki as far as Te Whanganui-a-Tara and the Wairarapa, causing considerable destruction.<sup>264</sup>

Ngāpuhi had already been involved in conflicts against Ngāti Whātua, Hauraki, and Waikato iwi for many years, and their increasingly aggressive

258. Document A83, pp 130–131, 138–139; doc A110, p 309; doc A94, pp 54–55, 121–123, 128, 159–160; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 44–49.

259. Document A83, pp 131–135, 253; doc A110, p 255; transcript 4.1.10, pp 1390–1395. For a whakapapa of Te Hiakai and Te Rauangaanga, see doc J4 (Papa), p 3.

260. Document A110, pp 256–257; transcript 4.1.5, p 174; doc A108, pp 138–139. This is known as the Battle of the Two Floodtides.

261. Document A110, pp 257–258; doc Q29(a), paras 21–26. For whakapapa of Taonui and Te Rangituatea II, see doc A110, pp 71–73; transcript 4.1.1, pp 18–19; transcript 4.1.4, p 228.

262. Document A83, pp 122–123, 135–137; Steven Oliver, 'Te Rauparaha', in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed W H Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin; Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), pp 504–507; see also Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 44–46.

263. Document A83, pp 138–139; doc A94, pp 54–55; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 44–49.

264. Jones, King Pōtatau, p 50; doc A94, pp 54–55; doc A83, pp 138–140. In Jones's version, the slaying of Moerua occurred on one of three 'peace tracks' Tainui people used to connect inland areas to the coast, in violation of Tainui tikanga.

expeditionary raids were a catalyst for instability elsewhere. It was during this trip that Te Rauparaha – already sensing that his possession of southern Kāwhia was becoming untenable – appears to have formed the idea of resettling near Te Whanganui-a-Tara.<sup>265</sup>

He returned to find that Ngāti Mahuta had arranged for the killing of one of his wives. His forces retaliated by killing the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Te Moerua at Te Marae o Hine, thereby violating a tapu that had been respected by Tainui peoples for centuries. Other incidents followed, including an unsuccessful attack on Mangatoatoa and the slaying by Te Rauparaha's men of two high-born Waikato women.<sup>266</sup>

From a Waikato and Maniapoto point of view, this cycle of violence could not continue, lest it escalate into another Hingakākā. In Jones's words, Te Rauparaha had 'embroiled himself in a sea of troubles' in which he was 'encircled by a ring of inveterate foes'.<sup>267</sup>

But it was the contest between the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition and Ngāti Toa-rangatira that was to have the greatest consequences, not only for this district but elsewhere. The decisive battle in this conflict occurred at Kāwhia in 1820, where a Waikato–Maniapoto–Hikairo force attacked a coalition of Ngāti Toa-rangatira, Ngāti Koata, and Ngāti Rārua. Te Rauparaha also sought aid from Ngāti Tama, but most of this force was repelled by Ngāti Maniapoto before reaching the theatre of war.<sup>268</sup>

As in other battles of this era, the Battle of Kāwhia (as it became known) was fought between coalitions of independent rangatira. Ngāti Maniapoto's forces under Peehi and the Ngāti Rōrā leader Te Rangituatea 11 attacked Kāwhia from the south; Ngāti Hikairo attacked from the north; and Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Māhanga attacked from the sea. The overall campaign was led by Te Wherowhero, whose forces came overland from the east, striking directly at Te Rauparaha's southern Kāwhia homelands.<sup>269</sup>

North of the harbour, peace was concluded fairly quickly, owing to the close relationship between the Ngāti Koata defenders and the Ngāti Te Wehi attackers. In the Ngāti Toa-rangatira strongholds to the south, the invading forces pushed Te Rauparaha from pā to pā, showing little mercy, until a severely ill Te Rauparaha and the remnants of his forces were forced to take refuge at Te Arawi on the coast outside the harbour entrance.<sup>270</sup>

265. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 47–48, 50; doc A94, pp 54–55; doc A83, pp 138–142.

266. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 50–52; doc A83, pp 138–142.

267. Jones, King Pōtatau, p 52.

268. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 52–56. One of the Maniapoto leaders in this battle was Wahanui Huatare.

269. Document 14, pp 1–3; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26; doc A86, pp 112–116; doc A120, pp 110–115; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 54–55, 78–81.

270. Document 14, pp 1–3; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26; doc A86, pp 112–116; doc A110, p 338; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 79–81.

Surrounded by cliffs and joined to the mainland by a narrow track, Te Arawā was difficult to take, but equally difficult to escape from. The Waikato–Maniapoto army kept Te Rauparaha trapped inside for several weeks, until Te Rangituatea II and the Waikato rangatira Te Hiakai brokered a solution, allowing the besieged Ngāti Toa-rangatira warriors to leave on condition that they leave Kāwhia and never return. If Te Rauparaha attempted to go to his relatives in Maungatautari, he was warned, ‘the upper jaw will close down on the lower’ – meaning the combined Waikato and Maniapoto forces would crush Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Toa-rangatira together.<sup>271</sup>

Te Rangituatea II is said to have been motivated by kinship links with his opponents, and by a debt he owed to Te Rauparaha, who had spared his life during an earlier battle. Another reason was that Te Rauparaha’s departure would allow Te Rangituatea II to assert Ngāti Maniapoto mana over the rich fishing grounds of southern Kāwhia before Ngāti Mahuta could take control of the district.<sup>272</sup>

Within days, Te Rauparaha had departed, accompanied by Ngāti Toa-rangatira and parts of Ngāti Koata. The heke was long and difficult. They stopped for a time among Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Mutunga in northern Taranaki before continuing on to Kapiti and Te Whanganui-a-Tara, accompanied by other peoples including Ngāti Rangatahi of Ōhura. The events of Kāwhia – which in some respects echo the earlier departure of Tainui from Hawaiki – were to have profound impacts on people elsewhere in Aotearoa, but that is another history.<sup>273</sup>

Though Te Rauparaha’s people left, some descendants of Toa-rangatira remained behind. As had occurred elsewhere in the district, neighbouring groups had intermarried, including Ngāti Toa-rangatira and their Ngāti Maniapoto neighbours, particularly those of Ngāti Kinohaku and Ngāti Waiora hapū. The Ngāti Maniapoto warrior Wahanui I was descended from Toa-rangatira, as was Te Rauangaanga II, who brokered Te Rauparaha’s departure.<sup>274</sup>

2.5.2.5 Te Amiowhenua

Not long after Te Rauparaha’s departure, Waikato–Maniapoto under Peehi Tūkōrehu joined Ngāti Whātua in a major war party which traversed the lower North Island seeking utu against those who had fought against them at Hingakākā and Kāwhia. Te Amiowhenua (encircling the land), as it is known, began with 271. Document 14, pp 1–3; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26; doc A86, pp 112–116; doc A120, pp 110–115; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 54–55, 78–81.

---

272. The claimant Ray Wī provided a whakapapa from Toa-rangatira to Te Rangituatea I. Most sources referred to kinship links without specifying them: doc 14, pp 2–3; doc S47, p 5; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26; doc A83, pp 141–142; doc A86, pp 112–116; doc A120, pp 110–115; doc A94, pp 54–55; doc A110, pp 208–209, 332, 338; Jones, King Pōtatau, p 84; doc S61(a), p 9.

273. Document A108, pp 91–99, 110; doc A66, p 7; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 81–87, 92–102.

274. Document 14, pp 1–3; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26; doc A83, pp 139–144; doc A86, pp 112–116; doc A120, pp 110–115; doc A94, pp 54–55; doc A110, pp 208–209, 332, 338; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 80–85, 94–102; doc S61(a), p 9.

a journey to Te Urewera. Peehi assisted Tūhoe in a battle against Te Arawa and formed a bond with the Tūhoe rangatira Te Purewa, which in turn contributed to the Tūhoe decision to support Ngāti Maniapoto in the New Zealand Wars.<sup>275</sup>

The invading force continued down the east coast to Wairarapa before crossing to Te Whanganui-a-Tara and returning up the west coast.

Peehi's forces reached Taranaki at the same time as Te Rauparaha and his people did on their migration south, probably in the summer of 1821–1822. Ngāti Toa-rangatira joined with northern Taranaki iwi including Te Atiawa, Ngāti Mutunga, and Ngāti Tama and trapped the Te Amiowhenua taua in Pukerangiora pā on the Waitara River.<sup>276</sup>

On hearing of his father-in-law's troubles, Te Wherowhero gathered a large army and marched southwards, encountering Te Rauparaha and Ngāti Mutunga. A major battle took place at Ōhoke pā, during which Te Hiakai was killed, and Te Wherowhero might have been too if not for an intervention by Te Rauparaha (which may have been repayment for his own escape from Te Arawā).<sup>277</sup>

Soon afterwards, Te Wherowhero famously defeated more than 50 Taranaki warriors in individual combat before his party continued on their way to Pukerangiora, setting Peehi free. This, as it turned out, was the first of three Waikato–Maniapoto invasions of Taranaki.<sup>278</sup>

2.5.2.6 Ngāpuhi arrive

As they returned from Taranaki in 1822, the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition faced a new threat with the arrival of Hongi Hika and his invading Ngāpuhi taua.<sup>279</sup> Waikato and Maniapoto forces had hitherto mainly fought in traditional ways – through hand-to-hand combat using mere, patu, taiaha, and (in Te Wherowhero's case) digging kō.<sup>280</sup> They had encountered muskets at Kāwhia and Ōkoki, but only a few. Hongi's entire force was armed with muskets.<sup>281</sup>

Hongi's forces captured Mātakitaki, a large pā at the junction of the Waipā and Mangapiko Rivers, and another Ngāti Maniapoto pā at Mangauikā, taking many prisoners. Ngāpuhi then established bases at Orahiri and Kāwhia, from which

275. Transcript 4.1.4, p 221; transcript 4.1.6, pp 92–95; doc A120, pp 98–99, 102; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 92–102; transcript 4.1.7, p 57; doc H(c) (Roa), p [15].

276. Document A120, pp 98–99, 102, 114–115, 289; doc K36(a) (Maniapoto-Anderson), pp 2–3; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 92–102; transcript 4.1.1, pp 43–44; transcript 4.1.13, pp 126–127.

277. Document A120, pp 114–115; transcript 4.1.10, pp 400–401; doc K36(a), pp 2–3; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 98–100; transcript 4.1.1, pp 43–44; transcript 4.1.13, pp 126–127.

278. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 92–102; doc A120, pp 98–99, 102, 114–115; doc K36(a), pp 2–3; transcript 4.1.1, pp 43–44; transcript 4.1.13, pp 126–127.

279. Jones, King Pōtatau, p 110.

280. Jones, King Pōtatau, p 98.

281. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 43–44, 96; transcript 4.1.10, pp 1395, 1450–1451; doc A120, pp 98–99; doc 017(a) (Roa), pp 4–5; doc A98, pp 206–210; doc A97, pp 106–109; doc A110, pp 227–228, 381–387; transcript 4.1.4, pp 144–145; Jones, King Pōtatau, p 110.

they controlled the surrounding lands, forcing the Waikato–Maniapoto survivors to retreat southwards.<sup>282</sup> At Te Koipō, a Ngāti Kinohaku pā near Te Anga in the Marokopa Valley, they massacred almost everyone inside.<sup>283</sup>

Te Wherowhero and his people sheltered at Ōrongokoekoeā, south of Te Kūiti in the headwaters of the Mōkau River. Most accounts name his host as Te Ota Peehi of Ngāti Matakore; others say he sheltered under the mana of Taonui Hikaka 1 of Ngāti Rōrā. Te Wherowhero remained for some months; during which time he and his wife Whakaawi had a son, Tūkaroto, who would later become Kingi Tāwhiao. Meanwhile, the Ngāti Urunumia leader Haupōkia Te Pakarū led a section of Ngāti Maniapoto south to Te Horangapai, where they settled among their kin. Haupōkia built a pā, Papawaka, to defend against any northern invasion.<sup>284</sup>

Ngāpuhi forces continued into the district, camping on the banks of the Waipā River at Ōtorohanga. They had taken many Ngāti Maniapoto women as captives. After regrouping, the Waikato–Maniapoto forces approached the camp. As one of the captured women came to the river to collect water, a warrior approached her. He told her that the Ngāti Maniapoto women should ‘entertain’ their Ngāpuhi captors and wear them out. As dawn approached and the Ngāpuhi warriors lay sleeping, Waikato–Maniapoto forces surprised the camp, seizing its muskets and killing the Ngāpuhi men. The site of this battle is known as Huipūtea (caught in one basket).<sup>285</sup>

Rather than take on a now heavily armed Waikato–Maniapoto force, Hongi Hika withdrew and made peace. Not all Ngāpuhi accepted this. Later in the 1820s, a taua led by Pōmare was ambushed at Te Rore and Pōmare was killed. Taonui Hikaka wore a flute around his neck made from the leg bone of Pōmare.<sup>286</sup>

Just as Hingakākā had repercussions that would last for decades, so too did the Ngāpuhi invasion. First, it caused a significant realignment of the district’s population. As Ngāpuhi forces left Te Rohe Pōtae, Peehi invited his Waikato allies to live near his homelands at the confluence of the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers. Te Wherowhero had a kāinga at Ōtāwhao, just north of the Pūniu, and also lived for a time at Whatiwhatihoe. By gathering here, they could put some distance between 282. Document A97, pp 106–109; doc 017(a), p 4; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 110–116.

283. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 186–187; doc A110, pp 153, 335. Also see doc A97, p 132.

284. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 48–50; doc 017(a), pp 1, 3–5; doc S9(b), pp 2–3; doc A97, pp 108–109; doc A110, pp 227–228, 305, 319, 384–385; transcript 4.1.4, pp 144–145; transcript 4.1.21, p 287; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 116, 118, 125; doc S9(b), pp 2–3; doc A44, p 12.

285. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 48, 93, 244; transcript 4.1.13, pp 387–388; doc 017(a), pp 54–56; doc S9(b), p 3; doc A110, p 356; transcript 4.1.7, pp 48–50; doc G17, p [27]; doc H9, p [9]; doc H9(c), p [9]. According to several accounts, one of the captives was Te Riutoto, the wife of Te Hiakai. In some accounts, she was the woman who met the Waikato–Maniapoto warrior and relayed the message to the Ngāti Maniapoto women: ‘Nga Moteatea’ (pt I) in Journal of the Polynesian Society, vol 65, 1956, no 54, p 175.

286. Document A110, p 385; Jones, King Pōtatau, p 142.

themselves and Ngāpuhi, and provide joint security.<sup>287</sup> In 1832, Te Wherowhero pursued Ngāpuhi forces north to Tutukākā, inflicting a heavy defeat that brought hostilities to a close.<sup>288</sup>

Secondly, the defeat at Mātakitaki had emphasised the importance of security, and therefore of muskets and trade with Europeans. Just as it was security that brought Waikato–Maniapoto peoples to Waipā, it was trade that brought them to Kāwhia. The muskets obtained at Huipūtea were a small step towards righting the power imbalance, but they were not enough.<sup>289</sup> From the mid-1820s onwards Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Apakura – key tribes in the Waikato–Maniapoto alliance – pursued an increasingly lucrative flax-for-muskets trade.

The departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāpuhi from Kāwhia had left much of the harbour available for occupation. Haupōkia Te Pakarū brought his Ngāti Urunumia people back from Te Horangapai to occupy the southern shores, where he was joined by several other Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira. Their Ngāti Mahuta allies commanded both sides of the harbour entrance. Ngāti Hikairo, displaced from their Waipā homelands by the Ngāpuhi invasion, moved to occupy lands between Pirongia and the northern shores of Kāwhia Harbour.<sup>290</sup> Peehi's brother Te Akanui joined this shift towards Kāwhia, apparently motivated by a conflict with another close relative, Paiaki. But Te Akanui did not stop there and instead proceeded south to Marokopa and Mōkau, before travelling inland to Piopio. There, he founded Ngāti Paretেকawa ki Napinapi.<sup>291</sup>

2.5.2.7 Ngāti Raukawa migrations

As the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition was realigning and occupying different parts of the district during the 1820s, Ngāti Raukawa and its Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi allies were also in a state of transition. Ngāti Maniapoto had made peace with these tribes after the battle of Hangahanga, and allowed some from Ngāti Raukawa to return to their homes in Wharepūhunga.<sup>292</sup>

---

287. Document A110, pp 227–228; doc A97, p 112. Also see 'Native Land Court Judgment', New Zealand Herald, 2 February 1893, p 3. According to Rewi Maniapoto's evidence to the Native Land Court's hearing on the Maungatautari block, several Waikato hapū including Te Patukoko, Ngāti Paretuaki, Ngāti Ruru, Ngāti Koura, Ngāti Parehaehaeroa, and Ngāti Te Aweroa lived at Otāwhao (Te Awamutu), along with Ngāti Naenae of Taupiri and Ngāti Ngāmuri of Whatawhata. Ngāti Apakura lived at Kaipaka, having been invited by Ngapapa after the battle of Mātakitaki. Ngāti Hourua lived at Ngāmoko, and Ngāti Pou at Ōrākau: doc A110, pp 227–228.

288. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 142–143.

289. Document K23 (McDonald), pp 6–7; transcript 4.1.13, pp 117–119; see also doc A110, pp 386–387, 434–435.

290. Rewi Maniapoto described the peacemaking to the Native Land Court in the 1880s, and named the Ngāti Raukawa kāinga as Pukewhakaahu, Te Mania, Aratitaha, and Whakarongopu. His grandfather Te Akanui settled at Ngamako, and Peehi Tūkōrehu at Pōkuru: doc A86, p 122; see also transcript 4.1.10, pp 1390–1398, 1450–1451; doc A83, p 134; doc A97, p 68; doc K16, p 6.

291. Document A83, pp 147–152, 209–223, 261–263.

292. Rewi Maniapoto described the peacemaking to the Native Land Court in the 1880s, and named the Ngāti Raukawa kāinga as Pukewhakaahu, Te Mania, Aratitaha, and Whakarongopu. His grandfather Te Akanui settled at Ngamako, and Peehi Tūkōrehu at Pōkuru: doc A86, p 122; see also transcript 4.1.10, pp 1390–1398, 1450–1451; doc A83, p 134; doc A97, p 68; doc K16, p 6.

However, most of Ngāti Raukawa did not take up this offer, instead remaining at Maungatautari or making preparations to migrate to other parts of the North Island. A small group of Ngāti Raukawa had followed Te Rauparaha south in 1821, buoyed by his stories of the prosperity to be had from Kapiti's fertile lands and musket trade. Others attempted to establish a new home at Heretaunga (Hawke's Bay), sparking conflict that would last for several years. Taupō also offered a temporary home to some.<sup>293</sup>

As the decade wore on, a series of conflicts occurred around Maungatautari, where Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Kauwhata, and Ngāti Wehi Wehi all had interests, as did Ngāti Hauā, and Ngāti Marutūahu, who had been pushed out of Hauraki by Ngāpuhi. In 1825 and again in 1827, further small groups of Ngāti Raukawa migrated south to join Te Rauparaha; and in 1828 a larger migration, known as Te Heke-mai-i-raro (the migration from below) took most of Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Kauwhata, and Ngāti Wehi Wehi south as well.<sup>294</sup>

In Wharepūhanga, only a very small number of Ngāti Raukawa remained behind, occupying ancestral lands without attempting to defend them from Ngāti Maniapoto (in particular, Ngāti Paretekawa) who also occupied parts of the area. The reasons for the departure of Ngāti Raukawa and its allies are contested. Some see them as having been pushed from Maungatautari by ongoing conflict, and from Wharepūhanga by loss of mana due to previous defeats; others see the migration as an entirely voluntary one, motivated by the desire for a more prosperous and secure future under Te Rauparaha's patronage.<sup>295</sup>

Whatever the causes, the result was to restore stability and balance to the district's northern borders. Having seen off numerous threats, by 1830 Waikato-Maniapoto hapū had control of the district's northern territories, and for the most part were ready to turn their attention from warfare to trade.

2.5.2.8 Taranaki and Mōkau

Only one outstanding cause remained: Taranaki. Between 1826 and 1834, Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto launched a series of incursions into that district. In 1826, warriors led by Tūkōrehu, Te Kanawa, and Te Wherowhero joined with Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Mutunga to support Te Atiawa against Ngāti Ruanui and Taranaki iwi.<sup>296</sup>

But Waikato-Maniapoto rangatira also sought utu for the deaths of Te Hiakai and others a decade or so earlier, and more generally for the assistance that Ngāti Tama, Ngāti Mutunga, and Te Ātiawa had given to Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Raukawa. Late in 1831, an enormous taua led by Te Wherowhero and including Te Ngohi (Rewi Maniapoto's father), and Māori from Mōkau advanced south through

293. Document A83, pp 147–152, 209–223, 261–263.

294. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 1390–1398, 1450–1451; doc A97, pp 68, 109–110, 111–114; doc A83, pp 152, 261–263.

295. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 1390–1398, 1450–1451; doc A97, pp 68, 111–114; doc A83, pp 134, 147–152, 209–223, 261–263.

296. Ron Crosby, The Musket Wars: A History of Inter-Iwi Conflict, 1806–45 (Auckland: Reed Books, 1999), pp 167–169.

Urenui and besieged Te Ātiawa in Pukerangiora. The pā was sacked with great loss of life and many members of the northern Taranaki iwi were captured and taken north. Te Ātiawa retreated to Ngāmotu, the islands off the coast near present-day New Plymouth, where they mounted a successful resistance. The Taranaki groups then made a partially successful raid on Motutawa at Mōkau, but it was clear to all that a further attack from Waikato–Maniapoto was inevitable.<sup>297</sup>

Te Wherowhero and Tūkōrehu joined again in 1833 to besiege Mikotahi pā at Ngāmotu; again, some Te Ātiawa survivors were taken north to Kāwhia. The following year, first Te Wherowhero and then Tūkōrehu attacked Ngāti Ruanui in south Taranaki.<sup>298</sup>

The consequences of these assaults were far reaching. On the Poutama coast south of Mōkau, the Waikato–Maniapoto taua used the former Ngāti Tama pā Te Kawau as a staging post and pushed Ngāti Tama south beyond the Waipingao Stream (on the southern side of Parininihi).<sup>299</sup> These Poutama lands were occupied although they do not seem to have been heavily populated. Te Rangituataka 11 and his brother Te Rerenga Wētere lived there, and Ngāti Rōrā and other Ngāti Maniapoto hapū also claimed interests due to their role in the conquest.<sup>300</sup>

In a series of heke, most of Ngāti Tama, Ngāti Mutunga, and Te Ātiawa who had not been taken north left for the south, to Waikanae, Te Whanganui-a-Tara, Te Wai Pounamu, and Te Wharekauri (the Chatham Islands). Other than on the offshore strongholds at Ngāmotu, northern Taranaki lay virtually deserted until the early 1840s.<sup>301</sup> The extent to which Ngāti Maniapoto gained and retained authority over these lands and the terms of agreement by which the former inhabitants returned became important questions for Crown officials and are matters we address in chapter 6.

2.5.2.9 Return to peace

A relative state of peace returned to the district's northern and southern borders. The mana of the many hapū making up the Waikato–Ngāti Maniapoto coalition was uncontested throughout all of the district.

During the 1830s, Te Wherowhero spent increasing amounts of time with the Ngāti Tūwharetoa leader Te Heuheu Tūkino, and in 1839 he travelled to Ngāpuhi territories and there signed He Whakaputanga – the Declaration of Independence. The following year, he travelled to Ōtaki and invited Ngāti Raukawa to return to Maungatautari, an offer that was declined.<sup>302</sup> Some from Ngāti Tama and Ngāti 297. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 102, 144–146; Crosby, The Musket Wars, pp 246–250, 255–256, 270–271; doc A28 (Thomas), p 18; doc A110, p 515.

298. Crosby, The Musket Wars, pp 270–273, 276–280.

299. Document A147, p 7; doc A110, pp 260, 309; transcript 4.1.5, pp 91, 241, 249. Also see doc Q29(a), paras 21–26; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 102, 144–146.

300. Document A110, pp 261, 310–311; see also doc A108, p 140; doc L7, p 7; doc R20, pp 6–7.

301. Document A147, pp 7, 10–11; doc A110, pp 260, 309; doc A23, p 26; transcript 4.1.5, pp 91, 241, 249; see also doc Q29(a), paras 21–26; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 102, 144–146.

302. Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 147, 149–150.

Rangatahi, however, did take up similar offers from Taonui Hikaka I of Ngāti Maniapoto to return to their ancestral lands.<sup>303</sup>

It was into this world of conflict, peacemaking, and Waikato–Maniapoto strength that Pākehā traders arrived. From the late 1820s, these Pākehā traders were quickly absorbed into the hapū of senior Waikato and Maniapoto rangatira. Missionaries followed in the 1830s, as we will see in chapter 3.

The authority of the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition remained unchallenged until the 1860s, when Crown troops entered Waikato seeking to impose settler authority over the Kingitanga. Ngāti Maniapoto authority would remain intact until the 1880s, and its territories would again serve as a refuge for Waikato leaders retreating from war. We will discuss those events in chapters 6 and 7.

Hapū Formation and Reformation

Hapū were by their nature highly dynamic. New hapū formed with considerable regularity, as existing hapū grew too large for their territories, or hapū leaders came into conflict, or neighbouring hapū merged through intermarriage. Just as new hapū formed, old hapū names faded away as a result of marriages, mergers, migrations, and defeats. Hapū could also take on different names for different purposes, depending on which familial bonds needed emphasis in particular circumstances, whether patrilineal or matrilineal descent was being emphasised, and whether hapū were identifying by local names or larger confederations (Ngāti Hari or Ngāti Urunumia, for example).<sup>1</sup> Pei Te Hurinui Jones produced a map which named 20 Ngāti Maniapoto hapū as having existed at the time of the Treaty,<sup>2</sup> yet by 1908 the Māori electoral option identified 142. In 2005, The Ngāti Maniapoto Māori Trust Board identified 47 constituent hapū; this inquiry has received claims from a similar number.<sup>3</sup>

1. Durie, Custom Law, p 17–20; doc A66, pp 4–5.

2. Document A114, p 70.

3. Document A114, pp 48–53; doc A110, p 218; doc A97, p 118; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 22; Durie, Custom Law, pp 16–18.

2.6 THE TRIBAL LANDSCAPE IN 1840

The Take a Takiwā chapters of this report will describe the tribal landscape in detail for each part of this district. Here, we provide a brief snapshot, explaining which territories hapū and iwi occupied in 1840.

Hapū in the district affiliate to a number of iwi from in and around the district, including Ngāti Māhanga and Tainui Awhiro, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Raukawa, 303. Document R20, p 8; doc A108, pp 106–109; doc A28, pp 60–62, 68–69; doc A147(b) (Stirling), pp 19–20.

Map 2.2: Hapū and iwi of the district, circa 1840

Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Tama and Whanganui iwi, though most affiliate to Ngāti Maniapoto, as its rohe coincides almost completely with the inquiry district's boundaries.

It is important to acknowledge that Māori interests in land and other parts of the environment cannot be accurately described by drawing lines on a map and assigning each portion to an individual hapū or iwi. Rather, such rights are defined by whakapapa, and depend on ancestral relationships, which do not follow physical boundaries. Iwi and hapū interests typically intersect and overlap, as articulated by Miria Tauariki and Paul Meredith:

Outlining clear tribal boundaries is fraught with numerous challenges given that Māori identity and tribal affiliations and associated tribal boundaries are complex, fluid and political. Māori society was not traditionally, and is not contemporaneously, precise, clear and unambiguous.<sup>304</sup>

Hapū and iwi territories can better be understood as possessing zones of occupation (both permanent and seasonal), along with broader zones or spheres of interest and influence. Some of these zones were agreed; others were contested. Some were heavily populated; others were not.

This section does not represent an exhaustive account of hapu in the district but rather reflects the kōrero of iwi and hapū who have engaged with the Tribunal during the inquiry. We reiterate that hapū names have changed over time; the names of hapū extant in 1840 do not necessarily match those used in modern times, though in many cases they do.

We also acknowledge the limitations of map 2.1 above, which depicts the location of hapū and iwi of the district at about 1840. The map is indicative only and does not attempt to portray the rohe of hapū and iwi. Nor does it show the areas in which they asserted interests. It was rare for hapū and iwi to remain settled in the same place or places across time. Often, they followed seasonal food sources. Migrations also took place as a result of conflict and peacemaking.

With those caveats in mind, we can describe the broad spheres of influence of each iwi in this district in 1840, and the locations of individual hapū so far as they can be determined. Our intention is to locate the district's people in the land, not to determine the rights and wrongs of overlapping or competing claims to particular territories.

2.6.2.1 North: Pūniu to Hangatiki

The Pūniu River is sometimes seen as the northern boundary of Ngāti Maniapoto influence, because it marked the southern boundary of the Crown's Waikato

---

304. Document A114, p 55.

confiscations, and because it was used in the 1883 petition of Ngāti Maniapoto and others seeking a hearing on the Aotea-Rohe Potae land block.<sup>305</sup>

But Ngāti Maniapoto witnesses in the Native Land Court and again in this inquiry clearly regarded the tribe as having mana north of the Pūniu in 1840. Their claims appear to have been based mainly on the influence of Peehi Tūkōrehu, who wrested control of the area from his Ngāti Raukawa kin and lived north of the river between Pirongia and present-day Te Awamutu.<sup>306</sup>

According to Harold Maniapoto, Peehi and his immediate descendants had exclusive authority over the lands between the Pūniu River and the Mangapiko and Mangaōhoi (also known as Mangahoe) Streams, surrounding and spreading north and east of present-day Te Awamutu. Ngāti Paretekawa territories therefore encompassed the settlements at Ōtāwhao, Moeāwhā, Kihikihi, and Ōrākau, their mana extending 'over all the people of the area surrounding the Mangatoatoa Pā extending from Kakepuku to Wharepūhanga, Wharepapa to Nukuhau on the banks of the Waikato river, to the Waipā river, Kakepuku, and Te Kawa.<sup>307</sup>

Mr Maniapoto told us that Peehi established this authority with the consent of the area's hapū, including Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Unu, and the closely related Ngāti Ngāwaero, Ngāti Ngutu, Ngāti Huiao, and Ngāti Kaputuhi. Te Kanawa, Paretekawa, and Unu were his tūpuna, and he was closely related to the others.<sup>308</sup> These groups, along with Ngāti Paiariki and Ngāti Kahu, occupied territories around Kakepuku, Te Kawa, and south-eastern Pirongia.<sup>309</sup>

The lands encompassing Ōtorohanga, Hangatiki, and Waitomo are heartland Ngāti Maniapoto territories, and many hapū also have connections there. In particular, the area is associated with Ngāti Urunumia, Ngāti Huiao, Ngāti Uekaha, Ngāti Kinohaku, Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Rōrā, and Ngāti Peehi. Each of these hapū shares close relationships with the others, and has distinct but overlapping interests.<sup>310</sup> Ngāti Wharekōkōwai, descendants of Wharekōkōwai and Rangimakiri, also have strong connections to the area, though their lands at Ōtorohanga were alienated during surveying.<sup>311</sup>

Ngāti Urunumia originated in Ōtorohanga and retained interests there even after its migrations to Te Horangapai and southern Kāwhia.<sup>312</sup> Ngāti Parewaeono

305. Document A110, pp 218, 223–242; doc A60, p 202; see also Pei Te Hurinui Jones's 1940 map attempting to describe 1840 hapū and territories: doc A114, p 70; and LG Kelly's 1949 map of Tainui rohe: doc A97, p 100.

306. Document A110, pp 223–242.

307. Document K16, p 6.

308. Document K16, p 6.

309. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 62–63, 66–68, 70, 72–73, 86, 89, 113; transcript 4.1.6, pp 290–291; doc A110, pp 79–80, 83, 142, 144, 158, 235, 737; doc A60, pp 198–204, 688, 748–749. Ngāti Kahu are the remnants of Ngāti Kahupungapunga, the original occupants of the Waipā. They survive through intermarriage with Ngāti Unu, though their histories have largely been forgotten. Ngāwaero is a fourth generation descendant of Unu and Hine Marama. She married Ingoa, the younger brother of Te Kanawa Whatupango, to make peace after Te Kanawa had killed one of Ngāwaero's close relatives.

310. Document S36 (Koroheke), p 2; claim 1.2.81, paras 10–11; claim 1.2.81, paras 10–11.

311. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 85–86; transcript 4.1.6, pp 306–307.

312. Document A110, pp 130, 173–175; doc L4, p 5; transcript 4.1.6, p 214.

and Ngāti Kaputuhi were also based around Ōtorohanga, where they both had marae (Te Keeti and Kaputuhi respectively).<sup>313</sup>

Ngāti Uekaha is most closely associated with territories between Ōtorohanga and the Waitomo Valley, including Haurua – which was a fighting pā and later became the site where Te Wherowhero sought his uncles' permission to accept the Kingitanga<sup>314</sup> – and the cave Ruakurī where Uekaha lived for a time.<sup>315</sup> Ngāti Huiiao had pā at Hangatiki, at the top of the Waitomo Valley, as well as further north at Pökuru, where Ngāti Huiiao is closely related to Ngāti Ngutu and Ngāti Paretekawa. Like Ngāti Uekaha, Ngāti Huiiao has a close association with Haurua.<sup>316</sup>

Ngāti Kinohaku territorial interests were extensive, encompassing territories from Ōparure, Hangatiki, and Waitomo in the east to southern Kāwhia and the Marokopa and Awakino coasts in the west, as well as extending north into Hauturu. Ngāti Kinohaku also had influence in the Mōkau River catchment immediately south-west of Te Kūiti, and are closely related to Ngāti Waiora and Ngāti Te Paemate in that area. All share associations with the great fighting pā Arapae.<sup>317</sup> According to the claimant Glen Katu, Ngāti Kinohaku 'inherited much of the interest in Ngāti Toa Rangatira and Ngāti Rāruru' when those groups departed to the south.<sup>318</sup> Another hapū with extensive territory was Ngāti Rōrā. Their base was at Te Kūiti where they had several pā, but their influence was extensive, overlapping that of many other hapū. Ngāti Rōrā interests encompassed Hangatiki, Pureora, and Waimiha, Taumarunui for a time in the 1830s, and much of the Mōkau River catchment.<sup>319</sup>

Pei Te Hurinui Jones regarded the Mangapiko as the northern boundary of Ngāti Maniapoto influence, noting that the 'small strip' between the Pūniu and the Mangapiko were the only Ngāti Maniapoto lands confiscated after the Waikato war (see chapter 6).<sup>320</sup> In a 1940 sketch map of hapū territories, he showed Ngāti Paretekawa lands as fully surrounding Ōtāwhao and Kihikihi, but not including Rangiaowhia.<sup>321</sup> The Ngāti Hikairo claimants Frank Kingi Thorne and Meto Hopa

313. Transcript 4.1.1, p 59; transcript 4.1.6, pp 51, 213–214.

314. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 231, 275.

315. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 117–119, 263–264, 270–274; transcript 4.1.2, pp 201–202; doc G7 (Tauriki), p 2; doc A110, pp 69, 128, 154–156, 355; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, 2005, pp 214–217; see also doc A114, p 70.

316. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 225–227, 230–232, 235, 273; doc S36, pp 2, 4, 6; doc G14, pp [24].

317. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 233–235, 274; submission 3.1.323, app A, p 2; doc G16 (Davis) p [8]; see also transcript 4.1.6, pp 60, 97–98, 113, 186–188; transcript 4.1.21, pp 19–20, 1630; doc Q11, p 3; doc S37(b) (Jensen), p 2; doc A110, pp 134, 152–153, 320, 333–336; doc A60, pp 301–305; doc A114, p 70; doc A106, pp 9–13; submission 3.4.80, para 9.

318. Transcript 4.1.21, p 1630.

319. Submission 3.4.279, pp 6–7; transcript 4.1.6, pp 15, 26; doc S47, p 3; transcript 4.1.4, pp 107–108, 216; doc E2, p [2]; doc A110, p 207; see also 'Native Land Court Judgment', New Zealand Herald, 2 February 1893, p 3, which discusses the competing interests in the Pukenui district and refers to migrations after Mātakitaki: docs L2, L4, and L7.

320. Document A110, p 237.

321. Document A114, p 70.

also used the Mangapiko Stream as an inland boundary for that tribe's Kāwhia–Pirongia interests.<sup>322</sup>

Other hapū with interests in the area immediately north of the Pūniu at 1840 included Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Hauā, and several other Waikato hapū. Traditional Ngāti Apakura territories encompassed Ngāroto in the north, the Waipā in the west, and the northern and eastern outskirts of modern-day Te Awamutu in the south. Key Ngāti Apakura pā included Taurangamirumiru at Ngāroto, and Rangiaowhia to the east of Te Awamutu.<sup>323</sup> When the Crown took Waikato lands after the Waikato war, many from Ngāti Apakura went to live among Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Mahuta, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and over time came to be identified as members of those communities.<sup>324</sup>

As noted earlier, Te Wherowhero also lived in this district for some time, along with related Waikato hapū. Ngāti Maniapoto regard Waikato as living in these areas under the mana of Peehi Tūkōrehu's Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu hapū, however, we did not hear from Waikato claimants on this matter.<sup>325</sup>

2.6.2.2 East: Wharepūhunga to Ōngarue

A little further east, the Wharepūhunga area was occupied in 1840 by members of Peehi's Ngāti Paretekawa hapū and by members of Ngāti Raukawa who remained on the land when the main body of that tribe migrated south. Ngāti Raukawa had been allowed to return after the 1816 defeat at Hangahanga, and appear to have had interests east of Tokanui and the Pūniu.<sup>326</sup>

We have already described the eastern boundary, which was set by Te Kanawa Whatupango and Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira Tūtētēwhā, and remained uncontested in 1840.<sup>327</sup> Over the generations, people along the borders have intermarried. Te Heuheu Tūkino II, paramount chief of Ngāti Tūwharetoa in 1840, could claim descent from Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa.<sup>328</sup>

Several related hapū had overlapping interests in the thickly forested territories east and south-east of Te Kūiti, encompassing Pureora and Waimiha. Ngāti Whakatere ki te Tonga occupied land at Maraeroa. It is generally regarded as belonging to Ngāti Raukawa, though Pei Te Hurinui Jones described it as a Ngāti Maniapoto hapū.<sup>329</sup>

322. Document A110, pp 253–254.

323. Document A97, pp 98–101; doc A98, pp 103–104; see also doc A97, pp 90–98.

324. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 241–242; transcript 4.1.1, pp 21–22; transcript 4.1.2, p 134; doc A60, pp 80–83.

325. Document K16, pp 6–7; doc A110, pp 227–228, 234–236.

326. Document A110, pp 242–252, 287–288, 351; doc A83, pp 254–255; doc A60, pp 1208–1214; see also doc A114, p 70; doc A97, p 100.

327. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 73–74, 146; transcript 4.1.17, pp 29, 32, 622.

328. In the Native Land Court, Ngāti Tūwharetoa claimed rights in the Aotea-Rohe Potae and Wharepūhunga land blocks, and Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Matakore, and Ngāti Raukawa objected to the inclusion of the Hurakia and Maraeroa blocks (in the Pureora forest, a prized bird-snaring district) in the Tauponui-a-Tia block: doc A110, pp 268–269, 276–291; doc A60, pp 1209–1212.

329. Document A110, pp 180, 226, 327–328, 331; doc A114, p 70; Jones and Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui, pp 340–342; see also Maraeroa A and B Blocks Claims Settlement Act 2012, 12(2).

Ngāti Te Kohera were based at at Tūaropaki, residing in the eastern areas of the district, including the Hauhungaroa Range, Pureora, and Titīraupenga.<sup>330</sup>

Ngāti Rereahu takes its name from Maniapoto's father. Its main territorial interests lie between Te Kūiti, Pureora, and the Waimiha and Ōngarue river catchments.<sup>331</sup>

2.6.2.3 South: Ōngarue to Mōkau

In the south, Ngāti Maniapoto territories bordered those of Ngāti Hāua and other Whanganui iwi. In the Native Land Court, claimants from both sides agreed that Whanganui–Maniapoto boundaries broadly form an east-west line a little south of Ōhura, with a bite taken out for Taumarunui – the boundary there being at Te Horangapai, near the Taringamotu river mouth. The picture is slightly complicated by generations of intermarriage giving Ngāti Hāua and Ngāti Maniapoto descendants claims on either side of the boundary; it is also complicated by the common practice of including Ngāti Rangatahi, who migrated south with Te Rauparaha, as a hapū of Ngāti Hāua.<sup>332</sup> According to the historian Anthony Pātete, Ngāti Hāua and Ngāti Maniapoto interests overlapped in the areas later defined by the Native Land Court as Umukaimata, Waiaraia, and Taurangi.<sup>333</sup> The southern boundary and its outcomes are further discussed in later chapters.

The district's south-eastern corner was occupied by Ngāti Urunumia and related hapū. Ngāti Pāhere was closely related to Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Te Ihingārangi, and had territories near Ōngarue just south of those of Ngāti Raerae and Ngāti Te Ihingārangi.<sup>334</sup> Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Hari territories centred around the Taringamotu River, extending north to Ōngarue and west to the Mōkau River headlands. As noted, Ngāti Urunumia also had interests near Ōtorohanga and in other parts of Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>335</sup> Ngāti Huru, a hapū of Ngāti Te Kanawa and therefore closely related to Ngāti Urunumia, occupied hill territories in the Hurakia (Hauhungaroa) Ranges. Ngāti Huru also intermarried with Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>336</sup>

---

330. Transcript 4.1.1, p153.

331. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 345, 362–364, 368; transcript 4.1.4, p130; doc s40 (Peni), pp 2–3; doc s41 (Anderson), p 2; doc A110, pp 135–137, 322, 331; see also doc A60, pp 481–482, 484, 487, 502; doc A114, p70. Claimants in the Native Land Court referred to Ngāti Karewa, Ngāti Poutu, Ngāti Whakatere, and Ngāti Pikiahu as hapū of Ngāti Matakore with interests in Maraeroa. Ngāti Matakore also had interests in Ketemaringi.

332. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 196–198, 200–201, 208, 210; submission 3.4.205, pp 4, 6–7; see also doc A114, p70.

333. Document A110, pp 268–273; doc A112, p 5; doc A124, pp 7–10; see also doc A108, pp 23, 78–79, 87–91; doc A114, p70; doc A97, p100.

334. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 144–145, 228–230; submission 3.4.199, p 54; submission 3.4.176, pp 3–5, 17, 61, 98–99; see also doc A114, p70.

335. Document A44, pp 2, 5; doc R20, p3; transcript 4.1.4, pp 140, 143–146, 200–201, 205, 208; transcript 4.1.6, p 214; transcript 4.1.5, p 230–233, 255; transcript 4.1.2, p 161; doc A66, pp 13–16; submission 3.4.199, pp 3–6, 25; doc L4, p 5; doc A110, pp 172–175, 316; see also doc A114, p70.

336. Transcript 4.1.4, pp 146–147; submission 3.4.168, pp 3–4, 6–7.

Ngāti Te Ihingārangi, named for Maniapoto's brother, occupied territories in the southeast of the district from Mangapehi to Waimiha and Te Kōura.<sup>337</sup> Ngāti Tūtakamoana occupied territories a little further inland but overlapping with their neighbours, encompassing the Mangaokewa Valley and also extending from Mangapehi to Ōngarue and Te Kōura.<sup>338</sup> Ngāti Raerae territories were centred around the Ōngarue and Mangakahu catchments extending inland to Tangitū. They were closely related to Ngāti Rōra and Ngāti Te Ihingārangi.<sup>339</sup>

As well as Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Ngāti Hāua (which comprises Ngāti Hāuaroa and Ngāti Hekeāwai), other iwi or hapū with interests in the south-eastern borders included Ngāti Hekeāwai and Tamahaki of Whanganui, as well as Ngāti Hinemihi, Ngāti Hikairo ki Tongariro (distinct from Ngāti Hiakiro in the north), Ngāti Hinewai and Ngāti Hotu.<sup>340</sup>

We have already discussed the south-western corner of the district, which was for many years contested between Ngāti Maniapoto hapū and Ngāti Tama. The 1820 Ngāti Maniapoto expedition which pushed Ngāti Tama southwards was conducted by inland hapū – Ngāti Urunumia, Ngāti Rōra, and Ngāti Kinohaku – accompanied by Ngāti Rākei of Mōkau. This was followed up with occupation by Mōkau hapū (named in the Native Land Court as Ngāti Waikorara, Ngāti Rākei, Ngāti Hinerua, and Ngāti Tū) under the mana of the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Waitara, who later took the name Takerei or Sir Grey.<sup>341</sup>

By 1840, a succession of Waikato–Maniapoto taua had either taken north or forced south most Ngāti Tama, Ngāti Mutunga, and Te Ātiawa inhabitants of northern Taranaki.<sup>342</sup>

The Mōkau River was a critical transport route with several significant Ngāti Maniapoto settlements,<sup>343</sup> and major fighting pā including Te Arapae, Tokitokinoa (close to Napinapi), and Mātangiāwha (in Piopio).<sup>344</sup>

South-west of Te Kūiti, the lands surrounding Kahuwera (encompassing Piopio and Aria, extending south-west to Tāwhitiraupēka) were occupied by Ngāti Waiora and Ngāti Te Paemate. These hapū were closely related to each other and, in turn, to Ngāti Kinohaku.<sup>345</sup> Also closely related to these hapū was Ngāti Rungaterangi, which occupied territories around Aorangi (east of Aria) and Mahoenui. As men-

337. Submission 3.4.220, pp 2, 3–6; submission 3.4.170, pp 66–67; doc A110, pp 322, 325, 331.

338. Submission 3.4.156, pp 2–3, 8; submission 3.4.220, pp 4–6; doc L22 (Wi), p 4; doc A114, p 70.

339. Transcript 4.1.4, p 131; doc Q10 (Rata), pp 3–8; submission 3.4.175(b), p 4.

340. Submission 3.4.211, pp 3–7; submission 3.4.234, pp 2–3; submission 3.4.163(a), p 4; submission 3.4.281, pp 2–4; submission 3.4.187, pp 7–8; submission 3.4.227, pp 3–5; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Kāhui Maunga, vol 1, pp 49–56, 65–70, 74–75.

341. Document A110, pp 255–265; doc A28, p 56; doc A147(b), pp 5–10 (also see pp 10–32); see also doc A124, pp 7–10; Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2001), p 1.

342. Document A23, p 26.

343. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 30, 46–47, 97, 200–201.

344. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 9, 14, 91, 162, 249.

345. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 13, 18, 30–31, 46–48, 53, 74, 89, 104; transcript 4.1.4, p 243;

transcript 4.1.3, pp 41–42; transcript 4.1.15(a), p 513; doc A60, pp 1149–1157; submission 3.4.246, p 6; submission 3.4.135, p 7.

tioned earlier, Ngāti Paretekawa had a settlement a little south along the Mōkau River at Napinapi.<sup>346</sup>

We have already discussed the various hapū who occupied the Mōkau coast, including the Poutama lands. They included Ngāti Rākei, Ngāti Tū, Ngāti Waikorara, and Ngāti Hinerua. Ngāti Rōrā, Ngāti Urunumia, and Ngāti Kinohaku also claimed interests, arising from their defeat of Ngāti Tama. Ngāti Waiora, Ngāti Paemate, and Ngāti Rungaterangi also had interests on the coast.<sup>347</sup> Ngāti Toa Tupahau were located north of Mōkau at Marokopa.<sup>348</sup>

Ngāti Rārua traditionally occupied lands around the Waikawau coast, but are said to have left before Te Rauparaha did.<sup>349</sup> Those lands became associated with Ngāti Kinohaku, as did the lands further north at Marokopa where Ngāti Te Kanawa and Ngāti Peehi also had interests.<sup>350</sup>

2.6.2.4 Harbours and Pirongia

Travelling up the coast, the lands between the Kāwhia and Aotea Harbours and Pirongia were probably the most heavily contested in the district. After the departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira, several groups occupied and claimed interests in the Kāwhia and Aotea Harbours and their surrounds.

Te Wherowhero stationed two of his lieutenants, Kiwi Te Roto and Te Kanawa, at Kāwhia, securing Ngāti Mahuta interests there. Ngāti Mahuta territories straddled the harbour entrance and included Taharoa in the south, allowing them to patrol the harbour and ensure Ngāti Toa-rangatira did not attempt to return.<sup>351</sup>

Southern Kāwhia was otherwise Ngāti Maniapoto territory. Several Ngāti Maniapoto pā and settlements dot the harbour's southern fringes, and several Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira and hapū had interests there, including Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Kinohaku, Ngāti Urunumia, Ngāti Ngutu, and others.<sup>352</sup> Pei Te Hurinui Jones, in his map of 1840 Ngāti Maniapoto territories, named southern Kāwhia as being occupied by Ngāti Te Kanawa, though other hapū names are more commonly used now.<sup>353</sup>

346. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 139–142; transcript 4.1.5, pp 14, 27–28, 30–31, 33–34.

347. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 31, 89, 140–141, 148, 159–160, 174–177, 191–192; transcript 4.1.4, p 216; doc A60, pp 424–425, 550–551, 1149–1157; doc A110, pp 255–265, 309; doc A147, pp 5–8; see also doc A114, p 70; doc A97, p 100.

348. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 141–142.

349. Transcript 4.1.2, p 163; transcript 4.1.5, pp 137, 175, 224–225.

350. Transcript 4.1.2, p 163; claim 1.1.257, p 3; doc A110, pp 130, 134.

351. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 90, 92, 98; Jones, King Pōtatau, pp 55, 59, 60; see also doc A114, p 70. For a whakapapa of Kiwi Te Roto and Te Wherowhero, see doc 14, p 3.

352. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 159, 162–165, 168–169, 194–196; transcript 4.1.1, pp 93–94; doc c8 (Kaati), pp [3], [4].

353. Document A114, p 70.

Ngāti Hikairo interests extended from northern Kāwhia some distance inland to the eastern side of Pirongia.<sup>354</sup> We were told that the Pirongia boundary between Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hikairo has never been fixed.<sup>355</sup>

Ngāti Te Wehi was the largest grouping among several with interests that encircle the Aotea Harbour. Ngāti Te Wehi had pā at Matakowhai and Manuaitū, and populous settlements at Raoraokauere and Waiteika near the eastern side of the harbour.<sup>356</sup> Claimants also referred to close relationships between Ngāti Te Wehi and Ngāti Hikairo, their neighbours in central Kāwhia.<sup>357</sup>

Meanwhile, Ngāti Whawhākia occupied a strip along the southern edge of the Aotea Harbour,<sup>358</sup> and Ngāti Patupō occupied territories straddling the harbour mouth and extending a small way inland.<sup>359</sup> Claimants described how Ngāti Patupō<sup>360</sup> and Ngāti Te Reko operated as specialist fighting forces securing Aotea and northern Kāwhia for the Waikato–Maniapoto coalition.<sup>361</sup> Ngāti Whakamarurangi, with links to both Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Māhanga, also had territories north of Aotea extending almost to Karioi.<sup>362</sup>

Further north were found Ngāti Māhanga, whose territories encompassed much of the area between Aotea and Whāingaroa, heading a good distance inland towards the Waipā River.<sup>363</sup> Ngāti Tamainupō, related to Ngāti Māhanga through marriage, also occupied southern Whāingaroa around Okete and Te Uku.<sup>364</sup> Also at Whāingaroa were several other Waikato hapū, who were consolidated in the nineteenth century under the name Tainui Awhiro, and had a close connection with the maunga Karioi at the mouth of the harbour.<sup>365</sup>

Whāingaroa, the district's most northern harbour, was occupied by Tainui Awhiro. The Ngāti Māhanga rohe covers the entire harbour, extending south of Aotea Harbour and inland to the Waipā River.<sup>366</sup> Ngāti Tamainupō, now comprising the Ngā Toko Toru collective with Ngāti Te Huaki and Ngāti Kotata, have a similar area of interest, running from the harbour east to the Waikato River and including Whatawhata and Taupiri.<sup>367</sup>

354. Document A98, pp 31, 100–111; transcript 4.1.2, pp 5, 17–18, 27–28, 238, 290–291. The rohe is mapped in doc A98, pp 31, 110; see also doc A60, p 749; doc A114, p 70.

355. Document A110, pp 253–254.

356. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 39, 44–48, 56, 65–68, 76, 85, 228–229; doc A94, p 113; see also doc C4, p [18]; doc A114, p 70.

357. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 47, 226.

358. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 330, 333; doc G26 (Reti, Ormsby, and King).

359. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 28, 76; transcript 4.1.12, pp 388, 400–401, 406–407.

360. Transcript 4.1.12, pp 1206–1207; transcript 4.1.2, p 76.

361. Transcript 4.1.2, p 60.

362. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 96–97, 111.

363. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 16–19, 25–26, 37; see also doc A97, p 100.

364. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 147–148, 174–176; see also doc A114, p 70.

365. Tainui Awhiro includes Ngāti Koata (ki Whāingaroa), Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Tahau, Ngāti Te Kore, Ngāti Pūkoro, Ngāti Te Ikaunahi, Ngāti Tira, Ngāti Heke, Ngāti Rua Aruhe, Ngāti Hounuku, Te Paetoka and Ngāti Te Karu, among others: transcript 4.1.3, pp 196–197, 199–201, 205–206; see also doc D6 (Ellison); doc D8 (Greensill), pp [1], [3]; doc A99, p 8.

366. Transcript 4.1.3, p 206; doc A94, pp 26, 29, 79–80.

367. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 146–148, 159, 181.

Most groups at Aotea and Kāwhia Harbours similarly descend from the Tainui waka. Though predominantly based at Kāwhia, the Ngāti Hikairo rohe covers both harbours and extends inland to Waipā. Ngāti Te Wehi share close ties with Ngāti Hikairo and are based around both harbours, remaining closer to the coast than Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>368</sup> Though based further inland at Te Kūiti, Ngāti Te Kiriwai interests extended as far west as the Te Kauri and Awaroa river mouths at Kāwhia Harbour.<sup>369</sup>

Ngāti Whakamaruruangi are similarly based close to the coast, occupying the area running from Karioi maunga to Raukūmara, at the southern end of Aotea Harbour.<sup>370</sup> They share close relations with Ngāti Mahuta, whose rohe encompasses Kāwhia Harbour, Taumatatōtara maunga, and the Taharoa lakes district.<sup>371</sup>

Ngāti Patupō and Ngāti Whawhākia were both based around southern Aotea.<sup>372</sup>

2.7 NGĀ RANGATIRA O TE ROHE PŌTAE

As described in section 2.4.4, rangatira fulfilled several different functions for and on behalf of their hapū. As Pākehā settlement increased in the district, so did the roles and responsibilities of rangitira as they sought to influence, amongst other things, the developing patterns of settlement, trade, and religion in the area. This section highlights some of the rangatira in the district in the lead-up to 1840, many of whom later signed the Manukau–Kāwhia or Waikato–Manukau sheets of the Treaty. Here, they have been organised by broad tribal grouping, though it is acknowledged that several rangatira were affiliated with multiple iwi or areas within the region. While not exhaustive or definitive, the following descriptions provide a sense of some of the key figures in the district and their motivations prior to the arrival of the Treaty.

2.7.1 Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira

2.7.1.1 Peehi Tūkōrehu

Peehi was of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Maniapoto. He and his brother Te Akanui decisively shifted allegiance to the latter iwi when they founded the hapū of Ngāti Paretekawa.<sup>373</sup> His pa at Mangatoatoa was the ‘political centre of the Tainui waka’ in the late eighteenth century.<sup>374</sup> Peehi was a key figure in the alliance between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto. He betrothed his daughters Ngāwaiata and Ngāwaero to Te Wherowhero.<sup>375</sup>

368. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 17–18, 39; doc A98, p 100.

369. Transcript 4.1.6, p 291.

370. Transcript 4.1.3, p 96. Also given as Tūrangatapuwaē in Frank Thorne’s Ngāti Hikairo evidence: transcript 4.1.2, p 17.

371. Transcript 4.1.2, pp 92, 115.

372. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 330, 332, 337; transcript 4.1.2, pp 76, 219–225.

373. Document A110, p 161.

374. Document A110, p 737.

375. Document A110, p 162.

A tupuna named Peehi signed the Treaty giving his affiliation as Ngāti Ruru, as further discussed in section 2.7.4.5. According to Harold Maniapoto, this could not have been the Ngāti Paretekawa leader Peehi Tūkōrehu, as he died in 1836. On his death, Tūkōrehu's mana passed to others from the hapū, including his cousin Rewi Manga Maniapoto, his son Tupotahi, and his grandson Tūkōrehu, none of whom signed.<sup>376</sup>

2.7.1.2 Te Ngohi Kāwhia

Te Ngohi (also known as Te Ngohi Kāwhia or Kāwhia Te Ngohi) was a rangatira of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Maniapoto, with mana in the Pūniu and Kāwhia districts. Te Ngohi's father was Te Akanui, another of the founders of Ngāti Paretekawa. His son was Rewi Manga Maniapoto, who was educated at a mission school at Te Kōpua.<sup>377</sup> Te Ngohi signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>378</sup>

2.7.1.3 Te Pakarū

Te Pakarū was a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira of southern Kāwhia and Marokopa. He signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840. It appears that he was the son of Haupōkia Te Pakarū, who signed the Treaty on 21 May 1840.<sup>379</sup>

2.7.1.4 Te Waraki (Nūtoni Te Waraki)

Te Waraki (Ngāti Ngutu, Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Maniapoto) was the eldest son of Peehi Tūkōrehu. He and his extended family lived at Pōkuru, but his interests are said to have extended from southern Kāwhia inland to Te Kawa and Pūniu. During the 1830s he supported the establishment of the Church Missionary 376. Transcript 4.1.10, p 325; transcript 4.1.1, pp 39, 41; doc P15(a). Peehi Tūkōrehu had a great-great-grandson named Peehi Maniapoto, but he could not have signed the Treaty. The line of descent was from Peehi Tūkōrehu to Tupotahi to Winitana Tupotahi (who fought at Ōrākau) to Maniapoto III to Peehi Maniapoto: doc H8, p 6; transcript 4.1.1, pp 39, 41; doc P15(a). Te Ota Peehi of Ngāti Matakore, who sheltered Te Wherowhero after the Ngāpuhi invasion, was alive at the time of the Treaty signing, but there is no evidence of him having Ngāti Ruru affiliation or living at Ōtāwhao: transcript 4.1.6, pp 244, 248, 356.

377. Document B1, p 5; doc K28, p 5; doc K7, p 7; see also doc A110, pp 308, 413–415.

378. Claudia Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books, 2004), p 298.

379. 'Haupokia' signed the English-language Waikato–Manukau sheet at Waikato Heads on 11 April 1840, and 'Te Pakaru' signed the te reo Māori Manukau–Kāwhia sheet at Kāwhia on 21 May 1840. Moepātu Borell and Robert Joseph speculated that Haupōkia Te Pakarū may have signed the Treaty twice – once at Waikato Heads in late March or early April using the name Te Pakarū, and then at Kāwhia on 21 May 1840 using the name Haupokia. Alternatively, they suggested that his son, also Te Pakarū, signed at Waikato Heads. The latter is more likely: the Kāwhia sheet bears a cross beside Haupōkia's name, whereas the Waikato Heads sheet bears a partial signature beside the name 'Te Pakaru', indicating greater familiarity with written language: doc A97, p 148; see also doc A23, pp 69–71; doc R20, pp 7–8; doc S21(b), pp 20–21; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296.

Society mission at Mangapōuri, and provided it with food from extensive gardens. He signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>380</sup>

2.7.1.5 Tāriki

Tāriki was a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira.<sup>381</sup> His main pā was at Paripari, an important settlement a few kilometres east of present-day Te Kūiti. Tāriki signed the Treaty on 21 May 1840 at Kāwhia.<sup>382</sup>

The French writer and artist George Angas visited Paripari in 1844, a few months after Tāriki's death. He recorded Tāriki's name as 'Te Ariki (lord)', and described him as 'the most celebrated chief of all Mokau'. According to Angas's account, the death of Tāriki meant that Taonui Hikaka I became the senior rangatira of the district.<sup>383</sup>

2.7.1.6 Haupōkia Te Pakarū

Haupōkia Te Pakarū (also known as Te Pakarū Nuitonu<sup>384</sup>) was a leader of Ngāti Urunumia, Ngāti Kinohaku, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Apakura.<sup>385</sup> After the Ngāpuhi invasion in the early 1820s, he led his people south to live among their Ngāti Hari kin.<sup>386</sup> When that conflict had ended, he led some of them to occupy lands around southern Kāwhia.<sup>387</sup>

In 1830, Haupōkia and another Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Apakura rangatira, Te Waru, travelled to Sydney where they formed a relationship with the trader Joseph Montefiore, who returned to Kāwhia and subsequently sent several traders to live among Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>388</sup> Haupōkia also had a close 380. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298; doc s1, p 18; doc P24(a), p 5; transcript 4.1.6, p 290; transcript 4.1.1, pp 95–96; see also doc A23, p 69.

381. Document A110, pp 474–475.

382. Document A23, p 73; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296; transcript 4.1.21, pp 266–267; doc A28, pp 65–66; doc A97, p 147; doc A35, p 4; doc A23, p 73; doc A98, p 225. Also see transcript 4.1.4, pp 255–256; doc A105, p 28; doc A110, pp 359–360.

383. Document A28, p 30; George Angas, Savage Life and Scenes in Australia and New Zealand: Being an Artist's Impressions of Countries and People at the Antipodes, 2 vols (London: Smith, Elder & Co, 1847), vol 2, p 82.

384. Document s1, p 18; doc n(e), pp 2–6; doc A44, p 36; transcript 4.1.21, pp 1609–1610.

385. Document s55, pp 12–13; doc s52, p 2; doc s21(b), pp 19–21, 48; doc A110, p 339; transcript 4.1.13, p 392; transcript 4.1.10, pp 150–151; transcript 4.1.21, pp 1609–1610; doc A25, p 32; doc A44, p 15; doc R20, p 7–8; doc L7, p 14; doc A108, pp 142, 157; transcript 4.1.1, p 743; transcript 4.1.7, p 742. Haupōkia Te Pakarū was descended from Te Kanawa Whatupango, through Tiramanuhiri, Waiora, and Haupōkia I: doc F14, p 1. Another whakapapa shows descent from from Te Kanawa Whatupango through Tiramanuhiri, Pirimaiwaho, and Taraunahi: doc A44, p 36.

386. Document R20, pp 13–14; doc A108, pp 142, 157; doc A44, p 36; transcript 4.1.17, p 749; transcript 4.1.4, pp 144–145; transcript 4.1.1, pp 52–53; doc R20, pp 5–6; see also doc A66, pp 13–17.

387. In particular, Te Pakarū is associated with lands around the Waiharake inlet, Te Rangiora pā, and Kinohaku territories: doc s52, pp 2, 9–10; doc A110, p 339; doc H15, p 6; transcript 4.1.7, pp 100–101; see also doc s21(b), pp 20–21; doc n(e), p 5.

388. Document A97, p 137; doc s21(b), p 19; doc A25, p 32; doc H15, p 6; doc A110, p 435; doc A26, p 17; doc A25, p 32; transcript 4.1.7, p 435.

relationship with the Wesleyan mission at Kāwhia. He built the mission house at Waiharakeke, and subsequently granted land to several missionaries.<sup>389</sup>

Claimant Meri Walters said that her tupuna, Haupōkia, signed the Treaty following explanations by the Wesleyan missionary John Whiteley, who she said described the Treaty as a ‘mechanism for safeguarding property’. For Haupōkia, she said, the Treaty ‘became about the protection of our lands, mana and Tino Rangatiratanga.’<sup>390</sup> Haupōkia signed the Treaty, along with Tāriki, at Kāwhia on 21 May 1840.

2.7.1.7 Taonui Hikaka I

Taonui was a senior rangatira of Ngāti Rōrā and Ngāti Maniapoto. According to the claimant Yorkie Tohe Taylor, he had ‘the confederated whakapapa of all Rangatira of Te Rohe Pōtae.’<sup>391</sup> He was regarded as one of the most powerful Ngāti Maniapoto leaders, and (according to George Angas) described himself as ‘lord of all Mōkau’ following Tāriki’s death.<sup>392</sup>

Though his main main pā was at Paripari he also resided in the upper reaches of the Mōkau River, and further south at Ōngarue, and travelled freely throughout the district.<sup>393</sup>

According to the claimant Mike Wī (Ngāti Rōrā), it was Taonui who made the decision to shelter Te Wherowhero in Ngāti Maniapoto territories after the battle of Mātakitaki, and Taonui who led the expedition which forced Ngāpuhi out of Ngāti Maniapoto lands.<sup>394</sup> Taonui signed the Treaty at Kāwhia on 15 June 1840.<sup>395</sup>

2.7.1.8 Ngāmotu

Ngāmotu was a Ngāti Te Kanawa and Ngāti Maniapoto leader who lived at Waiharakeke in southern Kāwhia. In 1831 he fought alongside Pōtatau Te Wherowhero in Taranaki. Later that decade he guided John Whiteley on a journey south to Taringamotu. Ngāmotu signed the Treaty on 27 August 1840 at Kāwhia.<sup>396</sup>

2.7.1.9 Takerei Waitara

Takerei was a Ngāti Maniapoto chief based at Mōkau. Like other Mōkau chiefs, he was eager to take advantage of trade opportunities with Pākehā, particularly 389. Document s55, pp 13–14.

390. Document s52, pp 9–10.

391. According to Mr Wī, Taonui’s land interests also extended into Taranaki and Whanganui: doc s61, p 6. Taonui was descended from Maniapoto through Rōrā, Kuraroa, Paruparu, Hokotahi, Te Rangituatea, and Ngarue. Rōrā was the son of Maniapoto and his third wife Paparauwhare: doc s9(b), pp 1–2; doc A110, pp 71–72.

392. Document s9(b), pp 2–3; doc A110, p 395; doc A28, p 66.

393. Document s9(b), pp 2–3; submission 3.4.279, pp 2–3; doc s19, pp 8–10.

394. Document s9(b), pp 2–3.

395. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296.

396. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296; doc s1 p 18–20; doc R20, p 7; doc K19, p 6; doc H15, p 14; doc F15, p 4. Ngāmotu was descended from Te Kanawa Whatupango and his wife Whaeapare, through Noke, Urunumia 11, and Te Hono: doc s1, pp 18–19; see also doc A70, pp 41–42.

wheat and coastal shipping.<sup>397</sup> In June 1847, it was reported that ‘[Takerei] Waitara & nearly all the people have gone to NP [New Plymouth] with pigs to purchase hand mills, as nearly every native has this year a patch of wheat in.’<sup>398</sup>

2.7.1.10 Te Rangituatea

Te Rangituatea was a descendant of Maniapoto and an important Ngāti Rōrā rangatira. For much of his early life Te Rangituatea was based in the southern areas of the region around Mōkau, though was for some time based at Kāwhia during conflicts with Te Rauparaha. He also fought with Ngāti Maniapoto against the Ngāti Toa confederation and was involved in the Waikato–Maniapoto invasion of Taranaki.<sup>399</sup>

2.7.2 Ngāti Apakura rangatira

2.7.2.1 Te Waru

Te Waru, also known as Hori Te Waru, was a Ngāti Apakura rangatira of Rangiaowhia, east of present-day Te Awamutu. He signed the Treaty at Kāwhia on 25 May 1840. Like other rangatira, he was very active in promoting trade and agriculture to bring greater prosperity to his people. With Haupōkia Te Pakarū, he travelled to Sydney in 1830 to establish a trading network.<sup>400</sup> He later played an important role in agricultural development in the Waipā Valley, and in the establishment of the district’s first flour mill at Rangiaowhia.<sup>401</sup> He signed the Treaty at Kāwhia on 25 May 1840.<sup>402</sup>

2.7.2.2 Pungarehu

Pungarehu (also known as Kahawai Pungarehu) was a Ngāti Apakura rangatira who lived at Pārāwera, Ōtāwhao (present-day Te Awamutu), and Rangiaowhia. He was regarded as Te Waru’s equal.<sup>403</sup> He signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads sometime in late March or early April 1840.<sup>404</sup>

2.7.3 Ngāti Hikairo rangatira

2.7.3.1 Kikikoi

Kikikoi, also known as Kīngi Te Waikawau, was born around 1780 in the Waipā and was a leading Ngāti Hikairo rangatira. According to oral history he took the name Waikawau following his involvement in the invasion of Ngāti Rārua

397. Document A110, p 458.

398. Schnackenberg to Reverend John Whiteley, 29 June 1847 (doc A19, p 108).

399. Document s61(d) (Taylor), pp 4–5.

400. Document A25, p 32; transcript 4.1.10, pp 104–105.

401. Document H15, pp 8–9; doc A110, p 455; doc A26, pp 24–25; transcript 4.1.10, pp 104–105; doc A97, pp 169–171; doc A44, pp 11–12; doc A60, p 638; James Cowan, The Old Frontier: Te Awamutu, The Story of the Waipa Valley: The Missionary, the Soldier, the Pioneer Farmer, Early Colonization, the War in Waikato, Life on the Maori Border and Later-day Settlement (Te Awamutu: The Waipa Post Printing and Publishing Company, 1922), pp 14–17.

402. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296.

403. Document K22, p 20; doc A97, pp 49, 52, 55, 146, 148–149; doc A110, pp 469, 568.

404. Document A97, pp 142–143; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298.

at Waikawau. He later played a central role in facilitating the early rūnanga hui in Kāwhia, where support of the Kīngitanga was debated by rangatira from the region.<sup>405</sup>

2.7.3.2 Pikia Haurua

Pikia Haurua was also born in the Waipā, around 1810. He is remembered as having a significant role in the land wars at Waikato and Taranaki and for being a faithful follower of Tāwhiao, who he travelled to Taranaki with in 1866. He went on to sign the 1883 petition on behalf of Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>406</sup>

2.7.3.3 Hōne Te One

Hōne Te One was born at Mātakitaki around 1810.<sup>407</sup> He opposed the kīngitangi, for fear it could aggravate relations between Māori and Pākehā, though he later played a significant role in facilitating hui between supporters and opponents of the Kīngitanga.<sup>408</sup> He also signed the 1883 Te Rohe Pōtae petition.

2.7.4 Waikato-affiliated rangatira

2.7.4.1 Pōtatau Te Wherowhero

Pōtatau was a senior Waikato rangatira. In 1839, he signed He Whakaputanga (the Declaration of Independence), but soon afterwards he refused to sign the Treaty of Waitangi and encouraged others to do the same.<sup>409</sup> After 1840, he spent much of his time in Māngere where he formed close relationships with governors. In 1858, Te Wherowhero was crowned the first Māori King at Ngāruawāhia, reflecting his mana as a warrior-rangatira and his kinship connections with many other iwi and hapū in Te Rohe Pōtae.

2.7.4.2 Te Kanawa Te Ikatu

Te Kanawa Te Ikatu (Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Hauā) was a close associate of Te Wherowhero, who led Ngāti Mahuta taua during the 1820s and 1830s. After the departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira, Ikatu occupied Kāwhia, living at Maketū pā (at the southern edge of the modern township).<sup>410</sup> With other Kāwhia rangatira, he became active in the flax trade during the 1830s. He settled the trader Thomas Smith (Tamete) at Maketū in northern Kāwhia.<sup>411</sup> Te Kanawa signed the Treaty of Waitangi on 21 May 1840 at Kāwhia.<sup>412</sup>

405. Document A98, p 329.

406. Document A98, p 330.

407. Document A98, pp 334–335.

408. Document A78, pp 165–167.

409. Document A23, p 68; Claudia Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books, 2015), p 70.

410. Document A101, pp 11–14, 18; see also doc J11, p 5; doc J20, pp 5–6; transcript 4.1.21, pp 1046–1047.

411. Document A110, pp 389–390.

412. Document J5, pp 2–3, 6–8; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296.

2.7.4.3 Kiwi Te Roto

Kiwi Te Roto was a senior Ngāti Mahuta rangatira. Along with Te Kanawa Ikatu, he occupied northern Kāwhia at Te Wherowhero's request after the departure of Ngāti Toa-rangatira. Of the two, Kiwi was regarded as the senior.<sup>413</sup> During the 1830s, Kiwi encouraged missionaries and traders, providing land for a Wesleyan church and school, and settling the flax trader John Cowell senior (Te Kaora) on land at Pouewe.<sup>414</sup> Kiwi signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>415</sup>

2.7.4.4 Hoana Riutoto

Hoana Riutoto (also known as Te Riutoto) was the great-granddaughter of Te Kanawa Whatupango.<sup>416</sup> She was a Ngāti Mahuta chieftainess who lived at Kāwhia, but also appears to have had land interests inland at Te Kōpua.<sup>417</sup> Te Riutoto was the widow of the Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Taimainū rangatira Te Hiakai, who was killed during the Waikato–Maniapoto battles against Ngāti Toa-rangatira.<sup>418</sup> She was subsequently allocated land at Kāwhia. During the early 1820s, she was taken and held captive by Ngāpuhi following the battle of Mātakitaki.<sup>419</sup> She was one of two women who went on to sign the Treaty, signing it at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>420</sup>

2.7.4.5 Te Mokoroa, Te Pūata, and Peehi

Ōtāwhao is typically associated with Ngāti Apakura and the Ngāti Paretekawa hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto. But in 1840, three Ōtāwhao rangatira signed the Treaty giving their affiliation as Ngāti Ruru. They were Te Pūata, Te Mokoroa, and Peehi.<sup>421</sup>

Sources in this inquiry variously described Ngāti Ruru as a hapū of Ngāti Kauwhata, Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Korokī, and Ngāti Apakura.<sup>422</sup> Rewi Maniapoto in the Native Land Court referred to Ngāti Ruru as a Waikato hapū which lived at Ōtāwhao at the invitation of Peehi Tūkōrehu following the marriage of his daughters to Te Wherowhero, but subsequently returned to their homelands further north.<sup>423</sup>

413. Document A101, pp 3, 11–15; doc J20, pp 5–7; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26.

414. Document A110, pp 389–390, 398; doc J20, p 7; doc A98, p 212; doc A97, p 137; doc A23, pp 22, 94–95; transcript 4.1.9, pp 25–26.

415. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298.

416. Document A94, p 128.

417. Document A97, p 143; doc O3(d) (Roa), p 144; doc A101, p 12.

418. Document S61(a), p 17; doc A94, p 128.

419. Document O17(a), p 5; doc H9(c), paras 48–49.

420. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298.

421. Document A110, p 469; doc A23 p 70; doc A97, p 146; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, pp 298, 300.

422. Document K22(f), p 1; doc A120, pp 34, 38–40, 56, 166, 212; doc K1, pp 20, 29; doc A124, pp 21–22; doc K16, pp 12–14, 25; doc A110, pp 227–228, 354. Also see Angela Ballara, Iwi: The Dynamics of Māori Tribal Organisation from c 1769 to c 1945 (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 1998), p 148.

423. Document A110, pp 227–228; also see doc K35, p 5; transcript 4.1.10, p 346; doc K16, p 19.

2.7.4.6 Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia

Te Awaitaia was the leading rangatira of Ngāti Māhanga. Though his birthplace was inland at Waipā, he lived at Whāingaroa for most of his adult life, having forced Ngāti Koata to move south. With his relative Te Wherowhero, he took leading roles in the campaign to oust Ngāti Toa-rangatira from Kāwhia, and in the Waikato conquest of northern Taranaki.<sup>424</sup>

During the 1830s he sponsored the establishment of a Wesleyan mission at Whāingaroa, and in 1836 he was baptised, taking the name Wiremu Nera, after the missionary William Naylor.<sup>425</sup>

He signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840. He also encouraged others to sign.<sup>426</sup> In 1844, he told Governor FitzRoy that they had signed the Treaty having been informed that ‘nothing but kindness proceeded from her [Majesty’s] government’.<sup>427</sup>

2.7.4.7 Kiwi Ngārau, Tūnui Ngāwaka, and Kāmura Whareroa

Kiwi Ngārau, Tūnui Ngāwaka, and Kāmura Whareroa were rangatira of Ngāti Tāhinga. They signed the Treaty at the Anglican mission at Maraetai, Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>428</sup>

2.7.4.8 Te Whata

Te Whata was a Ngāti Tipa rangatira from Whāingaroa, who signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads in late March or early April 1840.<sup>429</sup>

2.7.4.9 Muriwhenua

Muriwhenua was a rangatira of Ngāti Whakamarurangi and Ngāti Hauā.<sup>430</sup> He lived inland at Waipā, but settled with his people at Aotea after the battles of the early 1820s. He signed the Treaty sometime in late March or early April 1840. Like other Aotea leaders, he initially embraced contact with Europeans, supporting the establishment of missions and the development of agriculture. He was baptised at 424. Document P4(b), p 26; doc N49, p 4.

425. Document M9(a), p 2; doc M17, p 6.

426. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298; doc M5, p 2.

427. Document A23, pp 66–67.

428. Document M19(b), pp 5–6; transcript 4.1.16, pp 1137–1138; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 298.

429. Document J7, p 8; doc A110, p 469; doc A23, p 70; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 300.

430. Three people named Muriwhenua lived at about the same time, and were closely related. This Muriwhenua was sometimes known as Pāora or as Kaitangata. He was the grandson of Whakamarurangi of Ngāti Hauā, the son of Te Umu-ki-whakatane and Pareongaope, daughter of Te Kanawa Whatupango. He was the nephew of another Muriwhenua, who was the son of Pareongaope and Te Aho-o-te-Rangi (Ngāti Hourua). A third Muriwhenua was also known as Hōne Kingi or Hōne Kingi Uekoha. He was a descendant of Te Aho-o-terangi and Te Rawatihoro (Ngāti Hōrua). He also signed the Manukau–Kāwhia sheet, using his Christian name: doc A94, pp 154–157.

a Wesleyan church established on his land.<sup>431</sup> Muriwhenua's relative Hone Kingi Muriwhenua (Ngāti Māhanga) signed the same copy of the Treaty.<sup>432</sup>

2.7.4.10 Te Aoturoa

Te Aoturoa (Ngāti Te Wehi, Ngāti Paiaka) was a Ngāti Te Wehi rangatira with influence over much of eastern Aotea.<sup>433</sup> According to Aroha da Silva, Te Aoturoa oversaw trade and small-scale agricultural development and supported the establishment of a flour mill at Aotea.<sup>434</sup> He took the name Hōne Waitere in honour of the missionary John Whiteley. Te Aoturoa signed the Treaty using the name Hōne Waitere on 15 June 1840 at Kāwhia.<sup>435</sup>

2.7.4.11 Hako and Te Noke/Te Moke

Two other Ngāti Te Wehi rangatira signed the Treaty. One was Hako, or Hakiwaka, of Aotea, who signed the Treaty in late March or early April 1840. The other was recorded as Te Noke, but may have been Te Moke, who supported the establishment of the Aotea mission station. He signed a copy of the Treaty printed in te reo. The date of this signing is unknown.<sup>436</sup>

2.7.5 Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Raukawa, and Whanganui rangatira

2.7.5.1 Te Heuheu Tūkino Mananui

Te Heuheu Tūkino Mananui was a Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira credited with unifying many tribes in the central North Island, particularly through arranged marriages and the exchange of taonga.<sup>437</sup> He is most widely remembered for his fierce opposition to the Treaty of Waitangi and Pākehā settlement of Ngāti Tūwharetoa lands.<sup>438</sup>

2.7.5.2 Te Whatanui

Te Whatanui was a rangatira of Ngāti Raukawa. Spurred in part by continued conflict with Waikato groups, he led a heke in 1828 or early 1829 comprising several Ngāti Raukawa hapū and allied groups from Maungatautari to the Kapiti coast, 431. Document M14(a), p 5; doc A94, pp 155–156; see also doc M18(a), pp 70–71; doc A120, p 94; doc A100(a), pp 5–7, 13; doc M14(a), p 5.

432. Document A94, pp 71, 132, 155–156.

433. His descendants refer to him having homes at Te Pirau, Te Papatapu, Matakowhai, Makomako, and Motakotako: doc N45, p 2; doc A104(i), p 37; doc A103, p 9; transcript 4.1.2, p 48; doc A94, pp 28, 71.

434. Document A104(i), pp 12–13.

435. Document A104(i), pp 112–113; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296.

436. Doc A104(i), p 112; doc A23, p 70; Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 301. The printed sheet was witnessed by the missionary Robert Maunsell. Claudia Orange speculated that it may date from 1844: Claudia Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Allen & Unwin, 1987), p 62.

437. Document J22, para 15.

438. Document J22, para 11.

known as Te Heke Mai-i-raro.<sup>439</sup> He later established the pā Rangiuru at the Ōtaki river mouth.<sup>440</sup>

2.7.5.3 Te Peehi Tūroa

Te Peehi Tūroa was a significant Whanganui rangatira whose whakapapa connected him to Ngāti Patutokotoko and Uenuku. Te Peehi claimed descent to four different waka (Te Arawa, Aotea, Tainui, and Takitimu), reflecting the period of peace, cemented through a series of marriage alliances, that he was born into.<sup>441</sup> He signed the Treaty at Pākaitore on 23 May 1840.<sup>442</sup>

2.8 CONCLUSION

This chapter has described the world of Ngāti Maniapoto and other iwi living in Te Rohe Pōtae before 1840. It was a world in which a dynamic and distinct society developed. As seen throughout this chapter, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had their own traditions, histories, laws, systems of organisation and conduct, values, and beliefs, all of which contributed to and facilitated this society and their relationships and responsibilities to it. Since the arrival of the great waka and the legendary pre-waka ancestors before them, the district had seen periods of conflict, peace, and realignment, further developing and redefining the world Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lived in. It was a world underpinned by whakapapa and governed by the chiefs and their spiritual, political, and cultural obligations. It was also a world where tikanga regulated relationships. It was into this world that the Treaty of Waitangi was introduced.

---

439. Document A86, p 131; Angela Ballara, Taua: 'Musket Wars', 'Land Wars' or Tikanga? Warfare in Maori Society in the Early Nineteenth Century (Auckland: Penguin, 2003), p 342.

440. Ballara, Taua, p 344.

441. Document A112, pp 19–20.

442. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, pp 79–80, 130–131.

CHAPTER 3

TE TIRITI O WAITANGI I TE ROHE PŌTAE

Ka uru nga rangatira o Ngati Maniapoto ki tena kotahitanga o nga rangatira o te motu, ki te whakatu i tena tikanga nui, i runga i te mahara tera o puta mai he ora i runga i taua tikanga ki te whakatu i tena tikanga nui.<sup>1</sup>

3.1 INTRODUCTION

Between late March and early September of 1840, some 55 rangatira signed copies of the Treaty of Waitangi at Manukau, Waikato Heads, and Kāwhia. Of those rangatira, at least 22 were from the Te Rohe Pōtae district, including prominent leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Te Wehi, Ngāti Māhanga, and Ngāti Ruru. Most of these rangatira were from the north of the district, in particular from the coastal settlements around Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia, and the inland settlements at Ōtāwhao and Parawera (east of present-day Te Awamutu). Two – Tāriki and Taonui Hikaka – were very senior Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira based at Te Kūiti, with mana that extended throughout the central and southern parts of the district.

Most signed during a large hui called by the Church of England missionary Robert Maunsell at Waikato Heads late in March 1840. No Crown official attended. Nor had any Crown official set foot in Te Rohe Pōtae prior to the signing. The Treaty text that most of those rangatira signed was an English-language copy, though Maunsell (an able linguist who was highly proficient in te reo Māori) is presumed to have explained it in Māori. Some rangatira subsequently signed a Māori-language copy during visits to the Wesleyan mission at Kāwhia over a period of several months.

By this time, a small group of Europeans had been living in the district for little more than a decade. A handful of traders arrived in the late 1820s and settled around Kāwhia under the protection of Ngāti Mahuta rangatira.<sup>2</sup> Missionaries had arrived during the following decade, settling at Whāingaroa, Kāwhia, and Waipā. Māori welcomed these early arrivals, and valued them for the access they brought to the European world – in particular its goods and technology, such as muskets, food crops, and the printed word.

---

1. The description of Ngāti Maniapoto motivations for signing the Treaty of Waitangi in the 1904 Kawenata. Tom Roa translated these words as follows: 'Leaders of Ngati Maniapoto entered into that union of the leaders of Maoridom in that significant event believing it would be beneficial (for them and their people)': doc s19(a) (Te Kanawa), p 40.

2. Document A19 (Boulton), p 20; doc A23 (O'Malley), p 22.

The Treaty added a new layer to this emerging relationship between Europeans and Māori. From Britain's point of view, the Treaty was a necessary step towards its formal proclamation of sovereignty over New Zealand. Britain's primary motivation for acquiring sovereignty was to control the growing settler population elsewhere in the country, and more specifically to head off the New Zealand Company's attempts to establish colonies outside Crown control.

From the viewpoint of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, control of settlers was not an immediate issue. The district had a Māori population that ran into the thousands,<sup>3</sup> and a European population that could probably be counted in the tens.<sup>4</sup> Māori in this district wanted settlers in 1840, mainly because their presence opened up new opportunities. Nonetheless, they would have been aware of the challenges that had arisen in other districts where settlement had occurred earlier and at greater pace.

3.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The extent to which the Treaty was understood and signed by rangatira of the district is central to our task in the report. The Waitangi Tribunal's principal function is to consider claims that Māori have been prejudicially affected by Crown acts or omissions that were in breach of the Treaty's principles.<sup>5</sup> A critical first step in considering those claims is to determine the Treaty's meaning and effect as embodied in the two texts (English and Māori).<sup>6</sup> Those texts, as is now well understood, embody significant differences, which give rise to differing interpretations. More broadly, the two texts are a reflection of two legal cultures and two sources of authority.

Our determination of the meaning and effect of the Treaty includes the Treaty rights, obligations, and duties – together rendered as principles of the Treaty – that we consider should have guided the relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori after 1840. It is a determination that reflects the spirit of exchange that underpins the Treaty. That spirit emerged from the circumstances in which the Treaty was signed in 1840: how the Treaty was understood by the parties, and how it could have been given practical effect. In this sense, it is a determination that applies not just to the circumstances of 1840, but also to the range of situations

---

3. The demographer Ian Pool estimated that in 1840 the 'Waikato tribes', including Waikato-Tainui and Ngāti Maniapoto, accounted for just over 20 per cent of the Māori population. He also estimated that the Māori population in 1840 was somewhere between 70,000 and 90,000. The resulting population range for Waikato tribes (between 14,000 and 18,000) roughly accords with an 1845 estimate (reported in the New Zealander) that the Māori population between Mōkau and Manukau Harbour was 18,400: Ian Pool, Te Iwi Maori: A New Zealand Population Past, Present, and Projected (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1991), pp 51–52, 55–56; doc A23, p 81.

4. Dr O'Malley estimated the European population of the Waikato district at no more than a few hundred by the mid-1840s, and that Kāwhia – one of the main places of European settlement in Te Rohe Pōtae – had an estimated population of around 20 in 1841: doc A23, p 81.

5. Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, ss 5(1)(a), 6.

6. Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, s 5(2).

that governed the relationship between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the following years.

As it happened, and as our subsequent chapters illustrate, very little occurred in Te Rohe Pōtae to give effect to the Treaty on the ground in the years immediately after it was signed. Nevertheless, the Crown proceeded to act in accordance with its understanding of the Treaty. Governor Hobson proclaimed British sovereignty in May 1840, before he had received the Treaty sheets which had been signed at Waikato Heads or Kāwhia, and in 1841 institutions of government were established with notional authority across the whole country.

None of these changes reached Te Rohe Pōtae, at least not for some decades. In the first few years after the Treaty, few British officials visited, and no effort was made to establish institutions of British government in the district, nor to discuss with Māori how such institutions might interact with existing Māori systems of law and authority. For all practical purposes, Te Rohe Pōtae continued to be possessed by iwi and hapū, and governed by their rangatira and people in accordance with tikanga.

While political changes did not ensue, economic and educational developments did begin to take place during the 1840s, largely due to the growing influence of missionaries. As the number of mission stations increased, so did the area of land planted in wheat, maize, potatoes, and other imported crops. Several flour mills were built. Mission schools were established, and young Māori leaders attended and learned about British ways. By 1849, Governor Grey wrote that the mission school at Ōtāwhao (in the north of the district) had the most thriving and contented people he had seen anywhere in the world.<sup>7</sup>

During the 1850s, settler numbers in New Zealand increased, and settlers' political influence grew. The Crown, in response, sought to assert its authority across a broader territory, and to acquire more Māori land to meet settler demands. In Te Rohe Pōtae, this included the confirmation of pre-Treaty land transactions, as well as Crown purchases of land in the Mōkau and Whāingaroa coastal districts (see chapters 4 and 5). Partly as a result of the Crown's approach to acquiring land for European settlement, Māori in these and neighbouring districts became more and more concerned with how they might protect their tino rangatiratanga. As the Crown granted responsible government to Ministers (responsible to a settler Parliament), Māori began to explore their own new institutions. The Kingitanga was born, and war followed (see chapter 6).

It was not until the 1880s that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown were able to enter into sustained discussions about how the Treaty relationship might be brought into practical effect. At that time, the Crown, seeking land for the North Island Main Trunk Railway, began to negotiate with the district's Māori leaders. In return for taking down the aukati which had held their territories secure in the post-war years, and consenting to the railway, Māori imposed certain conditions. The Crown would have to pass laws and establish institutions that would secure their continued authority. These negotiations, and the Crown's subsequent actions, are the subject of constitutional claims in this inquiry, which are addressed in chapter 8.

---

7. Document A23, p123.

3.1.2 How the chapter is structured

The chapter has three main parts. First, the views of the parties on the meaning and effect of the Treaty in this inquiry district are summarised. Secondly, the Treaty and its signatories in the district are presented and placed in their historical context. Thirdly, the chapter examines how the Treaty is best understood in the inquiry district. The rights guaranteed to Māori by the Treaty and the rights gained by the Crown are discussed, followed by an analysis of what the Treaty meant for the relationship between the Crown and Māori authority in the district. Lastly, we draw conclusions on the Treaty's meaning and effect in the district.

3.2 ISSUES

The main purpose of this chapter is to establish the meaning and effect of the Treaty and its principles, so that its application to events in our district that occurred after 1840 is clear.

3.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The Waitangi Tribunal has built up a considerable body of jurisprudence about the Treaty's meaning and effect and its application in differing circumstances.

Other Tribunals have explained how, through the Treaty, the Crown acquired a right to govern, and in return acquired an obligation to actively protect Māori rights and interests. Māori retained tino rangatiratanga, while also acquiring the rights of British subjects. Those Tribunals, as well as the courts, have found that the Treaty created a partnership between Māori and the Crown, reflecting its original promise as a foundation for mutually beneficial co-existence between Māori and the Crown. Tribunals have also found that the Crown owed Treaty duties to hapū and iwi even if they were not given the opportunity to sign.

We discuss the views of these Tribunals in greater detail in section 3.4.

3.2.2 The parties' positions

The parties in this inquiry had considerable differences over their understanding of the relationship between the Crown's authority (kāwanatanga) and that of Māori (tino rangatiratanga), and the relative power that each was to have.

The claimants see the Treaty relationship as one of formal equals, whilst the Crown sees its governing power as superior to the tino rangatiratanga guaranteed to Māori.

3.2.2.1 The claimants' position on the Treaty's meaning and effect

Counsel for several claimant groups submitted that, prior to 6 February 1840, the only political authority that existed in New Zealand was the mana and rangatiratanga of Māori hapū and their leaders. Māori in Te Rohe Pōtāe had complete sovereignty over their territories.<sup>8</sup> They submitted the Treaty did little to alter that authority. Rather, it provided for Māori communities to continue to govern themselves according to their own mana and tikanga, while allowing the Crown to establish a limited form of government that did not impinge on tino rangatiratanga. By signing the Treaty, rangatira committed to working cooperatively with the Crown in ways that would bring mutual benefit. They did not, however, agree to cede their sovereignty.<sup>9</sup>

In pleadings on constitutional issues, claimant counsel described sovereignty as ‘the supreme, absolute power by which any State is governed’, arguing that sovereignty ‘may be exercised internally as when it inheres to a people or its rulers, or externally, where it comprises the independence of one political body with respect to other political bodies’. Whereas the European concept of sovereignty centred on the nation-state and its institutions of civil government, the key components of sovereignty were ‘political organisation, specific territorial control and a factual independence.’<sup>10</sup>

Counsel submitted that the sovereign authority of Māori ‘flows from the fact that long before the arrival of Europeans in what is modern day New Zealand, Māori were living here in organised societies and occupying the land as their forefathers of many, many generations had’. Māori were governed according to tikanga, a system of law and regulation that governed daily activities and interaction among people and communities, was strictly enforced, and struck a balance between the sometimes competing needs of individuals, whānau, hapū, and iwi.<sup>11</sup>

Counsel submitted that, upon the arrival of Europeans, the fundamental legal and political institutions of iwi and hapū remained intact. Britain recognised the sovereignty of hapū and iwi in various ways prior to the Treaty, including in Lord Normanby’s 1839 instructions to Hobson.<sup>12</sup> Māori did not cede their sovereignty through the Treaty, and ‘understood that its effects were primarily directed at Pakeha and the better control of British subjects (not Maori)’<sup>13</sup>

With respect to the Māori and English texts of the Treaty, claimants submitted that signatories would not have understood the ‘kāwanatanga’ ceded in article 1 to mean sovereignty. Rather, they would have understood kāwanatanga to mean ‘a limited form of government.’<sup>14</sup> On the other hand, they submitted that signatories would have understood the guarantee of ‘tino rangatiratanga’ as a guarantee of sovereignty or of mana motuhake, which they characterised as independence, authority, and nationhood in accordance with tikanga. Those who signed therefore

---

8. Submission 3.4.252, pp 13–17, 42, 123–125; submission 3.4.252(b), pp 21–23; statement 1.5.17, pp 3–5; see also submission 3.4.157(a).

9. Submission 3.4.252, pp 4, 123–125; submission 3.4.252(b), pp 5, 21–23; submission 3.4.127, p 4.

10. Statement 1.5.17, p 2.

11. Statement 1.5.17, paras 6–9.

12. Statement 1.5.17, paras 13, 16, 31.

13. Statement 1.5.17, paras 33, 36.

14. Submission 3.4.252, pp 13–17.

did not cede their sovereignty, and believed that the Treaty ‘would not affect their tribal authority’<sup>15</sup>

In addition, the claimants argued that the intention of the parties was an important matter for the Tribunal to consider. In looking at this issue, counsel submitted that basic contract law principles should be applied to make such a determination, which requires looking at the surrounding circumstances. This approach, they submitted, was adopted by the Waitangi Tribunal in the Te Roroa Report. These contract law principles are the source of the contra proferentem rule where ambiguities in a text are construed against the party that wrote the text. Counsel pointed out that this approach to interpreting the text of the Treaty was adopted by the Tribunal in the Orakei Report. Thus, in applying contractual principles to the interpretation of the Treaty, it was submitted that ‘all of the Māori signatories did not intend to cede sovereignty’.<sup>16</sup>

Further, claimants said that those who signed the English text could have understood it only through Māori language explanations, which may have included a reading of the Māori text and other verbal explanations of the Crown’s intentions. Their signatures indicated consent to these Māori-language explanations, not to the content of the English text.<sup>17</sup> Claimants told us that their tūpuna had grown to trust the missionaries and signed under their influence. They viewed the relationship in personal terms, as an alliance between themselves and the governor which would bring mutual protection and prosperity, while guaranteeing their ongoing independence.<sup>18</sup> Dan Te Kanawa, for example, told us that the time of the signing was ‘a period of great opportunity’, in which his Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Apakura tūpuna retained full authority over tribal rohe (territories) and resources, and could control the entry of settlers while ‘acquiring new knowledge, skills and capability to realise the potential benefits of these new opportunities’.<sup>19</sup>

Claimants referred to contemporary statements from Māori who were present at the Treaty signings, including the Waikato rangatira Pōtatau Te Wherowhero (who was later established as the first Māori King), who wrote to Governor Robert FitzRoy in 1843 stating that those rangatira ‘fully assented’ to the Crown’s proposal ‘because that Treaty was to preserve their chieftainship’.<sup>20</sup> The continued insistence of rangatira on their independence after 1840 and their refusal to submit to European laws or accept Crown mediation in their disputes were also evidence of this understanding.<sup>21</sup>

15. Submission 3.4.252, pp 16–17.

16. Submission 3.4.252, pp 44–48.

17. Submission 3.4.252, pp 33–44.

18. Claim 1.1.114, p 1; doc 552 (Walters), pp 9–10; doc H15 (Kaati), p 4; doc S19 (Te Kanawa), p 9; doc B1 (Te Muraahi), pp 5–6; doc J5 (Maki-Midwood), p 17; transcript 4.1.10, pp 105–106 (Gordon Lennox, hearing week four, Mangakotukutuku Campus, 8 April 2013); doc K22 (Lennox), pp 20–22; doc M19(b) (Te Rangi), pp 5–6; doc M5 (Watene, Pihama, and Watene), pp 10–11; see also doc A23, p 142; doc A97 (Borell and Joseph), p 52.

19. Document S19, p 8.

20. Submission 3.4.252, p 50. For further discussion of Te Wherowhero’s letter, see section 3.4.3.2.2.

21. Submission 3.4.252, p 50; statement 1.5.17, pp 6–7.

Some claimants also pointed to the fact that a number of hapū and iwi in the district did not sign the Treaty. They submitted that those who did not sign are not bound by its terms, but that the Crown – by way of the Treaty – issued a unilateral set of promises to non-signatories.<sup>22</sup>

Claimants submitted that: ‘If, as the Crown asserts, the acquisition of Māori consent was a self-imposed condition precedent to its assertion of sovereignty, then the Crown has clearly failed to meet what it itself understood to be the requisite benchmark.’<sup>23</sup>

3.2.2.2 The Crown’s position on the Treaty’s meaning and effect

The Crown saw the Treaty’s meaning and effect differently. The Crown submitted that the ‘essential nature of its Treaty relationship with Māori is the same despite regional differences in Crown-Māori engagement across the 19th century’.<sup>24</sup>

The Crown also referred to jus gentium, the law of nations, noting it pre-dates the body of law that today is known as ‘international law’. Counsel referred to the evidence of Paul McHugh before the Paparahi o Te Raki inquiry to contend that in accordance with jus gentium, the British Crown recognised the sovereignty of non-Christian polities. Thus, prior to entering into the Treaty, it had recognised that ‘the Māori tribes of New Zealand (including those of the Rohe Pōtae) held legal sovereignty over New Zealand’. The Crown then submitted that in 1840 it understood that jus gentium required it to obtain sufficient consent of Māori before it established sovereignty. The Treaty was the means by which it obtained that consent.<sup>25</sup>

The Crown’s position was that, ‘through the Treaty texts, signatories agreed to the Crown establishing a government in New Zealand that would have authority over all people and over all land in New Zealand’.<sup>26</sup> The Crown acknowledged the likelihood that there were many different intentions and understandings of the Treaty among Māori signatories, and that those understandings would have been based on the Māori text of the Treaty and the events surrounding the signing in the district.<sup>27</sup> The Crown’s view was that the Treaty’s incomplete coverage did not limit its effect across all of New Zealand.<sup>28</sup>

The Crown submitted that ‘[u]nder its own laws and practice’ it ‘did not acquire sovereignty simply through the Treaty of Waitangi itself, but through a series of constitutional and jurisdictional steps’. Those steps included obtaining consent for Crown sovereignty through the Treaty, issuing proclamations, and publication of those proclamations in the London Gazette on 2 October 1840.<sup>29</sup> The Crown submitted that the Court of Appeal (in the 1987 Lands case) ‘found that the Crown’s

22. Submission 3.4.252, pp 5, 124; submission 3.4.252(b), pp 3–4, 21; submission 3.4.127, pp 4–5.

23. Submission 3.4.127, p 6.

24. Submission 3.4.312, p 5.

25. Submission 3.4.312, p 8.

26. Submission 3.4.312, p 1.

27. Submission 3.4.312, p 4.

28. Submission 3.4.312, pp 4–5.

29. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 7–15.

sovereignty over New Zealand was beyond dispute once Captain Hobson's proclamations were gazetted' – a finding which the Crown relies on 'as to the fact of its sovereignty'.<sup>30</sup>

The Crown submitted that its acquisition of sovereignty through these jurisdictional steps did not diminish the constitutional significance of the Treaty, and nor did it diminish the Crown's Treaty obligations.<sup>31</sup> The Crown acquired sovereignty 'honourably, fairly, reasonably and in good faith', and in accordance with the rules of jus gentium.<sup>32</sup>

Sovereignty, the Crown submitted, 'denotes the paramount civil authority'. In 1840, British authorities associated this authority with 'the power to constitute a "civil government" whose members and subjects owed paramount allegiance to the Queen'. The sovereignty obtained over New Zealand 'extended over all of the area proclaimed, and all the people within that territory', and meant that the 'imperial Queen-in-Parliament held absolute and unfettered capacity to make any law'.<sup>33</sup>

The Crown also said that 'British sovereignty did not preclude local Maori authority continuing in place'. 'Maori customary law continued to apply between Maori, subject to colonial criminal law, and subject to those elements of custom considered to be contrary to fundamental principles of common law'.<sup>34</sup> In hearings, Crown counsel clarified that the Crown's Treaty duties to Māori did not place a 'legal fetter' on the Crown, but rather imposed a 'fetter in terms of the honour of the Crown'.<sup>35</sup>

The Crown further distinguished between de jure sovereignty (sovereignty under the law) and de facto sovereignty (the practical exercise of sovereignty).<sup>36</sup> Crown counsel noted in hearing:

The Crown's position is that it acquired de jure or legal sovereignty in 1840, but for many reasons it wasn't able from that point to exercise effective or de facto sovereignty in all places at all times from that point. The exercise of de facto sovereignty occurred incrementally over time, as a result of in part discussion and negotiations with Māori and that's very clearly demonstrated in this inquiry district.<sup>37</sup>

Prior to the mid-1880s, the Crown acknowledged, de facto sovereignty remained with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, as was demonstrated by (among other things) their

---

30. New Zealand Māori Council v Attorney-General [1987] 1 NZLR 641, 690 per Somers J and Richardson J at 671 (submission 3.4.312, pp 1–2).

31. Submission 3.4.312, p 2.

32. Submission 3.4.312, p 11.

33. Submission 3.4.312, pp 12–13

34. Submission 3.4.312, p 13.

35. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p 51 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

36. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 37–38, 41–43, 55 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

37. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 41–43 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

establishment and enforcement of an aukati to control access to the district. Although Te Rohe Pōtae Māori retained practical authority over the district, the Crown's view was that they had no legal authority, and the aukati was therefore not supported by any legal authority.<sup>38</sup>

The Crown further stated that under the Treaty, the matter of how de jure sovereignty became de facto sovereignty was one of the matters for the Crown to negotiate with Māori. This negotiation was not required by law, but was part of the Treaty relationship.<sup>39</sup> The gap between assertion of de jure sovereignty and establishment of de facto sovereignty also reflected practical realities, including a need for resources to support the machinery of government,<sup>40</sup> and the need for the Crown to proceed with 'prudence' and with 'some caution and discretion' in establishing practical authority outside of European settlements.<sup>41</sup>

The Crown submitted that the assertion of de facto sovereignty 'was not legally inconsistent with the full legal sovereignty obtained in 1840'. Rather, it 'reflected the political and practical realities of colonial government':

The Crown submits that it was not legally obliged to seek further consent of the Rohe Pōtae Māori to the exercise of Crown authority in the district after 1840. Following 1840, the relationship between the Crown and Rohe Pōtae Māori was not a 'state to state' relationship. It was a political and constitutional relationship – a Treaty relationship manifested in a particular circumstance . . . [T]he relationship was not between two sovereignties, but between the Crown and iwi. Māori were entitled, under the Treaty, to specific consideration and engagement with the Crown. But this was not a function of any de jure statehood or quasi-state relationship.

However, the Crown accepts that the Tribunal may inquire into whether the Crown's conduct in exercising its sovereign authority in the district was consistent with Treaty principles.<sup>42</sup>

The Crown considered that the precise details of how its governing authority was to be exercised, and the institutional structures and relationships that would support it, were matters that remained to be worked out through further debate and discussion.<sup>43</sup> 'British sovereignty did not preclude all Māori authority or customary law from having legal status in the colony.' The Crown acknowledged that 'a proper matter for debate' was whether the Crown 'constituted new forms of government in a way consistent with Treaty principles.'<sup>44</sup>

---

38. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p 43 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

39. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 37–38, 41–43 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015); submission 3.4.312, p 12.

40. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p 42 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

41. Submission 3.4.312, pp 12–14.

42. Submission 3.4.312, pp 11–12.

43. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 5.

44. Submission 3.4.312, p 1.

3.2.3 Issues for determination

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry<sup>45</sup> and the differences between the parties, we are required to address the following questions in this chapter:

- ▶ What rights were guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty?
- ▶ What rights did the Crown acquire through the Treaty?
- ▶ How would the Crown and Māori work together?

We begin by describing the events that led to the signing of the Treaty in the district, including the arrival of Europeans, the political events that led the Crown to present the Treaty to Māori, and the signings of the Treaty by various rangatira. We then set out our analysis and conclusions on the Treaty's meaning and effect.

3.3 THE TREATY AND ITS SIGNATORIES

The Treaty was brought to the fringes of Te Rohe Pōtae in 1840, where a dynamic Māori world operated. Although European settlement had been very limited up to that point, many Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities had demonstrated an interest in European goods, ideas, and technology. Although both Māori and Pākehā adapted their customs to some extent in order to ensure their relationships were successful, Māori remained in the majority and continued to exercise authority over the district. Rangatira engaged with Europeans because they had opportunities to advance their people's well-being in accordance with their duties as leaders.

3.3.1 The arrival of Europeans in Te Rohe Pōtae

Prior to 1840, contact between Europeans and Māori was fairly limited. Captain Cook sailed the Endeavour between Karewa and the entrance to Kāwhia Harbour in 1770, but did not land.<sup>46</sup> It is possible that Captain Felix Tapsell visited Kāwhia in 1805, but the evidence is not conclusive.<sup>47</sup>

3.3.1.1 Early trade

Regular contact began in the late 1820s, with trade as the initial focus. After Waikato and Ngāpuhi made peace, the Kāwhia rangatira Te Puaha travelled to the Bay of Islands in 1828, returning with a European ship's captain named John Rodolphus Kent (Hamukete)<sup>48</sup> From this initial contact, a trading relationship grew. Kent travelled to Sydney, returning with other traders, who settled in the early 1830s among Ngāti Mahuta rangatira around Kāwhia Harbour. Kent married Te Wherowhero's daughter and settled at Heahea on the northern shore. Other traders lived under the protection of Kiwi Te Roto, Te Kanawa Te Ikatū, and Te Tuhi.<sup>49</sup>

---

45. Statement 1.4.3, pp 17–21.

46. Document A23, p 20.

47. Document A23, p 21.

48. Document A23, pp 21–22.

49. Document A70 (Boulton), p 27; doc A26 (Francis), pp 8–15; doc A23, p 22; doc A97, p 141.

The senior Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Haupōkia Te Pakarū and Te Waru, of southern Kāwhia, travelled to Sydney in 1830, also returning with traders who established stations at Ahuahu on Kāwhia Harbour, and further south at Mōkau.<sup>50</sup> Haupōkia's descendant, Moepātu Borell, told us that he made land available for inland Ngāti Maniapoto hapū to live on so they too could benefit from the trade.<sup>51</sup>

The trading relationship brought mutual benefit. Potatoes and pigs had already arrived in Kāwhia and the Waipā by the 1820s, as had maize, pumpkins, and some other vegetables, probably through trade among Māori. But trade brought access to a wider range of agricultural crops and goods, including muskets and gunpowder. These gave Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori security against further invasions from the heavily armed Ngāpuhi, and allowed them to seek utu in Taranaki. In turn, Māori offered foreign traders a steady supply of flax, as well as pork, potatoes, and other produce to help feed Australia's colonial settlements and penal colonies.<sup>52</sup>

As in other parts of the country, this early phase of contact occurred largely under Māori control. Traders lived among Māori communities under the protection of rangatira; some married into their host communities, and in some cases acquired rights to use and occupy land, at least for the duration of the marriage.<sup>53</sup> Two incidents highlight the traders' vulnerability. In one, a Mōkau-based trader was caught up in hostilities between two warring factions: an invading party from Aotea took him home with them (he later moved to Tolaga Bay).<sup>54</sup> In another, members of Ngāti Hikairo plundered tobacco and other goods from a visiting ship. This was an indication of the value of trade to Māori, though their leader, Pikia, then made reparations comprising 2,000 kete of potatoes and pork and one of his sons, who was ordered on board as a slave.<sup>55</sup>

3.3.1.2 The arrival of missionaries

Before long, traders were followed by missionaries. Both Wesleyans and Anglicans established missions in the district. The Wesleyan Missionary Society (WMS) opened missions at three locations: Kāwhia, in 1834; Ahuahu (later renamed Te Waitere), in April 1835; and at Whāingaroa, also in April 1835. In 1834, the Church Missionary Society (CMS) opened a mission at Mangapōuri, where the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers meet. These mission stations were abandoned in 1836 after a disagreement between the Wesleyan and Anglican missionary societies, but most subsequently reopened. The Church of England opened another mission at Ōtāwhao

50. Document A26, pp 10, 13; doc A70, pp 17, 28; doc A110, p 435 (Joseph).

51. Document 11(e) (Borell), pp 2–3; transcript 4.1.10, pp 150–151 (Moepātu Borell, hearing week four, Mangakotukutuku Campus, 8 April 2013).

52. Document A19, pp 19–20; doc A23, pp 22–25.

53. Document A23, p 24; transcript 4.1.8, pp 1212–1213 (Moepātu Borell, hearing week two, Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, Te Kūiti, 14 December 2012).

54. Kerryn Pollock, 'King Country region – Māori and European contact', Te Ara – the Encyclopedia of New Zealand, Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/en/king-country-region/page-5>, last modified 30 March 2015.

55. Document A23, pp 22–23.

in 1841, and a Roman Catholic mission station was set up at nearby Rangiaowhia about 1844.<sup>56</sup>

These missions were established to be at least partially independent of their host communities – though they were nonetheless expected to make gifts to their hosts, such as axes, pencils and slates, and tobacco. The missionaries typically spoke at least some Māori.<sup>57</sup>

The missionaries' accounts indicate that they were enthusiastically received, with hundreds attending services.<sup>58</sup> Māori desire for technological and economic advancement appears to have been a significant factor: missionaries provided access to literacy, and to new agricultural techniques and crops, notably wheat, which was grown at Ōtāwhao and nearby Rangiaowhia from 1839.<sup>59</sup>

Rangatira who provided land for mission stations were doing so because they perceived benefits for their people. In turn, the willingness of missionaries such as John Whiteley at Kāwhia and John Morgan at Ōtāwhao to share knowledge gave them influence among Māori, allowing them to share their ideas for spiritual as well as material advancement.<sup>60</sup> We consider the various land transactions with the missionaries in chapters 4 (Wesleyan claims to land at Kāwhia and Whāingaroa) and 5 (the Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions). Māori were interested in missionary ideas, and would selectively adopt them or incorporate them into existing belief systems. A few rangatira, such as Te Awaitaia of Ngāti Māhanga, were baptised during the 1830s and became strong supporters of missionary efforts.<sup>61</sup>

Māori interest in missionary ideas should not be overstated. Impacts varied from person to person, and from place to place, and missionaries themselves acknowledged that Māori who attended church services or were baptised were scarcely 'converted' to western beliefs and ways. Rather, they were adding new ideas to existing social and belief systems.<sup>62</sup>

The German naturalist Ernst Dieffenbach visited Whāingaroa, Aotea, Kāwhia, and Ōtāwhao in 1840, finding many Māori who professed themselves Christians, and some who had learned to read and write, while also noting that most rangatira remained aloof from the missionaries and tended not to convert.<sup>63</sup> Further south, missionaries had less impact. At Mōkau, Dieffenbach found Māori 'in very prosperous circumstances,' with European clothing and cultivations of potatoes, maize, 56. Document A23, pp 33–36; doc A26, pp 21–22; doc A70 (Boulton), p 19; doc A110, pp 422–425; doc A98 (Thorne), pp 219–223; doc A97, pp 150–151.

57. Document A23, pp 35–36; Kerry Howe, 'The Maori Response to Christianity in the Thames–Waikato Area, 1833–1840', in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 7, no 1 (1973), pp 34–46.

58. Document A23, pp 35–36; Howe, 'The Maori Response to Christianity in the Thames–Waikato Area', pp 34–46.

59. Document A23, pp 22–25; doc A97, pp 167–174.

60. Document A23, pp 33–36; Howe, 'The Maori Response to Christianity in the Thames–Waikato Area', p 35.

61. Document A23, pp 33–36.

62. Document A23, pp 33–36; Howe, 'The Maori Response to Christianity in the Thames–Waikato Area', p 35.

63. Document A23, pp 39–40.

melons, taro, tobacco, and other crops along the riverbanks. But direct contact with Europeans was rare, and Māori in that location were sceptical of missionaries and Europeans generally.<sup>64</sup> It was not until after 1840 that the first mission station was established at Mōkau.<sup>65</sup>

In Te Nehenehenui, the great inland forest of Ngāti Maniapoto, where contact was rarer, missionary and European influence was similarly limited. We have no evidence that traders or missionaries entered the interior of the inquiry district before 1840. The artist George Angas travelled through the interior in 1844. Angas found that the influence of Christianity was weak, but observed the law of tapu applying with considerable rigour to Māori and to European traders alike.<sup>66</sup> (See chapter 2 for a discussion of tapu.)

3.3.1.3 Early attempts at land transactions

In addition to the local efforts of missionaries to acquire land from Māori to establish missions, missionaries also became drawn into the early efforts of incoming settlers to acquire land. In October and November 1839, the New Zealand Company purported to enter into a deed of sale with Te Rauparaha and other Ngāti Toa rangatira concerning 20 million acres of land between Mōkau and the Hurunui River in the South Island.<sup>67</sup>

In order to protect the land from the New Zealand Company, the Wesleyan missionary William White attempted to purchase all the land between the Mōkau and Whanganui Rivers. He did so in a deed signed on 28 January 1840 at Kāwhia. Among the signatories were the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Haupōkia Te Pakarū and Te Rangituatea, as well as Kiwi Te Roto (Ngāti Mahuta), and Muriwhenua and Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia (who were both of Ngāti Mahanga). All but Te Rangituatea went on to sign the Treaty. Those who signed White's deed received £30 worth of goods out of a total intended payment of £1,000. However, White did not return to make further payments on the deed.<sup>68</sup>

The New Zealand Company then attempted to follow up on its original deed by entering into another with Taranaki Māori on 15 February 1840, this time for land between the Mōhakatino and Haurangi Rivers.<sup>69</sup> Although these attempts at purchase initially came to nothing, they started a process whereby the Crown sought to acquire land in Taranaki, which in turn became a lingering point of contention in the relationship between the peoples of Te Rohe Pōtāe and the Crown after 1840.

---

64. Ernst Dieffenbach, Travels in New Zealand with Contributions to the Geography, Geology, Botany, and Natural History of that Country, 2 vols (London: John Murray, 1843), vol 1, p 169 (doc A23, pp 37–38).

65. Document A28 (Thomas), p 29.

66. Document A23, pp 20, 36, 43–44.

67. Document A23, p 93.

68. Document A23, pp 94–95.

69. Document A23, pp 95–96.

3.3.2 Britain's intentions and the first Treaty signings

In other parts of New Zealand, contact between Māori and Europeans had been going on for much longer, and ran much deeper. In Te Tai Tokerau, European trading and whaling settlements were established at Kororāreka and Hokianga, and missionary settlements elsewhere. Trade had been occurring since the late eighteenth century and had become a source of considerable mana for northern rangatira, as well as an important means of acquiring resources, including muskets and gunpowder. Relationships of a diplomatic nature also emerged. Several rangatira had visited Sydney, where they were treated as visiting dignitaries, and Hongi Hika had visited London, where he met King George IV. Of the 2,000 Europeans living in New Zealand in 1840, about half lived in the north.<sup>70</sup>

3.3.2.1 Background to the Treaty signing

The events leading to the signing of the Treaty at Waitangi on 6 February 1840 have been considered most recently in He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti: The Declaration and the Treaty, the Tribunal's Stage 1 report on the Te Paparahi o Te Raki inquiry. We rely on the account provided in that report as an authoritative statement about the circumstances which gave rise to the Treaty, including the signings in the north. It is not necessary to describe those events in detail here, but it is helpful to briefly recap some of the key elements.

During the 1830s, official relations between northern Māori and Britain were dominated by two key themes: mutual benefit, and protection. In general, northern Māori regarded their relationship with settlers and missionaries as mutually beneficial, and welcomed opportunities for trade and the acquisition of knowledge, ideas, and technology (including writing). There were also occasions in which they sought protection from foreign threat, or assistance in negotiating their international relationships.

In 1831, a group of northern rangatira appealed to Britain for protection against France, following concerns that it intended to colonise their lands. In that petition, they also asked Britain to impose order on disorderly or violent Europeans. They had the demographic and martial power to do so themselves, but did not want to upset their relationships with traders and missionaries, or with Britain more generally.<sup>71</sup>

In 1835, in response to another perceived threat from France, a group of 35 northern rangatira signed He Whakaputanga o te Rangatiratanga o Nu Tirene (also known as the Declaration of Independence of New Zealand), declaring their tino rangatiratanga ('independence' in the English version) and their Kingitanga and mana i te whenua ('sovereign power and authority'), and asserting that no authority other than them could have lawmaking powers.<sup>72</sup>

---

70. Document A23, pp 46–48; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti: The Declaration and the Treaty (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2014), pp 238–239.

71. Document A23, p 48; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 108–137.

72. Document A23, pp 51–56; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 160–171.

Britain recognised the sovereignty of hapū and iwi, and for much of the 1830s was reluctant to intervene in these islands beyond what was necessary to secure peaceful trading relationships. Three factors combined to cause a change of heart, and to push Britain in 1839 to commit to annexation. These were: the attempts by the New Zealand Company to establish settler colonies in New Zealand, with or without the Government's approval; further rumours of French ambitions in New Zealand; and grim, exaggerated reports of Māori warfare, land loss, and depopulation from the British Resident James Busby. Together, these led British officials towards the view that some form of British authority was needed in New Zealand, to control settlers and settlement, and thereby to protect Māori.<sup>73</sup>

New Zealand was hotly debated among British officials during the last years of the 1830s, and several options were considered, including the establishment of a British protectorate over the country, and the establishment of British authority in some parts of the country only. Britain's hand was effectively forced when the New Zealand Company ship Tory set sail for Wellington, with the intention of establishing a colony there.<sup>74</sup> In response, Henry Labouchere (under-secretary of the Colonial Office) announced that 'the Government had come to the determination of taking steps which would probably lead to the establishment of a colony in that country.'<sup>75</sup> The naval officer William Hobson was therefore despatched to New Zealand with instructions to secure Māori consent for a British declaration of sovereignty over any parts of New Zealand that they were willing to place under the Crown's dominion.<sup>76</sup>

3.3.2.2 Normanby's instructions

Hobson's instructions from the secretary of state for the colonies, Lord Normanby, acknowledged New Zealand 'as a sovereign and independent state', at least so far as that was possible for a tribal people without an overarching nationwide civil government. Normanby wrote:

I have already stated that we acknowledge New Zealand as a sovereign and independent state, so far at least as it is possible to make that acknowledgment in favour of a people composed of numerous, dispersed, and petty tribes, who possess few political relations to one each other, and are incompetent to act, or even deliberate, in concert. But the admission of their rights, though inevitably qualified by this consideration, is binding on the faith of the British Crown.<sup>77</sup>

The Crown could therefore assert sovereignty only with 'the free and informed consent' of the Māori people 'expressed according to their established usages.'<sup>78</sup>

---

73. Document A23, pp 59–63; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 183–187, 317.

74. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 295–315.

75. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 315.

76. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 312–325; see also doc A23, pp 61–63.

77. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 317; see also doc A23, p 61.

78. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 317.

According to Normanby, Britain had been forced to act because extensive settlement had become inevitable. Without the controlling influence of British government, the coming influx of settlers would have disastrous effects on the Māori population. A surrender of sovereignty was the best means of preventing Māori depopulation and preserving Māori land.<sup>79</sup>

In this, Normanby's views were coloured by reports from Busby and others in northern New Zealand. While Māori were being asked to surrender sovereignty, Normanby wrote, this was scarcely a sacrifice, as the influence of settlers had rendered their sovereignty 'precarious' and 'little more than nominal'. Acquiring the benefits of British authority and protection 'would far more than compensate for the sacrifice by the natives, of a national independence, which they are no longer able to maintain.'<sup>80</sup> The Te Paparahi o Te Raki Tribunal found that this was a profoundly inaccurate picture of the Bay of Islands and Hokianga.<sup>81</sup> In the context of this inquiry, we find similarly that Busby's reports bore no relation to the situation on the ground in Te Rohe Pōtae, where European contact had taken place to a far lesser degree than in the north, and Māori authority was under no threat whatsoever.

Normanby acknowledged that Māori might be suspicious of Britain's motives, and were likely to be unfamiliar with the Treaty's English technical terms, and therefore unable to comprehend its exact meaning and effect under British law. He instructed Hobson to emphasise the harm that would come to them if they did not sign – in particular, that Britain would be unable to protect them against the actions of British settlers with no laws of their own. Britain's principal motive, Normanby made clear, was not to obtain sovereignty for its own sake, but rather for the sake of controlling settlers and settlement, and the Treaty was to be clearly explained in these plain terms.<sup>82</sup>

Similarly, although sovereignty (in British eyes) necessarily implied a supreme lawmaking and governing authority, Britain had no immediate intention of asserting its authority over Māori territories. On the contrary, Normanby instructed Hobson to secure Māori possession of their lands and defend them 'in the observance of their own customs,' except to the extent necessary to put an end to what Normanby described as 'savage practices,' such as cannibalism. With sufficient exposure to mission schools, he believed, Māori would adopt British ways of their own accord, and need not be pushed.<sup>83</sup>

Normanby's letter of instruction described the terms on which Hobson was to seek a treaty with Māori, but it also proposed measures that would govern the sale of Māori land to Europeans. He gave specific instructions that Māori interests in their lands should be protected, noting that 'All dealings with the aborigines for their lands must be conducted on the same principles of sincerity, justice,

79. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 316–318.

80. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 317.

81. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, chapter 5, in particular pp 282–284.

82. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 316–318.

83. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 320.

and good faith. He continued that Māori ‘must not be permitted to enter into any contracts in which they might be the ignorant and unintentional authors of injuries to themselves.’<sup>84</sup> He also ordered Hobson to enforce a right of Crown pre-emption, under which only the Crown could extinguish Māori customary title to their lands. Private individuals would not be allowed to buy land directly from Māori, and all land titles would derive from the Crown. Normanby noted that a ‘Legislative Commission’ would be appointed to inquire into the large ‘purchases’ that had already occurred and that future purchases would be conducted through a protector of Aborigines.<sup>85</sup> This was the origin of the Land Claims Commission, which examined several pre-Treaty transactions in Te Rohe Pōtae, discussed in chapter 4.

After questions from Hobson, Normanby clarified three points. First, Hobson was granted discretion to claim the South Island by discovery rather than by cession. Secondly, with respect to ending what Normanby referred to as ‘savage practices’, Hobson was instructed to use persuasion wherever possible, but was authorised to use force if absolutely necessary. Thirdly, Hobson was told he would have to raise his own militia if he saw the need, since Britain would not be providing one.<sup>86</sup>

In summary, Hobson’s instructions presented the Treaty as a means by which Britain could acquire sovereign authority over New Zealand, in order that it achieve its stated goals of controlling settlers and protecting Māori. It was intended to pave the way for mutually beneficial settlement. Hobson was to do what he could to persuade Māori to adopt British values and ways, but was otherwise – with very limited exceptions – to defend Māori rights to live according to their own customs.

3.3.2.3 The Treaty’s texts and the signings in the north

The Treaty, as presented to Māori, contained a preamble which (in either language) referred to the Crown’s desire for Māori to recognise its authority so it could establish institutions of government and thereby secure to Māori peace, good order, rights, and property, while avoiding the harm that would arise from uncontrolled settlement.<sup>87</sup>

In general terms, the Treaty’s three articles can also be seen in this light: article 1 granting the Crown the right to govern, which it sought in order to control settlement; article 2 guaranteeing existing Māori rights while also enabling settlement by providing for sales of land to the Crown; and article 3 securing to Māori the rights and privileges already enjoyed by British subjects.

The first signings of the Treaty occurred in Te Tai Tokerau: at Waitangi on 6 February 1840; at Waimate on 9 and 10 February; at Mangungu on 12 February;

---

84. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 319.

85. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 319.

86. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 321–322.

87. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 349.

and at the Bay of Islands on 17 February.<sup>88</sup> During the Waitangi and Mangungu debates, Hobson explained the Treaty as one in which Britain would acquire authority to control settlement, and presented it as a necessary measure to protect Māori from the impacts of settlement by allowing the Crown to ‘restrain’ British subjects where necessary.<sup>89</sup>

At Waitangi, several rangatira said they would not sign if the Crown was ‘up’ and they were ‘down’, but would accept Hobson as governor if he and the rangatira were equals. On that basis, he could be a ‘father’ or ‘peacemaker’, protecting them and their lands from other foreign powers and from ‘rum-sellers’ and other unruly settlers.<sup>90</sup>

3.3.2.4 The differences between texts

As is now well understood, the English and Māori texts differed in three key respects. The first two concerned the relative powers retained by Māori and acquired by the Crown, and the third concerned the sale of land.

First, in article 1 of the English text, Māori purportedly ceded to the Crown ‘absolutely and without reservation all the rights and powers of Sovereignty’ in their territories. Sovereignty, in the English legal tradition, refers to the supreme power within any territory to govern and make law. The Crown defined it as ‘paramount civil authority’, encompassing a right to govern and an ‘unfettered’ right to make laws applying to all people and territories within New Zealand.<sup>91</sup> Claimants, similarly, defined sovereignty as ‘the supreme, absolute power by which any State is governed’, and said it encompassed political organisation, territorial control, and independence.<sup>92</sup>

In the Māori text, Māori granted the Crown ‘te kawanatanga katoa o o ratou wenua’. ‘Kāwanatanga’ is usually translated as government or governorship. As the Tribunal explained in its Te Paparahi o Te Raki stage one report, kāwanatanga was a newly coined word, made by combining the transliteration ‘kāwana’ (for ‘governor’) with the suffix ‘tanga’, to form an abstract noun. Witnesses in that tribunal explained how Northland Māori were familiar with the term ‘kāwana’ through their leaders having travelled to New South Wales and met governors there. Some would also have been familiar with the term ‘kāwanatanga’ from Māori translations of the Bible, where it was used to describe the powers accorded a provincial governor, as distinct from those of a sovereign. Te Rohe Pōtae leaders, in contrast, had not experienced any direct contact with New South Wales governors, and were considerably less likely to have been familiar with the term from the Bible, since mission stations had opened much more recently and had not yet been established south of Kāwhia and the Pūniu.

What the term did not convey, in the view of that Tribunal (and many others),

---

88. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 369–385.

89. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 353–389.

90. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 357–367.

91. Submission 3.4.312, paras 57–60.

92. Statement 1.5.17, paras 2–5.

was the idea of supreme authority inherent in the English term ‘sovereignty’, which was what the Crown in fact sought.<sup>93</sup> That Tribunal noted that in He Whakaputanga, the 1835 declaration of independence, ‘sovereign power and authority was translated as ‘ko te Kingitanga ko te mana i te wenua’, whereas kāwanatanga was used for ‘any functions of government’, implying an administrative authority, not a supreme unconditioned power.<sup>94</sup> Scholars have debated whether another term, such as mana, should have been used to explain the power that the Crown sought, without reaching consensus. Some have argued that kāwanatanga was an appropriate choice, even if it did not convey all of the connotations of sovereignty, because it explained the practical power that the Crown sought, which was to establish a government.<sup>95</sup>

The second significant difference between the two texts occurred in article 2. In the English text, Māori were guaranteed full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession of their ‘Lands and Estates Forests and Fisheries and other properties which they may collectively or individually possess’. By contrast, in article 2 of the Māori text, Māori were guaranteed ‘te tino rangatiratanga o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga me o ratou taonga katoa’ (which the Orakei Tribunal explained as conveying ‘full authority over their lands, homes, and things important to them’, and the Motunui–Waitara Tribunal explained as the ‘highest chieftainship’ or ‘the sovereignty of their lands’).<sup>96</sup> The preamble in Māori also indicated the Crown’s intention to protect Māori in their exercise of rangatiratanga as well as their whenua (‘o ratou rangatiratanga, me to ratou wenua’); this was translated in the English text as the protection of ‘just Rights and Property’.

The use of ‘tino rangatiratanga’ reflected that Māori would retain the highest form of political authority relevant to them. He Whakaputanga had used ‘Rangatiratanga’ as a translation for ‘Independence’, and ‘Wenua Rangatira’ as a translation for ‘independent State’. The same term used in the Treaty could therefore be read as a guarantee of independent statehood. He Whakaputanga also vested sovereignty (‘ko te Kingitanga ko te mana i te wenua’) in ‘nga tino rangatira’. Whereas kāwanatanga was used in the Bible to represent the powers of a provincial governor, rangatiratanga had been used for ‘kingdom’ (as in ‘the kingdom of God’).<sup>97</sup>

The third point on which the texts differed concerned land transactions, which were covered in the rest of article 2. In the of the English text granted the Crown an ‘exclusive right of Preemption’ over such lands as Māori were willing to part with. In the Māori text, pre-emption was translated as ‘hokonga’, generally understood

93. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 349–350.

94. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Orakei Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Brooker and Friend, 1991), p 188; Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Government Printing Office, 1989), p 51.

95. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 413–415, 460–464, 513–514.

96. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Orakei Claim, p 188; Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51.

97. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 350, 514.

to refer to buying, selling, or trading, without necessarily conveying any exclusive right.<sup>98</sup>

The Tribunal agreed with Claudia Orange and other historians who had concluded that the differences in the texts meant that much depended on how the Treaty was explained verbally to rangatira who were deciding whether to sign.<sup>99</sup>

The official text of the Treaty as set out in schedule 1 to the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 is reproduced in the sidebar below.

Te Tiriti o Waitangi

Ko Wikitoria, te Kuini o Ingarani, i tana mahara atawai ki nga Rangatira me nga Hapu o Nu Tirani i tana hiahia hoki kia tohungia ki a ratou o ratou rangatiratanga, me to ratou wenua, a kia mau tonu hoki te Rongo ki a ratou me te Atanoho hoki kua wakaaro ia he mea tika kia tukua mai tetahi Rangatira hei kai wakarite ki nga Tangata maori o Nu Tirani-kia wakaetia e nga Rangatira maori te Kawanatanga o te Kuini ki nga wahikatoa o te Wenua nei me nga Motu-na te mea hoki he tokomaha ke nga tangata o tona Iwi Kua noho ki tenei wenua, a e haere mai nei.

Na ko te Kuini e hiahia ana kia wakaritea te Kawanatanga kia kaua ai nga kino e puta mai ki te tangata Maori ki te Pakeha e noho ture kore ana.

Na, kua pai te Kuini kia tukua a hau a Wiremu Hopihona he Kapitana i te Roiara Nawi hei Kawana mo nga wahi katoa o Nu Tirani e tukua aianei, amua atu ki te Kuini e mea atu ana ia ki nga Rangatira o te wakaminenga o nga hapu o Nu Tirani me era Rangatira atu enei ture ka korerotia nei.

Ko te Tuatahi

Ko nga Rangatira o te Wakaminenga me nga Rangatira katoa hoki ki hai i uru ki taua wakaminenga ka tuku rawa atu ki te Kuini o Ingarani ake tonu atu-te Kawanatanga katoa o o ratou wenua.

Ko te Tuarua

Ko te Kuini o Ingarani ka wakarite ka wakaae ki nga Rangatira ki nga hapu-ki nga tangata katoa o Nu Tirani te tino rangatiratanga o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga me o ratou taonga katoa. Otiia ko nga Rangatira o te Wakaminenga me nga Rangatira katoa atu ka tuku ki te Kuini te hokonga o era wahi wenua e pai ai te tangata nona te Wenua-ki te ritenga o te utu e wakaritea ai e ratou ko te kai hoko e meatia nei e te Kuini hei kai hoko mona.

98. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 350–351.

99. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 427, 464, 513–514.

Ko te Tuatoru

Hei wakaritenga mai hoki tenei mo te wakaetanga ki te Kawanatanga o te Kuini-Ka tiakina e te Kuini o Ingarani nga tangata maori katoa o Nu Tirani ka tukua ki a ratou nga tikanga katoa rite tahi ki ana mea ki nga tangata o Ingarani.

(Signed) WILLIAM HOBSON, Consul and Lieutenant-Governor.

Na ko matou ko nga Rangatira o te Wakaminenga o nga hapu o Nu Tirani ka huihui nei ki Waitangi ko matou hoki ko nga Rangatira o Nu Tirani ka kite nei i te ritenga o enei kupu, ka tangohia ka wakaetia katoatia e matou, koia ka tohungia ai o matou ingoa o matou tohu.

Ka meatia tenei ki Waitangi i te ono o nga ra o Pepueri i te tau kotahi mano, e waru rau e wa te kau o to tatou Ariki. Ko nga Rangatira o te wakaminenga.

The Treaty of Waitangi

From the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975

HER MAJESTY VICTORIA Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland regarding with Her Royal Favour the Native Chiefs and Tribes of New Zealand and anxious to protect their just Rights and Property and to secure to them the enjoyment of Peace and Good Order has deemed it necessary in consequence of the great number of Her Majesty's Subjects who have already settled in New Zealand and the rapid extension of Emigration both from Europe and Australia which is still in progress to constitute and appoint a functionary properly authorised to treat with the Aborigines of New Zealand for the recognition of Her Majesty's Sovereign authority over the whole or any part of those islands – Her Majesty therefore being desirous to establish a settled form of Civil Government with a view to avert the evil consequences which must result from the absence of the necessary Laws and Institutions alike to the native population and to Her subjects has been graciously pleased to empower and to authorise me William Hobson a Captain in Her Majesty's Royal Navy Consul and Lieutenant Governor of such parts of New Zealand as may be or hereafter shall be ceded to her Majesty to invite the confederated and independent Chiefs of New Zealand to concur in the following Articles and Conditions.

Article the First

The Chiefs of the Confederation of the United Tribes of New Zealand and the separate and independent Chiefs who have not become members of the Confederation cede to Her Majesty the Queen of England absolutely and without reservation all the rights and powers of Sovereignty which the said Confederation or Individual Chiefs respectively exercise or possess, or may be supposed to exercise or to possess over their respective Territories as the sole Sovereigns thereof.

Article the Second

Her Majesty the Queen of England confirms and guarantees to the Chiefs and Tribes of New Zealand and to the respective families and individuals thereof the full exclusive and undisturbed possession of their Lands and Estates Forests Fisheries and other properties which they may collectively or individually possess so long as it is their wish and desire to retain the same in their possession; but the Chiefs of the United Tribes and the individual Chiefs yield to Her Majesty the exclusive right of Preemption over such lands as the proprietors thereof may be disposed to alienate at such prices as may be agreed upon between the respective Proprietors and persons appointed by Her Majesty to treat with them in that behalf.

Article the Third

In consideration thereof Her Majesty the Queen of England extends to the Natives of New Zealand Her royal protection and imparts to them all the Rights and Privileges of British Subjects.

W HOBSON Lieutenant Governor

3.3.3 The signings at the Waikato Heads and Kāwhia

After the initial signing on 6 February 1840, the Waitangi Treaty sheet was taken to other locations in Northland (Waimate, Mangungu, and Kaitāia) and to Auckland, where it was signed on 4 March. Soon afterwards, several copies were made and circulated throughout the country.

One of those copies was sent to a former British army officer, Captain William Symonds, at Manukau, with instructions to obtain signatures. Symonds immediately called a meeting of local rangatira there, but none signed. This was apparently due to the arguments made by the Ngāpuhi rangatira Rewa, who had reluctantly signed the Treaty at Waitangi and soon afterwards changed his mind and became a vigorous opponent.<sup>100</sup>

At a subsequent meeting on 20 March, also at Manukau, three Ngāti Whātua rangatira signed. Many Waikato rangatira also attended, including Te Wherowhero, who had signed He Whakaputanga, the 1835 declaration of independence of 100. Document A23, pp 63–65; Claudia Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and Port Nicholson Press, 1987), pp 68–69; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p375.

northern rangatira.<sup>101</sup> None of these Waikato rangatira signed the Treaty, though according to Claudia Orange some promised to do so later. Symonds left no record of how he had explained the Treaty's content at either of these meetings.<sup>102</sup>

3.3.3.1 The signings at the Waikato Heads

Meanwhile, an English-language copy of the Treaty was sent to the CMS missionary Robert Maunsell at Maraetai, his mission station at Waikato Heads. Its arrival, sometime during March, coincided with a large gathering of some 1,500 Māori at an annual mission meeting. Maunsell presented the Treaty, and obtained signatures from 32 Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira.<sup>103</sup> Maunsell claimed that they represented 'the leading men' of Waikato, 'excepting perhaps two'.<sup>104</sup> Among those who signed at this stage was the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Te Ngohi Kāwhia, the father of Rewi Maniapoto.

This copy – referred to today as the Waikato–Manukau sheet – was the only English-language copy of the Treaty that was signed. Maunsell was also sent a copy of the Māori text, one of 200 printed on 17 February at Paihia. According to Orange, it 'seems likely' that it was sent with the English Waikato–Manukau sheet to assist him in explaining the Treaty's terms.<sup>105</sup> Maunsell returned the signed English-language copy to Hobson on 14 April 1840.<sup>106</sup> He also obtained a further five undated signatures from Waikato rangatira on the printed Māori copy. It is possible that he obtained these signatures after the English sheet had been returned, but we cannot be sure.<sup>107</sup>

Orange noted that Maunsell was well respected and influential among Waikato Māori, as the large number attending the mission meeting suggests.<sup>108</sup> He was also a distinguished linguist and scholar of te reo Māori who published a book on Māori grammar in 1842, and subsequently published several translations of the Old Testament from Hebrew into Māori.<sup>109</sup> It is unclear how Maunsell explained the Treaty.

We do not know whether Maunsell had the printed Māori copy at the signing hui and, if he did, whether he used it. In his evidence to this inquiry, historian Vincent O'Malley suggested that if he did have it to hand, Maunsell 'may in fact have read out' the Māori text, 'which would obviously have made a rather more profound impression on Māori understandings of the agreement than a document

101. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 167, 212.

102. Document A23, pp 64–65; Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 68–69.

103. Document A23, pp 65–66, 69–70; Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 69–70.

104. Document A23, pp 65–66.

105. Claudia Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books, 2004), p 301.

106. Document A23, pp 65–66.

107. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 301.

108. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 69.

109. Judith Morrell Nathan, 'Robert Maunsell', in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed William H Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), p 286. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 463–464.

printed in a language which few if any of the assembled chiefs were likely to be fluent in, much less be able to read'. He cautioned, however, that this 'must be a matter of some speculation'.<sup>110</sup>

More significantly, Dr O'Malley argued that, even if Maunsell had not read the Māori text, the verbal explanations given in Māori 'were likely to have been of more importance to Māori when weighing up whether to sign than the words on the document itself'.<sup>111</sup> Indeed, in the circumstances, it would have been futile for him to have read out the English text. With or without the Māori text at hand, Maunsell would have explained the document in terms that the rangatira would have been familiar with.

When he returned the signed Waikato–Manukau sheet to Hobson in mid-April 1840, Maunsell gave no direct explanation of how he had explained its terms. He did, however, emphasise that missionaries had used their position to obtain signatures on behalf of the Crown 'in obtaining an acknowledgement of the sovereign power of the Queen on the part of the natives', and now had to trust in the Crown's 'lenity and honour' that no action would ever be taken that prejudiced Māori.<sup>112</sup> In referring to 'the sovereign power of the Queen', Maunsell is likely, consistent with the English legal tradition, to have been focusing on the wording of the signed document in English rather than his verbal explanation of its terms, on which basis rangatira would have signed. Twenty years later, in 1860, Maunsell recalled that those who signed did so on the understanding that 'they retained the rights over their lands, but that the Queen had power to make laws'.<sup>113</sup>

The only other record of how Maunsell explained the Treaty is from the Ngāti Mahanga rangatira Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia, who signed this copy of the Treaty. Te Awaitaia told Governor FitzRoy in 1844 that it had been suggested to them that they 'consent to [the Queen's] sovereignty, as nothing but kindness proceeded from her government', and that any other nation 'would forcibly compel us to give up possession of the country to them'.<sup>114</sup>

Dr O'Malley noted that we only have FitzRoy's account of this exchange in English, and therefore do not know what word Te Awaitaia used for 'sovereignty'. He concluded from this evidence that Maunsell's explanation of the Treaty emphasised its protective nature, particularly in regards to lands and other resources.<sup>115</sup>

Dr O'Malley also recorded that, in the same exchange, Te Awaitaia told FitzRoy that he was 'anxious that our lands should be secured to us, that a check should be put upon English urging us to sell those lands that we cannot part with'. When Māori did freely sell, 'we wish that the feeling of kindness should be mutual; when we dispose freely of our lands, let the English dispose freely of their property'.<sup>116</sup> While this was not a direct explanation of the Treaty transaction, it nonetheless

110. Document A23, p 65.

111. Document A23, p 65.

112. Document A23, pp 65–66.

113. 'Report of the Waikato Committee: Minutes of Evidence', 11 October 1860 (doc A23, p 66).

114. FitzRoy to Stanley, 25 May 1844 (doc A23, pp 66–67).

115. Document A23, pp 66–67.

116. Document A23, p 81.

implied that Te Awaitaia understood the Treaty as having granted the governor authority to control settlers – and, more specifically, to control them in a manner that protected Māori interests.

Symonds obtained the signatures of a further seven Waikato rangatira on the same English-language sheet at Manukau on 26 April 1840.<sup>117</sup> No translator was present, and it is unclear how Symonds explained the transaction. Te Wherowhero was again in attendance and again refused to sign. Symonds gave several possible explanations for this, including the influence of the Catholic Bishop Pompallier, Te Wherowhero's 'pride', and the lack of ceremony attached to the occasion.<sup>118</sup>

In total, 39 rangatira signed the Waikato–Manukau (English-language) copy of the Treaty. Table 3.1 shows the signatories, as they are recorded in Dame Claudia Orange's Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi.

3.3.3.2 The signings at Kāwhia

Before returning to Manukau to obtain further signatures, Symonds travelled to the Waikato Heads to check on Maunsell's progress. Symonds had intended to seek further signatures as far south as Taranaki, but found that Maunsell had done much of his work for him. '[W]ith the exception of very few', Symonds claimed, Maunsell had obtained the signatures from 'all the leading men of the country as far as Mokau.'<sup>119</sup>

The exceptions, he said, were those who 'belonged to the neighbourhood of Aotea and Kawhia.'<sup>120</sup> Rather than continuing himself, Symonds sent the Māori-language sheet upon which he had obtained the three Ngāti Whātua signatories at Manukau to the Wesleyan mission at Kāwhia. He asked the missionaries there to obtain signatures from the missing rangatira and from others as far south as possible in Ngāti Maniapoto country. Today this is known as the Manukau–Kāwhia sheet.<sup>121</sup>

From April through to September 1840, the Kāwhia-based Wesleyan missionaries John Whiteley and John Wallis obtained the signatures of 10 rangatira on the Manukau–Kāwhia sheet. One of those was from a visiting Ngāpuhi rangatira; the others were from Waikato or Te Rohe Pōtae, and included several leading Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira.<sup>122</sup> According to Orange:

How agreement was obtained is not known, but Symonds directed Whiteley to explain 'perfectly' the 'nature of the cession of rights' and the missionary later believed that he had done this to the best of his ability. A last signing, on 3 September, made Maori agreement to the treaty almost unanimous on the west coast down to Mokau.<sup>123</sup>

---

117. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 73.

118. Document A23, p 68; Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 70.

119. Symonds to colonial secretary, 12 May 1840 (doc A23, p 67).

120. Document A23, p 67.

121. Document A23, pp 63–65; Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 68–71.

122. Document A23, pp 71–74; Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 68–70.

123. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 70.

No	Signed as	Probable name	Tribe	Hapū
Signed in late March or early April 1840, at Waikato Heads, witnessed by Robert Maunsell and Benjamin Ashwell, dated 11 April 1840
1	Paengahuru	Paengahuru	Waikato	Ngāti Tipa
2	Kiwi Ngarau	Kiwi Ngarau	Waikato	Ngāti Tahinga
3	Te Paki	(Hone Wetere) Te Paki	Waikato	Te Ngaungau
4	Ngapaka	Ngapaka	Waikato	Ngāti Tipa
5	Kukutai	(Waata?) Kukutai	Waikato	Ngāti Tipa
6	Te Ngoki	Te Ngoki?/Te Ngohi?	Ngāti Maniapoto	from Kāwhia
7	Muriwhenua	Muriwhenua	Ngāti Hauā	from Aotea
8	Te Pakaru	Te Pakarū	Ngāti Maniapoto	from Kāwhia
9	Waraki	Te Waraki	Ngāti Maniapoto	from Kāwhia
10	Kiwi (Te Roto)	Kiwi Te Roto	Waikato	Ngāti Mahuta (Kāwhia)
11	Te Paerata	Te Paerata	Waikato	Ngāti Pou
12	Te Katipa	Te Katipa	Waikato	Ngāti Pou
13	Maikuku	Maikuku	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
14	Aperahama Ngakainga	Aperahama Ngakainga	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
15	Hoana Riutoto	Hoana Riutoto	Waikato	Ngāti Mahuta
16	Te Wairakau	Te Wairakau	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
17	Hako	Hako	Waikato?	Ngāti Te Wehi (Aotea)
18	Wiremu Te Awaitaia	Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia	Waikato	Ngāti Māhanga (Whāingaroa)
19	Tuneu Ngawaka	Tuneu Ngawaka	Waikato	Ngāti Tahinga?
20	Kemura Wareroa	Kemura Whareroa	Waikato	Ngāti Tahinga
21	Pohepohe	Pohepohe	Ngāti Hauā	from Matamata

Table 3.1: The Waikato–Manukau sheet

Sources: Claudia Orange, Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books, 2004), pp 298–300; doc A23, pp 69–71.

A total of 13 rangatira signed the Manukau–Kāwhia (Māori-language) copy of Te Tiriti – the three Ngāti Whātua chiefs who had signed at Manukau and the 10 who had signed at Kāwhia. The signatories, as recorded in Claudia Orange's Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, are shown in table 3.3.

3.3.4 Who among the signatories were from Te Rohe Pōtae?

So far as we can determine from claimant accounts and historical sources, at least 24 of the 55 signatories of the Manukau–Kāwhia, Waikato–Manukau, and printed sheets were of hapū and iwi of this district. Of those, it appears that at least seven

No	Signed as	Probable name	Tribe	Hapū
22	Pokawa Rawhirawhi	Pokawa Rawhirawhi	Ngāti Hauā	from Matamata
23	Te Puata	Te Puata	Waikato	Ngāti Ruru at Ōtāwhao
24	Te Mokorau	Te Mokorau	Waikato	Ngāti Ruru (Ōtāwhao)
25	Pungarehu	Pungarehu	Waikato	Ngāti Apakura (Parawera)
26	Pokotukia	Pokotukia/Pohotukia?	Ngāi Te Rangi	from Tauranga?
27	Tekeha	Te Keha?	Waikato	Ngāti Naho (Te Horo)
28	Te Warepu	Te Wharepu	Waikato	Ngāti Hine (Taupiri)
29	Te Kanawa	Te Kanawa	Waikato	Ngāti Hine (Taupiri) <sup>1</sup>
30	Te Whata	Te Whata	Waikato	Ngāti Tipa (Whāingarao)
31	Ngawaka (Te Ao)	Ngawaka Te Ao	Waikato	Ngāti Whauroa (Putataka)
32	Peehi	Peehi	Waikato	Ngāti Ruru (Ōtāwhao)
Signed on 26 April 1840, at Manukau Harbour, witnessed by WC Symonds
33	Wiremu Ngawaro	Wiremu Ngawaro	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
34	Hone Kingi	Hone Kingi	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
35	Ko te ta Wha	Te Tawa/Tawha?	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
36	Tamati	Tamati	Waikato?
37	Rabata Waiti	Rapata Waiti	Waikato?
38	Te Awarahi	Te Awarahi	Waikato	Ngāti Te Ata
39	Rehurehu	Rehurehu	Waikato?

1. This was Te Kanawa Te Ikatu of Ngāti Mahuta (not to be confused with Tangitehau Tana Te Kanawa of Ngāti Maniapoto). The Ngāti Hikairo claimant Frank Thorne gave his full name as Te Kanawa Te Ika-ā-Tūkeria and recorded his hapū affiliation as Ngāti Paretaikō. Mr Thorne said Te Ikatu was also affiliated with Ngāti Hikairo. The Ngāti Apakura researchers Moepātu Borell and Robert Joseph recorded him as also having Ngāti Apakura affiliations. He seems to have signed twice (see table 3): doc A144 (Stirling), p7; doc A98 (Thorne), p226; doc A97 (Borell and Joseph), p146.

were Ngāti Maniapoto leaders: Te Ngohi Kāwhia, Te Waraki, Tāriki, Haupōkia Te Pakarū, another chief named Te Pakarū (who was likely the son of Haupōkia<sup>124</sup>), Taonui Hikaka, and Ngāmotu. The 1904 Kawenata (accord) of Ngāti Maniapoto also named Manga (Rewi Maniapoto) as signing.<sup>125</sup> However, he does not appear on any of the Treaty sheets.<sup>126</sup> Claudia Orange named Hone Waitere Te Aotearoa,

124. Document A97, p148.

125. Document A110, p474.

126. Document A110, pp474–475; doc H9(b), p[8].

No	Signed as	Probable name	Tribe	Hapū
Signed in the Waikato, date unknown, witnessed by Richard Maunsell
1	Te Uira	Te Uira	Waikato	Ngāti Pou
2	Ngahu	Ngahu	Waikato	Ngāti Pou
3	Rahiri	Rahiri	Waikato	Ngāti Mariu?
4	Te Noke	Te Noke	Waikato	Ngāti Te Wehi
5	Te Wera	Te Wera	Waikato	Ngāti Mariu?

Table 3.2: The printed sheet

Source: Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 301.

who signed the Manukau–Kāwhia sheet, as a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira; however, Ngāti Te Wehi researcher Aroha de Silva named him as a Ngāti Te Wehi rangatira, as did the Ngāti Te Wehi claimant Marge Apiti. Other evidence also supports this.<sup>127</sup>

Of the signatories from the coastal harbour areas, there were three Ngāti Mahuta rangatira from Kāwhia (Te Kanawa Te Ikatu, Kiwi Te Roto, and Hoana Riutoto), three Ngāti Te Wehi rangatira from Aotea (Hone Waitere, Hako, and Te Noke), one Ngāti Hauā rangatira from Aotea (Muriwhenua), one Ngāti Māhanga rangatira from Whāingaroa (Te Awaitaia), three Ngāti Tahinga rangatira from Whāingaroa (Kiwi Ngārau, Tūnui Ngāwaka, and Kāmura Whareroa), and one Ngāti Tipa rangatira from Whāingaroa (Te Whata). The Te Matenga who signed may have been of Ngāti Hikairo. Of the signatories from further inland, there were two Ngāti Apakura rangatira from Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia (Te Waru and Pungarehu), and three Ngāti Ruru rangatira of Ōtāwhao (Te Mokorau, Te Puata, and Peehi). We have produced brief biographies of these rangatira in chapter 2.

Dr O'Malley argued that Ngāti Maniapoto 'were quite poorly represented', while it was 'not apparent that any Ngāti Raukawa signed' at all. This, in his view, reflected the fact that copies of the Treaty were not brought to inland locations such as Maungatautari (Ngāti Raukawa) and Hangatiki (Ngāti Maniapoto).<sup>128</sup> Researcher Paul Thomas echoed this view in his evidence on the Mōkau region: he had found nothing to suggest that the key Mōkau chiefs had signed the Treaty.<sup>129</sup> Counsel also submitted that there is no record that rangatira from the following 127. Document A104(i) (de Silva), pp 112–113; doc N45 (Apiti), para 4. New Zealand History Online names him as a rangatira of Ngāti Te Wehi and Ngāti Paiaka from Aotea: 'Hōne Waitere Te Aoturoa', Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <https://nzhistory.govt.nz/politics/treaty/signatory/2-10>, updated 20 June 2016. The claimant John Kaati named Waitere as signing for Ngāti Maniapoto but may have relied on Orange. Whereas Waitere signed as Te Aotearoa, he is more often known by the name Te Aotūroa.

128. Document A23, p 74.

129. Document A28, p 50.

No	Signed as	Probable name	Tribe	Hapū
Signed on 20 March 1840, at Manukau Harbour, witnessed by WC Symonds and James Hamlin
1	Te Kawau	(Apihai) Te Kawau	Ngāti Whātua	Te Taou, Nga Oho
2	Te Tinana	(Ihikiera?) Te Tinana	Ngāti Whātua	Te Taou
3	Te Reweti	Te Reweti (Tāmaki)	Ngāti Whātua	Te Taou
Signed on 28 April 1840, at Kāwhia, witnessed by James Wallis
4	Rawiri	Rawiri	Ngāpuhi? <sup>1</sup>
Signed on 21 May 1840 (at Kāwhia?), witnessed by John Whiteley
5	Te Kanawa	Te Kanawa	Waikato	Ngāti Mahuta <sup>1</sup>
6	Tāriki	Tāriki	Waikato? Ngāti Maniapoto?	From Patupatu Pā
7	Haupokia	Haupōkia (Te Pakarū)	Ngāti Maniapoto?
Signed on 25 May 1840, witnessed by John Whiteley
8	Te Waru	(Hori] Te Waru (Haunui)	Waikato	Ngāti Te Apakura
Signed on 15 June 1840, witnessed by John Whiteley
9	Taunui	Te Taonui	Waikato? Ngāti Maniapoto?	From Patupatu Pā
10	Hone Waitere, Te Aotearoa		Ngāti Maniapoto?	From Aotea?
11	Te Matenga, Te Wahapu Te Matenga			From Te Wahapu? <sup>2</sup>
Signed on 27 August 1840, at Kāwhia
12	Ngamotu	(Wiremu Hopihana?) Ngamotu	Ngāti Maniapoto?
Signed on 3 September 1840 [at Kāwhia?]
13	Warekaua	Wharekaua/ Wharekawa?	Waikato	From Whakatiwai?

1. Te Kanawa appears to have signed twice: see table 3.1.

2. The Ngāti Hikairo claimant Frank Thorne said this may have been Te Matenga of Ngāti Hikairo: doc A98 (Thorne), p 214.

Table 3.3: The Manukau–Kāwhia sheet

Source: Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 296; doc A23, pp 69–71.

hapū signed the Treaty: Ngāti Rae Rae, Te Ihingārangi, Ngāti Pahere and Ngāti Ingoa.<sup>130</sup> We consider these views below.

The rangatira appear to have signed with an ‘x’ or a tohu, suggesting they had not yet learned to write. This would emphasise that those who signed either sheet, including the English-language Waikato–Manukau sheet, would have relied on the oral te reo Māori explanation of the Treaty’s terms.

130. Submission 3.4.252, pp 24–26.

3.3.4.1 Ngāti Maniapoto

While it appears only eight Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira signed the Treaty, we do not accept that they only represented coastal interests. A number of the most notable rangatira of the period signed the Treaty. They included Te Ngohi Kāwhia and Te Waraki, who had considerable influence in the northern parts of the district, from southern Kāwhia across to the Pūniu, including interests in Ōtāwhao and other lands north of the Pūniu. In addition, the Treaty was signed by Tāriki and Taonui, both of whom had major pā at Te Kūiti but were recognised as having rights throughout much of the centre of the district and the Mōkau River valley. It does appear to be the case that none of the key coastal Mōkau rangatira such as Takerei Waitara signed. Nor did Te Rangituatēa, who had signed William White’s land purchase deed in January 1840. Haupōkia Te Pakarū – who signed at Kāwhia – was of Ngāti Hari and Ngāti Urunumia, whose interests extended into the Tūhūa district in the south, as well as in northern parts of the district.<sup>131</sup>

The Ngāti Maniapoto researcher Dr Robert Joseph told us that Ngāti Maniapoto were ‘well represented by a number of highly competent and intelligent rangatira . . . in the signing and endorsing of the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840’.<sup>132</sup> He referred to the 1904 Kawenata,<sup>133</sup> which recorded that Ngāti Maniapoto leaders entered into the Treaty relationship because they believed it would bring benefit to their people (we will consider this in more detail in section 3.4.3.2.4).<sup>134</sup>

During the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Kāwhia Murahi said that rangatira such as Te Ngohi Kāwhia signed in the hope of accessing new goods and advancing opportunities for trade, but also on the understanding that ‘the Crown had bound itself to meeting certain obligations which included the protection of mana rangatira’.<sup>135</sup> Tom Roa also told us that a ‘number of our rangatira signed Te Tiriti with an expectation that such an agreement guaranteed our mana rangatiratanga, our autonomous authority over our land, our taonga’.<sup>136</sup>

---

131. Transcript 4.1.4, p145 (Tame Tūwhangai, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Ngāpūwaihaha Marae, 26 April 2010).

132. Document A110, p 475.

133. Document A110, p 474.

134. Document S19(a), pp 38, 40.

135. Document A110, pp 472–474.

136. Document 14 (Roa), para 19(a).

3.3.4.2 Ngāti Raukawa

The evidence in this inquiry suggests that no rangatira from Ngāti Raukawa from this district signed the Treaty.<sup>137</sup> Dr O'Malley could not identify any Raukawa signatories from this district,<sup>138</sup> and claimants and traditional historians made no mention of any Raukawa signatories.<sup>139</sup> Some of the signatories were closely related to Ngāti Raukawa, including Ngāti Maniapoto leaders such as Te Ngohi Kāwhia (the father of Rewi Maniapoto), and signatories from Ngāti Ruru.<sup>140</sup> In addition, according to Claudia Orange, several of the southern Ngāti Raukawa rangatira signed at Ōtaki and Kapiti.<sup>141</sup> But there do not appear to be any Raukawa rangatira from this district who signed the Treaty.

3.3.4.3 Ngāti Hikairo

Frank Thorne told us that there is a 'strong and staunch' tradition that Ngāti Hikairo did not sign the Treaty of Waitangi in Kāwhia or elsewhere.<sup>142</sup> This was despite the fact that Ngāti Hikairo were present in Kāwhia in 1840.<sup>143</sup> Mr Thorne noted that Te Kanawa Te Ika-ā-Tūkeria (also known as Te Ikatu) of Ngāti Paretaikō, who signed the Treaty at Kāwhia on 21 May 1840, had Ngāti Hikairo connections, though Orange recorded him as signing for Ngāti Mahuta.<sup>144</sup> Mr Thorne also noted that Te Matenga, who was among the signatories at Kāwhia, may have been Te Matenga of Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>145</sup>

3.3.4.4 Ngāti Apakura

Orange named Pungarehu of Ngāti Apakura as signing the Waikato–Manukau sheet in late March or early April 1840, and Te Waru as signing the Waikato–Manukau sheet on 25 May 1840. According to the Ngāti Apakura traditional researchers Moepātu Borell and Robert Joseph, Pungarehu lived at and had mana over Rangiaowhia and Ōtāwhao. They also identified Te Kanawa Te Ikatu as being

---

137. The Waikato–Manukau sheet records a Te Paerata of Ngāti Pou as signing in late March or early May 1840. This appears to be a different rangatira from the Ngāti Koherā and Ngāti Raukawa leader Te Paerata, who was originally known as Hoariri and, according to traditions, did not become known as Te Paerata until after the formation of the Kingitanga in the 1850s. Hoariri died at Ōrākau and was the father of the 1880s Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Tūwharetoa leader Hitiri Te Paerata: doc K25 (Te Hiko), paras 1.3, 2.8–2.9; doc I12 (Te Hiko), paras 1.10–1.12; doc B2 (Joseph), para 8.

138. Document A23, p 74.

139. For claimants, see docs K25, I13 (Manaia) and P10 (Te Hiko and Hodge). For traditional histories, see docs A83 (Te Hiko) and A86 (Hutton).

140. Document B2, p 1.

141. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 312.

142. Document A98, p 224.

143. Document A98, p 225.

144. Document A98, pp 224–226.

145. Document A98, p 214.

descended from Apakura, and noted that the three Ngāti Ruru signatories (Te Mokoroa, Te Pūata, and Peehi) held mana at Ōtāwhao.<sup>146</sup>

3.3.4.5 Waikato-affiliated groups

The Treaty was signed by a number of rangatira from hapū of the coastal and nearby inland areas, from Kāwhia north to Whāingaroa. These signatories included rangatira of Ngāti Mahuta from Kāwhia, Ngāti Te Wehi and Ngāti Hauā from Aotea, Ngāti Māhanga, Ngāti Tahinga, and Ngāti Tipa from Whāingaroa, and Ngāti Ruru rangatira of Ōtāwhao. Many of these hapū had close affiliations with Waikato.

Their signatures contrast with the decision of Te Wherowhero not to sign the Treaty, in spite of several attempts to persuade him. Te Wherowhero lived for some time at or near Ōtāwhao at the invitation of his father-in-law Peehi Tūkōrehu. There is no clear explanation for his refusal, though (as noted earlier) he had signed He Whakaputanga, the 1835 declaration of independence, only a few months earlier. Claimant Gordon Lennox told us Te Wherowhero saw that declaration as the basis for his relationship with the Crown.<sup>147</sup> Several of Te Wherowhero's close associates did sign the Treaty, including Kiwi Te Roto and Te Kanawa Te Ikatu.

3.3.4.6 Ngāti Tūwharetoa

Iwikau Te Heuheu and another Ngāti Tūwharetoa rangatira, Te Koroiko or Te Korohiko, signed the Treaty at Waitangi on 6 February 1840,<sup>148</sup> even though, as the Central North Island Tribunal noted, 'their hapu and iwi did not consider themselves committed by this action.'<sup>149</sup> Indeed, Iwikau's older brother and Ngāti Tūwharetoa ariki Mananui Te Heuheu publicly rejected the Treaty and requested the whole of the Te Arawa waka do the same when it was presented at Ohinemutu in 1840, stating, according to Tūwharetoa oral history:

I will never agree to the authority [mana] of that woman and her people intruding on our islands, I am a chief of these islands, this is my response, stand up! And leave! Go!

Te Arawa listen! This is my word for the waka of Te Arawa, do not agree for we will be lost as slaves to that woman.<sup>150</sup>

---

146. Document A97, pp 52, 146. Some sources refer to Pokotukia (or Pohotukia), who signed the English-language Waikato–Manakau sheet at Waikato Heads, as a Ngāti Apakura rangatira. Other sources refer to him as possibly being of Ngāi Te Rangī from Tauranga. None of the claimants referred to him: doc A23 p 70; doc A97 p 145; doc A110, p 469.

147. Document K22, p 19.

148. Orange, An Illustrated History of the Treaty of Waitangi, p 290; see also doc A35 (Ward), p 13.

149. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 194.

150. Document J22 (Otimi and Chase), para 16.

We agree with the Central North Island Tribunal, who accepted that, led by Mananui and endorsed by their tribes, Ngāti Tūwharetoa and others deliberately rejected the Treaty in 1840.<sup>151</sup>

3.3.4.7 Northern Whanganui groups

Nine Whanganui rangatira signed the Treaty at Pākaitore on 23 May 1840. According to the Whanganui Land Tribunal, most of these rangatira were from the lower reaches of the river, well outside this inquiry district. Two of the signatories, Te Peehi Tūroa and his son Pakoro, had extensive interests inland at Mangonui o te Ao, but those interests do not seem to have extended into this district.<sup>152</sup> Among the senior northern Whanganui rangatira with connections to this district who did not sign were Te Mamaku and Te Oro of Ngāti Hāua; Matuaahu Te Wharerangi of Ngāti Hikairo ki Tongariro and Ngāti Tamakana; and Te Riaki of Ngāti Rangi, along with ‘many other northern and eastern rangatira’<sup>153</sup>

Among those groups who were not represented were Ngāti Hāua. Counsel for Ngāti Hāua did not address the status of the group in respect of the Treaty, except to state that Ngāti Hāua ‘have long asserted their tino rangatiratanga’<sup>154</sup> In his evidence to the Whanganui Land Tribunal, the late rangatira Sir Archie Tairoa maintained that Ngāti Hāua’s engagement with the Crown should have rightfully been based on a Treaty relationship, irrespective of whether they signed the Treaty:

At no time in our engagement with the Crown has there been a relationship based on the terms or the spirit of Te Tiriti. There is no partnership and sometimes barely even a relationship. Where there has been a relationship we have been relegated to the role of rebels, Hauhau, petitioners, submitters and objectors rather than Tiriti partners.<sup>155</sup>

3.3.5 Conclusions about the Treaty signings

The Treaty was brought to the edges of Te Rohe Pōtāe in the months following the initial signing at Waitangi. Although the Treaty does not appear to have been subject to the same amount of debate as in the north, Māori of the district had the opportunity to consider the Treaty in at least two locations: first at the Waikato Heads and then at Kāwhia, where a Māori-language text of the Treaty was left for some months. The process was not ideal – the Crown did not itself present or explain the Treaty in this district, nor did it seek to bring the Treaty sheets to

---

151. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 195.

152. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritāunoka: The Whanganui Land Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2015), vol 1, pp 79–80, 130–131. Te Peehi’s Te Patutokotoko hapū grouping is closely associated with Ngāti Hekeāwai, which has interests in Tūhua lands in the south of the district: doc R25 (Rupe), para 11. For a brief overview of the connections between Ngāti Hekeāwai and Te Patutokotoko, and their rohe, see doc A108 (Patete), pp 263–267.

153. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritāunoka, vol 1, p 132.

154. Submission 3.4.211, para 33.

155. Document A47, p 3.

the interior of the district so as to ensure all rangatira had the chance to consider whether or not to sign.

However, it is also clear that a significant number of rangatira from this district availed themselves of opportunities to sign the Treaty. Among Ngāti Maniapoto, some key rangatira were either on the spot (such as Te Ngohi, at the Waikato Heads) or took opportunities to sign while in Kāwhia (such as Taonui), marking their agreement to the new arrangement. Rangatira from a range of Waikato-affiliated hapū in the coastal areas and inland to Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia also signed. The very limited evidence that is available suggests that those who signed did so on the basis of explanations given to them that the Crown's role would be protective in nature, and that their existing authority would not alter as regards their own affairs. Maunsell said he explained the Treaty as meaning that Māori retained rights over their lands, while the Queen had power to make laws,<sup>156</sup> but this does not tell us how the parties understood the rights that Māori would retain, nor does it tell us where and how the Queen's laws would interact with the rights that Māori had retained. And the Ngāti Māhanga rangatira Te Awaitaia said he consented based on missionary advice that Britain would be 'kind' to Māori, whereas another nation might invade and force Māori to give up their country.<sup>157</sup>

By contrast, there appears to have been no signatories from Raukawa rangatira, nor were rangatira from northern Whanganui among the signatories here or elsewhere. It is unclear whether they were aware of the Treaty and had the opportunity to sign. Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Tūwharetoa, however, had the opportunity but chose not to sign (in the case of Tūwharetoa, two rangatira did sign – an act that was subsequently repudiated by the tribe). Both groups maintain their tradition of having refused to sign the Treaty.

We now turn to our attention to the Treaty's meaning and effect, and to the Treaty principles against which we will assess claims in this inquiry.

3.4 THE TREATY'S MEANING AND EFFECT

Our task in this chapter is to establish the Treaty's meaning and effect so as to be able to apply it to the claims before us. The Waitangi Tribunal's task in this respect is set out under section 5(2) of the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975. The section explains that, in carrying out its functions, the Tribunal has exclusive authority to determine the meaning and effect of the Treaty, and to decide issues raised by the differences between the texts. It is from the powers conferred upon the Tribunal in this section that the Tribunal derives the principles of the Treaty to apply in assessing claims.

In essence, while the Treaty's texts are stable and known, the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 requires us to make our own determination for the purposes of assessing the particular claims before us. It is for us to determine how the Treaty and its principles apply.

---

156. Document A23, p 66.

157. Document A23, pp 66–67.

3.4.1 How should the Treaty be interpreted?

3.4.1.1 Approaches to Treaty interpretation

Two possible approaches have been available to the Tribunal in carrying out this task: one which derives from a legal tradition of interpreting treaties and one in which western law and tikanga are placed side by side. Here we explain these approaches and how they have been applied by other Tribunals, before describing our approach.

3.4.1.2 The legal approach to interpreting treaties

The standard legal approach to treaties of cession requires four elements. These are:

1. international personality or statehood;
2. intention to act under international law;
3. agreement; and
4. intention to create legal and not merely moral obligations.<sup>158</sup>

While the debate on these matters turns on international law, the manner in which such treaties are interpreted in practice should be found in that treaty's text. This approach was discussed by the Waitangi Tribunal in the Orakei report.<sup>159</sup> Reviewing Lord McNair's The Law of Treaties, that Tribunal noted that a treaty needs interpretation only if the text is in some way contested or ambiguous. In such cases, 'the primary duty of a tribunal charged with applying or interpreting a treaty' is to 'give effect to the expressed intentions of the parties, that is, their intention as expressed in the words used by them in the light of the surrounding circumstances.'<sup>160</sup> McNair also stressed the need 'to bear in mind . . . the overall aim and purpose of the Treaty'.<sup>161</sup>

For bilingual treaties, such as the Treaty of Waitangi, the Orakei Tribunal noted that there is an increased likelihood that ambiguities in meaning will arise. Under such circumstances, neither text is regarded as superior and it is permissible to interpret one text by reference to the other.<sup>162</sup> The Tribunal endorsed McNair's view that the treaty in question should be interpreted to give effect to the parties' expressed intentions, by interpreting the words while considering the surrounding circumstances, including the treaty's overall purposes and aims.<sup>163</sup>

In addition, the Orakei Tribunal determined that, when considering the differences between the two versions of the Treaty, considerable weight should be given to the Māori text since that was assented to by the majority of signatories.<sup>164</sup> Moreover, that Tribunal considered that this was consistent with the contra proferentem rule, which (in the Tribunal's words) provides that, 'in the event of ambigu-

---

158. Philip Joseph, Constitutional and Administrative Law in New Zealand, 4th ed (Wellington: Thomson Reuters, 2014), p 59.

159. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

160. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

161. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

162. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

163. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

164. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

ity, a provision should be construed against the party which drafted or proposed that provision.<sup>165</sup> Performance of treaties is, in addition, ‘subject to an overriding obligation of mutual good faith and that obligation also applies to the interpretation of treaties.’<sup>166</sup>

The Tribunal went on to note the rule for the interpretation of treaties made between Native American or Indian peoples and the United States of America laid down by that country’s Supreme Court.<sup>167</sup> That rule indicates that what matters is not the technical meaning of the Treaty’s words, but ‘the sense which they would naturally be understood by Indians.’<sup>168</sup> In the court’s reasoning, this was because such treaties were drafted by officials who were ‘skilled in diplomacy, masters of a written language, understanding the modes and forms of creating the various technical estates known to their law, and assisted by an interpreter employed by themselves’, and who were drafting the treaty in their own language. The Indians, on the other hand, ‘have no written language, and are wholly unfamiliar with all forms of legal expression, and whose only knowledge of the terms in which the Treaty is framed is that imported to them by the interpreter employed by the United States.’<sup>169</sup> As the Tribunal also noted, most of the treaties in the United States are only in English.<sup>170</sup>

The Orakei Tribunal observed that these circumstances were in many ways applicable to the Treaty of Waitangi. Only some of the rangatira who signed could read in Māori, and few if any could read English.<sup>171</sup> Their understanding therefore relied on the Māori text and on any verbal explanations given in Māori.

The Orakei Tribunal then referred to the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Canada in R v Taylor and Williams where a similar approach to the interpretation of treaties with native people was adopted.<sup>172</sup> In that case the court stated:<sup>173</sup>

The principles to be applied to the interpretation of Indian treaties have been much canvassed over the years. In approaching the terms of a treaty quite apart from the other considerations already noted, the honour of the Crown is always involved and no appearance of ‘sharp dealing’ should be sanctioned. Further if there is any ambiguity in the words or phrases used not only should the words be interpreted as against the framers and drafters of such treaties, but such language should not be interpreted or construed to the prejudice of the Indians if another construction is reasonably possible . . . finally if there is evidence by conduct or otherwise as to how the parties

---

165. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180.

166. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 180–181.

167. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181.

168. Jones v Meehan (1899) 175 US 1 (Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181).

169. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181, quoting Jones v Meehan (1899) 175 US 1.

170. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181.

171. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181.

172. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181.

173. R v Taylor and Williams (1981) 62 CCC (2d) 227 at 235 (Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 181).

understood the terms of the treaty, then such understanding and practice is of assistance in giving content to the term or terms.

These approaches to treaty interpretation align with how the Treaty can be understood and interpreted by reference not only to the English version but also to the Māori text. The circumstances in which rangatira signed the Treaty and their actions that followed aid our interpretation of its terms.

3.4.1.2.1 A TIKANGA APPROACH TO INTERPRETING TREATIES

One limitation of the above approach to treaty interpretation is that it begins in a western legal tradition, rather than setting law and tikanga side by side. Through that lens, there is the potential for Māori sources and understandings of law and authority to be read down as ‘customary’ concepts that are legitimate only to the extent that western law acknowledges and provides for them.

Another way of understanding the meaning and effect of the Treaty is to begin by looking at the world in which the parties lived as a way of informing the interpretation of the Treaty and its texts. By this approach, the Treaty can be seen as a meeting point between two peoples, each with their own culture, language, technology, systems of law and government, and their own specific motivations for entering a Treaty relationship. To understand the Treaty by this approach, it is first necessary to understand the systems of law and authority that underpinned Māori and British societies at that time. The Crown brought with it ideas of statehood and sovereignty, its institutions of government and law, and its tradition of managing relationships using written agreements. It also brought with it a practice of treaty making that sought written consent to specific actions that were to be taken from the point the treaty was entered into.

Māori were orientated according to the exercise of mana, through hapū and iwi and under the leadership of rangatira, and through the practice of tikanga; and they managed relationships through oral exchange. The written word was foreign to most of the rangatira who signed the Treaty, and written English even more so. Māori, including those of Te Rohe Pōtae, also had their own tradition of treaty making (known as hohou rongo or tatau pounamu), having long negotiated with other Māori groups over territory and resource use, military alliances, peace, intermarriage, and other common aspects of pre-European life. They regarded such agreements as tapu, and would enter agreements only if they were consistent with tikanga and with the mana of their people (which, in the case of Ngāti Maniapoto, meant mana whatu āhuru).<sup>174</sup> As noted in preceding chapters, the term refers to their strength and peace that arose from their unity. Ngāti Maniapoto in particular were guided by a process of treaty-making tradition associated with ‘te kī tapu’ – the sacred word of the rangatira. Claimant Tom Roa told us that ‘it was because of the rangatira’s mana that his word was sacrosanct. And so he, his family, his people were committed by his word.’<sup>175</sup>

174. Document A117 (Jackson), pp17–19.

175. Document H9(c) (Roa), para 7.

The meaning that could be derived from the Treaty following this approach depends on the whole transaction, oral as well as written, and from the broader historical context. It is not simply a matter of interpreting words, and looking at motivations and understandings where ambiguities arise; but of seeking to understand those motivations first in order to determine what kind of relationship each party was seeking, and whether there was common ground. Although they have different conceptual origins, the tikanga and standard legal approaches bring us to a very similar point: either approach requires us to determine, for rangatira who signed the Treaty, their 'natural understanding' of what was being offered to them and what they therefore consented to.

3.4.1.2.2 THE APPROACH OF OTHER TRIBUNALS

In practice, the Waitangi Tribunal has taken both paths towards determining the Treaty's meaning and effect. This is partly due to the differences between the two texts, and partly also because of the importance of placing Māori sources of law and authority alongside those of British law. Where analysis has begun with the historical and cultural context it has inevitably led to closer discussion of the specific terms, and where it has begun with the specific terms it has inevitably broadened out to encompass the historical and cultural context.

For these reasons, all Tribunals have been concerned with how Māori understood the Treaty, and what they agreed to based on the proposals that were put to them. Within that context, Tribunals have given considerable weight to the Māori text. They have also considered the surrounding discussions, in acknowledgement of the fact that Māori understanding of the Treaty depended entirely on how it was presented in te reo.<sup>176</sup> We consider that approach to be equally applicable to Te Rohe Pōtae.

We turn now to consider what was retained or released by Rohe Pōtae Māori when they signed the Treaty.

3.4.1.2.3 OUR APPROACH

Our approach is to place a tikanga understanding of treaties alongside the standard legal approach to their interpretation. This ensures that any gloss that Māori sources of law and authority might add to our identification of Treaty principles, as they apply to the claims before us, are considered. It also requires us to consider how Te Rohe Pōtae Māori might have understood the Treaty arrangement, had they been asked to give their view of the situation. In doing so, we seek to resolve the key differences between the Treaty's two texts, in order to arrive at the principles of the Treaty that we apply to the claims in our inquiry. We are guided by the conclusions of previous Tribunals so far as they inform our analysis.

We apply this approach to the three key issues before us which we identified above, namely:

- ▶ What rights were guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty?

---

176. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 180; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 527.

- What rights did the Crown acquire through the Treaty?
- What was the relationship between Crown and Māori authority?

3.4.1.3 Limitations on the evidence

In setting out to determine what Māori signatories freely consented to, we must consider how they understood the offer that was presented to them. As described above, we have very limited evidence about how the Treaty was explained in this district. Specifically, we have very brief accounts from Maunsell and Te Awaiaia, which were discussed in section 3.3.3.1.

While this evidence is limited, we know more about the broader context and the parties' motivations, which we discussed in section 3.3.3.1. We also know a considerable amount about how the Treaty was explained to Māori in other parts of the country, and – as we will see – this is consistent with the brief accounts given by Maunsell and Te Awaiaia. Maunsell seems to have regarded the Treaty as a significant transaction, in which missionaries as well as Māori were being asked to place their trust in the Crown's honour. That, and the large attendance at his residence, would tend to suggest that he would have fully explained the Treaty's terms and that they would have been debated. While we have no evidence about the Treaty being explained or debated at Kāwhia, we again cannot see that Māori would have entered into a significant transaction with the Crown without first discussing the terms. Such an approach would scarcely be consistent with Māori forms of communal decision-making. The fact that Treaty signings occurred over several months in Kāwhia, and that some of the rangatira who signed at Waikato Heads later returned to Kāwhia or Aotea, would tend to suggest there was ample opportunity for debate. As well as considering the context and the debates, we also have evidence about how Māori subsequently interpreted the Treaty and their rights and obligations under it, and how they acted in the period immediately after the signings. This evidence, which we will discuss in section 3.4.3.2, sheds considerable light on how Māori in this district understood the agreement they had entered.

Notwithstanding the limited evidence about the signings themselves, therefore, we are able to draw conclusions about what the Treaty signatories freely consented to, which in turn allows us to derive Treaty principles.

3.4.1.4 Does it make a difference that the Waikato–Manukau sheet was signed in English?

The Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 grants the Tribunal exclusive authority to determine the Treaty's meaning and effect 'as embodied in the 2 texts', and to 'decide issues raised by the differences between them'.<sup>177</sup> For most Treaty signings around New Zealand, rangatira signed a te reo Māori translation of the English original, and the material differences between those two texts required Tribunals to determine the relative weight that must be given to each, while giving due consideration to the broader context. But, for the Waikato–Manukau signing, rangatira signed the English text which granted the Crown "all rights and powers of sovereignty' over the signatories' territories. This was the sheet signed by three Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira (Te Ngohi Kāwhia, Te Pakarū, and Te Waraki), and by several of the coastal Waikato rangatira (Te Kanawa Te Ikatu, Kiwi Te Roto, Hoana Riutoto, Muriwhenua, Te Awaitaia, Kiwi Ngārau, Tūnui Ngāwaka, Kāmuru Whareroa, Te Whata, Pungarehu) and the Ngāti Ruru signatories (Te Mokoroa, Te Puata, and Peehi). Does this materially alter the arrangement that was put to these signatories, and therefore what they consented to? In particular, does it mean that the rangatira who signed this sheet were offered – and consented to – the Treaty's English language terms, and were therefore not offered the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga?

---

177. Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975, s5.

We note that the Crown did not make any submission that this was the case. Rather, the Crown accepted that for all of this district's signatories the Treaty provided 'solemn guarantees to Māori by the Crown of continuing Māori rights and property; including rangatiratanga.'<sup>178</sup> It is not clear why Crown counsel omitted 'tino'; nonetheless, it is an acknowledgement that the Crown guaranteed all of this district's signatories the rights set out in the Māori text.

As discussed in section 3.3.3, a Māori-language copy of the Treaty was sent to Maunsell at some stage. Claudia Orange's view was that this was likely one of the 200 copies printed at the Paihia mission in February 1840, and was probably forwarded to assist Maunsell with his explanations of the Treaty's terms. Maunsell himself was among the Church Missionary Society's most expert scholars of Māori. We accept O'Malley's view that the Treaty was probably explained in Māori, and in terms that were similar to those used elsewhere in locations where the Māori text was signed. Indeed, if it was not explained in Māori then it is not clear what Māori signatories consented to, if anything, since, so far as we know, none of the signatories was fluent in English. On this basis, we share the Crown's view that the Treaty offered Māori signatories a guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, irrespective of which version was signed.

It is also important to note that many of this district's signatories signed the Māori language Manukau–Kāwhia sheet. Among Ngāti Maniapoto, these included the southern Kāwhia rangatira Ngamotu, and the signatories with mana over central and southern areas of the district (Tāriki, Taonui, and Haupōkia Te Pakarū). Others to sign this sheet were the Ngāti Apakura rangatira Te Waru and the Ngāti Te Wehi rangatira Hone Waitere. Te Noke of Ngāti Te Wehi signed the printed te reo sheet. For these signatories, there is no question that the text and explanations in Māori would have determined their understanding of what they were consenting to.

3.4.1.5 The Treaty's application to non-signatories

Counsel for some claimants submitted that many rangatira from this district did not sign the Treaty, either because they dissented or because they were never 178. Submission 3.4.312, p 11; see also p 15; transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 35–36, 38, 46 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

---

offered the opportunity. They submitted that those who did not sign could not be bound by the Treaty.<sup>179</sup>

Earlier (see section 3.3.5), we explained how Ngāti Maniapoto have a tradition whereby they were signatories to the Treaty. Other Waikato-affiliated groups were in a similar position. Not all rangatira signed. Others were not given the opportunity or refused to do so, including Raukawa, Ngāti Hikairo, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa.

Other Tribunals have considered the Treaty's application in territories where Māori either refused to sign or were not offered the opportunity, or alternatively where they signed but without the Crown making any meaningful attempt to convey the Treaty's significance or terms. Those Tribunals have consistently concluded that the Crown acquired Treaty obligations to all hapū and iwi by virtue of its acquisition of kāwanatanga. However, they have differed over the extent to which the Treaty imposed obligations on non-signatories or those who signed without having the terms explained.<sup>180</sup>

In the Rekohu inquiry, the Tribunal found that the Crown's acquisition of sovereignty bound the Crown to a unilateral declaration of Treaty rights:

There appear to have been significant North Island rangatira who did not sign, and no signatories for the greater part of the South Island when sovereignty over that area was proclaimed, and yet the Treaty must be taken to have applied in all places when sovereignty was assumed.<sup>181</sup>

In 2008, the Central North Island Tribunal concurred that the 'Crown's guarantees are binding on it as a unilateral declaration and promise of intent', but also concluded that the Treaty was equally binding on Māori, irrespective of whether they signed or not. Some later gave their formal affirmation to the Treaty, and others did not, 'but all have a partnership with the Crown. Whether a formal act of cession took place or not, all iwi are in the same position.'<sup>182</sup>

But in the Te Urewera inquiry, the Tribunal concluded that Tūhoe did not owe reciprocal Treaty duties because the Treaty was not offered to them. Te Urewera peoples 'knew nothing of the Treaty': 'It could not, in any real sense, take effect to bind them to its terms.'<sup>183</sup> This conclusion, the Tribunal felt, was open to it because of the nature of the Waitangi Tribunal's jurisdiction, and the extent to which it depended on the existence of the Crown's sovereignty:

179. Submission 3.4.252, pp17–18.

180. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu: A Report on Moriori and Ngati Mutunga Claims in the Chatham Islands (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2001), pp 30–31; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 206–207; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2018), vol 1, p 152; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritauanoka, vol 1, p 151; see also submission 3.4.312, pp 4–5; submission 3.4.252, pp18–20.

181. Waitangi Tribunal, Rekohu, p 30.

182. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1 pp 206–207.

183. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 141.

In our view, if we were to ignore the reality behind the May 1840 proclamations, we would be unable to exercise responsibly our statutory jurisdiction. The Treaty of Waitangi Act makes plain that our task is to apply Treaty principles, not legal principles. It is well established that the Tribunal can find lawful Crown conduct to be inconsistent with Treaty principle. That outcome would not be possible if the Tribunal was unable to examine Crown acts or omissions simply because they were lawful.

Moreover, the Treaty of Waitangi Act states that, in performing its tasks, the Waitangi Tribunal has exclusive authority to determine ‘the meaning and effect of the Treaty as embodied in the 2 texts and to decide issues raised by the differences between them’ (s5(2)). Nothing in that wording compels the Tribunal to adopt the law’s view of the Treaty’s ‘effect’. Indeed, the contrary outcome is suggested by the fact that the Tribunal has exclusive authority to determine the Treaty’s meaning and effect, and by the silence of section 5(2) on what matters the Tribunal should look to when deciding issues raised by the difference between the two texts of the Treaty. In our view, when the ‘effect’ of the Treaty for non-signatories is in issue, the actual circumstances of their dealings with the Crown are of paramount importance, not the law’s gloss on those circumstances.<sup>184</sup>

That Tribunal concluded that while ‘the Crown undertook Treaty obligations to all Māori, the meaning and effect of the Treaty for Māori varied according to whether or not their rangatira had signed it.’<sup>185</sup>

We agree with other Tribunals that the Crown acquired obligations to all hapū and iwi in the district irrespective of whether they had signed the Treaty. To that extent, our conclusions about the Treaty’s meaning and effect will apply to all hapū and iwi in the district. But we must also consider what reciprocal obligations the district’s iwi and hapū acquired through the Treaty, and the extent to which their tino rangatiratanga was modified by the Crown’s acquisition of new rights and powers through the Treaty. We will consider those questions below in respect of both signatories and non-signatories.

3.4.2 What rights were guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty?

We begin by considering the nature and extent of the rights that were guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty. It was, after all, the Crown that offered the Treaty to Māori at a time when Māori authority was acknowledged over Aotearoa–New Zealand, including in Te Rohe Pōtae. The Treaty is, therefore, best understood by first ascertaining the extent to which the parties intended that authority to continue.

3.4.2.1 The guarantees of undisturbed possession and tino rangatiratanga

In the English text, article 2 guaranteed Māori ‘full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession of their lands, estates, forests and fisheries and other properties’ for so long as they wished to retain them. This, Normanby’s instructions suggested, was

---

184. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 146.

185. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 146.

principally intended as a property right, under which Māori communities would be guaranteed possession of their lands, and the Crown would not attempt to acquire those lands except with free, informed consent. But the promise of ‘undisturbed’ possession also suggested that Māori communities would be left, at least for the time being, to manage themselves according to their own customs. This, too, was stated in Normanby’s instructions, and was consistent with the principal purpose for seeking sovereignty, which was to control settlers and settlement.<sup>186</sup> In taking this approach, the Crown nonetheless intended that Māori would ultimately be brought under British law, but it saw no need to immediately force the issue, believing that exposure to missionaries and mission schools would lead inevitably to assimilation.<sup>187</sup>

In the Māori text, the rights guaranteed to Māori were taken a considerable step further. In article 2, Māori were guaranteed ‘te tino rangatiratanga o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga me o ratou taonga katoa.’<sup>188</sup> The preamble also explained that through the Treaty the Crown was anxious to protect both rangatiratanga and land (‘o ratou rangatiratanga, me to ratou wenua’). This was different, and much greater, than the promise to protect ‘just Rights and Property’ in the English text. ‘Te tino rangatiratanga’ represented the mana embodied in rangatira.<sup>189</sup> It was a guarantee of enduring possession of and relationships with land and resources, and of the authority necessary to maintain those relationships as iwi and hapū saw fit<sup>190</sup> – that is, in accordance with their own knowledge and ways of seeing (mātauranga) and ways of understanding what was right and proper (tikanga).<sup>191</sup>

In chapter 2 we explained how all relationships among people, and between people and the environment, were understood through the lens of whakapapa, and were managed through ongoing dialogue between people and atua. Whanaungatanga (kinship among all things) formed the basis of a system of law and ethics (tikanga) and provided the source of all authority to act in the physical world (mana). A people’s mana depended on the successful maintenance of relationships among people (both internally and externally) and with land and environmental taonga.

Rangatira embodied that mana, and bore primary responsibility for managing and maintaining relationships in accordance with tikanga. Their duties included political leadership, guiding community decision-making, mediation, economic

---

186. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 320.

187. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 320.

188. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 188–189; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 346–347, 349–351.

189. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Manukau Claim (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1985), p 67; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 186.

190. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Muriwhenua Fishing Claim (Wellington: Department of Justice, 1988), p 181.

191. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei: A Report into Claims concerning New Zealand Law and Policy Affecting Māori Culture and Identity, Te Taumata Tuatahi (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2011), pp 22–23.

and environmental management, military leadership, and diplomacy. They embodied the mana of their people, and their positions depended on their ongoing success at advancing their people's interests. They were, in effect, accountable to their community.

3.4.2.1.1 THE VIEWS OF OTHER TRIBUNALS

Other Tribunals have translated tino rangatiratanga as 'full authority', 'full chieftainship', and 'highest chieftainship'.<sup>192</sup> They have described it as encompassing a right of hapū or tribal self-determination, autonomy, self-government,<sup>193</sup> self-regulation,<sup>194</sup> absolute authority,<sup>195</sup> and 'full tribal authority and control'<sup>196</sup> in relation to land, people, and taonga.<sup>197</sup> The Manukau Tribunal described tino rangatiratanga as inseparable from mana, and the Te Motunui–Waitara and Orakei Tribunals noted that rangatiratanga and mana were inextricably linked.<sup>198</sup> In the view of the Motunui–Waitara Tribunal, tino rangatiratanga 'could be taken to mean . . . the sovereignty of their lands'.<sup>199</sup>

The Muriwhenua Fishing Tribunal referred to three core elements of tino rangatiratanga. The first is authority or control, without which the other two components would be meaningless. The second is that authority must be exercised in ways that recognise its spiritual source, and the spiritual source of the taonga concerned, in which the main reason for exercising authority is to maintain the tribal base for future generations. The third element is that tino rangatiratanga applies not only to taonga but to people within the kinship group, including their access to resources.<sup>200</sup> The Orakei Tribunal found that the authority embodied in the concept of rangatiratanga is not only the authority of a chief but also the authority of his or her people.<sup>201</sup>

---

192. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Manukau Claim, p 67; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51; Waitangi Tribunal, The Te Roroa Report 1992 (Wellington: Brooker & Friend, 1992), p 26; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Muriwhenua Fishing Claim, pp 173–174; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 208–209; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 174.

193. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngai Tahu Sea Fisheries Report (Wellington: Brooker & Friend, 1992), p 269; Waitangi Tribunal, Preliminary Report on the Te Arawa Representative Geothermal Resource Claims (Wellington: Brooker & Friend, 1993), p 31; Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1996), pp 19–20.

194. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngawha Geothermal Resource Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1993), p 136.

195. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 134.

196. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngai Tahu Sea Fisheries Report, pp 269–270.

197. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 174; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), p 4; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 1, p 16.

198. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Manukau Claim, p 67; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, p 186.

199. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 51.

200. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Muriwhenua Fishing Claim, p 181.

201. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 132–133.

Furthermore, the Tribunal in Ko Aotearoa Tēnei found that tino rangatiratanga is a guarantee to Māori of their right ‘to make and enforce laws and customs in relation to their taonga.’<sup>202</sup> The Tūranga Tribunal described it as a guarantee of tribal autonomy, which referred to ‘the ability of tribal communities to govern themselves . . . to determine their own internal political, economic, and social rights and objectives, and to act collectively in accordance with those determinants.’<sup>203</sup> The Central North Island Tribunal described the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga as ‘full authority over their own affairs’ including ‘self-government by appropriate and agreed institutions’, and carrying with it a ‘right to be consulted and give consent to Crown policies and laws affecting the things of fundamental importance to them’. Such guarantees ‘could only be overridden in exceptional circumstances.’<sup>204</sup>

The Tribunal in its Te Paparahi o Te Raki stage one report gave exhaustive consideration to the translation of the Treaty’s key terms, and concluded that the translators ‘must have known that tino rangatiratanga conveyed more than what was set out in the English text.’<sup>205</sup> In other words, the translators conveyed the ‘full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession’ that the Crown intended to offer, but went a step further, using a term that also conveyed the highest form of authority among Māori. In so doing, the translators ‘shifted the meaning’ of the English text, and did so ‘because they understood what it would take to convince Māori to sign.’<sup>206</sup>

3.4.2.1.2 THE CLAIMANTS’ VIEWS OF TINO RANGATIRATANGA

Counsel for some of the claimants submitted that this district’s signatories would have understood the guarantee of ‘tino rangatiratanga’ as a guarantee of mana motuhake – of independence, authority, and nationhood in accordance with tikanga.<sup>207</sup> Counsel noted that in He Whakaputanga – the 1835 declaration of independence of northern rangatira, later signed by Te Wherowhero – all sovereignty and independence was vested in ‘tino rangatira’ (‘hereditary chiefs’ in the English text), creating ‘a clear, powerful and unequivocal declaration of legal and political self-determination and independence’. On that basis, they submitted, any guarantee of tino rangatiratanga was the equivalent of a guarantee of sovereignty.<sup>208</sup> Counsel for several of the claimants referred to an 1843 letter to Governor FitzRoy written by or on behalf of Te Wherowhero, in which he said Māori had signed on

202. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei: A Report into Claims concerning New Zealand Law and Policy Affecting Māori Culture and Identity — Te Taumata Tuarua, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2011), vol 1, p 8.

203. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua: The Report on the Turanganui a Kiwa Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, p 113.

204. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 191.

205. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 514–515.

206. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 514–515.

207. Submission 3.4.252, pp 14–16.

208. Submission 3.4.252, pp 16–17.

the understanding that ‘the Treaty was to preserve their chieftainship’ (see section 3.4.2.2.3).<sup>209</sup>

When, after war and a period of further independence, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori came to set out what they sought in return for the opening of their district for the main trunk railway, they put their demands in terms of their tino rangatiratanga. This was expressed in a petition of 1883 (on behalf of over 400 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori), where it was stated that the Crown had enacted successive laws which denied rights guaranteed to them under the Treaty. According to the petitioners, article 2 ‘fully guaranteed’ (‘i tino whakapumautia’) to them their ‘absolute chiefly authority’ (‘te tino rangatiratanga’), as well as confirming their absolute and undisturbed possession of their lands (‘me te kore ano hoki e whakaraurau ta matou matou noho i runga i o matou whenua’).<sup>210</sup> The expression of rights in the petition reflected not just article 2 (which guaranteed the exercise of tino rangatiratanga in relation to lands, waters, fisheries and other taonga), but also the preamble, which expressed the Crown’s desire to protect rangatiratanga as well as whenua (which had only been rendered in English as ‘just Rights and property’).

Dr Jackson gave evidence for the claimants and he spoke about Māori understandings of the Treaty. In his view tino rangatiratanga was synonymous with mana. Mana, he said, was an ‘absolute’ power to define rights and interests; to protect, use, and make decisions about people, territory, and resources; and to negotiate with other groups. Because mana derived from whakapapa and ultimately from atua, it could be exercised only in accordance with tikanga or Māori law; it was held by and for the people, being a taonga (treasure) handed down through generations; and it entailed an obligation to promote the people’s well-being through mediation of relationships.<sup>211</sup>

In his view, rangatira neither could nor would willingly transfer mana to the Crown. Indeed, mana was ‘absolutely inalienable’:

No matter how powerful rangatira might presume to be, they never possessed the authority nor had the right to give away or subordinate the mana of the collective because to do so would have been to give away the whakapapa and the responsibilities bequeathed by the tipuna. The fact that there is no word in Te Reo Maori for ‘cede’ is not a linguistic shortcoming but an indication that to even contemplate giving away mana would have been legally impossible, politically and constitutionally untenable, and culturally incomprehensible.<sup>212</sup>

Dr Jackson further elaborated:

---

209. Submission 3.4.157(a), p 32; submission 3.4.252, p 32; see also doc A23, p 79.

210. ‘Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes’, 26 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, J-01, pp 1–4.

211. Document A117, pp 11–13.

212. Document A117, pp 13–14.

People do not voluntarily give up their independence. . . . there is no history of, say, France voluntarily ceding or giving up its sovereignty to England. That is not a human political reality. Yet . . . one of the presumptions made about indigenous peoples, is that we would do that. So Britain would never expect France to do that, but there was a presumption that we would, and that is what I call, almost a magical suspension of disbelief.<sup>213</sup>

Even if mana could be ceded, the circumstances gave no cause for rangatira to do so. Māori vastly outnumbered Europeans in 1840, and were controlling the terms of their engagement in order to take advantage of potential benefits and control risks. It was, he said, ‘simply not a human reality, let alone a Māori one, that the presence of a tiny minority would bring about a surrender of long held and deeply cherished concepts of power.’<sup>214</sup>

In Dr Jackson’s view, the available evidence supported the conclusion that rangatira were seeking to preserve and enhance their mana by making an agreement with the Crown. Rangatira understood that relationship as granting the Crown a limited power, kāwanatanga, to ensure that settlers did not impinge on the mana of hapū and iwi. The Treaty was therefore ‘a re-affirmation of mana,’ along with a ‘a tikanga-based expectation that the British Crown would meet its obligations by helping to keep order among Pakeha while acknowledging the kawa and mana of the existing polities.’<sup>215</sup>

3.4.2.1.3 THE CROWN’S VIEWS OF TINO RANGATIRATANGA

The Crown, in its closing submissions on constitutional issues, did not directly explain its understanding of tino rangatiratanga. Rather, its submissions focused on the process by which the Crown, in its own view, acquired sovereignty over all territories and peoples in New Zealand. In that context, it referred to tino rangatiratanga in order to define it as a lesser power. Specifically, it submitted that it understood the Treaty ‘to represent Māori agreement to the transfer of sovereignty, and solemn guarantees to Māori by the Crown of continuing Māori rights and property; including rangatiratanga.’<sup>216</sup> It also submitted that it ‘simply did not understand that its guarantee to Māori of tino rangatiratanga resulted in the sharing of sovereignty’ (emphasis in original).<sup>217</sup>

During the hearings, Crown counsel was questioned about the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. Counsel said that rangatiratanga remained ‘present and constant’ throughout the signing of the Treaty and afterwards, and that the Crown’s recognition of tino rangatiratanga occurred through the Treaty.<sup>218</sup> Counsel said that the

213. Transcript 4.1.8, pp 1154–1155 (Moana Jackson, hearing week 2, Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, 14 December 2012).

214. Document A117, pp 19–21.

215. Document A117, pp 22–23.

216. Submission 3.4.312, p 11.

217. Submission 3.4.312, p 15.

218. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 35–36 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

relationship between Māori and the Crown ‘was not [a] state to state relationship, but acknowledged (in response to a question from the Tribunal) that it could fairly be characterised as a rangatira to rangatira relationship.’<sup>219</sup>

Although the Crown regarded Māori as having consented through the Treaty to its acquisition of sovereignty, this did not necessarily mean that the Crown was able to exercise its authority – the practical exercise of that authority had to be ‘worked out with Māori either nationally or in particular areas’. The exact steps the Crown would take to determine how its authority might be exercised ‘will depend on the circumstances and are many and varied but will include . . . consultation or becoming fully informed about the Māori position, discussion, consideration of the Māori interests, [and] balancing that interest against other interests that exist’. The promise of tino rangatiratanga was ‘one of the obligations’ that the Crown was obliged to ‘adhere to’ as part of this process of determining how it might exercise its authority.<sup>220</sup> While these submissions do not clearly define the Crown’s understanding of tino rangatiratanga, they do appear to suggest that it was a right that the Crown could balance alongside other interests.

Under further questioning, Crown counsel described tino rangatiratanga as ‘something less than sovereignty’, and as ‘an authority exercised by Māori, by rangatira over Māori communities’ which the Crown ‘undertook to respect and preserve but . . . doesn’t equate to the same powers that sovereignty does that exists in the Crown’. Tino rangatiratanga ‘doesn’t have or comprise of the power to govern over the country as a whole, whereas the sovereignty and the Crown does entail that.’<sup>221</sup> Counsel also said:

Rangatiratanga is peculiarly a Māori phenomenon in that it is imbued with the Māori view of the world and Māori tikanga, that no one else shares. So it’s unique in that sense, but perhaps one can draw parallels with the Crown discussing matters with significant community leaders or business leaders.<sup>222</sup>

Judge Ambler put it to Crown counsel that tino rangatiratanga ‘didn’t depend on the Crown agreeing to it’. Māori had tino rangatiratanga prior to the Treaty ‘and the Treaty provided for that to continue’. Crown counsel agreed that tino rangatiratanga continued ‘subject to the Crown’s right to govern.’<sup>223</sup> Asked if the Crown’s right to govern was in turn fettered by tino rangatiratanga, counsel said tino rangatiratanga was ‘not an absolute fetter’ and ‘not a legal fetter’ on the Crown’s

---

219. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p35 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

220. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 37–38 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

221. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 46–47 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

222. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 48–49 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

223. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p 50 (Presiding officer and Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

authority. It was ‘an important fact or principle that is to be considered when the Crown is exercising its authority in a way that affects Māori’. Although it was not a legal fetter, it ‘engages the honour of the Crown’ and meant there were certain acts the Crown could carry out without breaching Treaty principles.<sup>224</sup>

3.4.2.1.4 OUR VIEW OF THE GUARANTEE OF TINO RANGATIRATANGA

Before the Treaty was signed in this district, Māori exercised tino rangatiratanga. The term denoted the authority rangatira exercised on behalf of their communities, and in service of their well-being. Tino rangatiratanga encompassed authority in a wide range of spheres – including political, social, economic, diplomatic, and military. As other Tribunals have noted, tino rangatiratanga cannot be separated from mana.

In the Māori text of the Treaty, article 2 guaranteed Māori signatories ‘te tino rangatiratanga o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga o ratou taonga katoa’ – indicating that Māori were to retain their existing authority with respect to lands, homes, and all other valued things. The English text of the Treaty referred to ‘full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession’ of lands, estates, forests and fisheries. Unlike the text in te reo, this said nothing about the exercise of authority. Nonetheless, it was a significant guarantee of possession, and also of non-interference. As discussed above, the Crown’s intention, as set out in Normanby’s instructions, was that it would not initially interfere with Māori communities (except in limited circumstances), but would instead defend their right to live according to their customs until such time as they chose to assimilate. The Crown’s expectation was that they would do so, and would therefore come under Crown authority.

However, the text did not make this clear, and instead, in the preamble, suggested that the Crown’s focus was on controlling settlers and protecting Māori from the harmful effects of settlement. Where such anomalies exist we must consider what the rangatira understood they consented to. Inevitably, this leads us back to their own understanding of what it would have meant to have the Crown guarantee their tino rangatiratanga.

We have no doubt that Māori understood it to be a guarantee of their authority, autonomy, and independence.<sup>225</sup> This encompassed their rights to maintain control of, use, and develop their lands, villages and other taonga. It also included rights to determine their own social, political, and institutional structures.

The Treaty also granted the Crown a significant new power – kāwanatanga. As we will discuss in section 3.4.3, kāwanatanga allowed the Crown to govern and make laws for particular purposes. To that extent, the ultimate sovereign authority that Māori communities held was modified by the Treaty to become a right to self-determination and autonomy or self-government existing alongside the Crown’s

---

224. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 50–51 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

225. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 5.

right to make law and govern.<sup>226</sup> While different in nature from the Crown's kāwanatanga, tino rangatiratanga must have been understood as an equivalent power.

It followed that there would need to be further discussions between Māori and the Crown about how these two forms of power would intersect and co-exist. For, as the Taranaki Tribunal found, the Treaty envisaged two spheres of authority (the Crown and Māori), where their respective authorities would inevitably overlap.<sup>227</sup> We will consider the precise nature of the relationship between kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga and what was needed for there to be co-existence in section 3.4.4.

3.4.2.2 Tino rangatiratanga and the exercise of tikanga

We turn now to consider how the exercise of rangatiratanga was to be implemented under the Treaty. In doing so we refer to the arguments made by the parties regarding tikanga.

Claimants said that tikanga is relevant to the Treaty for three reasons. First, some argued that tikanga is an essential part of Māori culture and is therefore a taonga for the purposes of article 2.<sup>228</sup> Secondly, some referred to Hobson's verbal assurance at Waitangi that he would protect all religions including 'te ritenga Maori hoki' (translated at the time as 'Maori custom').<sup>229</sup> Thirdly, some argued that the exercise of tino rangatiratanga cannot be separated from the exercise of tikanga, since tikanga is the system of law and values that underpins political authority and decision-making.<sup>230</sup>

The claimants argued that article 2 of the Treaty obliged the Crown to protect tikanga in all walks of life. They further argued that tikanga should not be dismissed as 'lore' or 'custom', but needed to be recognised as a system of law.<sup>231</sup> As such, the Crown was obliged to recognise tikanga. Accordingly, they argued, the Crown's right of kāwanatanga did not allow it to impose British or settler laws on Māori without their consent.<sup>232</sup> They also submitted that the Crown had a Treaty obligation to recognise tikanga as a basis for Māori political authority and decision-making 'at all levels', and to ensure that tikanga was incorporated into the way New Zealand was governed.<sup>233</sup>

---

226. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 172; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 113; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Whanau o Waipareira Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1998), p 26.

227. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 19.

228. Submission 3.4.124, pp 119–120; submission 3.4.130(b), pp 34–35.

229. Submission 3.4.124, p 120; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 372; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, p 257.

230. Submission 3.4.130(b), paras 165–166, 168; submission 3.4.124, paras 90, 103, 105, 109, 112, 138, 183, 186, 195, 239, 253, 262, 347.

231. Transcript 4.1.11, pp [20]–[21] (Counsel for Wai 1309 claimants, hearing week five, Te Hingārangi marae, 6 May 2013); submission 3.4.130(b), p 35.

232. Submission 3.4.130(b), p 35.

233. Submission 3.4.130(b), pp 35, 41, 42.

We note that the Crown acknowledged the importance of tikanga to the claimants, and its pervasive influence on Māori life prior to the Treaty. The Crown submitted that tino rangatiratanga was ‘imbued with the Māori view of the world and Māori tikanga.’<sup>234</sup> The Crown submitted that tikanga (as a body of law or values) was not guaranteed by the Treaty. Nor was it a taonga.<sup>235</sup> It contended that, as the Crown had limited influence over tikanga, any protective obligations it had could only go so far.<sup>236</sup> Furthermore, the Crown argued it was obliged to balance the protection of tikanga alongside ‘other relevant interests.’<sup>237</sup>

In assessing these submissions, we consider that tikanga underpinned how ‘tino rangatiratanga’ was exercised as it was relevant to their land tenure, the environment, social and political relationships, and generally to the Māori way of life in Te Rohe Pōtae. Tikanga mediated relationships between people and taonga, and was therefore an integral aspect of tino rangatiratanga. In respect of any interests or taonga, a community’s authority (mana or tino rangatiratanga) depended on its exercise of the relevant tikanga. Because the guarantee of rangatiratanga was a promise of protection for Māori autonomy, the Crown was therefore obliged to respect Māori tikanga as a system of law, policy, and practice.<sup>238</sup>

Consistent with these findings, other Tribunals have described article 2 as including the protection of rights to manage taonga in accordance with customs and cultural preferences, including any modern adaptation of those preferences.<sup>239</sup> The Foreshore and Seabed Tribunal found, and we agree, that the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga was inherently a guarantee of the right to exercise tikanga: ‘The exercise of mana by rangatira was underpinned and sustained by adherence to tikanga. The chief whose thoughts and actions lacked that essential and recognisable quality of being ‘tika’ would not be sustained in his leadership.’

The Crown’s guarantee of tino rangatiratanga was meaningless, the Tribunal found, unless also accompanied by the tikanga ‘that sustain and regulate the rangatira and his relationship to the people, and the land.’<sup>240</sup>

We see that conclusion as entirely applicable to the claims in this inquiry. We acknowledge that the question of whether tikanga is a taonga is a matter for the claimants to decide. But it is clear that the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga encompasses the exercise of tikanga. Thus Rohe Pōtae Māori had the right to exercise their tino rangatiratanga in accordance with their own systems of law and custom.

---

234. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 48–49 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

235. Submission 3.4.285, pp 7–8.

236. Submission 3.4.285, pp 2–3, 8.

237. Submission 3.4.285, pp 3, 7–8.

238. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 5; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuatahi, p 23; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuarua, vol 2, pp 237, 300.

239. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report 1991, 3 vols (Wellington: Brooker and Friend Ltd, 1991), vol 3, pp 726, 731; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, p 53.

240. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Crown’s Foreshore and Seabed Policy (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), p 3.

3.4.2.3 Royal protection and the rights of British subjects

Finally, we consider the guarantees made to Māori under article 3. These guarantees potentially supplemented the rights that were guaranteed to Māori under article 2.

In the English text, the Treaty extended Royal protection to Māori and granted them ‘all the Rights and Privileges of British Subjects’. This was translated into te reo Māori as the Queen offering to ‘tiaki’ all Māori, and ‘tukua ki a ratou nga tikanga katoa rite tahi ki ana mea ki nga tangata o Ingarangi’. This is often translated as granting to Māori the same rights as British subjects.<sup>241</sup> It is, therefore, a guarantee of equal treatment in law and policy. The Crown could not discriminate against Māori, or treat settlers more favourably, or more generally prioritise settler interests over those of Māori.<sup>242</sup> The Central North Island Tribunal found that one specific application of this principle was to grant a right to representative government (as the settlers had), either through full and fair representation in the national assembly, or through equivalent Māori institutions, or both.<sup>243</sup>

Another effect of article 3 is that it grants Māori options. Whereas article 2 guaranteed the right of tino rangatiratanga to Māori communities, article 3 also granted members of those communities the right to participate fully and on an equal basis in the emerging settler society.<sup>244</sup>

3.4.2.4 Our conclusions on the rights guaranteed to Māori through the Treaty

Our conclusion is that the Treaty guaranteed to Māori their tino rangatiratanga. This was a guarantee that Māori would be able to continue to exercise full authority over lands, homes, and all matters of importance to them. This, at a minimum, was the right to self-determination and autonomy or self-government in respect of their lands, forests, fisheries, and other taonga for so long as they wished to retain them. That authority or self-government included the right to work through their own institutions of governance, and apply their own tikanga or system of custom and laws. Through article 3, Māori were also granted the same rights as British subjects, including the right to representative government. However, the right of tino rangatiratanga was not exactly the same as it had been prior to the Treaty. It was necessarily qualified by the Crown’s new right of kāwanatanga, which included power to make laws and to govern subject to Māori Treaty rights.

Many of the claimants told us that their tūpuna signed the Treaty because of the perceived benefits to their people’s well-being, and therefore to their mana. We agree with them as this district’s leaders had seen the benefits arising from contact with traders and missionaries, most particularly through access to new sources of food, goods, and technology. They vastly outnumbered Pākehā, who had hitherto

241. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 351.

242. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 2, p 428; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Preliminary Report on Customary Rights in the Northern South Island (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2007), p 6; Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 27.

243. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 177, 206, 405.

244. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngai Tahu Sea Fisheries Report, p 274; Waitangi Tribunal, Foreshore and Seabed Policy, p 133–134.

posed no challenge or threat, though (claimants said) such threats remained possible should settlement commence without control. When the opportunity arose to form an alliance with the world's largest power – which might open up opportunities for deeper and greater trading relationships, and which offered a promise that their existing independence, authority, and territorial relationships would be protected from any future threat – they took it.<sup>245</sup> Why would they not? For, as Verna Tuteao of Ngāti Mahuta put it: ‘The negotiation of agreements for the advancement of hapū wellbeing was . . . one of the principal functions of any rangatira.’<sup>246</sup>

3.4.3 What rights did the Crown acquire through the Treaty?

We now turn to consider the nature and extent of the rights that the Crown acquired through the Treaty.

The Crown intended the Treaty as a vehicle by which Māori would consent to its acquisition of sovereignty over New Zealand.<sup>247</sup>

Māori consent to the cession of sovereignty, based on the free and frank explanation of the Treaty's terms and broader purposes, was exactly what Hobson was tasked with obtaining. As Lord Normanby's instructions made clear, prior to the Treaty all sovereignty in New Zealand belonged with Māori hapū and iwi, and the Crown could not assert its own authority except with the ‘free and informed consent’ of the Māori leaders ‘expressed according to their established usages.’<sup>248</sup>

The Crown's intention was also reflected in the English text, which provided that the signatories would cede ‘absolutely and without reservation all the rights and powers of Sovereignty’ that had previously belonged to them. Wherever rangatira signed the Treaty, the Crown's representatives regarded this as an act of cession. From Britain's point of view, that consent was a critical first step towards formal acquisition of sovereignty in accordance with jus gentium, or the law of nations (see earlier discussion in section 3.2.2.2).<sup>249</sup>

On 21 May 1840, Governor Hobson proclaimed British sovereignty over the whole country, the North Island by cession and the South Island (for reasons described earlier) by discovery.<sup>250</sup> At that time, the Manukau–Kāwhia sheet was still in Kāwhia, where the missionary John Whiteley was gathering signatures. Only four rangatira had signed the sheet, and none from this district. Te Kanawa, Tāriki, and Haupōkia Te Pakarū signed on 21 May, and another six rangatira signed after that date.<sup>251</sup> Hobson did have possession of the Waitangi sheet and the Waikato–Manukau sheet, which had been signed by several rangatira from this district (see table 1).<sup>252</sup> The British Government later accepted Hobson's proclama-

245. Document s52, pp 9–10; doc B1, pp 5–6; doc J5, p 17; doc A110, pp 472–473; see also submission 3.4.124, p 133.

246. Document J20, pp 5–6.

247. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 312–325; see also doc A23, pp 61–63.

248. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 316–318; see also doc A23, pp 61–63.

249. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 7–15.

250. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 386–387.

251. Document A23, pp 69–71.

252. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 85.

tions as valid, and from then on has regarded the Crown's sovereignty as an established legal fact.<sup>253</sup>

The Crown's view in this inquiry was that Māori signatories consented to the Crown establishing a government 'that would have authority over all people and . . . all land in New Zealand', although the detail of how that authority would be exercised, especially in relation to Māori, was left for future debate and discussion.<sup>254</sup> On this basis, the Crown submitted that it acquired sovereignty in 1840 'honourably, fairly, reasonably and in good faith'.<sup>255</sup> The Crown defined sovereignty as 'the highest authority to govern',<sup>256</sup> or 'the paramount civil authority', extending over all of New Zealand's people and territories,<sup>257</sup> and as encompassing (through the imperial Queen-in-Parliament at that time) 'the absolute and unfettered capacity to make any law'.<sup>258</sup> This was 'full sovereignty',<sup>259</sup> to which any residual Māori authority was subordinate.<sup>260</sup> Counsel elaborated that 'British authorities associated British sovereignty with the power to constitute a 'civil government' whose members and subjects owed paramount allegiance to the Queen'.<sup>261</sup>

The claimants, however, thought quite differently. They submitted that signatories would not have understood the 'kāwanatanga' ceded in article 1 to mean sovereignty. Rather, they would have understood 'kāwanatanga' to mean 'a limited form of government' which allowed the Crown 'to govern settlers according to British law', but did not interfere with the sovereignty of Māori iwi and hapū.<sup>262</sup> If the Crown had a self-imposed condition of acquiring Māori consent to Crown sovereignty, they said, then the Crown failed to meet its own benchmark.<sup>263</sup>

3.4.3.1 The text of article 1: sovereignty and kāwanatanga

The concept of sovereignty has its origins in the supreme power exercised by the British sovereigns.<sup>264</sup> Over time, the bulk of that power was delegated to the branches of government, which exercised power in the sovereign's name, and by 1840 sovereignty had come to be associated not only with the monarch but with Parliament and executive government.<sup>265</sup> The difference between the exercise of 253. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 85; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 389.

254. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 13.

255. Submission 3.4.312, p 11.

256. Transcript 4.1.24(a), p 45.

257. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 12–13.

258. Submission 3.4.312, pp 12–13. Similarly, in the Te Paparahi o Te Raki inquiry, the Crown defined sovereignty as 'civil government', especially government by legislation, and argued that the Crown's acquisition of sovereignty meant the Crown in Parliament had unfettered lawmaking powers: Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 9–10, 42–45, 462, 484.

259. Submission 3.4.312, p 13.

260. Transcript 4.1.24(a), pp 37–38, 48–50 (Crown counsel, hearing week 17, James Cook Hotel Grand Chancellor, Wellington, 11 February 2015).

261. Submission 3.4.312, pp 12–13.

262. Submission 3.4.252, pp 14, 33, 116.

263. Submission 3.4.127, p 6.

264. Philip Joseph, Constitutional and Administrative Law in New Zealand, 4th ed (Wellington: Thomson Reuters, 2014), pp 516–518.

265. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 9–10, 42–45, 462, 484.

sovereign authority through civil, national institutions and tribal groups exercising customary law was why Lord Normanby acknowledged Māori sovereignty, while also qualifying it as being dispersed among the tribes.<sup>266</sup>

As we have seen, ‘sovereignty’ was not a term that had any direct equivalent in te reo Māori. Explaining the term would have been a challenge for officials and missionaries. The Tribunal in Te Paparahi o Te Raki noted that in He Whakaputanga the phrase ‘ko te Kingitanga ko te mana i te wenua’ was used as a translation for ‘all sovereign power and authority’, ‘Rangatiratanga’ was used for ‘Independence’, and ‘Wenua Rangatira’ for ‘independent State’.<sup>267</sup> That document therefore recognised mana and rangatiratanga as the highest forms of authority in the Māori world. Mana refers to an authority handed down from atua to act on their behalf in the physical world, and rangatiratanga refers to the social, political, economic, diplomatic, and military leadership that were all responsibilities of rangatira acting in consultation with their community.

By comparison, neither mana nor rangatiratanga were used to convey what the Crown meant by ‘sovereignty’ in the Treaty. Instead, signatories were asked to agree to convey to the Queen ‘kawanatanga’. As other Tribunals have noted, the word ‘kawanatanga’ derives from ‘kawana’, a transliteration of the English word ‘governor’, and is typically translated as ‘government’ or ‘governorship’,<sup>268</sup> and associated (in Māori translations of the Bible) with provincial governors.<sup>269</sup>

Although it conveyed that a governor would be present, who would exercise some form of authority on behalf of the Crown, the term ‘kawanatanga’ was not explicit about the nature of the Crown’s authority or how it might operate. Nothing in the Māori text conveyed any idea that the Crown would be granted powers to make and enforce laws in respect of Māori whenever and however it chose, nor that Māori systems of law and authority would be superseded or replaced. The Crown was granted a right to exercise an authority, but in respect of what or who exactly remained unclear from the text.

After canvassing the extensive debate about whether ‘kawanatanga’ was an appropriate translation for ‘sovereignty’, or whether some other term should have been used, the Tribunal in its Te Paparahi o Te Raki Stage 1 inquiry concluded that ‘a straightforward explanation of sovereignty could not have avoided the use of “mana”’:

As we have set out, the assertion of mana in he Whakaputanga expressed the highest level of authority within the signatories’ territories. This declaration of mana, together with the accompanying declarations of rangatiratanga and kingitanga, collectively amounted to an assertion of the authority to make and enforce law. This is the essence of sovereignty.<sup>270</sup>

---

266. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 312–325; see also doc A23, pp 61–63.

267. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 346–351.

268. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 349–350, 393, 413–415.

269. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 349–350.

270. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 514.

If the nature of the power the Crown was seeking was not clear from article 1, what was clear from the Treaty's preamble was that the Crown sought sovereignty for specific purposes: to control settlers and settlement, and thereby to protect Māori from harm that might otherwise come to them.<sup>271</sup>

3.4.3.2 How Te Rohe Pōtae Māori understood 'kāwanatanga'

Given the differences between the two texts, much depends on how the Treaty's key terms were explained. While we cannot know exactly how the terms were explained in this district, the limited evidence we do have (from Maunsell and Te Awaitaia) suggests that 'kāwanatanga' was explained in terms that reflected the preamble – that is, as a power that would control settlement and thereby protect Māori.

Maunsell's 1860 recollection was that he had explained to Māori that the Treaty meant they would retain their lands, while the Crown acquired a right to make laws. He also told them that the Crown would act honourably towards Māori and not harm their interests.<sup>272</sup> It is not known what, if anything, he said about the application of British law and authority to Māori communities. Assuming that he explained the article two guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the rangatira would have understood Maunsell's assurance about lands to also include a guarantee of political autonomy consistent with their rights and obligations as rangatira. This, therefore, would have implied a limit on the extent to which the Crown's lawmaking and governing powers could apply to them.

Te Awaitaia's 1844 account was that he had signed the Treaty on missionary advice, after they explained that Britain intended them 'nothing but kindness', whereas another country might take their lands by force.<sup>273</sup> This suggests that Te Awaitaia understood kāwanatanga to include a power that would be used to protect Māori – and presumably also settlers – from foreign interference. It also suggests that Te Awaitaia saw foreign interference as a genuine threat to Māori independence. In the same exchange, Te Awaitaia sought assistance from the governor to control settlers, and in particular their land hunger. This suggested that Te Awaitaia understood the governor's role to include control of settlers (in particular their land hunger), and also understood the Treaty as one that was intended to bring mutual benefit. Altogether, Te Awaitaia's comments suggest that he understood kāwanatanga as a power that was intended to protect Māori interests, particularly when those interests were threatened by either foreign powers or settlers. Although Māori had vastly outnumbered settlers in Te Rohe Pōtae in 1840, it is likely that rangatira had been aware that these potential challenges might arise, as they already had in districts such as the Bay of Islands.

271. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 524–525; Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), p 114.

272. Document A94, p 186; submission 3.4.252, pp 41–43; see also transcript 4.1.7, p 111 (John Kaati, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho marae, 6 November 2012).

273. FitzRoy to Stanley, 25 May 1844 (doc A23, pp 66–67).

As well as being consistent with the Treaty's purposes as set out in the preamble, Te Awaitaia's understanding was also consistent with Normanby's instructions about the purposes for which the Crown sought sovereignty. Furthermore, it was consistent with how the Treaty was explained at other locations. At Waitangi, Hobson explained that the Crown sought power to 'restrain the Queen's subjects' and thereby to protect Māori and 'do good' for them. He explained the Treaty as granting the Crown permission to exercise this power, but 'did not spell out the full implications of British sovereignty'.<sup>274</sup> Claudia Orange wrote that this protective element was 'emphasised at all treaty meetings', and included protection against foreign threat.<sup>275</sup> The Tribunal in Te Paparahi o Te Raki concluded that rangatira in that district 'understood kāwanatanga primarily as the power to control settlers and thereby keep the peace and protect Māori interests'.<sup>276</sup>

That Tribunal also concluded that rangatira expected to retain their independence and authority as rangatira, and furthermore expected that they would be the governor's equal.<sup>277</sup> This conclusion was based in part on speeches at Waitangi, during which rangatira said they would not sign if the governor was 'up' and they were 'down'.<sup>278</sup> That Tribunal also noted Māori understanding of kāwanatanga would owe much to their experience of kāwana (governors). Among rangatira in this district, two Ngāti Maniapoto signatories (Haupōkia Te Pakarū and Te Waru) had visited Sydney in 1830 to establish trading relationships. Unlike Ngāpuhi rangatira who travelled to Sydney during the early 1800s, there is no record of Haupōkia and Te Waru meeting the colony's governor.<sup>279</sup>

While we have no further evidence about how 'kāwanatanga' was explained to Te Rohe Pōtae signatories, there is some evidence – albeit fairly limited – about how they later described the Treaty transaction, and how they acted in accordance with their understanding of what had been agreed. That evidence suggests that kāwanatanga meant for them: (i) that the Crown could appoint a Governor who would exercise a new form of authority which was described in te reo Māori as kāwanatanga; (ii) that this new power included a power to make laws, provided that where those laws affected Māori they were protective of Māori rights and were enacted with Māori consent; (iii) that Māori would retain their independence and their mana, including their right to govern themselves according to their own tikanga (that is, their own system of laws, practices, and values); (iv) that the Crown would use its authority to protect Māori authority or chieftainship; (v) that the Crown would use its authority to control settlers (including their land hunger) and protect Māori from harmful effects of settlement; (vi) that Māori had a right to be consulted on any laws the Crown made with respect to matters of importance

---

274. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 515, 517.

275. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 86–87.

276. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 523.

277. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 523.

278. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 520, 524.

279. Document A26, pp 10–14; doc A19, pp 21–22; see also Hazel Petrie, Chiefs of Industry: Māori Tribal Enterprise in Early Colonial New Zealand (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 2013), pp 47–48.

to them, and to determine for themselves whether those laws were beneficial; and (vii) that the relationship would bring benefit to Māori. Conversely, they did not understand kāwanatanga to mean that they had compromised their autonomy or their right to continue to exercise their own authority and laws. The following events subsequent to the signing of the Treaty aid our analysis.

3.4.3.2.1 MĀORI WANTED LAWS THAT WOULD PROTECT THEIR AUTONOMY AND INTERESTS

Shortly after the Treaty signings, from December 1840 to January 1841, the chief protector of Aborigines, George Clarke, travelled through the Waikato district and the northern parts of Te Rohe Pōtae. At Ōtāwhao, Clarke noted that Māori there had 'heard that his Excellency Sir George Gipps was legislating for them, and asked why were not his regulations translated into native, that they might read and judge for themselves'. Clarke noted that the chiefs asked:

Were the English the only people interested in the laws he was making? Was the country his otherwise than by theft? I had said that they were misled by designing men; 'Let us see, let us see whether it is so or not', they replied, 'we are now a reading people; render Government acts and designs into native fairly, and then we will think for ourselves for the future.'<sup>280</sup>

At Puketea, Clarke commented that people he had met were by and large jealous of their liberty, as well as of their lands; they see them intimately connected, and they are carefully watching and comparing every public act, deducing from thence positive conclusions as to the line of conduct that will be pursued towards themselves.<sup>281</sup>

Clarke's observations suggest a willingness among those communities, which included both Waikato groups and Ngāti Maniapoto, to accept that the Crown might make laws that affected them, along with an expectation that they should be consulted and empowered to determine for themselves whether the laws were beneficial to their interests.

3.4.3.2.2 THE CROWN HAD A RESPONSIBILITY TO PRESERVE CHIEFTAINSHIP

In 1843, when Governor FitzRoy arrived in New Zealand, Te Wherowhero and four other Waikato rangatira wrote to him setting out their understanding of the Treaty:

When Governor Hobson first arrived, some said that he only came to take our lands; but we said, wait quietly, by his actions we shall prove him. Then the Chiefs agreed at Waitangi to the treaty of the Queen; they fully assented to her proposal,

---

280. Document A23, p77.

281. Document A23, p77.

because that Treaty was to preserve their chieftainship. But when the Europeans arrived in great numbers, we began to be alarmed, because we saw many of their proceedings were directly contrary to the Queen's agreement, some were coveting our lands, some stole our pigs, some reviled and swore at us; and had not the late Governor constantly befriended us, we should long since have been dead with grief.<sup>282</sup>

The letter suggests that Te Wherowhero and others who signed the letter understood the Treaty's purpose as being to preserve the chieftainship of Māori, and kāwanatanga as involving the intervention of a governor to protect Māori from settlers.

3.4.3.2.3 THE MĀORI WORLD WOULD CONTINUE TO BE GOVERNED BY TIKANGA

Early engagements between the Crown and Māori in the Mōkau region demonstrated that Māori were wary about how the Crown might exercise its authority, and also demonstrated the extent to which Māori still regarded themselves as having the right to manage their affairs according to their own mana and tikanga. In 1845, Taonui Hikaka, the Ngāti Rōrā rangatira who signed the Kāwhia–Manukau sheet, was described as having placed a tapu on the Mōkau River for the purposes of transporting pigs, which soon became a complete ban on travel through the region without permission.<sup>283</sup> When the artist George Angas visited the region the previous year, he described Taonui as 'scrupulously attached to the religion of the Tohunga', and that he had 'nowhere seen the law of tapu more rigidly adhered to' than amongst Māori whom he encountered at Mōkau.<sup>284</sup> This was not to say that Taonui was averse to European settlement: he allowed his daughter, Rangitūatahi, to be married to the French trader, Louis Hetet, who helped introduce cattle, goats, and sheep to the region.<sup>285</sup> Taonui was, however, wary of the potential effects of European settlement. Some years later he was quoted as saying that 'although a few Europeans might be advantageous and useful, a great many may be dangerous.'<sup>286</sup>

Taonui placed the tapu because of a series of incidents that had arisen with Taranaki people, who had recently begun to return to the region after the conflicts with the Waikato–Maniapoto alliance in the early 1830s (see chapter 2, section 2.5.2.8). In 1842, Waikato and Maniapoto decided to release their captives, and other Taranaki groups soon began to return to their homelands – a process which Waikato and Maniapoto hoped to influence through a combination of settlement and intermarriage.<sup>287</sup> At the same time, the Crown initiated efforts to purchase Waikato and Maniapoto interests in Taranaki lands, which sparked resistance among Ngāti Maniapoto. In 1844, the protector of Aborigines, Thomas Forsaith, quoted a group of Kāwhia and Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs asserting their interests in

282. Document A23, p 79.

283. Document A28, p 37.

284. Document A23, p 42.

285. Document A28, p 35.

286. Document A28, p 48.

287. Document A23, pp 97, 103, 105.

Taranaki: 'We have a power to enforce our claim if we choose, but our inclination is for peace, not war.'<sup>288</sup>

Taonui, who had himself maintained a presence at Tongaporutu, was first cursed by a Taranaki chief after he had attempted to take up land there; then, another Taranaki group appeared to be responsible for disrupting a trading arrangement Taonui was hoping to secure.<sup>289</sup> Taonui considered that Europeans and Crown officials were as much responsible for these actions as Taranaki Māori. In response to the situation, McLean tried to arrange for Taranaki Māori to pay Taonui as recompense for these actions. At the same time, the official Henry Hansen Turton wrote letters to Taonui and his son, Te Kuri, objecting to the prohibition on travel.<sup>290</sup>

Takerei Waitara, a local Mōkau rangatira, was concerned about the ongoing effects the prohibition might have on trade in the region. In 1846, McLean visited Mōkau in an attempt to lift the tapu, and sought out Takerei's agreement to assist in the matter. Taonui's son, Te Kuri, became angered at McLean's efforts, and (according to the local missionary, Cort H Schnackenberg) had 'a whole catalogue of offences from the pakeha', particularly McLean and Turton.<sup>291</sup> As a result, Te Kuri prevented Crown messengers from crossing into Mōkau. When Schnackenberg told Te Kuri that 'he exposed himself to the anger of the Government', Te Kuri was said to have replied:

There is your Governor (pointing to Auckland) he is the chief of the europeans [sic] and their places, but he has no right here; our Governor is inland (meaning his father) who will not allow his tapu to be trodden underfoot by any person!<sup>292</sup>

In a sense, the river had been set aside, the enforcement of the tapu reminding the Crown that Māori law remained in place and would continue to be enforced.

In May 1846, the missionary Schnackenberg advised the Government against any rash action.<sup>293</sup> He said: 'I am aware that eventually the natives must & will be stopped from such unlawful intemperance with travellers as their ignorance cannot always remain an excuse for undeserved annoyance.'<sup>294</sup> Schnackenberg added:

[Mōkau Māori] know nothing about the Queen's sovereignty . . . and are of opinion that they are quite strong enough not only to drive all the settlers from the island, supposing they wished to be rid of them, but also to defend themselves against any force that could be sent from England. The natives of this place however are not all disposed to quarrel with the Europeans, on the contrary they are very wishful to receive

---

288. Document A23, p 102.

289. Document A28, pp 35, 37.

290. Document A28, pp 37–38.

291. Document A28, pp 53–54.

292. Document A28, p 54.

293. Document A28, pp 37–38.

294. Document A28, p 38.

a body of settlers to whom they would sell a tract of land, but they never dream that in such an event they would lose their chieftainship in the river.<sup>295</sup>

In July 1846, some 1,200 to 1,500 Māori from throughout the district (including the interior and Kāwhia) met at a great hui. It began with a ceremonial re-enactment of war, but the discussion that followed emphasised the extent to which all were determined to be at peace. They remained concerned about the return of Taranaki people to the region, but agreed that the tapu should be lifted.<sup>296</sup> For a period, trade in the district flourished, though concerns about the Crown's role in the region persisted. These are matters we explore further in chapter 5.

Taonui's management of these events suggested that he regarded the Treaty as having had no effect on his authority over the Mōkau River and its environs. Rather, he and the governor exercised authority over distinct spheres of influence. Within this sphere, Taonui saw his law as applying to Europeans and Māori alike. Also significant is the determination of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that they would manage any peacemaking with Taranaki by themselves – the governor was not seen as necessary to this process, and Europeans who sought to get involved were seen as interfering. This is not to say that Taonui saw no role for Europeans; he clearly welcomed some degree of settlement, but he clearly saw this as a matter that should occur at a pace that he would determine.

3.4.3.2.4 MĀORI SOUGHT ONGOING PROTECTIONS FOR THEIR RIGHTS AND MANA

After the Taranaki and Waikato wars and the period of enduring independence that followed, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori began to negotiate with the Government with the aim of establishing a lasting peace, securing the return of lands that had been confiscated after the war, and securing Crown agreement for laws that would protect Māori rights. During and after these negotiations, Ngāti Maniapoto and other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders described the Crown's role under the Treaty as one that was protective of Māori rights and interests.

In the 1883 petition (discussed in detail in chapter 8), the petitioners (from Ngāti Maniapoto, Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, and Whanganui) described how the Crown had enacted laws that had breached their rights as guaranteed by 'te Tiriti o Waitangi, i tino whakapumautia ai te tino rangatiratanga, me te kore ano hoki e whakararurua ta matou matou noho i runga i o matou whenua.'<sup>297</sup> This was translated as 'the Treaty of Waitangi, which confirmed to us the exclusive and undisturbed possession of our lands.'<sup>298</sup> However, a more literal translation was that their full chieftainship ('te tino rangatiratanga') had been fully guaranteed to them ('i tino whakapumautia'), and that there would be absolutely no disturbance

295. Document A23, p 84.

296. Document A28, pp 38–39.

297. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes', 26 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, J–01, p 2.

298. 'Petition of the Maniapoto, Raukawa, Tuwharetoa, and Whanganui Tribes', p 1.

to their possession of their lands. In essence, this was a restatement of the rights guaranteed under article two in the te reo Māori text.

The 1904 Kawenata, a statement of kotahitanga (unification) on behalf of Ngāti Maniapoto hapū entitled 'Ko Te Kawenata o Ngāti Maniapoto me ona Hapu Maha', referred to the Crown's offer of protection in the following terms:

I te wa o te tau 1840. Ka mahia o nga rangatira o te motu ko Te Tiriti o Waitangi, Ka uru nga rangatira o Ngati Maniapoto ki tena kotahitanga o nga rangatira o te motu, ki te whakatu i tena tikanga nui, i runga i te mahara tera o puta mai he ora i runga i taua tikanga. Ka uru nei a Ngati Maniapoto ki te tukunga i te mana o te motu o me te iwi Maori ki raro i te maru o Kuini Wikitoria.

I roto i taua Tiriti ka whakapumautia hoki e te Kuini Wikitoria ana kupu tiaki atawhai i nga Maori o tenei motu. Me te kupu, kia mau tonu ki te iwi Maori o ratou whenua, paru moana, turanga ika, rakau ahere manu, me era atu taonga o te Maori.<sup>299</sup>

Dan Te Kanawa translated this as:

In 1840 the leaders throughout the land formulated the Treaty of Waitangi. Leaders of Ngāti Maniapoto entered into that union of the leaders of Maoridom in that significant event believing it would be beneficial (for them and their people). Maniapoto entered into the allowing of the mana over the land and the Maori people being put under the protection of Queen Victoria.

In that Treaty, Queen Victoria confirmed her gracious protection of the Maori of this land. And promised that the Maori people would retain their lands, seabeds, fisheries, forestries and other treasures.<sup>300</sup>

Te Kawenata was signed after the Crown had asserted practical authority in Te Rohe Pōtae, and reflected Māori understanding of the relative authority of themselves and the Queen at that time. Nonetheless, it clearly expresses an understanding of kāwanatanga as a protective power, both in respect of mana and in possession of lands and resources. As expressed in the Kawenata, it is possible to imagine how both the Queen's authority and mana Māori could co-exist, while also having Māori mana placed 'under' the Queen's protection.

3.4.3.2.5 OUR CONCLUSIONS ON MĀORI UNDERSTANDINGS OF KĀWANATANGA

Although the evidence is limited, from the above we conclude that Māori in Te Rohe Pōtae understood kāwanatanga to mean that the Crown would appoint a governor and would enact laws, which would protect their authority or chieftainship, protect them from foreign threats to their authority, and protect them from harmful effects of settlement (including settlers' lawlessness and land hunger). They also understood that their relationship with the Crown would bring them benefit. To this extent, they understood that they had surrendered some aspects of their pre-Treaty authority to the Crown – in particular, henceforth they would no longer control settlers and settlement in those areas ceded to the Crown. But, subject to this condition, they did not regard kāwanatanga as interfering with their mana or independence, including their right to exercise their authority and live according to their own systems of law. On the contrary, they seem to have believed they had a right to consider the Crown's laws and to make their own decisions about whether those laws would be beneficial to them. Kāwanatanga, as they saw it, was a power to govern and make laws, but it was a power that particularly applied to settlers, settlement, and international relations, and – to the extent that it might apply to Māori – was to be used for the protection of Māori interests, and in a manner that was consistent with Māori views about what was beneficial to them. It was therefore not the supreme and unfettered power that the Crown believed it to be; rather, it was a power that was conditioned or qualified by the rights reserved to Māori.

299. Document A110, p 474; see also doc H9(b), p 8.

300. Document S19(a), p 40.

3.4-3.3 Sovereignty: its acquisition and its form

Much of the Crown's view on the rights it acquired through the Treaty stems from its understanding of the broader process by which sovereignty was acquired, including the Treaty's place in that process. Counsel for the Crown considered that it acquired sovereignty through a series of jurisdictional steps which included obtaining consent (through the Treaty) for its assertion of sovereignty, Governor Hobson's proclamations of sovereignty in May 1840, and the publication of those proclamations in the London Gazette in October 1840. Under the Crown's 'own laws and practices', once those steps had been completed, British sovereignty was an incontrovertible fact.<sup>301</sup> Counsel submitted that its acquisition of sovereignty through these steps 'was done honourably, fairly, reasonably and in good faith and in accordance with the rules of jus gentium [the law of nations] that the Crown itself accepted and applied'. The Crown 'therefore acquired sovereignty in a manner that can be said to be consistent with the principles of the Treaty'.<sup>302</sup>

Although the Crown regarded sovereignty as 'paramount civil authority' over all peoples and territories, and as encompassing 'the absolute and unfettered capacity to make any law', it did not regard its sovereignty as precluding local Māori authority or customary law remaining in place.<sup>303</sup> The Crown also distinguished between de jure sovereignty (sovereignty under the law) and de facto sovereignty (the practical exercise of sovereignty), acknowledging that de facto sovereignty remained with Te Rohe Pōtāe Māori until at least the mid-1880s. The delay in asserting de facto sovereignty, the Crown said, 'was not legally inconsistent with the full legal sovereignty obtained in 1840', and reflected the political realities of the time. In the Crown's view, it was 'not legally obliged to seek further consent of the Rohe Pōtae Māori to the exercise of Crown authority in the district after 1840.<sup>304</sup>

301. Submission 3.4.312, p 1.

302. Submission 3.4.312, p 11.

303. Submission 3.4.312, pp 1, 12–13.

3.4.3.3.1 DR MCHUGH'S OPINION IN THE TE PAPARAHI O TE RAKI INQUIRY

The Crown's submissions relied on the opinion given by Dr McHugh in the Stage 1 Te Paparahi o Te Raki inquiry.<sup>305</sup> That opinion was specifically concerned with how the Treaty was understood in English law and jus gentium, the law of nations.

According to Dr McHugh, Britain's official policy towards New Zealand was principally aimed at controlling British and other settlers or visitors. Prior to 1839, the Crown attempted to achieve this control by recognising and working with Māori authority; from 1839, it was determined that control of settlers required the establishment of Crown sovereignty over part or all of the country.<sup>306</sup> The British Government regarded itself as being bound by its own laws, and by the law of nations or jus gentium, and therefore took the approach that it could not establish sovereignty without Māori consent.<sup>307</sup> This, in McHugh's view, was 'a self-imposed rule' that 'could not be enforced against the Crown either by other states or much less by its own courts' – but was nonetheless a step the Crown believed was legally required.<sup>308</sup>

Nevertheless, according to Dr McHugh, '[i]t is clear that officially [in Britain] the Treaty was regarded as a valid instrument of cession, through which rangatira consented to transfer their sovereignty to the Crown.<sup>309</sup> Having obtained signatures at Waitangi, Waimate, and Hokianga, Hobson arranged for copies of the Treaty to be taken to other parts of the country for signing. In October, Hobson forwarded copies of the Treaty with 512 signatures to London, where the Colonial Office received it with 'approval and commendation.' This, according to Dr McHugh, 'was the process by which Maori agreement to British sovereignty over New Zealand was obtained, at least from the perspective of British officials. The process 'could hardly be described as highly organised', and was interrupted by the stroke Hobson suffered in March 1840.<sup>310</sup>

By sending missionaries and others to obtain signatures, McHugh said, Hobson showed his intention to acquire sovereignty over the country as a whole, and furthermore demonstrated the seriousness and sincerity of the Crown's intention to obtain Māori consent.<sup>311</sup> Hobson's proclamations on 21 May 1840 were 'premature' (given that Hobson was by that time aware of signings only in Northland

---

304. Submission 3.4.312, pp 11–12.

305. Submission 3.4.312, pp 9–11

306. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a) (McHugh), pp 1–11.

307. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), pp 3–4, 9–11, 14.

308. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21 (McHugh), pp 94–95; see also pp 72–73.

309. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), p 14.

310. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), p 12.

311. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), p 12.

and Waikato–Manukau<sup>312</sup>), and reflected the pressure on Hobson to respond to the New Zealand Company’s attempts at self-government.<sup>313</sup> McHugh argued:

Technically, in terms of British constitutional law, the issue of the Proclamations amounted to the ‘moment’ of British sovereignty, at least for the purposes of British and colonial courts. Strictly, it amounted to the formal and authoritative announcement by the Crown that the prerequisite it had set itself before such annexation could occur – Maori consent – had in its estimation been satisfied and that the Crown could now exert sovereign authority over all the inhabitants of the New Zealand islands.<sup>314</sup>

For practical purposes, however, the May proclamations ‘were aimed jurisdictionally at the European settlers’, especially those in Port Nicholson. They were not intended to assert practical authority over Māori: there was ‘no supposition that such a ceremonial announcement meant that Maori would immediately defer to the Crown and switch to English law’. Rather, from the Crown’s viewpoint, authority over Māori continued to depend on their consent to the Treaty; the process of gathering signatures therefore continued after the proclamations were issued.<sup>315</sup>

The acquisition of British sovereignty, in Dr McHugh’s view, was therefore ‘a process rather than a singular “event”’. Signings of the Treaty by rangatira, Hobson’s proclamations and their official acceptance and publication in Britain, the November 1840 Royal Charter establishing New Zealand as a colony separate from New South Wales, and the establishment of the machinery of government were all ‘jurisdictional steps’ which extended British sovereignty over British subjects and over Māori. These steps ‘baked into the sovereignty as a whole.’<sup>316</sup>

3.4.3.2 THE LEGAL OPINION OF DR ALEX FRAME

The claimants pointed to the opinion of Dr Alex Frame, who discussed the process by which sovereignty was asserted and the form that sovereignty took. Dr Frame made a series of arguments about how any powers that arise from a treaty coming into force must be based on that treaty:

What the Crown acquired from the Treaty of Waitangi and its subsequent Proclamations was a sovereignty qualified and limited by the Treaty itself. In particular, the law-making power acquired by the Crown is limited by the terms of the Treaty.<sup>317</sup>

He advanced five reasons for this conclusion:

---

312. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 85.

313. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), pp 12–13.

314. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), p 13.

315. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), pp 13–14; Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21, pp 71–72.

316. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21(a), pp 15–16.

317. Document A116 (Frame), p 6.

- ▶ First, '[p]owers based on a Treaty must, as a matter of elementary logic, be consistent with the Treaty'. The treaty 'cannot be relied on for what it confers but discounted as to its limitations'.<sup>318</sup>
- ▶ Secondly, 'the most fundamental rule of international law is . . . treaties must be complied with'. This, he said, was accepted under jus gentium and explicitly provided for under article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 (which came into force in 1980), to which New Zealand is a signatory.<sup>319</sup> The Vienna Convention, Dr Frame said, provided that every treaty was binding on its parties and must be performed in good faith.
- ▶ Thirdly, domestic law cannot be used as an excuse for non-compliance (as it is in New Zealand). This is provided for under article 27 of the Vienna Convention.<sup>320</sup>
- ▶ Fourthly, the Crown 'is an essential part of the law-making capacity of Parliament', and Parliament's lawmaking powers are therefore constrained by the Treaty.<sup>321</sup>
- ▶ Fifthly, Dr Frame referred to the Privy Council's 1941 decision (Te Heuheu Tukino v Aotea District Maori Land Board)<sup>322</sup> that the Treaty was not legally binding unless incorporated into New Zealand statutes. That decision, Dr Frame said, 'is not supported by the authorities on which it purports to rely, and in so far as it treats Parliament as free to enact laws contravening the Treaty of Waitangi, is now open to restatement and/or revision by the Supreme Court'.<sup>323</sup>

Dr Frame also discussed the nature and form of sovereignty itself. He said that most New Zealand lawyers understood sovereignty as 'the exclusive right and power to make or unmake any law whatsoever in a particular territory'. Sovereignty could not be limited, even by a court, if the sovereign exercised his or her power 'in sufficiently clear language'. This view of sovereignty 'came from a line of legal theory which contended that "law" was all and only about the ability of a ruler to apply force and compulsion to the ruled'. That theory proposed that sovereignty was (a) essential in every state; (b) indivisible; and (c) unlimited and illimitable.<sup>324</sup>

The esteemed New Zealand jurist Sir John Salmond (1862–1924), Frame said, argued that only the first of these propositions was valid. Sovereignty could be divided, and indeed it was in the constitution of Britain itself, which reserved law-making powers to the Crown-in-Parliament but retained executive powers to the

---

318. Document A116, p 6.

319. Document A116, p 6.

320. Document A116, p 6.

321. Document A116, p 6.

322. Te Heuheu Tukino v Aotea District Maori Land Board [1939] NZLR 107 (SC and CA) [1941] NZLR 590 and [1941] AC 308 (PC); doc A116, pp 6–7, 10–11; see also Alex Frame, 'Hoani Te Heuheu's Case in London 1940–41: An Explosive Story', New Zealand Universities Law Review, vol 22, no 1 (2006), pp 148–180.

323. Document A116, pp 6–7, 10–11.

324. Document A116, pp 3–4.

Crown alone. Similar division of sovereignty was evident in other democracies. Salmond also pointed out that sovereignty could be limited. Most modern constitutions imposed limits on the legislature's lawmaking powers.

Salmond furthermore distinguished between 'external sovereignty' and 'internal sovereignty'. External sovereignty over a territory excluded other states from exercising any authority over that territory. Internal sovereignty over a territory was authority to govern its inhabitants. The two forms of sovereignty could be exercised together, but did not have to be. Whereas external sovereignty was essential, internal sovereignty may or may not exist, and did not preclude the existence of distinct local governments with their own internal sovereignty.<sup>325</sup>

3.4.3.3 OUR VIEWS ON THE PROCESS BY WHICH THE CROWN SOUGHT TO ACQUIRE SOVEREIGNTY

The Crown's position about the process by which it acquired sovereignty in New Zealand is based on an assessment of how sovereignty was acquired under English law and the Law of Nations, based on the beliefs of British officials about what was legally required and whether the relevant tests were met. It refers to Māori consent as judged through British eyes and for British purposes, and says little about how Māori understood the Treaty or what they freely and intelligently consented to in accordance with their own tikanga.

It is clear that the Crown did not wait for the process of collecting signatures to decide that consent had been achieved, and indeed dispensation had already been granted to Hobson to judge when consent was reached. Hobson proclaimed sovereignty over the entire North Island when he was in possession only of the Northland and Waikato–Manukau copies of the Treaty;<sup>326</sup> he did not know whether Māori had signed the Treaty in other parts of the country, let alone what their understandings might be. Britain's principal representative in New Zealand therefore relied on an assumption that Māori would consent, as much as on a belief that they had.

As discussed in sections 3.4.3.1 and 3.4.3.2, even among those who had signed from this district, there is no evidence that they considered they were granting to the Crown such an extensive source of unfettered power. Rather, they conceived of the Treaty as offering the Crown a limited power to govern and make laws – one that applied to settlers and settlement, and to protection from foreign threats, which was qualified by the rights reserved to Māori and involved an obligation to protect those rights. The Crown officials and missionaries involved knew or should have known that Māori did not consent to the Crown exercising the unfettered power it sought through the Treaty. They believed they had retained their full chieftainship, and therefore (as described in the Taranaki and Central North Island Tribunals, among others) their autonomy or self-government. The Crown's authority, they believed, was qualified by their own, and by the Crown's obligations to acknowledge their rights and protect them from harm.

---

325. Document A116, pp 4–5.

326. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p 85.

Before we address the meaning of kāwanatanga further, we turn now to reflect on what other Tribunals have said about the Crown's assertion of sovereignty.

3.4.3.4 *The views of other Tribunals

Up until recently, the Waitangi Tribunal's determination in many reports was that the Crown had acquired sovereignty through the Treaty, but that sovereignty was qualified by the requirement to give effect to tino rangatiratanga. This, in essence, was the Treaty exchange. To elaborate, the position developed in those reports was that, through the Treaty, the Crown acquired a power to govern and make laws, and that those powers extended throughout the whole country; that the Crown's authority was qualified by the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga; and that kāwanatanga was a right to govern that was considerably less than the supreme and unfettered governing and lawmaking power that the Crown had sought, and believed it had acquired. Even though these Tribunals saw the Crown's sovereignty as qualified, they nonetheless assumed that sovereignty referred to an overarching power to make and enforce law, which included a right and prerogative for the Crown to decide policies of its choosing.

The Orakei Tribunal was among the first to develop this position in detail. In considering the texts of the Treaty, that Tribunal concluded that the term kāwanatanga was likely to have been understood as 'the right to make laws for peace and good order, and to protect the mana Maori'. This right was 'subject to the protection of Māori interests,' and was 'less than the sovereignty ceded in the English text' since it did not convey the 'English cultural assumptions' implicit in sovereignty, such as 'the unfettered authority of Parliament or the principles of common law administered by the Queen's Judges in the Queen's name'. Notwithstanding this conclusion about the texts of the Treaty, the Tribunal concluded that the cession of sovereignty was 'implicit from surrounding circumstances,' particularly in the debates between Hobson and the rangatira at Waitangi.<sup>327</sup> This led the Orakei Tribunal to the conclusion that, through the Treaty, the Crown acquired the right of sovereignty, subject to the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. Thus, the Crown acquired an overarching power to make and enforce law, so long as those powers were exercised in a manner that was consistent with tino rangatiratanga.

Over time, Tribunals have described the Treaty's guarantee of tino rangatiratanga as a guarantee of tribal autonomy which was nonetheless consistent with the Crown's sovereignty. The Taranaki Tribunal described 'aboriginal autonomy' as 'the right of indigenes to constitutional status as first peoples, and their rights to manage their own policies, resources, and affairs (within rules necessary for the operation of the State) and to enjoy cooperation and dialogue with the Government'. The Tribunal noted that autonomy rests on two presumptions: that it is the inherent right of all peoples in their 'native countries'; and that in colonised countries 'sovereignty, in the sense of absolute power, cannot be vested in only one of the parties'. To this extent the Tribunal noted how 'sovereignty was constrained in New Zealand by the need to respect Maori authority'.<sup>328</sup>

---

327. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 189, 208.

Expanding on this position, the Tūranga Tribunal found that 'tribal autonomy was the only basis for a quality Treaty relationship' and that it was 'axiomatic that the sovereignty or kawanatanga of the Crown was and remains subject to the guarantee to protect tino rangatiratanga or, in English, tribal autonomy'. Tribal autonomy, in this sense, was the 'ability of tribal communities to govern themselves as they had for centuries'. The exercise of this authority did not mean that Māori rejected a role for the Crown at the national level. 'Clearly, the alacrity with which Maori leaders engaged with the Government showed that they desired to negotiate and foster a relationship with the colonial State'.<sup>329</sup> The Crown's duty, therefore, was to protect Māori autonomy, not to actively conspire to defeat it.

The Central North Island Tribunal elaborated further by concluding that the Treaty provided for distinct Māori and Crown spheres of influence within a single state. Although the responsibility for establishing and running that state rested with the Crown, the Treaty provided for 'two authorities, two systems of law, and two overlapping spheres of population and interest'.<sup>330</sup> Where these spheres of influence overlapped, this was to be managed through dialogue and negotiation, in a spirit of partnership, with Māori respecting the Crown's right of kāwanatanga, and the Crown respecting Māori autonomy and authority over the full range of their affairs, and acknowledging that it could enact laws affecting matters of fundamental importance to Māori only with their consent.<sup>331</sup> The Tribunal's main conclusion was that:

The Treaty guaranteed all Central North Island tribes their autonomy and the right of self-government by representative institutions responsible to their communities. Even so, the tino rangatiratanga of all tribes is affected by their partnership with the kawanatanga, and is not exactly the same as it was before 1840. Both Treaty partners owe each other a duty of good faith and cooperation, dialogue and negotiation of agreement on key issues. Where those issues are fundamental to Maori and their rights as guaranteed by the Treaty, and on the principles of good governance, the Crown must govern by consent. There may be times, however, when the authority of kawanatanga must prevail. The appropriate agreements and compromises between Crown and Maori spheres of authority must be decided in partnership.<sup>332</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal noted that these standards were reasonably practicable. Reviewing events that took place after 1840 in that district, the Tribunal concluded that the 'political relationship between nineteenth-century governments and Central North Island tribes sometimes came close to achieving

---

328. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 20.

329. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 113.

330. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 166.

331. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 191.

332. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 207.

these Treaty standards.<sup>333</sup> The Tribunal placed particular emphasis on the joint consideration of proposals to provide for Māori self-government in partnership with the Crown.

In Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, its report on contemporary claims about Māori culture and identity, the Tribunal applied a similar approach. It concluded that, through the Treaty, the Crown acquired kāwanatanga, which was ‘the right to enact laws and make policies’, while ‘iwi and hapū retained tino rangatiratanga over their lands, settlements, and “taonga katoa”’. In this way, the Tribunal said, ‘the Treaty provided a place for each culture in the life of this country’. The Crown’s powers, the Tribunal noted, were ‘not absolute’. They were, and remain, ‘qualified by the promises solemnly made to Māori in the Treaty, the nation’s pre-eminent constitutional document’.<sup>334</sup>

In its Stage 1 report, the Te Paparahi o Te Raki Tribunal undertook a detailed assessment of the circumstances by which the Treaty was brought to the north. The Tribunal looked at what Māori understood kāwanatanga to mean based on their own knowledge and experience and by reference to what the rangatira at Waitangi were told. It noted that Northland Māori might have had some idea of what a kāwana or governor was, based on their knowledge of the Bible and from their visits to Sydney. In both contexts, a kāwana was a colonial administrator, not a sovereign. The Tribunal also considered kāwanatanga through the lens of Māori systems of leadership. Hobson was seen as a rangatira for Pākehā, similar to Busby but with greater powers, and therefore able to relieve rangatira of the burden of maintaining order and controlling settlers.<sup>335</sup>

The Tribunal found that although ‘kāwanatanga’ conveyed the idea that some form of government would be established, it did not convey the idea of that government as possessing supreme, overarching power to which Māori would be subject.<sup>336</sup> Therefore, the Tribunal found, the Crown did not acquire ultimate power, and Te Raki Māori did not cede their sovereignty, which the Tribunal defined as their power to make and enforce law over their own people and territories. Rather, they agreed ‘to share power and authority with Britain’, under an arrangement in which they and the governor would be equals, the governor having ‘power to control settlers and thereby keep the peace and protect Māori interests’, including power to investigate land transactions involving settlers, and to protect New Zealand from foreign powers, while rangatira retained their independence and authority. Where the Māori and settler populations intermingled, the Tribunal found, ‘questions of relative authority remained to be negotiated over time on a case-by-case basis’. In drawing these conclusions, the Tribunal pointed out that it was expressing no view about the sovereignty that the Crown quite clearly exercises today.<sup>337</sup>

---

333. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 207.

334. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuarua, vol 1, pp 14–15.

335. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 349–350, 524–525.

336. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 512–514.

337. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 523, 524, 526–527, 529.

3.4.3.5 Our conclusions on the Crown's right of kāwanatanga

Through the Treaty, the Crown sought consent from rangatira for an assertion – in accordance with English law and jus gentium – of Crown sovereignty over their territories. This intention was reflected in article 1 of the English text. The Crown defined sovereignty as a paramount civil authority, encompassing an unfettered right to make law, and a right to govern over all peoples and territories in New Zealand. The text in te reo Māori granted the Crown 'kāwanatanga', which has been translated as government or governorship.<sup>338</sup> The term 'kāwanatanga' suggested that the Crown would exercise some form of governing authority, but it did not convey the full meaning of the term sovereignty as the Crown understood it – a supreme governing and lawmaking power which would apply to all peoples and territories in the territories covered by the Treaty. Indeed, the term kāwanatanga offered little information about the nature of the power that Britain sought, except that it involved the presence of a governor, and seemed (from the preamble) to be aimed at controlling settlers and settlement in order to protect Māori.

Control of settlers and settlement was, indeed, the immediate purpose for which the Crown sought to acquire sovereignty. Initially, at least, it intended to leave Māori in possession of their lands, and to defend them in the exercise of their customs. Ultimately, however, it expected to also apply its laws and authority to Māori communities and territories, and it believed the acquisition of sovereignty would give it a legal right to do so at a time of its choosing. But nothing in either text made clear that this was the Crown's intention.

How, then, did the signatories understand kāwanatanga? There is very limited evidence of what was discussed at the Treaty signings in this district. Maunsell said he told signatories that the Crown sought a power to make law that did not interfere with Māori possession of land. This says little about the nature or effect of the laws that would be made, and, again, falls considerably short of conveying all that the term 'sovereignty' does. Te Awaitaia's recollection of his signing suggests that Māori were told that the power of kāwanatanga would be used to protect Māori from adverse impacts of settlement, including settler land hunger, and also to protect New Zealand from foreign interference. The subsequent actions of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori indicate that they did not regard the Treaty as interfering with their autonomy and authority, including their right to continue to exercise their own tikanga. The evidence, limited as it is, suggests that they regarded kāwanatanga as involving the establishment of a power – through the office of a governor – which would be used to protect and preserve Māori interests and chieftainship.

This is consistent with the findings of many previous Tribunals about the nature of kāwanatanga – that it involved a power to make and enforce laws which applied to the whole of New Zealand, but was qualified by the guarantee of tino rangatira, and was therefore considerably less than the supreme and unfettered governing and lawmaking power that the Crown had sought and believed it had acquired.

---

338. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 349–350, 392–394.

Even if the kāwanatanga acquired by the Crown was less than the supreme governing and lawmaking power that the Crown sought, this does not mean that there was no meeting of minds. As we have explained, the Crown sought sovereignty for particular purposes: initially, at least, its intention was to control settlers and settlement, and to protect from foreign threat, and thereby to protect Māori from any adverse effects of settlement or contact with the wider world, thereby allowing both Treaty partners to benefit from their relationship. Hobson was instructed to explain those purposes to Māori, and the evidence, limited as it is, suggests that this is how the Treaty was explained in this district, just as it was in other districts for which there are records. In our view, Māori consented to the Crown exercising a governing and lawmaking power that could be used for these purposes. This was a significant power. It allowed the Crown broad powers over settlers and settlement, and over New Zealand's international relationships, and did not exclude the possibility of the Crown governing over and making laws for Māori so long as its policies and laws were consistent with tino rangatiratanga and had the free, informed consent of the affected communities. The Crown – based on Hobson's proclamations, which relied solely on the English text of the Treaty – believed that it had acquired a supreme, unfettered governing and lawmaking authority, but this was not the proposal it put to Māori.

As the Tribunal found in Te Paparahi o Te Raki, the meeting of minds could be found in what signatories consented to based on what was put to them. In this district, as in others, there is no evidence of the Crown clearly explaining to signatories that it sought a supreme, unfettered power over all people and territories; rather, the evidence is that it explained that it wanted a governing power that could be used to control settlers and protect from foreign threat, thereby protecting Māori and bringing mutual benefit. In a context in which Te Rohe Pōtae leaders were willing to engage with Europeans for all of the benefits that brought, but were also aware of the potential challenges that could occur, this was an attractive arrangement, and one that Te Rohe Pōtae signatories consented to.

As noted above, the Te Paparahi o Te Raki Tribunal (and others) found that the details of the relationship between kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga remained to be worked out after the Treaty. Although the Crown argued that it had legitimately acquired sovereignty in 1840, it too acknowledged that the detail of how kāwanatanga would be exercised was a matter 'for future debate and discussion', particularly in respect of 'institutional structures and relationships'.<sup>339</sup>

With respect to Dr McHugh's theories, we note that he was describing the Crown's acquisition of sovereignty in accordance with its own system of law. That is, he described the legal tests which the Crown believed it had to meet before it asserted sovereignty, the basis on which it came to a view that those tests had been met, and the process by which it thereby proclaimed its sovereignty in a manner that was consistent with its own laws. However, the theories of constitutionalism promoted by Dr McHugh must be seen in context. He was explaining how Britain understood the Treaty's meaning and effect in 1840; he was not pretending to explain what Māori intended or consented to at that time. As described in section 3.4.1, our task, in determining the Treaty's meaning and effect, is to consider and resolve any ambiguities in the two texts of the Treaty in a manner consistent with our jurisdiction. As described above, Māori signatories understood kāwanatanga as a power to govern and make law that was qualified by their own rights of tino rangatiratanga.

---

339. Submission 3.4.312, p1.

As noted in section 3.4.3.3, Hobson proclaimed British sovereignty in May, before he had seen any of the signed Treaty sheets other than those from Waitangi and Waikato–Manukau.<sup>340</sup> His proclamations were therefore issued on the basis of an assumption that Māori in this district and others consented to the Treaty's terms. The Crown subsequently recognised those proclamations by publishing them in the Gazette. From that time onwards, the Crown regarded its sovereignty as an incontrovertible fact, and therefore regarded itself as having an unfettered legal right to govern and make law for all people and territories in New Zealand. This did not necessarily mean it would immediately exert practical authority over Māori communities and territories; as Normanby's instructions made clear, its immediate concern was with control of settlers and settlement, and it was prepared, for a time, to leave Māori to live according to their own customs. But British officials nonetheless fully expected that the Crown would ultimately extend its practical authority over all people and territories in New Zealand.

This had not been explained to Māori, in the Māori text, although it was in the English text. Furthermore (and so far as we can determine), there appears to have been no detailed explanation given in the verbal explanations. We will see in later chapters how the Crown's attempts to establish practical authority in Te Rohe Pōtāe would play out. Though the Crown did not regard itself as being legally required to seek Māori consent for any assertion of its practical authority, it nonetheless acknowledged that its establishment of any 'new forms of government' was a matter that was subject to Treaty principles. We will return to these points in section 3.4.4.

Dr Frame suggested that the Crown might be compelled to accept the Treaty as legally binding in terms of current international law, thereby making Treaty obligations enforceable in domestic law. The Crown did not refute this suggestion. Nor did the Crown seek to challenge in any meaningful way Dr Frame's argument that the relevant leading case of Te Heuheu Tukino v Aotea District Maori Land Board wrongly applied authorities on which it purported to rely.<sup>341</sup> This is not a matter we are required to make a determination on, because the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 does in fact incorporate the Treaty and we are required to have regard to its terms. Dr Frame also asked us to accept the Vienna Convention as binding on the Crown, and (by virtue of the Supreme Court's finding) part of domestic law. But it seems unlikely to us that the Vienna Convention would lead us to a place where we could arrive at conclusions that might assist our task under the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975.

---

340. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, p85.

341. Te Heuheu Tukino v Aotea District Maori Land Board [1941] NZLR 590 (PC).

Dr Frame's analysis of the writings of Sir John Salmond is, we consider, more relevant. Sovereignty may well be capable of division internally in a legal sense. Certainly, that is what occurs in federal states and in terms of Native American jurisdiction on reservations in the United States. Given the essential exchange of the Treaty – kāwanatanga for rangatiratanga and the constraints imposed upon the Crown as a result – we note that these are matters that would warrant further investigation in the Waitangi Tribunal's forthcoming kaupapa inquiry into constitutional issues. However, the law in that field we doubt would add much more to our current jurisdiction, which is set out in the Treaty of Waitangi Act 1975 at sections 5 and 6.

In that latter regard, we have explained how our approach is based on the meeting of two legal traditions – one based on European law, the other on tikanga. In both legal traditions, there needed to be consent and mutual acknowledgement of the other's authority. That is because we regard the Treaty as the outcome of two peoples coming together, each with their own traditions of treaty-making. The Treaty created a realm in which their two authorities were to co-exist.

The Treaty, therefore, did not give rise to a situation in which either Māori or the Crown are able to claim an absolute authority. If an overarching power could be said to have arisen by virtue of the Treaty, it would need to include both Māori and the Crown; neither could be excluded, nor could one be said to be subordinate to the other. In essence, the power arrangement that would exist under this arrangement would be more in the nature of one sovereign entity consisting of multiple governmental authorities, much like in the model described by Dr Frame. This arrangement would not be capable of segmentation along de jure and de facto lines, in which the acquisition of nominal power by one party includes the actual assumption of power over another as a legal inevitability. It is rather a conception in which all forms of authority are given equal protection.

This is not to say, however, that in a functional way, one party could not act on behalf of the other. The Treaty imagined a situation in which the Crown would need to act in protection of Māori. However, they needed to first act in partnership in order to bring into effect an arrangement by which this could happen. In addition, the Crown needed to discuss with Māori any measures that it would introduce that would impact on their tino rangatiratanga. The Crown could not, for example, introduce government institutions for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori without their consent, such as the Native Land Court. That was because tino rangatiratanga continued to be a standing qualification on the Crown's right to govern. Such institutions in their district needed to reflect and give effect to their tino rangatiratanga.

Thus, our conclusion is that through the Treaty the Crown acquired a right to govern and make laws, and thereby to control settlers and settlement, and to manage international relationships with foreign European states. With respect to Māori communities, the power of kāwanatanga provided for the possibility of the Crown governing and making laws, so long as those powers were used in a manner that was consistent with their tino rangatiratanga, and which offered them protection from any harmful effects of settlement or foreign intervention. The Treaty thereby provided a basis upon which Māori and settlers could gain mutual benefit from their relationships.

We consider that the obligation to use kāwanatanga in this manner continued even after the Crown proclaimed and asserted its sovereignty. The nature of the Crown's protective obligations would naturally depend on the circumstances, including the degree to which Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū needed that protection, the practical ability of the Crown to provide it, and the nature of the Māori rights and interests involved. The practical details of how Crown authority might be exercised, especially where Crown and Māori interests intersected, remained to be worked out through negotiation and discussion in the years after 1840. In section 3.4.4 we will consider what the Treaty said about how that working out might occur.

3.4.4 What was the relationship between Crown and Māori authority?

We have set out our conclusions in relation to the rights accorded to Māori and the Crown through the Treaty. Kāwanatanga was an authority to govern and make laws for the explicit purpose of controlling settlers and preventing the harm that might otherwise arise to Māori from uncontrolled settlement or foreign intervention. The guarantee of tino rangatiratanga was for the existing autonomy and authority of Māori communities in relation to their lands, resources, and all other valued things to continue, whilst Māori also enjoyed the same rights as British subjects. The question inevitably arises: how were kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga to co-exist, particularly as the colony developed and circumstances changed?

We consider that there are several key principles of the Treaty and related Crown duties that should have governed how the relationship between the parties moved into the future. We deal with each in turn.

3.4.4.1 *Tino rangatiratanga and kāwanatanga have distinct functions

The Treaty, through the provision and guarantee of rights to kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga, allows for the Crown and Māori to exercise distinct functions. Those functions, and their related spheres of authority, had the potential to intersect and overlap. However, at their core, they provided for two different spheres of authority.

The primary responsibility for Māori was with the maintenance and well-being of their own communities and territories. As already discussed, rangatira who signed the Treaty had no expectation that their systems of law and authority, their social and political structures, and indeed their human, environmental, and spiritual relationships might be broken down and replaced by the new Crown authority. As other Tribunals have found, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga meant that Māori autonomy and authority would endure and that Māori communities would continue to have the right to govern themselves according to their own systems of mana and tikanga.

The Crown's principal focus, clearly spelled out in the Treaty's preamble and in verbal explanations, was on control of settlers and settlement. The role of kāwanatanga, as found by other Tribunals, also included authority to manage New Zealand's foreign relations, albeit in a manner that did not interfere with tino rangatiratanga.<sup>342</sup> Together, these functions implied the existence of a significant new power, where hitherto political authority had rested with iwi and hapū. In Māori terms, the new arrangement would most likely have been seen not as surrendering authority to the Crown, but as forging a new alliance under which their tino rangatiratanga would be respected, protected, and indeed enhanced.<sup>343</sup> As part of this arrangement, the Crown could only exercise its powers in ways that respected Māori rights and interests. This was a guarantee that could be overridden only in exceptional circumstances.<sup>344</sup>

Over time, while the nature of the authority of each party remained the same, the areas of life over which each party exercised authority would inevitably evolve. Societies are liable to change over time; thus both Māori and the Crown would need to adapt in the way they exercised the respective functions of tino rangatiratanga and kāwanatanga, and would need to negotiate over how that might occur. We will consider the principles underlying such negotiation in section 3.4.4.3.

To summarise, the Treaty recognised two distinct spheres of authority, each with distinct functions. While each party had a duty to acknowledge the other's sphere of interest, and while the Treaty granted the Crown kāwanatanga powers, it also specifically provided for Māori to retain their tino rangatiratanga, and therefore their rights of autonomy and self-determination. As the Central North Island Tribunal put it, the Treaty provided for 'two authorities, two systems of law, and two overlapping spheres of population and interest'.<sup>345</sup> From this are derived the principles of kāwanatanga and rangatiratanga, including Māori autonomy or self-government.

3.4.4.2 The Treaty involved reciprocal recognition of rights for mutual benefit

The Treaty recognises that the exercise of Crown authority was qualified by the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga. Rangatira of Te Rohe Pōtae consented to the Crown making laws for the purpose of controlling settlement and thereby minimising the harm that might otherwise arise. But they did not cede all their authority, except to the extent necessary for the Crown to control settlers and settlement. On the contrary, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga conveyed that their existing authority would endure and most likely be strengthened through this new alliance with Britain. The Crown was required to respect Māori authority and self-determination, and could not unreasonably exercise kāwanatanga in a manner that altered, interfered with, or was inconsistent with tino rangatiratanga.<sup>346</sup> Likewise, tino rangatiratanga was limited by the Crown's right to govern, and in particular to control settlers and settlement in accordance with the principle of 342. Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuatahi, p 236; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 524–525.

---

343. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, p 525.

344. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 191.

345. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 166.

346. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngai Tahu Report 1991, vol 2, pp 233–234.

kāwanatanga. In these ways, the Treaty involved a reciprocal exchange of rights, which was intended to provide a place in this country for both Māori and settlers, and to provide a basis for ongoing relationships founded on mutual protection and benefit. From this exchange of rights are derived the principles of reciprocity and mutual benefit.

3.4.4.3 *The Treaty established a partnership subject to ongoing dialogue

The Treaty established a relationship akin to a partnership between the Crown and Māori that would be subject to ongoing negotiation and dialogue. This required the Crown and Māori to work out how the Crown's new power of kāwanatanga might intersect with Māori communities' rights of tino rangatiratanga in a manner that made a place for both powers while also delivering on the Treaty's promise of mutual protection and benefit.

Other Tribunals have concluded that the negotiations required to bring the Treaty relationship into practical effect needed to be conducted honestly, fairly, in good faith, and in a spirit of cooperation and partnership.<sup>347</sup> Negotiation and dialogue were inevitable because the Treaty dealt in 'large generalities', rather than addressing detailed arrangements for the co-existence of kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga,<sup>348</sup> because it promised both parties significant forms of authority, and because those forms of authority would inevitably overlap or affect each other.<sup>349</sup>

Among the matters that would have to be worked out were the laws that would be needed to control settlement and to protect tino rangatiratanga, and the institutions – Crown and Māori – that would be needed to provide for the exercise of kāwanatanga on the one hand and Māori autonomy and self-government on the other. The Crown, in this inquiry, acknowledged that the 'precise spheres of responsibility and authority' were not specified in the Treaty and remained to be negotiated afterwards, including the institutional arrangements that would be required.<sup>350</sup>

In any negotiations over laws and institutions to give effect to kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga, neither party could impose its will. These matters could only be worked out through ongoing dialogue and partnership, in which the parties acted with the utmost good faith. From this are derived the principles of partnership and good governance.

3.4.4.4 *The Crown has a duty of active protection of Māori rights, interests, and taonga

A Crown duty of active protection arises from the provisions of the Treaty and is inherent in the Crown's partnership obligations. It is an essential part of the Treaty

---

347. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp173–174, 191, 208; Waitangi Tribunal, Ko Aotearoa Tēnei, Te Taumata Tuatahi, p 24.

348. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whiritaunoka, vol 1, p 151.

349. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 173.

350. Submission 3.4.312, p 5.

bargain: as we have seen throughout this chapter, the Crown acquired its right of kāwanatanga on the basis that such authority was needed to protect Māori from uncontrolled settlement and also foreign intervention. This protective guarantee was made clear in the preamble and in article 3, as well as in the oral explanations that were recorded in this district and elsewhere. The preamble, in particular, made it clear that the Crown's protective guarantee was in respect of both rangatiranga and land ('kia tohungia ki a ratou o ratou rangatiranga, me to ratou wenua'). The Central North Island Tribunal found that the guarantee of active protection includes the protection of tino rangatiranga.<sup>351</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori appear to have been prepared to accept the Crown acting in a protective capacity, and to exercise its legislative powers in doing so. We know from Te Awaitaia's comments that the promise of protection, in particular from the potential for foreign threat, was one of the factors that motivated rangatira to sign.<sup>352</sup> This understanding may have been shared by other rangatira who signed the Treaty, based on the assurances Maunsell said he had made. This was reflected in the comments recorded when the protector of Aborigines, George Clarke, travelled through the Waikato and to the north of Te Rohe Pōtae shortly after the Treaty was signed. These understandings were also reflected in the petition of the four tribes in 1883, and in the Kawenata in 1904. These documents explained the view of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and Ngāti Maniapoto in particular, that the Treaty had guaranteed to Māori their tino rangatiranga, and that the Crown's role was to actively protect their authority through the provision of suitable laws.

As other Tribunals have explained, the Crown's duty is one of active protection, which imposes an obligation to protect Māori rights and interests 'to the fullest extent reasonably practicable'.<sup>353</sup> This means that the Crown cannot ignore, deny, or interfere with Māori communities' tino rangatiranga, including authority over and relationships with people, lands, and taonga. But it also means that the Crown is positively obliged to protect and support Māori communities' tino rangatiranga, for example, by putting in place legislative or administrative measures that support those communities' authority and relationships, if that is what the community wants.<sup>354</sup>

The nature of this protective obligation necessarily varies according to the circumstances. In 1840, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were in little need of protection from settlers, and indeed were generally welcoming of the opportunities that they provided. As we will see in later chapters, growth in the settler population subsequently created pressures that would lead Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to seek the Crown's protection, particularly its protection of their lands.

351. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 172, 201.

352. Document A23, pp 66–67.

353. For example, see Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Manukau Claim, ch 8.3; Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Orakei Claim, pp 135–136; Waitangi Tribunal, Ngai Tahu Sea Fisheries Report, pp 269–270.

354. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngawha Geothermal Resource Report, pp 100–101; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Arawa Representative Geothermal Resource Claims, ch 5.

The nature of the Crown's obligation of 'active protection' also depends on the degree of practical influence the Crown is able to exercise. Initially, it had very little capacity to exercise practical authority in this district, and therefore to protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in exercising their tino rangatiratanga, which they continued to exercise without the Crown's assistance. Over time, the Crown's practical power grew and therefore so did its capacity to protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori rights and interests.

From the principle of partnership is derived the Crown's duty to use its powers of kāwanatanga to actively protect Māori interests.

3.4.4.5 The Crown has a duty of equitable and equal treatment

The rights accorded to the Crown through the Treaty also imposed a duty to treat Māori equitably. The Crown could not favour settlers over Māori at an individual level, and nor could it favour settler interests over the interests of Māori communities. This obligation arises from article 3, which promises all Māori the same rights of British subjects. It guarantees Māori equal citizenship rights, including equal rights to political representation. As the Te Tau Ihu Tribunal explained:

The obligations arising from kawanatanga, partnership, reciprocity, and active protection required the Crown to act fairly as between settlers and Maori. The interests of settlers could not be prioritised to the disadvantage of Maori. Where Maori have been disadvantaged, the principle of equity – in conjunction with the principles of active protection and redress – requires active measures to restore the balance.<sup>355</sup>

The Crown's duties, to this extent, also required the Crown to treat Māori groups equally, and to act in a way that allows Māori groups to maintain amicable relations. From these are derived the principles of equity (between Māori and settlers) and equal treatment (between Māori and Māori).

3.4.4.6 Māori have the right to pursue options

Articles 2 and 3 together provide Māori with a right to 'choose their social and cultural path' – that is, to continue to govern themselves along customary lines, or to engage with the emerging settler society, or both.<sup>356</sup> From this is derived the principle of options.

3.4.4.7 The Crown has a duty to provide redress

Should the Crown act in excess of its kāwanatanga powers, or otherwise breach the Treaty's terms, in a manner that resulted in prejudice to Māori, the Crown was liable to compensate its Treaty partner. From this is derived the principle of redress.

---

355. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 5. Also see Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o te Waka a Maui: Preliminary Report, p 6.

356. Waitangi Tribunal, Report on the Muriwhenua Fishing Claim, pp 193–195.

3.4.4.8 *The Treaty's application to non-signatories

Finally, for the sake of completeness, we must consider the Treaty obligations of those iwi and hapū who did not sign. As discussed in section 3.4.1.5, other Tribunals have found that the Treaty applies to non-signatories as a unilateral declaration by the Crown of its intent. To the extent that the Crown exercised its powers of kāwanatanga with respect to those hapū and iwi, it was obliged to do so in a manner that gave effect to their Treaty rights. The Treaty guaranteed tino rangatiratanga to all hapū and iwi, and their tino rangatiratanga therefore remained intact, irrespective of whether they had signed or not. Any Crown action fundamentally affecting the tino rangatiratanga of a Māori community, whether its rangatira had signed or not, required its consent. As we have seen, the Treaty's terms provided for a working out of arrangements by which the Crown's authority and that of Māori might co-exist and be exercised in partnership. Such a working out remained possible for non-signatories as well as signatories, and as we will see in chapter 8, during the 1880s signatories and non-signatories alike would seek Crown recognition of and protection for their tino rangatiratanga.

3.4.5 Conclusions on the Treaty's meaning and effect

The Treaty of Waitangi was brought to this district at a time when rangatira were eager to engage with Pākehā. Their contact to date had been limited to a few traders and missionaries, and their experiences had been largely positive. Britain, they understood, was a source of considerable wealth, offering new food crops, new agricultural methods, new trading opportunities, and new ideas.

When Queen Victoria offered to deepen the relationship, and in particular to lend her empire's considerable power to the protection and defence of mana Māori, many of this district's rangatira took up the offer. As a complex constitutional transaction taking place in two languages between people with markedly different ideas about law and authority, some misunderstanding was inevitable.

So far as we can determine, official explanations given in Te Rohe Pōtae did not convey the full legal meaning of its proposal. What was made clear, from the texts (especially in te reo) and from the missionaries' recorded explanations, were Britain's immediate, practical intentions, which had been spelled out in Normanby's instructions. It sought a power to control settlers and thereby minimise the harm that might come from uncontrolled settlement.

What was offered to Māori, both in terms of the text and in oral explanations, did not necessarily reflect the inbuilt assumptions that were associated with the Crown's intention to acquire sovereignty. These assumptions were repeated to us by the Crown in our hearings: through the Treaty, the Crown acquired Māori consent to it asserting sovereignty, which included a supreme authority over all places and people, including the power to determine institutions necessary for governance (after further discussion and engagement with its Treaty partner). Although the Crown acknowledged that it did not and could not assert that authority immediately over all Māori communities, it was an authority the Crown considered it had legitimately acquired.

Contrary to that position, we consider that the Treaty represented a coming together of two peoples, each with their respective cultural, legal, and political traditions. The Treaty therefore cannot be understood only on the basis of what British officials or the Crown believed it to mean in 1840; nor can it be understood solely in terms of its meaning and effect under English law at that time. The rangatira who signed the Treaty had pre-existing systems of law (tikanga) and authority (mana and tino rangatiratanga), which could be modified only with the free, informed consent of Māori communities. What Māori consented to depended on what they understood the Treaty to mean, and this inevitably reflected the explanations that were made to them in their own language, and which they interpreted through the lenses of their own assumptions about law and authority. The Treaty's meaning and effect can therefore be found in the common ground between Māori and British understandings – a common ground that provided for the Crown to exercise a new governing power, but one that did not interfere with the rights of Māori to continue to govern themselves in a manner consistent with their own mana and tikanga; for the Crown's new power to be used in a manner that protected Māori interests; and for the relationship to provide for mutual benefit to Māori and settlers alike. Inevitably, much remained to be negotiated, in particular about the potential overlaps and tensions between Crown and Māori spheres of influence. It is from these key elements of the Treaty transaction that we can derive principles that should be applied to the claims before us.

3.4.5.1 *The Treaty's meaning and effect

Under the Treaty, Māori were guaranteed that their right to exercise tino rangatiratanga (and therefore mana) would continue. The Treaty in turn created an obligation on the Crown to protect Māori communities in possession of and authority over their lands, resources, and all other valued things. Māori would have understood this as including their mana, their tino rangatiratanga, and their tikanga – their systems of authority and law, including systems for managing relationships among people, among groups, and with the environment and natural resources. In this respect the Treaty did not diminish Māori authority, but affirmed it.

Under the Treaty, the Crown was granted a right to exercise kāwanatanga – a right to govern and make laws. To the extent that it applied to Māori people and territories, that right was to be used for the control of settlers, and for the protection of Māori and the benefit of Māori and settlers alike, including the protection of Māori authority in respect of lands and other taonga. The rangatira who signed the Treaty appear to have understood its terms as creating a relationship between themselves and the Queen, and in turn with the governor as her representative, each acting as leaders and guides – rangatira – for their respective peoples. They were not consenting to the establishment of settler-controlled institutions of law and government with power over them.

The Treaty created a formal relationship. In tikanga terms, it can be understood as a mutually beneficial alliance with common and overlapping interests. This was an arrangement based on mutual interest and mutual benefit, intended to provide a place in this district for both peoples – and for their cultures, traditions, systems of law and government, and relationships with the natural world. It was an arrangement that allowed both forms of authority to co-exist.

The exact relationship between Māori and Crown authority was not spelled out. However, the Treaty established a number of concrete elements about the nature of the powers accorded to the respective parties, and how their relationship could be brought into practical effect:

- ▶ Kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga had distinct spheres of authority, with distinct functions, but with potentially overlapping spheres of interest – kāwanatanga being principally concerned with settlers, and with international relationships, and tino rangatiratanga being principally concerned with Māori communities.
- ▶ The relationship between the Crown and Māori was in the nature of a partnership in which any differences would be resolved through negotiation and dialogue conducted honestly and in good faith, and as much as possible in ways that delivered on the Treaty's original promise of mutual benefit. Neither partner in this relationship was superior. Further discussions were required in order to bring into effect the specific legal or institutional arrangements that might be needed to provide for the ongoing exercise of both forms of authority.
- ▶ The Crown had a duty to actively protect Māori rights and interests, including the exercise of Māori authority – this included a duty not to ignore, deny, or interfere with Māori authority or relationships with lands and other taonga, and a duty to actively support those relationships to the greatest extent practicable in accordance with Māori wishes (including through legislation and institutional arrangements if that was what Māori communities sought).
- ▶ The Crown also had a duty to treat Māori equitably, not favouring settlers over Māori or settler interests over those of Māori communities; and a duty to treat Māori communities equally.
- ▶ The Crown's exercise of its right of kāwanatanga was fettered by the requirement to give effect to tino rangatiratanga; it could not alter or interfere with tino rangatiratanga except with consent. Tino rangatiratanga was also fettered by the Crown's right to govern and make laws, and in particular its obligations to control settlers and settlement and to protect New Zealand from foreign threat.

Above all, the Treaty signalled a relationship that would be mutually beneficial, providing access to new opportunities and also providing for mutual protection. In this respect, it represented the formal beginning of a relationship akin to a partnership.

We also conclude that the Treaty applied to non-signatory hapū as a unilateral set of promises by the Crown to respect and protect their tino rangatiratanga and other rights just as it would for hapū whose leaders had signed. Out of practical necessity, all Māori needed to engage with the Crown on the basis of the Treaty's guarantees, whether they had signed the Treaty or not. At a minimum, however, the Crown was obliged to approach these groups on the basis that a workable relationship had to be put in place based on mutual consent, much as Māori needed to do the same with the Crown.

3.4.5.2 *The principles and duties we apply

From these conclusions, we apply the following principles and duties of the Treaty to the claims before us:

- ▶ Kāwanatanga: The Crown has a right to make laws and govern, which was initially for the principal purposes of controlling settlers and settlement, and managing foreign relationships. This power is qualified by the rights that are reserved to Māori. To the extent that it affects Māori communities, the right of kāwanatanga must be used to protect Māori interests.
- ▶ Good governance: The Crown must keep to its own laws and not act outside the law. The Crown should be accountable for its actions in relation to Māori and subject to independent scrutiny.
- ▶ Tino rangatiratanga, self-government, and autonomy: Māori communities retain their tino rangatiratanga, including their right to autonomy and self-government, and their right to manage the full range of their affairs in accordance with their own tikanga. As part of the Treaty exchange, the Crown guarantees to protect and provide for the exercise of Māori authority and autonomy.
- ▶ Reciprocity and mutual benefit: The Treaty provided for two peoples to share one country. Māori granted the Crown its new power of kāwanatanga in return for a guarantee of protection for their tino rangatiratanga. Through this mutual recognition of powers, the Treaty also provides a basis for mutual protection and for relationships that would bring mutual benefit.
- ▶ Partnership: The Treaty established a relationship that was subject to ongoing negotiation and dialogue, under which the Crown and Māori would work out the practical details of how kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga would co-exist. Both partners owe each other a duty to act honourably and in good faith. Neither partner can act in a manner that fundamentally affects the other's sphere of influence without their consent, unless there are exceptional circumstances.
- ▶ Active protection: The Crown is obliged to use its power of kāwanatanga to actively protect the Māori rights and interests guaranteed under articles 2 and 3 of the Treaty.
- ▶ Options: Māori have the right to continue to govern themselves along customary lines, or to engage with the developing settler and modern society, or a combination of both.
- ▶ Equity: The Crown must act fairly as between Māori and settlers. It cannot use its powers of kāwanatanga to advance Pākehā interests at the expense of Māori. Equal treatment: The Crown must treat all Māori groups equally and in a manner that is not intended to create division between them.
- ▶ Redress: Should the Crown act in excess of its kāwanatanga powers, or should it breach the Treaty's terms in any other way by act or omission resulting in prejudice, the Crown should compensate.

3.4.5.3 The Treaty in Te Rohe Pōtae after 1840

In the rest of our report, we assess the extent to which the Crown acted in accordance with these Treaty principles and duties in respect of the hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae.

For many years after the Treaty was signed at Waikato Heads and Kāwhia, the Crown and this district's Māori followed divergent paths. The Crown, basing its understanding on the English texts, proclaimed its sovereignty and moved to establish the machinery of government. Its immediate concern was with establishing authority among settler communities, not asserting power over Māori except in relation to land transactions.<sup>357</sup> For the most part, from its point of view, governing Māori could wait.<sup>358</sup>

Over time, as settlement increased in other parts of New Zealand, the Crown began to devolve authority to its settlers in New Zealand. In the 1850s it established an elected settler legislature (voting rights were subject to a property test that effectively disenfranchised Māori), and it accorded responsible government to settler Ministers accountable to the settler Parliament (except in respect of Māori affairs, for which responsible government was granted in 1864).<sup>359</sup>

The Crown's efforts to establish a government had little or no practical effect in this district until many years after the Treaty. Few government officials even visited during the 1840s. Māori communities continued to govern themselves as before, showing some interest in missionary ideas, and considerable interest in trade and agriculture.<sup>360</sup> The 1840s was something of a golden age of economic development as Māori communities grew corn, wheat, potatoes, and other crops, much of it for export to Sydney.<sup>361</sup> Interaction with the Crown was limited to the confirmation of a few pre-Treaty transactions, as well as a handful of Crown purchases, which mainly occurred in coastal areas (discussed in chapters 4 and 5). This lack of sustained interaction meant that the Crown was able to secure its position in other parts of the country, including establishing institutions for governing New Zealand, before it came to any significant engagement with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

However, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders closely observed the Crown's actions in other parts of the country, where the settler population grew and became more demanding for land, and the Crown became increasingly responsive to settler demands. The establishment of a settler legislature, derisively labelled 'the English

---

357. Orange, The Treaty of Waitangi, pp 85, 92–93; Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 386–387, 389; Alan Ward, National Overview, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahaua Whanui Series, 3 vols (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), vol 2, pp 76–79; 'New Zealand officially becomes British colony', Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <https://nzhistory.govt.nz/letters-patent-issued-making-new-zealand-a-colony-separate-from-new-south-wales>, updated 23 December 2016.

358. Wai 1040 ROI, doc A21, pp 78–79.

359. Document A23, pp 142–152, 157, 234; Alan Ward, National Overview, vol 2, pp 461–462.

360. This period is discussed in doc A23, pp 75–92, 123–134.

361. Document A23, pp 123–131; Tūhuatahi Tui Adams and Paul Meredith, 'Ngāti Maniapoto — The coming of the Pākehā, Te Ara — the Encyclopedia of New Zealand, <http://www.TeAra.govt.nz/en/ngati-maniapoto/page-3>, accessed 12 April 2017.

Committee' by some Waikato Māori,<sup>362</sup> saw rangatira begin to explore new institutional arrangements. Many of those who had signed the Treaty in the hope of forging an alliance with the Queen now turned to a new alliance among themselves: the Kingitanga was born in 1856–58. Haupōkia, who was among the Treaty signatories, was also among those who selected Te Wherowhero as the first Māori King; and most of this district's signatories supported the movement along with him.<sup>363</sup>

By the 1860s, Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto were at war with the Crown. War was followed by confiscation, and by two further decades of independence before negotiations over the practicalities of the Crown–Māori relationship in this district finally began. We will consider these events in chapters 6, 7, and 8, particularly how the Crown responded to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori requests for laws to be enacted and institutions created that protected their authority.

---

362. Document A23, p 142.

363. Document s11(d), p 18; doc A97, p 21; transcript 4.1.8, p 1214 (Moepātu Borell, hearing week 2, Waitomo Cultural and Arts Centre, 14 December 2012); doc A144, pp 14–15.

CHAPTER 4

NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA O MUA: OLD LAND CLAIMS

As long as a person or a people sat on the land and people agreed for them to be there, kei te pai. The minute they left that land, e whakahokia mai te mana o te whenua.

—Thomas Moke<sup>1</sup>

4.1 INTRODUCTION

By the Treaty of Waitangi, the Crown was granted a right to exercise kāwanatanga – a right to govern and make laws. As set out already in chapter 3, that right had particular application to Māori people and territories. It was to be used for the control of settlers, for the protection of Māori, and for the benefit of Māori and settlers alike, including the protection of Māori authority in respect of lands and other taonga.

In asserting its new powers to achieve these aims, the Crown regarded control of land purchasing as fundamental. In 1839, Secretary of State for the Colonies Lord Normanby had instructed Captain William Hobson to proclaim that land purchases would be valid only if derived from or confirmed by the Crown. This proclamation was first issued by Governor Gipps in Sydney on 14 January 1840, and repeated by Hobson on 30 January after he arrived in New Zealand. Among other things, the proclamation declared that the Crown would recognise no title to land ‘which either has been, or shall hereafter be acquired’, unless that title derived from or was confirmed by a grant from the Crown.<sup>2</sup>

As well as asserting the necessity of the Crown’s pre-emptive right to purchase land from Māori, Normanby’s instructions required that commissioners be appointed to investigate previous transactions between Māori and Pākehā. Again, this was first provided for by Gipps, who in 1840 produced legislation establishing a process to investigate land claims. After the annexation of New Zealand in May 1841, Governor Hobson re-enacted this as the New Zealand Land Claims Ordinance 1841. These ordinances stated all claims to land obtained by Europeans before 1840 to be null and void, and declared the Crown’s ‘intention to recognize claims to land which may have been obtained on equitable terms from the said

---

1. ‘The land is returned to the original owners’: transcript 4.1.9 (Thomas Moke, hearing week 3, Maketu Marae, 5 March 2013, pp 308–309).

2. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 1, p76; doc A70 (Boulton), p 51.

chiefs or aboriginal inhabitants' and that were 'not prejudicial to the present or prospective interests' of future settlers.<sup>3</sup>

When the Treaty was signed by Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira in the months after February 1840, only a small population of Pākehā were resident in the inquiry district. From the late 1820s, traders had settled around harbours and river mouths on the coast. They exchanged European goods and crops for flax, pork, potatoes, and other produce. Living under the protection of rangatira such as Te Wherowhero and Haupōkia Te Pakarū, they were often married into their host communities.<sup>4</sup> From the mid-1830s, Anglican and Wesleyan missionaries began establishing mission stations in the Waipā area of southern Waikato and on the west coast around the Kāwhia and Whāingaroa Harbours. Māori in the region formed close relationships with missionaries, who offered opportunities to acquire literacy and European agricultural techniques.<sup>5</sup>

The prospect of Britain's annexation of New Zealand prompted a rush of speculative land purchases by Sydney-based merchants, often purporting to transact fancifully large areas of land. For example, John Jones and Francis Leathart claimed to have acquired 101,493 acres of land in Te Rohe Pōtae between January 1839 and January 1840. Some of this land they then claimed to have disposed of to a further Sydney claimant, WC Wentworth.<sup>6</sup> Ernst Dieffenbach, the German naturalist who travelled through parts of the inquiry district in April 1840, recorded that '[t]he greater part of the land in the vicinity of Kawia [sic] is claimed by Europeans.'<sup>7</sup>

The number of old land claims in this inquiry district that were registered with the land claims commissions is not clear from the evidence.<sup>8</sup> Most of the claimed transactions were speculative in nature, however, and were not pursued. The land claims commissions ultimately investigated just six claims in the inquiry district. Each was accorded a plan number beginning with the letters 'OLC'.<sup>9</sup>

The land claims commissions operated in two distinct phases. The first phase was overseen by Edward Godfrey and Matthew Richmond, who served as commissioners from 1840 to 1845. Godfrey and Richmond investigated four related claims. All four were heard in June 1843. Three of these claims concerned land occupied by the Wesleyan Missionary Society (WMS) at Nihinihi, Whāingaroa (OLC 946), Ahuahu, Kāwhia (OLC 947), and Awaroa, Kāwhia (OLC 948). The fourth claim (OLC 1040) was lodged by former WMS employee William Johnston

3. Document A70, pp 51–54.

4. Document A97 (Borell and Joseph), p 137.

5. Document A70, p 19; doc A23 (O'Malley), pp 33–36.

6. Document A70, pp 45, 480–484.

7. Document A23, p 39.

8. Leanne Boulton stated there were 41 claims: doc A70, pp 47, 471–484. The Crown stated there were 51: submission 3.4.288, pp 14–15. In the Tribunal's assessment, the evidence cited does not unambiguously support either figure.

9. In this chapter we follow the 'OLC' numbers used by the parties and in Ms Boulton's evidence. Some sources provide a different sequence of OLC numbers: see, for example, doc A21, p 39 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell); 'Appendix to the Report of the Land Claims Commissioner', AJHR, 1863, D-14.

for land at Kinohaku, Kāwhia. The governor awarded Crown grants in all four cases, in accordance with the commissioners' recommendations.

In the second phase, Commissioner Francis Dillon Bell investigated two claims between 1857 and 1862, initially under the Land Claims Settlement Act 1856. In July 1858, Bell heard George Charleton's claim to land at Pouewe, Kāwhia (OLC 1353). Charleton died in 1862 before the commission reported, but in 1864, on Bell's recommendation, a Crown grant was issued to his widow, Ann Charleton. Bell's investigation of a claim to land at Ōhaua, Kāwhia, by John Laurie and Samuel Joseph (OLC 1314), was carried out by correspondence alone. This claim was declared abandoned in 1880.<sup>10</sup>

In sum, five Crown grants totalling just over 416 acres were awarded to Pākehā in the inquiry district based on the commissions' recommendations.

Separately from the five old land claims for which land was granted, four further transactions in the inquiry district that derived from pre-Treaty relationships were later alienated by other mechanisms. Two were areas of land claimed by the wms: the Raoraokauere Mission Station at Aotea Harbour and the Te Kōpua Mission Station at Waipā. Under the Land Claims Ordinance 1841, the land claims commission could not investigate transactions that had taken place after 14 January 1840. However, in 1844, Governor Robert FitzRoy decided to waive the Crown's pre-emptive purchase right in certain circumstances. FitzRoy indicated he would grant a waiver at Raoraokauere, and the wms applied for a waiver at Te Kōpua. Nonetheless, it took until 1862 – nearly 20 years – for Crown grants to be awarded to the wms. The Te Kōpua Mission Station is not discussed here: it was not the focus of any claim in this inquiry and has reverted to Māori freehold land status.<sup>11</sup> At Ōhaua a third area, adjacent to OLC 1314, was granted as OLC 400 to Samuel Joseph in circumstances that are unclear. The land has since been repurchased and returned to Māori freehold status. A fourth area, known as Rangitahi, south of Whāingaroa Harbour, was occupied by Edward Meurant and his Māori wife, Eliza Kenehuru. Upon Meurant's death in 1851, the land remained in Māori communal ownership. A Crown grant was later issued to the land – designated OLC 118 – in circumstances that are not entirely clear.

The awards resulting from these four transactions alienated a further 516 acres.

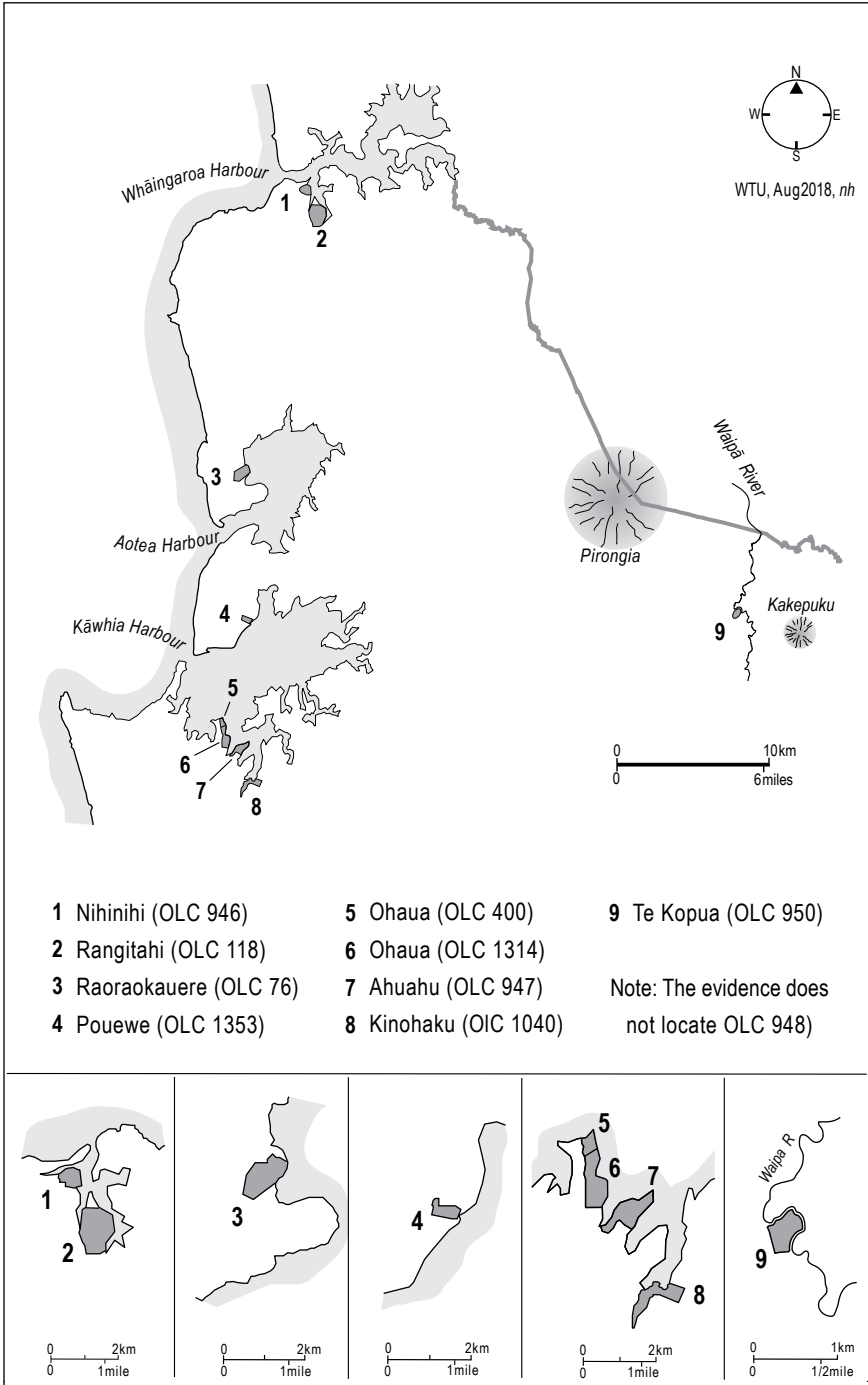

The main research reports addressing these matters was presented by Leanne Boulton. Reports prepared by Vincent O'Malley and Andrew Francis also contained relevant material, as did the traditional history report prepared by the Ngāti Hikairo claimants.<sup>12</sup>

---

10. Document A70, p 121.

11. Document A21, p 39.

12. Leanne Boulton, 'Hapu and Iwi Land Transactions with the Crown and Europeans in Te Rohe Potae Inquiry District, c 1840–1865' (document A70); Vincent O'Malley, 'Te Rohe Pōtae Political Engagement, 1840–1863' (document A23); Andrew Francis, 'The Rohe Potae Commercial Economy in the Mid-Nineteenth Century, c 1830–1886' (document A26); Frank Thorne, 'Te Maru-ō-Hikairo: Oral and Traditional History Report of Ngāti Hikairo' (document A98).

Map 4.1: Pre-Treaty transactions referred to in this chapter

No	Location	Claimant	Date(s) of deed(s)	Approximate area initially claimed (acres)	Approximate area granted (acres)	How land was granted
946	Nihinihi, Whāingaroa	WMS	27 February 1839	90	76	Crown grant, 8 November 1855
947	Ahuahu, Kāwhia	WMS	20 November 1834, 24 November 1834, 12 April 1839, 24 April 1839, 1 August 1839	160	160	Crown grant, 8 November 1855
948	Awaroa, Kāwhia	WMS	3 January 1840	4	4	Crown grant, 8 November 1855
1040	Kinohaku, Kāwhia	Johnston	30 January 1836, 8 October 1839, 18 January 1840, 13 February 1840	600	118	Crown grant, 25 July 1848
1353	Pouewe, Kāwhia	Cowell, Charleton	11 January 1840, 11 March 1846	50	44	Crown grant, 25 October 1864
76	Raoraokauere, Aotea	WMS	12 June 1840, 14 March 1844	34	167	Crown grant, 10 June 1862
370	Te Kōpua, Waipā	WMS	5 May 1840, 2 September 1848	35	35	Crown grant, 10 June 1862
400	Ōhau, Kāwhia	Joseph	Unknown	Unknown	34	Unknown
118	Rangitahi, Whāingaroa	Meurant	1839?	300	280	Unknown

Table 4.1: Pre-Treaty transactions in the inquiry district that led to alienations

4.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The land alienated through these processes represents a very small portion of the inquiry district. Yet the alienations raise important issues. By entering into a Treaty relationship, the Crown recognised that its assertion of kāwanatanga imposed on it a duty to protect Māori rights. This was clear from the preamble and article 2 of the Treaty, in which the Crown promised to protect ‘o ratou rangatiratanga, me to ratou wenua’ or the ‘just rights and property’ of Māori and assured them ‘te tino rangatiratanga o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga me o ratou taonga katoa’ or ‘full exclusive and undisturbed possession of their Lands and Estates Forests Fisheries and other properties . . . so long as it is their wish and desire to retain the same’ (see chapter 3, section 3.3.2.4).

The process of awarding Crown grants for land transacted in the pre-Treaty period was the first serious test of the Crown’s commitment to protect the Māori rights it had recognised under the Treaty. Crown officials in the 1840s knew that this meant respecting Māori law and custom. In 1845, for example, Lord Stanley, the secretary of state for the colonies, told the House of Lords:

law and custom are well understood among the natives of the islands. By them we have agreed to be bound, and by them we must abide. These laws – these customs – and the right arising from them on the part of the Crown – we have guaranteed when we accepted the sovereignty of the islands . . . the interpretation of the Treaty of Waitangi, with regard to these rights, is, that, except in the case of the intelligent consent of the natives, the Crown has no right to take possession of land . . .<sup>13</sup>

To grant title to Pākehā for a claimed pre-Treaty transaction, the Crown first had to establish that Māori had given their informed consent to the full and final alienation of the affected land.

4.1.2 How the chapter is structured

This chapter examines land alienated from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as a result of the Crown's process for investigating pre-Treaty transactions. Section 4.2 establishes the issues for determination in this chapter. Section 4.3 considers Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions, and section 4.4 then examines the operations of the land claims commissions in Te Rohe Pōtae. Other alienations in the inquiry district that derived from pre-Treaty relationships are examined in section 4.5. Section 4.6 contains our Treaty analysis and findings, and an assessment of prejudice. These findings are summarised in section 4.7.

4.2 ISSUES

This section sets out the findings of previous Tribunals, the Crown's acknowledgements regarding pre-Treaty transactions, and the arguments made by the claimants and the Crown, in order to establish the issues for determination.

4.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The Tribunal has a well-developed jurisprudence on pre-Treaty transactions, which have been addressed in several reports. Of these, the Muriwhenua Land Report and the Hauraki Report considered the issues in most depth.<sup>14</sup> Both Tribunals examined the nature of pre-Treaty transactions in their inquiry districts and assessed the adequacy of the land claims commissioners' investigations into those transactions.

The Muriwhenua Land Tribunal's findings on the nature of pre-Treaty transactions were unequivocal. The Tribunal concluded that pre-Treaty transactions in their inquiry district 'did not effect, and could not have effected, binding sales, and that the parties were not of sufficiently common mind for valid contracts to have formed'. Rather than sales, the pre-Treaty transactions were tuku whenua, an arrangement that 'conferred [upon Pākehā] a personal right of occupation conditional upon acceptance of the norms and authority of the local Maori community as represented in the rangatira'.<sup>15</sup>

13. Document A23, p 87.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), pp 53–108, 392–398; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, ch 3; see also Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngati Te Rangiteaorere Claim Report (Wellington: Brooker and Friend Ltd, 1990), pp 10–14, 18–22; Waitangi Tribunal, The Whanganui River Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1999), ch 4; Waitangi Tribunal, The Kaipara Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), chs 3, 4.

The Tribunal substantiated this finding with reference to the power dynamic evident on the ground in Muriwhenua. In its view, there was no compelling evidence to suggest that Māori had bowed to an alternative power structure at the time the transactions were conducted. Instead, Māori retained control of the area 'by sheer weight of numbers' and, therefore, '[t]he presumption must be . . . that Maori saw things faithfully in terms of their own law, which was the only law they needed to know and the only one to which they owed commitment'.<sup>16</sup> The Tribunal found that, under Māori land law, land was owned by the community as a whole, with use-rights allocated by rangatira. These use-rights were conditional upon the occupiers' continued contribution to the common wealth.<sup>17</sup>

The Hauraki Tribunal, by contrast, found that a sharp dichotomy between customary and modern expectations of exchange was inappropriate for their inquiry district. The Tribunal explained:

In the light of the different circumstances of Hauraki, we take a modified view of these transactions from that of the Muriwhenua Tribunal for their district. On the basis of both claimant and Crown evidence, we consider that some of the pre-1840 and pre-emption waiver transactions in Hauraki did not take place in a wholly customary environment but one in which more modern concepts of commodity trade and entrepreneurship had some influence.<sup>18</sup>

Accordingly, the Tribunal found that 'Maori alienors could well have intended to convey substantial and perhaps permanent rights to Pakeha purchasers'.<sup>19</sup> However, the Tribunal qualified that statement by adding, 'we are by no means persuaded that the rangatira and hapu concerned intended to relinquish all their interests in or connections with the land' (emphasis in original).<sup>20</sup>

Like its Muriwhenua counterpart, the Hauraki Tribunal premised its findings on the contemporary distribution of power, but differed in its analysis. While Hauraki remained a predominantly Māori place in the late 1830s, the Tribunal found that the growing importance of Pākehā in the region meant that the area was 'no longer a wholly traditional world'. The inter-tribal fighting of the 1820s had left Hauraki almost void of Māori habitation in the years immediately

---

15. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 392.

16. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 68, 106.

17. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 68, 108.

18. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 153.

19. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp 153–154.

20. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 154.

preceding the land transactions, as iwi and hapū fled to the Waikato.<sup>21</sup> This meant that Hauraki Māori were re-establishing their presence on their whenua as Pākehā were establishing theirs. The residence patterns of returning Hauraki iwi were, in part, informed by proximity to these newcomers. The Tribunal concluded that, for some Māori, association with wealthy Pākehā served to reaffirm their presence in the region and, in this context, both traditional and modern forms of exchange held sway.<sup>22</sup>

While the Muriwhenua Land and Hauraki Tribunals offered distinct findings on the nature of pre-Treaty transactions, they reached similar conclusions regarding the efficacy of the commissioners' investigations. The Muriwhenua Land Tribunal listed several matters that the commissioners were bound to inquire into to ensure that the Crown actively protected Māori interests. The Tribunal found:

The matters that needed spelling out, in our view, were these: had the alienors sufficient right and title? was a sale in fact intended? would a sale be in breach of any trusts? had the affected hapu sufficient other lands . . .? were the transactions otherwise contrary to the interests of the Maori alienors? was the consideration adequate? and had matters been honestly put without fraud or unfair inducement?<sup>23</sup>

Using these questions as a guide, both Tribunals found that the inquiries of Godfrey and Richmond failed to protect Māori interests and that the resulting Crown grants thereby breached Treaty principles.<sup>24</sup>

The two Tribunals made similar findings in respect of the later commission overseen by Francis Dillon Bell. The Muriwhenua Land Tribunal concluded that Bell's primary task was 'to tidy an uncertain title situation' by 'converting vague Crown grants into certain ones by surveying the original grantee's entitlements'. The Tribunal found that 'Maori were not called upon to be heard' and that Bell 'simply assumed that valid alienations had been effected.'<sup>25</sup> The Hauraki Tribunal drew a similar conclusion, noting that, while he was willing to recommend additional payments or to modify the boundaries of previously awarded land, Bell was unwilling to rule a transaction void on the basis that not all owners had given consent.<sup>26</sup> Bell thus failed to consider the possibility that the transactions were conducted on a Māori customary basis. For these reasons, both Tribunals once again concluded that the resulting Crown grants breached Treaty principles by failing to actively protect Māori interests.

---

21. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 89.

22. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp 88–91.

23. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 126.

24. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 126; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp 154, 163–164.

25. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 171, 172.

26. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 156.

4.2.2 Crown concessions and acknowledgements

The Crown in this inquiry made no concessions of Treaty breach in relation to pre-Treaty transactions. The Crown did acknowledge that the land claims commission system was ‘not perfect’, and may have been deficient in some respects, but it maintained that these deficiencies did not breach Treaty obligations.<sup>27</sup>

The Crown made several specific acknowledgments regarding George Charleton’s claim to Pouewe (OLC 1353), although again it did not concede any Treaty breach or resulting prejudice. The Crown acknowledged:

- ▶ ‘there may have been a failure of process with respect of the Charleton claim’;
- ▶ ‘the evidence on the record of inquiry may suggest that this pre-Treaty transaction may not have been intended by the original Māori owners to be a permanent alienation’;
- ▶ ‘in this particular instance, the pre-Treaty transaction may have been intended to be an interest in land for life held on trust for future Māori beneficiaries’;
- ▶ ‘there is evidence of later Māori opposition to the alienation’; and
- ▶ ‘[p]rejudice may have resulted to Māori in result of the old land claims process in relation to George Charleton’s claim.’<sup>28</sup>

4.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

The Tribunal received several specific claims concerning pre-Treaty transactions.<sup>29</sup> The parties to this inquiry agreed that the Crown had a duty under the Treaty of Waitangi to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori interests in land transacted with Europeans prior to the signing of the Treaty, and properly investigate the nature and effect of those transactions. The key difference between the parties is that the Crown said it met this duty, and claimants said it did not.<sup>30</sup>

On the nature of pre-Treaty transactions, the claimants argued that the findings of the Muriwhenua Land Tribunal were applicable to the Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district. Counsel framed pre-Treaty transactions as traditional arrangements premised on reciprocity, suggesting that, in accordance with Māori custom, ‘pre-Treaty transactions in Te Rohe Pōtae were more about the relationships between people (enabling access to resources) than about title to property.’<sup>31</sup> To substantiate this perspective, counsel emphasised the similarities between the

---

27. Submission 3.4.288, pp 1, 3, 6.

28. Submission 3.4.288, pp 3, 20, 22, 31, 33; statement 1.3.1, pp 37, 42.

29. Wai 1112, Wai 1113, Wai 1439, Wai 2351, Wai 2353 (submission 3.4.226); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 1450 (submission 3.4.196); Wai 1499 (submission 3.4.171); Wai 2014 (submission 3.4.171; submission 3.4.208); Wai 125 (submission 3.4.210); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249(c)); Wai 2345 (submission 3.4.139).

30. Claim 1.5.20, p 2; submission 3.4.116, pp 2–3; submission 3.4.288, pp 1, 13.

31. Submission 3.4.116, pp 2–3.

Muriwhenua Land and Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry districts at the time the transactions were conducted.<sup>32</sup>

The Crown argued that the Hauraki Tribunal's findings on the nature of pre-Treaty transactions were more applicable in Te Rohe Pōtae than those of the Muriwhenua Land Tribunal. Counsel suggested that 'Māori in the relevant areas of the inquiry district became familiar with European trade in the period', pointing to testimony given before the land claims commission in 1843 in which a Māori witness appeared to distinguish between arrangements conducted according to Māori expectations of exchange, on the one hand, and Pākehā notions of 'sale' on the other.<sup>33</sup> In addition, the Crown pointed to the lack of protest in response to four of the five land claims granted in Te Rohe Pōtae as evidence that Māori understood the transactions as permanent alienations. The Crown's view was that in these transactions the subsequent conduct of the parties in each case is the best guide to their intentions.<sup>34</sup> The claimants submitted in reply that the Crown 'should not apply the principle that silence means acceptance', especially in the context of its duty of active protection toward Māori.<sup>35</sup>

On the land claims commissions' investigations of the transactions, the claimants argued '[t]he principles of the Treaty of Waitangi required the Crown to protect the customary interests of Māori in relation to pre-Treaty transactions.'<sup>36</sup> Claimant counsel asserted that the commissions failed to inquire into Māori understandings of the transactions or to seek to understand Māori customary land rights. Instead, counsel submitted, the commissioners simply asked Māori witnesses to affirm the accuracy of the information provided.<sup>37</sup> In addition, the claimants argued that the location of hearings in Auckland and the Crown's failure to provide independent advice to Māori witnesses were detrimental to the interests of Māori.<sup>38</sup> These failings, and the subsequent awarding of Crown grants in accordance with the commissioners' flawed findings, amounted to a failure to actively protect the interests of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.<sup>39</sup>

The Crown, however, disputed this assessment. It did not consider that it had 'breached the Treaty through its involvement in the assessment and administration of pre-Treaty transactions.'<sup>40</sup> Crown counsel argued that there was no evidence to support the suggestion that the commissioners simply assumed that all transactions were sales.<sup>41</sup> Instead, counsel said that the commissioners sought the confirmation of interested parties, including Māori. The Crown argued that the 32. Transcript 4.1.22, pp 306–310 (Dominic Wilson, questioned by Tribunal, hearing week 15, Napinapi Marae, 4 November 2014).

---

33. Submission 3.4.288, pp 11–12, 16–17.

34. Submission 3.4.288, p 11.

35. Submission 3.4.343, pp 2–3.

36. Submission 3.4.116, p 2.

37. Submission 3.4.116, pp 9–12.

38. Submission 3.4.116, pp 10–11.

39. Submission 3.4.116, pp 2–4; doc s12 (Kaati), pp 17–18.

40. Submission 3.4.288, p 1.

41. Submission 3.4.288, pp 19, 25.

accuracy of this evidence should be questioned only if the commissioners' rulings were subsequently opposed.<sup>42</sup> The Crown described the commissions' hearings as fair, and asserted that Māori right holders and Māori evidence were adequately represented throughout the process.<sup>43</sup> As to the hearings, Crown counsel disputed the suggestion that holding them in Auckland somehow singled out Māori for unfair treatment, emphasising that the location was also an obstacle to some Pākehā claimants.<sup>44</sup>

On the specific matter of George Charleton's claim to Pouewe, the claimants emphasised commissioner Bell's failure to address the protests of Māta Ritana Kaore and others. The claimants also described the Crown's subsequent acquisition of the block as a means of establishing a foothold in Te Rohe Pōtae or as a 'lever for the Crown to break the aukati', a matter that is addressed in chapter 8 (sections 8.3.1.2 and 8.5.1.1).<sup>45</sup> As noted above, the Crown made a number of acknowledgements regarding Pouewe, accepting that the pre-Treaty transaction may not have been intended as a permanent alienation and that Māori may have suffered prejudice as a result of the claims process.<sup>46</sup> However, it rejected any suggestion that deficiencies in the handling of Charleton's claim were representative of wider failings in the regime for investigating pre-Treaty transactions, observing that the protests of Māta Ritana Kaora and others were concerned with Charleton's claim to the land, rather than with the commission's investigation processes.<sup>47</sup>

4.2.4 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues and summarised the arguments of the parties, we identify the issues for us to determine as follows:

- ▶ How did Māori in Te Rohe Pōtae understand pre-Treaty transactions?
- ▶ Were the Crown's regimes for investigating and validating pre-Treaty transactions consistent with its obligations under the Treaty? Specifically:
- ▶ Did the land claims commissioners inquire sufficiently into the nature and extent of pre-Treaty transactions?
- ▶ Were the commissions' processes fair to Māori right holders?
- ▶ Did the Crown respond adequately to concerns expressed by Māori arising from the commissions' investigations?
- ▶ What were the outcomes of the land claims process for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?

4.3 MĀORI UNDERSTANDINGS OF PRE-TREATY TRANSACTIONS

In this inquiry, the claimants and the Crown expressed fundamental disagreement about the extent to which the understandings of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had been modified by European expectations of exchange, both at the time the original

---

42. Submission 3.4.288, pp 19, 25.

43. Submission 3.4.288, pp 25–31.

44. Submission 3.4.288, pp 26–29, 31.

45. Submission 3.4.143, pp 23–24; submission 3.4.226, pp 51–57.

46. Statement 1.4.3, p 55; submission 3.4.288, p 22.

47. Submission 3.4.288, p 32.

transactions were conducted and at the time the commissions investigated. Claimant counsel argued that evidence of the application of Māori custom at the time of the pre-Treaty transactions (and well into the 1840s) supported their view that the transactions were ‘made in terms of Māori custom and . . . did not absolutely alienate land to the settlers’, instead being ‘allocations of use for the settler party so long as the parties were engaged in a reciprocal relationship’.<sup>48</sup> In contrast, Crown counsel argued that ‘the nature of the evidence suggests that Maori in the relevant areas of the inquiry district became familiar with European trade in the period’ and that new concepts of trade and entrepreneurship arising from contact with Europeans had some influence on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori from the time of the original transactions.<sup>49</sup> Claimant counsel responded that ‘European views of the transactions are irrelevant as they were conducted at a time that Māori customary law applied in fact and in law on the ground’.<sup>50</sup>

The parties also disagreed about the political situation in the inquiry district before and immediately after the signing of the Treaty. Counsel differed over whether Te Rohe Pōtae had more in common with the Muriwhenua or Hauraki regions, and which Tribunal’s findings were more applicable. Claimant counsel submitted that the available evidence demonstrated that, as in Muriwhenua, throughout this period ‘Te Rohe Pōtae Māori controlled nearly all aspects of the lives of the settlers on the ground’.<sup>51</sup> The Crown, for its part, cited the Hauraki Tribunal’s conclusion that a sharp dichotomy between traditional and modern expectations of exchange was not an adequate framework for an analysis of the pre-Treaty transactions in that inquiry district.<sup>52</sup>

4.3.1 Early interactions with manuhiri

The first recorded Pākehā visitor to the inquiry district was Captain John Rodolphus Kent (known to Māori as Hamukete), who entered Kāwhia Harbour on 1 January 1824 aboard the Elizabeth Henrietta. His visit was prompted by a request from the New South Wales government to establish greater flax-trading connections with Māori. In 1828, Kent established a trading post at Kāwhia. Māori were extremely interested in acquiring European goods, especially muskets, and Kent was welcomed to Kāwhia. Over the following years he was instrumental in the expansion of land-based trading in the inquiry district.<sup>53</sup>

In 1829, Kent brought more Pākehā traders from Sydney. At a Native Land Court hearing in 1886, Wiremu Te Wheoro said they included Te Kaora (John Cowell senior), Te Kawana (Cavanagh), and Tamete (Thomas Smith). These Europeans ‘were claimed and taken away by the various Chiefs as their pakehas’.<sup>54</sup>

---

48. Submission 3.4.116, pp 2, 6.

49. Submission 3.4.288, pp 11–12.

50. Submission 3.4.288, pp 11–12; submission 3.4.343, p 6.

51. Submission 3.4.343, p 6.

52. Submission 3.4.288, p 11.

53. Document A26 (Francis), pp 8, 13; doc A23, p 21.

54. Document A23, p 22; also see doc A26, p 13 and doc A70, p 27.

The arrival of these newcomers was also discussed before the Native Land Court in 1886 by Hōne Kaora, a Ngāti Hikairo grandson of Te Kaora:

These different Pākehās were appropriated by various chiefs, who settled them as follows: ‘Hamukete’ was taken by Te Wherowhero, and settled at Heahea (near Kāwhia Heads, north side); Te Tuhi took ‘Te Rangi-tera’ and settled him also at Heahea; Kiwi took ‘Te Kaora’ and settled him at Pouewe (Kāwhia township); Te Kanawa took ‘Tamete’ and settled him at Maketū (near the above). ‘Hamukete’ married Tiria, Te Wherowhero’s daughter; ‘Te Rangi-tera’ married Heihei, Te Tuhi’s daughter, and ‘Tamete’ married Rangi-ātea, niece of Te Kanawa. . . . They would be appropriated by these various chiefs in order that they might, through them, obtain arms, etc, and with whom to barter their flax.<sup>55</sup>

The senior Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Apakura rangatira Haupōkia Te Pakarū and Te Waru, of southern Kāwhia, also travelled to Sydney in 1830. They too returned with traders, including Joseph Montefiore, a Sydney-based merchant who established stations at Ahuahu on the Kāwhia harbour, and further south at Mōkau.<sup>56</sup> Haupōkia’s descendant, Moepatu Borell, told us that his tupuna made land available on the coast for inland Ngāti Maniapoto hapū to live on so they too could benefit from the trade.<sup>57</sup>

These accounts of the arrival of Pākehā traders to Te Rohe Pōtae speak to the customary nature of the initial interactions. Māori recognised the economic opportunities the newcomers represented and, as a result, rangatira claimed (or appropriated) them so as to access the material benefits their presence would provide. The traders were not simply placed in proximity to Māori but were incorporated into their tribal structures, often through marriage. These relationships between tangata whenua and manuhiri and the obligations and privileges they created were governed by tikanga.

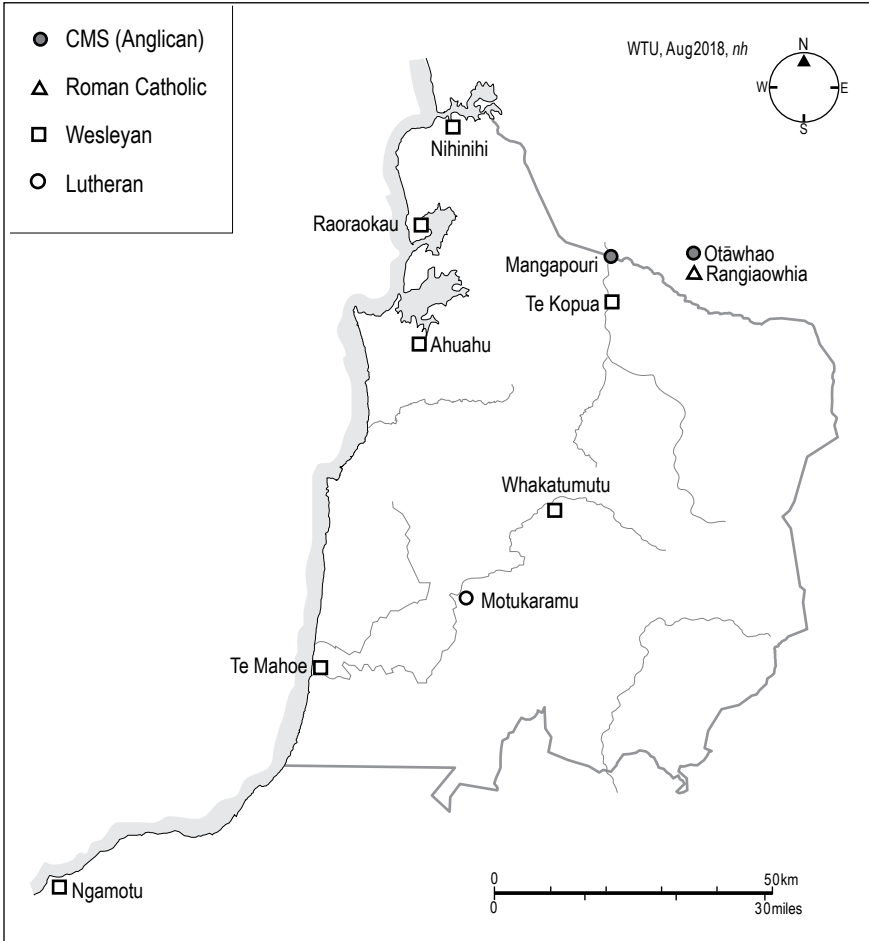

The first missionaries arrived in the inquiry district in the mid-1830s. In 1834, the Church Missionary Society (CMS) established a station inland at Mangapōuri, at the junction of the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers. The WMS established stations at Ahuahu, on the south side of Kāwhia Harbour, and Whāingaroa in 1835. The Wesleyan stations were vacated between 1836 and 1838, after a dispute between the CMS and the WMS regarding their respective spheres of operation. The CMS also abandoned the region, but returned to the Waipā area in 1839, establishing a station at Ōtāwhao. On the Wesleyans’ return, the Ahuahu station was expanded and the Whāingaroa station was relocated to Nihinihi, on the southern shore of Whāingaroa Harbour.<sup>58</sup> WMS operations expanded further in the early 1840s with the founding of the Raoraokauere station at Aotea Harbour and the 55. Document A98 (Thorne), p 212.

56. Document A26, pp 10, 13; doc A70, pp 17, 28; doc A110 (Joseph), p 435.

57. Document 11(e) (Borell), pp 2–3; transcript 4.1.10, pp 150–151 (Moepatu Borell, hearing week four, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

58. Document A70, pp 18–20; doc A26, pp 21–22.

Map 4.2 Mission stations in the inquiry district

Te Kōpua station at Waipā in about 1840, and stations at Te Māhoe, Mōkau and Whakatumu on the upper reaches of the Mōkau River, both in about 1843. Around 1844, a Lutheran mission was established at Motukaramu, also inland on the Mōkau River, and a Roman Catholic mission was set up at Rangaiowhia.<sup>59</sup>

Like traders, missionaries were welcomed to Te Rohe Pōtae, in recognition of the benefits their presence offered Māori. Although the missionaries retained some independence, they were expected to make gifts to their hosts. And while the missionaries' primary goal was to disseminate the Christian faith, they, too, established mutually beneficial relationships: missionaries built homes, schools, and churches, and they provided access to Christianity, literacy, and new agricultural techniques.<sup>60</sup>

59. Document A70, pp 68–70, 94, 105; doc A28 (Thomas), p 29; doc A23, p 128.

4.3.2 Evidence of Māori understandings

The Tribunal received a range of evidence relating to Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions. This included claimant kōrero about the relationships and arrangements formed between their tūpuna and Pākehā traders and missionaries. It also included documentary evidence from the time of the transactions, and in the 1840s and 1850s, at the time they were investigated by the land claims commissions

According to claimant Thomas Moke, ‘any land rights given to settlers or missionaries prior to 1840 would have been non-permanent arrangements based on tikanga.’ This was because the mana of the land was placed first and foremost with the rangarira for safekeeping and protection, an obligation embodied in the saying ‘e tuku mana, e tuku tangata, e tuku whenua’, which describes the ceding of authority over people and land.<sup>61</sup> Mr Moke continued:

I am of the view that our tūpuna at Kāwhia were working under customary concepts of tuku whenua and allocating usage rights. Even if there was a sense or growing knowledge of permanent alienation of land at the time (which I think personally was highly unlikely), how could these rangatira go against the wishes of Te Wherowhero and alienate the land under his mana by the very people he put there to keep the land safe?<sup>62</sup>

Mr Moke considered reciprocity to be a fundamental element of these transactions, and that occupation depended on ongoing agreement.<sup>63</sup> This applied, for example, if there was any change in the purpose for which gifted land was used. And if the newcomers left, the expectation was that the land would be returned to the original owners.<sup>64</sup>

Claimant Verna Tuteao gave a similar account of tuku whenua arrangements entered into by Ngāti Mahuta around Kāwhia Harbour with missionaries and other early Pākehā.<sup>65</sup> With regard to the placement of Te Kaora at Pouewe, Ms Tuteao described it as a Ngāti Mahuta expression of ‘kaua e tuku te whenua’, meaning that the land was not intended to be relinquished permanently.<sup>66</sup> Use of the land continued for as long as the relationship remained beneficial. It was also expected that the recipient of the land would remain loyal to the rangatira who had placed them there, in this case Kiwi Te Roto of Ngāti Mahuta. This transaction

60. Document A23, pp 34–35; doc A70, pp 19–20; doc A26, pp 20–39.

61. Transcript 4.1.9, pp 285–286 (Thomas Moke, hearing week 3, Maketu Marae, 5 March 2013).

62. Transcript 4.1.9, p 286.

63. Transcript 4.1.9, p 310.

64. Transcript 4.1.9, p 317.

65. Transcript 4.1.9, p 41 (Verna Tuteao, hearing week 3, Maketu Marae, 4 March 2013).

66. Transcript 4.1.9, p 75.

formed the basis of OLC 1353 and was a matter of some tension between Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Mahuta (see section 4.4.2).

Evidence in support of these understandings comes from Joseph Montefiore, who established trading interests at Kāwhia in 1830. Montefiore gave evidence before the House of Commons in 1838 on arrangements between Māori and Europeans over land. Speaking to the nature of his land transaction with the chief Haupōkia Te Pakarū, Montefiore explained: ‘when I was at Kaffea [sic] I obtained a Grant of Land from a Chief, which I have here; it is a very small Quantity; it is under a Condition that I should establish a mercantile Establishment there. I did not purchase it; it was given to me.’<sup>67</sup>

Montefiore clearly indicated that the rights he acquired at Kāwhia were not in the nature of a purchase but were rather a gift contingent upon his obligation to establish a trading post on the land. Although the merchant had the arrangement recorded in writing by one of his crew, he considered that written deeds were meaningless for Māori: ‘it is merely making a Man put his Signature to an Instrument he knows nothing about.’<sup>68</sup> On the other hand, he was sure that Haupōkia understood their oral arrangement ‘perfectly’, not least because Montefiore had brought ‘a large Quantity of Trade’ to Kāwhia.<sup>69</sup>

Montefiore saw himself as having acquired a lifetime interest at Kāwhia. He said that, if he left for three or four years and then returned, he would be allowed to live there again and that, ‘though only a Gift’, the land was ‘to be considered as mine for ever.’<sup>70</sup> Yet Montefiore was also in no doubt that his occupation of land at Kāwhia was on Māori terms. He stated that, if a dispute arose between Māori and those Europeans who had settled amongst them, ‘the Settler would have no Power; he would be obliged to succumb to the Desire of the Natives’. Overall, he described his arrangement with Kāwhia as enduring and functional. Montefiore stated that Māori never molested the trader who was working for him and instead treated him ‘in the best possible way.’<sup>71</sup>

Historian Leanne Boulton observed that trading relationships were further strengthened when newcomers were assimilated into iwi or hapū by marriage. Within this customary context, use-rights could be passed to family members and close associates of the traders, though the tangata whenua would not tolerate the transfer of land to strangers.<sup>72</sup> This distinction was at the heart of opposition prompted by George Charleton’s claim to Pouewe (see section 4.4.2). Charleton based his claim on his purchase of the land from John Vittoria Cowell, who himself claimed the land through marriage to Māta Ritana, as well as on his father’s occupation of the land at Kāwhia. Māta Ritana disputed Charleton’s claim on the basis that she and her whānau retained customary interests in the land. From their

---

67. Joseph Barrow Montefiore, evidence, 6 April 1838 (doc A70, pp 28–29).

68. Joseph Barrow Montefiore, evidence, 6 April 1838 (doc A70, p 29).

69. Joseph Barrow Montefiore, evidence, 6 April 1838 (doc A70, p 29).

70. Document A70, p 34.

71. Document A70, p 29.

72. Document A70, pp 33, 437–438.

perspective, the land remained in customary ownership and Cowell possessed use-rights only. He had no right to transact the land with a third party.<sup>73</sup>

These accounts are consistent with the Muriwhenua Land Tribunal's view that the reciprocal expectations that underpinned Māori relationships were reflected in the allocation of land to Pākehā. In the Māori world it was unthinkable that a person could hold land rights without owing corresponding obligations and responsibilities to the community. Land was a communally held asset, but rangatira possessed the authority to allocate use-rights. The rangatira would do so if the manuhiri was a visitor of value, as was often the case with traders or missionaries. Agreement concerning the specific parcel of land was reached and sealed when the manuhiri provided gifts to the rangatira and his people. Ongoing occupation depended on the user's continued contribution to the community's collective welfare.<sup>74</sup> The Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal described this as a mutually beneficial exchange that carried with it the expectation of an ongoing relationship.<sup>75</sup> It is in this way that a tuku whenua can be differentiated from a land sale: in the latter case, land is permanently transferred from one party to another and no enduring relationship is formed.

The Crown in this inquiry argued that the evidence showed that Māori 'understood that pre-Treaty transactions could be of varying natures'. By 1843, when the land claims commissioners began their investigations in the district, counsel said, the evidence suggested those transactions 'were understood by the owners as sales in accordance with the European conception of those transactions.'<sup>76</sup> In support of this view, the Crown placed significance on a statement made by Hamiora, a Māori witness, to the commissioners investigating the Wesleyan claim to Ahuahu (see section 4.4.1). Hamiora was addressing competing claims to the land, one by John Whiteley on behalf of the Wesleyan mission and the other by Montefiore. The Māori owners, Hamiora said, 'sold the land therein described as Kawhia to the Wesleyan Mission several years ago and received for them the payment stated . . . none of this land was ever sold to Mr Montefiore – we allowed an agent to live on it but we kept the land ourselves.'<sup>77</sup>

The Crown said Hamiora's testimony was evidence that Māori understood two distinct forms of transaction during the pre-Treaty period – one involving use-rights and another more akin to permanent sale.<sup>78</sup> It may be that Māori distinguished between these types of transaction. In our view, however, Hamiora's dismissal of Montefiore's claim as inferior to that of the wms does not constitute compelling evidence that Māori regarded the latter as a permanent land sale. Rather, it reflects the growing influence of the Wesleyan mission in Te Rohe Pōtae by the time of the 1843 commission.

73. Document A70, pp 129–130.

74. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 68, 106.

75. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, p 120.

76. Submission 3.4.288, pp 16–17.

77. Document A70, p 71.

78. Submission 3.4.288, pp 16–17.

The lack of evidence of protest by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over the land claims commissions' activities in the 1840s and 1850s was identified by the Crown as further evidence that Māori understood the transactions as permanent alienations.<sup>79</sup> The claimants, in contrast, argued that at the time of the commissions Māori did not see a strong need to protest because they continued to control matters on the ground.<sup>80</sup> The extent and significance of Māori protest against grants of land for pre-Treaty transactions is addressed later in this chapter (see sections 4.1.1.4 and 4.4.2.3). In general terms it is significant that, in the four Wesleyan claims, the original arrangements between tangata whenua and Pākehā remained intact at the time of the investigations. Tellingly, the case that did prompt protest was the Pouewe claim made by George Charleton, who had no part in the original agreement.

Other evidence of interactions between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and Europeans in the inquiry district speaks to the ongoing pre-eminence of tikanga after 1840 (see chapter 3, section 3.4.3.2.3). Cort H Schnackenberg, the Wesleyan missionary at Te Māhoe in Mōkau, recorded this diary entry in 1846:

If I cut down a Manuka tree that may be in my way or any other of no value to the natives, I am often reminded that I ought to have got the consent of the owner of the land or in other words ought to pay for it. . . . If they come to my house, perhaps for no other purpose than to look about or beg, or light their pipes . . . and I tell them not to sit in my way as I am busy, but to go to their work or else spend their idle time in their own places, 'we are in our own place' is the reply.<sup>81</sup>

The settler Thomas Emery was placed in 1845 at Mangamāhoe, near Kakepuku in the north of the inquiry district, by the rangatira Te Oro, an elder of Ngāti Unu and Ngāti Kahu. Each year, Emery would gift a cattle beast to the whānau as payment for grazing his cows on the land. He paid for three years, but the gift was discontinued after he married Rangiamohia, the daughter of Merekihereka, another local rangatira.<sup>82</sup>

These examples concern relationships formed in the years after the Treaty of Waitangi was signed. They demonstrate that, even in areas where cross-cultural contact dated back more than a decade, Māori law and custom continued to hold sway. In Mōkau and Mangamāhoe, as elsewhere in Te Rohe Pōtae, land remained a communally owned asset, and European access to both the land and its resources continued to be governed by Māori expectations. The Hetet, Ormsby, Searancke, Turner, Hughes, Eketone, Barton, and other Pākehā-Māori whānau provide further evidence that Europeans in the inquiry district lived, in the main, on Māori terms at least until the 1880s.<sup>83</sup>

---

79. Submission 3.4.288, pp 11–12.

80. Submission 3.4.116, pp 12–14.

81. Document A23, p 129.

82. Document A110, p 409.

83. Document A110, pp 392–422.

The Crown submitted that pre-Treaty transactions in Te Rohe Pōtae should be understood as akin to those in the Hauraki inquiry district, which the Tribunal found ‘did not take place in a wholly customary environment.’<sup>84</sup> On balance, we prefer the view of claimant counsel that, in Te Rohe Pōtae, custom prevailed. In Hauraki, the Tribunal pointed to the growing influence of Pākehā and the effects of political instability as factors that altered Māori understandings of exchange.<sup>85</sup> We accept that, in parts of this inquiry district, interactions with traders and missionaries appear to have led to some appreciation of European expectations of exchange. But this was limited by the tiny Pākehā presence in the inquiry district. This continued to be the situation in the early 1840s, when the land claims commission began its investigations. It was also the case that in this inquiry district there had been considerable unrest in the recent past, at Kāwhia in particular (see chapter 2, section 2.5.2.4). In Te Rohe Pōtae, however, these events had enhanced rather than weakened the mana of rangatira such as Te Wherowhero, Te Awaitaia, and Haupōkia. In our view this only strengthened their ability to engage with the Pākehā arrivals on their own terms.

4.4 THE OPERATION OF THE LAND CLAIMS COMMISSIONS

The land claims commissions operated in the inquiry district in two distinct phases:

- ▶ Commissioners Godfrey and Richmond heard the four Wesleyan mission claims (OLC 946, OLC 947, OLC 948, and OLC 1040) in June 1843.
- ▶ Commissioner Bell heard George Charleton’s claim to Pouewe (OLC 1353) in July 1858.

The parties to this inquiry expressed strong disagreement over the commissions’ operations. The claimants argued that the Crown’s regime for investigating old land claims breached Treaty principles because it did not require the commissioners to inquire into Māori understandings of the transactions or Māori customary land rights. The commissioners’ role, the claimants said, was limited to assessing the accuracy of the information provided. The claimants said the commissions’ processes were unfair as the hearings were poorly notified and were located at an unreasonable distance from Te Rohe Pōtae; Māori witnesses were not given independent advice; Māori right holders were inadequately represented in the process; and the commissioners relied on insufficient and flawed evidence in making decisions to recommend Crown grants.<sup>86</sup>

The Crown denied that its involvement in the land claims commissions in Te Rohe Pōtae breached Treaty principles. It said its old land claims regime included scope for recognition of Māori custom and that the commissioners were empowered to inquire into the intentions of the parties to pre-Treaty transactions. It disputed the suggestion that the commissioners assumed that all transactions

---

84. Submission 3.4.288, p 11.

85. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 153.

86. Submission 3.4.116, pp 9–12.

were sales; rather, commissioners sought the confirmation of interested parties, including Māori. The Crown described the commissions' hearings as fair and asserted that Māori right holders and Māori evidence were adequately represented throughout the process. The lack of opposition to four of the five old land claims pursued in the inquiry district demonstrated, in the Crown's view, that the commissions' processes were considered acceptable by Māori at the time.<sup>87</sup>

4.4.1 The Wesleyan mission claims (OLC 946, OLC 947, OLC 948, and OLC 1040)

In June 1843, commissioners Matthew Richmond and Edward Godfrey investigated four old land claims concerning land in Te Rohe Pōtae. All involved land claimed by, or in association with, the WMS.

4.4.1.1 The Godfrey and Richmond commission

The legal basis for a land claims commission was established by the governor of New South Wales, George Gipps, who oversaw the passage of the New Zealand Land Claims Act in August 1840.<sup>88</sup> Colonel Edward Godfrey and Captain Matthew Richmond were appointed as commissioners in September 1840, and notice of their appointment was published in New Zealand in December. The New South Wales legislation was re-enacted by New Zealand's Legislative Council as the Land Claims Ordinance 1841, following the establishment of New Zealand as a separate Crown colony in May that year.<sup>89</sup>

Section 3 of the Land Claims Ordinance 1841 empowered the governor to appoint commissioners to 'hear[,] examine and report' on pre-Treaty transactions, and stated it was 'expedient and necessary' that 'an inquiry be instituted into the mode in which such claims to land have been acquired, the circumstances under which such claims may be and are founded, and also to ascertain the extent and situation of the same'.

Section 6 required the commissioners to ascertain the price paid for the land in question; the date payment was made; the manner and circumstances of payment; and the amount of land acquired. In cases where the commissioners found the land to 'have been obtained on equitable terms from the said chiefs or aboriginal inhabitants,' they were to recommend the issuing of a Crown grant to the claimant under section 2.<sup>90</sup>

To investigate claims, the commissioners were empowered under section 9 to set and advertise the date of claim hearings. Hearings were to be advertised in the New Zealand Government Gazette or in newspapers and such notifications were deemed 'sufficient warning and summons to any claimant or opponent under this Ordinance'. Section 9 also provided that, during the hearings, the commissioners were to take sworn evidence from witnesses. If the commissioners deemed Māori

87. Submission 3.4.288, pp 22–32.

88. For a discussion of the establishment of the land claims commission, see Duncan Moore, Barry Rigby, and Matthew Russell, Old Land Claims, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahaua Whanui Series (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1997), pp 14–17.

89. Document A70, p 52.

90. Document A70, pp 55–56.

witnesses incapable of understanding the oath, they were to give the oral testimony 'such credit as it may be entitled to from corroborating or other circumstances'.<sup>91</sup>

The legislation gave clear instructions to the commissioners on matters of process, but it paid little attention to the nature of land ownership in New Zealand. The Land Claims Ordinance 1841 largely re-enacted Gipps's New Zealand Land Claims Act, which was patterned on an Act developed in New South Wales in the 1830s to address property rights derived from the sale of land by squatters to other settlers. Thus, the Land Claims Ordinance said nothing about indigenous tenure and land rights, and assumed transactions in which both parties held the same assumptions regarding the transfer of land.<sup>92</sup>

Despite being silent on matters of customary tenure, the legislation did allow the commissioners some flexibility in their decision-making. Section 6 called for the commissioners' investigations to 'be guided by the real justice and good conscience of the case without regard to legal forms and solemnities'. The legislation also entertained the possibility that pre-Treaty transactions were not necessarily purchases. Under section 2 the ordinance applied to anyone who:

Held or claimed by virtue of purchases or pretend purchases gifts or pretended gifts conveyances or pretended conveyances leases or pretended leases agreements or other titles, either mediately [through an agent] or immediately from the chiefs or other individuals or individual of the aboriginal tribes inhabiting the said Colony.

Godfrey and Richmond also received instructions from Gipps in October 1840 regarding the nature of their inquiries. The protector of Aborigines, or a representative on his behalf, was to attend all their hearings in order to protect Māori rights and interests. A formal deed of alienation would not be needed before recommending a Crown grant: 'proof of conveyance according to the custom of the country and in the manner deemed valid by the inhabitants is all that is required'. Later instructions from Gipps added that a transaction should be deemed valid when at least two chiefs 'admit the sale'.<sup>93</sup>

The legislation under which the first commissioners operated did not, therefore, overtly address matters of customary rights and exchange. This omission led the Muriwhenua Land Tribunal to conclude that the Land Claims Ordinance 1841 was 'insufficient, in all the circumstances, to compel the full examination that was needed if Maori law was to be upheld, and Maori interests protected'.<sup>94</sup> We accept that the Land Claims Ordinance and Gipps's instructions did not prevent the commissioners exploring Māori custom and law. But nor did they direct the commissioners to do so. The Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga obligated the Crown to ensure that tikanga and Māori understandings of these transactions be addressed. The Crown's failure to do so meant the responsibility for establishing

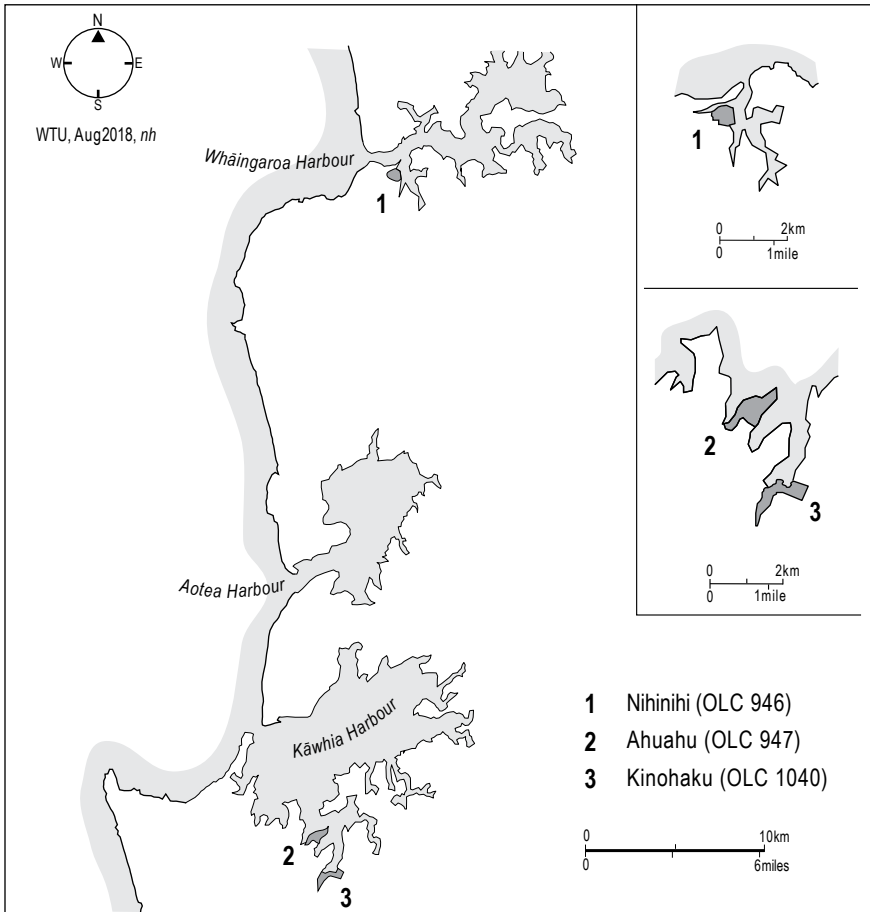

---

91. Document A70, p 57.

92. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 122–124.

93. Document A70, p 58.

94. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 122.

Map 4.3: The Wesleyan mission claims whether Māori clearly understood pre-Treaty transactions as full and final alienations relied almost entirely upon the efficacy of the commissioners' inquiries.

4.4.1.2 Background to the claims

The Wesleyan missionaries' relationships with tangata whenua included making arrangements over land. They made four claims for land acquired at Kāwhia and at Whāingaroa in 1834, 1839, and 1840.<sup>95</sup> Several of these transactions involved the Kāwhia-based Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Apakura rangatira Haupōkia Te Pakarū and Te Waru, who by this time had also established relationships with European traders on the west coast of the district. Haupōkia in particular developed close ties to the Wesleyan mission at Kāwhia. He and his people built the mission house at Waiharakeke.<sup>96</sup>

95. Document A70, p 67.

The four Wesleyan mission claims were based on a series of purchase deeds, of which 11 were presented to the land claims commission in 1843. Multiple deeds usually indicated the addition of adjoining pieces of land to the purchase area. Some were signed only by Haupōkia or Te Waru, whereas others had 10 or more Māori signatories. The earliest deed, for Ahuahu, Kāwhia, was dated 20 November 1834, and two more were dated to the early to mid-1830s. The remainder were dated between April 1839 and February 1840.<sup>97</sup> It is unclear how the dates on which the deeds were drawn up and signed aligned with when the original transactions took place. However, the timing of most of the deeds close to 1840 suggests that, as elsewhere in New Zealand, impending British annexation caused the Wesleyan missionaries and associated Pākehā to hurriedly cement transactions with Māori in order to secure title to land at and around the mission stations.

Of the 11 deeds, six appear to be written in te reo Māori, and five in English.<sup>98</sup> It is difficult to assess how well Māori who signed the deeds understood their content. Most of the deeds contain a mark alongside the names of each of the Māori signatories, which suggests they were illiterate in the writing sense, but whether this also means they could not read is unknown. We do not know whether the te reo deeds were read aloud to those Māori who may not have been able to read, or if the English deeds were translated.

4.4.1.2.1 NIHINIHI, WHĀINGAROA (OLC 946)

The Nihinihi claim for land on the Opoturu River at Whāingaroa was based on a deed signed on 27 February 1839. The deed was written in te reo Māori (most likely by the Wesleyan missionary John Whiteley)<sup>99</sup>, and was later translated by protector of Aborigines Thomas Forsaith when it came before the commission in 1843.

The deed was signed by Ngāti Māhanga rangatira Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia, together with the missionary James Wallis. Hakopa, Hone Kingi, Warekura, and Mahikai were described as witnesses ('Ko nga kai titiro'), however the text of the deed suggests that they were in fact parties to the transaction:

Tenei ano maua, ko o maua ingoa i raro nei ka tukua atu nei to maua whenua Ko te Nihinihi, ki Te Hohaiate Mihanere Weteriana me o ratou wanaunga hei wenua mo ratou ake tonu atu.

96. Document A97, p137; doc s21(b) (Jensen), p19; doc H15 (Kaati), p6; doc A110, p435; doc A26, p17; transcript 4.1.7, p100 (John Kaati, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho marae, 6 November 2012); doc s55 (Borell), pp13–14.

97. Document A70(a) (Boulton document bank), vol 2, pp817, 826–837, 847–848, 888–897.

98. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp817, 826–837, 847–848, 888–897.

99. Several of the Wesleyan old land claim deeds appear to be written in a dialect common to certain areas, including Taranaki and Hokianga, where the 'h' is dropped from words such as 'wenua' and 'wanaunga'. This suggests they were written by John Whiteley, who learnt te reo Māori at Mangungu (Hokianga).

We whose names are undersigned do hereby agree to deliver Our land called The Nihinihi to the Wesleyan Missionary Society and their Successors, a place for them for ever.

The payment for the lands, waters and all things thereon ('ko nga utu mo taua kainga me nga wai me nga mea katoa o taua wenua koia enei') was 20 blankets, one piece of printed cloth, 11 handkerchiefs, 24 spades, 24 axes, 20 hatchets, 36 razors, 36 knives, 10 iron pots, 300 fish hooks, 320 figs of tobacco, and 100 pipes. The deed concluded:

Kua roiro mai enei mea ki a maua i tenei ra hei utu mo taua wenua. Koia ka tukua rawatia atu nei to maua nei kainga ki a te Warihi mo te Hohaiate Mihanere Weteriana ake ake ake.

We have received the said articles this day as payment for the said land; and in consideration of the above we now fully deliver up our land as aforesaid to Mr Wallis for the Wesleyan Missionary Society for ever.<sup>100</sup>

4.4.1.2.2 AHUAHU, KĀWHIA (OLC 947)

Ahuahu was where the main Wesleyan mission station at Kāwhia was located. There were five deeds, three in English and two in te reo Māori. Again the translations appear to have been made later by Forsaith.

- ▶ The first, described as 'a memorandum of an agreement', was signed on 20 November 1834 and written in English. The deed was signed by Haupōkia Te Pakarū and the missionary William White and witnessed by four Europeans. This transaction concerned a parcel of land called Ahuahu, which bordered lands belonging to Te Waru and Makahu, as well as Uwatahi Bay and the Waiharakeke River. Payment included 14 axes, four iron pots, four blankets, 50 pipes, and 18 pounds of tobacco.<sup>101</sup>
- ▶ The second deed, also described as 'a memorandum of an agreement' and written only in English, was entered into on 24 November 1834. The signatories were Te Waru and William White, and there were five European and Māori witnesses. The parcel of land concerned in this transaction was known as Tawiti. The payment was listed as exactly the same as that of the first deed.<sup>102</sup>
- ▶ The third and fourth deeds, signed on 12 April and 1 August 1839, concerned land called Te Tauranga, bordered by Uwatahi Creek, the mission station at Ahuahu, the Waiharakeke River, and Te Kume. The April deed was written in English. It was signed by Te Au, Wero (a woman), and Tatata, and witnessed by Hakopa Tauranga and William Johnston. Payment included six axes, six

100. Document A70(a), vol 2, p 817.

101. Document A70(a), vol 2, p 837.

102. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 835–836.

spades, six blankets, and 18 yards of printed cloth. The August deed was written in te reo Māori, and was evidently a further transaction for the same land, Te Tauranga, between John Whiteley and the rangatira Haupōkia and Te Raku. As with the Nihinihi deed, these chiefs agreed to ‘deliver our land’ (‘ka tukua atu nei to matou wenua’) to the wms ‘and their heirs or successors to be by them possessed from henceforth and for ever’ (‘me o ratou wanaunga hei wenua mo ratou ake tonu atu’). Payment included £1, four blankets, four shirts, two frocks, four knives, four pairs of scissors, four razors, four shaving boxes, four pipes, and 40 figs of tobacco.<sup>103</sup>

- ▶ The fifth deed was dated 24 April 1839, and was written in te reo Māori. It was signed by 13 Māori, including Te Waru and the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Rangituatea. In this case, the signatories agreed to ‘sell and deliver up these our said lands to the Rev. J. Whiteley’ (‘ka hokona rawatia atu o matou nei kainga ki a Te Waitere’) The lands in question were situated west of Tawiti and included land known as Tamoe, Te Tutu, Pareparenga, Waotu, Para, Kume, Nukutauri, Heronui, Pukehinau, Ratahi, Te Tahinga ‘me era atu ingoa nohi-nohi’ (‘and other names of inferior note’). Payment for these lands included: 1 Camlet Cloak, Receipt. 20 Blankets, 20 Spades, 20 Axes, 20 Trowsers, 20 Shirts, 20 Handkerchiefs, 20 Razors, 20 Knives, 16 Scissors, 16 Tin Pots and 400 Fish Hooks.<sup>104</sup>

4.4.1.2.3 AWAROA, KĀWHIA (OLC 948)

The Awaroa deed was written in te reo Māori and signed on 3 January 1840 by Te Waru and John Whiteley, witnessed by James Wallis and Edward Meurant. It was later translated by Forsaith. The land in this transaction went by the names of Te Tekoteko and Te Rawiri and was stated to be at Awaroa, Kāwhia, near the villages of England, or Huwihuwiawa, and Paul. Te Waru agreed to ‘fully deliver up the said land’ (‘Koia ka tukua rawatia atu aua kainga’) in exchange for £2, two blankets, and two razors.<sup>105</sup>

4.4.1.2.4 KINOHAKU, KĀWHIA (OLC 1040)

The fourth claim was made by William Johnston, a former wms employee. It was based on four deeds, two in English and two in te reo Māori:

- ▶ The first deed was signed on 30 January 1836 by Haupōkia and Johnston and was written in English. It was witnessed by Whiteley, Meurant, Opataia, Wahanui, Te Arai, and Te Tuhituhi and began:

Know all men by these presents that I Haukopia do hereby sell and fully deliver up to William Johnston, and his heirs and successors for ever, the several parcels of land known by the names of Puketutu, Hamakuku, Tutemanawa, Rangiatea,

103. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 826–827, 833–834.

104. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 828–831.

105. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 847–848.

Arohamanu and other names, lying at the head of a branch of the Waiharakeke River . . . known by the name of Kotekimu.<sup>106</sup>

The payment comprised a coat, a handkerchief, four duck frocks, four trousers, four shirts, four axes, two razors, two knives, 25 pipes, and 20 pounds of tobacco.

- ▶ The second deed was signed by Haukopia, Johnston, and Ahuriri on 8 October 1839, was witnessed by Whiteley and Warareka Eketone. It was also written in English and stated that Haupōkia did 'hereby sell and fully deliver up' lands to the south of the earlier transaction known as Kaipoku, Witenga, and Puketoa together with 'their Timber, Tapued places and their appurtenances'. Payment comprised £2, six blankets, six axes, six spades, five iron pots, six knives, six razors, four handkerchiefs, and 12 pounds of powder.<sup>107</sup>
- ▶ The third deed was written in te reo Māori and was signed on 18 January 1840 by Johnston, Haupōkia and 22 other Māori, witnessed by Whiteley. The deed stated, 'ka hokona rawatia atu o matou nei kainga ki a Wiremu Honetona' (translated as 'we are selling fully our places to William Johnston'). These places were listed as Kopounai, Te Rua, Mangareporepo, Te Takapau, Te Kume, Kuranui, Te Kata, Te Ratau, Pairoa, Waikotuku, Wahimate, Poutaha, Moari, Kaori, Pourewa, Awapune, Puketutu, Puiamanuka, Pamamaku, Rapaki, and Te Titaha, adjacent to Puketutu. The payment (ko nga utu) was 10 iron pots, 20 spades, 20 axes, 20 hatchets, 200 figs of tobacco, 20 pipes, one cask of powder, 10 gowns, 10 shirts, 20 blankets, 10 razors, and four tinder boxes.<sup>108</sup>
- ▶ The final deed, also written in te reo Māori, was signed on 13 February 1840. Haupōkia and Johnston signed, together with nine other Māori, once again witnessed by Whiteley. The deed began: 'Tenei ano matou te tuku nei i o matou nei whenua' (translated as 'Here are we delivering up (or selling) our lands'). The lands in question were named Ngataumutu, Pukeokiokinga, Ruatupapaku, Mamaku, Taumanuka, Hapua, Tirohangakaipuke, Pokanoa, Pukematai, Horopari, Hiwaka, Kahakaharoa, 'me etahi atu ingoa' ('and other (minor) names'). Payment included four cartridge boxes, one gun, 10 gowns, 20 hatchets, one cask of powder, 20 axes, 20 blankets, 10 iron pots, 10 tinder boxes, 10 spades, 10 knives, 10 razors, 20 pipes, 200 figs of tobacco, and four pieces of soap. The deed concluded: 'Ka tukua rawatia te whenua, nga rakau nga wai nga mea katoa ka riro rawa riro tonu ake ake ake.' (Translated as: 'We fully deliver up the lands, the trees, the waters, all things above and below, all things, all (are) gone fully, gone for ever.')<sup>109</sup>

106. Document A70(a), vol 2, p 888.

107. Document A70(a), vol 2, p 889.

108. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 890–893.

109. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 894–897.

4.4.1.3 The commission investigates, June 1843

Hearings for all four claims were held in Auckland in early June 1843. On 22 March that year, the New Zealand Gazette had provided notice in English that the three wms claims would be heard by the commissioners on 3–4 April. However, the hearings did not take place until 3–5 June, with Johnston's claim being heard on 7 June.<sup>110</sup> The fact that hearings were held at such a distance from the land in question was remarked on by one witness, Tawito, who said that the chiefs he represented, Haupōkia and Ahuriri, were 'afraid to come so far from home'.<sup>111</sup>

John Whiteley, the Kāwhia-based Wesleyan missionary, attended all four hearings, appearing on behalf of the wms and William Johnston. At the hearings, Whiteley detailed the nature of the transactions, specified the money and goods paid for the land, and presented deeds to substantiate this detail.<sup>112</sup>

The commissioners also questioned four Māori witnesses. Two, Hakopa and Waka, appeared before the commissioners to confirm the sale of Nihinihi to the wms. On behalf of the Ngāti Māhanga rangatira Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia, Hakopa declared that the deed was accurate and that the purchase price was paid. Waka represented himself and confirmed the same detail.<sup>113</sup> The two other witnesses, Hamiora and Tawito, appeared in respect of the three Kāwhia claims. Hamiora and Tawito were recorded as confirming that they had signed, or witnessed the signing of, the deeds; that payment was received; that the boundaries were correct; and that those who had transacted the land had the right to do so.<sup>114</sup> Gipps had instructed that the protector of Aborigines or his deputy should attend all hearings to provide independent advice and support to Māori witnesses. Thomas Forsaith, who in 1843 was promoted from sub-protector to protector of Aborigines, guaranteed the various deeds to be true copies or true translations. The records of what the Māori witnesses said are written translations by Forsaith.<sup>115</sup>

Our understanding of the evidence of the Māori witnesses is limited to Forsaith's English-language summaries. Based on this record, it appears that the Māori witnesses were each asked to confirm the detail provided by the claimants and outlined in the deeds. There is no evidence that the commissioners asked the witnesses to clarify their understandings of the original transactions or confirm that all customary right holders consented to the arrangements. Nor is there evidence to indicate that the commissioners questioned the relationship between the purchase deeds and the claimants' original arrangements with tangata whenua.<sup>116</sup> It appears that the deeds were taken at face value.

110. Document A70, pp 68, 84. Boulton found no evidence that notice was given for the Johnston claim.

111. Document A70, p 82.

112. Document A70, pp 69–71, 84–85.

113. Document A70, pp 69–70.

114. Document A70, pp 71–72, 85.

115. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 816–845, 887–904; A H McLintock (ed), An Encyclopaedia of New Zealand (Wellington: Government Printer, 1966), vol 1, p 732.

116. Document A70, pp 75–79, 86.

In our inquiry, the descendants of Wetini Mahikai (Wai 2345) raised issues concerning the text of the purchase deed produced in support of the WMS claim to land at Nihinihi (OLC 946).<sup>117</sup> Claimants noted that the deed, written in te reo Māori, refers to Ngāti Mahanga chief Wiremu Nera Te Awataia as the sole Māori alienor, and that the deed also refers to some of the chiefs who received payment for the land – including the claimants’ tupuna, Wetini Mahikai – as ‘kaititiro’, or witnesses, rather than as sellers.<sup>118</sup>

There is no evidence that the commissioners identified or sought to resolve these inconsistencies. It seems clear to us that, if the commissioners had undertaken their task under legislation that required a proper inquiry into customary interests, these problems would have been uncovered and resolved. In our view, the correct way to address contested claims to land would have been to hold an open process accessible to all Māori who lived in the area. For the reasons we have set out, the Crown’s legislative regime limited the possibility of such an inquiry taking place. It was made less likely still by the location of the hearings in Auckland, and the limitations of the notification process.

The claimants also questioned the commissioners’ use of a pre-printed template form in their report on the Wesleyan claims.<sup>119</sup> The claimants argued the language used in the template report was evidence that the commissioners did not inquire into the nature of the transactions, and instead sought to simply confirm them as valid sales. The template form included a space to identify the name of the ‘sellers’ and called on the commissioners to confirm that the claimant had ‘made a bona fide purchase from the Native Chiefs.’ Furthermore, in the space beneath where the names of alienors were entered, the template form noted ‘a deed of sale was executed by the above-named chiefs and others, and they had admitted the payment they received, and the alienation of the Land.’<sup>120</sup>

4.4.1.4 Outcomes of the investigation

The commissioners reported on all four claims on 1 July 1843. In each case they recommended the award of a Crown grant.<sup>121</sup> In the case of William Johnston (OLC 1040), the commissioners initially recommended that he be awarded 232 acres. This comprised the 150 acres represented by the deeds signed in 1836 and 1839 and a one-acre-per-pound award for the 500 acres Johnston claimed to have purchased for goods valued at £82 following the Crown’s January 1840 proclamation.<sup>122</sup> The award was subsequently reduced to 118 acres 2 roods 37 perches when the land represented by the 1836 and 1839 deeds was surveyed and found to comprise only 36 acres rather than the claimed 150 acres. A Crown grant was issued to Johnston for this amount in July 1848.<sup>123</sup> Crown grants for the three WMS claims

117. Submission 3.4.139, pp 8–12.

118. Submission 3.4.139, pp 8–9; doc M17 (Tuteao), pp 7–9; doc M17(a) (Tuteao appendices), p 2.

119. Submission 3.4.249(c), p 25; submission 3.4.139, p 10.

120. Document A70, p 77.

121. Document A70, pp 73, 87.

122. Document A60 (Berghan), pp 24–25; doc A70, pp 87–88.

123. Document A70, pp 89–91.

were not issued until November 1855. The Ahuahu and Awaroa claims at Kāwhia (OLC 947 and OLC 948) were awarded in their entirety, representing 160 acres and 4 acres respectively. The 90-acre Nihinihi claim for OLC 946 was initially awarded to the WMS in full, though for reasons that are unclear this was reduced to 76 acres in 1862. In total, the commission's investigations into the four claims by the WMS and William Johnston resulted in the award of Crown grants amounting to 358 acres 2 roods 37 perches.<sup>124</sup>

With one minor exception, we did not receive evidence of Māori opposition to the Wesleyan claims, either during the commission's 1843 investigations or thereafter.<sup>125</sup> There are several possible explanations for this. One is that, as the Crown argued, Māori did not object to the transactions. As noted earlier, in each case the original arrangements between tangata whenua and Pākehā remained intact at the time the claims were investigated. However, the fact that the hearings were poorly advertised and held in Auckland may have meant that some right holders were unaware of the commission's processes. In any case, the paperwork for the award of the Crown grants took up to 12 years to complete. In the meantime, as far as Māori were concerned, little would likely have changed on the ground. This contrasts with George Charleton's claim to Pouewe, which involved two settlers whose presence was not sanctioned by all tangata whenua, and whose claims provoked significant Māori opposition.

4.4.2 George Charleton's claim at Pouewe (OLC 1353)

The fifth old land claim investigated in the inquiry district was OLC 1353, a 44-acre block at Pouewe, Kāwhia, claimed by George Charleton and heard by Commissioner Francis Dillon Bell in 1858. The commission reported on Charleton's claim in July 1864.

4.4.2.1 The Bell commission

In presiding over Charleton's claim to Pouewe, Commissioner Bell operated under a different legislative regime than his predecessors. The Land Claims Settlement Act 1856 retained many elements of the earlier legislation, but its overall effect was to further limit the scope for commissioners to investigate matters of custom and the intentions behind pre-Treaty transactions.<sup>126</sup> For example, section 25 of the Act defined old land claims as claims 'arising under purchases made from the Natives' before 14 January 1840. This was a departure from the Land Claims Ordinance 1841, which allowed for the possibility that pre-Treaty transactions were not necessarily purchases.<sup>127</sup>

124. Document A70, p 73.

125. In 1854, the missionary John Whiteley reported that a Māori man named Paora had hinted he would 'try to disturb' Johnston's claim at Kāwhia, which Whiteley called 'a case of honourable purchase long since settled by Crown title'. It is not clear what caused this dispute or how it was resolved: doc A70, p 91.

126. Moore, Rigby, and Russell, Old Land Claims, p 41.

127. Document A70, pp 64–65.

Section 25 required the commissioners to determine the amount paid by the claimant; the area of land involved in the claim; and the circumstances in which the payment was made. These terms, too, were narrower than the 1841 ordinance, section 2 of which held it necessary for the commissioners to inquire into ‘the circumstances under which such claims may be and are founded’. Section 39 of the 1856 Act provided that, where the commissioners were satisfied ‘that the Native title is extinguished’, they could recommend that the Crown issue a grant to the claimant.<sup>128</sup> This left open a small window for the commissioners to exercise some discretion in inquiring into the nature of the original pre-Treaty transactions. However, as with the previous regime, the 1856 Act did not explicitly require the commission to consider matters of custom or tikanga Māori. The legislation did not, therefore, improve or rectify the Crown’s omission to direct the land claims commissioners to have regard to Māori understandings of these transactions.

Importantly, by the time Charleton’s claim was ruled on by the commissioner, the Land Claims Extension Act 1858 had been enacted. Among other things, this legislation empowered the commissioner to recommend Crown grants to settlers based on their long-term occupation, effectively removing the requirement that they prove the extinguishment of customary title.<sup>129</sup> This legislation was thus a clear contravention of the Crown’s commitment under article 2 of the Treaty to respect Māori laws and customs relating to their lands.

4.4.2.2 Background to the claim

Pouewe is where Kāwhia township is now located, on the northern side of Kāwhia Harbour. It is a place of great significance to Māori. Claimant evidence described Pouewe’s importance to several iwi and hapū, in particular Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Mahuta, who share close whakapapa connections with common ancestors as well as overlapping land interests in the north-western corner of the inquiry district.<sup>130</sup>

Ngāti Hikairo researcher Frank Thorne recorded that Pouewe was traditionally Ngāti Apakura land but was vested in the Waikato family of Te Uira, who was killed and eaten at the site by Ngāti Toa in reprisal for Te Uira’s own killing of Te Hurinui, a Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Toa rangatira.<sup>131</sup>

In section 4.3, we described how the trader John Cowell senior (Te Kaora) was placed at Pouewe by tangata whenua upon his arrival in Kāwhia in 1829. According to one account, this was done by the Ngāti Mahuta rangatira Kiwi Te Roto (also known as Pihopa, or ‘Bishop’).<sup>132</sup> Cowell senior died in 1839 and his son, John Vittoria Cowell, took over the Pouewe trading post and married Māta Ritana, the half-sister of Wiremu Toetoe Tumohi, a prominent Ngāti Apakura rangatira.<sup>133</sup> On 11 January 1840, John Vittoria Cowell signed a deed with Kiwi, described as ‘chief

128. Document A70, pp 64–65.

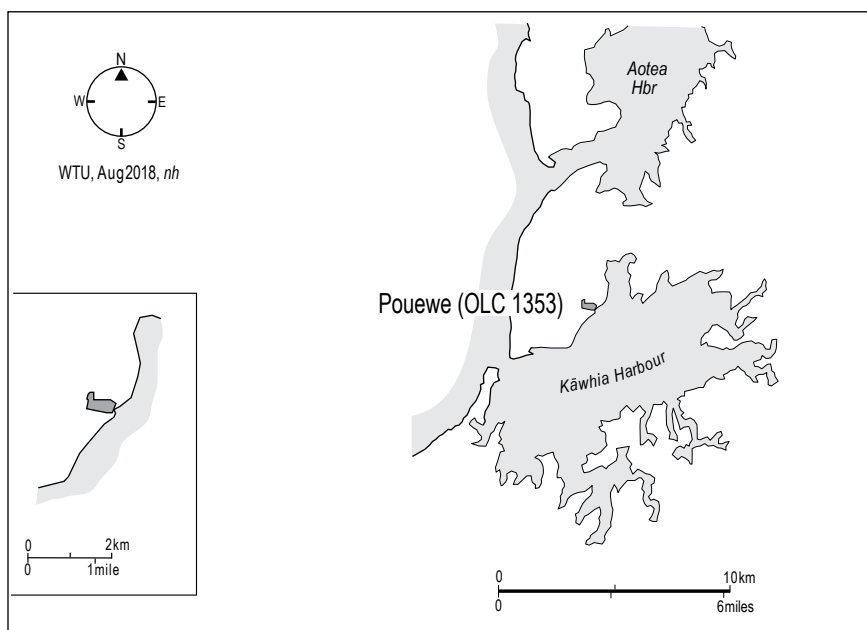

129. Document A70, pp 130–131.

130. Document A98, pp 24, 28, 78.

131. Document A98, pp 211, 235.

132. Document A98, p 212.

133. Document A70, p 36; doc A26, p 16; doc A98, pp 211–212.

Map 4.4: George Charleton's claim at Pouewe of the Tribe of Waikato, in which he purported to purchase 20,000 acres in the vicinity of Kāwhia Harbour, including Pouewe. Written in English, the deed listed payment including one cask of tobacco, 40 spades, 40 axes, eight casks of powder, 10 handkerchiefs, 10 blankets, six muskets, a dozen pairs of trousers, a dozen shirts, 1,000 flints, and 1,000 pipes.<sup>134</sup>

In 1843, Cowell travelled to Auckland to attend a land claims commission hearing for another block of land located on the shores of Kāwhia. Cowell and a Sydney-based merchant, Edward Lee, claimed 5,250 acres of land on the southern shores of the harbour, and this claim was scheduled to be heard by the commission on 17 April 1843. To cover his travel to the hearing, Cowell borrowed money from his neighbour, George Charleton. However, he did not arrive in Auckland until after the hearing. Cowell returned to Kāwhia indebted to Charleton and without any award of land.<sup>135</sup>

To satisfy his debt, Cowell signed a second deed with Charleton that purported to sell him 50 acres of land – known as Pouewe – on 11 March 1846. This deed was also written in English, and the payment for the land was £33.<sup>136</sup> Charleton moved to Pouewe, built a house, and cultivated crops. By 1847, however, Charleton had become concerned about his title. According to the missionary John Whiteley, 134. Document A70, p 122; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 972.

135. Document A60, p 23; doc A70, p 36.

136. Document A70, pp 122–123, 127–128.

Charleton was 'aware that he had no legal claim upon the Government for a Crown Title', but he wished to 'throw himself' on 'the kind consideration of the Governor'.<sup>137</sup> In this vein, he wrote to the colonial secretary on 15 January 1850 seeking a solution. In this letter, Charleton detailed the extent of his investment in the property during the intervening years and suggested that the Crown either grant him 25 acres of land upon the payment of £1 per acre (in accordance with Governor FitzRoy's pre-emptive waiver proclamation of 26 March 1844, discussed in section 4.5.1) or place the land up for public auction and use the proceeds to compensate him for the improvements he had made.<sup>138</sup>

Initially, it appeared that the Crown would issue a pre-emption waiver. Governor George Grey announced that Charleton would 'be allowed to acquire the land he asked for on paying £1 per acre, the contents of the piece being estimated at 25 acres'.<sup>139</sup> However, for reasons unknown this directive was not pursued and, in line with a survey conducted in June 1854, the Crown put the land at Pouewe (now calculated at 38 acres) up for public auction, with improvements valued at £700.<sup>140</sup>

The auction announcement prompted Māori opposition to the alienation of the land. The only record we have of this protest is from a Daily Southern Cross article of 2 January 1855. The article stated that the land 'has never been purchased by the Government [and] was a gift to a Mrs Cowell, (a Maori and her children)', and went on to say 'the tribe who gave the land have sent a strong remonstrance to the Government to prevent the sale of it' and a 'good authority' had reported 'the Natives have already said they will not permit any stranger purchaser to take possession of the land'.<sup>141</sup>

The opposition to the proposed auction prompted the Crown to cancel the sale.<sup>142</sup> However, matters were further complicated when the Ngāti Hikairo rangatira Kikikoi – also known as Waikawau or Kīngi Te Waikawau – wrote to the governor in February 1855. Kikikoi's intentions appear to have been twofold. First, he wanted to support Charleton's claim to ownership of Pouewe, and secondly, he disputed the right of Kiwi Te Roto and Ngāti Mahuta to have sold the land in the first place. He wrote: 'Katahi au ka whakaaro, kei te pakeha tenei kainga, kei a Kamura; ko Ngati Mahuta e he ana; kaore he wahi i a ratou' (then I decided this village belongs to Charleton: Ngāti Mahuta are mistaken; no part belongs to them).<sup>143</sup>

The basis for Kikikoi's support for Charleton's occupation is unclear. He may have been motivated by a desire to demonstrate that Charleton remained at Pouewe at the will of his own iwi, Ngāti Hikairo, and not because of Kiwi and Ngāti Mahuta. Yet Charleton's claim ultimately derived from Cowell's arrangement

137. Document A70, p123.

138. Document A70, p124.

139. Document A70, p125.

140. Document A70, p125.

141. 'Land Sale', Daily Southern Cross, 2 January 1855, p3; doc A70, pp125–126.

142. Document A70, p126.

143. Document A70, p127; doc A70(a), vol 3, p990; Tribunal translation.

with Kiwi in January 1840, which Kikikoi's letter disputed on behalf of Ngāti Hikairo. The letter recalled:

E Hoa ma, Whakarongo mai ki taku korero ki a korua mo ta korua pukapuka kua tae mai nei ki a Kamura [Charleton], ara, mo Pouewe; rere! Whakarongo mai. Na Pikia rangatira o Ngāti Hikairo raua ko tana tamaiti ko Kikikoi i whakanoho a Te Kaora [Cowell], haunga tenei Kaora engari ko te Kaora kua mate. Ko te Kaora hoki, na Pikia tera Pakeha kai tenei kainga. Ko Kawhia katoa i a Pikia katoa. Ka mate Pikia; ora ke ko Kikikoi; i a ia ka ratoa te whenua. Te haeranga mai o Pihopa [Kiwi Te Roto] ki te hoko i Pouewe mai, ka ki mai ki a Kikikoi kia hokona; nā ka ki atu ki Kikikoi, e kore e marere i au. Ka ki mai nei me hoko. Ka ki atu ia, kahore, na hae ana ia ki waho o te whare mai muri i a ia; katahi ka tonoa tahaetia nga taonga ra – homai e Te Kaora nga taonga; ka kawea mai ki tатаhi tu ai ana taonga. Ka ki Kikikoi, haria o taonga; me utu e koe ki tou whenua kore nei. Whenua ko Pouewe e kore e marere e au. Ka ki mai a Pihopa me waihoki e koe nga taonga ki te tangata i te kainga. Ka ki atu ia, e kore e marere i au; na, tiro ana ia, waihotia iho nga taonga; katahi ka haria e nga tamariki ki te whare. E rua tau katahi ka tukua e au nga taonga ki a Ngāti Haua, ki na, ka tae mai a te Raika [Ligar, a surveyor]; ka ruritia tenei kainga. Katahi au ka whakaaro, kei te pakeha tenei kainga, kei a Kamura; ko Ngāti Mahuta e he ana; kaore he wahi i a ratou. . . . Tenei naku ki a korua e te Kawana, e te Raika, ko te pukapuka a te Kuini me homai ki a Kamura, arā, ko te pukapuka mo tenei pihī, mo Pouewe. Na Kikikoi, Kawhia.<sup>144</sup>

This was translated at the time by a Crown official as:

Friends, hear you – in reference to your letter addressed to Kamura [Charleton] to a piece of land at Pouewe. Hear you, Pikia, chief of the Ngāti Hikairo, and his son Kikikoi, were the persons who paid the Father of the present JV Cowell in possession – This land and the whole of Kawhia belonged to Pikia, when Pikia died, Kikikoi became his successor. When Pihopa [Kiwi Te Roto] proposed to sell, Kikikoi objected. Afterwards he Pihopa clandestinely sold and took the goods from Cowell which were laid on the beach. Kikikoi said take your goods, pay for them with your land, for Pouewe shall not be the payment. Pihopa proposed to leave the goods with Kikikoi the real owner of the land, but he refused. The goods were kept in a house for two years and then Kikikoi gave them to the 'Ngatihaua', 'Ngatiapakura' and to all the Tribes. Subsequently this land was taken by Kamura and Mr Ligar came and surveyed it. I then found out that this land was in the possession of the surveyor. Hear you now. This land belongs to Kamura – no portion of it belongs to the Ngatimahuta. Hear now Governor and Ligar. Let the Crown Grant for this piece of ground for Pouewe, be given to Kamura. Signed, Kikikoi of Kawhia.<sup>145</sup>

A modern translation of the Māori text of the letter reveals further details:

144. Document A70(a), vol 3, p990.

145. Document A70, p126.

Friends, Listen to my accounting to you two concerning your letter which came here to Charleton. It came here to Charleton about Pouewe. Now, listen to me, It was Pikia, chief of Ngāti Hikairo together with his son, Kikikoi, who caused Cowell to settle there. Not this Cowell, but the one who died. Cowell was Pikia's Pākehā at this village. All of Kāwhia was Pikia's. Pikia died, but his son Kikikoi lives. By him was the land distributed. Then came Bishop [Kiwi Te Roto] to purchase Pouewe. He said to Kikikoi it would be bought. Kikikoi said to him it will not be given away by me for free. He [Kiwi] answered, it must be bought. He [Kikikoi] said, no, and went out of the house behind him. Then the goods for it were sent secretly. Cowell brought the goods, which were carried to the coast and there left. Kikikoi said, take away your goods; you must pay for the land which is not yours. The land Pouewe will not be given away by me. Bishop said, you must return the goods to the man in the village. He replied, it [the land] will not be given away by me. Now, seeing this, the goods were left down there, then they were carried by the youths to the house. After two years, I sent the goods to Ngāti Haua and Ngāti Apakura, and to all the tribes. Afterwards, Charleton took that place. Later Ligar came and surveyed the village; then I decided this village belongs to Charleton: Ngāti Mahuta are mistaken; no part belongs to them. . . . This is my explanation to you oh Governor, oh Ligar. The Queen's paper should be sent to Charleton, that is, the paper for this piece, Pouewe. From Kikikoi, of Kāwhia.<sup>146</sup>

Kikikoi's letter sheds some light on how Māori understood this pre-Treaty transaction. He claimed that Kiwi Te Roto of Ngāti Mahuta had no rights to Pouewe and that it was not for Kiwi to determine the purchase. Although this dispute over who had mana over the land was explicit in the letter to the governor, it was not taken into consideration by the commission when it investigated.

The letter also highlights the cultural value of the payment. Cowell secretly gave some goods to Kiwi in payment for the land. It is likely these were the goods referred to in the 11 January 1840 deed, which as mentioned listed numerous trade items including muskets, gunpowder, tools, clothing, blankets, pipes, and a cask of tobacco.<sup>147</sup> The secretive nature of this transaction, however, did not sit well with Kikikoi, who initially refused to accept Cowell's payment. The goods were then taken and stored for two years, before Kikikoi distributed them to other iwi and hapū. In doing so, Kikikoi asserted that he had the mana and rights over the land. Making sure that the benefits from permitting Pākehā to occupy land were appropriately distributed was an essential element of tuku whenua. As such, because Kikikoi claimed rights over the land, and because he had distributed the goods, he believed that he had the right to determine that the land should be granted to Charleton.

The proposal to put Pouewe up for auction was raised for a second time in 1855 but came to nothing. There the matter rested, until 1857, when a request on Charleton's behalf was made to the land claims commission for an investigation of his claim to Pouewe.

---

146. Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

147. Document A70(a), vol 3, p972.

4.4.2.3 The commission investigates, July 1858

Charleton's claim to Pouewe came before the commission in mid-July 1858. The block had been surveyed earlier that year by Edwin Davy to be 44 acres in extent. Davy included all the land encompassed by a fence on the site and noted: 'No objection whatever was made to the additional piece at the North West corner being included and being already enclosed by the same fence with the rest of the land.'<sup>148</sup> Phillipa Barton, named claimant for Wai 2353, stated that this additional piece was known by Ngāti Hikairo as Pākanāe and that it subsequently housed the Kāwhia Native School.<sup>149</sup>

Commissioner Bell's investigations followed a similar pattern to his predecessors. He heard evidence from Charleton's appointed agent – Captain John Salmon – and was presented with the deeds of the transactions between Kiwi Te Roto and Cowell, and Cowell and Charleton. Bell also heard the testimony of Hone Wetere Ngainui, of Ngāti Hikairo, who confirmed the accuracy of the deed and the survey, the payment of the purchase price, and declared that 'there is no dispute between us [Ngāti Hikairo] as to [the lands] now belonging to Mr Charleton.'<sup>150</sup>

There is no evidence to indicate that Bell inquired into the nature of the original pre-Treaty transaction or considered the validity of Cowell's transaction with Kiwi Te Roto. Cowell's right to sell the land to Charleton was not questioned; the deeds were taken at face value. Nor is there any evidence to suggest that the commissioner asked Ngainui about the nature of customary interests in Pouewe.

In September 1858, two months after the hearing, Māta Ritana Kaora and others wrote to Donald McLean, Native Secretary and chief land purchase commissioner, to dispute Charleton's claim to the land. Ritana told McLean: 'he whenua kua oti te whakapumau hei kainga mo aku tamariki ake ake' ([Pouewe] is land that has been confirmed to my children for ever).<sup>151</sup>

She warned McLean: 'kia tupato koe ki tena pakeha, ki a Kamura, no te mea e haere tahae atu ana ia ki te hoko huna i toku whenua i Pouewe kei Kawhia . . . e noho noa iho i runga i toku whenua. Kāore ona whenua i reira.'<sup>152</sup> This was translated at the time as, 'be cautious with respect to that Pakeha Kamura (Charleton) as he is going secretly and dishonestly to sell my land at Pouewe . . . he is merely occupying my land, he has no land there.'<sup>153</sup> A modern translation of this passage says, 'be careful of that Pākehā, Charleton, because he is going stealthily to sell my land Pouewe at Kāwhia dishonestly . . . he is living there without rights on my land; he has no land there.'<sup>154</sup>

A second letter to McLean followed in October 1858, co-authored with Māta Ritana's half-brother, Wiremu Toetoe Tumohi. In this letter they restated Ritana's claim to the land, suggesting that it was given to her by their parents: 'he whenua

148. Document A70, p128.

149. Document N4 (Barton), pp15–17.

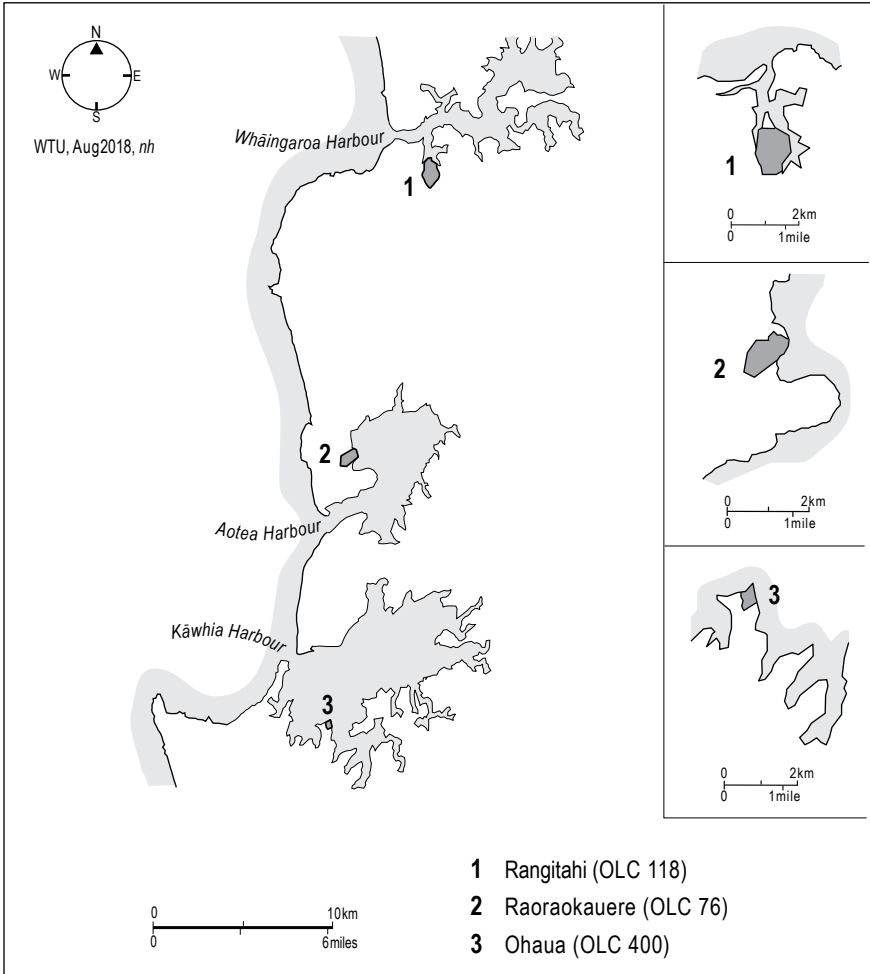

150. Document A70, p129.

151. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp872–873; doc A70, pp129–130.

152. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp872–873.

153. Document A70, pp129–130.

154. Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

Map 4.5: Land granted through other mechanisms tuku atu enei na o matou matua mona, ara ma ratou, ko ana tamariki, hei whenua pumau mo ratou’ (that is, for her and her children, as land fixed permanently for them).<sup>155</sup>

They disputed Charleton’s claim and suggested that, by writing to McLean, they wished ‘to let you know lest you purchase Pouewe’: ‘he pukapuka whakamohio tena kia mohio koe kei hoko koe i Pouewe.’<sup>156</sup>

155. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 867–868.

156. Document A70(a), vol 2, pp 867–868; translation by Waitangi Tribunal; doc A98, pp 211–212.

As chapter 5 sets out, McLean and his agents were actively acquiring land in the inquiry district at this time, which may explain the rumours that the Crown wanted to purchase land at Pouewe.

There is no evidence that the Crown responded to either of Ritana's letters. At the foot of Ritana's second letter, a note written by Assistant Native Secretary TH Smith and dated 24 December 1858 recommends that 'her letter should be referred to the Land Claims Commr – it appears her intention is to protest against Charleton's claim.'<sup>157</sup> We do not know if Bell saw either letter, let alone took them into account in determining whether native title was extinguished for Pouewe.

4.4.2.4 Outcomes of the investigation

In March 1864, commissioner Bell recommended issuing a Crown grant to 44 acres at Pouewe. George Charleton had since died, and the land was granted to Charleton's widow, Ann. In his report, Bell employed section 15 of the Land Claims Extension Act 1858, which empowered the commissioner to recommend a Crown grant based on a claimant's long-term occupation. Accordingly, a Crown grant of 44 acres was issued to Ann Charleton on 25 October 1864.<sup>158</sup>

Two years later, Ann Charleton was evicted from Pouewe by adherents of the Kingitanga, prompting her first to seek compensation and then offer to sell the land to the Crown.<sup>159</sup> These matters, and the Crown's eventual purchase, are addressed in detail in chapter 8.

4.5 LAND GRANTED THROUGH OTHER MECHANISMS

Three Crown grants were awarded for land that was alienated through other mechanisms for confirming pre-Treaty and related transactions:

- ▶ The WMS applied for a pre-emption waiver over two blocks associated with the Raoraokauere Mission Station at Aotea Harbour (OLC 76).
- ▶ Samuel Joseph acquired title to Ōhau/Nathan's Point at Kāwhia (OLC 400).
- ▶ A Crown grant was awarded in respect of Edward Meurant's occupation of land at Rangitahi (OLC 118).

4.5.1 Raoraokauere pre-emption waiver (OLC 76)

A Crown grant for the Raoraokauere Mission Station land at Aotea Harbour was issued to the WMS in June 1862. The alienation occurred in the context of Governor FitzRoy's 26 March 1844 proclamation that the Crown was prepared to waive its pre-emptive land purchase right. FitzRoy's system of pre-emption waivers meant private individuals could apply to the governor to purchase land directly from Māori under certain conditions.<sup>160</sup> Although the scheme was intended

---

157. Document A70, p130.

158. Document A70, p131.

159. Document A70, pp131–133.

160. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp109–112.

to apply only to lands transacted after 1844, in practice the governor received numerous requests to validate transactions that had occurred after the 14 January 1840 proclamation and were therefore barred from investigation by the land claims commission.<sup>161</sup>

The original transaction between the wms and Aotea Māori for land at Raoraokauere took place in June 1840. A second transaction followed in March 1844.<sup>162</sup> Both transactions occurred after the 14 January 1840 proclamation, and could not be processed as old land claims. The wms asked FitzRoy to grant a pre-emption waiver for Raoraokauere in 1844 and the governor did so, but for reasons unknown no action was taken until Land Claims Commissioner Bell reviewed the matter in 1858. In 1862, Bell recommended that a Crown grant be issued to the wms for 167 acres.<sup>163</sup>

In this inquiry, the Ngāti Te Wehi claimants argued that the wms and Governor FitzRoy viewed the Raoraokauere Mission Station transactions as sales in the European sense, and sought to apply a pre-emption waiver on that basis. The claimants maintained, to the contrary, that their tūpuna only intended to convey a use-right to the Wesleyan missionaries for as long as they remained in the rohe and carried out their duties.<sup>164</sup>

4.5.1.1 *The application to waive pre-emption

The wms request for a Crown pre-emption waiver for land at Aotea Harbour came on 29 March 1844, just three days after FitzRoy's proclamation. In a letter to the governor, Wesleyan missionaries John Whiteley, James Wallis, and Gideon Smales requested he recognise two blocks claimed to have been purchased by the wms in association with the Raoraokauere Mission Station. The deed for the first transaction was signed by Aperahama, Te Materau, Te Moke, and Te Haratua on 12 June 1840. The area was estimated at 40 acres and the missionaries paid a £2 deposit.<sup>165</sup> The text of the first deed, written in te reo Māori, read in its entirety: 'Kua riro mai inaianei e rua Pauna moni hei whakatapu mo tenei kainga mo nga rakau hei hanga ware mo te Mihinere. Ma te Kawana e wakarite.'<sup>166</sup> A modern translation is, 'Two pounds in money have been received to reserve this place and the trees to build a house for the Missionary. It is for the Governor to arrange this.'<sup>167</sup>

By 1844, however, the arrangement that underpinned this transaction had become strained. In their letter to FitzRoy, the missionaries explained that 'much unpleasantness was occasioned by several persons from Waikato', who were distressed that the mission station was being built on land which included the graves of several of their kin and places where their tūpuna had died. In response, a second deed was signed, dated 14 March 1844, for what Whiteley, Wallis, and Smales

---

161. Document A70, p 61.

162. Document A70, p 92.

163. Document A70, pp 104–105, 109.

164. Submission 3.4.237, p 78.

165. Document A70, pp 94–95.

166. Document A70(a), vol 3, p 1041.

167. Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

described in their letter as an 'adjoining piece of land of about the same extent and including that part of the original allotment which is at present occupied by one dwelling house and garden.'<sup>168</sup>

The second deed was also written in te reo Māori. It was signed by some 15 Māori, including Hori Kingi Te Matera, Aperahama Te Karu, Kiripahoko Te Haratua, and Te Manihera Moke, and witnessed by EW Stockman, Joseph Teabought, Heriatera Ngā Ahi, and Hoani Weteri Ngamuka.

The deed began:

No te mea kua roa te nohoanga o tetahi Mihanere o te Hahi Weteriana i to matou kainga, A kahore ano i rite noa te hoko ki a matou, ka mea ai me tuku e matou to matou kainga nei ki a ratou, ara ki a te Waitere raua ko Te Mera mo te Hohaiati Mihanere o te Hahi Weteriaua o Ingarani, Ka tukua hoki inaianei to matou nei kainga kua oti nei te ruri.<sup>169</sup>

A modern translation of this passage reads:

Because the residence of a missionary of the Wesleyan Church has been of long duration in our settlement, and because we have not arranged a sale, to achieve it we must gift our place to them for the Missionary Society of the Wesleyan Church of England. So now we gift this, our place, the survey of which has been completed.<sup>170</sup>

The deed then described the boundaries of the land, stating:

E takoto ana i te taha ki uta o te Pa Raoraokaueri, anga atu ana ki tua atu i te kainga o Eruera puta rawa ki tatahi. Ko tetahi wahi o tenei wenua i wakatapu imua e te Pumipi ratou ko Te Whaitere, ko Te Tatona.

It lies on the inland side of the Raoraokaueri [sic] Pa; it faces outwards beyond Edward Stockman's place as far as the sea.' The deed noted that 'Part of this land was previously set aside by Pumipi [Bumby], Waitere [Whiteley] and Te Tatana.

The payments made for this place ('Ko nga utu mo tenei kainga') were listed as:

£7 koura, £3 hiriwa, 4 paraikete, 2 kororirori, 4 kaone, 12 haikiha, 24 ho, 36 heu, 24 kutikuti, 10 kohue, 300 matau, 100 paipa, 300 tupeka, 1 huri paraua, 1 tatari paraua.

£7 in gold, £3 in silver, 4 blankets, 2 preserving pans, 4 gowns, 12 handkerchiefs, 24 hoes, 36 sets of shears, 24 pairs of scissors, 10 boilers, 300 hooks, 100 pipes, 300 figs tobacco, 1 flour grinder, 1 flour sifter.

In return for these goods, the signatories said:

---

168. Document A70, p 98.

169. All references to the Māori text of this deed are to doc A70(a), vol 3, pp 1043–1045.

170. Translation of this and subsequent passages by Waitangi Tribunal.

i homai, koia matou ka tuku ai i tenei kainga me nga wai katoa me nga repo katoa, me nga taepa me nga mea katoa o tenei kainga ki a raua mo te Hohaiati Mihanere o te Hahi Weteriana o Ingarani, mo o ratou tangata ake ake ake.

we gave them [Whiteley and Smales] this place and all its waters and marshes plus the fences and all the appurtenances of this place for the Missionary Society of the Wesleyan Church of England and their people for ever more.

The deed ended by saying:

No te mea i tuhituhi mai te Pukapuka o Te Kawana imua, kia kaua ai matou e hoko wenua ki te Pakeha koia matou ka mea ai, me tuhituhi matou ki tenei Kawana hou nei, me ki atu, mo te mea kua roa ke te noho o te Mihanere ki tenei kainga, koia matou ka hoko atu ai ki a ia, kia tika ai tona noho: mana hoki, ma te Kawana e wakaae mai ki tenei kainga hei nohoanga mo to matou Kaiwakaako.

Because the Governor's instruction was written earlier, that is that we should not sell land to Europeans, we said we would write to this new Governor and say, because of the long occupation of the Missionary in this place, so we sell to him so that his staying here is proper according to tikanga; it is for him, the Governor to agree to this place being a residence for our Teacher [or Mentor].

While the missionaries viewed the initial June 1840 transaction as a permanent alienation, Aotea Māori do not appear to have shared this view. Following the signing of the second deed in March 1844, they repossessed the land named in the first deed and proposed to transact that land with a trader.<sup>171</sup> The WMS, however, opposed the establishment of a trading post alongside their mission station. In their letter to the governor, the missionaries requested FitzRoy's assistance to address the issue while acknowledging that Māori now refused to let them occupy the land. Whiteley, Wallis, and Smales nevertheless claimed the land on the basis that Māori had 'made [it] over to us' in 1840, and 'a deposit was paid upon it'.<sup>172</sup> At around the same time, a copy of the deed of the second transaction was sent to FitzRoy, together with a letter signed by a number of the deed's signatories, including Te Kiripahoko, Te Manihera Te Moke, and Aperahama Te Karu. In this letter the signatories explained:

Kua tae mai ano te pukapuka o Te Kawana i mua, kia kaua ai matou i hoko i te whenua, otiia ka w[h]akaaro matou kua roa ke te noho o te Mihanere ki tenei kainga, he kainga iti, ka tohe ano etahi o nga tangata ki a ia, kia utua, koia matou ka mea ai, kia utua, kia tika ai tona noho, kia pai ai.

Koia matou ka tuhituhi atu nei ki a koe, kia pai koe, kia wakaae mai, kia wakapai mai ki tenei hokonga.

171. Document A70, p102.

172. Document A70, p102.

This was translated by an unnamed Crown official as:

We some time ago received the letter of the Governor requiring us not to sell land but we have thought that our Missionary has long been living on that land, that it is a small place, that some of the people (who have an interest in the land) have teased for payment, therefore we have decided to sell that our Teacher may dwell in peace and quietness.

We therefore write to you to request that you will be pleased to favour this sale with your sanction and approbation.<sup>173</sup>

4.5.1.2 The Crown's response

The terms of FitzRoy's March 1844 proclamation stated that, in considering Crown pre-emption waivers, the governor would consider '[the] nature of the locality; the state of the neighbouring and resident natives; their abundance or deficiency of land; their disposition towards Europeans; and [their disposition] towards Her Majesty's Government'. In addition, he was to consult with the protector of Aborigines before consenting 'in any case'.<sup>174</sup> FitzRoy therefore sought the advice of George Clarke, protector of Aborigines, on the situation at Raoraokauere Mission Station. Clarke expressed doubt as to the validity of the 1840 transaction, concluding that the Wesleyans had not conducted themselves 'with their usual discretion'. However he suggested that the 1844 transaction appeared to be in the form of a purchase, not a gift. FitzRoy also sought the advice of Robert FitzGerald, a land claims commissioner, who recommended that the governor 'might waive the Crown's right of pre-emption over any lands the Natives may be quite willing to sell to the Mission' (emphasis in original).<sup>175</sup>

On receiving this advice, FitzRoy instructed colonial secretary Andrew Sinclair to 'inform these parties that if they apply to me in compliance with the regulations of April last – I will waive the Crown's right of pre-emption over such portions of land as the Natives may be quite willing to alienate – to the extent specified in this letter'.<sup>176</sup> For reasons unknown, the matter rested until February 1858, when WMS chairman Thomas Buddle wrote to commissioner Bell seeking to finalise the issue.<sup>177</sup> Buddle identified the land claimed for the Raoraokauere Mission Station at Aotea as 36 acres 3 roods 1 perch, in accordance with a survey commissioned in 1844 by the WMS.<sup>178</sup>

Bell noted in his review that 'Gov FitzRoy offered a Pre-emptive Certificate but no steps appear to have been taken'. In addition, he questioned the sufficiency of 173. Document A70, p96. The phrase in brackets in the English translation is that provided in the original translation, despite there being no equivalent in the Māori original: doc A70(a), vol 3, pp1019–1020.

---

174. Rose Daamen, The Crown's Right of Pre-Emption and Fitzroy's Waiver Purchases, Waitangi Tribunal Rangahaua Whanui Series (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1988), p73.

175. Document A70, pp103–104.

176. Document A70, p104.

177. Document A70(a), vol 3, p1040.

178. Document A70(a), vol 4, p1046.

a sketch plan provided by the wms and suggested that ‘probably the best way will be to have an inquiry under the Native Reserves Act 1856.’<sup>179</sup> It is not clear why Bell thought this legislation would be best suited to address the matter, and in any case his suggestion was not followed.

4.5.1.3 Outcomes of the process

On 10 June 1862, a Crown grant was awarded to the wms under the Land Claims Settlement Act 1856 for the land on which their three mission stations sat, including the Raoraokauere Mission Station at Aotea. The final award constituted 167 acres, which was more than double the acreage represented by the 1840 and 1844 deeds combined. The reason for awarding a far larger area than requested is not clear.<sup>180</sup> There is no evidence to indicate Aotea Māori ever agreed to this larger area, or how if at all it related to the earlier transactions.

4.5.2 Ōhaua/Nathan’s Point (OLC 400)

Unlike the old land claims investigated in this district by the land claims commission, the permanent alienation of land at Ōhaua appears to have occurred without any inquiry whatsoever. OLC 400 is located at the northern point of Ōhaua Peninsula, on the southern shores of Kāwhia Harbour.<sup>181</sup> It is adjacent to, or possibly contiguous with, another claim by John Laurie and Samuel Joseph (OLC 1314), that was investigated by Bell but declared abandoned in 1880. Speaking to this alienation, the claimant Tangiwai King expressed profound confusion and frustration: ‘What I don’t understand is how the title for Mr Joseph became registered without any investigation or verification. There were systems in place but they did not protect Māori land or interests.’<sup>182</sup>

During the 1830s, Samuel Joseph established a trading post on the land, living at Ōhaua with his Ngāti Kinohaku wife and their children. The evidence available identifies OLC 400 as 34 acres 1 rood in area and suggests that Joseph initially transacted the land with Ngāti Mahuta chiefs Wiremu Hoeta Kumete and Te Manihera. Somehow, in the absence of an old land claim investigation, Joseph managed to secure title to a 34-acre block at the north-eastern point of Ōhaua. It is unclear how this was able to happen. Ms Boulton suggested that further research would be required ‘to determine the circumstances that led to Joseph being allowed to secure title to land he had acquired from Maori before 1840 without going through the old land claims investigation and validation process.’<sup>183</sup>

By the late 1850s, Joseph had run into financial difficulties and become indebted to his Auckland-based trading partner, LD Nathan. To satisfy his debt, and unbeknownst to his family, Joseph sold the land to Nathan, from whom it gained the

179. Document A70, p 104.
Document A70, p 104.

180. Document A70, p 105.

181. Document J1 (King), pp 15–16.

182. Document J1, p 16; submission 3.4.171(a), pp 95–96.

183. Document A70, pp 116–117.

name Nathan's Point. Ms Boulton stated that 'it appears a Crown grant was issued', although whether to Joseph or Nathan she did not know.<sup>184</sup> When the land came up for private sale, the former Māori owners bought it back. Tangiwai King stated that his father bought the land back in 1928, 'because we wanted it in the family and we wanted Ngāti Mahuta land to stay Ngāti Mahuta land'.<sup>185</sup> In 1994, the land was returned to Māori freehold status.

4.5.3 Rangitahi (OLC 118)

Rangitahi is located on a peninsula in the southern reaches of Whāingaroa Harbour, bounded by the Omahina and Oporoturu Rivers.<sup>186</sup> The land was occupied from the late 1830s by a Pākehā, Edward Meurant, who lived there with his Ngāti Mahuta wife Eliza Kenehuru, the daughter of Te Tuhi-o-te-Rangi and niece of Te Wherowhero.<sup>187</sup> Meurant appears never to have sought a Crown grant to the land.<sup>188</sup>

After Meurant's death in 1851, the missionaries John Whiteley and James Wallis corresponded with Crown officials in an attempt to organise his affairs. In a letter dated April 1853, they wrote that Meurant had purchased about 300 acres from Whāingaroa Māori in 1839, for which a deed had been drawn up but since lost. Whiteley and Wallis asked that the land 'be made over to the Government and that some consideration should be made to the surviving widow and children'. Wetini [Mahikai], Wharekura, and Hone Kingi signed a statement in te reo Māori, dated 23 April 1855, which recorded that they had formerly sold their land at Rangitahi to Meurant. This was forwarded to the government by Whiteley and Wallis, who continued to ask that the Crown use Rangitahi for the benefit of Meurant's widow and children. The missionaries also stated that 'the natives still regard the land as the property of Mr Meurant's family'.<sup>189</sup> Other evidence, however, suggests that Meurant made an agreement for the land with Muriwhenua, Wharekura, and [Wetini] Mahikai on 5 January 1845.<sup>190</sup>

We have not seen evidence that the circumstances of these purported transactions were investigated or that a Crown grant was ever awarded. Rangitahi is no longer Māori land, but in the absence of further evidence relating to the alienation of Rangitahi, we are unable to take the matter further.

4.6 TREATY ANALYSIS AND FINDINGS

The Crown's undertaking to properly investigate pre-Treaty transactions was a key part of the Treaty bargain. In the Treaty, and in associated public statements,

184. Document A70, p 116.

185. Document J1, p 16.

186. Submission 3.4.210, p 22.

187. Document A70, pp 32–33.

188. Document A70(a), vol 2, p 527.

189. Document A70, p 33; doc A70(a), vol 2, pp 528–532.

190. Document A70, p 32; doc A70(a), vol 3, pp 961–965.

Crown officials also undertook to deal with Māori land in accordance with their laws and customs. Failure to uphold these promises would reflect poorly on the honour of the Crown.

4.6.1 Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions

We view the land transactions conducted between tangata whenua and Pākehā traders and missionaries in the inquiry district prior to February 1840 as constituting traditional arrangements established in accordance with Māori custom. Evidence on the record of inquiry speaks to the customary nature of Pākehā interactions and dealings with Māori prior to the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. Traders and missionaries were incorporated into their host communities; land was made available to newcomers in recognition of their contribution to their hosts; and, on those occasions where manuhiri strayed from the expectations of tangata whenua, they were swiftly reminded of the community's expectations. This evidence points to the ongoing application of Māori custom across Te Rohe Pōtae during and after the time when pre-Treaty transactions were entered into. It was therefore those cultural expectations of customary interaction that Māori brought to the table when transacting land with manuhiri prior to the signing of the Treaty.

However, the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would have understood the nature of the deeds they signed, whether these were in English or te reo, remains unclear. It is impossible from the commissions' records to say if and how they inquired into whether the deeds were accurate representations of the original transactions. Although the files show that some of the reo Māori deeds were translated by officials such as Thomas Forsaith, there is no evidence that the commissioners themselves examined how key terms such as 'tukuā' (gift) or 'hokonga' (sale) were understood by Māori signatories. Nor is there evidence that the commissions examined the deeds' timing, to establish whether these were hurried attempts to cement transactions that occurred years before in response to the prospect of British annexation. For these reasons, we agree with historian Leanne Boulton's assessment that the commissions largely took the deeds at face value.<sup>191</sup>

Further, it is unknown whether those Māori who signed the deeds understood their content. We do not know whether the deeds written in te reo Māori were read to those Māori who may not have been able to read. As noted in section 4.4.1.2, most of the deeds seem to have contained a mark next to the name of the Māori signatories, which suggests they were illiterate in the writing sense, though signatories' reading abilities at this time are not known. If they could not read, the issue then turns to whether the deeds were read aloud to Māori present. If so, in the case of the reo Māori deeds, a further question is then whether the oral translations accurately depicted the nature of the agreements, the lands subject to the transactions and the payments Māori received. Overall, due to the paucity of evidence in relation to Māori understanding of these deeds, we make no firm conclusions on these matters.

---

191. Document A70, p 39.

4.6.2 The operation of the commissions

4.6.2.1 The Wesleyan mission claims

We find that, in its mandating and supervision of the land claims commissions in the inquiry district, the Crown failed or omitted to direct the commissioners to take into account Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions and the tikanga Māori principles associated with them. In accordance with Normanby's instructions and the Treaty itself, the Crown was required to actively protect Māori tino rangatiratanga over their land interests. That Treaty standard extended to the investigation of pre-Treaty transactions and the subsequent issuing of Crown grants. In the case of the three wms claims and the claim of William Johnston, Crown grants were issued to Pākehā based on the commissioners' recommendations without the commission being required to clearly ascertain the nature of the original transactions. The Crown failed to fulfil its duty of active protection, resulting in the permanent alienation of some 358 acres of ancestral land in the inquiry district.

The evidential record of Godfrey and Richmond's investigation into the four Wesleyan-related claims suggests a failure on the part of the Crown to ensure, through the legislation under which the commission operated, that the commissioners adequately determined the nature of the pre-Treaty transactions before recommending that the Crown issue grants to the claimants. The commissioners failed to inquire into the nature of the original transactions; did not explore Māori understandings or customary interests in the land when questioning Māori witnesses; and paid little or no mind to any potential discrepancies between the written deeds and the original oral arrangements. The commissioners' failure to uncover issues regarding the Nihinihi deed indicates the legislative effect of not requiring them to have regard to such matters.

These failings were compounded by other issues regarding the operation of the land claims commission under a legislative regime for which the Crown was responsible. In particular, we consider Māori were disadvantaged as a consequence of the hearings being held in Auckland, which limited participation and so failed to provide adequate opportunities to investigate customary interests. This undermined the transparency of the commission's inquiries. In addition, the protector of Aborigines, or his deputy, was meant to attend all hearings to provide independent advice and support to Māori witnesses. Although protector of Aborigines Thomas Forsaith seems to have been present at the 1843 inquiry into the Wesleyan claims, the evidence (section 4.4.1.3) suggests that, in practice, his role was confined to that of an interpreter and translator.

We find that these factors combined meant the Crown failed to fulfil its article 2 duty of active protection of Māori tino rangatiratanga over their lands, resulting in the prejudicial loss of land. We find, further, that prejudice resulted from the land claims process in relation to these transactions, as the customary interests of those who gifted the land were permanently alienated in a manner contrary to their tikanga.

4.6.2.2 *George Charleton's claim at Pouewe

The Crown has acknowledged the possibility of a failure in respect of the way Charleton's claim was processed, and accepted that the pre-Treaty transaction may not have been intended by the original owners to be a permanent alienation.<sup>192</sup> We accept these acknowledgements, and go further. We find that the Crown's regime for investigating old land claims resulted in a failure to ascertain that the original pre-Treaty transaction was not intended as a permanent alienation by the original owners. Charleton's claim to the land derived from a transaction with John Vittoria Cowell, though Cowell's interest in the land was customary and in the nature of a life interest only, deriving from his father's occupation of the site and from his marriage to Māta Ritana. While Cowell claimed to have purchased the land from Kiwi Te Roto of Ngāti Mahuta, this purchase was speculative and never validated and Cowell's interest remained based in custom. He had no right to sell the land to Charleton, and the commission would have recognised this had it been required to consider Māori understandings of the transaction and the tikanga associated with it.

In investigating this claim, Commissioner Bell was responsible for determining whether the native title had been extinguished. However, he failed to do so. The evidence suggests that Bell's inquiry paid little attention to the nature of the pre-Treaty transaction, or Cowell's right to sell the land to Charleton. Instead, the evidence suggests that the commissioner's investigation of the claim was superficial. This impression is further substantiated by Bell's failure to address protest by Māta Ritana Kaora and her family. Māta Ritana opposed Charleton's claim based on her ongoing customary interests in the block and, despite voicing her concerns both before and after the commissioner's inquiries, her protests fell on deaf ears.

Bell recommended that a Crown grant for the 44-acre block be issued to Charleton's widow, Ann Charleton, in 1864. This grant was awarded under section 15 of the Land Claims Extension Act 1858, which empowered the commissioner to recommend a grant on the grounds of the settler's long-term occupation. As noted above, this legislation was directly in breach of the Crown's commitment under article 2 of the Treaty to respect Māori laws and customs relating to their lands. Consequently, and in issuing this grant, the commissioner failed to consider Māori customary law or tikanga, nor did he establish Māori understandings of the pre-Treaty transaction. He also overlooked the continuing protest and disputes over customary ownership as voiced by Māta Ritana, Kikikoi of Ngāti Hikairo, and others. Thus, due to the deficiencies in the legislation, and in awarding this land to Charleton in accordance with the commissioner's recommendations, the Crown failed to fulfil its duty to actively protect the interests of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

---

192. Statement 1.4.3, p 55; submission 3.4.288, p 22.

In its concessions on the topic, the Crown acknowledged that '[p]rejudice may have resulted to Māori in result of the old land claims process in relation to George Charleton's claim at Pouewe in Kawhia (OLC 1353)'.<sup>193</sup> We find that prejudice did indeed result from the land claims process in relation to Charleton's claim to Pouewe, as the customary interests of Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Mahuta, and others were permanently alienated. This was due to the commission's failure to establish the intentions of Māori in transacting the land with John Vittoria Cowell during the pre-Treaty period. Moreover, we note that the effects of the Crown's decision to award Pouewe to Charleton were not confined to those with direct interests in the land, but had a wider impact due to the cultural and strategic importance of Kāwhia to Māori across the inquiry district.

4.6.3 Other alienation mechanisms

The record in respect of the Raoraokauere pre-emption waiver (OLC 76) speaks to clear breaches in the Crown's Treaty obligations. Upon entering the initial transaction, tangata whenua and missionaries evidently had different expectations and understandings of the arrangement, as demonstrated by Māori repossessing land that the missionaries believed they had purchased. There is no evidence that the governor, in considering whether to waive Crown pre-emption, inquired into the original intentions of Māori sellers or examined the nature of customary rights in the affected lands. These omissions were carried over into subsequent considerations of the issue, and ultimately a Crown grant was awarded to the wms in 1862. The Crown thus permanently alienated Māori land without first establishing the intentions and rights of those Māori who transacted the whenua. This constituted a failure by the Crown to fulfil its duty to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The impact of this failure was compounded when the Crown awarded a significantly larger area of land than the wms had claimed.

We share the claimant Tangiwai King's confusion and frustration about the circumstances surrounding the alienation of Ōhau/Nathan's Point (OLC 400). It is not clear to us why an inquiry into the Ōhau transaction was not conducted under the Land Claims Ordinance 1841 or succeeding legislation. Nor is it clear how a Crown grant came to be awarded in the absence of such an inquiry. This underscores the inadequacy of the legislation in actively protecting Māori interests. We find the alienation of this land without any apparent investigation to be a further failure by the Crown to fulfil its duty to actively protect Māori land interests under article 2 of the Treaty.

We make no finding of Treaty breach in respect of Rangitahi (OLC 118). Edward Meurant may have held a valid customary claim to use of the land based on the interests of his high-born Ngāti Mahuta wife, Eliza Kenehuru. That use-right may well have passed to his descendants, whether through custom or legislative provision. There is simply not enough information on the record of inquiry to offer a firm conclusion on this matter.

---

193. Submission 3.4.288, p 33.

4.6.4 Prejudice

In consequence of these Treaty breaches, approximately 569 acres of Māori land was permanently alienated in the inquiry district.<sup>194</sup> The commissioners' inquiries into OLC 947 and OLC 948, awarded to the WMS on the shores of Kāwhia, resulted in Crown grants of 160 and four acres respectively, while 76 acres was awarded to the WMS at Whāingaroa in respect of OLC 946. A total of just over 118 acres was awarded to William Johnston for OLC 1040, and a 44-acre block of land at Pouewe was awarded to George Charleton's wife, Ann Charleton, following the commission's inquiry into OLC 1353. In the case of the Raoraokauere Mission Station site, the Crown issued the WMS with a grant for 167 acres of land on the shores of Aotea Harbour.

While small in the context of the inquiry district, the land was of a high quality. Due to the nature of the early Pākehā presence in Te Rohe Pōtae, these blocks all had harbour frontage and were positioned to accommodate arrivals from the sea. Speaking to the quality of Pouewe during his visit to Kāwhia in early 1883, for example, Minister of Native Affairs John Bryce reported that the anchorage near the government's land was very good and that there was 'no doubt' Pouewe was the 'best place that could be found on the whole harbour'.<sup>195</sup> The land granted to Pākehā through the land claims process and the Crown's pre-emption waivers was of considerable value in a seafaring society. Accordingly, we find that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered prejudice as a result of these alienations.

The alienation of Pouewe was the cause of further prejudice to Māori in the inquiry district. During the hearings, we heard of the cultural practices associated with Pouewe prior to its alienation. Speaking of the puna (springs) from which the land was named, Jack Tepai Te Onehahau Cunningham told us that:

Enei puna i muri atu i te papara kauta o Kāwhia me to whare peke o Aotearoa o mua, kotahi te puna i te taha mau i te awa, kotahi puna i te taha katau. Enei puna mo nga wahine kua whanau hei horoi i a rātou, me o rātou pepe, me era mahi a te wahine. Kua paipatia te awa me nga puna. Kua ngaro nga wai e puta mai ana i nga hiwi kua kore e mohiatia he awa, he puna tapu i reira.<sup>196</sup>

These springs are behind the Kāwhia hotel and the old Bank of New Zealand, one on the left side of the river, another on the right. These springs were for women who have given birth, to wash themselves and their babies and that kind of activity for the women. The river and the springs have been piped. The water that comes from the hillsides is lost and the rivers and sacred springs are no longer known there.<sup>197</sup>

---

194. The nature of the evidence makes it difficult to be more precise. This figure does not include the land at Te Kōpua and Ōhau that was later returned to Māori ownership, or the Rangitahi land.

195. Document A78 (Marr), p 729.

196. Document N38 (Cunningham), p 4.

197. Document N38(a) (Cunningham), pp 4-5.

The alienation of the land and resulting significant alterations to the site have damaged the relationship between Pouewe and tangata whenua, further aggravating the prejudice for those with a long and intimate association with the land.

4.7 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

In this section, we summarise our key conclusions and findings in this chapter.

On Māori understandings of pre-Treaty transactions:

- ▶ In the decades prior to the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi, tangata whenua of the inquiry district entered into a range of transactions over land with Europeans.
- ▶ Te Rohe Pōtae Māori entered into these transactions on the understanding that they were traditional arrangements established in accordance with Māori custom, whereby use-rights only were extended to Pākehā newcomers, conditional on their contribution to the community's collective welfare.

On the operation of the land claims commissions in Te Rohe Pōtae:

- ▶ The Crown, in establishing its legislative regime for investigating pre-Treaty transactions, failed to direct commissioners to ascertain Māori custom or tikanga and Māori understandings of the transactions, an omission for which the Crown is wholly responsible.
- ▶ The commissioners' inquiries took the English texts of the deeds of transactions at face value. They paid little or no regard to evidence in te reo Māori or to the cultural context within which the transactions were conducted.
- ▶ In all five old land claims for which the land claims commissions held hearings in Te Rohe Pōtae (OLC 946, OLC 947, OLC 948, OLC 1040, and OLC 1353), the commissioners recommended Crown grants be issued.
- ▶ In each case, Crown grants were duly awarded, thereby transforming pre-Treaty arrangements for conditional use-rights into full and final alienations.
- ▶ The alienation of these lands contradicted obligations placed on Crown officials to deal with Māori land in accordance with their laws and customs and thus constituted a failure by the Crown to fulfil its duty under article 2 of the Treaty to actively protect the rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori over their lands.

On land granted through other mechanisms:

- ▶ In the case of the Raoraokauere Mission Station at Aotea Harbour (OLC 76), Governor FitzRoy paid little attention to Māori understandings of the transactions when considering the application to waive pre-emption in 1844. The subsequent alienation represented a failure by the Crown to fulfil its duty to actively protect Te Rohe Pōtae Māori interests. The impact of this failure was compounded when the Crown awarded a significantly larger area of land than the wms had claimed.
- ▶ In respect of Ōhaua/Nathan's Point (OLC 400), a Crown grant was awarded for land subject to a pre-Treaty transaction in the apparent absence of any form of inquiry under the land claims legislation, which was a further failure by the Crown to fulfil its duty to actively protect Māori interests under article 2 of the Treaty.

In consequence of these Treaty breaches under article 2, approximately 569 acres of Māori land was permanently alienated, resulting in prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

CHAPTER 5

NGĀ WHAKAWHITI WHENUA I, 1840–65: CROWN PURCHASING, 1840–65

While he remained peacefully at home and sold no land he would be respected by all Europeans but directly he sold any land they would make a slave of him.

—Te Kaka and ‘grand committee’<sup>1</sup>

5.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter examines Crown purchases of Māori land in the inquiry district between 1840 and 1865. The use and ownership of land was a key area of engagement between iwi and hapū and the Crown after the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. This included a process to investigate and confirm titles for pre-Treaty transactions, discussed in chapter 4. It also involved the transfer of customary Māori land to Crown ownership. The Crown’s right of pre-emption under the Treaty effectively gave it a monopoly over the purchase of Māori land. For the most part, Māori could not sell directly to settlers.<sup>2</sup>

The Crown’s effort to purchase Māori land in the Te Rohe Pōtae district was described by historian Leanne Boulton as ‘part of a concerted and organised programme of land acquisition undertaken in the 1850s to supply land for European immigrants who were arriving in the colony in increasing numbers.’<sup>3</sup> Negotiations with rangatira from the region began as early as 1842, when Governor William Hobson paid Pōtatau Te Wherowhero and his brother Kati £150 and other goods for their interests in Taranaki.<sup>4</sup> By the early 1850s, when purchasing began in the district, the Crown was under pressure to open up new lands for Pākehā settlement. In addition, the Crown wanted to open routes from the west coast into the interior of the North Island. Due to the difficulty of overland travel, land close to navigable harbours and river mouths was highly valued. The Crown was also attracted by reports of minerals on some of the lands it sought to purchase.<sup>5</sup>

---

1. The message given to Taonui Hikaka by Te Kaka and the ‘grand committee’ of Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira who opposed land sales, at Te Paripari in May 1850: Louis Hetet to Donald McLean, 9 May 1850, McLean Papers, Ms-0032-0338 (doc A28, pp 47, 68).

2. With the partial exception of the pre-emption waiver period (1844–45), also discussed in chapter 4.

3. Document A70 (Boulton), p 442.

4. Document A23 (O’Malley), pp 98–99.

5. Document A28 (Thomas), pp 50–51.

Māori had complex motivations for offering land to the Crown. In some cases, transactions seem to have been conceived as assertions of mana rather than ‘sales’ in the European sense. When Te Wherowhero explained his 1842 arrangement with Hobson, he said his actions were in response to earlier payments to other Te Rohe Pōtae leaders for Taranaki: ‘all these Chiefs received payment but I have received none.’<sup>6</sup> Hapū and iwi of the inquiry district also sought to bring settlers and capital to their areas and so access the benefits of Pākehā settlement. By the 1850s, rangatira along the coastal and northern parts of the district had hosted traders and missionaries for several decades. Some, notably Tākerei Waitara and Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia, sought a greater European presence. But not all Māori supported land sales. In Te Rohe Pōtae, the Crown’s efforts to purchase land met resistance from influential rangatira such as Taonui Hikaka. Nor was resistance to purchasing confined to this district. Throughout New Zealand, attempts to acquire land for the Crown after 1840 were often frustrated by opposition from Māori with rights to the lands in question. The Crown’s determination to continue its purchasing agenda in the face of such opposition was a major factor behind the outbreak of fighting in Taranaki and Waikato in the early 1860s, as discussed in chapter 6.

Between 1851 and 1864, the Crown acquired approximately 150,000<sup>7</sup> acres of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land in the inquiry district (see table 5.1). Some 25 purchases were made, almost all involving land located on or near the coast (see map 5.1). In the south, near the Mōkau and Awakino river mouths, the Crown acquired four blocks between 1854 and 1857, comprising about 61,000 acres. In the north-west, between 1851 and 1857 the Crown acquired virtually all the land between the Whāingaroa and Aotea Harbours, as well as one block situated between Kāwhia Harbour and the Marokopa River, comprising about 67,000 acres. The Crown attempted, without success, to acquire further land in these areas. In the north of the inquiry district, the Crown acquired about 1,300 acres inland at Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia in a series of purchases during the 1850s. Most of this land was granted to Church organisations. Finally, in 1864, after a long series of negotiations, the Crown acquired the Waipa–Waitetuna block, approximately 21,000 acres of which lies within the inquiry district’s northern boundary, including the Pirongia parish extension.

The main sources of evidence addressing these events were reports by Leanne Boulton, Paul Thomas, Kesaia Walker, Vincent O’Malley, Bruce Stirling, and Brent Parker.<sup>8</sup> The chapter also makes use of the land data compiled by Tutahanga Douglas, Craig Innes, and James Mitchell, Innes’s collation of purchase deeds,

6. Document A23, p99.

7. The Tribunal received various estimates from parties on the total amount of land purchased in the inquiry district before 1865: see submission 3.4.130(h), p1 and submission 3.4.309(a), p2. The reasoning behind our estimate of 150,000 acres is set out in table 5.1.

8. Boulton, ‘Hapu and Iwi Land Transactions with the Crown and Europeans in Te Rohe Potae Inquiry District, c1840–1865’ (doc A70); Thomas, ‘The Crown and Maori in Mokau 1840–1911’ (doc A28); Walker, ‘History of pre-1865 Crown Purchase Reserves in Te Rohe Pōtae’ (doc A142); O’Malley, ‘Te Rohe Pōtae Political Engagement, 1840 – 1863’ (doc A23); Stirling, ‘Mokau ki Runga Claim Issues’ (doc A147(b)); evidence of Brent Parker on the Crown’s purchase of Oiōroa Block (doc A153).

Transactions	Block names	Purchase year	Total payment (£ s)	Approximate area (acres) <sup>1</sup>
Mōkau–Awakino	Awakino	1854	530 0	61,054 <sup>2</sup>
	Mokau	1854	100 0
	Taumata Maire	1855	500 0
	Rauroa	1857	400 0
Western harbours	Horea	1850	50 0	67, 147 <sup>3</sup>
	Whaingaroa	1851	600 0
	Karioi	1855	575 0
	Ruapuke	1856	300 0
	Wharauroa	1857	410 0
	Wahatane	1857	40 0
	Te Mata	1859	283 0
	Harihari	1857	400 0
	Oioroa	1854	100 0
	Ngāti Raukawa	1856	60 0
Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia	Ngāti Toa-rangatira	1858	240 0	1,305 <sup>4</sup>
	Ōtāwhao mission station lands	1850	£5 and goods of unknown value
	Ōtāwhao school lands	1850	2 10
	Awamutu pa	1850	3 0
	Moeawha	1850	2 10
	Rangiaowhia church lands	1854	Gift
	Te Tomo	1855	20 0
	Paiaka	1855	20 0
	Te Taruna	1856	Gift
	Kairanga-pai-hau	1857	Gift
Waipa–Waitetuna	Waipa–Waitetuna	1864	1,500 0	20,840 <sup>5</sup>
Total approximate area purchased within the inquiry district				150, 346

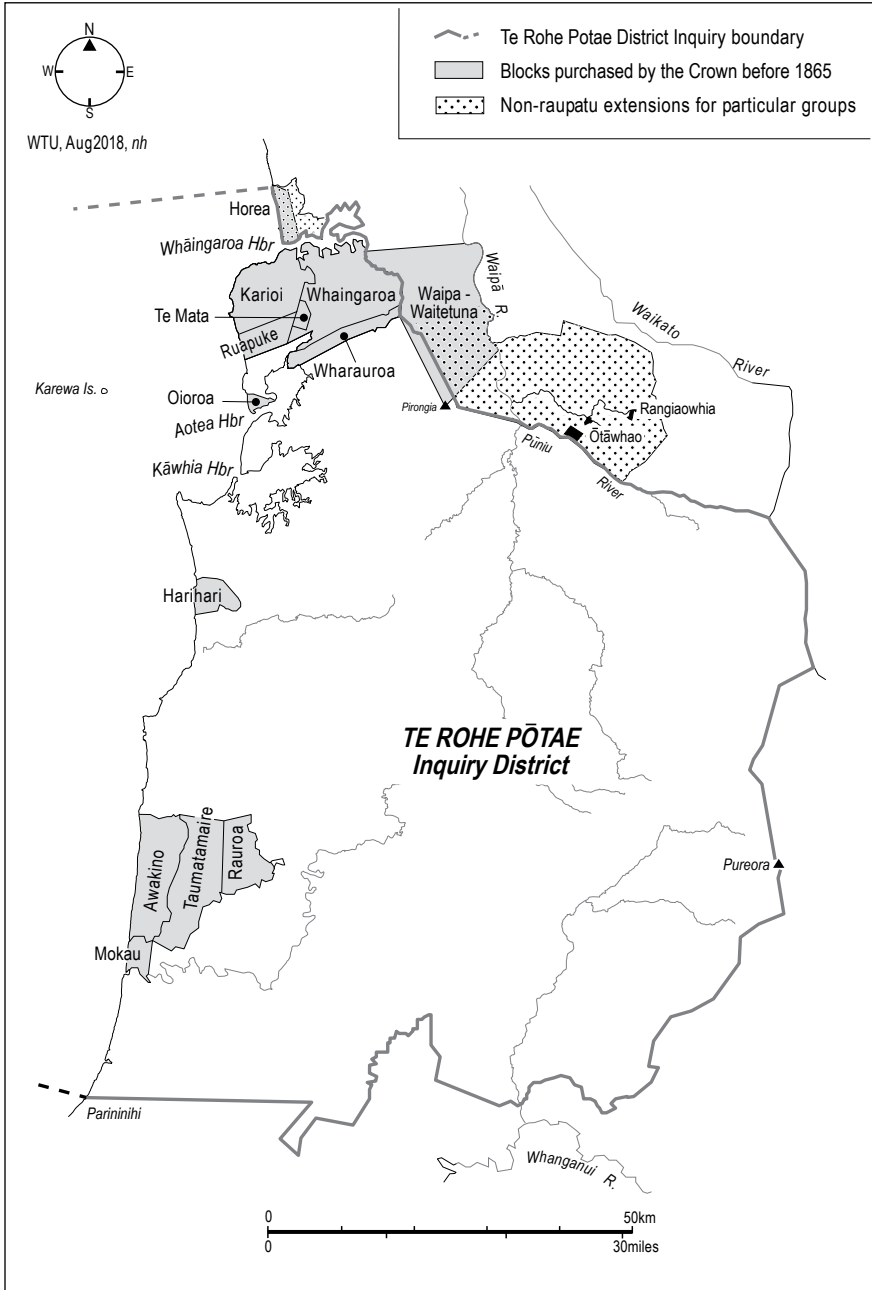

1. These figures are the Tribunal's estimate, based on either Crown survey or modern GIS calculation.

2. Document A21 (Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell), p 41.3. This figure does not include Horea (estimated at between 4,000 and 4,500 acres) as native title to that block was ultimately not extinguished. Nor does it include the 1,159-acre Te Mata block, as this was a reserve within the Whaingaroa purchase area. See doc A21, pp 26, 41; doc A141 (Innes), folder 3, p 80.

4. Document K16 (Maniapoto and Maniapoto), pp 15–29; doc A97 (Borell and Joseph), p 152.

5. According to figures calculated by the Tribunal's mapping officer, about 20,840 of the estimated 53,276 acres that made up the Waipa–Waitetuna block are located within the inquiry district. For further discussion, see section 5.6.

Table 5.1: Crown purchases in the inquiry district, 1851–64

Map 5.1: Crown purchasing in the inquiry district, 1840–65

as well as documents presented by claimant Harold Maniapoto relating to the Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions.<sup>9</sup>

5.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The main task of this chapter is to assess the Crown's conduct in purchasing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land before 1865 against the guarantees in the Treaty of Waitangi and the statements made by Crown officials of the time.

It was British secretary of state for the colonies Lord Normanby who first established the basic standards for the purchase of Māori land (see chapter 3).<sup>10</sup> Normanby, in his August 1839 instructions to Hobson, ordered officials seeking to acquire land to first establish 'the free and intelligent consent of the Natives, expressed according to their established usages'.<sup>11</sup> All purchases were to be conducted with 'sincerity, justice and good faith'. Hobson was further instructed that Māori were not to 'be permitted to enter any contracts in which they might be the ignorant and unintentional authors of injuries to themselves', and that the Crown's acquisition of land 'must be confined to such districts as the natives can alienate, without distress or serious inconvenience to themselves'.<sup>12</sup>

As set out in previous chapters, Normanby's instructions formed the basis for article 2 of the Treaty of Waitangi, which affirmed to Māori 'te tino rangatira o o ratou wenua o ratou kainga me o ratou taonga katoa'. This phrase was rendered in the English text as 'full exclusive and undisturbed possession of their Lands and Estates Forests Fisheries and other properties'.<sup>13</sup> Previous Tribunals have understood it to mean the 'highest chieftainship' over lands, homes, and all other things valued by Māori.<sup>14</sup>

Normanby's instructions were affirmed in 1845 by secretary of state Lord Stanley. Stanley told the British Parliament that the Treaty guaranteed to Māori their property according to their own law and custom. He declared:

these rights and titles the Crown is bound in honour to maintain, and the interpretation of the treaty of Waitangi, with regard to these rights is, that except in the case

---

9. Douglas, Innes and Mitchell, 'Alienation of Māori land within Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district 1840–2010: A quantitative study' (doc A21); Innes, 'Te Rohe Pōtae Crown Purchase Deed Document Bank' (doc A141); Brief of evidence and appendices to the evidence of Harold and Thomas Maniapoto (docs K16, K16(a)).

10. For Normanby's instructions, including the quoted passages, see doc A23, pp 60–63.

11. Document A23, p 61.

12. Document A23, p 63.

13. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti: The Declaration and the Treaty (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2014), p 393.

14. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Orakei Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Brooker and Friend, 1991), p 188; Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Motunui–Waitara Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Government Printing Office, 1989), p 51; See also Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 346–347, 349–351.

of the intelligent consent of the natives, the Crown has no right to take possession of land . . .<sup>15</sup>

What did become a matter of contention for Crown officials, however, was whether all the land in New Zealand could be said to be subject to Māori customary law and thus protected under the Treaty. In 1846, Stanley's successor Earl Grey instructed Governor George Grey to acquire 'unoccupied' Māori land. Māori would be given title to occupied or cultivated lands, and the Crown would own the remainder.<sup>16</sup> This has since been referred to as the 'waste land theory'.<sup>17</sup> The resulting protest made clear to Governor Grey that Māori would resist the wholesale acquisition of unoccupied lands. In May 1848, he promoted instead what he termed a 'nearly allied principle'. As the Te Tau Ihu Tribunal described it:

Maori could be persuaded to sell their waste lands for a nominal sum – maybe even for no payment at all, so long as their mana was acknowledged – and then their titles to land in actual occupation would be registered as reserves, just as if that had been all they had ever owned.<sup>18</sup>

After acquiring large tracts of Māori land in a region for nominal prices, Grey suggested, the reserves set aside by the Crown would be the 'only admitted claims of the natives in that district'.<sup>19</sup> Although the British Government accepted Grey's advice, he was instructed to uphold the Treaty, which, he was told, secured to Māori 'a title to those lands which they possessed according to native usage (whether cultivated or not)'.<sup>20</sup>

Grey may have been the architect of the Crown's purchasing regime, but its application in this period relied on individual Crown purchase agents. Initially, the purchase of Māori land was overseen by the protector of Aborigines, but after 1849 it became the responsibility of the surveyor-general, at that time Charles Whybrow Ligar. In December 1849, Ligar received a general set of instructions from the colonial secretary, Andrew Sinclair. He was to purchase, with haste, blocks of land 'of the largest extent possible, and in position and in character adapted for the immediate wants of the Europeans'. Ligar was told that the Governor thought it essential to set aside 'good reserves' that were 'carefully agreed on and marked out before the purchase is completed'.<sup>21</sup> Acting on these instructions, Ligar began negotiations at Whāingaroa Harbour that led to the purchase of the Whāingaroa block.

---

15. Stanley to Grey, 15 August 1845, quoted in Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o Te Waka a Maui: Report on Northern South Island Claims, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 295.

16. Document A23, p 89.

17. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o Te Waka a Maui, vol 1, p 299.

18. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o Te Waka a Maui, vol 1, p 300.

19. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa Ki Tararua Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2010), vol 1, pp 54–58; doc A23, pp 88–89.

20. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o Te Waka a Maui, vol 1, p 303.

21. Sinclair to Ligar, 13 December 1849 (doc A70, p 163).

Ligar was also involved in marking out the Te Mata reserve from that purchase, which was later alienated to the Crown.

Donald McLean became the central figure within the Crown's purchasing regime. McLean began purchasing land for the Crown while employed as inspector of police at New Plymouth. Between 1846 and 1851 he oversaw the purchase of almost one million acres of land in Hawkes Bay, Rangitikei, Whanganui, and Taranaki.<sup>22</sup> He later became chief commissioner of the Native Land Purchase Department, which was officially established in 1854, though it had operated informally since 1850.<sup>23</sup> McLean would become Native Minister in 1869. As head of the purchase department, McLean oversaw several district commissioners and other officers responsible for buying land in different regions of New Zealand. At Mōkau and Awakino, however, McLean himself led purchase negotiations in the 1850s, though he relied on his subordinates to work out the details. He also initiated the complex series of transactions that took place on the north-west coast of the inquiry district after 1854, but again left others finalise the purchases.

McLean's main assistant in the inquiry district was John Rogan, a former New Zealand Company surveyor. From 1845, Rogan was employed by the provincial government in New Plymouth, where he met McLean and became involved in early surveys and negotiations for the Awakino and Mokau blocks.<sup>24</sup> From 1854, he was a land purchase commissioner, in which capacity he took a lead role in completing purchases at Taumatamaire and Raoroa, and around the Whāingarōa, Aotea, and Kāwhia Harbours. In 1863, he was briefly involved in negotiations for the Waipa–Waitetuna block. In 1865, he was appointed one of the first Native Land Court judges. He later also became a judge of the compensation court established to compensate 'loyal' Māori after the Taranaki and Waikato wars.

Other Crown officials who were involved in land purchasing transactions during this period include William Searancke, John Grant Johnson, and Henry Tacy Kemp. Governor Grey himself conducted land purchases on behalf of missionary organisations at Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia in the 1850s. The task of finalising the 1864 Waipa–Waitetuna purchase fell to Henry Hanson Turton, a former Wesleyan missionary. Turton was also commissioner for the investigation of native titles at that time, another role that involved assessing compensation for Māori whose land had been confiscated (see chapter 6, section 6.9).

5.1.2 How the chapter is structured

This chapter examines Crown purchasing of Māori land in the inquiry district from 1840 until 1865. Section 5.2 establishes the issues for Tribunal determination. The chapter then assesses the transactions, organised geographically: first, 22. Document A70, p164; Ray Fargher, The Best Man Who Ever Served the Crown? A Life of Donald McLean (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 2007), p 58.

23. Fargher, The Best Man Who Ever Served the Crown?, pp130, 164; Alan Ward, 'Donald McLean', in The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed WH Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin; Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), vol 1, p 256.

24. 'The Late Judge Rogan', Auckland Star, 1 July 1899.

in section 5.3, the Mōkau–Awakino purchases are examined; then, in section 5.4, those around Whāingaroa Harbour and the north-west coast. The Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions are addressed next in section 5.5, and finally the sale of the Waipa–Waitetuna block is discussed in section 5.6. Each section concludes with Treaty analysis and findings. The chapter ends with an assessment of prejudice in section 5.7 and a summary of findings, section 5.8.

5.2 ISSUES

This section establishes the issues for Tribunal determination. It looks at relevant findings of other Tribunals, the Crown's concessions and acknowledgements, and claimant and Crown arguments, before distilling a series of issue questions to focus our analysis of Crown purchasing in the inquiry district before 1865.

5.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The Waitangi Tribunal has now considered Crown purchases prior to 1865 in a number of reports, including those arising from the Ngāi Tahu, Muriwhenua Land, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, Te Tau Ihu, and Wairarapa ki Tararua inquiries.

Past Tribunals have noted that, by signing the Treaty, Māori did not necessarily agree to sell their lands only to the Crown.<sup>25</sup> In the Māori text, pre-emption was translated as 'hokonga', understood to refer to buying, selling, or trading, but not denoting any exclusive right. Much, therefore, would have depended on how this clause was explained to the signatories in te reo.<sup>26</sup>

In any case, Tribunals have agreed that whenever the Crown granted itself exclusive purchasing rights, its obligation to protect Māori interests was heightened.<sup>27</sup> The Ngāi Tahu Tribunal found that the granting of a pre-emptive monopoly under article 2 of the Treaty imposed significant reciprocal obligations on the Crown. With Māori unable to find alternative buyers, the Crown was under a strong obligation to ensure that those with whom it was dealing did indeed wish to sell. It was likewise obliged to deal with the utmost good faith in such matters as the quantity of land purchased and the price paid. In Treaty terms, the Crown's duty of active protection obliged it, when exercising its right of pre-emption, to ensure that sellers fully understood the implications of selling their land and that each tribe was left with a sufficient endowment for its own present and future needs.<sup>28</sup> The

---

25. Waitangi Tribunal, He Whakaputanga me te Tiriti, pp 350–351; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 77–78.

26. There is no evidence of any specific discussion of the right of pre-emption with Te Rohe Pōtae signatories, though the missionary Robert Maunsell later said that Māori who signed at Waikato Heads did so on the understanding that 'they retained the rights over their lands but the Queen had power to make laws' (see chapter 3, section 3.3.3).

27. Waitangi Tribunal, The Pouakani Report 1993 (Wellington: Brooker's Ltd, 1993), pp 240–242; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 2, pp 386–388, 418.

28. Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngāi Tahu Report 1991, 3 vols (Wellington: Brooke and Friend, 1991), vol 2, p 277, vol 3 pp 825–826, 832.

Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal went further, arguing that the Crown, by asserting pre-emptive purchasing powers, knowingly entered a fiduciary relationship. This obliged the Crown not only to actively protect Māori land interests, but also to act, as the British colonial under-secretary Herman Merivale put it in 1848, as a ‘trustee for the public good and more particularly as guardian of the native races.’<sup>29</sup>

Previous Tribunals have emphasised that the Crown understood the importance of following exacting standards of conduct when purchasing Māori land. The Te Tau Ihu Tribunal, for example, found that ‘the Crown, in the circumstances of the time, considered prior investigation of Maori customary rights, as determined by their own customary law, to be a vital pre-requisite to its acceptance of any decision to sell.’<sup>30</sup> The Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal found similarly that Crown purchase agents in that region were aware that there was a set of best practice standards which needed to be applied to ensure that Māori did not enter into bargains that were injurious to their wellbeing. To meet these standards, the Tribunal found, the Crown had to ensure that:

- ▶ the rightful owners were the ones selling the land;
- ▶ any disputes regarding rights were resolved before the transactions were completed;
- ▶ boundaries were clearly marked;
- ▶ the price was fair;
- ▶ consent was informed and freely given; and
- ▶ sufficient reserves had been set aside for the long-term interests of tangata whenua.<sup>31</sup>

The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunal agreed that these standards were known to the agents conducting land purchases, and summarised the Crown’s obligations as follows:

In essence, in purchasing a block of land the Crown had to be sure at all times that all Maori who held rights were fully informed on the meaning and permanence of a sale, that they knew its full extent (from a survey or a walking of the boundaries or both), and that they readily assented to the sale, as evidenced by witnessed signatures or marks on the deed. Those who still opposed the sale after all of this were entitled to have their interests cut out of the block.<sup>32</sup>

Where land purchase agents failed to satisfy the Crown’s own standards, Tribunals have concluded that the Crown breached the principles and plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty. After considering Donald McLean’s purchasing practices in the Wairarapa region, for example, the Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal concluded that the Crown failed to adequately investigate all potential right-holders

---

29. Merivale to Beecham, 13 April 1848, quoted in Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 78–79.

30. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Tau Ihu o Te Waka a Maui, vol 1, p 441.

31. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 104–105.

32. Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, p 120.

and that it acquired land before establishing the shares, area, price, and boundaries of the affected areas. This meant that the Crown failed to fulfil its duty of good faith and breached its duty of active protection to Māori.<sup>33</sup>

On the issue of sufficiency, other Tribunals have emphasised the Crown's failure, when reserving land from pre-1865 purchases, to establish clear guidelines regarding the present and future needs of Māori. The Muriwhenua Land Tribunal, for example, suggested that, to establish the area of land that would have constituted 'ample reserves', the Crown should have ascertained the size of the Māori population and 'the quantity, quality, location, and tenure of land required for their future wellbeing'.<sup>34</sup>

Tribunals have similarly found that the Crown had a duty to protect reserved land from future alienation that risked further diminishing the land base of iwi and hapū. This duty was heightened where the Crown itself purchased land that had been previously reserved or excluded from sale. Discussing the purchasing of reserves immediately after setting the land aside, the Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal said:

in a land-based economy like New Zealand in the nineteenth century, Māori needed land if they were to foot it in the new settler dispensation. Quite simply, too little land was reserved. Under these circumstances for the Crown to buy up such reserves as it had seen fit to make – sometimes immediately after making them – was simply opportunistic. It militated against the likelihood that Māori would ever be able to engage in the new economy, and was therefore by definition inappropriate behaviour for the Crown.<sup>35</sup>

5.2.2 Crown concessions and acknowledgements

In this inquiry, the Crown did not ultimately concede any Treaty breaches in relation to Crown purchases before 1865. In opening submissions, the Crown did make one 'conditional' concession in relation to the sufficiency of its purchase reserves:

The Crown concedes that where it did not reserve sufficient land for the present and future needs of the iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae when purchasing land from them before 1865, it failed to uphold its duty under the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles to actively protect the interests of the iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae from whom it purchased land.<sup>36</sup>

In closing submissions, however, the Crown effectively withdrew this concession, submitting 'that there is no evidence on the record of inquiry that supports

---

33. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 185–186.

34. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report (Wellington: GP Publications, 1997), p 333.

35. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, p 262.

36. Statement 1.4.3, p 58.

the application of this concession to any of the pre-1865 transactions in the inquiry district.<sup>37</sup>

5.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

The Tribunal received around 30 specific claims related to the purchase of Māori land in the inquiry district before 1865.<sup>38</sup> The parties were largely in agreement about the standards that applied to the Crown's conduct when it purchased Māori land during this period. The claimants' overall submissions emphasised the Crown's Treaty duties of good faith and active protection.<sup>39</sup> The Crown, for its part, accepted that it was required 'to exercise its monopoly powers of purchase fairly and responsibly, and to apply high standards of good faith and fair dealing while the monopoly was in place'.<sup>40</sup>

The parties fundamentally disagreed, however, on the question of whether the Crown's actions in this inquiry district met the required standards. Indeed, they could hardly have been further apart. The claimants said that all of the land acquired by the Crown before 1865 was procured in breach of Treaty principles, whereas the Crown said 'there is no evidence before the Tribunal demonstrating that land was acquired by the Crown in the Rohe Pōtae in pre-1865 transactions in breach of the Treaty'.<sup>41</sup>

Broadly, the claimants' concerns were threefold.

- ▶ First, the claimants said the Crown pursued transactions in the rohe despite growing opposition from some of those who held customary rights to land. The Crown made inadequate attempts to identify all right holders, and instead repeatedly conducted land transactions with willing sellers only.<sup>42</sup>
- ▶ Secondly, the claimants said that the Crown failed to establish the free and informed consent of right holders. The Crown, claimants said, failed to ensure that Māori fully understood the nature of the alienations and used the promise of European settlement to promote its purchasing agenda.<sup>43</sup> The claimants said the Crown, after acquiring the land, sometimes held it back from sale to Pākehā settlers, leading some Māori to conclude that the purchases were not permanent alienations. To this end, counsel submitted that the Crown was 'reckless and manipulative' in making assurances to Te Rohe

37. Submission 3.4.289, p 11.

38. Wai 1469 (submission 3.4.228); Wai 2014 (submission 3.4.208); Wai 1500 (submission 3.4.160); Wai 1598; Wai 535 (submission 3.4.243(a)); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submissions 3.4.246 and 3.4.246(a)); Wai 849 (submission 3.4.194); Wai 1747; Wai 426 (submission 3.4.146); Wai 827 (submission 3.4.245); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 1897 (submission 3.4.148); Wai 125 (submission 3.4.210); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249(c)); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141).

39. Submission 3.4.105, p 5.

40. Submission 3.4.289, p 3.

41. Submission 3.4.105, p 46; submission 3.4.289, pp 24–25.

42. Submission 3.4.105(a), pp 19–20, 27, 32–33.

43. Submission 3.4.105, pp 38–42.

Pōtae Māori to induce them to sell, ‘when those assurances were not ultimately fulfilled’.<sup>44</sup> The claimants also pointed to what they said were ‘sharp’ or unethical practices employed by the Crown to promote its purchasing aims; the payment of unfairly low prices for some land; and a failure in some cases to adequately identify the extent of land to be alienated.<sup>45</sup>

- ▶ Thirdly, the claimants said the Crown failed to set aside and protect sufficient land from its purchases. They pointed to instances in which the Crown failed to deliver agreed reserves in a timely manner or in the correct location. The claimants alleged that in some cases the Crown allowed reserves to be purchased by settlers, and that the Crown itself purchased some reserved land, despite knowing it had been set aside to benefit Māori.<sup>46</sup>

Together, the claimants said, the three areas of Crown misconduct amounted to serious breaches of the Crown’s Treaty duties of good faith and active protection. As a result, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were prejudiced ‘at an economic, cultural and spiritual level’. Moreover, claimants said, the extent of prejudice was greater for Māori opposed to land sales, and for those from whom the Crown purchased the most land.<sup>47</sup>

The Crown, for its part, denied that it breached Treaty principles by purchasing Māori land in this period. On the contrary, counsel said, ‘all pre-1865 transactions were entered into with willing sellers who had rights to the land, accepted the payments as adequate, and were not coerced into the transactions in any way’.<sup>48</sup> Where it encountered resistance from Māori to its purchasing activities, the Crown said, it did not ‘blindly’ accept offers but took a cautious approach including where there was opposition to sales or contests over ownership.<sup>49</sup>

The Crown acknowledged evidence that its purchasing methods in the inquiry district shifted over time. At first, the Crown said, it negotiated land sales on ‘a more collective basis, through the use of hui to reach agreement amongst the owners’. From the mid-1850s, though, the Crown’s strategy changed. Instead of large hui, the Crown ‘tended to seek out willing sellers, making initial payments to individuals or smaller groups for their interests in various lands with the hope of securing purchases of large blocks’.<sup>50</sup>

However, the Crown did not accept that either of these approaches necessarily breached Treaty principles or caused prejudice to Māori. The Crown rejected the proposition that its purchases were ‘generally undertaken in an underhanded or unfair way’.<sup>51</sup> The Crown submitted, further, that there was no evidence that Māori

---

44. Submission 3.4.105, p 38.

45. Submission 3.4.105(a), pp 23–28.

46. Submission 3.4.105, pp 27–29; submission 3.4.105(a), pp 14–17.

47. Submission 3.4.105, pp 45–46; submission 3.4.105(a), pp 33–36.

48. Submission 3.4.289, p 3.

49. Submission 3.4.289, pp 4.

50. Submission 3.4.289, p 5.

51. Submission 3.4.289, p 5.

misunderstood the nature of the transactions, or were unhappy with payment, and little to suggest that purchase prices or other Crown actions relating to the purchases were in any way unfair.<sup>52</sup>

The Crown said it did not have a duty to create reserves in all pre-1865 transactions, and argued that all purchases in this period left Te Rohe Pōtae Māori with sufficient land ‘for their present and future needs’.<sup>53</sup> The Crown did, however, make a series of acknowledgements about its administration of reserved lands from pre-1865 purchases in the inquiry district. It noted that ‘some of these reserves were not protected from alienation’, and acknowledged evidence that the Crown itself purchased reserve land, including the 1,159-acre Te Mata block at Whāingaroa. The Crown further acknowledged that ‘in some instances it took a long time or was difficult for the owners to receive title to properly utilise the land’.<sup>54</sup>

The Crown therefore conceded the possibility that it ‘may have breached the Treaty where reserve land was on-sold by mistake, or where substituted land was inadequate to compensate for the intended purpose of the original reserve or for the cultural significance of the original reserve’.<sup>55</sup> Ultimately, however, the Crown argued that there was insufficient evidence available to properly establish any breach of Treaty principles or specific prejudice to Māori.<sup>56</sup>

5.2.4 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry<sup>57</sup> and briefly summarised the parties’ arguments, we now identify the issues for us to determine. Our questions are:

- ▶ Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase, including by properly identifying all customary right holders with interests in the land?
- ▶ Did the Crown establish the free and informed consent of right holders, including by:
  - properly identifying the land it was seeking to purchase at the time of the transaction;
  - ensuring that right holders understood the nature of the transaction;
  - using fair negotiation tactics;
  - dealing fairly with opponents to the sale;
  - paying a fair market price; and
  - ensuring payment was distributed fairly?
- ▶ Did the Crown ensure right holders retained sufficient land for their present and future needs?

---

52. Submission 3.4.289, p1.

53. Submission 3.4.289, pp 6–7.

54. Submission 3.4.289, p16.

55. Submission 3.4.310(d), p 25.

56. Submission 3.4.310(d), pp 25–26.

57. Statement 1.4.3, pp 57–59.

5.3 THE MŌKAU–AWAKINO TRANSACTIONS

The Crown began negotiating to purchase land at Mōkau, in the south-western corner of the inquiry district, in 1850. A sustained effort by Crown officials, between 1854 and 1857, resulted in four purchases totalling some 61,000 acres:

- ▶ The Awakino block, estimated at 16,000 acres but later found to be 23,000 acres, was purchased in March 1854.
- ▶ The Mokau block was purchased in May 1854. Nominally comprising 2,500 acres, the extent of the land actually acquired by the Crown was uncertain because opponents to the transaction withheld substantial and ill-defined areas from the sale. It has since been calculated at about 850 acres.
- ▶ The 26,700-acre Taumatamaire block was purchased in January 1855.
- ▶ The 10,200-acre Rauoa block was purchased in July 1857.<sup>58</sup>

The Mōkau area is of great significance to Māoridom. As the resting place of the anchor stone of the Tainui, which was placed in the mouth of the Mōkau River prior to the waka's final journey north to Kāwhia, it is especially important to the Tainui people (see chapter 2). The region's natural abundance, as well as the access afforded to the interior of the North Island via the Mōkau and Awakino Rivers, made Mōkau a highly-prized economic and strategic asset. In addition, the Mōkau region was part of a longstanding border zone between the peoples of Taranaki and Waikato-Maniapoto. The people of Mōkau played vital roles in the conflict, conquest, and peace-making of the 1820s and 1830s, discussed in chapter 2, section 2.5.2.8.<sup>59</sup>

The Mōkau–Awakino purchases of the mid-1850s were the first land transactions between the Crown and Ngāti Maniapoto. They emerged from a desire on the part of some Mōkau Māori for Pākehā settlement and access to European goods and capital. The Mōkau rangatira Tākerei Waitara had spearheaded successful efforts to foster trade with Europeans through the late 1840s. Inland Māori with interests at Mōkau, including the Ngāti Rōrā rangatira Taonui Hikaka, were also in favour of accessing European goods and had facilitated the settlement of French trader Louis Hetet for that purpose.<sup>60</sup>

The Crown's interest in Mōkau reflected increased settler demand for land, as well as the suitability of the area for European settlement and economic development. By 1850, settlers in Taranaki had become frustrated by growing Māori opposition to land sales around New Plymouth and began pressuring the Government to acquire land to the north, including around Mōkau.<sup>61</sup> The mouth of the Mōkau River was seen as a potential port, and there were reports of rich mineral deposits upriver, including coal said to resemble that of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 'which makes the best coke in the world.'<sup>62</sup>

58. Document A70, p 256; doc A21 p 41; doc A147(b) (Stirling), pp 77–78.

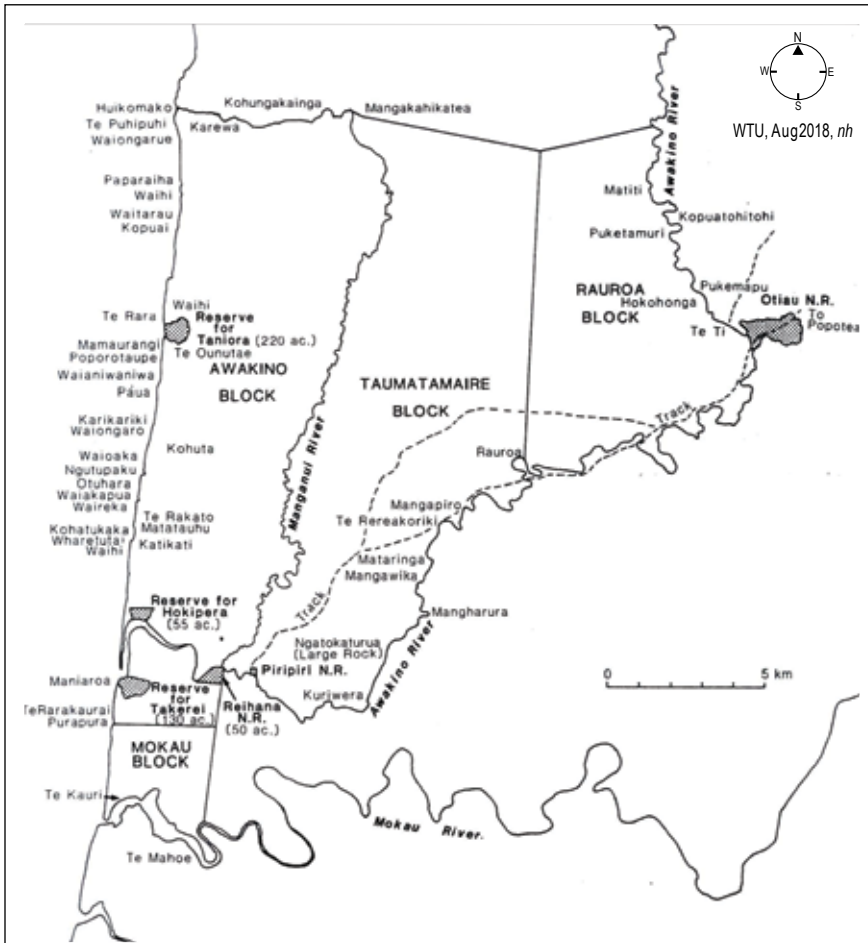

59. Document A28, pp 11–13; doc A70(b), p 9.

60. Document A28, pp 34–35; doc A70, pp 17–18, 157.

61. Document A70, p 159; doc A28, pp 50–51.

62. Document A70, p 159; doc A28, p 71.

Map 5.2: The Mōkau–Awakino transactions

While the Crown and some Māori were eager to engage in land transactions, others remained cautious. In the aftermath of the conflict between Waikato-Maniapoto and Taranaki in the early nineteenth century, and particularly as Taranaki Māori looked to return to the coastal districts south of Mōkau, some Ngāti Maniapoto leaders were concerned to control European access into the region. Taonui asserted his authority at Mōkau in the mid-1840s by placing a tapu on the Mōkau region. Worried by the effect that this would have on trade, Tākerei eventually persuaded Taonui to lift the tapu, on the assumption that they would be able to maintain control for their mutual benefit.<sup>63</sup> (For a more detailed account of these events, see chapter 3, section 3.4.3.3.)

63. Document A28, pp 37–39; doc A70, pp 179–180.

Tensions along the northern Taranaki coast eased further in April 1848, when Tākerei and other Ngāti Maniapoto hosted a large party of Te Ātiawa, led by Te Rangitake. Many were returning from years spent living in the Kapiti region. The result of the hui appears to have been agreement to establish a clear demarcation at Waikāramuramu, south of Parininihi and north of Pukearuhe (see chapter 6). However, the potential for discord was not altogether removed. Also in April 1848, the Taranaki rangatira Te Teira sent a letter to McLean offering to sell land along the Poutama coast north of Waikāramuramu, including Mōkau and Mohakatio. This was an area where Ngāti Maniapoto asserted substantial interests.<sup>64</sup> In this context, the Crown's return to the area to purchase land in the 1850 was significant. Relationships would need to be handled well.

5.3.1 The parties' positions

The Tribunal received several submissions relating specifically to the four Mōkau–Awakino transactions.<sup>65</sup>

In submissions on the Awakino purchase, claimants argued that the Crown failed to identify and establish the consent of all right holders and ignored ongoing opposition from some right holders.<sup>66</sup> The claimants suggested that the Crown used the promise of a European settlement at Mōkau to promote its purchasing agenda, and in doing so, made assurances to Tākerei and others that they would benefit economically from the transaction. This amounted to a failure to ensure that Māori fully understood the nature of the alienation. The claimants argued that, for Mōkau Māori, the sale of the land was conditional on the establishment of a European settlement. They also said this and the other Mōkau transactions were conducted in accordance with customary expectations that future generations would continue to benefit from their association with the land.<sup>67</sup> In addition, claimants said the Crown failed to pay a fair price for the land, and raised numerous issues regarding the Crown's administration of reserved lands.<sup>68</sup>

In submissions on the Mokau purchase, the claimants argued that the Crown failed to identify all customary right holders and continued to pursue its purchasing agenda despite significant opposition. They alleged that the Crown pressured some Māori to promote the sale of the land to other Māori; that the purchase price paid for the Mokau block was unfair; that the Crown used the provision of reserves to pacify opposition, allowing it to avoid determining the rights of those opposed to the land that would be sold; and that the Crown failed in its responsibility to protect land set aside from the transaction.<sup>69</sup>

---

64. Document A28, pp 62–64.

65. Wai 535 (submission 3.4.243(a)); Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349 (submissions 3.4.246 and 3.4.246(a)); Wai 849 (submission 3.4.194).

66. Submission 3.4.105, p 25; submission 3.4.243(a), p 12.

67. Submission 3.4.105, pp 38–42; submission 3.4.243(a), pp 9–12; submission 3.4.246(a), p 135.

68. Submission 3.4.246, pp 94–100.

69. Submission 3.4.105, pp 19–21, 33–38; submission 3.4.246, pp 85–89, 94–109; submission 3.4.246(a), pp 139–141.

In submissions on the Taumatamaire purchase, the claimants argued that the Crown failed to identify all right holders with interests in the land and that it completed the transaction in the face of ongoing opposition from some Mōkau Māori. The claimants alleged that the Crown failed to protect land set aside from the alienation.<sup>70</sup>

In submissions on the Rauroa transaction, the claimants said the Crown failed to identify all right holders before completing the transaction, paid an inadequate price for the land, and set aside inadequate reserves.<sup>71</sup> In addition, the claimants suggested that the Crown delayed surveying the Rauroa block in a deliberate move to impoverish Mōkau Māori and thereby promote further land sales.<sup>72</sup>

The Crown, for its part, cited the Awakino purchase in support of its position that pre-1865 Crown purchases were initiated by willing Māori sellers, who accepted the price as adequate and were in no way coerced. Crown counsel pointed to ‘the large amount of evidence concerning Takerei’s enthusiasm and persistence in seeking a sale to the Crown.’<sup>73</sup> Counsel also rejected claimant assertions that the Crown gave assurances that European settlement would follow any purchase, citing Boulton’s statement that ‘no specific representation to this effect was made by the Crown.’<sup>74</sup>

The Crown did not specifically address the circumstances of the Mokau block purchase. In closing submissions, the Crown said it was unaware of any pre-1865 transactions ‘that amounted to less than outright sales’, noting that ‘some purported sales were not completed, although some payments may have been made by the Crown with the intention of securing purchases.’<sup>75</sup> The Crown made no specific submissions on the Taumatamaire or Rauroa purchases.

The Crown did note issues with the later substitution of land for Weterē’s and Reihana’s 50-acre reserves in the Awakino block, and accepted there was ‘prima facie evidence of prejudice resulting from title delays and/or failure to protect reserves by survey or otherwise’. Ultimately, though, the Crown said there was no evidence of Māori protest or opposition to the substitutions, and no specific prejudice had been demonstrated.<sup>76</sup>

5.3.2 Background to the transactions

The Mōkau–Awakino transactions had their origins in Crown efforts to cement closer relationships with Mōkau hapū. In the late 1840s, Governor Grey and land purchase officer Donald McLean visited Mōkau several times. They sought to foster a relationship with Tākerei Waitara, a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira who was known to be eager to take advantage of trade opportunities with Pākehā.<sup>77</sup> In 1847, 70. Submission 3.4.243(a), pp 11–14; submission 3.4.246(a), p 140.

71. Submission 3.4.105, pp 43; submission 3.4.246(a), p 135; submission 3.4.243(a), p 13.

72. Submission 3.4.105, pp 42–44.

73. Submission 3.4.289, p 4.

74. Submission 3.4.289, p 18.

75. Submission 3.4.289, p 14.

76. Submission 3.4.289, p 7; submission 3.4.310(d), p 25–26.

77. Document A110 (Joseph), p 458.

Tākerei Waitara visited Grey in Auckland in the hope that Grey could assist in securing the sailing ship Hydrus. He had purchased the vessel some years previously but was yet to take possession of it. Grey returned Tākerei's visit in 1849, personally delivering the Hydrus to Mōkau. It was then that Tākerei took Grey's name: Tā Kerei, or Sir Grey.<sup>78</sup>

In March 1850, Tākerei and other Mōkau Māori asked McLean to visit their home. He obliged by spending 13 days there. McLean recorded that he found the people there 'all favourable to the disposal of the Awakino tract of land, and expressing a desire to have many Europeans among them.'<sup>79</sup> Upon inspecting the land, however, McLean formed the view that the Crown would do better to purchase land on either side of the Mōkau River, to the south of the Awakino, and that the area included should extend some 25 miles upriver.<sup>80</sup> He therefore declined Tākerei's offer, on the grounds that it would not deliver a large block that suited the Crown's aims for settlement in the region. Boulton suggested that this decision may have also reflected McLean's growing awareness of divisions within Māori at Mōkau and elsewhere in the region over the merits of selling land.<sup>81</sup> We find this interpretation plausible.

Although these initial discussions had no concrete result, McLean's visit came to the attention of Taonui Hikaka. While his main pā was inland at Te Paripari (near modern-day Te Kūiti), Taonui also resided on the upper reaches of the Mōkau River.<sup>82</sup> Taonui's initial response to McLean's visit was reportedly to offer the same Awakino land for sale, apparently as an assertion of his own rights there. Taonui's stance towards land sales appears to have changed in May 1850, however, as the result of a hui held at Te Paripari. There, Te Kaka, a Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira whose lands bordered the Mōkau River, warned Taonui against selling land to the Crown. According to Louis Hetet, 'a grand committee' comprising Te Kaka and other opponents of land sales told Taonui that 'while he remained peacefully at home and sold no land he would be respected by all Europeans but directly he sold any land they would make a slave of him for he must go here and there where they bid him'. If he did choose to sell land, they warned, Taonui risked becoming like the old Rauparaha [Te Rauparaha] and John Heki [Hone Heke] and others for when the white people had got all out of him and had no further [want] of him they would dispise [sic] him, but they say remain as he is at present and he will be respected by all Maories and white[s] . . .<sup>83</sup>

---

78. Document A28, pp 54–56. The ship, renamed the Parininihi, was seized by the Government after the Taranaki war.

79. Document A28, p 57; doc A70, pp 183–184.

80. Document A28, p 58; doc A70, p 184.

81. Document A70, p 199, 248, 262, 452.

82. According to the French writer and artist George Angas, Taonui considered himself 'lord of all Mōkau' (doc S9(b), pp 2–3; doc A110, p 395; doc A28, p 66).

83. Document A28, pp 47, 68; doc A70, pp 188–189; see also Louis Hetet, Te Paripari, to Donald McLean, 9 May 1850, McLean Papers, Ms-0032–0338.

Taonui appears to have taken this advice to heart. From this point on, he did not contemplate offering to sell any Ngāti Maniapoto land north of the Mōkau River. At times, Taonui and his people appeared to be willing to allow Tākerei to transact in small areas of land, including the Awakino coastal strip, but they remained firmly opposed to the prospect of purchasing extending upriver.

Shortly after McLean's visit in 1850, Taonui did offer to sell land in Taranaki south of Pukearuhe-Waikāramuramu.<sup>84</sup> It is unclear whether this was a serious offer, or whether it was a response to counter Tākerei's offer at Mōkau (or indeed Te Teira's prior offer of April 1848). Historians Paul Thomas and Vincent O'Malley argued that early offers of land often represented assertions of customary rights and so were not necessarily intended as 'sales' in the European sense.<sup>85</sup> We find this persuasive, especially in respect of situations where those rights were subject to claim and counter-claim. This was undoubtedly the case along the Poutama coast south of Mōkau where both Ngāti Maniapoto and Taranaki returnees continued to assert rights to the land.

5.3.3 Negotiation and opposition, 1852–57

Although he was aware of the complex interplay of customary rights in the Mōkau region, McLean pressed ahead with his plans to purchase land. Crown officials returned to Mōkau in 1852, again seeking large areas of land suitable for European settlement. Negotiations commenced for what would eventually become the Awakino block, purchased in 1854, and the Mokau block, part of which the Crown purported to acquire in 1854, although that purchase remained incomplete. Later, the Crown purchased the Taumatamaire block, in 1855, and the Rauoro block, in 1857.

5.3.3.1 Crown efforts to secure land on the Mōkau River, 1852

In 1852, after receiving further reports of coal seam outcrops along the Mōkau River, McLean sent surveyor John Rogan and purchase officer GS Cooper to Mōkau to progress negotiations. McLean and his agents paid special attention to land on either side of the river as far inland as 'Maungaharakeke' (Mangaharakeke Creek). McLean described this part of the valley as being 'most valuable . . . having a good navigable river . . . with abundance of coal, limestone, timber, and flax . . . together with several flats of rich land well adapted for agriculture.'<sup>86</sup>

To persuade the Mōkau hapū to sell their land, both McLean and Cooper raised the prospect of European settlement. Writing in his diary between March and April 1850, McLean explained how he had told Mōkau Māori he 'would see the land, and then talk about the purchase; that we desired the limestone and coal,

---

84. Document A28, p 68.

85. Document A28, pp 48–49, 68–69; doc A23, p 167.

86. McLean to colonial secretary, 27 March 1850, Turton's Epitome, c.XIII, Aotea, Kawhia and Mokau, no 12 (doc A28, p 58); doc A70, p 184.

if they desired the Europeans.<sup>87</sup> Writing to Tākerei in December 1852, Cooper insisted:

Both sides of Mokau must be given up at one time, and then I will go down to Mokau and conclude the arrangements, that a town may be built at that place, that it may be cultivated by Europeans, so that the land may be improved, and that we all and our children may dwell together, and that we may grow and increase in wealth and strength as one people, and that our children may climb together to the summit of worldly prosperity.<sup>88</sup>

Despite these efforts, Mōkau Māori refused to make their valuable river lands available for sale. And reports of opposition increased. Some Mōkau rangatira sent letters to Taonui, warning him of the activities of Rogan and Cooper. Te Kaka, who had urged Taonui against land sales at Te Paripari in 1850, continued to express his opposition.<sup>89</sup> Apparently undeterred, Tākerei refused to let Rogan depart until Cooper, a more senior Crown official, arrived. Cooper reiterated McLean's earlier statement that the Crown would only purchase in the larger area. Cooper later said he had offered £2,000 in 1852 for the area inland to Maungaharakeke. But there was no support for this; even Tākerei refused.<sup>90</sup>

The first offer to sell what became the Mokau block on the northern bank of the Mōkau River came from Te Watihi (also known as Peketahi) and his brother Te Wētini Ngakahawai. Cooper replied that the purchase had to extend 25 miles upriver and refused their offer. Te Watihi and Te Wētini replied in turn that all the land in that area belonged to hapū who resided in the interior, represented by Te Kaka. However, Te Kaka was not prepared to allow any transactions further upriver until he was sure that the smaller Mōkau transaction proposed by Te Watihi and Te Wētini had proven to be a success.<sup>91</sup>

Crown officials resolved to meet with Taonui to break the impasse. They were also interested in discussing Taonui's prior offer to sell land to the Crown in the Poutama region, to the south of Mōkau. Te Kaka and his people refused to permit the officials to travel upriver. Cooper described the obstruction as 'extraordinary'.<sup>92</sup>

Unable to acquire the land they sought and unwilling to purchase the land on offer, the Crown's purchase agents left Mōkau late in 1852 with nothing to show for their efforts.

A year later, the Crown returned to the negotiating table with a renewed interest in the region. According to Thomas, by late 1853 the Crown had come to a view that the Mōkau purchase would be 'an important step towards acquiring the

87. Document A28, p 58; doc A70, p 184.

88. Document A28, pp 85–86.

89. Document A28, p 75.

90. Document A28, pp 58, 78, 81, 85, 89; doc A70, p 206.

91. Document A28, p 79.

92. Document A28, p 79.

strategically and economically valuable northern Taranaki region' and might also facilitate the Crown 'sweeping further north and into the interior'.<sup>93</sup>

5.3.3.2 The Awakino purchase, March 1854

The Awakino block lay adjacent to the coastline and included both the northern and southern sides of the Awakino River estuary. When it was purchased, the Crown estimated the block to cover 16,000 acres. On survey in the 1880s, the block was discovered to be 23,000 acres in extent.<sup>94</sup>

When Crown officials returned to Mōkau late in 1853, they were willing to agree to transactions that they had earlier declined. This included the land at Awakino that Tākerei had offered McLean in March 1850 to encourage Europeans to settle among his people. Previously, officials had considered the land too rugged and remote to be attractive to settlers. Now, in a letter to the colonial secretary, McLean explained that his renewed interest in Awakino was part of a broader strategy of initiating further purchases in the interior. He wrote, 'I am in hopes that the purchase of this land from an influential branch of the Waikato tribe will tend to the acquisition of a large extent of country extending inland from Awakino towards the Waipa district'.<sup>95</sup>

In late 1853 and early 1854, McLean wrote a series of letters encouraging chiefs in the region around Mōkau to enter into large-scale land sales. He also dispatched Rogan to make arrangements with willing sellers. But Rogan soon reported to McLean that all but one of the replies he had received expressed opposition to the proposal. The only offer, again, was from Tākerei and again in respect of the Awakino coastal strip. Rogan's assessment was that this land consisted of 'terrible mountains'.<sup>96</sup>

Nevertheless, Rogan proceeded to finalise arrangements for the purchase of land at Awakino. McLean's instructions were to survey off the block and reserves – there is no evidence that Rogan was advised to walk the boundaries with Māori to ensure their accuracy. A sketch map of the land was made based on physical boundaries, and the block's area was estimated at 16,000 acres.<sup>97</sup> On this basis, the Crown offered £500 to Tākerei and his supporters. Tākerei agreed that a further £30 to be paid to the Nelson-based hapū Ngāti Rarua, one of several groups living outside of Mōkau who claimed interests in the area.<sup>98</sup>

As mentioned, it was not until the 1880s, when the land was finally surveyed, that the Awakino block was discovered to be 23,000 acres in extent, nearly half

93. Document A28, p 87.

94. Document A147(b), p 35. Using GIS, Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell calculated the combined area of the Awakino and Mokau purchase blocks to be 24,082 acres: doc A21, p 41. This suggests that the 23,000-acre figure is broadly accurate, given that the Crown acquired some 850 acres through the Mokau purchase (see section 5.3.3.2).

95. Document A28, p 87; doc A70, pp 258–259.

96. Document A28, p 88.

97. Document A70, p 182; doc A28, p 94.

98. Thomas suggested that the inclusion of Ngāti Rarua may have been motivated by the Crown's desire to purchase land in the northern South Island. See doc A28, pp 82, 89.

as big again as originally estimated.<sup>99</sup> The Crown made no attempt to compensate the former owners for what was effectively a significant underpayment in terms of the price per acre. Whereas the £530 total payment would have represented about eight pence per acre if the block was 16,000 acres in size, for 23,000 acres the equivalent figure was less than sixpence per acre. The matter was later the subject of a petition and an inquiry by the Native Land Court (see sidebar).

The evidence suggests that the Crown's agents did not place a priority on ensuring that all potential right holders agreed to the Awakino transaction. Despite his awareness of the complexity of customary rights at Mōkau, McLean indicated that he would not be willing to entertain thoughts of paying Taranaki Māori for their interests in the land.<sup>100</sup> Moreover, when the Crown tried to purchase the Mokau block a short while later (see section 5.4.2.3), it was noted that some of those who opposed the transaction were Ngāti Maniapoto people who had been omitted from the Awakino purchase.<sup>101</sup>

This, too, was the assessment of Cort H Schnackenberg, the Wesleyan missionary stationed at Mōkau who, despite his role in assisting McLean's purchasing efforts, was on occasion critical of Crown actions towards Māori in the region. Early in 1854 Schnackenberg wrote to McLean, calling on him to heed the opposition from some Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira to land sales. While Schnackenberg had been visited by a group of Māori who wished to sell land, he warned McLean that important figures including Te Kaka, Taonui, and his son Te Kuri remained opposed. He suggested that McLean – and not Tākerei – was the best man to engage with the 'the opposition party', or else the chiefs 'must be allowed time to come forward with their offer'.<sup>102</sup>

In a later letter to a Wesleyan colleague, Schnackenberg questioned how the 70 names listed on the March 1854 Awakino purchase deed could represent the many hundreds of people who occupied the land. He said some 360 Māori lived in the affected area, adding that 'I do not think that I can be out 5 either way – I know all'.<sup>103</sup>

The £500 for the Awakino block was initially paid in January 1854.<sup>104</sup> Crown officials then requested that the money be returned so it could be presented to Tākerei in public. In March 1854, Tākerei's sons Wetere and Te Rangituataka (also known as Reihana) escorted McLean from New Plymouth. Arriving at Mōkau, McLean faced considerable disquiet from Māori about the price that had been paid. Many viewed it as a partial payment only, and when McLean insisted that no additional payments would be made, negotiations temporarily broke down.<sup>105</sup> After further discussion, the signing of the deed went ahead on 28 March, attended

99. Document A147(b), p 35.

100. Document A28, p 98.

101. Document A28, pp 81, 87–88.

102. Document A28, p 97; doc A70, p 203.

103. Document A28, p 96.

104. Document A70, pp 201–202; doc A28, p 89.

105. Document A28, p 89.

by McLean, Rogan, and Schnackenberg, among other Pākehā. Thomas concluded that Mōkau Māori understood the event, which, as Rogan noted, was conducted ‘in public, in presence of their own missionary’, as the commencement of a formal relationship with the Crown.<sup>106</sup> We think it likely that the ceremony accorded to the hui reflected the value that Tākerei and other supporters of land sales placed on attracting Europeans to the region, and their hopes for a township.

McLean handed the £500 to Tākerei ‘as he was the man of great consequence amongst them’. Tākerei then divided the money to ‘the heads of the hapus or families’.<sup>107</sup> After the signing, though, further disagreement erupted about the purchase price. In response to claims that the Crown had initially offered £2,000 for the land, Cooper clarified that his 1852 offer of £2,000 had been for land on the Mōkau River inland to Maungaharakeke, not for the Awakino block.<sup>108</sup>

Yet McLean boasted to the Colonial Treasurer that he had acquired the Awakino block for the lowest possible amount, while Cooper congratulated McLean on ‘obtaining Takerei’s land at so reasonable a price’.<sup>109</sup> Schnackenberg agreed that the price was low, writing to a colleague that the money, once divided among the ‘Mokau, Awakino, Waikawau, Ruakaka and Motueha folks’, would be ‘lost like a straw on the dry sand and not worth the time they have spent in commiti [sic] about it’.<sup>110</sup>

The purchase deed for Awakino was signed on 28 March 1854 by Tākerei, Te Haurua, Te Waka Wharau, Mihipeka, Rangiparea, Reihana Takarei, Aperehama te Ranipikitea and more than 60 others, and more than 60 others. The deed, in te reo Māori, indicated that the signatories also included five children between the ages of two and six. The deed declared that the signatories gave their ‘full and true consent . . . to entirely transfer a portion of our land or country to Victoria’ and her successors forever, and also consented to roads or highways through their reserves when required (‘Ko nga ara ruri nui o te Kuini e tukua e matou kia haere i nga wahi kua wakatapua mo matou i te wa e ruritia ai aua ara’).<sup>111</sup>

Payment for the land included £500 to be received on the day of signing, and a further £30 to ‘be reserved for the Ngatirua of Nelson which is to be handed to them by Takarei’: ‘Heoi rawa nga utu mo tenei whenua koia enei ko nga rau E rima £500 kua riro mai ki a matou i tenei ra E toru tonu tekau pauna £30 takitahi e toe ake nei mo nga tangata o Ngatirua kei Wakatu ma Takarei ano e homai ki a ratou.’<sup>112</sup>

Two further receipts record that the £30 was paid to Ngāti Rarua in 1856.<sup>113</sup> A further payment of £100 was made by the Crown on 1 August 1854 to chiefs

106. Document A28, p 93.

107. Document A28, p 93.

108. Document A28, p 89; doc A70, p 206.

109. Document A28, p 90; doc A70, p 206.

110. Document A28, p 90; doc A70, p 205.

111. HH Turton, Maori Deeds of Old Private Land Purchases in New Zealand (Wellington: Government Printer, 1883), pp 623–625 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 449–451).

112. Turton, Maori Deeds, pp 623–625 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 449–451).

113. Document A70(a), vol 1, pp 405–410.

from the Waikato iwi of Ngāti Hāua for a vague area described as ‘all our lands at Awakino at Papaitai and on to Taumata maire[sic]’<sup>114</sup>

The Crown set aside six areas of land from the Awakino transaction: the Ounutae, Rangitoto, Waikato, and Ketekarino reserves, and two blocks for Tākerei’s sons Wetera and Reihana.<sup>115</sup> The Crown’s subsequent administration of the reserves created numerous problems for Mōkau Māori, which are examined in section 5.3.4.1.

---

114. Document A70(a), vol 1, pp 231–241. Thomas concluded that ‘McLean, in preparation for the planned purchase of more Awakino lands, had decided to alienate all Ngati Haua’s claimed interests in this area’: doc A28, pp 116–117.

115. Document A147(b), p 44.

Mōkau Māori Challenge the Awakino Block Purchase Price in the Twentieth Century

In 1938, Mōkau Māori brought to the Crown’s attention their longstanding grievance about the inaccurate 1854 estimate of the size of the Awakino block. In a petition to Parliament that year, Rangirere Te Maenae and 58 others noted that, whereas the deed gave the area as 16,000 acres, the Crown obtained title to 23,000 acres. This had the effect of significantly reducing the price per acre Māori received for the block.

The petition was recommended to the Government for inquiry, and in turn referred to the Native Land Court. The court heard the matter in 1941 and Judge EW Beechey reported in 1942, finding in favour of the petitioners. Beechey found that the Crown, through its own error, acquired ‘a substantial area that it did not intend to acquire’ and that ‘if the Native owners had been aware that the block contained 23,000 acres, the purchase price of £530 would have been proportionately greater, and that they have lost the money equivalent since 1854 and that this sum compounded at 5 per cent is what they should receive’. Accordingly, Beechey ruled that ‘it is only equitable that the Crown should pay for what it got on the basis fixed by it’.<sup>1</sup>

However, Chief Judge GP Shepherd disagreed. In recommendations to the Native Minister that accompanied Beechey’s report, Shepherd suggested that the Awakino purchase ‘was not of an area defined with any regard to the niceties of survey, but of a tract of land lying within boundaries of which were determined by natural features. The description of the deed makes no mention of acreage.’ (Historian Bruce Stirling observed that, while Shepherd was correct that the text of the deed makes no reference to the acreage of the block, he neglected to note that the sketch plan on the deed clearly does note the area as 16,000 acres.) Shepherd then reasoned that ‘the quantum of the purchase price certainly had no reference to a value calculated as on an acreage basis’ and suggested that, ‘in the face of the terms of the conveyance, any loss – and it is not suggested here that there was any loss – must lie where it fell.’<sup>2</sup>

---

1. Document A147(b), pp 38–39.

Ultimately, the Native Minister accepted Shepherd’s recommendations and the petitioners were unsuccessful in their claim. As far as the Tribunal is aware, the Crown is yet to acknowledge the 7,000 acres of surplus it acquired without payment through its inaccurate 1854 estimate of the size of the Awakino block.

---

2. Document A147(b), pp 39–41.

5.3.3.3 The Mokau purchase, May 1854

The Mokau block was situated adjacent to the coast, between the Awakino block and the northern bank of the Mōkau River. When the Crown sought to purchase the land in May 1854, it was estimated to contain 2,500 acres, although this figure included a substantial portion withheld by opponents to the sale, thought at the time by the missionary Schnackenberg to be about 500 acres.<sup>116</sup> According to Stirling, however, approximately 1,300 acres were ultimately removed from the block, roughly half of the original 2,500-acre estimate. On this basis, Stirling calculated the area the Crown purported to acquire in the Mokau purchase comprised only about 850 acres.<sup>117</sup>

With the Awakino transaction complete, McLean’s attention turned to the other parcel of land offered by Mōkau Māori in earlier negotiations. In March 1854, immediately after completing the Awakino purchase, McLean offered Te Wētini Ngakahawai and other Mōkau Māori £200 for the Mokau block. Te Wētini had been involved in Cooper’s attempt to purchase land in 1852. He and other right holders had refused to include some of the best lands on the Mōkau River, including sites of cultural significance and land that, if retained, would enable Māori to benefit economically from the arrival of Europeans.<sup>118</sup> When negotiations resumed, McLean refused either to offer more than £200 or to remove any land from the block (other than the land around the kāinga at Te Kauri). These initial attempts to finalise the transaction made little progress and, upon his departure from Mōkau, McLean left the matter in the hands of Rogan.<sup>119</sup>

Mr Thomas argued that the ‘Crown’s aim was evidently to tempt or pressure Te Wētini and others into a quick agreement and to gain land through creating

---

116. Document A28, p 105; doc A70, pp 260–263.

117. Document A147(b), pp 77–78.

118. Document A28, p 78; doc A70, pp 259–260.

119. Document A28, pp 101–102.

competition between chiefs.<sup>120</sup> To this end, McLean left Rogan £300, of which £200 was to be made available to Te Wētini and others if they agreed to sell the Mokau block. If Te Wētini delayed, he risked allowing Rogan to use the money to pay Tākerei, with whom Rogan was now negotiating to obtain land to the east of the Awakino block. When Rogan temporarily left Mōkau, he left all £300 in the care of Tākerei and the pressure on Te Wētini appears to have intensified. Te Wētini soon asked Rogan to resume negotiations for the Mokau block.<sup>121</sup>

On his return, Rogan faced a markedly different scene than McLean had met earlier in the year. Te Kaka and Taonui's son Te Kuri were at Mōkau and had met with Schnackenberg in the preceding days to reassert their opposition. Rogan was now face-to-face with major opponents to the Crown's efforts to purchase land in the region.<sup>122</sup>

On 27 April 1854, Rogan met separately with supporters and opponents of the proposed purchase. At one hui, he suggested to Te Wētini and Hōne Pūmipi, who supported the deal, that he would pay them £100 and hold back the other £100 until the opponents could be induced to sell. Te Wētini and Pūmipi agreed to this proposal. The next day, an open hui was held to discuss the Mokau block transaction, attended by Rogan, Schnackenberg, and Māori from both camps.<sup>123</sup> At the hui, Rogan failed to convince the opponents to sell their interests in the Mokau block. As a result, he proposed an alternative approach to the transaction, suggesting that part of the block be purchased from the willing sellers, who would receive £100 of the purchase money. The remaining £100 would be available to the non-sellers, should they decide at a future stage to include their lands within the purchase area.<sup>124</sup> The fact that this amounted to 50 per cent of the purchase price suggests that Rogan estimated the interests of the non-sellers to equate to as much as half of the estimated 2,500 acres. This is a significant contrast with Schnackenberg's assessment of about 500 acres.

According to Rogan, his proposal met with general agreement from both parties. However, the subsequent actions of Te Kuri and Te Kaka suggest that Rogan either seriously misread or deliberately misrepresented the mood of the hui.<sup>125</sup> On the morning of 30 April, Te Kuri and Te Kaka made their way out to the Mōkau heads to place a tapu on the river 'kia tutakina te awa mo nga pakeha' (to close the river to the Pākehā).<sup>126</sup> In our view the tapu was a manifestation of their rangatiratanga and a clear expression of their refusal to permit the sale of Mōkau lands to the Crown. In placing a tapu on the Mōkau River, Te Kuri and Te Kaka were asserting their authority in a manner consistent with the actions of rangatira elsewhere during the early 1850s who applied tapu to protect land from being sold.<sup>127</sup>

---

120. Document A28, p 102.

121. Document A28, p 102; doc A70, p 260.

122. Document A28, p 103.

123. Document A28, p 103; doc A70, p 261.

124. Document A28, pp 103–104; doc A70, p 261.

125. Document A28, p 103.

126. Document A28, p 104; doc A70, p 264.

127. Document A28, p 106.

Despite the actions of these rangatira, and despite proposing to pay only half of what had originally been offered, Rogan pursued what he understood at the time to be the alienation of virtually the whole Mokau block. On the following day – 1 May 1854 – a deed of sale for the block was signed by Te Wētini, Tarati Mahoro, Tiki Poti te Pukahu, Rawiri Ngarinui, Karorina Hemoata, Manihera Wairaweke, Pūmipi, Tawhao, Te Aka, Nuiton te Painui, Wereta Tipoka, Ruihia Huirangi, Kerei Pouwhero, and more than 50 others identified as ‘the chiefs and people of ngati maniapoto.’<sup>128</sup> The Crown signatory was Donald McLean, and the witnesses included Schnackenberg and Tākerei.

Payment for this land was £100, although the deed also referred to a further £100 ‘[t]he hundred pounds remaining is for the three places, which have not yet been agreed to’ (‘me te rau kotahi e toe ake nei mo nga wahi e toru tahi kahore ano i wakaetia’). The deed named these three ‘places which have not been agreed to by some of our people’ (‘[k]o nga wahi i roto o te rohe kahore ano i whakaetia e etahi atu tangata koia enei’), as Te Kauri, Te Waipuna, and Tokowhaiti. It then described the boundaries of Te Kauri and Tokowhaiti, however Te Waipuna was simply named in the deed, with no physical description.<sup>129</sup>

Mr Thomas suggested that these lands equated to what Rogan and Schnackenberg considered to be the interests of the non-sellers. We agree. Te Kauri aside, there is little suggestion that the exclusion of these lands reflected any direct consultation with the non-sellers. Importantly, the deed did not clearly establish the extent of the lands withheld from sale, nor whose interests they represented. These ambiguities would prove troublesome in years to come.<sup>130</sup>

Those who signed the deed received £100 for their interests, an amount Schnackenberg later described as ‘paltry’. He said that, on account of the low price, ‘nearly all the money was taken by children as the Natives said it is only “te kapa”, pennies or cooper [copper] coins.’<sup>131</sup> According to Thomas, Crown officials ‘were delighted’ that Rogan had secured the land for so little, given that it purported to transfer a strategic location at the mouth of the Mōkau River and contained land of considerably higher quality than the Awakino block.<sup>132</sup> Against this, however, must be weighed the fact that, when the reserves from the Mokau transaction were finalised many years later (see section 5.3.4), it would emerge that the Crown had actually acquired little more than 850 acres.<sup>133</sup> This meant the £100 represented approximately two shillings and fourpence per acre of land purchased.

After the deed was signed, officials continued their efforts to acquire the remaining Māori interests in the block. Throughout the rest of May 1854, McLean sent koha to Te Kaka, seeking to induce him to sell his interests, while Rogan held extended discussions with Te Kaka and Te Kuri, during which he doubled the 128. References to the Māori text and English translation of this deed are to Turton, Maori Deeds, pp 625–627 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 411–421).

129. Turton, Maori Deeds, pp 625–627 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 411–421).

130. Document A28, pp 104–105.

131. Document A28, p 105; doc A70, p 292.

132. Document A28, pp 105–106.

133. Document A147(b), pp 77–78.

Crown's offer for their interests from £100 to £200.<sup>134</sup> The rangatira were unswayed. Te Kaka and Te Kuri wrote to Crown officials 'warning them not to send a vessel there as the river was tapu'd. Meanwhile, hui were held at Kāwhia – reportedly attended by more than 100 Māori, including Taonui – with the goal of preventing additional land sales at Mōkau and beyond.<sup>135</sup> As a result of these hui, the rangatira Nuitone Te Pakarū placed a further tapu over a large land area stretching from Mōkau north to Harihari, near Kāwhia.<sup>136</sup>

Making little progress in finalising the transaction, Rogan turned his attention to identifying and surveying those portions of the Mokau block the Crown had acquired. Here, too, he found progress difficult. As noted above, the Crown set aside portions of the Mokau block for non-sellers prior to the deed signing. However, in doing so, its agents did not identify the respective interests of Mōkau Māori in the sale block. Subsequent efforts to do so ultimately proved to be a near impossible task.<sup>137</sup> Speaking to his efforts to survey the land throughout May 1854, Rogan said:

The natives who were willing to sell set about pointing out their individual claims, and with a view of obtaining the boundaries of the whole piece to be disposed of. The sum of their several claims forming the piece they would offer to the Government. In the attempt they differed among themselves as to their individual rights, and even when some of them had settled the boundaries and marked them on the ground, the parties adverse to the sale disputed the boundaries.<sup>138</sup>

Opponents of the sale also disputed the Crown's proposal to include the Te Māhoe mission station lands in its purchase. Schnackenberg had hoped thereby to acquire a Crown grant for approximately 200 acres for the Wesleyan mission.<sup>139</sup> In negotiations prior to signing the deed, the Mōkau rangatira Te Waru and Tamihana consistently expressed opposition to the sale of Te Māhoe and, as a result, neither signed the deed. When Schnackenberg attempted to give Te Waru £3 for his interests, he sent it back immediately. Nevertheless, Schnackenberg maintained that consent to the inclusion of Te Māhoe had been established because the deed did not explicitly exclude the land and 'most of the principal owners' had signed.<sup>140</sup>

Matters came to a head when Rogan attempted to survey the block in late May 1854. He was confronted by Te Waru, who led a party of men armed with spears. According to Rogan: 'I said to him, "Is this land yours?" He said "No," and then, moving the spear about half an inch "but this is mine. I am going to die here, and these people are prepared to do exactly as I tell them."<sup>141</sup>

---

134. Document A28, pp108–109.

135. Document A28, p106; doc A70, p295.

136. Document A28, pp47–48; doc A70, p295.

137. Document A28, pp104, 109.

138. Document A28, p109.

139. Document A28, p109; doc A70, pp92–93.

140. Document A28, pp109–110.

141. Document A28, pp110–111.

Rogan was clearly frightened by the encounter and, having made little progress in his efforts to survey other portions of the block, he left Mōkau on the government's instruction in late May 1854. He told Schnackenberg that not only the Crown grant for Te Māhoe but the survey and purchase of the Mokau block generally would not be completed until the consent of all parties could be obtained.<sup>142</sup>

There is no evidence that formal negotiations for the Mokau block continued beyond this point. In 1855, Rogan reminded McLean that Mōkau 'is not ours yet'.<sup>143</sup> Rogan continued to try to put pressure on Te Kaka to sell his interests in the block throughout 1855, without success. In May 1855, Schnackenberg reported to McLean that Te Kuri 'and his party refuse to sell'.<sup>144</sup> Schnackenberg complained privately that Rogan was 'afraid' to deal with Mōkau Māori who continued to oppose the sale of land for the Te Māhoe mission station; yet Schnackenberg's own attempts to finalise acquisition of the land in 1855 were also unsuccessful.<sup>145</sup>

In 1857, the Crown appears to have acknowledged that its purchase of the Mokau block remained incomplete, when it extinguished native title over all land purchased at Mōkau and Awakino between 1854 and 1857, apart from the Mokau block. Thus, when the Crown returned to Mōkau during the 1880s and 1890s to assert its title (section 5.3.3.6), its claim to the Mokau block was therefore based on what, by its own admission in 1857, was an incomplete transaction. This uncertainty was also apparent from the ongoing confusion regarding the status of lands excluded or otherwise set aside from the Mokau purchase, several of which were surveyed in 1884, as discussed in section 5.3.4.2.

5.3.3.4 The Taumatamaire purchase, January 1855

The Taumatamaire block was located immediately inland from the Awakino purchase, and negotiations for its purchase commenced as soon as the latter was concluded in early 1854. At the time of the purchase it was estimated at 24,000 acres.<sup>146</sup> In December that year, Rogan returned to Mōkau to finalise the arrangement. A deed for the block was signed on 1 January 1855 in the names of Tākerei Waitara, his wife Hokiopera, his sons Wetere and Te Rangituataka, his daughter-in-law Mere Peka, and more than 40 others. The deed recorded a payment of £500.<sup>147</sup> A surviving receipt for Taumatamaire records the sellers' agreement that if other Māori came forward to claim rights to the land, the sellers would pay them part of the purchase moneys.<sup>148</sup>

142. Document A28, p 111; doc A70, p 93.

143. Document A28, p 125.

144. Document A28, pp 125–127.

145. Document A28, pp 125–127; doc A70, pp 94–95.

146. Using GIS, Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell calculated the combined area of the Taumatamaire and Rauroa purchase blocks to be 36,972 acres. Innes also used GIS to calculate the Rauroa block at 10,240 acres, which suggest that the actual size of Taumatamaire was some 26,732 acres: doc A21, p 41; doc A141, folder 3, p 80.

147. Document A28, pp 120–121; A70(a), vol 1, pp 422–434; doc A70, pp 273–276.

148. Document A70, pp 274, 459.

Between Rogan's departure from Mōkau in May 1854 and his return in December, opposition to land sales remained strong. Indeed, during his absence, rumours circulated that inland Ngāti Maniapoto planned to travel to the coast to take possession of the land as a move to prevent any additional sales. Schnackenberg recorded that Tākerei planned to visit the inland hapū in the spring of 1854. We do not know what happened at those meetings, but Tākerei's resolve to continue land transactions with the Crown was evidently shaken. According to Rogan, Tākerei told him that he would 'cease his entire control after the sale of the land, when the last-named piece is sold.' This was the Rauroa block, discussed in the next section. Rogan understood Tākerei's decision to withdraw support for land sales was 'not because the land is not his, nor that he could not sell if he presses it, but for the sake of peace with the Interior'.<sup>149</sup>

In these circumstances, Rogan moved quickly to confirm the alienation of the Taumatamaire block to the Crown. Once again, the Crown's representative appears to have made little effort to identify the respective interests of Mōkau hapū in the land. Thomas suggested that the transaction was finalised 'after minimal negotiations and following consultation with one group only'.<sup>150</sup> We agree with this characterisation. The sale, which Rogan later labelled an agreement with 'Ta Kerei and his tribe', took place within days of Rogan's return to Mōkau.<sup>151</sup> Soon afterwards, Māori from Waikawau, a coastal settlement to the north of the Awakino River, expressed concern that the land had been transacted without their knowledge or consent.<sup>152</sup>

The Crown paid £500 for 24,000 acres in the Taumatamaire block, or five pence per acre. This was lower than the minimum price later prescribed in McLean's July 1855 instructions to Rogan. McLean wrote that for the region 'from the Waikato to the Mokau, extending inland to the sources of those rivers', a price range of between sixpence per acre and one shilling and sixpence per acre would ensure the Crown's investment in purchasing Māori land was profitable.<sup>153</sup> Ms Boulton concluded that the low purchase prices for both Taumatamaire and Rauroa reflected their 'remote location and rugged topography'.<sup>154</sup> This seems likely.

Only one reserve of an indeterminate size was set aside from the Taumatamaire block. This was the canoe landing site Te Piripiri on the north bank of the Awakino River.<sup>155</sup> Although surveyed at 6 acres in the 1880s, the Native Land Court later found that the deed's description of boundaries and accompanying sketch map suggested a larger reserve of between 50 and 70 acres was warranted. In any case, it appears that this reserve was never granted (section 5.3.4.3).

---

149. Document A28, pp 119–120; doc A70, p 281.

150. Document A28, p 120.

151. Document A28, pp 117, 120.

152. Document A28, pp 120–121; doc A70, p 277.

153. Document A70, p 341; doc A28, p 122.

154. Document A70(b), p 14.

155. Document A28, p 122; doc A70, pp 276–277.

5.3.3.5 The Rauroa purchase, July 1857

The Rauroa block was located alongside and further inland again from the Taumatamaire purchase. At the time of purchase, the block was estimated at 9,000 acres.<sup>156</sup> In his evidence, researcher Craig Innes calculated that the actual figure was more like 10,240 acres.<sup>157</sup>

Rogan secured agreement for the sale of the Rauroa block immediately after purchasing Taumatamaire in January 1855, although the transaction was not finalised until 1857.<sup>158</sup> On 30 July 1857, 30 Mōkau Māori signed a deed for 9,000 acres, for a payment of £400. Once again, they were led by Tākerei and his sons Wetere and Te Rangituataka.<sup>159</sup>

The negotiations for Rauroa shared many features with those for Taumatamaire. Once again, Rogan prioritised Tākerei's interests in the land, knowing that the ongoing opposition from inland Ngāti Maniapoto to land sales meant that this would be the last sale Tākerei participated in. Mr Thomas noted that Rogan described the deal as an arrangement with Tākerei and 'the Awakino Natives' and that, as with Taumatamaire, 'the Crown had once again sought the consent of only a very few Maori, and from one group only'.<sup>160</sup> We agree.

In February 1855, Rogan wrote to McLean reporting that he had arranged 'to traverse the North boundary of the last block [Rauroa] next spring and the payment is to be made in the summer'.<sup>161</sup> With reference to the purchase price paid for Taumatamaire, he calculated that by the summer the recipients 'will have expended the £500 and will be more anxious to urge their friends in the interior to sell the opposite side of the Awakino'.<sup>162</sup> This evidence suggests that Rogan timed his visits carefully, arranging surveys and purchase payments in a manner designed to encourage further sales.

In January 1857, McLean instructed district commissioner William Searancke to travel to Mōkau to survey the Rauroa block. Rogan then returned in July to finalise the transaction. The £400 paid to Mōkau Māori for Rauroa represented almost 11 pence per acre, which was within the acceptable range of sixpence to one shilling and sixpence per acre set by McLean in 1855 for land between Waikato and Mōkau.<sup>163</sup>

As with Taumatamaire, Rogan set aside only one reserve from the land acquired at Rauroa by the Crown, the 290-acre Otiao block (section 5.3.4.4).

5.3.3.6 Delays in selling the land to settlers

In May 1854, McLean wrote to Henry Halse, a New Plymouth police magistrate, expressing his reluctance to open the Awakino and Mokau blocks to selection by

156. Document A147(b), pp 43–44.

157. Document A141, folder 3, p 80.

158. Document A28, pp 128–129; doc A70, pp 279–280.

159. Document A70(a), vol 1, pp 457–458; doc A28, p 129; doc A70, p 280.

160. Document A28, p 129–130.

161. Document A70, p 280.

162. Document A70, p 146; doc A70, p 280.

163. Document A28, pp 128–129.

settlers. He feared that if Pākehā began settling the area, the land nearby would 'be enhanced in value by the immediate location of settlers on it'.<sup>164</sup> This would only encourage Māori to bargain for higher prices, hindering the Crown's goal of acquiring more land in the region. As mentioned, in 1857 the Crown proclaimed its ownership of the Awakino, Taumatamaire and Rauroa blocks, but not the Mokau block, presumably because the final payment of £100 had yet to be made.<sup>165</sup> But the Crown, having obtained title to at least three of these blocks, did little to follow up the purchases on the ground. This may have been for practical reasons. The three northern blocks were located on rugged terrain either side of the Awakino River and were thus unlikely to be immediately attractive to settlers. Moreover, to access the land, settlers and surveyors needed to use the more navigable Mōkau River, which was still controlled by Māori.<sup>166</sup>

The Crown's failure to take up its Mōkau lands may have further encouraged Māori misunderstanding about the nature of the transactions. As Boulton noted, 'it is unlikely that those residing on the land would have seen much immediate evidence that the Crown now considered that it owned the land'.<sup>167</sup> Mr Thomas agreed. In his view, the long delay gave Mōkau Māori grounds to believe the Crown had abandoned its claim, as sometimes happened when there was opposition and disputes over the right to sell. He found it significant that Crown officials 'do not seem to have even mentioned the transactions during the long course of post-war negotiations with local and regional chiefs'.<sup>168</sup> We return to the question of how Māori understood these purchases in section 5.3.5.2.

It was not until the mid-1880s, nearly three decades later, that the Crown returned to Mōkau to lay claim to its purchases. By this time the context was very different. War had intervened in 1860, followed by confiscation – including land in Taranaki as far north as Paraninihi, south of Mōkau. An aukati had been maintained for some 20 years, during which the Crown had no authority in the district. These events are discussed in chapters 6, 7, and 8. Mr Thomas suggested that when the Crown returned to Mōkau in the late nineteenth century to lay claim to its purchases, careful investigation and consultation was required. We agree. This was especially important in respect of the Mokau block, the status of which remained ambiguous, with uncertainty over the extent of lands excluded from the sale, and whose interests they represented.<sup>169</sup> However, no such precautions appear to have been taken.

Things began to change in 1882. In June, the Native Land Court sat at Waitara to investigate title to lands to the south and east of the Mōkau–Awakino purchase areas. At around the same time, the Crown renewed its efforts to negotiate the building of a railway line through the region, and opportunistic Pākehā like the Australian settler Joshua Jones began seeking to 'open' the land around Mōkau for

---

164. Document A70, p 270.

165. Document A28, p 130.

166. Document A70(b), p 13.

167. Document A70(b), p 18.

168. Document A28, p 388.

169. Document A28, pp 130, 133.

mining and other commercial ventures. (For more on these events, see chapters 7, 8, and 9). In the wake of these developments, Native Minister John Bryce identified an opportunity to assert the Crown's interests in a region previously closed to Crown's authority. In a December 1882 letter in the New Zealand Herald, he reminded the Ngāti Maniapoto leader Wahanui Huatare that 'the Government owns large blocks of land near Mokau, and it is unreasonable to suppose that they will consent to be denied access to their own lands'.<sup>170</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, however, appear to have taken a different view about the status of the purchases. This was reflected in the June 1883 petition to Parliament of Wahanui and over 400 others, and in a further statement to Parliament by Wahanui the following year. The 1883 petition's description of 'lands still remaining to us . . . upon which the European, to the best of our knowledge, has no legal claim' included the areas covered by the Mōkau–Awakino purchase (see chapter 8, section 8.4.5.1).<sup>171</sup> Wahanui repeated this position before the House of Representatives in October 1884, where he said:

the lands that I speak of are ancestral lands, and the hands of the Europeans have never touched them. No white man's foot has trodden upon those lands, nor has any European obtained authority over them, either by lease or otherwise. This is the reason why I say that we should have the administration of those lands; but afterwards I will ask this House to help me to devise a law for administering them.<sup>172</sup>

Mr Thomas suggested that the opposition and uncertainty surrounding the Mōkau–Awakino transactions of the 1850s meant that when the Crown returned to Mōkau in the late nineteenth century to lay claim to its purchases, careful investigation and consultation was required.<sup>173</sup> We agree. This was especially important considering Wahanui's statements, and the delicate state of the Crown's negotiations with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori at that time (see sections 8.6 and 8.7). In the event, no such precautions appear to have been taken. From late 1883 the Crown sent surveyors to mark out the Mokau-Awakino blocks, and made preliminary plans for a road and a bridge over the Mōkau River. Mr Thomas found no evidence that the surveyors discussed the significance or validity of the purchases with Māori; rather, they focused on drawing boundaries and marking out reserves.<sup>174</sup> Having said this, there is no suggestion that Māori protested or attempted to obstruct the survey.

In 1884, there were reports that the Government was preparing 'for the immediate opening up of the Mokau', and in 1886 plans were made to establish a township near the Mōkau river mouth.<sup>175</sup> But progress remained hampered by settler disinterest, again likely because of the rough and mountainous terrain of the Crown

170. Document A41 (Loveridge), pp 58–59.

171. Document A28, p 389.

172. Document A41, pp 155–156.

173. Document A28, pp 130, 133.

174. Document A28, p 390.

175. Document A28, pp 390–391.

purchase blocks. Finally, from 1888, the Crown began to sell or lease land from the four blocks. By early 1890 there were reports that around 25,000 acres (roughly half of the overall purchase area) had been acquired by Pākehā, yet even this was said to be mostly in the hands of absentee speculators, who did not occupy or improve the lands.<sup>176</sup> According to Thomas, almost all the Awakino block, now known to be 23,000 acres, was sold to settlers by 1890.<sup>177</sup> Importantly, this included two 50-acre reserves ostensibly set aside for Tākerei's sons Wetere and Te Rangituataka. The Crown's failure to protect these reserves were among the first of numerous issues regarding the Crown's delivery of title to lands set aside for Mōkau Māori.

5.3.4 The administration of reserves

Historian Kesaia Walker identified three categories of land set aside by the Crown from its pre-1865 purchase reserves: Native reserves, lands excluded from sale, and re-purchased reserves.<sup>178</sup> Of these, the first two apply to the Mōkau–Awakino transactions of the 1850s.

In general terms, 'native reserves' were understood to be areas that should be specifically protected, including by the issuing of a separate Crown grant to the beneficiaries named in the purchase deed. Yet, as Dr Grant Phillipson has observed of lands designated native reserves in the Te Tau Ihu region, they were often 'left under de facto customary tenure but without a clear title in terms of British law' for many years after the sale took place.<sup>179</sup>

By contrast, land excluded from sale was treated as ordinary Māori customary land, with title to be determined by the Native Land Court, which would then draw up lists of owners. In his evidence to this inquiry, Mr Thomas highlighted a lack of clarity around the legal status of lands excluded from sale. In the case of the 1854 Mokau purchase, for example, it was not clear whether the excluded lands were intended as permanent reserves, or simply left out of the sale for the time being.<sup>180</sup>

As will be seen, however, the Crown and the court often confused these categories, and any measures intended to specifically protect reserve lands were at best unevenly applied.

As can be seen in table 5.2, of the 13 reserves set aside from the Mōkau purchases, seven were considered native reserves, and six were regarded as excluded from sale.

5.3.4.1 Awakino block reserves

As mentioned, the Crown set aside six parcels of land from the 1854 Awakino transaction. These were the Ounutae, Rangitoto, Waikato and Ketekarino reserves,

176. Document A28, p 392.

177. Document A28, p 394.

178. Document A142 (Walker), p14.

179. Grant Phillipson, The Northern South Island: Part 2, Rangahaua Whanui series, Waitangi Tribunal, 1996, p 2.

180. Document A28, pp104–105.

Block	Purchase year	Reserves and land excluded from purchase							Percentage remaining (2013)
		Name	Status	Area reserved (acres)	Area granted (acres)	Year title awarded	Area remaining (2013) (acres) <sup>1</sup>
Awakino <sup>2</sup>	1854	Rangitoto	Native reserve	55	51	1922	51.0	92.9
		Waikato (Maniara)	Native reserve	130	125	1922	110.0	85.0
		Ounutaē	Native reserve	220	110	1922	110.0	100.0
		Ketekarino	Native reserve	50	7.5	1953	7.5	100.0
		Reihana's reserve	Native reserve	50	50	1893*	0.0	0.0
		Weter's reserve	Native reserve	50	50	1903*	0.0	0.0
Mokau <sup>3</sup>	1854	Te Kauri (Hingarangi)	Excluded from sale	N/A	147	1897	18.4	12.5
		Te Waipuna	Excluded	N/A	175	1897	93.0	53.1
		Tokowhaiti (Purapura)	Excluded	N/A	884	1897	813.3	92.0
		Te Mahoe (Tawari/ Tauwhare)	Excluded	N/A	76	1897	0.0	0.0
		Te Māngeo	Excluded	N/A	6	Not awarded	0.0	0.0
Taumatamaitre <sup>4</sup>	1855	Te Piripiri	Native reserve	6	6	Not awarded	0.0	0.0
Rauroa <sup>5</sup>	1857	Otiao	Excluded	N/A	290	1901	242.5	84.0

1. Figures based on the evidence of Bruce Stirling and Kesaia Walker: doc A147(b), doc A142.

2. Document A147(b), pp 44–69; doc A142, pp 61–83.

3. Document A147(b), pp 83–86; doc A142, pp 84–92.

4. Document A147(b), pp 69–76; doc A142, pp 93–97.

5. Document A147(b), pp 43–44; doc A142, pp 98–100.

Table 5.2: Land set aside from the Mōkau–Awakino purchases

* Substituted

5.3.4.1.1

and two blocks for Tākerei's sons, Wetere and Reihana – totalling approximately 555 acres.<sup>181</sup>

5.3.4.1.1 RANGITOTO, WAIKATO, AND OUNUTAE

In the case of the Rangitoto and Waikato (also known as Maniaora) reserves, title to the land was not awarded until 1922 after repeated complaints by Māori.<sup>182</sup> The granting of the Ounutae reserve (also known as Taniora's reserve) was also delayed and, in this instance, when title to the land was awarded in 1922, Mōkau Māori received 110 acres, rather than the 220 acres specified on the deed. To explain this discrepancy, Crown agents suggested that the land purchase officer, John Rogan, had incorrectly calculated the area of land on the sketch plan and that the land reserved to Māori was in accordance with physical boundaries identified on the deed.<sup>183</sup> This was disputed by Māori. However, the death of Taniora Pararoa Wharau – a signatory to the deed who had assisted Rogan in conducting his rudimentary survey of the land – meant they too retained little knowledge of the original transaction, hampering their ability to successfully challenge the reduced award.<sup>184</sup>

5.3.4.1.2 KETEKARINO

The Crown appears to have lost all record of the Ketekarino reserve until the 1930s, when the matter was brought to its attention by Mae Taniora Wharau, who had recently worked through the papers of her late father. Ms Wharau contacted Crown officials seeking an explanation as to why Pākehā had occupied the land.<sup>185</sup> The Crown initially asserted that a substitute block had been awarded elsewhere in place of Ketekarino, though this was ultimately found to be inaccurate. The Ketekarino reserve was one of several issues raised by Rangirere Te Maenae and 58 others in a 1938 petition to parliament concerning the Crown's conduct in transacting lands at Mōkau.<sup>186</sup>

The matter of the Ketekarino reserve was heard by the Native Land Court in 1941 and, in reporting on the issue in 1942, Judge EW Beechey offered the government clear guidance on the matter. Ketekarino, Beechey wrote, was undoubtedly used as a burial-ground and a pa reserve in the early days [and] . . . the claimants are entitled to have an area at Ketekarino set aside, as undertaken by the Crown [in 1854], and that the "small piece" should be similar in area to the other small pieces, about 50 acres for the old burial-site.<sup>187</sup>

---

181. Document A147(b), p 44.

182. Document A147(b), pp 47–50.

183. Document A147(b), p 45.

184. Submission 3.4.246, p 95; doc A147(b), p 45. The Ounutae reserve was the subject of a specific claim by Wai 849 claimants (see submission 3.4.194).

185. Document A142, pp 79–83.

186. Document A147(b), pp 52–54.

187. Document A147(b), p 55.

Despite the court's recommendation that a reserve of 50 acres should be set aside for Mōkau Māori, the Crown made little progress towards honouring the deed in the following decade. Instead, the Crown's response prioritised the interests of the leaseholder, the Pioi Estate Company (a large Pākehā farming venture), over the interests of Māori. For example, when the leaseholder agreed to hand over 7 acres and 3 roods of the land – including the urupā – to tangata whenua, the Auckland commissioner of crown lands applauded this as a 'very reasonable attitude'. In contrast, he framed Māori insistence that the entire 50-acre block be set aside as an obstacle to an 'amicable settlement'.<sup>188</sup> This apparent favouritism continued in 1949 when the lease of the land came up for renewal. The Crown could have chosen to renegotiate the lease to remove the land that rightfully belonged to Mōkau Māori. Instead, the relevant Crown official suggested that 'we cannot force the Company to surrender the 50 acres' and that the only chance of settlement was 'to persuade the Maoris to reduce their claim'; that is, to accept the 7 acre 3 rood reserve and compensation for the balance.<sup>189</sup>

Ultimately it seems that Mōkau Māori had no choice but to agree to the Crown's proposal. This was the basis of the settlement that was approved by the Minister of Lands in 1953. Title to the Ketekarino reserve was finally issued in June 1858. In total, 7 acres, 2 roods and 20 perches were returned to Mōkau Māori, together with £60 compensation for the 42 acres and 1 rood retained by the Crown. This was less than the £70 given to the leaseholder for improvements to the land around the urupā.<sup>190</sup>

5.3.4.1.3 REIHANA'S AND WETERE'S RESERVES

The Crown's actions in respect of the two 50-acre reserves set aside for Tākerei's sons Te Rangituataka (known as Reihana) and Wetera Te Rerenga displayed the same pattern of administrative ineptitude and indifference. The land set aside for Reihana was sold to a settler shortly after it was surveyed in 1884, and officials mistakenly assumed the same had occurred in the case of Wetera's reserve.<sup>191</sup> In 1888, Wetera wrote to Crown officials requesting that title for his brother's land be issued. However, he died soon afterwards. Native Department officials located the survey plan but deferred action, commenting that 'Wetera now being dead the matter may rest for the present'.<sup>192</sup> Te Rangituataka and Kingi Wetera, the son of Wetera Te Rerenga, then took up the cause in a series of letters in the 1890s.

In both cases, when title was awarded the land was different from that originally promised. In 1893, title to the 50 acres for Reihana's reserve was awarded to Te Rangituataka on the opposite side of the Awakino River from the original block.<sup>193</sup> The location of the land may have been a factor in Te Rangituataka's decision to

---

188. Document A147(b), pp 57–59.

189. Document A147(b), pp 60–62.

190. Document A147(b), pp 61–64.

191. Document A147(b), pp 64–67.

192. Document A147(b), pp 64–65.

193. Document A147(b), pp 66–69.

sell it to a private purchaser in 1894.<sup>194</sup> In 1902, 50 acres were awarded to Weterer's descendants at Mahoenui, south of Awakino. This land was included in the Mahoenui development scheme in 1930 and then incorporated into a larger block, which was sold in 1979.<sup>195</sup>

5.3.4.2 Mokau block reserves

As described earlier, the 1854 Mokau purchase deed named Te Kauri, Te Waipuna, and Tokowhaiti as areas 'which have not been agreed to'.<sup>196</sup> Although not listed on the deed, when the Crown returned to survey its Mōkau–Awakino purchases in 1884, Māori also sought to exclude two further areas from the sale, Te Mahoe (also known as Tawari/Tauwhare), and Te Mangeo. These five areas were then included in a schedule of reserves prepared in 1896 in response to concerns raised by Mōkau Māori over the Crown's administration of reserved lands.<sup>197</sup>

Māori also raised issues in the twentieth century over the inclusion in the Mokau purchase of two wāhi tapu located at the mouth of the Mōkau River. These were the 38-acre Te Naunau sandspit and 1-acre Motutawa Island, neither of which was listed in the deed or raised by Māori at the time the land was surveyed in the 1880s.<sup>198</sup> The Crown's actions in relation to these areas will be considered in a future chapter of our report.

5.3.4.2.1 TE KAURI, TE WAIPUNA, AND TOKOWHAITI

As land excluded from sale rather than native reserves, Te Kauri (also known as Hingarangi), Te Waipuna, and Tokowhaiti (or Purapura) were treated as ordinary Māori land. Title was issued by the Native Land Court in the 1890s. The Crown then showed interest in purchasing some of the land, despite being aware of what the surveyor-general called 'the larger question' of whether Māori should be encouraged to part with land had been set aside for their long-term benefit.<sup>199</sup> At that time Māori were opposed to selling, but much of the land was later alienated from Māori ownership through processes that often targeted those lands closest to the river. Most of the Te Kauri block, for example, was alienated by a mixture of private purchases, public works takings and Europeanisation (a process by which collective Māori title was converted to individual European title).<sup>200</sup>

5.3.4.2.2 TE MAHOE AND TE MANGEO

The 76-acre Te Mahoe block was awarded to Māori in 1899.<sup>201</sup> However, the entire block was alienated in 1912 through scenic reserve takings under the Public Works Act, a process that will be discussed in a future chapter of our report.

194. Document A142, p 73.

195. Document A142, pp 77–79.

196. Document A70(a) vol 1, pp 411–421, 453–455.

197. Document A147(b), pp 76–79.

198. Document A147(b), pp 99–119.

199. Document A147(b), p 80.

200. Document A142, pp 84–86, 91–92.

201. Document A147(b), p 95.

The six-acre Te Mangleo block was investigated by the court in 1897, but according to Mr Stirling the process was never completed, and it is no longer customary Māori land today.<sup>202</sup> As will be seen, in the twentieth century Crown officials repeatedly confused this land with the Te Piripiri reserve from the Taumatamaire block.

5.3.4.3 The Piripiri reserve (Taumatamaire block)

The Crown set aside one reserve from the 1855 Taumatamaire purchase, ‘a landing place for the canoes of the people of the interior’ known as Te Piripiri.<sup>203</sup> It was surveyed in 1884 to be about six acres, yet Rogan’s 1855 sketch plan of the Taumatamaire deed indicates a ‘considerably larger area.’<sup>204</sup> It was later found by the Native Land Court to be between 50 and 70 acres. According to Mr Stirling, the reserve is yet to be honoured.<sup>205</sup>

The Piripiri reserve was the subject of numerous complaints by Mōkau Māori, in part due to a series of misunderstandings by Crown officials. When first confronted by Māori over the reserve’s status in the late nineteenth century, the Crown maintained that its officials had included the Te Piripiri reserve within the boundaries of the replacement block issued in 1893 for Reihana’s reserve from the Awakino purchase. As Mr Stirling observed, these lands were adjacent, but they did not overlap.<sup>206</sup> Further confusion when the Crown’s 1896 schedule of reserved lands, Piripiri was identified as Native Reserve Section 12 Block I Awakino North Survey District. This land was in fact the Te Mangleo reserve set aside from the Mōkau block, mentioned earlier. Yet the error persisted. In 1938, the Crown responded to concerns raised by Mōkau Māori about Te Piripiri and other reserves by suggesting that Te Mangleo was likely a replacement block for the Te Piripiri reserve.<sup>207</sup>

In 1941 the Native Land Court was charged with inquiring into reserves set aside from the Mōkau–Awakino transactions in response to the 1938 petition by Rangirere Te Maenae and others. In his 1942 report Judge Beechey concluded that, contrary to previous statements by officials, Piripiri was not alienated along with the rest of Reihana’s reserve, and found further that the court ‘was “not at all satisfied that [Te Mangleo] had any relation to the Piri Piri reserve’. In his view, Māori had substantiated their claim, and rather than the six acres mentioned in the Taumatamaire deed, 50 to 70 acres ‘should have been set apart between the Maungakawakawa Stream and the Awakino River.’<sup>208</sup>

Responding to this inquiry, the Crown proposed to offer other land to Mōkau Māori as a replacement for Te Piripiri. Mōkau Māori declined that offer. As an alternative to Te Piripiri, efforts were made to seek the return of Reihana’s

202. Document A147(b), pp 94–95.

203. Document A70(a), vol 1, pp 422–434.

204. Document A147(b), pp 69–70.

205. Document A147(b), pp 69–76.

206. Document A147(b), p 72.

207. Document A147(b), pp 72–73.

208. Document A147(b), pp 74–75.

replacement reserve, which had been sold in 1894 but was now in the control of the Public Trustee. However, the Lands Department declared it unavailable in 1947. Mr Stirling could find no further archival references to Te Piripiri and concluded that ‘the Piripiri reserve has yet to be made.’<sup>209</sup>

5.3.4.4 The Otiao reserve (Rauroa block)

One reserve of 290 acres, known as Otiao, was set aside from the 1857 Rauroa purchase. The purchase deed made no mention of reserves, leading officials to regard Otiao as land excluded from the sale. Mr Stirling, however, noted that Otiao was clearly marked as ‘Native reserve’ on the sketch plan that accompanied the deed.<sup>210</sup> We see this as further evidence of the Crown’s confusion about these matters. Title to Otiao was awarded by the land court in 1901, and the land remains largely in Māori ownership.<sup>211</sup>

5.3.5 Treaty analysis and findings

During the early 1850s, the Crown sought to acquire land in the Mōkau region. Between 1850 and 1852, land purchase officers visited the area to negotiate with Mōkau Māori. In doing so, they discovered very different opinions amongst tangata whenua as to the wisdom of entering land transactions with the Crown.

Crown purchase agents in the early 1850s should have been familiar with the standards required when purchasing Māori land. These were clear from the guarantees in the Treaty and associated public statements. In this section, we measure the Crown’s conduct in the Mōkau–Awakino purchases against those standards. We address three questions:

- ▶ Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase?
- ▶ Did the Crown then establish the free and informed consent of the sellers?
- ▶ Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs?

5.3.5.1 Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure?

To ensure that the Crown was buying from the right people, and to maximise the chance that all concerned understood the nature of the transactions, its purchase processes had to be public and transparent.<sup>212</sup> In this respect, Donald McLean’s initial visit to Mōkau in 1850 represented a positive first step on the Crown’s part. He remained there for 13 days and held a large hui with Tākerei and his people. In the event, the Crown declined to purchase, as it could not secure a large block that suited its aims for settlement in the region, although this may also have been due to McLean becoming aware of divisions within the communities at Mōkau and further inland over the merits of land sales.

---

209. Document A147(b), pp 75–76.

210. Document A147(b), pp 43–44.

211. Document A142, p 99.

212. Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120.

When the Crown returned to Mōkau in 1852 to resume purchase negotiations, it took a different approach. In Boulton's words, the Crown 'relied on purchasing the interests of those who agreed to sell and waiting or putting pressure on those who were unwilling.'<sup>213</sup> As will be seen, this approach was to characterise Crown conduct in purchasing Māori land in the inquiry district for much of the 1850s and 1860s. In each of the four Mōkau–Awakino transactions, the Crown did not ensure that all those with rights were willing to sell. Instead, as Ms Boulton observes, 'Protests seem to have become, by default, the principal means of identifying those with intersecting interests in land under offer.'<sup>214</sup> Even then, however, Crown officials ignored opposition, and pressed ahead despite knowledge of it. An example was the receipt for Taumatamaire, which explicitly anticipated that sellers would pay off any disputes with other land.

There is good evidence that the Mōkau and Awakino communities were seriously divided over the issue of land sales, and that the divisions grew during the 1850s as each purchase was completed. This would have been clear to Crown agents from the well-documented objections of Ngati Maniapoto in the interior to the land-selling activities of coastal Māori, and especially from events surrounding the tapu placed on the Mōkau River by Te Kuri and Te Kaka, alongside other acts of resistance to the 1854 Mokau purchase. As the Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunal found, the Crown was entitled to cut the interests of those who opposed sale out of the purchase block, provided it had conducted a fair and transparent negotiations process, in which (among other things) all right holders were fully informed on what the sale meant, including its full extent.<sup>215</sup> This was not, however, the case at Mōkau.

We find that the Crown, in conducting the Awakino, Mokau, Taumatamaire, and Rauroa transactions, made insufficient efforts to identify all customary right holders. Instead, it conducted the purchases in the knowledge that there was opposition, but refused to act on that opposition. This was a breach of the Treaty principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and the duty of active protection.

5.3.5.2 Did the Crown establish free and informed consent?

In addition to properly identifying all customary right holders, the Crown to establish the free and informed consent of right holders through a fair negotiation process. This required the Crown to properly identify the land at the time of the transaction, to ensure that right holders understood the nature of the transaction, to use fair negotiation tactics – including by dealing fairly with opposition – and to pay a fair market price for the land.<sup>216</sup>

As mentioned, McLean's instructions to Rogan for the 1854 Awakino purchase were to survey the block and reserves. There is little evidence in any of these

---

213. Document A70, p 291.

214. Document A70, p 291.

215. Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, vol 1, p 120.

216. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, pp 104–105.

purchases of attempts by Crown officials to walk the boundaries with Māori to ensure their accuracy. External boundaries of all four blocks were defined by survey before the purchases were completed. However, the total area of land was estimated rather than calculated. As a result, four purchases were later found to differ markedly compared to the initial estimate. For Awakino this effectively resulted in a significant underpayment in terms of the price per acre, yet when this was discovered in the 1880s the Crown made no attempt to compensate the former owners, despite Māori raising the matter again in the twentieth century.

In addition, Rogan failed to complete the survey of the 1854 Mokau purchase boundaries, due to the difficulties created by opposition to the transaction. When the Crown returned to lay claim to the purchase in the 1880s there was no attempt to rectify these issues by accurately defining the interests of sellers and non-sellers, or their successors. Deficiencies in the definition and survey of the purchase areas were, in addition, a major cause of the subsequent problems of getting title to defined reserves, which is discussed below.

It is not clear whether Mōkau Māori fully realised the nature of the Mōkau–Awakino transactions. As Ms Boulton and Mr Thomas both pointed out, their understandings were not tested by settlement until the 1880s, when the context was very different.<sup>217</sup> In some ways, the serious opposition to selling expressed at Mōkau and further inland seems to suggest that some Māori at least had a good grasp of the potential consequences. Having said this, we are not satisfied that the Crown did enough to assure itself that Māori understood the effect of the purchases on their future relationships with the land.

Māori who supported the sale of Mōkau–Awakino land did so, above all, because they thought that Pākehā trade and settlement would bring benefits for their people. This is what Tākerei and his supporters told McLean during his 1850 visit and repeated in several letters.<sup>218</sup> As noted, in the initial period of negotiations, Crown officials encouraged these expectations, holding out the prospect of settlement as a way of encouraging land sales to extend inland along the Mōkau River. If Mōkau Māori agreed to give up their best lands, they could expect a township and perhaps even a port to be established, improvement and cultivation of the lands, and general prosperity for both races. These hopes, however, were to be disappointed. The Crown failed to secure the land and minerals it sought, and what land it did buy was not onsold to settlers until the 1880s and 1890s.

We have, however, seen no evidence of the Crown promising Māori that specific actions or benefits would follow their signing any of the Mokau purchase deed. McLean and his subordinates made clear that their interest was primarily in the land upriver from Mōkau, because of its value for both minerals and settlement. Officials also made it plain that the land they did buy was mountainous and inaccessible, and expectations of large scale rural settlement should thus have been dampened. On the other hand, it seems reasonable for supporters of land sales to have expected a township and port to be established at Mōkau, given the location of the purchased land at the Mōkau rivermouth and along the coast to Awakino. Upon returning to Mōkau in 1854, the Crown continued to allow Māori to understand it was acquiring land for the settlement of Europeans, even while McLean recorded his intention to deliberately hold the land back from settlers to keep purchase prices for adjacent land as low as possible. This was not the behaviour of a Treaty partner acting in good faith.

---

217. Document A70, p 449; doc A28, p388.

218. Document A70(b), p13.

The Crown's tactics in negotiating the four Mōkau–Awakino purchases showed further evidence of bad faith. Rather than allow negotiations to proceed at their own pace, the Crown manipulated Mōkau Māori into agreeing to purchase, and did not provide sufficient time for opposition and disputes to be resolved through tikanga.

In this regard, we view McLean and Rogan's leaving of £300 in the care of Takerei in 1854 for Te Wētini and others to acquire if they agreed to sell the Mokau block as a cynical tactic that appears to have succeeded in hastening the eventual purchase. Rogan's 1855 calculation that by the summer the sellers of the Taumatamaire block would have expended the £500 and would then be more willing to put pressure on neighbouring Māori to sell their lands was equally opportunistic, and again was not the action of a good faith partner.

Under pre-emption, the Crown effectively had a monopoly over the purchase of Māori land; there was no 'market' aside from that through which the Crown sold the land on to settlers. The Crown's express philosophy was to buy at a low price from Māori and sell at a higher price to settlers. Doubtless it would have taken the same approach with the Mōkau–Awakino blocks. However, as mentioned, they were not gazetted for settlement until the 1880s, which makes it impossible to compare like prices for like.

What we do know is that the prices for the Awakino and Mokau blocks were considered low by the missionary, Schnakenberg. We can also say that based on the estimated areas at the time, the prices per acre were broadly within the band of acceptability laid down by McLean in 1855, given that much of the land was very remote and rugged. We therefore make no findings of Treaty breach on the issue of price for these transactions.

Overall, we find that the Crown did not pursue its negotiations with Mōkau Māori in the utmost good faith. Together, these actions constituted a breach of the Treaty principles of partnership and good faith, and the duty of active protection.

5.3.5.3 *Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land?

In purchasing Māori land, the Crown had to ensure that right holders retained enough land for their present and future needs. This required the Crown to investigate the extent and quality of land remaining to right holders, set aside reserves of sufficient size and quality, provide the agreed reserves in a timely manner and in the correct location, and if necessary, act to protect those reserves from subsequent alienation.<sup>219</sup>

There is no evidence that the Crown sought to ensure the adequacy of the reserves it set aside from the four Mōkau–Awakino purchases by, for example, assessing the size of the Māori population at Mōkau or the extent of their remaining landholdings.

The Crown's administration of land reserved or otherwise set aside from the Mokau-Awakino transactions created numerous difficulties for Mōkau Māori. Title was not issued for many decades, during which time the Crown sold some of the land to settlers. Uncertainty over the legal status of the land was a major source of the Crown's confusion and resulting delays. When they complained about the delays, Māori were often dismissed, misinformed, or told to apply to the Native Land Court, where they faced further legal complications, including succession issues. For the most part, it took until well into the twentieth century for titles to be confirmed, and in all but a few cases this only occurred after sustained pressure on the Government by Māori. And when the land was finally granted, it was often different to that promised in the 1850s, including at least two cases where a reserve is still yet to be created.

We find these Crown failures to be in breach of the Treaty principles of good faith and redress, as well as the plain meaning of article 2, which provided for Māori to retain possession of their lands, including wāhi tapu, for as long as they so desired.

5.4 THE WESTERN HARBOURS TRANSACTIONS

Another major set of early Crown purchases in this inquiry district occurred in and around the three harbours of the district's north-west coast: Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia. The transactions occurred in two phases:

- ▶ The first phase was conducted by surveyor-general Charles Ligar, and involved land adjacent to Whāingaroa Harbour, on the north side at Horea in May 1850 and on the southern shore in March 1851.
- ▶ The second phase was initiated by Donald McLean and mainly completed by John Rogan, and involved a series of negotiations for land around the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia Harbours.
- ▶ The second phase began in 1854, when McLean initiated at least 24 separate arrangements with Māori for land in the area. Most were negotiated by McLean during visits to the rohe, but some were conducted with chiefs he hosted in Auckland. McLean then instructed Rogan and others to finalise the transactions, and surveys were completed. Between November 1855 and June 1859, the Crown succeeded in securing seven further purchases on and around the western harbours. As a result, the Crown acquired almost all the 219. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, p 333; Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, vol 1, p 262.

---

Map 5.3: The western harbours transactions coastal land between Whāingaroa and Aotea, as well as land further south between Kāwhia and Marokopa. Several further attempts to acquire land on the coast failed.

In addition, the Crown made two ‘blanket’ purchases from particular iwi, which purported to extinguish all their interests in the lands covered by these purchases.

The western harbours are large tidal inlets, sheltered from the western ocean and separated from the inland Waipā valley by steep hill country. Karioi maunga stands just south of Whāingaroa, and Pirongia maunga is east of Aotea and Kāwhia. The harbours are of immense value to Māori and are intimately connected to Tainui traditions. Whāingaroa, meaning ‘the long pursuit’, was named by the Tainui crew and reflects their long search for a place to settle, while the waka itself was buried at Kāwhia at the end of their journey (see chapter 2). These early arrivals soon established kāinga, taking advantage of the area's abundant kai-moana and the opportunities for travel inland and along the coast to other parts of the region.

The lands surrounding the western harbours later became some of the most heavily contested in the region as several Tainui groups vied for control of the area. In the 1700s, a series of battles broke out around Kāwhia, drawing in groups from throughout Waikato and Taranaki, and redrawing the tribal landscape of the region. An uneasy peace, punctuated by periods of conflict, continued into the 1800s as groups continued to contest dominance over the area and looked to settle unresolved grievances. In 1820, at the Battle of Kāwhia, a coalition of Waikato, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Hikairo forces drove Ngāti Toa-rangatira from the region. Many Ngāti Koata, who had fought with Te Rauparaha, also chose to depart to the south. Further disruption came in the 1820s, as Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto faced a series of conflicts with heavily armed Ngāpuhi. These events are set out more fully in chapter 2, section 2.5.

By the late 1840s and early 1850s, when the Crown began seeking to purchase land around the western harbours, the region remained in a state of flux, with several distinct but related iwi and hapū occupying various areas and continuing rivalries over rights to land and resources. As previous chapters have set out, the tribal dynamic had been further altered in the late 1820s by the arrival of European traders, and in the 1830s by the establishment of Wesleyan and Anglican missionaries at Kāwhia, Whāingaroa, and Aotea. Māori largely retained control over these relationships, which they valued in large part because they allowed iwi and hapū to engage successfully with the early colonial economy.

Several early European visitors published reports of journeys in the 1840s through the west coast harbours and inland Waikato (see chapter 3). In April 1840, the German naturalist Ernst Dieffenbach visited the west coast of the district, where he was impressed by the progress of the Wesleyan missionaries and Māori knowledge of English laws and systems of government. Dieffenbach thought Whāingaroa an ideal location for European settlement, with good access to quality agricultural and forest land on the Waikato and Waipā plains. He reported limestone at Aotea and thought Kāwhia 'almost the best harbour on the western coast'.<sup>220</sup> In 1844, the English writer and artist George Angas travelled through the Waikato and down the west coast. Angas, too, considered the region suitable for settlement. He described avid competition between Pōtatau Te Wherowhero in southern Waikato and Te Awaitaia and others at Whāingaroa for European settlers. Angas described the Waikato rangatira Te Wherowhero as:

having lately proffered a request to the Governor to allow Europeans to settle on the Waikato, being anxious to have pakehas amongst his people, to purchase their produce, and give them European articles in exchange; and he had offered certain lands for sale to the British Government for that purpose.<sup>221</sup>

---

220. Document A23, p 39.

According to Angas, Te Wherowhero had also referred to a rival offer by ‘the chiefs Wiremu Nera [Te Awaitaia], Paratene, and others at Waingaroa on the west coast, for settlers to come amongst them’. To this, Te Wherowhero reportedly said, ‘Tell the Kawana [Governor] that he must not neglect the elder brother for the sake of the younger.’<sup>222</sup>

This, then, was the context in which the Crown began efforts to purchase land around the district’s western harbours. In many ways, the situation resembled that at Mōkau in the late 1840s. Customary rights to land along the northwest coast had changed significantly in preceding decades and were by no means settled. Here, too, rangatira such as Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia of Ngāti Māhanga sought a closer relationship with the Crown in the hope that it would encourage more Europeans to settle and peace and prosperity for his people. And just as at Mōkau, the 1850s saw growing opposition to land sales in the district.

5.4.1 The parties’ positions

The Tribunal received several submissions relating specifically to the western harbours transactions.<sup>223</sup>

In submissions on the Horea purchase, the claimants said the Crown took advantage of conflict between Ngāti Mahuta, on the one hand, and Ngāti Tahinga and Tainui hapū on the other, to acquire the lands at Horea. The claimants said that missionaries exerted considerable pressure on Ngāti Mahuta to sell.<sup>224</sup> Claimants further argued that, while the Crown negotiated a deed with Te Wherowhero and Ngāti Mahuta, ‘there was no deed signalling an extinguishment of Ngāti Tahinga-Tainui interests in the land.’<sup>225</sup>

On the Whaingaroa purchase, claimants submitted that the Crown failed to clearly explain the nature and extent of the transaction to Māori sellers. Ngāti Māhanga claimants emphasised a gulf between how their tūpuna understood the Whaingaroa block transaction and the Crown’s expectations. The claimants suggested that the approach of their tūpuna to the transaction was regulated by manaakitanga, whereby Ngāti Māhanga encouraged Pākehā to settle in their rohe by sharing their lands and resources in exchange for koha, though the iwi retained mana over the land. In conducting the transactions with their tūpuna, the claimants argued, the Crown failed to understand manaakitanga and simply assumed

221. Document A23, p 40.

222. Document A23, pp 40–41.

223. Wai 125 (submission 3.4.210); Wai 1327 (submission 3.4.249(c)); Wai 2273 (submission 3.4.141); Wai 1448, Wai 1495, Wai 1501, Wai 1502, Wai 1592, Wai 1804, Wai 1899, Wai 1900, Wai 2125, Wai 2126, Wai 2135, Wai 2137, Wai 2183, Wai 2208 (submission 3.4.237); Wai 1588, Wai 1589, Wai 1590, Wai 1591 (submission 3.4.143); Wai 827 (submission 3.4.245).

224. Submission 3.4.210, p 21.

225. Submission 3.4.210, p 25.

that the transaction represented a permanent alienation. The claimants further submitted that the Crown failed to set aside sufficient reserves for their present and future needs.<sup>226</sup>

Karioi maunga, which rises above the coast south of Whāingaroa, was alienated as a result of the Karioi purchase. The claimants highlighted the significance of this maunga and ‘dispute that this land was ever sold.’<sup>227</sup> Further, they raised concerns relating to lands reserved or excluded from the transaction.<sup>228</sup>

In submissions on the Ruapuke purchase, claimants argued that the Crown pressured Ngāti Whakamarurangi to agree to the sale. As a result, they submitted, the sellers ‘were forced to accept a purchase price which was much less than what they originally wanted for the block’. Although reserves were set aside from the sale, they have since been alienated.<sup>229</sup>

In submissions on the Wharauoa purchase, claimants submitted that ‘the Crown did not act honourably, reasonably and in good faith’. Rather than transacting with all people with interests in the land, they said, they Crown dealt with only a small number of rangatira, resulting in complaints that the block had been sold to the wrong people and demands for additional payments.<sup>230</sup>

The claimants submitted that, although the Te Mata block was set aside in 1851 as a reserve from the Whaingaroa purchase, by June 1859 the Crown had purchased the entire block. In their view, this denied Māori commercial opportunities and reduced ‘their long term ability to participate in, and benefit from, the developing colonial economy.’<sup>231</sup>

In submissions on the Harihari purchase, claimants argued that the Crown neither properly consulted all right holders, nor ensured that Māori understood the nature of the transaction, nor verified the area of land being transacted. In the claimants’ submission, the Crown failed to pay the full purchase price for the block and failed to ensure the sellers ‘received adequate compensation for the land sold.’<sup>232</sup>

The claimants argued that the Crown failed to ensure it dealt with the right owners when it conducted the Oioroa purchase, and that it failed to ensure that Māori understood the nature of the transaction. Counsel submitted ‘the fact that Te Haho Kewene continued to live on the Oiōroa block after the Crown had acquired it, is enough to support a finding that, the setting in which this transaction was carried out, was one of Māori customary practice and reciprocal benefits.’<sup>233</sup>

226. Submission 3.4.249(c), pp 27–30, 34–36.

227. Submission 3.4.210, p 25.

228. Submission 3.4.210, pp 26–27.

229. Submission 3.4.141, pp 10–12.

230. Submission 3.4.237, pp 81–83.

231. Submission 3.4.105, pp 27–28.

232. Submission 3.4.143, pp 34–35; submission 3.4.160, pp 44–45.

233. Submission 3.4.141, p 9; submission 3.4.148, pp 4.

In the claimants' view, this meant that the rangatira who entered into the transaction 'did not understand the European concept of a "forever sale"'.<sup>234</sup> Ngāti Te Wehi claimants submitted that their tūpuna never consented to the sale and that the sale was therefore invalid.<sup>235</sup>

The Crown did not make specific submissions on all of these transactions. Crown counsel cited Horea as an example of proposed sales that were never completed, even though 'payments may have been made by the Crown with the intention of securing purchase'.<sup>236</sup> In respect of Te Mata, the Crown submitted that, after it was alienated, 'there were still three other reserves not alienated from the wider Whaingaroa block, comprising a total of around 1,120 acres, as well as 4,000 acres of reserves in the wider Whāingaroa area'.<sup>237</sup>

In respect of Harihari, the Crown submitted that the circumstances surrounding the reduction in price are unclear, as is the extent to which Māori consented to that reduction. The Crown argued that it was reasonable to reduce the price given the block was smaller than originally thought, and that subsequent confusion over the distribution of payments 'may be primarily an issue between the various Māori owners of the block, rather than an issue between the Crown and Māori'.<sup>238</sup> As for the lack of reserves created at Harihari, it was not 'incumbent on the Crown to make reserves for Māori in the course of pre-Native Land Court transactions unless it was, or can be, demonstrated that Māori residing in the block at the time did not retain sufficient other land for their continued wellbeing'. This was not the case at Harihari, the Crown said.<sup>239</sup>

5.4.2 Background to the transactions

The 1850s marked the beginning of a new phase of Pākehā settlement in New Zealand. Previously, according to Boulton, Europeans arrivals had tended to be 'single men who had come alone or as crews of traders and married into Maori communities'. Increasingly, these men 'were being replaced by planned, large-scale immigration of British men and women, many of whom had families or would go on to marry other European settlers'. These organised settlers were initially concentrated at the New Zealand Company towns of Port Nicholson, Wanganui and New Plymouth, and in the growing settlement at Auckland. By the mid-1850s, however, 'the flow of immigrants arriving at Auckland expecting to be able to purchase land was putting pressure on the Government to purchase more Maori land'. This placed attention on areas like Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia, which appeared attractive to settlers, not least because the harbours provided 'access by ship to bring people and regular supplies to sustain a European population'.

---

234. Submission 3.4.141, p 9-; submission 3.4.148, pp 4.

235. Submission 3.4.245, p 4.

236. Submission 3.4.289, pp 14, 14 n

237. Submission 3.4.289, p 7.

238. Submission 3.4.310(d), pp 18–19.

239. Submission 3.4.310(d), p 23.

Settlers also hoped to use coastal access to transport coal, limestone, and timber from the inland Waikato and Waipā areas to Auckland.<sup>240</sup>

These were also periods during which Māori on the west coast and in southern Waikato made highly successful efforts to engage with the early colonial economy. Crown officials and other European visitors in this period made regular comment on Māori economic growth, particularly the enthusiasm to grow wheat, to build mills to process it into flour, and to acquire ships to transport it to markets in New Zealand and overseas. In part, this reflected the influence of missionaries such as John Morgan and John Whiteley, who placed a high value on encouraging Māori agriculture, especially wheat production, as a route to prosperity and 'civilisation'.<sup>241</sup> In this they were supported by Governor Grey, who provided loans for the purchase of livestock, tools, flour mills and ships, part of his so-called 'flour and sugar' policy for Māori technological advancement.<sup>242</sup> Māori, however, had their own motivations for economic expansion.

Surveyor-general Charles Ligar observed these developments among iwi and hapū at Whāingaroa in the early 1850s, and their increasing economic self-confidence:

They have now dispensed with the formerly all-important European character, once so indispensable among them, and to be seen in every village, "The Native Trader". He has been for the last three or four years unknown among them, being unable to make a profit by his trading transactions.<sup>243</sup>

Ligar noted that Whāingaroa iwi and hapū were deeply invested and engaged in these new economic pursuits:

The old persons may be seen in groups round the evening fire, chatting about the appearance of crops, and all subjects relating to them; the women being busily employed in making baskets to carry grain and potatoes, or in plaiting leg ropes for driving their pigs to market. All other pursuits seemed merged into the habits of thrift; and the most engrossing subject that can be broached, is the relative merits of two mill sites, over or undershot wheels, and the best means of raising £200 or £300 for the purpose of building a mill which shall grind more than one erected by a rival tribe.<sup>244</sup>

The Ngāti Māhanga and Ngāti Hourua rangatira Te Awaitaia was a key figure behind economic expansion at Whāingaroa. He was born inland at Waipā, but lived at Whāingaroa for most of his adult life (chapter 2, section 2.7.4). He

---

240. Document A70, p158–159.

241. Document A26 (Francis), pp34–38; doc A70, pp148–151; doc A23, pp11–12, 123–128.

242. Document A23, pp91–92.

243. Document A70, p225.

244. Document A70, p225.

played a prominent role alongside his relative Te Wherowhero in the campaign against Ngāti Toa-rangatira and in the Waikato-Maniapoto conquest of northern Taranaki. He converted to Christianity in the early 1830s and supported the establishment of a Wesleyan mission station at Nihinihi, Whāingaroa. In 1836 he was baptised, taking the name Wiremu Nera after the missionary William Naylor, and in 1840 he signed the Treaty at Waikato Heads.<sup>245</sup>

Te Awaitaia considered himself a friend of the Queen and the Governor.<sup>246</sup> He played an important part in promoting land transactions with the Crown from the late 1840s until well into the 1860s. The same cannot be said of other leading rangatira of the region, such as Te Wherowhero, who would revise their attitudes towards inviting Pākehā settlement during the 1850s.<sup>247</sup>

5.4.3 The Horea and Whaingaroa purchases

Two transactions took place early in the 1850s:

- ▶ In May 1850, the Crown intervened in an internal dispute over land at Horea, on the northern side of Whāingaroa Harbour, by ‘purchasing’ the land from one of the parties involved in the dispute. The sale was never confirmed.
- ▶ In March 1851, the Crown purchased the Whaingaroa block, to the southeast of the harbour. A deed was signed, and payment was made in instalments, though Crown officials later made several additional payments after difficulties arose when the land was surveyed for on-sale to settlers.

Both the Horea and Whaingaroa transactions were conducted by surveyor-general Charles Ligar, who held formal responsibility for the purchase of Māori land from 1849 until 1854. The instructions given to Ligar in December 1849 by the colonial secretary Andrew Sinclair on behalf of Governor Grey bear repeating, as they formed a general policy for Crown purchases in this period. Ligar was ordered ‘without the least delay to purchase from the Natives a large extent of land’ in ‘position and in character adapted for the immediate wants of the Europeans’. He was further instructed to arrange payment in instalments over several years, and that the governor wished him to set aside ‘good reserves’ that were ‘carefully agreed on and marked out’ before the purchase was completed.<sup>248</sup>

5.4.3.1 The Crown’s intervention at Horea, May 1850

Horea sits on the northern side of the Whāingaroa Harbour. It had been the subject of contest between different kin groups in pre-Treaty times, and further dispute over the land was still evident after 1840. An extant signed deed suggests that the Crown acquired the block on 25 May 1850. As will be seen, however, the transaction had aspects that were unusual, and it is not typical of other Crown purchases in the area at this time.

---

245. Document A23, p 66–67.

246. Submission 3.4.249(c), pp 3–4.

247. Document A23, pp 165–171.

248. Document A70, pp 163, 223.

It was at Horea, in 1835, that Wesleyan James Wallis first established a missionary base. He seems to have stayed for only a few months before shifting to Whāingaroa, but remained involved in events there in subsequent years.<sup>249</sup>

The area had earlier been the subject of customary transactions between Ngāti Koata (also sometimes referred to just as Tainui) and Ngāti Tahinga. Over the years, they had become closely interconnected and it appears they assisted each other in matters of defence. By 1840, there was also a Ngāti Mahuta presence, under the leadership of Pōtatau Te Wherowhero. This led to disputes about rights between, on the one hand, Ngāti Koata/Tainui and Ngāti Tahinga and, on the other, Ngāti Mahuta, each side asserting primacy.<sup>250</sup>

The disputes continued throughout the decade, causing local missionaries to intervene in an attempt to calm the tensions. In January 1849, the Anglican missionary Benjamin Ashwell attended a meeting between the two groups at which there was 'much angry discussion'. At the end of the meeting, 'the Ngatimahuta at the instigation of Te Wherowhero' apparently agreed to 'refer the matter to the Governor'. Whether this was spontaneous, or in response to a suggestion by Ashwell, is not clear.<sup>251</sup> In the event, Governor Grey met with a large group of Ngāti Mahuta in mid-February at Ngahokowhitu (on the banks of the Waipā), accompanied by Ashwell. At the time, Grey did not investigate the causes of the dispute over Horea, but simply called on Ngāti Mahuta to refrain from hostilities.<sup>252</sup> Subsequently, he reported to London that he intended to refer the question of the disputed ownership of the land to 'persons appointed for that purpose by the Government'.<sup>253</sup>

In September 1849, tensions once again rose to the surface: according to Ashwell, 'a large party from the Ngatimahuta Tribe' was preparing 'to proceed to Waingaroa [sic] respecting the disputed land between them and the Ngatitahinga'.<sup>254</sup> As a result, Ashwell and the Wesleyan James Wallis (now based in Whāingaroa) travelled to Horea in a further attempt to calm tensions. Some chiefs expressed a willingness to make peace, but the conflict was not entirely resolved. Ashwell afterwards wrote that he hoped the dispute would be settled by the Governor.<sup>255</sup>

By early 1850, however, each side had built a fighting pā, and matters came to a head. In early January, Ngāti Mahuta, apparently with reinforcements from Waikato, attacked the stronghold of Ngāti Koata/Tainui, and Ngāti Tahinga came to the assistance of the defenders.<sup>256</sup> In an article published on 16 January 1850, the New Zealander reported:

249. Document A70, p 69; doc M24(e) (Greensill), para 9.

250. Document A22, pp 521–522 (O'Malley); doc M24(e), para 24.

251. Document A70, pp 211–212.

252. Document A70, pp 213; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1210.

253. Document A70, pp 213–214.

254. Document A70, pp 214–215.

255. Document A70, p 215; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1224.

256. Document A70, pp 211–212, 216; doc M24(e), para 24.

about ten days ago, a party of Ngatimahuta went from Waikato, travelling by night and concealing themselves among the high dock [a large-leaved plant] that surrounds the Pah of Ngatitahinga at Horea until the people were gone to their cultivations. They then crawled through the dock, entered the Pah . . . turned out two old men and two old women, and set fire to the Pah.<sup>257</sup>

The article continued that it was believed that the Government was willing to do what it could by way of mediation, and ‘it is probable Te Wherowhero and the contending parties may be visited this week.’<sup>258</sup>

It was at around this point that missionaries and Crown officials began to promote the acquisition of the contested land as way to address the dispute, which in turn prompted the involvement of Charles Ligar, the surveyor-general.<sup>259</sup>

The Governor had instructed Ligar, just three months earlier, to begin buying large areas of land for European settlement, and by February 1850 he was already in the district negotiating with Ngāti Māhanga for what would become the Whaingaroa purchase, discussed in the next section. The precise instructions given to Ligar with respect to Horea are unknown. In a later letter to a friend, though, Ashwell suggested that Ligar was ‘commissioned by the Governor to purchase the Land, and thus put an end to the dispute.’ Ligar, Ashwell continued, ‘called upon me, and requested me to accompany him to use what influence I had to bring the matter to a peaceable termination.’<sup>260</sup>

To this end, Ligar and Ashwell travelled to Horea, arriving on 14 March. The two men began by visiting Ngāti Mahuta at their pā and sought to induce them to sell their interests in the disputed land. Ashwell recalled informing them, at Ligar’s request, ‘that the Governor wished to purchase the land in order to prevent bloodshed’. He then ‘begged of them to accede to this proposition’, and they agreed to consider it, ‘and give a final answer the following day.’<sup>261</sup>

At a church service that evening, Ashwell then berated those Ngāti Mahuta who had previously been baptised, for ‘trampling under foot their baptismal vows’. What they were doing, he asserted, was ‘wrong in the sight of God and man’: ‘Therefore – we their Missionaries . . . blamed them. The Governor and all good men blamed them. The Church of God blamed them, and above God the Holy Spirit was grieved, and blamed them.’<sup>262</sup>

Present, too, was the Wesleyan missionary James Wallis, mentioned earlier. Before leaving the pā, he sought to record in writing an agreement that the chiefs there would ‘leave it with Te Wherowhero the principal Chief of Waikato, and the Governor-in-Chief, Sir Geo. Grey, to settle’. In the end, when the matter was put to

---

257. The New Zealander, 16 January 1850, p 3; see also document A70, p 215.

258. The New Zealander, 16 January 1850, p 3.

259. Document A70, pp 211–212, 215–216.

260. Document A70, p 216; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1229.

261. Document A70, pp 216–217.

262. Document A70, p 217.

the assembled group on 16 March, '400 Armed Natives answered with one Voice Ae Ae.'<sup>263</sup>

The missionaries and Ligar then proceeded to the 'Waingaroa Pa  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile distant' (presumably meaning the pā defended by Ngāti Koata and Ngāti Tahinga). There, they met with a rather different response. In his journal, Ashwell commented that at this pā 'they did not seem so well pleased with the arrangement'. His translation of the words of one chief was: 'Let the Thunder and rain pass by . . . then perhaps we may consent' (emphasis in original).<sup>264</sup> This suggests that although the question of selling land to the Crown might have been broached with Ngāti Koata/Ngāti Tahinga, they were not willing even to discuss the matter at that point: their prime objective was to get through their present troubles and secure a measure of peace.

Ashwell concluded his account by saying:

After much persuasion and constantly going to both parties The arrangement agreed to was, that . . . all the Waikato Natives shd. remove to Waipa, and then after some little time had elapsed The Waingaroa [sic] Natives wd. in all probability also remove and sell their claim to the Governor . . . but Waikato was to receive the first payment[.]<sup>265</sup>

Two days later, on 18 March 1851, Ngāti Mahuta left Horea, and so too did Ligar and Ashwell (and presumably Wallis). Ashwell recorded before their departure: 'Mr Ligar closed the Waikato Pa himself and told the Natives we should consider it Government property.'<sup>266</sup>

Several weeks passed and then, in May, a formal deed for Horea was drawn up. It gave no indication of the number of acres involved in the transaction but it described the land as being bounded:

On the West by the sea on the South the mouth of Whaingaroa on the East the Marataka stream from the mouth to the commencement, thence to Waima at te Tauterei thence across the stream to Whakapaetai[,] the little stream[,] thence the boundary follows the coast line. Horea is the name of the place.<sup>267</sup>

By taking that description and the sketch plan attached to the deed, and then checking the geographical reference points against a modern topographical map, it can be ascertained that the area involved was probably between 4,000 and 4,500 acres.<sup>268</sup>

The same month, the colonial secretary wrote to Ligar concerning his application for £100 to enable him to 'purchase the block . . . as a means of settling the

263. Document A70(a), vol 3, pp 1233, 1234

264. Document A70(a), vol 3, pp 1233, 1234–1235

265. Document A70(a), vol 3, p 1235; doc A70, p 219.

266. Document A70, p 219.

267. Document A70, p 220; doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 153–164, 441.

268. Document A70(a), vol 1, p 164. Estimate by the Tribunal's mapping officer.

serious and long-pending disputes between the Nga te Mahuta and Nga te tepa Tribes [sic]. He informed Ligar that the auditor-general would make the money available.<sup>269</sup>

On 25 March 1850, Te Wherowhero affixed his mark to the deed, which said, in translation: ‘I and also those persons of the Ngatimahuta hapu agree to sell this land to Queen Victoria’. The transaction was witnessed by Tamati Ngapora and Takiwaru, along with James Baber, a clerk of the Survey Office. The deed, however, records the payment as having been £50, not £100.<sup>270</sup> If the area was indeed over 6,000 acres, that works out at less than 2d an acre. Had it been for an outright purchase (even of only, say, half the interests), that figure seems remarkably low. Also to be considered is newspaper report of the time referring to Te Wherowhero as having ‘received a sum of £50 from the government, on the understanding that his people should not visit Horea again with hostile intentions.’<sup>271</sup>

In the end, it seems that the Crown’s intervention at Horea changed very little. There is no evidence to suggest that Ngāti Tahinga and/or Ngāti Koata ever signed a similar deed. In August 1850, seemingly regardless of whatever the Crown may have understood as being achieved by the transaction, Ngāti Mahuta reoccupied their position at Horea. Alongside that is the fact that no proclamation was ever issued declaring that Native title over the Horea block had been extinguished.<sup>272</sup>

Ultimately, Horea became part of the Te Akau block which was confiscated under the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863.<sup>273</sup> The subsequent history of the land, as part of the Te Akau block, will be considered in a future chapter of our report.

5.4.3.2 The Whaingaroa purchase, March 1851

At roughly the same time as becoming involved at Horea, the Crown entered negotiations for the purchase of the Whaingaroa block, on the southern shores of Whāingaroa Harbour.

5.4.3.2.1 THE PURCHASE NEGOTIATIONS

Surveyor-general Charles Ligar appears to have begun discussing the sale of the Whaingaroa block with Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia and other Ngāti Māhanga in early 1850. By early February, he reported considerable progress, to which Sinclair replied, conveying Grey’s opinion that:

the whole of the arrangements which you propose to carry out for the purpose of completing the purchase of a block of land situated near Waingaroa [sic] from William Naylor and the Ngatimahanga tribe are extremely judicious and that it is His Excellency’s wish that these arrangements should be completed and the first 269. Document A70, p 220; doc A70(a), vol 2, pp 550–551.

270. Document A70, p 220; doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 153–164, 441.

271. Document A70, p 221; see also New Zealander, 28 August 1850, p 3.

272. Document A70, pp 220–221.

273. Document A70, p 221.

instalment paid with the least practicable delay . . . the price paid for the land, the periods at which the instalments are to be paid and the extent of the reserves all appear judicious and good.<sup>274</sup>

Little more is known about the negotiations for this purchase, other than the fact that a deed for the land was signed on 22 March 1851. The deed was signed by ‘Wiremu Nero [sic]’ (Te Awaitaia), Te Waka and 11 other ‘chiefs of Ngatimahanga and of Nga Te Hourua’. The deed, written in te reo Māori, declared that the Māori signatories ‘and their whole tribes consent to sell this piece of Land to Queen Victoria’ (‘na ka whakaae nei ratou ko o ratou hapu katoa ki te hoko i tenei whenua ki a Kuini Victoria’).<sup>275</sup> The sketch map accompanying the deed showed that the block included most of the southern shoreline of Whāingaroa Harbour. In return, the Crown agreed to pay £400, over three instalments.<sup>276</sup> The block’s size was not mentioned but was later thought to contain 8,000 acres. In fact, according to GIS calculations by Innes, the total area of the Whāingaroa block is 25,091 acres.<sup>277</sup>

The evidence suggests that an initial payment of £200 was paid on 22 March 1851, the day the deed was signed. According to Ms Boulton, portions of this payment and of the next £100 instalment were passed on by Te Awaitaia and his people to what Ligar referred to in April 1852 as ‘distant tribes’. Recipients in 1853 included Ngāti Māhanga at Whaikohai and Ngāti Te Ata, as well as the rangatira William Nga Waro and Hori Tauroa. An additional £10 was paid to another chief, Kiwi, in December 1853.<sup>278</sup> The issue of prices and payment is revisited in the next section.

Visiting the Whāingaroa area again in April 1852, Ligar observed the keen desire of Māori to engage with new economic opportunities, including by using the capital acquired from the 1851 purchase. He recorded that those involved in the sale had used part of their purchase money to buy ‘implements of agriculture and horses’, and had ‘otherwise placed themselves in circumstances to commence the cultivation of wheat on a large scale’.<sup>279</sup>

Ligar also set aside four reserves, identified in the deed as ‘ka waiho tonu hei kainga mo nga tangata i te whenua’ (reserved as places of abode for the owners). These were named as Te Mata, Takapaunui, Ohiapopoko and Te Uku. Although not mentioned in the deed, Ms Boulton noted that fifth area, which came to be known as ‘Te Rape’, also appears to have been excluded from the sale. Together, these reserve lands were later found to contain some 2,300 acres.<sup>280</sup>

After 1854, the Crown made a series of payments to Māori for land in the Te Mata block, part of a later sequence of western harbours transactions conducted

274. Document A70, p 223.

275. Document A141, ‘AUC 142 Whāingaroa’; Turton, Maori Deeds, pp 596–597 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 134–151).

276. Document A70, p 226; doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 134–151; doc A141, ‘AUC 142 Whāingaroa’.

277. Document A141, p 72.

278. Document A70, p 226.

279. Document A70, p 224.

280. Document A70, p 238–241.

by McLean and Rogan, among others. At 1,159 acres, Te Mata was the largest single area of land set aside from pre-Native Land Court transactions in the inquiry district, and represented half of the land reserved from the Whaingaroa purchase. By 1858, the Crown had acquired the whole of Te Mata block. We consider the Crown's actions in acquiring Te Mata at section 5.4.4.2.5 and the later history of the Whaingaroa reserves at section 5.4.5.1.<sup>281</sup>

5.4.3.2.2 CROWN SALES TO SETTLERS: DISPUTES AND FURTHER PAYMENTS

The Whaingaroa purchase – and parts of the Karioi purchase (see section 5.4.4.2) – were the only pre-1865 transactions in the district where Māori understandings of what had been agreed were tested by the arrival of European settlers to take up occupation soon after the sale had occurred.<sup>282</sup> After the deed was signed in 1851, small plots of land at Whaingaroa were advertised for purchase as early as June 1852, including one area that became the European township of Raglan (named after a British commander in the Crimean war) on the south side of the harbour.<sup>283</sup>

In December 1853, Captain John Campbell Johnstone purchased a 1,600-acre block, known as Te Haroto, at public auction.<sup>284</sup> This land was located between Hauroto Bay and the mouth of the Waitetuna River. In size, it was one-fifth of the Whaingaroa block, though Johnstone paid £1,460 at auction, more than three times the £400 initially paid to Māori for the whole 8,000 acres. However, when Johnston attempted to take up the land at Te Haroto he encountered considerable resistance from Māori. It was not until April 1855, 16 months after purchasing the land, that Johnstone finally took possession of the block. He later attributed this delay to the government 'selling the land before they had bought it'.<sup>285</sup>

In January 1854, Johnstone arranged for a team of surveyors to commence work at Te Haroto. They were 'soon interrupted by "Watini" [Watene Waitepuna] who turned us off'.<sup>286</sup> Johnstone informed Ligar of the situation and was given 'written authority' to complete the Crown's purchase of the land. Johnstone's efforts to acquire remaining Māori interests in Te Haroto met with little success. This did not, however, prevent the Crown from attempting to accept Johnstone's payment for the land in early 1854, though Johnstone delayed paying until July of that year, out of caution due to Māori opposition.<sup>287</sup>

Eventually, that opposition forced the Crown to return to the negotiating table. On 3 May 1854, Donald McLean, now chief land purchase commissioner, signed a deed recording payment of £100 to Taniora, E Ruini and 25 others 'for all places within the land purchased by Mr Ligar formerly'.<sup>288</sup> McLean then made a further payment of £100 on 25 August 1854, when Watene Waitepuna, Nikorima Ratu,

281. Document A70, pp 325–326.

282. Document A70, p 227.

283. Document A70, pp 243–244 transcript 4.1.16 (Verna Tūteao, hearing week 6, Aramiro), p 1336.

284. Document A70, p 229.

285. Document A70, pp 229, 231–232.

286. Document A70, p 229.

287. Document A70, pp 229–231.

288. Document A141, 'AUC 138 Te Haroto'; A70(a), vol 1, pp 88–101.

Taniora and Hemi signed a second deed in Auckland. The deed was described as ‘the final payment for Te Haroto’, and recorded that Māori would move off the land ‘when the wheat crop now growing upon the land is ripe, and has been reaped.’<sup>289</sup>

5.4.3.2.3 REOCCUPATION BY NGĀTI MĀHANGA

Johnstone finally took possession of Te Haroto in April 1855 and subsequently sought compensation from the government for the expense and delay in taking possession of the land. After a lengthy process, he was awarded just over £560 for financial damages in 1864.<sup>290</sup> However, by the early 1860s, Ngāti Māhanga had returned to reoccupy part of the land at Te Haroto. Johnstone later recalled that Te Awaitaia:

expressed a wish to purchase a piece of land on the harbour belonging to me, and near the Native reserve, which latter has no water frontage, and I gave him permission to live on it pro tem., which he did, cultivating the land, and using it for a pig run. A year ago he located a member of his tribe on the land.<sup>291</sup>

According to Johnstone, when he asked Te Awaitaia and his people to move off the land, the rangatira ‘gave me filthy abuse, and threatened to burn down my house.’ Despite Johnstone’s complaints to the colonial secretary, Ngāti Māhanga remained on the land and refused to pay rent.<sup>292</sup> It is unclear from the evidence how long this situation continued.

5.4.3.2.4 LATER INQUIRIES OVER PAYMENT

In later years, Māori questioned whether the agreed price for the Whaingaroa block was ever paid in full. This may have been partly because portions of money were distributed to several Māori groups with interests in the land, a situation that Ms Boulton said was common, especially when payment was made in instalments.<sup>293</sup> In addition, as mentioned, from 1854 the Crown made several additional payments to assist Johnstone, as well as multiple payments for Te Mata reserve within the Whaingaroa block.

On 14 June 1913, the Native Department received an inquiry from Tema Pouwhare, writing from the office of a firm of Auckland solicitors, enclosing a copy of the 1851 Whaingaroa purchase deed, advising that ‘the vendors stated that the purchase money is not yet being [sic] fully paid.’<sup>294</sup> He asked the Department to provide information on how much had been paid, and how much was still owing.

---

289. Document A141, ‘AUC 149 Te Haroto’; A70(a), vol 1, pp207–210. Another payment of £35 was made on 12 April 1854 to Noah Te Ngaru, Ekau Waingaro and others for land known as Te Koao within the Whaingaroa block. According to Ms Boulton, the circumstances around this payment are not clear: doc A70, p 234.

290. Document A70, pp 232–235.

291. Document A70, pp 235–236.

292. Document A70, p 236.

293. Document A70, pp 226–227.

294. Document A70, p 236.

When officials replied referring Pouwhare to Turton's Deeds, a collection of early land purchase documents, he responded that those records suggested that £200 of the £400 purchase price remained outstanding. The same complaint was made in September 1913 by the Auckland lawyer A H Te Mete.<sup>295</sup>

Thomas Fisher, under-secretary of the Native Department, asked one of his staff, Patrick Sheridan, to investigate these complaints. Using Turton's Deeds, Sheridan located deeds and receipts totalling £602 for 'Whaingaroa'. Ms Boulton, however, noted that only £310 of the listed payments can be confirmed as payment for Whaingaroa block, the remainder relating either to the Te Mata reserve or to poorly defined land elsewhere in the district. Sheridan concluded that 'a great deal more' than £400 purchase price had been paid, and noted that, in any case, 'the statute of limitations is a sufficient answer in this case especially as the old file perished in the fire at the Parliament Building in 1908'. Fisher duly communicated the outcome of Sheridan's investigations to Mr Te Mete.<sup>296</sup>

The issue of payment for the Whaingaroa block was raised again in 1914 in a letter to the Native Minister by Te Awarutu Te Awaitaia, the son of Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia, who subsequently also made a petition to Parliament on the subject. Te Awarutu had seen Fisher's reply to his lawyer, Mr Te Mete, and disagreed with its contents. According to his own research, Te Awarutu calculated that £342 of the £400 had been paid, leaving £58 still owing. He was especially incensed by the suggestion that a statute of limitations should apply, which he found to be an insult to the mana of his late father:

This seems to me to be a rather questionable tactic to use against the Son of the loyal Native – a Native who stood loyally by Her Majesty Queen Victoria in the Darkest hour of New Zealand history: - Wiremu Te Awaitaia, who could, had he so desired, have been "King" in place of Potatau.<sup>297</sup>

Te Awarutu's petition was received by the Native Affairs committee with a report from Under-Secretary Fisher setting out the payments as investigated by Sheridan. Ms Boulton found no evidence as to how or whether it was resolved.<sup>298</sup>

5.4.4 Further purchases in the north-west after 1854

Beginning in April 1854, the chief commissioner of the recently established Land Purchase Department, Donald McLean, commenced negotiations for several areas of land in the western and north-western reaches of the inquiry district. In July 1855, McLean charged John Rogan, the district commissioner, with completing this series of transactions. As a result, over the following years the Crown acquired:

---

295. Document A70, p 236–237.

296. Document A70, p 237.

297. Document A70, p 238.

298. Document A70, p 238.

- ▶ the entire Te Mata native reserve (set aside from the 1851 Whaingaroa block and discussed in section 5.4.3.2, above);
- ▶ the 1,249-acre Oioroa block;
- ▶ the 4,840-acre Harihari block;
- ▶ approximately 36,000 acres across the Karioi, Ruapuke, Wharauora, and Wahatane blocks; and
- ▶ the interests of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Toa-rangatira across the above-mentioned lands.

5.4.4.1 McLean's initial payments

Throughout 1854, McLean – with the assistance, on occasion, of sub-commissioners of the Land Purchase Department – entered 24 known arrangements across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts.<sup>299</sup> Ms Boulton acknowledged the paucity of evidence concerning McLean's initial negotiations for these transactions, but suggested that the material that has survived presents the arrangements as 'confusing and chaotic'.<sup>300</sup> The receipts and deeds of the initial transactions indicate that McLean visited the region on a handful of occasions throughout 1854, at which time he negotiated with Māori in 'intense, rapid bursts'.<sup>301</sup> Almost all the transactions occurred between April and July 1854 and, in one instance, McLean made payments for six areas of land across just four days.<sup>302</sup>

In entering these arrangements, McLean appears to have negotiated with individuals or small groups of owners, rather than seeking the consent of the wider community. There is an absence of documentation concerning the hosting of hui to establish communal consent, despite the fact that, as Dr O'Malley has suggested, Crown officials had 'every incentive to forward details of these meetings to the Government . . . to provide . . . evidence as to the careful and scrupulous manner in which they had proceeded with their negotiations'.<sup>303</sup> Instead, the surviving documentation indicates McLean's willingness to commence negotiations for land transactions without establishing communal consent. In several cases across Whāingaroa, for instance, deeds were signed by individuals or small groups of owners.<sup>304</sup>

McLean's approach to paying for the land and identifying the affected areas was similarly haphazard. In his subsequent instructions to Rogan – discussed below – McLean described his initial payments to Māori sellers as 'advances' on the land.<sup>305</sup> In some instances, the payments appear to be more akin to loans, as Māori were expected to pay the money back to the Crown once they had received payment for their interests in lands subsequently alienated.<sup>306</sup> The land affected by these

---

299. Document A70, p 300.

300. Document A70, p 362; doc A70(b), p 16.

301. Document A70, pp 300, 317, 319.

302. Document A70, p 317.

303. Vincent O'Malley, Wai 1040 RO1, doc A6, pp 478–479 (doc A70, pp 375–376).

304. Document A70, pp 334–335.

305. Document A70, pp 303, 315.

306. Document A70, p 321.

early arrangements, meanwhile, was usually ill-defined. None of the lands were surveyed prior to the signings of the 1854 deeds and neither the deeds nor the receipts specified the acreage affected by the arrangements. Instead, the documents usually defined the affected lands by way of place names and landmarks, though on occasion even this detail was absent.<sup>307</sup> In some instances McLean paid Māori sellers for all their interests across wide areas of land, such as the ‘Whaingaroa district’ or, in a handful of cases, the ‘Kawhia, Aotea, Te Akau and Waikato’ regions.<sup>308</sup>

In mid-1855, McLean called upon John Rogan, the district commissioner of the Land Purchase Department, to bring a semblance of cohesion to these early arrangements. On 13 July, McLean formally informed Rogan:

Several advances have been made to the Natives of Waikato, Whaingaroa, and Aotea, on account of tracts of land which they have agreed to dispose of to the government. Copies of the receipts, twenty seven (27) in number, have been already furnished to you at Auckland, together with sketches made by the claimants of the lands they agree to cede.<sup>309</sup>

With reference to these lands, McLean instructed Rogan to ascertain the ‘extent, position, description, and quality of these blocks’ and make ‘final arrangements’ for the Crown’s acquisition of these areas.<sup>310</sup>

McLean emphasised that the finalisation of the earlier arrangements was ‘of urgent importance, now that the Whaingaroa district is being settled by Europeans.’<sup>311</sup> As noted in section 5.4.3.2, settlers had begun purchasing lands acquired by the Crown under the 1851 Whaingaroa block purchase by late 1853. McLean was concerned that Māori would become aware of the prices at which the Crown was on-selling their land to settlers and that, as a result, Crown agents would ‘be compelled to pay an enormously high price’ for additional lands.<sup>312</sup>

On the matter of specifics, McLean was willing to defer much of the detail to Rogan, suggesting that he use his ‘experience in adjusting such questions with the Natives’ in establishing the best way to proceed.<sup>313</sup> However, on the matter of purchase price and native reserves, he issued clear instructions. To ensure a profitable investment for the Crown, McLean called on Rogan to pay between sixpence and one shilling and sixpence per acre for the lands acquired.<sup>314</sup> McLean also instructed Rogan to set aside ‘ample reserves’ for Māori sellers. He described these lands as blocks ‘excepted by the Natives, for their own use and subsistence, within the tracts of land they have ceded to the Crown for colonization.’ McLean added that reserves should be ‘sufficiently extensive to provide for their present and

---

307. Document A70, pp 454–455.

308. Document A70, p 319.

309. McLean to Rogan, 13 July 1855 (doc A70, p 341).

310. McLean to Rogan, 13 July 1855 (doc A70, p 341).

311. McLean to Rogan, 13 July 1855 (doc A70, p 344).

312. McLean to colonial secretary, 30 August 1855 (doc A70, p 344).

313. McLean to Rogan, 13 July 1855 (doc A70, p 341).

314. Document A70, p 341; doc A28, p 122.

future wants' and noted that 'there has been a district understanding that [Māori sellers] should not at any time be called upon to alienate any lands so reserved.'<sup>315</sup>

5.4.4.2 Further purchases around Whāingaroa Harbour

- ▶ Between November 1855 and June 1859, Rogan and others completed seven further purchases on and around the western harbours. The Crown thereby acquired nearly all the land along the coast from Whāingaroa and Aotea, as well one block further south between Kāwhia and Marokopa. The Crown also purported to alienate the entire interests of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Toa-rangatira in the land already transacted in this region.

5.4.4.2.1 THE KARIOI PURCHASE, NOVEMBER 1855

The 17,849-acre Karioi block is located at the southern mouth of Whāingaroa Harbour, reaching down the coast towards Aotea Harbour and bounded on the east by the 1851 Whāingaroa block.<sup>316</sup> The block is significant as the site of Karioi maunga. James Rickard stated: 'we've never really moved away from the mountain. The reason why we talk about Karioi Te Maunga is because it provided us with the essence of life, fresh water, and so we lived on those slopes all our lives, or the thousand years that we arrived here.'<sup>317</sup>

The transaction of the Karioi block began on 12 April 1854, when McLean made the first of two £50 payments for land known as Te Hutuwai.<sup>318</sup> This payment was made to Kereopa, Wetini Mahikai, and 16 others, on the understanding that it was an advance of the £200 purchase price for Te Hutuwai. The second £50 advance was made in July of the same year to Wetini and six others. As far as can be determined, the outstanding £100 owed on Te Hutuwai was never paid to Māori sellers. Instead, the money received by Wetini and others came to constitute an advance on the larger Karioi block.<sup>319</sup>

Following McLean's initial negotiations for Te Hutuwai, Rogan travelled to the Whāingaroa district to survey the land that became the Karioi block. He completed the survey in August 1855.<sup>320</sup> The available evidence does not offer detail of the negotiations conducted during this period, though it appears that the purchase price served to delay the execution of the Crown's acquisition of the land. Shortly after the block was surveyed, Rogan wrote to McLean reporting that he had offered £475 (in addition to the £100 already advanced) for the Karioi block, though the sellers 'unanimously declined this offer, and requested me to refer the 315. McLean to colonial secretary, 29 July 1854 (doc A70, pp 341–342).

316. At the time of purchase, the block was estimated to be 12,000 acres. Innes calculated it to be 17,849 acres using GIS: doc A141, p 72.

317. Transcript 4.1.16, p 303 (James Rickard, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

318. Document A70, p 348. While the land was held to constitute 12,000 acres at the time of sale, recent Geographic Information System estimates suggest that the block's area is 17,849 acres: doc A141 (Innes), p 72.

319. Document A141, 'AUC 730 Te Hutuwai Whaingaroa', 'AUC Karioi'.

320. Document A70, p 348.

question for your consideration.<sup>321</sup> McLean was not willing to raise the price and Māori ultimately accepted the additional £475 initially offered.

The deed for the Karioi block was executed on 5 November 1855. It was signed by Rogan on behalf of the Crown and by Remi, Heta, and more than 50 others described as ‘the Chiefs and people of Whaingaroa’, including 11 identified as children. A further payment of £475 was made on the signing of the deed, bringing the total sale price for Karioi to £575.<sup>322</sup> The plan attached to the deed stated that the block was ‘about 12,000 acres’ and identified one native reserve, of approximately 600 acres in size.<sup>323</sup> The reserve was subsequently known as the Karioi Native Reserve, or Whaanga.<sup>324</sup>

There is little evidence about the understandings of Māori sellers in transacting the Karioi block with the Crown. However, the surviving evidence reveals some irregularities in the Crown’s acquisition of the land. The deed of sale appears to have been signed by a number of people with no authority to transact the land, including children and captives.<sup>325</sup> During our hearing week at Aramiro Marae, Heather Thompson explained that during ‘the 1887 hearing of the Manuaitu-Aotea block a Ngāti Tuirangi chief brought it to the attention of the Court that there were at least three names of slaves included in the sale of the Karioi Block, who clearly had no entitlement to the land.’<sup>326</sup>

The claimants also noted that the Whāingaroa rangatira Hounuku – whose lands were affected by the transactions – was not party to the deed.<sup>327</sup> In light of this record, Marleina Te Kanawa described the Crown’s acquisition of the Karioi block as ‘a dubious sale.’<sup>328</sup>

Alongside the Whaanga native reserve, the sellers excluded three areas of land from the sale block when Rogan surveyed the area in August 1855. In correspondence to McLean at the time, Rogan explained:

The Natives decided on retaining the whole of the water frontage, from the entrance of the Harbour inland to the proposed township, and following Mr Ligar’s boundary for about two miles, which compromises nearly the whole of the available land in this block.<sup>329</sup>

According to Ms Boulton, the lands excluded from the Karioi block were likely the Rakaunui, Te Kopua, and Papahua blocks. These blocks constituted much of 321. Rogan to McLean, 9 August 1855 (doc A70, p 349).

322. Document A70, pp 348–349; doc A70(a) (Boulton document bank), vol 1, pp 71–86).

323. Document A70, p 348.

324. Document A70, p 325.

325. Document A70, p 349; doc A99 (Tainui researchers), p 105.

326. Transcript 4.1.16, p 1228 (Heather Thompson, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 13 September 2013).

327. Document A70, p 349; transcript 4.1.16, p 333 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

328. Transcript 4.1.16, p 333 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

329. Rogan to McLean, 9 August 1855 (doc A70, p 351).

the southern shoreline of Whāingaroa Harbour not already acquired by the Crown as part of the 1851 Whaingaroa block purchase.<sup>330</sup>

In addition, according to the claimants, the Crown set aside a 228-acre area of land along the coast for a pilot and signal station reserve in 1861. When Crown officials sought to survey the land in 1869, Kereopa Honehono resisted such efforts, and it was not until 1877 that the land was finally surveyed.<sup>331</sup> In Rogan's sketch plan and description of the block, the disputed land was clearly included within the Karioi block. However, Marleina Te Kanawa told us that as far as the sellers were concerned 'it was originally part of the Te Kōpua block' that was excluded from the sale, which 'eased into Te Whaanga' further down the coast.<sup>332</sup>

Speaking to the significance of this land, Te Kanawa explained that the area included the pā Te Pae Akarōa and a place called Pokopoko, 'where there are burial grounds'.<sup>333</sup> The Tainui Oral and Traditional Historical Report describes Te Pae Akarōa as 'a long promontory between Iwitahi and Te Kōpua overlooking Ngarunui beach' where – despite the Crown's claim of ownership – '[h]apu gathered annually up until the 1960s to catch the seasonal migratory influx of mango and other species'. Reflecting upon the Crown's claim of ownership to these highly significant sites, Te Kanawa questioned why Māori sellers would 'want to sell their tūpuna, or why would they agree to it?'<sup>334</sup>

In 1915, the land was vested in local government and over the following decades portions of the block were set aside for roads, while various leasing options were applied to the land.<sup>335</sup> In 1989, meanwhile, local government proposed the development of the site and, as the claimants explained, this proposal served as 'the catalyst' for the Wai 125 claim.<sup>336</sup>

5.4.4.2.2 THE RUAPUKE PURCHASE, FEBRUARY 1856

The Crown also acquired the 4,413-acre Ruapuke block between April 1854 and the summer of 1855 and 1856.<sup>337</sup> Ruapuke is located immediately south of Karioi, and includes a stretch of coastline north of the mouth of Aotea Harbour. The Crown's transaction of the land commenced on 14 April 1854, when McLean made a payment of £10 to Hemi Matini and Hetaraka for land referred to as 'Paparata Aotea'. The receipt of payment for Paparata Aotea identified 'Pumipi' as 'the principal person – or elder – who consents to the sale of this land', while the signatories

---

330. Document A70, p351.

331. Document A99, pp109–110.

332. Document A141, 'Karioi'; transcript 4.1.16, p334 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

333. Transcript 4.1.16, p333 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

334. Transcript 4.1.16, p333 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013); doc A99, p108.

335. Document A99, pp110–111.

336. Document A99, p111; transcript 4.1.16, p336 (Marleina Te Kanawa, hearing week 6, Aramiro marae, 10 September 2013).

337. While the land was thought to be 6,000 acres at the time of sale, Innes calculated its area as 4,413 acres using GIS: doc A141, p72.

were identified as ‘his children; wherefore we also consent to the sale, and affix our names hereunto.’<sup>338</sup> The receipt identified the block with reference to physical boundaries and noted that ‘the total amount of payment . . . for this land shall be decided upon hereafter.’<sup>339</sup>

In mid-1855, Rogan travelled to Ruapuke to finalise McLean’s earlier arrangement. In correspondence with McLean, he explained that ‘the Chief Wiremu Nera and some of the Aotea Natives’ had offered to sell a 6,000-acre block, for which he offered them £300.<sup>340</sup> However, the offer was ‘unanimously declined’ by the prospective sellers, who were unwilling to accept anything less than £700. In light of this impasse, and in accordance with a request from the land owners, Rogan referred the question of price to McLean for his consideration.<sup>341</sup>

As with the Karioi block transaction, McLean was unwilling to increase the price offered to Māori. Over the following months, meanwhile, he pressured the sellers to accept the initial offer. Precisely what happened between August and October 1855 is not clear from the available evidence. In a letter dated 1 October, Rogan explained to McLean that ‘your timely letter to Chapman of Aotea, has settled the question between the Natives and I, they are all agreeable to take the £300 previously offered.’<sup>342</sup> Ms Boulton suggested that Chapman might have been ‘one of the Maori who was involved in the negotiations or . . . a European who was asked to exert his influence with Maori to persuade them to take the lower amount.’<sup>343</sup> We note that Chapman signed the eventual deed, so was likely one of the Māori owners of the land.<sup>344</sup> It is clear is that his influence was used to promote the Crown’s purchasing agenda. As a result of his involvement, the owners of Ruapuke agreed to accept less than half the purchase price that, just two months earlier, they had stated was the lowest price they would accept.

In the wake of these underhand tactics, the deed of sale for Ruapuke was signed on 2 February 1856. John Rogan signed the document on behalf of the Crown, while the Māori signatories were listed as Wiremu Nera Awaitaia, Hetaraka, Te Waka, Hemi, Chapman, Hapati, and almost 80 others, described as ‘the chiefs and people of Aotea and Whaingaroa.’<sup>345</sup> Rogan subsequently described the signatories as ‘Ngatinaho and Ngatimahanga natives.’ Upon signing the deed they received £290, bringing the total purchase price to £300.<sup>346</sup>

Two native reserves totalling 396 acres were set aside from the 6,000-acre block: the 86-acre Toroanui block, reserved for ‘Kewene Paia’, and the 310-acre Horokawau block, set aside ‘for Hone te Apa.’<sup>347</sup>

---

338. Document A70, pp 356–357; doc A141, ‘AUC 726 Paparata Aotea’.

339. Document A141, ‘AUC 726 Paparata Aotea’.

340. Document A70, p 356.

341. McLean to Rogan, 12 September 1855 (doc A70, p 356).

342. Document A70, p 356.

343. Document A70, pp 356–357.

344. Document A141, ‘AUC 136 Ruapuke’.

345. Document A70, p 357; doc A141, ‘AUC 136 Ruapuke’.

346. Rogan to McLean, 4 February 1856 (doc A70, p 357).

347. Document A70, p 358; doc A140, p 47.

5.4.4.2.3 THE WHARAUROA PURCHASE, DECEMBER 1857

In April 1854, alongside the Karioi and Ruapuke blocks, McLean also entered arrangements for land within what would ultimately become the 12,891-acre Wharauroa sale block.<sup>348</sup> Bounded at the west by Aotea Harbour, Wharauroa is a thin rectangular block located along the southern boundary of the 1851 Whaingaroa purchase. Between the commencement of McLean's payments in 1854 and the Crown's subsequent acquisition of the Wharauroa block three years later, three different Crown agents made a total of six payments for the land.

McLean made the first payment on 11 April 1854, when he paid £50 to Hemi Watini, Wiremu Nera (Te Awaitaia), and four others for land referred to as 'Hui Pokohuka'. The deed of sale identified the block by physical boundaries and stated that 'when the land has been surveyed and the boundaries perambulated, the total amount of payment will be decided upon.'<sup>349</sup> McLean then made an additional £50 payment the following day for land identified as 'Tutaenui/Waikarakia' to Rupene Rapatahi, Hakopa, Wiremu Nera, and 11 others.<sup>350</sup>

HT Kemp, sub-commissioner of the Native Land Purchase Department, made the third payment on 5 May 1854 for land identified as 'Tureakina'. The deed was signed by Te Tana, Hamiora, and five others described as 'the Chiefs and people belonging to the Ngatimahanga Tribe, and of Waikato.'<sup>351</sup> At the time of the deed signing, the signatories received £100 and the deed identified Tureakina with reference to physical boundaries. As was the case with Hui Pokohuka, the document noted that 'The remaining payment of the land will be finally arranged whensoever the land is examined, and laid down by the Surveyor.'<sup>352</sup>

Two additional payments were made in 1855 and 1856. On 11 September 1855, McLean made a payment of £10 to 'Puhata' for an 'unsold portion of land named Te Wharauroa in the Whaingaroa District.'<sup>353</sup> The receipt stated that 'This is the only and final payment for the above named portion of land.'<sup>354</sup> Just over a year later, on 10 October 1856, a payment of £30 was made to Māori sellers. This payment only appears in the final deed of sale for the Wharauroa block, which lists all the preceding payments made for the affected lands. It is not clear who the payment was made to or for what area of land.<sup>355</sup>

The final deed of sale for Wharauroa was signed on 2 December 1857 by Rogan and Te Tana, Hemi, Aperahama, Hone, Hakopa, and others identified as 'the Chiefs and people of the tribe of Ngatitewehi.'<sup>356</sup> This deed identified the block by physical boundaries and, upon signing the deed, the signatories received 348. At the time of sale the block was estimated to be 8,000 acres. Using GIS, Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell calculated it to be 12,891 acres.

---

349. Document A70, p 359; doc A141, 'AUC 724 Hui Pokohuka'.

350. Document A70, pp 340, 359; doc A141, 'AUC 723 Waikarakia'.

351. Document A70, p 359; doc A141, 'AUC 145 Tureikina'.

352. Document A70, p 359; doc A141, 'AUC 145 Tureikina'.

353. Document A70, pp 359–360; doc A141, 'AUC 144 Te Wharauroa'.

354. Document A70, pp 359–360; doc A141, 'AUC 144 Te Wharauroa'.

355. Document A141, 'AUC 132 Wharauroa'.

356. Document A70, p 360; doc A141, 'AUC 132 Wharauroa'.

a £170 payment for the land.<sup>357</sup> In total, the Crown paid £410 for the 8,000-acre Wharauoa block. Two blocks – Te Rape and Mowhiti – totalling 474 acres were retained by the sellers.<sup>358</sup>

The Crown's acquisition of Wharauoa was the most complex transaction of its pre-Native Land Court purchases across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts. Ms Boulton suggested that the piecemeal nature of the purchase strongly indicates that the Crown was 'unable to negotiate a single transaction with publicly reached consensus amongst . . . those who held interests in the block'.<sup>359</sup> While this specific assessment cannot be corroborated by concrete evidence, the stream of complaints that emerged in the wake of the Crown's acquisition of the land supports Ms Boulton's broad assessment that there were serious issues with the Crown's consultative efforts.

Between 1886 and 1900, the Native Affairs Department received several letters seeking unpaid monies from the sale of the Wharauoa block. On 24 August 1886, lawyer ET Dufaur of Auckland wrote to the under-secretary for the department on behalf of former owners of the land seeking £150 of unpaid monies. The department informed Dufaur that no money was outstanding on the Wharauoa block. This prompted him to request detail, on behalf of his client, concerning the date and location of the payments made and the names of those who had received a portion of the purchase price. However, the under-secretary for the department, P Sheridan, considered that Dufaur had 'no right to expect this information respecting a purchase made 30 years ago'. As such, the Crown refused to divulge additional information to him.<sup>360</sup>

Similar queries were lodged with the department in 1895 and 1900. On 7 March 1895, Hone Waitere Te Ngana wrote to the Native Minister, Richard Seddon, requesting the payment of outstanding monies owed on the Wharauoa block. Commenting on this correspondence, the under-secretary noted that 'there is nothing due on this purchase and the Natives have been repeatedly so informed'.<sup>361</sup> Evidently, Hone Waitere did not agree. In October, his son, Te Mahara Hone Waitere, wrote to the department, once again requesting the payment of the outstanding purchase price. As a result, department officials sought confirmation that no money was owed. Following consultation with Rogan, Hone Waitere was told that 'there are no grounds whatever for supposing that there is still a balance due'.<sup>362</sup> Five years later, in 1900, John St Clair wrote to the land purchase officer, George Wilkinson, on behalf of Hone Waitere and other sellers – including Paora Pomare, Pita Mahu, and Hapoka Pikiwai – seeking to make a time when the balance owing to the sellers could be paid. In response, Wilkinson wrote that he was unaware of any balance owing on the purchase.<sup>363</sup>

---

357. Document A141, 'AUC 132 Wharauoa'.

358. Document A70, p 360; doc A142 (Walker), pp 54–57.

359. Document A70, p 362.

360. Sheridan to Lewis, 20 October 1886 (doc A70, p 363).

361. Sheridan, minute, 14 August 1895 (doc A70, p 366).

362. Sheridan, minute, 30 December 1895 (doc A70, pp 366–367).

363. Document A70, p 367.

The Crown also received correspondence during the late nineteenth century that suggests its agents had not established the consent of all right holders for the alienation of Wharaurua. On 15 November 1890, Kanga Kihirini Te Kanawa wrote to the Native Minister, Edwin Mitchelson, explaining that he had not sold the land and that the sellers were ‘my younger brothers (relatives) we came from a common ancestor. Our ancestor was thus from whom we claim this land.’<sup>364</sup> Te Kanawa included the whakapapa of ‘our ancestor’ down to Aperahama Karu, who was presumably the ‘Aperahama’ whose name appeared on the December 1857 deed of sale.<sup>365</sup>

After some investigation into the transaction, the under-secretary for the department dismissed Te Kanawa’s claim to the land, suggesting:

It cannot be supposed if the writer had any claims that he would have allowed his younger relatives to sell the land without looking after his own interests. In any case it is clearly impossible to admit any claim at this date and I recommend that applicant be informed that the question of a purchase which was completed so many years ago cannot be reopened.<sup>366</sup>

A response to this effect was subsequently sent to Te Kanawa. Evidently unsatisfied with the Crown’s position, he wrote again on 21 June 1894, referring specifically to land known as Kainamunamu. He explained that, at the time of the sale, he had ‘belonged to the King party’ and, as such, had opposed selling the land. He was now, however, ‘willing to accept’ his portion of the purchase price, ‘having withdrawn from the King Party.’<sup>367</sup> On this occasion, George Wilkinson dismissed the credibility of Te Kanawa by describing him as ‘a shingle short.’<sup>368</sup> Te Kanawa was informed that ‘the Government has now no money in hand belonging to the persons who sold that land.’<sup>369</sup>

5.4.4.2.4 THE WAHATANE PURCHASE, AUGUST 1857

The Wahatane block is located at the south-eastern corner of the Wharaurua block, inland from Aotea and Whāingaroa Harbours. In contrast to the other blocks acquired by the Crown throughout this series of transactions, Rogan alone commenced and completed the purchase of Wahatane in 1857.<sup>370</sup>

There is no detail concerning the negotiations that preceded the purchase. Hemi Matini and Hariata signed the deed of sale on 24 August 1857. On this date, they received two payments of £20, bringing the total purchase price for the land to £40.<sup>371</sup> The deed estimated the unsurveyed block to be 500 acres. A geographic

---

364. Document A70, p 364.

365. Document A70, p 364.

366. Lewis to Native Minister, 26 November 1890 (doc A70, p 365).

367. Document A70, p 365.

368. Wilkinson to Sheridan, 14 July 1894 (doc A70, p 365).

369. Sheridan to Davis, 29 August 1894 (doc A70, p 366).

370. Document A70, p 369.

371. Document A141, ‘AUC 135 Wahatane’; doc A70, p 369.

information system estimate, however, suggests that the land is 815 acres.<sup>372</sup> Rogan did not set aside any reserves for the sellers of Wahatane.<sup>373</sup>

5.4.4.2.5 THE TE MATA PURCHASE, JUNE 1859

Between 1854 and 1859, the Crown made a number of small purchases of land in Te Mata, an area originally designated as a reserve in the Whaingaroa purchase of 1851. The Crown ultimately acquired the entire 1,159-acre<sup>374</sup> block – around half the land reserved in the Whaingaroa block – for a total of £283.

The first £30 payment for land in Te Mata reserve was made on 11 January 1854 to Kiwi Hone Warena, Apera, Kereopa, and others. The area was unsurveyed, and the deed did not give an acreage. It appears that Ligar – who had negotiated the Whaingaroa purchase and marked out its reserves, including Te Mata – was responsible for this purchase.<sup>375</sup> We note that this payment was made just 12 days after the final payment for Whaingaroa.<sup>376</sup>

Two further payments were made in May 1854. McLean made the first payment of £35 to Wiremu Nera, Waka Te Ruke, and Hetaraka on 6 May. This was followed on 31 May by a payment of £72 to Hemi Matini, likely made by Commissioner Johnson.<sup>377</sup> Later in 1854, Rogan indicated these payments were for around 450 acres ‘within the Native reserve called the Mata’, though the evidence is unclear.<sup>378</sup> Just a month later he reported that he had surveyed one block of 450 acres within the reserve, but did not note any payments for it, and another of 180 acres. He said £107 had been paid for the latter block, with £25 more owing.<sup>379</sup> An additional £5 payment in respect of this land was made to Te Waka on 4 September 1857, following a request from him two years earlier.<sup>380</sup>

A further payment of £20 was made on 20 August 1857 to Paratene and Kamariera for a narrow 180-acre area along the southern edge of Te Mata. Finally, in June 1858, Rogan made ‘an arrangement’ with Te Waka to purchase the remainder of the block for £100. The deed, signed on 15 June 1858, was signed by Te Waka, Nikorima, and others described as ‘the chiefs and people of Ngatimahanga’. A sketch plan was attached to the deed, but no acreage was provided.<sup>381</sup>

Although Rogan characterised the June 1858 purchase as encompassing the remaining area of Te Mata, he also paid a further £21 to Heteraka in June 1859 for 42 acres of land at Te Mata. It is not clear if this area had been part of the reserve.<sup>382</sup>

---

372. Document A141, p 72.

373. Document A141, ‘AUC 135 Wahatane’; doc A70, p 369.

374. Document A70, p 325.

375. Document A70, pp 323, 326–327; doc A141, ‘AUC 134 Te Mata’.

376. Document A70, p 323.

377. Document A70, pp 323, 327; doc A141 ‘AUC 134 Te Mata’.

378. Rogan to McLean, 8 October 1855 (doc A70, p 327)

379. Document A70, p 327. This came to a total of £132, but it appears that £137 had been paid for Te Mata by the end of 1854.

380. Document A70, p 329.

381. Document A70, p 329; doc A141, ‘AUC 134 Te Mata’.

382. Document A70, p 330.

5.4.4.3 Purchases near Kāwhia and Aotea

Alongside its purchases in Whāingaroa during this period, the Crown also purchased two blocks – Harihari and Oioroa – in Kāwhia and Aotea. Unlike in Whāingaroa, both McLean and Rogan were involved in the Crown's initial negotiations in these areas during 1854. While the Crown ultimately purchased only two blocks in Kāwhia and Aotea, McLean made payments on several other areas in 1854. In May, for instance, he made a payment of £5 for 'Kawhia', followed in July by £64 for 'land at Kawhia'.<sup>383</sup> Due to growing opposition to land sales in the area, however, the purchases were never finalised.

In the immediate wake of the Crown's acquisition of the Mokau block on 1 May 1854, Māori across the western parts of the inquiry district held hui in Kāwhia to discuss land sales with the Crown. According to Ms Boulton, Rogan attended these hui. While opposition to land sales was the over-riding theme of these discussions, consenting opinions were heard. In his account of these hui, the trader Samuel Joseph recorded the views of a Kāwhia-based Māori that he identified as 'William'. William spoke against the absolute anti-selling stance of some rangatira and objected 'to the old people who cling to their Maori customs to the exclusion of European enlightenment'.<sup>384</sup> He pointed to the desire of some for the purchase money from sales, but emphasised his interest in promoting European settlement on his lands. 'I only want some European neighbours,' he explained, 'let the others have the money to make them content'.<sup>385</sup> In response, the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Taonui Hikaka suggested that William could make a small piece of land available to Pākehā, but warned the hui against large-scale land alienations as 'although a few Europeans might be advantageous, a great many might be dangerous'.<sup>386</sup>

Despite such warnings, William was not alone in his support for land sales. In October 1855, when Rogan was in the Kāwhia and Aotea regions seeking to finalise McLean's 1854 arrangements, he complained at the amount of work piling up before him. 'The work instead of diminishing, is gaining on me,' explained Rogan. Every 'piece of land I survey is increased by new land offered. Aotea and Kawhia will keep me occupied for 6 mos [months]'.<sup>387</sup>

While some Māori across Kāwhia and Aotea were enthusiastic for land sales, many continued to oppose land sales with the Crown. This opposition appears to have been muted during McLean's 1854 arrangements, which likely reflects the fact that his negotiations primarily targeted willing sellers.

When Rogan appeared in the district and began the far more visible task of surveying the land, however, the opposition of many Māori to land sales quickly became apparent. In December 1855, for example, the Reverend John Morgan of the Ōtāwhao mission station wrote to the Government, suggesting:

383. Document A70, p 299.

384. Joseph to McLean, 6 May 1854 (doc A70, p 295).

385. Joseph to McLean, 6 May 1854 (doc A70, p 296).

386. Joseph to McLean, 6 May 1854 (doc A70, p 296).

387. Rogan to McLean, 1 October 1855 (doc A70, p 343).

Considerable excitement exists at the present time amongst the Maori tribes of Kawhia Rangiaowhia, Mohoanui [Mahoenui] & Mokau, in consequence of a report current amongst the aborigines that it is the intention of HM Government to purchase the Kawhia district from the Waikato tribes, a purchase which the Ngatimaniapoto and other tribes have determined to resist. [Emphasis in original.]<sup>388</sup>

Morgan urged the Government to abandon land purchasing in the region, suggesting that failure to do so would likely provoke a ‘Maori war . . . in which many tribes would become involved’.<sup>389</sup>

Rogan nonetheless pursued the Crown’s purchasing agenda until such an approach became untenable. This occurred in early 1856. Rogan’s presence in the region created such disquiet that, in March of that year, the colonial secretary, Andrew Sinclair, was forced to intervene. In a letter to McLean, Sinclair told the land purchase commissioner that ‘great excitement seems to exist amongst the Natives at Kawhia, relative to the Government purchasing and surveying land in that district’ and McLean was instructed to ‘withdraw all surveys being carried on under your department from that district’.<sup>390</sup> As a result of this directive, the Crown’s purchasing efforts around the Kāwhia and Aotea districts were limited to the Harihari and Oioroa blocks.

5.4.4.3.1 THE HARIHARI PURCHASE, AUGUST 1857

The purchase of the 4,840-acre Harihari block, located on the coast between Marokopa and Kāwhia, commenced in 1854 and concluded three years later in August 1857. The Crown paid a total of £400 for the block.<sup>391</sup>

On 6 May 1854, in the immediate wake of the above-mentioned Kāwhia hui, the rangatira Waitere Pūmipi asked the trader Samuel Joseph to write to McLean on his behalf. In this correspondence, McLean was informed that Pūmipi was planning on travelling to Auckland ‘to get part of the payment for Hari Hari’. With reference to the Kāwhia hui, Joseph explained that Pūmipi ‘had a large meeting with Nuitone [Te Pakarū] etc. and that seeing he was determined [to sell] they said no more; that he wishes to have part payment at once and to receive it in Auckland’.<sup>392</sup> There is no detail relating to the location of the deed signing or the negotiations that preceded the arrangement.

Waitere Pūmipi, John Hobbs Tamaha, and eight others identified as ‘the chiefs and freemen of Ngatimaniapoto’ ultimately signed a deed of sale for Harihari on 4 July 1854. The deed, written in te reo Māori, declared that the Māori signatories ‘transfer[red] for ever a certain portion’ of land to Queen Victoria and her 388. Morgan to Sinclair, 5 December 1855 (doc A70, p 298).

389. Morgan to Sinclair, 5 December 1855 (doc A70, p 298).

390. Colonial secretary to McLean, 6 March 1856 (doc A70, p 300).

391. The block was estimated to be 4,000 acres at the time of purchase, and 4,400 acres when set apart for leasing in 1890. Using GIS, Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell calculated it to be 4,840 acres: doc A70, pp 309, 314; doc A21, p 41.

392. Joseph to McLean, 6 May 1854 (doc A70, p 307).

successors ('kia tino tukua rawatia tetahi wahi o to matou kainga ki a Wikitoria te Kuini o Ingarani ki nga Kingi Kuini ranei o muri iho i a ia ake tonu atu').<sup>393</sup> Donald McLean signed the document on behalf of the Crown and handed over an advance of £200 to the signatories, with the understanding that an additional £300 would be paid 'when the survey has been completed'. The deed simply identified the Harihari block with reference to physical boundaries.<sup>394</sup>

In early 1856, Rogan travelled to the area to finalise the transaction. However, when perambulating the boundaries of the block, Rogan discovered that the land's area was smaller than initially estimated. As the acreage was not specified on the deed, we can only assume that there was some oral estimation of the block's size. Writing to McLean on 23 January 1857, Rogan explained that 'the quantity of land which the Natives represented to have sold to the Government, on the execution of [the deed], was much in excess of the actual quantity, which is nearly 4,000 acres'. In turn, he told McLean that he and the sellers had reached a new agreement 'for the final alienation of their claims to this land', which saw the Crown's final instalment of the purchase price reduced from £300 to £200.<sup>395</sup>

On this basis, on 10 August 1857 Hōne Pūmipi and 27 others, including one boy, signed documentation finalising the sale of the Harihari block and received the remaining £200 of the purchase price.<sup>396</sup> Rogan ultimately paid slightly less than 2 shillings per acre for the block and neglected to set aside any reserves for the sellers, in contradiction to McLean's instructions and the Crown's purchasing standards.<sup>397</sup>

The Crown's approach to purchasing Harihari resulted in long-term confusion and disquiet amongst many who claimed interests in the block. As early as October 1855, Rogan informed McLean of letters, received from 'Harihari natives', in which they 'complain bitterly of Hone Pumipi's tikanga which seems to nail the entire sum for himself alone'.<sup>398</sup> There is no evidence of whether or how the Crown responded to these concerns, but they appear to have remained unresolved almost two decades later. In February 1874, Horo Hawea wrote to Native Minister Donald McLean requesting his share of the Harihari purchase price, 'as I did not get any of the money when it was sold'.<sup>399</sup> McLean was advised that Hawea's concerns were just, as he was an original owner of the land. Despite this, McLean considered that Hawea should approach Pūmipi and not the Government for his share of the purchase price. Openly dismissing the Crown's responsibility to consult with all right holders, McLean wrote that 'if Pumipi sold the land to a Pakeha surely it is

---

393. Document A141, 'AUC 581 Harihari'; Turton, Maori Deeds, p 621 (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 242–260).

394. Document A141, 'AUC 581 Harehare'.

395. Document A70, pp 308–309; doc A141, 'AUC 391 Harihari'.

396. Document A70, p 309; doc A141, 'AUC 391 Harihari'.

397. Document A70, p 309.

398. Rogan to McLean, 1 October 1855 (doc A70, p 308).

399. Horo Hawea to McLean, 11 February 1874 (doc A70, p 309).

not intended that the Government should make it good. I should say Haere ki a Pūmipi.<sup>400</sup>

Māori also made a number of complaints in the decades after the transaction about outstanding payments, suggesting that many sellers did not consent to or know about Rogan's reduction of the final payment from £300 to £200.<sup>401</sup> The first such complaint was received by the Crown in late 1883, when Rawenata Haki wrote to George Wilkinson, the land purchase officer, on behalf of himself and Pūmipi's daughter requesting 'the balance of the money due' on the Harihari block.<sup>402</sup> This correspondence was followed by a request from Hetaraka Warihi to the under-secretary of the Native Department, on 16 July 1885, also seeking the outstanding £100 owing on the Harihari purchase. Wahanui Huatare and Haupōkia Te Pakarū made similar requests to the Native Minister in May 1889 and June 1890 respectively. Wahanui also raised the issue with Wilkinson in person in April 1891.<sup>403</sup> In responding to these requests, Crown agents initially faced some confusion as to the arrangements reached by McLean and Rogan. Once this confusion was clarified, however, the correspondents were all told that the purchase price for the Harihari block had been paid in full.<sup>404</sup>

Ultimately, the Crown did not assume control of Harihari until 30 October 1890, when it set apart the block for leasing as a grazing run, under sections 198 to 219 of part seven of the Land Act 1885.<sup>405</sup> At this time, it seems that at least one Māori owner was still living on the land. In the months immediately prior to the Crown's leasing of the land, Haupōkia Te Pakarū informed the Native Minister that Nuitone Te Pakarū, who had opposed land sales at the time of the Harihari block transaction, 'was one of the old people who had a very strong claim to that block and it has ever since been in occupation by him and then by me.'<sup>406</sup>

Throughout the course of the inquiry, Ngāti Mahuta claimants also spoke to the alienation of their interests at Harihari without their consent. As John Moncur Te Uaanehu Forbes told us, the Ngāti Mahuta rangatira Kiwi gifted the Harihari lands to Pūmipi following the marriage of Pūmipi's sister to Kiwi's son.<sup>407</sup> This arrangement, claimant counsel submitted, was akin to a tuku whenua, whereby Pūmipi had been gifted rights to the land, while Ngāti Mahuta retained their interests in the same.<sup>408</sup> Despite this, in purchasing the land between 1854 and 1857, the Crown neither identified nor acquired the interests of Ngāti Mahuta in Harihari.

---

400. McLean, minute, 21 February 1874 (doc A70, p 310).

401. Document A70, pp 308–310.

402. Rawenata Haki to Wilkinson, 18 December 1883 (doc A70, p 310).

403. Document A70, pp 312–313.

404. Document A70, pp 309–313.

405. Document A70, p 314.

406. Haupōkia Te Pakarū to Native Minister, 19 June 1890 (doc A70, p 314).

407. Document 115 (Forbes), p 5.

408. Submission 3.4.143, pp 34–35; submission 3.4.338, pp 3–5.

5.4.4.3.2 THE OIOROA PURCHASE, 1855

The Crown's purchase of the 1,249-acre<sup>409</sup> Oioroa block in late-1855 was the result of an earlier arrangement conducted in Auckland on 6 June 1854 for a much larger area of land. On this date, McLean made a £100 down-payment for an area of land identified as the Aotea block, which stretched from Aotea in the south to Ruapuke in the north.<sup>410</sup> The deed was signed by Te Aho, Taukawe, Te Kewene, Hetaraka, and others identified as 'Chiefs and people of Aotea', and specified that 'final or complete payment' would 'be made when the land is gone over and surveyed'.<sup>411</sup>

As with the Harihari purchase, the Crown relied on the signatories of the Aotea deed to distribute the purchase money to other right holders. Commenting on these efforts before the Native Land Court's 1887 title investigation into the Manuaitu-Aotea block, Te Kewene's son, Te Manihera Pouwharetapu, explained:

Kewene kept £65 and gave £25 to Te Aho Moana, giving Wi Kumiti £10 between them [sic]. They returned [home] by way of the Coast, and presented portions of the money to Taraho and Paorapiipi, which however was declined. At Mataiwhitu they presented some money to Tikapa who also refused to accept it. The same thing took place at Whaingaroa with the Tainuis [sic].<sup>412</sup>

A number of right holders thus refused to accept their portion of the purchase price for the Aotea block.

According to Ms Boulton, it appears that when Rogan sought to finalise McLean's earlier transaction he was unable to complete the Crown's acquisition of the land.<sup>413</sup> As a result, those who agreed to sell the Aotea block offered Oioroa as a replacement block to satisfy the money already received. In November 1855, Rogan wrote to McLean explaining that he had surveyed land to satisfy the £100 advance and that 'Oioroa, situated on the north side of Aotea Harbour' contained about 1,300 acres, the whole of which, except about two hundred acres of fern land, consists of sand hills. An instalment of One hundred pounds (£100) had been paid to Kewene and Te Aho for this and other land. The Natives wished me to consider this land equivalent to the amount paid; but I declined concluding any arrangement with them until you were acquainted with the character of the land.<sup>414</sup>

McLean's response to Rogan has not been located, though he clearly agreed with the proposal as the purchase subsequently went ahead.

The Crown thus acquired Oioroa on the basis of an initial advance paid to a handful of rangatira for a much larger area of land. According to historian Brent 409. In 1883, the land was surveyed at 1,236 acres. Douglas, Innes, and Mitchell calculated it to be 1,249 acres using GIS: doc A153 (Parker), p 18, doc A21, p 41.

410. Document A70, pp 303–304.

411. Document A141, 'AUC 415 Oioroa'.

412. Document A70, pp 303–304; Te Manihera Pouwhare evidence, 25 April 1887 (doc A153, p 8).

413. Document A70, p 304.

414. Rogan to McLean, 15 November 1855 (doc A153, p 21).

Parker, many of the signatories to the Aotea deed were of Ngāti Naho descent.<sup>415</sup> Wiremu Taka of Ngāti Naho – whose father was party to the sale – explained that ‘[w]hen Te Oioroa was sold Ngati Naho were the principal consenting parties.’<sup>416</sup> Ngāti Whakamarurangi and Ngāti Tūirirangi claimants also identified their tūpuna as signatories to the original document for Aotea.<sup>417</sup>

As was heard throughout the course of this inquiry, however, these arrangements were established without the consent of all who claimed interests in the land. Despite their long association with Oiōroa, Ngāti Te Wehi were not party to the transaction and, in turn, their interests in the land were alienated without their consent. As Diane Bradshaw explained, ‘The area is significant as an ancient waka landing place, in particular the Aotea waka to which we, the tangata whenua – Ngāti Te Wehi – whakapapa, and which is said to be buried under the sand of Oiōroa.’ Bradshaw added that ‘The relationship of the tangata whenua to Oiōroa is also marked by the numerous burial sites of Ngāti Te Wehi’s forebears, many of which pre-date the arrival of the drifting sand.’<sup>418</sup>

It also appears that the Crown did not ensure that all those party to the arrangement understood that the transaction represented the full and final alienation of their rights. Heather Taruke Thomson of Ngāti Whakamarurangi acknowledged that her tūpuna, Te Aho Moana and Te Haho Kewene, had entered the transaction with the Crown. She explained, however, that Te Haho Kewene continued to live at Oiōroa and the adjoining Rauiri block following the sale of the land.<sup>419</sup> This does not conclusively prove that the transaction was conducted in a Māori customary framework. However, it does indicate that the Crown’s land-purchase agents failed to clearly explain to Māori sellers the nature and extent of the transaction. As a result, Māori continued to live on the land in accordance with their customs.

5.4.4.4 Other alienations

In addition to the blocks acquired by the Crown from specific right holders, agents also conducted two transactions during this period of Crown purchasing that purported to acquire the interests of specific iwi across lands purchased throughout the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts. To this end, in January 1856 a deed of sale for the claims of Ngāti Raukawa for lands at ‘Aotea, Whaingaroa, Karioi, Te Akau and on to Waikato’ was signed by Tamihana Te Rauparaha, Matene Te Whiwhi, and others, who received a payment of £60.<sup>420</sup> This payment was made for lands which, up to January 1856, had been acquired by the Crown and the deed specified that ‘the total amount to be paid to us will be decided upon when all those lands shall have been purchased by Mr McLean.’<sup>421</sup> Whether any additional payments were made to the iwi, however, is unclear.

---

415. Document A153, p 24.

416. Document A70, pp 304–305.

417. Document M14(a) (Thomson), p 11.

418. Document N21 (Bradshaw), pp 7–10.

419. Document M14(a), pp 11, 14.

420. Document A70, p 369.

421. ‘AUC 711 Aotea, Whaingaroa, Karioi, Te Akau’ (doc A70, pp 369–370).

On 19 April 1858, meanwhile, a similar arrangement was established between T Rauparaha, Te Waka, and others described as ‘the Chiefs and People of the Tribe Ngatitao.’<sup>422</sup> The deed was executed in Wellington and signed, on behalf of the Crown, by the district commissioner of the Land Purchase Department, WN Searancke.<sup>423</sup> The interests apparently acquired from the signatories were described as ‘the whole of our lands from & about Whangaroa [sic] to Aotea, Kawhia, and on to the Akau – that is, all those portions of land which have been sold to the Government of New Zealand by our relations up to the present day’. For these interests, the signatories received £240.<sup>424</sup>

5.4.5 The administration of reserves

Both Ligar and Rogan were instructed to make reserves from their purchases in the western harbours. In his 1849 instructions to Ligar, Colonial Secretary Sinclair emphasised the establishment of good native reserves as essential and instructed that they were to be ‘carefully agreed on and marked out before the purchase [was] completed.’<sup>425</sup> Similarly, McLean, in a letter to the colonial secretary in July 1854 and in his instructions to Rogan in 1855, stated that native reserves were to be ‘ample’ blocks of land ‘excepted by the Natives, for their own use and subsistence, within the tracts of land they have ceded to the Crown for colonisation.’<sup>426</sup> Further, they were to be extensive enough to provide for present and future Māori needs and were to be protected from alienation, as was the ‘district understanding’ at the time.<sup>427</sup>

As can be seen in table 5.3, 12 reserves were set aside from the western harbours purchases. Seven of these were considered native reserves and five were regarded as excluded from sale. No reserves were set aside from the Harihari and Oioroa purchases at Kāwhia and Aotea, or from the Wahatane purchase near Whāingaroa. The ‘blanket purchases’ of Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Toa-rangatira interests also made no mention of land being set aside for those iwi.<sup>428</sup>

5.4.5.1 Whaingaroa block reserves

In accordance with Sinclair’s instructions outlined above, Ligar set aside four reserves for Māori sellers from the Whaingaroa purchase: Te Mata, Takapaunui, Ohiapopoko, and Te Uku. These reserves totalled approximately 2,380 acres.<sup>429</sup>

In 1932, Timi Piripi and one other petitioned Parliament, alleging that the Native Land Court had never ascertained the boundaries of the Whaingaroa block, that the Te Uku reserve had been exchanged for less valuable land in Karioi, 422. ‘AUC 140 Aotea, Whangaroa & Kawhia’ (doc A70, p 370).

423. Document A70, p 370.

424. ‘AUC 140 Aotea, Whangaroa & Kawhia’ (doc A70, p 370).

425. Colonial secretary to surveyor-general, 13 December 1849 (doc A70, p 223).

426. McLean to colonial secretary, 29 July 1854 (doc A70, p 342); McLean to Rogan, 13 July 1855 (doc A70, p 341).

427. McLean to colonial secretary, 29 July 1854 (doc A70, p 342).

428. Document A70, pp 303–305, 307–313, 321–324, 368–369.

429. Document A70, pp 238–239.

Block	Reserves and land excluded from purchase
	Purchase year	Name	Status	Area reserved (acres)	Year title awarded	Area remaining (2013) (acres) <sup>1</sup>	Percentage remaining (2013)
Whaingaroa <sup>2</sup>	1851	Te Mata	Native reserve	1159	N/A	0.000	0.0
		Takapaunui	Native reserve	679	1869	157.900	23.0
		Ohiapopoko	Native reserve	422	1908	341.800	81.0
Karioi <sup>4</sup>	1855	Te Uku	Native reserve	99 <sup>3</sup>	1916	99.000*	100.0
		Whaanga	Native reserve	1430	1896	1115.400	78.0
		Rākanui	Excluded from sale	1044	1896	189.000	18.0
Ruapuke <sup>5</sup>	1856	Te Kōpua	Excluded from sale	143	1896	116.000	81.0
		Papahua	Excluded from sale	46	1919	0.600	1.4
		Toroanui	Native reserve	86	1874	0.000	0.0
Whararua <sup>6</sup>	1857	Horokawau	Native reserve	310	1918	0.000	0.0
		Te Rape	Native reserve	428	1905	0.258	0.1
		Mowhiti	Excluded from sale	46	1912	0.000	0.0

1. Figures based on the evidence of Kesaia Walker: doc A142.

2. Document A142, pp 23–34.

3. As described in section 5.4.5(1)(b), in 1896 the Crown substituted the Te Uku reserve with a 99-acre block known as Section 56 of the Karioi parish. The original Te Uku reserve was recorded in land purchase files as approximately 20 acres, but Māori maintained that the physical descriptions in the deed indicated a much larger area.

4. Document A142, pp 36–46; doc A70, p 335; doc A99, p 110.

5. Document A142, pp 47–53.

6. Document A142, pp 54–57.

* Substituted

Table 5.3: Land set aside from the western harbours purchases and that the Te Mata block, as well as never being surveyed, had been wholly sold to Europeans. The petitioners asked that the Native Land Court be empowered to 'enquire into all the circumstances surrounding these reserves', including to ascertain the boundaries and beneficial owners. The Native Department investigated the matter and reported to the Native Affairs Committee, but it seems that no further action was taken.<sup>430</sup>

5.4.5.1.1 TE MATA, TAKAPAUNUI, AND OHIAPOPOKO

This chapter has already considered the history of Te Mata (see section 5.4.4.2.5). At 1,159 acres, it was the largest reserve created in the inquiry district, representing half of the land reserved to Māori from the Whaingaroa block.<sup>431</sup> Between 1854 and 1859, the Crown made a series of purchases in the Te Mata block, ultimately acquiring the entire reserve for £283.<sup>432</sup> Walker believed a re-purchased reserve possibly existed in the Te Mata block. Remana Nutana claimed before the Native Land Court in 1892 that section 85 of Te Mata reserve, containing 42 acres, was given back by McLean to those who had sold the land to the Queen.<sup>433</sup> According to cover sheet notes, Rogan purchased the land for Hetaraka Nera, but he was unable to pay Rogan back. The Government then repurchased the land from Rogan for 15 shillings an acre.<sup>434</sup> The land was reserved from sale so that it could be a 'resting place for Māori travelling from Raglan to Aotea'.<sup>435</sup>

The 679-acre Takapaunui block contained several kāinga and urupā and it was said that Ngāti Māhanga paramount chief Wiremu Te Awaiaia had lived in the middle of the block with his family and no one had lived there before him.<sup>436</sup> The Native Land Court issued title to the block in April 1869 in favour of ten named owners, along with a list of approximately 120 others interested in the land. The court also declared the land inalienable by sale or lease for 21 years. The block was partitioned in 1908 into Takapaunui A (47 acres) and Takapaunui B (620 acres).<sup>437</sup> Takapaunui B was then partitioned into Takapaunui B1 (108 acres) and Takapaunui B2 (510 acres) in 1915.<sup>438</sup> Both Takapaunui A and B1 – constituting around 23 per cent of the original block – remain Māori land today. Takapaunui B2 was alienated by private purchase in 1956.<sup>439</sup>

The Native Land Court investigated title to the 422.8-acre Ohiapopoko block in 1908 and awarded it to 147 owners.<sup>440</sup> Around 81 per cent of the block remains in

430. Document A142, pp 24–25.

431. Document A70, pp 325–326; submission 3.4.249(c), pp 30–32.

432. Document A70, p 323; doc A142, p 27.

433. Document A142, p 27.

434. Document A142, p 27.

435. Document A142, p 27.

436. Document A142, p 27.

437. Document A142, p 29.

438. Document A60, p 1073.

439. Document A142, p 27.

440. Document A142, pp 30–31. One extra owner, and ten extra shares, were added to the block in 1911 by the Native Appellate Court.

Māori ownership today. The remaining 19 per cent of the block was alienated by two private purchases, one in 1932 and another in 1965.<sup>441</sup>

5.4.5.1.2 TE UKU

The Te Uku block, near where the Waitetuna River enters Whāingaroa Harbour, was reserved from the Whāingaroa purchase because of its significance to Māori as a traditional kāinga, a food-gathering site, and as a central part of a network of connected waterways.<sup>442</sup> In 1893, the Crown put up a 268-acre block of land for sale in the vicinity of the reserve prompting an immediate response from Remana Nutana, who claimed that the block of land included Te Uku.<sup>443</sup>

Surveyor-general S Percy Smith disputed Nutana's claim, understanding Te Uku to be approximately 20 acres in size, as it was recorded in government records. However, with reference to physical boundaries, Nutana understood the block to be much larger and requested that the sale be placed on hold pending a full inquiry. This request was seemingly accepted in 1894, when Smith appointed Gerhard Mueller and George Wilkinson to investigate the issue. In 1895, Mueller and Wilkinson concluded that Te Uku was intended to comprise a 'very much larger area than 25 acres.'<sup>444</sup> By this time, however, the Crown had already sold the land around the 20-acre reserve.

To compensate for this loss, the Minister of Lands provided section 56 of the Karioi parish (99 acres) to those who could prove ownership of Te Uku. Section 56 was gazetted as a permanent Māori reserve in 1896, and remains wholly Māori land today.<sup>445</sup> Claimants argued that section 56 was an inadequate replacement for Te Uku, which was set aside from the Whāingaroa block due to its economic and cultural significance. Claimants said the replacement land was far removed from Te Uku.<sup>446</sup>

The 20 acres that remained at Te Uku is yet to be returned to Māori ownership. The land was reserved by the Department of Lands and Survey in the 1890s. In 1903, the Crown gazetted the land as a permanent recreation reserve and today it is leased to a local farmer under the administration of the Te Uku and District Memorial Hall Committee.<sup>447</sup>

5.4.5.2 Karioi block reserves

Four areas – Te Kopua, Papahua, Whaanga, and Rakaunui – totalling approximately 2,660 acres were reserved or excluded from the sale of the Karioi block.

---

441. Document A142, p 30.

442. Document s54 (Green), pp 4–5; doc A142, p 31. The alienation of Te Uku is the subject of a specific claim for Wai 426, see submission 3.4.146.

443. Document A142, p 32.

444. Mueller and Wilkinson, report, 16 November 1895 (doc A142, p 32); doc A142, pp 31–32.

445. Document A142, pp 33–34.

446. Submission 3.4.146, pp 3–9; doc s54, pp 4–5.

447. Document A142, pp 31–34.

5.4.5.2.1 TE KOPUA AND PAPAHAUA

The Native Land Court investigated title to the 142-acre Te Kopua block in 1896 and awarded the block to 88 people. Today, 81 per cent of the block remains in Māori ownership.<sup>448</sup> Title to the 46-acre Papahua block was awarded in three partitions in 1919 to the children of Wetini Mahikai and a section of Ngāti Māhanga. Only 1.4 per cent of the block – an urupā where rangatira Te Awaitaia and members of his family are buried – remains as Māori land today.<sup>449</sup>

Te Kopua and Papahua were afforded no long-term protection from alienation and were particularly impacted by land takings under public works legislation. The Tainui Oral and Traditional Historical Report explained how the Crown constructed signal beacons upon those parts of the Te Kopua block that had been set aside.<sup>450</sup> As will be detailed in the public works chapter in a future part of our report, portions of both the Te Kopua and Papahua blocks were acquired in 1941 for defence purposes and the lands were not returned to tangata whenua following the Second World War. This led to a bitter and long-running dispute between Tainui Awhiro and the Crown, which, as counsel for the claimants submitted, served as a flashpoint of modern Māori activism, out of which the Waitangi Tribunal was established.<sup>451</sup>

In addition to land taken in 1941, portions of Te Kopua were alienated for a native school in 1904 and the construction of roads later in the century, while other parts of the reserve were Europeanised in the 1960s.<sup>452</sup> Future chapters of this report will consider matters relating to education, public works, and twentieth-century land administration.

Alongside the 1941 public works takings, other portions of the Papahua block were taken for roads, while Papahua 2 was gifted to local government in 1923.<sup>453</sup> As counsel for Ngāti Māhanga claimants explained, the gift was facilitated by the district Māori land board at a time when land could be alienated without the consent of a majority of owners (the Māori land board regime is discussed in detail in future chapters of this report). As a result, the land was alienated with the consent of just 44 per cent of owners and, while the land was ‘gifted’ to the council for use as a public reserve, a portion of the land is now used by the Raglan camping ground.<sup>454</sup>

5.4.5.2.2 WHAANGA AND RAKAUNUI

A portion of the Whaanga block and most of the Rakaunui block have also been alienated from Māori ownership. The original survey of Whaanga gave its size as

---

448. Document A142, pp 39–40.

449. Document A142, p 41.

450. Document A99, p 109.

451. Submission 3.4.210, p 2.

452. Document A142, pp 40–41.

453. Submission 3.4.249(c), pp 63–67.

454. Submission 3.4.249(c), pp 65–66.

600 acres. In 1879, Kereopa Hone Hone and 35 others petitioned Parliament that the survey was incorrect and excluded 1,000 acres. When the Native Land Court investigated title to the block in 1896, its size was given as 1,413 acres.<sup>455</sup> After awarding title to the block, the court then subdivided it into Whaanga 1 and 2. The court declared the subdivisions inalienable, but this did not prevent the alienation of 22 per cent of the block as a result of private purchasing between the 1920s and 1940s.<sup>456</sup>

The Native Land Court awarded title to the 1,044-acre Rakaunui block in 1896 to Wetini Mahikai and others in three subdivisions. As a result of private and Crown purchasing, 82 per cent of the block has been alienated, leaving less than 190 acres in Māori ownership today.<sup>457</sup>

5.4.5.3 Ruapuke block reserves

Two blocks – Toroanui and Horokawau – totalling approximately 396 acres were reserved from the Ruapuke sale. Both reserves were subsequently alienated in full. The owners of the 86-acre Toroanui block sought a Crown grant for the block in 1874. Although the grant has not been located, it appears to have been issued to Kewene Te Haho, Ratapu Te Haho, and Pouwharetapu. The entire block was alienated to a private purchaser in 1894.<sup>458</sup> Title to the 310-acre Horokawau block was awarded in 1918 to 12 owners. The entire block was alienated in result of a road taking in 1912 and a private purchase in 1920.<sup>459</sup>

5.4.5.3.1 WHARAUROA BLOCK RESERVES

Two areas – Mowhiti and Te Rape – totalling 474 acres were excluded from the sale of the Wharauoa block. In addition, the purchase included an area – Hui Pokohuka – transacted by McLean in 1954, the deed for which recorded a reserve called Kihorewaru.

5.4.5.3.2 MOWHITI AND TE RAPE

Title to the 46-acre Mowhiti block was awarded in 1912. In 1969, the block was Europeanised under the Maori Affairs Amendment Act 1967.<sup>460</sup> The Native Land Court issued title to the 428-acre Te Rape block in 1905 to 54 people. Between 1916 and 1918, the Crown purchased the majority of the block. Today, Māori retain just 1 rood 5.6 perches of the original Te Rape block. The remaining land – Te Rape 2A – was gazetted as a Māori burial ground in 1961.<sup>461</sup>

---

455. Document A99, p 110.

456. Document A142, pp 37–39.

457. Document A142, pp 45–46.

458. Document A142, pp 48–49. Douglas, Innes and Mitchell record that the GIS estimate of Toroanui is 102 acres, see doc A21, p 125.

459. Document A142, pp 47, 49–53.

460. Document A142, p 57.

461. Document A142, pp 56–57.

5.4.5.3.3 KIHOREWARU

The Hui Pokohukua block was purchased by McLean on 12 April 1854 for an initial payment of £50, with a further £50 paid on 4 August 1854.<sup>462</sup> The boundary of the block was described as commencing at Hui Pokohuka, along to Tipahau and the boundary of land purchased by Ligar at Matahahaea, then to Opiri, Kohukohu, and Tihiotonganui.<sup>463</sup> The receipt for the first payment stated that the full £300, a figure which was open to change, would be paid once the land was surveyed.<sup>464</sup> However, the purchase was never completed and it appears that the block later became part of the larger Wharauoa block purchased by the Government in 1857.<sup>465</sup>

A receipt for the £50 paid for the Hui Pokohuka block indicated that an area of land called Kihorewaru was to be set aside for Te Awaitaia as a place of residence. This does not appear to have happened because this land also became part of the Wharauoa purchase.<sup>466</sup>

5.4.6 Treaty analysis and findings

In the early 1850s, the Crown entered arrangements for two blocks of land on the shores of Whāingaroa Harbour. Horea, on the northern shores, was transacted by the Crown in an attempt to calm tensions between Ngāti Mahuta and Ngāti Tahinga, while the Whaingaroa block, located on the harbour's southern shores, was purchased from Ngāti Māhanga for the purposes of European settlement.

Between 1854 and 1858, the Crown purchased several blocks of land across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts. These lands included the Oioroa block, at the northern headland of Aotea; the Harihari block, on the coast between Marokopa and Kāwhia; the Karioi, Ruapuke, Wharauoa, and Wahatane blocks, which constituted the bulk of lands between the Whāingaroa and Aotea Harbours; the entire Te Mata native reserve, set aside from the 1851 Whaingaroa sale block; and the interests of the Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Toa-rangatira iwi across the above-mentioned lands.

In this section, the Crown's conduct in these transactions is assessed against the standards established in the Treaty for the purchase of Māori land, as confirmed in statements by officials of the time. As with the Mōkau–Awakino purchases, three questions are addressed:

- ▶ Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase?
- ▶ Did the Crown then establish the free and informed consent of the sellers?
- ▶ Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs?

---

462. Document A70, p 340.

463. Document A142, p 35.

464. Document A70, p 340.

465. Document A142, p 35.

466. Document A142, p 35.

5.4.6.1 Did the Crown fully investigate customary tenure?

The evidence demonstrates that the Crown failed to fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase in the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts. In the case of the Whāingaroa block, Ligar purchased the 8,000-acre block for £400 in March 1851. But shortly after the purchase of a portion of the land by a Pākehā settler, additional transactions were required within the confines of the original block in order to acquire the interests of customary right holders whom Ligar had failed to consult.

During the second phase of purchasing in the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts, McLean routinely targeted willing sellers. This enabled him to circumvent any potential opposition and resulted in a series of transactions that required subsequent negotiations and additional payments to finalise. The result, however, was that McLean failed to adequately consult with all rights-holders, often entering arrangements for the sale of land with individuals or small groups of people.

Much of the responsibility for ensuring that the lands were acquired with the consent of all rights-holders then fell upon Rogan. In many instances, he too failed in this regard. In the case of the Harihari and Oioroa blocks, for example, the Crown employed a tactic whereby it conducted negotiations with specific rangatira, with the understanding that these rangatira would distribute portions of the purchase price to other right holders. This approach, Ms Boulton explained, ‘put those not involved in the initial transactions in 1854 at a disadvantage’, and left ‘many to find out later that other individuals had sold interests in the land.’<sup>467</sup> Ngāti Te Wehi claimants, for example, explained how their interests in Oioroa were alienated without the consent of their tūpuna, and the Crown appears to have acquired the Harihari block without the consent of Ngāti Mahuta or Nuitone Te Pakarū, who claimed interests in the area and was a long-time opponent of land sales.

Similar issues were evident in other Crown purchases. In acquiring the Karioi block, for example, while the Crown clearly gained the consent of many right holders, a number of those who signed the deed of sale were children and captives, who had no authority to transact the land. Moreover, Hounuku, a rangatira who held interests in the affected lands, was not a signatory of the deed. In the case of Wharauoa, meanwhile, Kanga Kihirini Te Kanawa complained in the decades following the sale of the land that, at the time of the transactions, he was opposed to land sales. The Crown dismissed Te Kanawa’s concerns, despite his recital of his shared whakapapa with one of the signatories to the sale.

We find that the Crown, in acquiring lands across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts, failed to establish the consent of all right holders, in breach of the Treaty principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and the duty of active protection.

---

467. Document A70, p 377.

5.4.6.2 Did the Crown establish free and informed consent?

The Crown also made inadequate efforts to properly identify the land it was seeking to purchase at the time of the transactions. In particular, throughout 1854, McLean paid advances on lands that were generally identified with reference to physical boundaries. These arrangements were made with the understanding that final payment for the affected lands would be made following the completion of surveys. As Ms Boulton pointed out, this approach to land purchasing in the inquiry district broadly conformed with McLean's efforts elsewhere.<sup>468</sup>

In transacting the land at Horea, the surveyor-general, Charles Ligar, entered an arrangement with Te Wherowhero in May 1850, in which the latter received either £50 or £100 for his interests in the land. The extent to which Te Wherowhero and Ngāti Mahuta understood the transaction as a permanent alienation is unclear. The Crown's precise understanding of this arrangement is similarly unclear, as native title to the block was not extinguished as a result of the transaction. Accordingly, the Crown did not alienate the land as a result of the transaction. In turn, there is no evidence of a Treaty breach.

In purchasing the Whaingaroa block, Ligar appears to have failed to explain to Māori the nature and extent of the transaction, as evidenced by the re-occupation of a portion of the land by members of Ngāti Māhanga. Similarly, in the case of the Oioroa block, it appears that Crown agents failed to ensure that the nature of the transaction was clearly understood by all Māori sellers prior to the alienation of the land. Claimants pointed to the continued occupation of the land by one seller as evidence that the full and final nature of the transaction was not clearly understood by all those party to the arrangement. In our view, this assessment is substantiated by the available evidence.

The prices paid by the Crown for lands across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts ranged between one and two shillings per acre, which broadly conformed with Governor Gore Browne's 1858 declaration of a national average price for Māori land of one shilling and sixpence per acre.<sup>469</sup> As discussed by other Tribunals, it is difficult – if not impossible – to determine what would constitute a fair price for Māori land in the context of pre-Native Land Court purchasing. Land could not be sold to third parties and, as such, there was no functioning market that could provide for the emergence of a price that was freely agreed to by both purchasers and the vendors.<sup>470</sup> Nonetheless, we do know that, at least in the Whaingaroa example, where the Crown sold an area one-fifth the size of the original block for more than three times the amount Māori had received for the whole block, the Crown's purchase prices were clearly unfair.

What is also clear from the evidence available to us is that, in the context of this series of Crown purchases, the Crown's exclusive right to purchase Māori land operated less as a mechanism to protect Māori interests, and more as a tool

468. Document A70, p 362.

469. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 278–279.

470. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 1, p188; Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 278–279.

to promote the Crown's purchasing agenda. This assessment is evidenced by McLean's 1855 instructions to Rogan, in which he promoted urgency in Rogan's efforts to finalise the transactions, in recognition that, upon becoming aware of the Crown's re-sale price of their land, Māori would demand higher prices.

In those instances where Māori sellers sought an increase to the Crown's offer, such requests were routinely denied, as was the case in the Karioi and Ruapuke block transactions. Moreover, in the case of the Ruapuke block, McLean appears to have applied pressure on Māori sellers to induce them to accept a price they had previously rejected.

Overall, we find that the Crown did not pursue its negotiations with Māori across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts in the utmost good faith. We find that, in this way, the Crown failed to act honourably and in good faith, thereby breaching the Treaty principle of partnership.

5.4.6.3 Did the Crown ensure Māori retained sufficient land?

The Crown also failed to ensure Māori retained sufficient lands from its transactions in the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts. In seeking to legitimise the prices paid for Māori lands in the context of Crown pre-emption, Crown agents and officials often emphasised the increased value of those lands retained by Māori as an important benefit of selling land to the Crown.<sup>471</sup> The Crown was also aware of the need to protect those reserves from alienation, as was the understanding in the district at the time.

While Ligar set aside a significant area of land from the Whaingaroa purchase, he provided the sellers with only limited harbourside reserves. In the context of an economy that relied upon ocean-based trading, this was a significant oversight which meant that the lands reserved to Māori sellers were not sufficient for their present and future needs.

Moreover, Ligar failed to institute protective mechanisms to ensure Ngāti Māhanga retained those lands 'reserved as places of abode for the owners' and, as a result, the vast majority of the approximately 2,300 acres set aside from the Whaingaroa block were subsequently lost. In particular, within four years of the purchase the Crown began purchasing land in the Te Mata reserve. By 1858 it had acquired the entire 1,189-acre reserve. We agree with the Wairarapa ki Tararua Tribunal that the Crown's purchasing of reserves was 'simply opportunistic[,] . . . militated against the likelihood that Māori would ever be able to engage in the new economy, and was therefore by definition inappropriate behaviour for the Crown.'<sup>472</sup>

In the case of the Te Uku reserve, when Remana Nutana informed the Crown that land it proposed to sell in the vicinity of Te Uku actually included much of the reserve, the Crown agreed to look into the matter. However, while an inquiry was conducted into the issue, the land in question was not removed from the market and, by the time the report that validated Nutana's concerns was released, the land

471. Waitangi Tribunal, Muriwhenua Land Report, pp 278–279.

472. Waitangi Tribunal, The Wairarapa ki Tararua Report, p 262.

had already been sold. In compensating Māori for the portion of Te Uku that it had sold, meanwhile, the Crown awarded an inadequate replacement block. While Te Uku had been set aside from the Whaingaroa block due to its economic and cultural significance, the replacement land was far removed from Te Uku.

Similarly, when the Crown acquired lands across the Whāingaroa, Aotea, and Kāwhia districts between 1854 and 1857, it also failed to ensure that Māori retained sufficient lands to benefit from any potential increase in land values.

In acquiring the Harihari, Oioroa, and Wahatane blocks, as well as the interests of Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Raukawa, the Crown did not set aside any land for the sellers, in contradiction to McLean's instructions from July 1855, as well as the Crown's own purchasing standards. In the cases of the Karioi, Ruapuke, and Wharauroa blocks, while lands were set aside or reserved from the sale block, these areas were not protected from subsequent alienation and, across later decades, significant portions of the blocks were alienated.

In failing to set aside adequate reserves from its purchases, and for failing to ensure that Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs, we find that the Crown failed in its duty of active protection and thereby breached the Treaty principle of partnership.

5.5 THE ŌTĀWHAO AND RANGIAOWHIA TRANSACTIONS

In a series of purchases during the 1850s, the Crown acquired about 1,300 acres at Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia, before granting most of these lands to Church organisations. Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia are situated in the far north of the inquiry district, between the Pūniu and Mangapiko Rivers. In contemporary terms, the Ōtāwhao lands are situated in and around modern-day Te Awamutu, while Rangiaowhia is located west of Te Awamutu and north-east of Kihikihi.

In 1834, the Anglican Church Missionary Society (CMS) established its first Waikato station at the junction of the Waipā and Pūniu Rivers, and in 1839 the Anglicans expanded their presence into Ōtāwhao.<sup>473</sup> In 1841, the Reverend John Morgan took up residence at the Ōtāwhao station. Then in about 1844 the Roman Catholic Mission established a station at Rangiaowhia under the leadership of Father Jean Pezant.<sup>474</sup> The establishment of these stations occurred under the authority of local rangatira, who granted the newcomers rights to occupy parcels of land. In time, the arrangements – which occurred in the immediate pre- and post-Treaty periods – were formalised by the Crown. The transactions occurred in an era of Māori–Pākehā relations in which many iwi and hapū sought European settlement in their midst, in light of the economic boon the presence of Pākehā could offer.

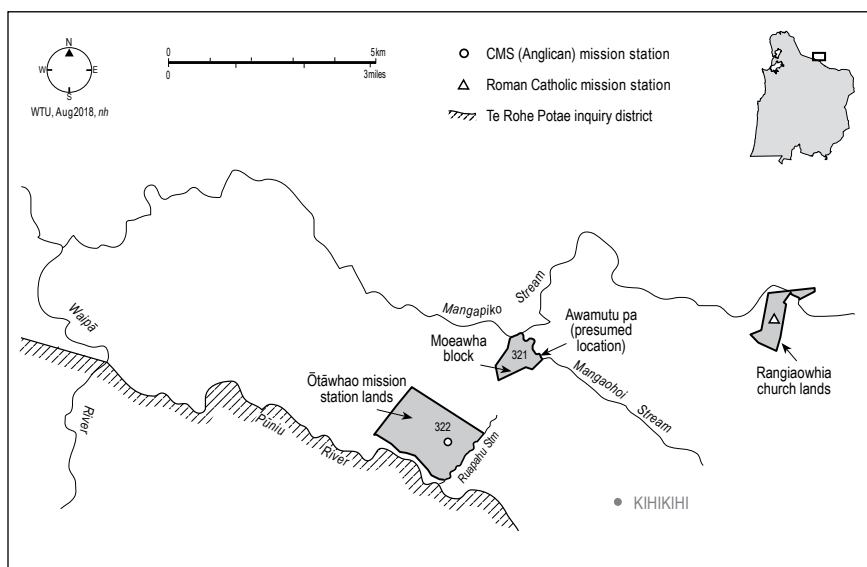

At Ōtāwhao, the following transactions took place:

---

473. Document A23, p 34.

474. Document A23, pp 34, 128.

Map 5.4: The Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions

- ▶ On 26 March 1850, the 173-acre Otawhao block – which included the site of the Ōtāwhao mission station – was acquired by the Crown.<sup>475</sup>
- ▶ The Crown acquired the 5-acre Otawhao school lands and the Awamutu pā lands on 10 July and 12 July 1850, respectively.<sup>476</sup>
- ▶ On 29 October 1853, Governor Grey granted the 870-acre Moeawha block in trust to the Bishop of New Zealand.<sup>477</sup>
- ▶ On 13 July 1855, Te Tomo was acquired by the Crown, followed by the Paiaka block on 16 July 1855.
- ▶ On 25 April 1856, 4 acres 2 roods and 31 perches at Te Taruna were allocated by Māori for Rakapa (Rachel) Edwards and her Pākehā settler husband.<sup>478</sup>

During the same period, lands occupied by the Catholic Mission at Rangiaowhia were also acquired by the Crown:

- ▶ On 2 January 1854, a deed of gift was executed by rangatira of Ngāti Apakura for the 298-acre Rangiaowhia Church Lands.
- ▶ Approximately five acres were alienated on 29 January 1857 at Karangapahau.<sup>479</sup>

475. Document K16(a) (Maniapoto appendixes), app G-1a, p 15.

476. Document A141, 'AUC 328 Otawhao' and 'AUC 395 Te Awamutu'.

477. Document K16(a), app G-4, p 19.

478. Document A141, 'AUC 330 Te Tomo', 'AUC 393 Paiaka' and 'AUC 331 Te Turuna'; doc A30 (Innes), pp 214–215.

479. Document A141, 'AUC 604 Rangiaowhia Catholic Church Lands'; doc K16(a), app H-2, p 28.

5.5.1 The parties' positions

The claimants had three main contentions. First, they said the Crown did not ascertain the actual intentions or understandings of Ngāti Paretekawa and others in their pre-Treaty land transactions with Church missionaries in the Te Awamutu–Waipā region. Secondly, when the Crown purchased lands there, it failed to ascertain who the right holders were. The Crown failed to engage with the mana whenua. Lastly, the claimants said, the Crown failed to ensure that the terms of the various trusts, established by the Crown and managed by the Church, were properly fulfilled.<sup>480</sup>

The Crown made no specific submissions in response to these claims.

5.5.2 Background to the transactions

As discussed in chapter 2 (section 2.5.1), the late 1700s witnessed growing conflict around Maungatautari, as Ngāti Raukawa sought to extend their reach over lands held by Waikato tribes.<sup>481</sup> This was the context in which Peehi Tūkōrehu and his brother Te Akanui decided to shift their primary allegiances from their Ngāti Raukawa to their Ngāti Maniapoto kin, naming their hapū Ngāti Paretekawa in honour of the daughter of Te Kanawa Whatupango.<sup>482</sup> Peehi emerged as a significant rangatira of Ngāti Maniapoto, consolidating his authority around Kakepuku and the country between the Pūniu River and Mangapiko Stream.<sup>483</sup> An alliance between Peehi and the Waikato rangatira Te Wherowhero underpinned the broader Waikato-Maniapoto alliance and, amidst the Ngāpuhi raids of the 1820s, Peehi invited his Waikato allies to settle in the Te Awamutu and Ōtāwhao districts to ensure their shared safety and security.<sup>484</sup>

Ngāti Apakura had long held interests in the Waipā region, but in the early nineteenth century Rangiaowhia became the heartland of the tribe.<sup>485</sup> In the wake of the Ngāpuhi raids a section of Ngāti Korokī moved onto the lands of Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Hinetu at Te Awamutu: 'Although Ngāti Korokī and Ngāti Hinetu were kin, a dispute occurred which ended in a fight where some Ngāti Korokī were killed at Kaipaka near Te Awamutu.' Ngāti Hauā became involved in support of their Ngāti Korokī kin, but escalating conflict was avoided and agreement was reached that Ngāti Apakura would settle on lands at Rangiaowhia that had been occupied by Ngāti Korokī and Ngāti Kauwhata.<sup>486</sup>

480. Submission 3.4.208, p34.

481. Document A83 (Te Hiko), pp109–111; Pei Te Hurinui Jones and Bruce Biggs, Nga Iwi o Tainui: The Traditional History of the Tainui People (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1995), pp294–301, 324.

482. Transcript 4.1.1, pp39–40 (Harold Maniapoto, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga marae, 1 March 2010), pp175–176 (Robert Te Huia, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga marae, 2 March 2010).

483. Document K16 (Maniapoto), pp5–8.

484. Document A110 (Barrett), pp227–228; doc A97 (Borell and Joseph), p112.

485. Document A97, pp101–102.

486. Document A97, p109; transcript 4.1.1, p41 (Harold Maniapoto, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga marae, 1 March 2010).

Although situated north of the Pūniu River, the Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia lands fall within the boundary extensions granted to our inquiry district that were granted to the Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura claimants.<sup>487</sup>

According to Harold Maniapoto, the prospect of a missionary presence at Ōtāwhao in the 1830s was met with enthusiasm by local rangatira. 'Peehi Tūkōrehu and Te Wherowhero quickly recognised the value that the church and Pākehā involvement in the region would bring,' Mr Maniapoto said, 'and by 1835 agreed to engage with them to exploit that opportunity for the betterment of their hapū and people of the area.'<sup>488</sup> No deeds or other evidence were provided to us to corroborate the traditional evidence of the claimants.

The Reverend Benjamin Ashwell established a CMS station at Ōtāwhao in 1839. In 1841, the Reverend John Morgan arrived with his wife Maria to further advance the work of the mission.<sup>489</sup> In Morgan's conception of missionary work, the dissemination of Christianity went hand in hand with the spread of civilisation.<sup>490</sup> Morgan aimed to '[e]stablish Maori in Christian belief', establish schools, foster the growing of wheat and the erection of flour mills, and promote the use of 'profits to buy livestock.'<sup>491</sup>

Morgan's conception of his missionary vocation seems to have complemented the aspirations of his Māori hosts. Soon after his arrival, Māori were cultivating significant areas of wheat and barley, along with fruit trees such as peaches, apples, pears, plums, quinces, and gooseberries.<sup>492</sup> Morgan also encouraged Māori to mill their own wheat rather than sending it beyond the district. In turn, he helped arrange for the first of the district's many mills to be erected in 1844, which was paid for by Māori in livestock.<sup>493</sup> Additional mills were soon constructed nearby.<sup>494</sup>

Morgan also acknowledged receiving strong support from Governor Grey, writing: 'This rapid advancement in civilisation is the fruits of Sir G. Grey's kind present and friendly feeling towards those tribes.'<sup>495</sup> Grey's approach, known as 'sugar and flour' and described by historian Andrew Francis as 'strategic gifting', led in return to Māori gifts of land for agricultural schools.<sup>496</sup> Mr Maniapoto said Ngāti Paretekawa traditions record that Peehi Tūkōrehu, Te Wherowhero, and other rangatira supported the establishment of a mission school in their district. By 1841, Mr Maniapoto said, Te Wherowhero and Te Paewaka had agreed to provide land at Moeawha for a school. His evidence was that school, in practice was primarily for the benefit of half-caste children.<sup>497</sup>

487. Submission 3.1.159; memorandum 2.5.24; submission 3.4.208; submission 3.4.228.

488. Document K16, p 11.

489. Document A26, pp 21–22.

490. Hazel Petrie, Chiefs of Industry: Māori Tribal Enterprise in Early Colonial New Zealand (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 2006), pp 88–89.

491. Document A26, p 22.

492. Document A26, p 24.

493. Document A26, p 24.

494. Document A26, p 24.

495. Morgan letters and journals, p 73 (doc A26, p 31).

496. Document A26, p 31.

497. Document K16, pp 11, 12–14, 15.

A Catholic mission seems to have been established by 1844 at Rangiaowhia. The first priest there was Father Pezant, and his place was taken in the 1850s by Father Garavel. As at Ōtāwhao, the mission grew wheat, oats, potatoes, and ‘an abundance of fruit including pears, apples, apricots, peaches and cherries, though not quite on the scale of the Anglican station headed by Morgan.’<sup>498</sup> Once again, we received no evidence as to the basis on which agreement to establish this mission was gained.

5.5.3 Crown purchases and subsequent grants to Church organisations

With the CMS and Roman Catholic missions well established in the Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia districts, the arrangements for land-use developed over the preceding decade were formalised by the Crown in the 1850s. Writing to the CMS headquarters in London in 1853, Morgan reflected on the mission’s acquisition of land at Ōtāwhao:

The block given up at Otawhao for my School when surveyed proved to be 870 acres, so that with the land granted by Sir G Grey (part of which was a gift from the Natives to the CMS 3 years ago) and a small piece since given we have now at Otawhao nearly 1100 acres of some of the finest land in New Zealand.<sup>499</sup>

The lands referred to by Morgan include the 173-acre Otawhao block and the 870-acre Moeawha block. In addition to these lands, the Crown acquired a number of smaller areas at Ōtāwhao between 1850 and 1856. In 1854 and 1857, meanwhile, the Crown acquired two blocks of land at Rangiaowhia that it then transferred to the Roman Catholic Mission. These were the 298-acre Rangiaowhia Church Lands and approximately five acres known as Kairangapaihau.

5.5.3.1 Purchases at Ōtāwhao

5.5.3.1.1 ŌTĀWHAO MISSION STATION LANDS, MARCH 1850

The deed for the Otawhao block transaction, which was the site of the CMS mission station, was dated 26 March 1850 and signed by Te Katea, Haunui, Riwai Te Mokorou, and Te Reweti Waikato.<sup>500</sup> The deed stated that the boundaries were shown to surveyor-general Ligar, who ‘Surveyed the land and made a Plan.’ The Crown granted the 173-acre block to the CMS on 15 October 1850:

as a site for a place of worship, or for schools, or in other like manner for purposes connected with the religious and moral instruction of our subjects inhabiting these islands, and of other persons being children or poor and destitute people inhabiting any islands in the Pacific Ocean.<sup>501</sup>

498. Document A26, p39.

499. Morgan to Church Missionary Society, 3 November 1853 (doc A26, p31).

500. Document K16(a), app G-1A, p15.

501. Submission 3.4.208, p39.

Although the missionaries had occupied Ōtāwhao in 1839, prior to the signing of the Treaty, they do not seem to have attempted to make a claim to the land claims commissioners established to consider pre-Treaty transactions (see chapter 4). The deed made clear, all the same, that the transaction was intended to formalise an existing agreement with the CMS. The alienation was

Partly in consideration of the Goods of the Church Missionary Society of London, given to us by the Revd John Morgan, these are things that he gave us: – Two Cows, Two Calves, Two Sheep, One Mare, Five Pounds . . . and partly as a free gift where by we gave that portion of the land on the Western side.<sup>502</sup>

5.5.3.1.2 MOEAWHA BLOCK

The Moeawha transaction concerns the land said to have been provided by Te Wherowhero and Te Paewaka in the early 1840s for the purpose of a school.<sup>503</sup> In closing submissions, the claimants stated that the land was transferred to the Crown on or around 10 July 1850 in return for £2 10s. This does not appear to be correct. Deed 405B, which the claimants refer to in connection with this purported transaction, relates to the Ōtāwhao school lands (discussed below) and not the Moeawha lands. There appears to be no available evidence that the Crown ever purchased the 870-acre Moeawha block.

On 29 October 1853, meanwhile, the land was transferred to the Bishop of New Zealand to support missionary schools.<sup>504</sup> The ‘Grant in Trust’ declared:

Where as Schools have been Established under the superintendence of the Bishop of New Zealand, for the Education of childrens of Our subject of both races, and of children of other poor and destitute persons . . . we of our especial grace for us our heirs and successors Do Hereby grant unto the said Bishop of New Zealand, all that allotment . . . for the use or towards the support and maintenance of the said School so long as religious Education industrial training and instruction in the English language, Shall be given to youth educated there-in and maintained there-at.<sup>505</sup>

The deed seems to have been signed by Governor Grey. Crown counsel raised the possibility that Grey might have simply witnessed the transaction. Judge Ambler responded: ‘I would think it is his signature as the donor.’ Counsel then raised what is really the crucial question: ‘Well what I’m not sure of is what, what capacity the Governor had to be the donor.’<sup>506</sup>

In accordance with the terms of the trust, a school was never established on the site, though the Moeawha block served as ‘an adjunct’ to the mission school at Ōtāwhao in the years before the Waikato war.<sup>507</sup>

502. Document K16(a), app G-1a, p 15.

503. Document K16, p 24.

504. Submission 3.4.208, p 39.

505. Document K16(a), app G-4, pp 19–20; submission 3.4.208, pp 39–40.

506. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 382–383 (Crown counsel questioned by Judge Ambler).

507. AJHR, 1905, G-5, p viii

5.5.3.1.3 ŌTĀWHAO SCHOOL LANDS AND AWAMUTU PĀ, JULY 1850

During July 1850, two further areas were acquired by the Crown. On 10 July 1850, Te Wikitia and Karauria Papahia, described on the deed of sale as ‘Chiefs of the Ngati Ruru Living at Otawahao at Waikato’, exchanged their interests in the five-acre Otawahao school lands for £2 10s.<sup>508</sup> We do not know what relationship, if any, this land had with the mission station. Two days later, on 12 July 1850, a deed of sale was signed by Hone Pihama, Horomona, Hemi Waikato, Maruhau, and Heremaia for the Awamutu pā lands.<sup>509</sup> The signatories received £3.<sup>510</sup> The lands affected by this alienation lay within the area already transacted as part of the Otawahao block sale and later came to be designated as ‘Pt Lot 321’ of the Mangapiko parish.<sup>511</sup> It is unclear why this specific arrangement needed to be made.

5.5.3.1.4 TE TOMO AND PAIAKA, JULY 1855

In July 1855, two further parcels of land were alienated by Māori. The acquisitions of the Te Tomo and Paiaka blocks were both conducted by Donald McLean, chief commissioner of the Native Land Purchase Department.<sup>512</sup> The Te Tomo deed of sale was signed on 13 July by Te Katea, Rewi, and Porokoru Titipa, who received £20 for a block of unknown size.<sup>513</sup> Three days later, on 16 July, McLean paid an additional £20 for the Paiaka block.<sup>514</sup> The signatories to this deed were Porokoru Titipa, Rewhi Ngaruru, and Hakopa Ngaruhi.<sup>515</sup> According to the claimants, the Paiaka block was 50 acres in extent.<sup>516</sup> It is unclear what, if any, relationship these blocks had with the CMS station.<sup>517</sup>

5.5.3.1.5 TE TARUNA, APRIL 1856

The final parcel of land alienated at Ōtāwhao in the 1850s was Te Taruna, comprising 4 acres, 2 roods, 31 perches.<sup>518</sup> The deed of gift for Te Taruna was executed on 25 April 1854 and signed by Warana, Ahukaramu, Pita, Matena, and Patuhoe.<sup>519</sup> The deed specified that the signatories surrendered the land to ‘Victoria the Queen of England and to the Kings and Queens, who may succeed her for Ever’ and explained that ‘The reason that we surrender this place is that we Desire that the Government of New Zealand shall settle that place on Rachel Edwards and her Children.’<sup>520</sup> In accordance with this directive, the land was later awarded to Rakapa (Rachel) Edwards – the Māori wife of a Pākehā settler – in June 1864,

---

508. Document A141, ‘AUC 328 Otawahao’; doc K16(a), app G-2, p 17.

509. Document A141, ‘AUC 395 Te Awamutu’; doc K16(a), app G-3, p 18.

510. Document A141, ‘AUC 395 Te Awamutu’; doc K16(a), app G-3, p 18.

511. Document K16(a), app B, p 4, app G-3, p 18.

512. Document K16(a), app G-5, app G-6, pp 21–22.

513. Document K16, p 23; doc K16(a), app G-5, p 21; doc 141, ‘AUC 330 Te Tomo’.

514. Document K16(a), app G-6, p 22; doc A141, ‘AUC 393 Paiaka’.

515. Document K16(a), app G-6, p 22; doc A141, ‘AUC 393 Paiaka’.

516. Document K16, p 24.

517. Document K16, p 24.

518. Document A141, ‘AUC 331 Te Turuna’.

519. Document A141, ‘AUC 331 Te Turuna’; doc K16(a), app G-7b, p 24.

520. Document K16(a), app G-7b, p 24.

under the Crown Grants Act 1862.<sup>521</sup> No additional detail concerning the motivations behind this transaction is available.

5.5.3.2 Purchases at Rangiaowhia

The Rangiaowhia Church Lands and Karangapaihau were acquired by the Crown and then awarded to the Roman Catholic Church. As with the Ōtāwhao transactions, they appear to have been intended to provide official sanction for existing arrangements between the church and Māori right holders.

5.5.3.2.1 RANGIAOWHIA CHURCH LANDS, JANUARY 1854

The deed of gift for the Rangiaowhia church lands was signed on 2 January 1854 by seven Ngāti Apakura rangatira: Hoani Papita Kahawai, Hori Te Waru, Turimanu, Te Wana Tarakaka, Penetita Te Wharaunga, Te Hemara Piritahi, and Werahiko Te Rongotea.<sup>522</sup> With regard to the gift, the deed specified:

We the Chiefs of Rangiaowhia in the Northern Island of New Zealand have agreed on this day . . . and consented freely to give up without consideration to the Queen of England a portion of land, to be by her transferred to the Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church at Auckland for the purposes we desire most vizt. – for a School for education for our children and for the objects of our Roman Catholic Church.<sup>523</sup>

The deed defined the boundaries of the land and stated that the signatories ‘surrender for ever’ the 298-acre block.<sup>524</sup> Apakura historians Moepātu Borell and Robert Joseph noted that ‘it appears that only 197 acres was transferred to the Mission’ when the deed eventually went through the courts in 1874.<sup>525</sup>

5.5.3.2.2 KARANGAPAIHAU, JANUARY 1857

The second area gifted by Ngāti Apakura to the mission was ‘the land at Rangiaowhia, named “Karanga-Pai-Hau”’. The deed was signed by Hoani Papita on 29 January 1857.<sup>526</sup> According to counsel for the claimants it comprised approximately 5 acres.<sup>527</sup> Hoani Papita conveyed the land to:

her Majesty Queen Victoria . . . upon Trust, To Grant the said land unto the Bishop of the Catholic Church and to the Bishops who may succeed him, to be held as the site of a Church for Christians, professing the forms of worship of the Catholic Church.<sup>528</sup>

521. Document A30, pp 214–215; doc K16, pp 26–27.

522. Document A141, ‘AUC 604 Rangiaowhia Catholic Church Land’; doc K16(a), app H-1, pp 26–27; submission 3.4.228, pp 74–75.

523. Document A141, ‘AUC 604 Rangiaowhia Catholic Church Land’; doc K16(a), app H-1, pp 26–27.

524. Document A141, ‘AUC 604 Rangiaowhia Catholic Church Land’.

525. Document A97, p 152.

526. Document K16(a), app H-2, p 28.

527. Document K16(a), app H-2, p 28; submission 3.4.228, pp 74–75.

528. Document K16(a), app H-2, p 28.

According to Ms Borell and Dr Joseph, Karangapaihau was ‘at the highest part of the Rangiaowhia ridge at the north-western end of the village’. The resident hapū built the first chapel and presbytery there in 1844, and also their timber replacements in 1851.<sup>529</sup>

We include these deeds at this point in the report for completeness and note that they were signed by prominent Ngāti Apakura rangatira and that there is no evidence of protest.

5.5.4 Subsequent developments

The alienation of Te Taruna brought the period of Crown purchasing at Ōtāwhao to a close. Mr Maniapoto claimed that ‘the Crown failed to investigate customary interests and title to the lands’ before entering into the transactions. He asserted:

none of the persons who sold the lands held mana whenua or customary interests or ownership rights over the lands that were sold. Waikato had permanent occupation in the district through the action of Tūkōrehu in placing them there, they had no real claim beyond that.<sup>530</sup>

We are mindful that we did not hear from any hapū of Waikato with regard to these transactions. Thus we cannot offer any reflections on these alienations as understood from their perspective. There is evidence available, however, that rights at Ōtāwhao were a matter of dispute during the 1850s and into the 1860s. John Gorst took up residence in Te Awamutu in 1862 as resident magistrate for Waikato. As the main Crown official in the upper Waipā at a time of deepening crisis in the relationship between the Crown and Māori, his actions are addressed in detail in chapter 6. Here, we note that he later described Te Awamutu as ‘a debated territory, claimed both by Waikato and Ngatimaniapoto.’<sup>531</sup> Gorst made specific comment on that relationship in the context of rights to determine the use and allocation of land:

Pehitukorehu [Peehi Tūkōrehu], an ancestor of the Ngatimaniapotos, conquered the Ngatiraukawa tribe in battle and drove them from their stronghold, Otawhao, and their lands in that neighbourhood, to beyond Maunga-tautari: so little did he value the land – many square miles in extent – of which he thus became the master, that he gave it away to his friends and kinsmen, the Waikatos of the Ngatimahuta tribe . . . They occupied the country, felled the forest, and cultivated without dispute for years. Some dozen years ago the Waikatos sold a few acres of their land to settlers. The jealousy of the Ngatimaniapoto was aroused; they asserted a claim to the land, re-occupied a part of it, and the Waikatos were obliged to promise that no more should be sold without their consent. Ever since that time a feud has been going on which has

---

529. Document A97, pp 150–151.

530. Document K16, pp 19–27.

531. John Gorst, The Maori King (Hamilton: Paul’s Book Arcade, 1959), p 221.

several times nearly broken out into open war, and the Ngatimaniapoto dispute the validity of the sale to the present day.<sup>532</sup>

James Fulloon also discussed the question of rights to land at Te Awamutu, in a report to the Native Minister at the end of March 1863:

But the real one is a question of propriety to the land, to Te Awamutu. By what I can make out, the district was taken from the Ngatiraukawa; the conquest was commenced by the Ngatimaniapoto, under Tukorehu, who gave it over to Paewaku [Te Paewaka] (Potatau's uncle) who completed the conquest, when Te Awamutu was sold, the Ngatimaniapoto did not share in the proceeds, they say now, that Potatau having died, so has his gift to the Church Missionary Society died also; therefore that part of the estate that was given by Potatau should revert to them . . . This is the real ngakau (heart) of the question . . .<sup>533</sup>

These passages, in our view, complement the interpretation of the transactions offered by the Ngāti Paretekawa claimants.

5.5.5 Treaty analysis and findings

The missionary John Morgan acknowledged that with the Ōtāwhao transactions the CMS gained about 1,100 acres of 'some of the finest land in New Zealand'. It is clear that the Crown, in the person of the Governor, played a central role in the transactions. The discussion in chapter 2 showed that possession of the region was keenly contested prior to the arrival of Europeans. The Ngāti Paretekawa claimants have presented traditional evidence that their tupuna Tūkōrehu asserted rights there until his death in the mid-1830s. This is corroborated by the observations of James Fulloon and Resident Magistrate John Gorst, who were both Crown officials.

In these circumstances, we would have expected to see evidence of a thorough investigation to ensure that the transactions took place with the consent of all right-holders. There is no evidence that this happened. It is not necessary to have heard from all those who may claim interests in the Ōtāwhao lands to conclude that the Crown's actions amounted to a failure to fulfil its Treaty duty of active protection of Māori interests in these lands. In doing so the Crown breached the plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty.

In the two most significant transactions, for Otawhao and Moeawha, the Crown appears to have acted as an intermediary, in order to gift the land to the CMS. On one interpretation, it did so simply in order to comply to ensure that existing arrangements complied with the law, because the Crown had asserted a pre-emptive right to purchase Māori land. Another way of understanding these transactions, it seems to us, is that the Crown became a stakeholder in the relationship that the deeds served to confirm. This is clear from the Otawhao deed, which also specifies the purpose for which the land is to be gifted to the church. The latter interpretation is wholly in keeping with the Treaty relationship, whereby Crown pre-emption entailed an acknowledgement of concomitant responsibilities to Māori. The circumstances in which the Crown obtained the Moeawha lands, however, are completely unknown to us. The possibility that a deed containing details of the transaction exists cannot be ruled out, but the absence of such evidence puts the subsequent action of the Governor – gifting the land to the church – in an extremely questionable light.

532. Gorst, The Maori King, p 32.

533. Fulloon to Native Minister, 30 March 1863, AJHR, 1863, E1, p 13 (doc A23, p 458).

Whatever the circumstances in which the Crown acquired these lands, there can be no doubt that the responsibilities also acquired by the Crown extended to ensuring that the terms under which the lands were gifted to church organisations were upheld. This obligation also applied to the Rangiaowhia church lands. Whether Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura were able to enjoy the intended benefits of these gifts is a question that will be addressed when we discuss educational issues in the inquiry district.

5.6 THE WAIPA–WAITETUNA TRANSACTION

Land between the Waipā River in the upper Waikato basin and the Waitetuna River, which flows into Whāingaroa Harbour at its south-eastern end, was first offered to the Crown in 1858. By the time the deed for the sale of the 53,000-acre Waipa–Waitetuna block was signed in September 1864 the surrounding circumstances were dramatically different from the other transactions discussed in this chapter. By that time, a huge army of Crown soldiers had invaded and occupied the upper Waikato and Waipā river basins as far south as the Pūniu River. Iwi and hapū aligned to the Kīngitanga movement had been forced from their lands. The settler parliament had legislated to punish those it considered to have ‘rebelled’ against the Queen’s authority by confiscating their land for the purposes of creating military settlements. These events are discussed in more detail, as they affected the people of the inquiry district, in chapter 6, but they provide the essential context for understanding the distinctive characteristics of the Waipa–Waitetuna transaction.

Of the slightly more than 53,000 acres that made up the Waipa–Waitetuna block, just a sliver (about 2,300 acres, or around 4 per cent) lies within the Te Rohe Pōtae inquiry district proper. A further 18,400 acres, more or less, is contained within Pirongia parish, one of the four parishes that make up the extension into the Waikato raupatu district that the Tribunal granted for the purpose of hearing the non-raupatu claims of some groups.<sup>534</sup>

The main evidence in this inquiry on the Waipa–Waitetuna block either came from, or relates to, Ngāti Māhanga. The block falls within their rohe boundary. They did not raise the Waipa–Waitetuna transaction specifically in their submissions, but did adopt the generic closing submissions on pre-1865 Crown 534. Memorandum 2.5.21, pp 16–17; doc A30(h)(i), p 5. Figures calculated by the Tribunal’s mapping officer.

---

Map 5.5: The Waipa-Waitetuna transaction purchasing, which make specific reference to Ngāti Māhanga in the section on Waipa-Waitetuna.<sup>535</sup>

Ngāti Hikairo have brought specific non-raupatu claims within the Pirongia parish.<sup>536</sup> However, Ngāti Hikairo also pointed more generally to considerable areas within Pirongia parish that they said were part of their customary rohe.<sup>537</sup> Given the considerable overlap between the parish and the Waipa-Waitetuna block, the Crown's acquisition of Waipa-Waitetuna appears to be of relevance. Ngāti Hikairo adopted 'the generic submissions of claimant counsel in full', which we take to include submissions on pre-1865 Crown purchasing.<sup>538</sup>

535. Submission 3.4.249(c), pp 5, 25; submission 3.4.105, pp 21-23.

536. Submission 3.4.33, p 9; doc N40 (Apirana), p; doc N40(a) (Apirana appendixes), pp 7-64.

537. Submission 3.4.226, pp 23-24.

538. Submission 3.4.226, p 9.

5.6.1 The parties' positions

The claimants acknowledged that Crown officials were aware of opposition from within Ngāti Māhanga and declined to purchase the land when it was first offered. They submitted, however, that this restraint was abandoned as the land acquired a greater strategic value immediately preceding and throughout the Crown's invasion of Waikato.<sup>539</sup> They said the Crown put pressure on willing sellers to persuade the objectors to sell, and they argued that it purchased the land without first establishing the consent of all right holders.<sup>540</sup> They said that this caused divisions and tensions within the tribe.<sup>541</sup> It is by no means clear, they said, that the interests of non-sellers were properly protected, as was required under the Treaty.<sup>542</sup>

The Crown, for its part, said the Waipa–Waitetuna transaction had 'only limited applicability' to considering the course of the Crown's pre-1865 purchasing in Te Rohe Pōtae. In support of this view, it cited the fact that the block lies largely outside the inquiry district. It also pointed to the transaction being negotiated later than all the others discussed. The situation with regard to reserves was 'difficult to assess', in the Crown's view, because they had not been thoroughly investigated in the evidence.<sup>543</sup> Counsel pointed out that the transaction was initiated by Māori and that the Crown, aware of opposition to the sale, was cautious about proceeding with negotiations, 'in line with its Treaty duties.' That said, counsel also acknowledged that the evidence suggests the Crown's purchasing methods in the pre-1865 transactions did shift over time. The Crown highlighted that Māori objectives in entering into such transactions were 'complex, varied, and sometimes competing.' Pointing to the Waipa–Waitetuna transaction in particular, it said that the offer of land to the Crown 'reflected the complex and dynamic relationships between groups considered by the Crown to be "rebels" and those considered to be "loyal"'.<sup>544</sup>

5.6.2 Background to the transaction

The lengthy Waipa–Waitetuna negotiations and eventual sale took place against a background of increasing concern among many rangatira about the risks the influx of settlers into New Zealand posed to their continued authority over their lands and people. They perceived that they risked being sidelined from decision-making, and they were concerned about the pressure on them to sell land. During the 1850s, the idea of a Māori King, under whose mana iwi and hapū could unite to protect their own mana and lands, gathered momentum as a response to these

---

539. Submission 3.4.105, p 21.

540. Submission 3.4.105, pp 21–22.

541. Submission 3.4.105, pp 14–15, 22.

542. Submission 3.4.105, p 22.

543. Submission 3.4.289, pp 1, 2.

544. Submission 3.4.289, pp 4–5, 16, 17.

pressures. In 1857 and 1858, at a series of large hui Pōtatau Te Wherowhero was chosen and installed as the first King (chapter 6, section 6.3).<sup>545</sup>

One whose mana was said to rival Te Wherowhero was Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia of Ngāti Māhanga. They had fought together and been rivals during the conflicts of the 1820s and 1830s (chapter 2). At hui to discuss the Kingitanga, however, Te Awaitaia made it clear that his allegiance was to a partnership with the Queen. He was an early convert to Christianity and he signed the Treaty of Waitangi at Kāwhia (chapter 3).<sup>546</sup> Giving evidence at the Kōrero Tuku Iho hearing in Raglan in 2010, Ngāti Māhanga claimants characterised him as keen to engage with Pākehā so that his people could benefit from the developing European economy.<sup>547</sup> By the late 1850s, he had already been involved in a number of other land transactions with the Crown (section 5.4).

The sale of Waipa–Waitetuna land to the Crown was first proposed by another rangatira of Ngāti Māhanga, Hetaraka Nera (also written Nero). On 2 November 1858, Hetaraka wrote to McLean offering land ‘situate at Waipa and . . . called Pitawa.’<sup>548</sup> In May the following year, another letter reiterated the offer. This time it was signed by Te Awataia and several others and mentioned other locations as well as Pitawa.<sup>549</sup> Others within Ngāti Māhanga opposed the offer, and officials chose not to pursue the purchase. They did not return to the negotiating table until late in 1862.<sup>550</sup>

The Crown’s initial rejection of this offer of land reflected a number of concerns. The Waipa–Waitetuna block was in close proximity to Kingitanga strongholds and the Crown recognised that the purchase would likely escalate tensions.<sup>551</sup> In addition, the Crown considered the price asked by Nera to be too high. At £1,500, it amounted to something between four and five shillings an acre. This was considerably more than had previously been paid for land outside of Auckland, and TH Smith, the assistant native secretary, warned against a display of eagerness. This, he wrote, would only serve to increase land prices overall.<sup>552</sup>

Officials were also aware of, and concerned by, opposition to the proposed transaction. In a memorandum dated 13 June 1859, Smith noted that the land in question was ‘owned by the Ngati Mahanga, of which W Nero is the acknowledged chief’, but added that ‘the whole tribe . . . is not agreed about the cession of this

---

545. Alan Ward, A Show of Justice (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1973), pp 96–99; Evelyn Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, Rangatira (Wellington: Huia, 2002), pp 134–135, 136–139, 141, 151–153, 156–157, 158; Gorst, The Maori King, pp 40, 55.

546. Document A22, pp 628–629.

547. Transcript 4.1.3, pp 55–56 (Kaye Turner, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Poihākēna marae, 12 April 2010); doc A70, p 389.

548. Document A70(a), vol 3, p 1082; doc A70, p 389.

549. Document A70, pp 388–389.

550. Document A70, p 392.

551. Document A70, p 387.

552. Document A70, pp 389, 393.

land to the Government, several individuals have protested against its alienation, among them the actual residents.<sup>553</sup> In light of this situation, the Crown provisionally accepted Nera's offer of the land, but told him that 'it would be desirable to postpone further action until the whole of the bona fide proprietors should agree about the surrender of their claims.'<sup>554</sup>

5.6.3 Negotiation and purchase, 1862–64

In the assessment of Boulton, between 1859 and the beginning of 1863 what she described as 'critical developments' in the negotiations appear to have occurred. Ms Boulton stated: 'Unfortunately, the sources located do not indicate how these came about. But they appear to have moved the situation from a stalemate to a definite acceptance of Nera's offer and a survey in preparation for a final transaction.'<sup>555</sup>

In our view, it is almost certain that the 'developments' included the land's increased strategic value as the Crown prepared for war.<sup>556</sup> This situation is discussed in detail in chapter 6; here we note that the northern edge of what would become the Waipa–Waitetuna block lay very close to the proposed route of a road between Raglan township at Whāingaroa and Whatawhata on the Waipā River. John Gorst, civil commissioner for upper Waikato, later wrote:

Wiremu Nera and his tribe had been persuaded to consent to a road being made from Raglan, through the forest ranges, to Whatawhata on the Waipa: the Government eagerly offered to supply money and employ Nera's natives at high wages in its construction. When the project became known to the Waikatos, they were greatly concerned: the peril was extreme: the intended road, if made, would place Ngaruawahia at the mercy of troops landed at Raglan.<sup>557</sup>

The evidence shows that, in addition to seeking £1,500 for the Waipa–Waitetuna land, Ngāti Māhanga separately asked for £300 for the strip of land on which the road would be built.<sup>558</sup>

Such was the opposition from Kīngitanga leaders that the Crown was forced to abandon its plan. The road was only constructed to the limits of Crown land at Whāingaroa.<sup>559</sup>

It is clear that by late 1862 the Crown was more willing to overlook opposition from within Ngāti Māhanga. Native Minister Francis Dillon Bell wrote to Governor Grey in December: 'I believe there is no doubt that Nero and his followers are the principal owners; and there can hardly be a good reason why the Crown should not acquire their rights'. With reference to opponents of the sale, Bell acknowledged that the Crown could not 'immediately get a perfect title to 553. Document A70(a), vol 3, p 1110; doc A70, p 392.

554. Document A70(a), vol 3, p 1112; doc A70, p 392.

555. Document A70, p 398.

556. Document A70, p 433; document A23, pp 420–423, 508.

557. Gorst, The Maori King, p 186 (doc A23, p 421).

558. Document A70, p 391; document A70(a), vol 3, p 1101.

559. Document A70, p 397.

the whole', but suggested that, by accepting Nera's offer, the government would become 'principal owner of the territory'. The 'claims of opposing proprietors' could then 'be gradually bought up, and the survey of the boundaries undertaken whenever the Govt. should judge it safe to do so'. His eagerness to pursue the deal was evident. Bell emphasised the 'great importance of such an acquisition in a political point of view'.<sup>560</sup> He advised Governor Grey:

Looking to the importance of the matters involved in this offer, His Excellency's advisers, after giving it their careful consideration, are of opinion that it would be better that negotiations should be carried on at headquarters, and after personal communication between the Governor and Nero. They recommend that Nero be invited to come in to Auckland with his friends for that purpose, and that he be informed, that if they can satisfy the Governor that they have the principal right of ownership over the land offered, such right will be purchased on behalf of the Crown.<sup>561</sup>

Bell also indicated that, while the offer on the table was 'substantially the same as was offered by Nero in 1858 & 1859', the area (which he estimated at 50,000 acres) now included 'the country that would be crossed by the road from Raglan into the heart of Waikato'.<sup>562</sup>

Grey approved Bell's proposal. With Bell, and possibly other officials, the governor met with Te Awaiaia in Auckland sometime in late January.<sup>563</sup> That was followed by a further meeting in Raglan on 21 February 1863, this time between John Rogan and a wider group of Ngāti Māhanga, to endeavour to bring matters to completion. At the meeting, Rogan, Te Awaiaia, Hakopa, and about two dozen other Ngāti Māhanga signed an agreement in principle, specifying the boundaries of the block and certain pieces of land that were to be reserved. Opponents to the sale also attended the meeting, and as a result Rogan removed a further portion of land from the block.<sup>564</sup>

Afterwards, Rogan acknowledged that many non-sellers had stayed away from the meeting. Reporting to Bell, he wrote that 'the greater part of the tribe who did not attend the meeting and who have equal claims with Nero, deny his right to dispose of this block without their concurrence'.<sup>565</sup> There is no evidence that the purchase area was reduced to any significant degree to account for the interests of 'the greater part of the tribe'. Nor was Rogan able to confirm the boundaries of the area to be purchased. Although Nera himself had listed the boundary markers in writing and a sketch map was then drawn up at some point, Rogan admitted that the meeting had 'terminated rather unsatisfactorily as Nero's own people could not agree to the boundaries represented in the sketch'. He complained: 'It is impossible

---

560. Bell to governor, 3 December 1862 (doc A70(a), vol 3, pp 1169–1170); doc A70, pp 401–402.

561. Bell to governor, 3 December 1862 (doc A70(a), vol 3, pp 1170–1171); doc A70, p 402.

562. Bell to governor, 3 December 1862 (doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1168).

563. Document A70, pp 402–403.

564. Document A70, p 404.

565. Rogan to Native Minister, 23 February 1863 (doc A70, pp 404–405; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1192).

for me to ascertain the extent and position of Nero's claims on this offer, as it is not considered advisable even by themselves that I should proceed to the ground.<sup>566</sup>

Despite admitting that he had neither established the clear consent of all customary right holders, nor managed to define Nera's claim on the ground, Rogan advised Bell that 'I am so satisfied with his right to dispose of his interest in the land that I should recommend the Government to advance a sum of money on account by way of "mark"'.<sup>567</sup>

In order to circumvent opposition to the purchase, Rogan proposed using willing sellers among the iwi to convince their whanaunga to sell. He recommended to the Native Minister that £500 be paid to Nera and the other sellers up front, with the remaining £1,000 'held over' until some future time when 'Nero will be in a better position to induce the whole of his tribe to join him in the sale'.<sup>568</sup>

This amounted to the Crown using the outstanding purchase money as leverage over Nera, to place him in the position of having to persuade opponents among his own tribe to sell their interests before he received further payment.<sup>569</sup> Moreover, Rogan recommended not paying even the £500 immediately. Rather, it should be 'delayed for a few months in order to give Mr MacGregor a chance to finish the road. Because if they get the money there will be no work'.<sup>570</sup>

Premier Alfred Domett, for his part, was reluctant to proceed with the plan until he knew exactly what the Crown was getting for its money. He apparently presumed it might not be outright ownership: 'If any money is given at all it should be first ascertained precisely what is given for the money. If it is a right to go on the land – to plant potatoes – catch eels in the streams – or anything else – we should know distinctly.' (Emphasis in original.)<sup>571</sup>

By September 1863, no payment had been made. In the middle of that month, Rogan left for Raglan but it is not clear whether he met Nera or handed over any money.<sup>572</sup> Given the amount of money eventually paid on the occasion of the formal deed-signing, the latter seems unlikely.

Meanwhile, on 12 July, General Cameron and his troops had crossed the Mangatāwhiri and invaded Waikato.<sup>573</sup> Then, on 3 December, the New Zealand Settlements Act was passed. The Act is discussed in detail in the next chapter, but here we note that in areas where Māori were deemed to be in rebellion, it authorised the Crown to 'reserve or take' land for settlement (particularly military settlement). This was followed by a newspaper report in January 1864 that an expedition

566. Rogan to Native Minister, 23 February 1863 (doc A70, pp 404–405; doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1192).

567. Document A70, p 405.

568. Document A70, p 405.

569. Document A70, p 405.

570. Rogan to Native Minister, 23 February 1863 (doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1195; doc A70, p 405).

571. Domett, note, 27 February 1863 (doc A70(a), vol 3, p 1194; doc A70, p 406).

572. Document A70, p 406.

573. Document A22, p 40.

had been ‘sent out by sea to occupy Raglan’, and that the intention was to march in force from Raglan to the Waipā valley.<sup>574</sup>

On 2 May 1864, Henry Turton was appointed as commissioner for the investigation of native titles. He promptly set out for Whāingaroa, where he met with Te Awaitaia and other ‘friendly or neutral’ chiefs to negotiate the Crown’s acquisition of their rights to land between the Waipā and the Horotiu (Upper Waikato) Rivers that was now under military occupation. The reason for these negotiations, Turton wrote in June that year, was that ‘the Government were so very anxious to have all Native titles cleared away, and the district left to them for immediate occupation by military settlers.’<sup>575</sup> Three months later, on 17 September 1864, it was Turton who signed the Waipa–Waitetuna deed for the Crown, as ‘Special Native Lands Commissioner’. The deed stated that it was ‘he Pukapuka tino hoko tino hoatu tino tuku whakaoti atu na matou na nga Rangatira me nga Tangata o Ngatimahanga o Whaingaroa’ (‘a full and final sale conveyance and surrender by us the Chiefs and People of the Tribe Ngatimahanga of Raglan’). The deed stated that Turton had paid over the full £1,500 to those who had signed.<sup>576</sup> The list of Māori signatories ran to nearly four dozen, compared with fewer than 30 who signed the 1863 agreement in principle. Given Rogan’s earlier admission that ‘the greater part of the tribe’ had refused to sign in 1863, it is unlikely that this represented unanimous, or even majority, agreement. There is no indication that the area covered by the deed had been reduced in any way. By mid-November, survey parties were already cutting the boundary lines and work on the Waipā end of the road from Whāingaroa had begun.<sup>577</sup>

On 17 December 1864, Grey proclaimed the Crown’s intention to ‘retain and hold as land of the Crown all the land in the Waikato taken by the Queen’s forces, and from which the rebel Natives have been driven.’<sup>578</sup> A map dated 15 December 1864 and ‘showing the conquered territory in the northern part of the North Island (New Zealand)’ also showed areas that the Crown considered to be inhabited by ‘friendly natives’. One of these was an area roughly matching the Waipa–Waitetuna block and noted as having been ‘offered by Nera’. It had two reserves marked inside it. Another was marked just outside but still on the west bank of the Waipā River, so in fact within Waipa–Waitetuna as shown on the deed.<sup>579</sup>

On 5 January 1865, the ‘Military Settlements district’ was proclaimed under the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863. The proclamation of districts for settlement was the legal mechanism by which confiscation of Māori land was effected (chapter 6, section 6.9), but the Military Settlements district also included most 574. ‘Monthly summary of events’, Nelson Examiner, 12 January 1864, p 6 (doc A70, pp 406–407).

575. Turton to colonial secretary, 17 June 1864, AJHR, E-4, p 1 (doc A70, p 407).

576. Document A141, ‘AUC 139 Waitetuna and Waipa Rivers (Land Between)’.

577. Document A70, p 411; deed of purchase (doc A70(a), vol 1, pp 102–111).

578. ‘A Proclamation’, 17 December 1864, New Zealand Gazette, no 49, p 461 (doc A70, p 410).

579. Document A70, pp 411–412.

of the Waipa–Waitetuna block.<sup>580</sup> The remainder of the block was included within the ‘Central Waikato district’ by a further proclamation under the New Zealand Settlements Act issued on 5 September 1865.<sup>581</sup>

5.6.4 The administration of reserves

When the Ngāti Māhanga rangatira signed the February 1863 agreement in principle for Waipa–Waitetuna, they indicated places they wanted kept as reserves. After setting down the boundaries of the land they were willing ‘[give] up to the government’, Nera added the rider: ‘These are the places we reserve. “Puketutu”, “Te Rewai”, “Turangatahi”, and “Tokehohou”. These are the whole of the pieces we reserve.’<sup>582</sup>

A map purporting to date from December 1864, shows three reserves falling within the area of the Waipa–Waitetuna block, and of reserves set aside by special commissioner Turton in 1866.<sup>583</sup> It seems likely that the reserves in Waipa–Waitetuna were made for Māori of Ngāti Māhanga (being those involved in the transaction that alienated the land to the Crown). However, we received no claims from Ngāti Māhanga concerning reserves in this block. Nor do we have jurisdiction to investigate Ngāti Māhanga claims relating to land outside our inquiry boundary. For these reasons we make no further comment on this issue.

5.6.5 Treaty analysis and findings

In making findings we confine ourselves to matters associated with the Crown’s initial purchase of the block. In doing so we must, of necessity, consider the block as a whole, since it is obviously impossible to separate out anything that applied only to the sliver within the inquiry boundary or even that part within the parish extension.

In purchasing the Waipa–Waitetuna block, we acknowledge that the Crown was initially reluctant to purchase the land and that this was partly because of ongoing opposition from some of those with interests in the block. However, another reason appears to have been that Ngāti Māhanga sought a price that was higher than the Crown was willing to pay. The position changed when the Crown’s perception of the value of the land changed, prior to the Waikato war. Once the Crown was willing to pay the price demanded by the sellers, the Crown proved itself willing to purchase the block without the consent of all right-holders, and despite knowing that some right-holders continued to oppose the transaction. Further support for this conclusion comes from the fact that, in February 1863, John Rogan seriously considered withholding full payment in order to put pressure on Te Awaitaia to

---

580. ‘Proclaiming Certain Lands under “New Zealand Settlements Act, 1863”’, 29 December 1864, New Zealand Gazette, no 1, p 1.

581. ‘Proclaiming Certain Lands under “New Zealand Settlements Act, 1863”’, 2 September 1865, New Zealand Gazette, no 35, p 265.

582. Document A70, p 404; doc A70(a), p 1188.

583. Document A70, pp 412–428.

induce others to sell. Yet in September 1864, the Crown paid in full. The evidence points to a clear conclusion that when the Crown purchased the Waipa–Waitetuna block it failed in its duty to actively protect the interests of all Māori with customary rights in the block, and in doing so the Crown breached the Treaty principle of partnership.

The Crown argued that the Waipa–Waitetuna transaction had ‘only limited applicability’ to considering the course of the Crown’s pre-1865 purchasing in the inquiry district. We do not agree. The context for pre-1865 purchasing was growing disquiet and outright opposition among many Māori over the Crown’s land purchasing practices. As chapter 6 describes in some detail, it was the Crown’s attempts to enforce a disputed land purchase that provided the spark for the wars of the 1860s. The Waipa–Waitetuna purchase occurred alongside – and was incorporated into – a military occupation carried out with the express purpose of breaking down Māori authority including customary rights to land. This makes the circumstances of the purchase troubling, at the least. Certainly, the purchase appears analogous to the provision of compensation for confiscation. On the evidence available, however, we are not able to draw firm conclusions.

5.7 PREJUDICE

The parties disagreed about whether Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffered prejudice in consequence of the Crown’s pre-1865 purchases.

Claimants argued that the impacts of the Crown’s acquisition of Māori land in Te Rohe Pōtae were self-evident ‘at an economic, cultural and spiritual level’. They said that the extent of prejudice was greater for Māori who opposed land sales – including, for example, opponents to the 1864 Waipa–Waitetuna purchase. They also said that among Māori who did engage in land sales, the prejudice was greater for those such as Ngāti Māhanga, who participated in multiple purchases, and therefore had more of their land alienated from their ownership.<sup>584</sup>

The Crown, by contrast, thought it unnecessary to consider prejudice to Māori in consequence of these transactions, because there was no evidence that it acquired land in breach of the Treaty in this period.<sup>585</sup>

That is not what the evidence shows. Rather, it demonstrates that Crown agents, in negotiating for the purchase of Māori land in the inquiry district prior to 1865, failed to comply with the Crown’s own standards of conduct for such purchases. In doing so, they breached Treaty principles at almost every step. We have found that the Crown did not fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase; did not establish the free and informed consent of the sellers; and did not ensure that Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs. By these failings, the Crown breached the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi. In

---

584. Submission 3.4.105, pp 45–46; submission 3.4.105(a), pp 32–35.

585. Submission 3.4.289, pp 24–25.

consequence of these Treaty breaches, approximately 150,000 acres of Māori land was alienated in the inquiry district.<sup>586</sup>

The evidence shows that the Crown, in response to growing opposition to land sales in the district during the 1850s, increasingly sought to negotiate with willing sellers only. In pursuing this strategy, the Crown repeatedly ignored the claims of those who asserted rights to the land but did not wish to sell. In such cases, opponents to land sales who nevertheless had their rights alienated were clearly prejudiced by the Crown's actions. Despite not being party to the negotiations and transactions concerning their land, the Crown's insistence on pressing ahead with its purchases meant that opponents lost their land without receiving any payment. They were also denied the opportunity to ensure that they retained adequate and suitable reserves, leaving them more likely to be left with insufficient land.

We further note that divisions over land sales to the Crown caused considerable damage to tribal relationships. Examples include the tensions between Tākerei Waitara and inland Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs, led by Taonui Hikaka, over the purchase of land at Mōkau and Awakino from 1854. Similar tensions were felt in the north between Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia of Ngāti Māhanga and neighbouring hapū and iwi. Where the Crown ignored opposition and disputes about who had rights to the land, resulting in conflict, its actions prejudiced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

Those Māori who sought a relationship of mutual benefit with the Crown through land transactions were also prejudiced by the Crown's land purchasing in this period. The long delay in onselling the land to settlers meant that in most cases the benefits of European settlement to Māori communities were not realised until the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, when circumstances were very different. There is no evidence that the Crown made any effort to ensure that those who chose to sell retained sufficient land to prosper in the settler economy, when it finally eventuated.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori also suffered direct economic prejudice as a result of the Crown's purchasing during this period. Purchase monies were not always distributed to all right holders, as later protests demonstrate, while the Crown's failure to adequately identify the land being transacted at the time of purchase sometimes resulted in significant underpayments to the sellers. In addition, the Crown's failure to deliver titles to reserved land, in some cases for a century or more, meant that, for sellers, the intended benefits of increased land value resulting from proximity to settlers were not realised.

Despite these impacts, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to seek ways to retain their land in collective customary ownership. For Ngāti Maniapoto, an important means of achieving this was to place a tapu on land to prevent it from being sold to the Crown. In section 5.3.3.3, for example, we described the actions of the rangatira Te Kuri and Te Kaka, who placed a tapu at the heads of the Mōkau River in 586. The nature of the evidence makes it difficult to be more precise. This figure is the Tribunal's estimate, based on either Crown survey or modern GIS calculation (see table 5.1). It does not include reserves or lands excluded from sale, or the land at Horea over which native title was not extinguished.

---

April 1854, as a manifestation of their rangatiratanga and a clear expression of their refusal to permit the sale of their lands to the Crown.

During the Ngā Korero Tuku Ihu hearings, Tainui claimant Sean Ellison described how Pōtatau Te Wherowhero coined the term Tainui Awhiro as a name for the Tainui people at Whāingaroa. According to Ellison, Te Wherowhero was responding to Crown purchasing at Whāingaroa, and sought to unite Tainui hapū against the sale of land:

Tainui a Whiro nei he mea tapa nā Pōtatau Te Wherowhero, te Kingi Māori tuatahi. Nā runga anō ki tōnā riri o mua ki Te Awaitaia mōna i huri ai ki te whakarata atu ki te pākehā i timata ai ki te hokohoko haere i ngā whenua. Mōna kē te aronga o tērā kupu ‘Tainui a Whiro’.

Tainui a Whiro was the name given by Pōtatau te Wherowhero, the first Māori King, because of his anger at Te Awaitaia, his old friend, because Te Awaitaia cleaved unto the pākehā and began to sell the lands. That is how the term Tainui a Whiro came to be.<sup>587</sup>

This attempt to prevent sales was, however, seen as a threat by the Crown, as was the Kīngitanga itself. As set out in chapter 6, the Crown’s willingness to pursue purchases of contested land was a major factor behind the outbreak of war in the early 1860s. Despite growing resistance by Māori leaders, the Crown’s continued pursuit of bad faith purchase tactics thus had wider implications, in the form of the resulting war and its impacts.

5.8 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

In this section, we summarise the conclusions and findings made in this chapter.

- ▶ Between 1851 and 1864, the Crown purchased approximately 150,000 acres of Māori land within the inquiry district. The land was mostly concentrated on the coast, and inland around the Waipā and Puniu Rivers.
- ▶ The Crown’s right of pre-emption under the Treaty effectively gave it a monopoly over the purchase of Māori land. Although the Treaty anticipated that Māori would sell some land to the Crown, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, together with the article 2 duty of active protection, meant Crown purchases of Māori land had to be conducted in good faith, and in ways that were not injurious to Māori wellbeing. These obligations were heightened due to the Crown’s exclusive right to purchase land, as Māori were unable to find alternative buyers.
- ▶ The standards required of the Crown when seeking to purchase Māori land were well-known to Crown officials of the time. They can be summarised as follows:

---

587. Transcript 4.1.3, p197 (Ellison). Also see doc D6, p4 (Ellison).

- the Crown had to fully investigate customary tenure to the land it sought to purchase, to ensure it was negotiating with the right people;
- the Crown had to establish the free and informed consent of right holders through a fair negotiation process; and
- the Crown had to ensure that right holders retained enough land for their present and future needs.

Our findings on the Mōkau–Awakino transactions are as follows:

- ▶ Between 1854 and 1857, the Crown acquired four blocks in the south-west of the inquiry district, between the Mōkau and Awakino river mouths, comprising about 58,000 acres.
- ▶ When seeking to acquire land at Mōkau in 1850, Crown officials initially held large public hui and took time to consult with Māori in the area. After 1852, however, officials preferred to seek out and negotiate with willing sellers only, despite being aware of significant and growing opposition to land sales. We found this to be in breach of the Treaty principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and the duty of active protection.
- ▶ In negotiating for the consent of right holders to the four Mōkau–Awakino blocks:
  - The Crown made inadequate efforts to properly identify the land at the time of the transactions. In the case of the Awakino block, this effectively resulted in a significant underpayment in terms of the price per acre, yet when this was discovered in the 1880s the Crown made no attempt to compensate the former owners. In the case of the Mokau block, the Crown's failure to complete the survey due to difficulties created by opposition to the transaction led to a failure to define the interests of sellers and non-sellers, and their successors.
  - The Crown continued to allow Māori to understand it was acquiring land for the settlement of Europeans, even while chief purchase commissioner Donald McLean privately recorded his intention in 1854 to deliberately hold the land back from settlers to keep purchase prices for adjacent land as low as possible.
  - Rather than allow negotiations to proceed at their own pace, the Crown used the distribution of purchase money and other methods to manipulate Māori into agreeing to purchase, and did not provide sufficient time for opposition and disputes to be resolved through tikanga.
  - We found that these actions constituted breaches of the Treaty principles of partnership and good faith, and the duty of active protection.
- ▶ The Crown's administration of land reserved or otherwise set aside from the Mokau-Awakino transactions created numerous difficulties for Mōkau Māori. Title was not issued for many decades, during which time the Crown sold some of the land to settlers. When Māori complained, they were often dismissed, or given inaccurate information by Crown officials. Many of the titles were not confirmed until the mid-twentieth century, and only after sustained pressure on the Government by Māori. When the land was finally granted, it was often in a different location or of a smaller size to that promised in the 1850s, including at least two cases where reserves are still yet to be created. We found these Crown failures to be in breach of the Treaty principles of good faith and redress, as well as the plain meaning of article 2, which entitled Māori to retain possession of their lands for as long as they desired.

Our findings on the western harbours transactions are as follows:

- ▶ Between 1851 and 1857 the Crown acquired virtually all the land between the Whāingaroa and Aotea Harbours, in the north-west of the inquiry district, as well as one block situated between Kāwhia Harbour and the Marokopa River, comprising about 40,000 acres. In the early 1850s, the Crown entered arrangements for two blocks of land on the shores of Whāingaroa Harbour. Then, between 1854 and 1858, the Crown purchased several blocks of land across the Whāingaroa, Aotea and Kāwhia districts.
- ▶ The Crown failed to consult all customary right holders when purchasing the Whāingaroa block in 1851, requiring a series of further payments. During the second phase of purchasing, from 1854, chief commissioner McLean targeted willing sellers, through a series of arrangements made with individuals or small groups of people. This enabled him to circumvent any potential opposition. McLean then left it to his subordinate John Rogan and others to complete negotiations, which usually involved further payments. Rogan, too, made inadequate efforts to identify all right holders, for example in the Harihari and Oioroa purchases, where the Crown relied on rangatira involved in the land sales to distribute portions of the purchase price to other right holders. We found these failures to be in breach of the Treaty principle of partnership, the guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, and the duty of active protection.
- ▶ In negotiating for the consent of right holders to the western harbours transactions:
  - The Crown made inadequate efforts to properly identify the land at the time of the transactions. This was especially true of McLean's 1854 advance payments, for which the land was identified with reference to physical boundaries, sometimes sketched on a map.
  - The Crown entered a transaction at Horea with Pōtatau Te Wherowhero, in the hope of resolving internal tensions between two groups of right holders. The extent to which Te Wherowhero and Ngāti Mahuta understood the transaction as a permanent alienation is unclear, and the Crown showed no interest in negotiating with Ngāti Tahinga/Tainui hapū. However, as native title to the block was not extinguished, we found no evidence of a Treaty breach.
  - When purchasing the Whāingaroa block, the Crown appears to have failed to explain to Māori the nature and extent of the transaction, as evidenced by the re-occupation of a portion of the land by members of Ngāti Māhanga. Similarly, in the Oioroa purchase, claimants pointed to the continued occupation of the land by one seller as evidence that transaction was not understood to be permanent by all right holders.

- The Crown generally set the price for its pre-1865 transactions. When Māori asked for more money, such requests were almost always denied, as was the case in the Karioi and Ruapuke purchases. This was part of the Crown's deliberate strategy to buy from Māori at a low price and sell the land on to settlers for much higher amounts. The value of such a strategy can be seen in onsale prices within the Whaingaroa block, one of the few parts of the district where settlement took place soon after purchase.
  - We found that through these actions the Crown failed to act honourably and in good faith, thereby breaching the Treaty principle of partnership.
- In reserving or otherwise setting aside land from the western harbours transactions:
- The Crown was aware it had a duty to provide for present and future Māori needs. Crown agents were instructed to establish good reserves that were clearly marked out and agreed with Māori before the purchases were completed. The Crown was also aware of the need to protect those reserves from alienation, as was the understanding in the district at the time.
  - Within four years of the 1851 Whaingaroa purchase the Crown began purchasing land in the Te Mata reserve, and by 1858 it had acquired the entire 1,189-acre reserve.
  - The Crown was aware that in the Whaingaroa purchase, Māori sought for land to be reserved near the harbour. However, the Crown included only limited harbourside reserves. In the case of the Te Uku reserve, the Crown failed to award this land to Māori in a timely manner, and did not act to prevent the land from being sold to a settler. Instead, it provided Māori with replacement land that was inadequate to their needs.
  - Much of the land that was set aside from the Karioi, Ruapuke, and Wharauoa purchases has now been alienated from Māori ownership. The Crown set aside no reserve land whatsoever in the Harihari, Oioroa, and Wahatane purchases, or in the purchase of Ngāti Toa-rangatira and Ngāti Raukawa interests.
  - For failing to ensure that Māori retained sufficient land for their present and future needs, we found that the Crown failed in its duty of active protection and thereby breached the Treaty principle of partnership.

Our findings on the Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia transactions are as follows:

- During the 1850s, the Crown acquired about 1,300 acres inland at Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia, in the north of the inquiry district around the Waipā and Puniu Rivers. Almost all of this land was granted to Church organisations.
- These lands were of high quality, and occupation and control of the area had been keenly contested by Māori prior to the arrival of Europeans. In the 1840s and 1850s, with assistance from missionaries, the Māori economy of the area expanded considerably, notably through wheat production and flour milling.
- In acting as an intermediary between Māori right holders and church organisations, the Crown became a stakeholder in the relationship that the land transactions served to confirm using its pre-emptive purchasing powers. This created obligations on the Crown to ensure that the terms under which the lands were gifted to church organisations were upheld. These matters will be addressed in future parts of our report, including those addressing education issues.

- ▶ Despite Crown officials being aware of contests between Ngāti Paretekawa and others over customary rights, there is no evidence that the Crown investigated the customary tenure of the area before conducting the Otāwhao transactions. We found this to be a breach of the plain meaning of article 2 of the Treaty.

Our findings on the Waipa–Waitetuna purchase are as follows:

- ▶ In 1864, after a long series of negotiations, the Crown acquired the 53,000-acre Waipa–Waitetuna block, which lies partly within and partly outside of the inquiry district’s northern boundary.
- ▶ The Crown was initially reluctant to purchase the land, in part due to ongoing opposition from some of those with interests in the block. The Crown was also unwilling at first to pay the price asked for by the sellers. However, Crown perception of the value of the land changed after preparations began for the Waikato War. The Crown was now willing to pay the price demanded by the sellers, and to purchase the block without the consent of all right-holders, despite knowing that some right-holders continued to oppose the transaction.
- ▶ The Waipa–Waitetuna purchase occurred during a Crown military occupation of land in Waikato (including the area covered by the purchase block) that was carried out with the express purpose of breaking down Māori authority, including customary rights to land. Although the evidence is not sufficient to draw firm conclusions, aspects of the purchase resemble the process of compensation for confiscated land discussed in chapter 6.
- ▶ We found that the Crown, in purchasing this land, failed in its duty to actively protect the interests of all Māori with customary rights in the block, and in doing so the Crown breached the Treaty principle of partnership.

In consequence of these Treaty breaches, approximately 150,000 acres of Māori land was alienated, resulting in prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

CHAPTER 6

TE TOHERIRI TE RAUPATU: WAR AND CONFISCATION

Ā muri, kia mau ki te whakapono, kia mau ki te ture me te aroha, hei aha te aha, hei aha te aha.<sup>1</sup>

6.1 INTRODUCTION

In 1860, 20 years after the Treaty signings at Waikato Heads and Kāwhia, the Crown's relationship with the people of Te Rohe Pōtae remained extremely limited. So, too, did its effective authority. Māori in the district continued to live according to their own law and authority, even as they avidly continued to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the arrival of Europeans in Aotearoa.

The first sustained engagement between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown took place between 1860 and 1864, which culminated in the Crown deploying the largest military force yet seen in New Zealand in an attempt to enforce its sovereign control. An initial positioning of British troops to enforce a land survey at Waitara in Taranaki deteriorated into violent conflict but without a clear military outcome. The parties negotiated a truce. Then, in July 1863, soldiers crossed the Mangatāwhiri Stream south into Waikato. By April 1864, a Crown force of nearly 12,000 men occupied all of the Waikato Basin as far south as the Pūniu River. All this land was confiscated from its Māori owners, largely for the purpose of settling Europeans. Conflict also reignited in Taranaki. Most of that district, too, was occupied and confiscated by the Crown. The lands between, which remained under Māori authority within the protection of the aukati, became known as Te Rohe Pōtae.

The claimants in this inquiry used the term 'raupatu' to describe the war and the confiscations as two parts of a single process by which the Crown sought to impose its authority and large-scale European settlement. According to Dean Mahuta, raupatu 'refers to the hundreds of people that were killed (by the blade of the patu) in the confiscation of land'.<sup>2</sup>

---

1. The words of Pōtatau Te Wherowhero after he was raised up as king: transcript 4.1.1, p 222 (Tom Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010). 'In the time to come, hold fast to the faith, to the law, and to compassion, whatever may happen' (Tribunal translation).

2. Document A22 [O'Malley], p 233, quoting Dean Mahuta, 'Raupatu: A Waikato Perspective', Te Kaharoa, vol 1, no 1 (2008), p 178.

The Waitangi Tribunal has now addressed raupatu issues in several reports, beginning with the Taranaki Report in 1996. The conflicts between Māori and the Crown in the 1860s have been the subject of considerable inquiry by historians. And, as the Crown has worked to restore its Treaty relationships with iwi and hapū in the modern era it has acknowledged and apologised for waging war on its citizens and taking their land. While the Waikato raupatu has not been the subject of a thorough Tribunal inquiry, that cannot be attempted here for reasons of jurisdiction, scope, and relevance. Our focus in this chapter is on the raupatu grievances of the people of Te Rohe Pōtae, notably Ngāti Maniapoto.

In this inquiry, importantly, we heard from many claimants who told us their histories and experiences of raupatu. In addition, two major research reports on raupatu issues by Dr Vincent O'Malley were presented in evidence. Traditional history reports were prepared by the Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Apakura, Mōkau ki Runga, and Ngāti Kauwhata claimants. Paul Thomas, Craig Innes, and Brent Parker also prepared research reports.<sup>3</sup>

6.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

The raupatu in Taranaki and Waikato profoundly affected the relationship between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Crown. Understanding the raupatu is therefore essential to understanding subsequent development of that relationship, particularly through the Te Ōhāki Tapu negotiations of the 1880s. And the impacts of raupatu, as the evidence presented in this inquiry showed, are still felt today.

The scale of European immigration to New Zealand during the 1850s and the Crown's steps towards recognising settler self-government led many Māori to consider how they might best safeguard their tino rangatiratanga, their mana motuhake. The Kīngitanga movement was perhaps the most significant Māori response. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were (and are) among the strongest supporters of the Kīngitanga, and to that extent the establishment and purposes of the Kīngitanga, and the Crown's response, are important issues for this chapter. We acknowledge that Waikato, the iwi to which the first Māori King Pōtatau and his descendants belong, have settled their raupatu claims with the Crown.

The decision by Ngāti Maniapoto to support resistance to the Crown's disputed purchase of land in Taranaki in 1860 was interpreted by the governor as an unjustified interference and an insurrection against the Queen's authority. During

---

3. Vincent O'Malley, 'Te Rohe Pōtae War and Raupatu' (document A22); Vincent O'Malley, 'Te Rohe Pōtae Political Engagement, 1840 – 1863' (document A23); M Tauariki, Te I Ngaia, T Roa, R Maniapoto-Anderson, A Barrett, T Douglas, R Joseph, P Meredith, 'Ngāti Maniapoto Mana Motuhake: Report for Ngāti Maniapoto Claimants and the Waitangi Tribunal' (document A110); Moepatu Borrell and Robert Joseph, 'Te Iwi Ngāti Apakura Mana Motuhake: Report for Ngāti Apakuru Claimants and the Waitangi Tribunal' (document A97); Bruce Stirling, 'Mōkau ki Runga Claim Issues' (document A147(b)); Peter McBurney, 'Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi interests in and about Te Rohe Pōtae District' (document A120); Paul Thomas, 'The Crown and Maori in Mokau 1840 – 1911' (document A28); Craig Innes, 'Alienation of Maori granted lands within Te Rohe Pōtae Parish extension 1863 – 2011' (document A30); J Parker, 'Evidence of J Parker on Land returned to rebel Māori' (document A139).

the war, the Crown painted Ngāti Maniapoto and their leader Rewi Maniapoto as implacably opposed to the Queen's sovereignty and as a violent and extremist group that had forfeited their rights under the Treaty. Ngāti Maniapoto have also been blamed for the outbreak of the Waikato war in 1863. The effects of this view have continued to be apparent even in the very recent past. In 1995, for example, the Treaty negotiations Minister Douglas Graham referred to Ngāti Maniapoto as 'the real rebels' during the passage of the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Bill through Parliament.<sup>4</sup> In 2003, the noted historian Michael King wrote in his best-selling Penguin History of New Zealand that 'the group that had been perhaps most bellicose in both the Waikato and Taranaki wars, Ngāti Maniapoto, lost nothing' (emphasis in original).<sup>5</sup> The actions of Rewi and Ngāti Maniapoto in the lead-up to the Waikato war are thus crucial to understanding the raupatu and the Crown's actions towards the people of Te Rohe Pōtae.

At the outset of the inquiry the Crown indicated a view that its concessions would remove the need for the Tribunal to address many of the issues relating to raupatu. Rather, the Crown suggested the focus be on the extent of the prejudice suffered.

In the event, however, the Crown contested most of the issues raised by the claimants, including who was responsible for starting the war in Waikato and the Crown's conduct during the fighting. The taking of prisoners and their treatment, and allegations of deliberate infection of prisoners with smallpox, rape, and killing the wounded, the unarmed, the elderly, women, and children, remain as issues that need to be addressed.

Parts of the northern and southern boundaries of our inquiry district were originally set following the historical lines of confiscation in Waikato and Taranaki. But these boundaries neither prescribe nor limit the customary rights and interests of the people of Te Rohe Pōtae. The Crown disputed the right of some claimants to bring raupatu claims in this inquiry, arguing they were already settled by virtue of being named in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995. In chapter 1, we determined that these groups were still able to make claims on the basis of non-Waikato whakapapa. An important task for this chapter is to assess what rights and interests were confiscated from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

Assessment of prejudice is certainly required, and we examine such matters as casualties, loss of land, destruction of property, displacement, disease, support for refugees, economic losses, care of wāhi tapu, damage to leadership and identity, labelling as 'loyal' or 'rebel', historical vilification, and damaged relationships with Pākehā.

---

4. Douglas Graham, 19 October 1995, NZPD, vol 551, p 9922 (quoting Michael King, Te Puea (Auckland: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977), p 26).

5. Michael King, The Penguin History of New Zealand (Auckland: Penguin Books, 2003), p 215.

6.1.2 How the chapter is structured

Section 6.2 sets out what previous Tribunals have said about raupatu as context for the claims in this inquiry, and then summarises the arguments put forward by claimants and the Crown to establish the issues to be determined in this chapter.

Sections 6.3 to 6.8 address issues about the Taranaki and Waikato wars which are in dispute between the Crown and the claimants. Section 6.3 analyses why the Kīngitanga was established, and the Crown's attitude towards it before the Taranaki war. Section 6.4 examines the question of why Ngāti Maniapoto and other Te Rohe Pōtae and Waikato tribes decided to intervene in Taranaki in 1860. Section 6.5 addresses the question of whether the Crown tried to avoid war in the crucial period of 1861–1863, including the issue of whether opportunities existed for the Crown to recognise the authority of the Kīngitanga. In section 6.6, we assess the Crown's argument that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were partly responsible for the Waikato war, particularly the question of whether there was a credible threat of an attack on Auckland. Finally, we outline the course of the conflict in Waikato in section 6.7. The extent of involvement of Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū is established, and claims that Crown forces acted egregiously during several engagements are addressed. Section 6.8 discusses Ngāti Tūwharetoa's involvement in the war.

Section 6.9 sets out the extent and impact of confiscation on Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū. In section 6.10, the prejudice caused by raupatu is assessed. Section 6.11 provides a summary of the Tribunal's findings of Treaty breach.

6.2 ISSUES

6.2.1 Historiography of the causes of war

We begin our discussion of the issues with a brief overview of how historians have explained the causes of the wars. Until the 1950s, explanations for the war focused on its necessity: armed intervention by the British was said to have been necessary to quell a rebellion and, in particular, to forestall an attack on Auckland.<sup>6</sup> That did not mean, however, that the Crown bore no responsibility. In the first significant attempt to explain the war, The Maori King, published in 1864, John Gorst argued that the Crown had failed to govern:

No effort had been made to teach obedience to rulers – indeed, it had never been quite settled on our side who the rulers of the Maories were to be. . . . So that it was the very caution and timidity of our policy that had brought us upon the horns of a dilemma, in which we must either give up the right to govern, which we had been too weak to exercise, or plunge the colony into a war of races.<sup>7</sup>

---

6. Document A23 [O'Malley], pp 495–507, where Dr O'Malley provides a more extensive historiographic overview, informs this section.

7. John Gorst, The Maori King, Or, The Story of Our Quarrel with the Natives of New Zealand (Hamilton: Paul's Book Arcade, 1959), p3. Gorst's book was first published in 1864; references here are to the 1959 edition.

Māori were treated alternately as British subjects or foreigners 'according to the interest or caprice of their British rulers'. The Government, Gorst said, denied Waikato tribes self-government and then punished them for not exercising it. He praised the 'wisdom and moderation' of Kingitanga leaders, but argued this was not enough to overcome the 'weakness' of their system of governance. Nor could they control the Ngāti Maniapoto leader, Rewi Maniapoto, whom Gorst characterised as a leader of the 'most violent of the king's partizans', a man who sought to 'hatch mischief'.<sup>8</sup>

James Cowan, whose extensive history of the wars appeared in 1922, thought 'the passionate sentiment of nationalism and home rule for the Maoris . . . developed into a war-fever'; Māori aimed to 'sweep the pakeha to the sea'. The Government, in contrast, sought what was seen as the reasonable goal of 'teach[ing] subjection to British authority'.<sup>9</sup> Yet elsewhere, Cowan provided an incisive summary of Waikato Māori dissatisfaction:

irritation caused by the inevitable friction over European encroachment, the treatment of the natives by the lower class of whites, the reluctance of the authorities to grant the tribes a reasonable measure of self-government, and, lastly, the sympathy with Taranaki and the bitterness engendered by the loss of so many men in the Waitara campaign . . .<sup>10</sup>

In the 1960s, academic historians focused on an examination of the motives of the colonial government. Keith Sinclair emphasised the agency of the settler government at the expense of imperial power, and after examining the Waitara purchase argued that the wars that followed were 'essentially campaigns in the same war, a product of colonization in New Zealand, a war for dominion, for land'.<sup>11</sup> Alan Ward renewed the emphasis on the Waikato invasion, which was 'largely to facilitate the acquisition of Maori land'. But the war also 'expressed the determination of Europeans to resolve the ultimate question of which race and which society was going to prevail and admit the other on sufferance'. This question 'had to be resolved in any colonial situation'. The colonists feared chaos, and like Gorst and Cowan, Ward identified the belief that Māori society was unable to organise itself along peaceful and orderly lines as an important reason for the war. But faith in strong leadership had its own shortcomings: Ward argued that the autocratic tendencies of Governors Browne and Grey aggravated tensions.<sup>12</sup> Criticism of Grey's conduct was sharpened by B J Dalton, who invoked Machiavelli to argue

---

8. Gorst, The Maori King, pp 7, 108, 176, 240.

9. James Cowan, The New Zealand Wars: A History of the Maori Campaigns and the Pioneering Period, 2 vols (Wellington: Government Printer, 1983), vol 1, pp 231, 241.

10. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 232.

11. Keith Sinclair, The Origins of the Māori Wars, 2nd ed (Wellington: New Zealand University Press, 1961), p 271.

12. Alan Ward, 'The Origins of the Anglo-Maori Wars: A Reconsideration', NZJH (1967), vol 1, no 2, pp 151, 156–157, 159, 165.

that, despite professing peace, Grey deliberately planned an aggressive and unprovoked invasion of Waikato.<sup>13</sup>

As historian Vincent O'Malley told the Tribunal, the explanation for the wars now largely accepted among historians is that advanced by James Belich in 1986.<sup>14</sup> Belich offered a 'tentative' argument that the wars were 'more akin to classic wars of conquest than we would like to believe'. The British, he said, repeatedly sought victory through a decisive battle and while that did not preclude 'a political aim of seizing land' the 'single minded search for rapid and decisive victory accords much better with a political aim of asserting sovereignty'. Thus, 'a main cause of the Waikato War was the failure of the British attempt to assert their sovereignty over the Maoris through victory in Taranaki'.<sup>15</sup> At Waipapa marae, Dr O'Malley agreed that the 'argument about imposing substantive sovereignty, wishing to do that, is essentially correct'.<sup>16</sup>

The histories cited, from Sinclair on, focus on explaining British aggression. Hostilities were initiated by the British, so in one sense the focus is logical. Nonetheless, the British aggression was not unopposed, and in the absence of considered attempts to explain why Māori responded, old stereotypes of hatching mischief and war fever have been allowed to linger.

When Belich wrote that Kingitanga forces did not join the conflict in Taranaki to assist Wiremu Kīngi, but to 'repel a British foray across the tacitly agreed boundaries of control and so protect Maori independence', he was essentially arguing that sovereignty was a shared motivation for the conflict. In part, this was an aspect of Belich's criticism of 'the myth that the Treaty of Waitangi made New Zealand British instantly, by the wave of a wand'. Historians, he claimed, had tended to follow Sir William Martin and Octavius Hadfield, denying a conflict over sovereignty and arguing that Kīngi was loyal to the Crown but justified in resisting Governor Browne's abuse of his powers.<sup>17</sup>

In sum, historians now largely agree that the causes of war were the Crown's attempt to impose 'substantive sovereignty' on tribes which had remained independent since 1840, and the settlers' imperative to open up tribally held land for colonisation.

6.2.2 What other Tribunals have said

Tribunals have generally concluded that the Crown made war on Māori in the 1860s to break Māori authority and obtain land for settlement.

The Taranaki Tribunal concluded that the governor's actions at Waitara, which caused the Taranaki war, were contrary to the Treaty because they were contrary to Māori law and disregarded Māori authority. More broadly, the Crown's actions

---

13. BJ Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, 1855-1870 (Sydney: Sydney University Press, 1967), ch 7.

14. Document A23, pp 504-505.

15. James Belich, The New Zealand Wars and the Victorian Interpretation of Racial Conflict (Auckland: Penguin, 1988), p 80.

16. Transcript 4.1.12, p 948.

17. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 79-80.

could not have been consistent with Treaty principles because underlying them was an intention to confiscate most of Taranaki for European settlement.<sup>18</sup>

The Crown breached Treaty principles by seeking military solutions to essentially political problems in Waikato, the Hauraki Tribunal said.<sup>19</sup> The Tauranga Raupatu and Central North Island Tribunals agreed that the Crown's invasion of Waikato amounted to a declaration of war on 'the tribes of the Kingitanga'.<sup>20</sup> The Crown's stance towards the Kingitanga made a negotiated settlement impossible unless Māori 'forfeited their tino rangatiratanga' and Māori acted consistently with Treaty principles when they refused.<sup>21</sup>

The Turanga Tribunal said that the Treaty 'contemplated a right' to defend tino rangatiratanga by armed force, if necessary, against unlawful attack. Article 3 of the Treaty 'bestows upon Maori all the rights and privileges of British subjects, and British subjects have a right to the rule of law and to protection against a capricious sovereign'.<sup>22</sup>

Beginning with Taranaki, Tribunals have acknowledged that, in emergency situations, treaties, the rule of law, and civil rights may all be suspended. However, the Taranaki Tribunal considered that the 'general principles' of the Treaty persist 'to the extent that they provide criteria for assessing the circumstances'.<sup>23</sup> The Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal's firm conclusion was that 'the circumstances in Tauranga Moana were never so extraordinary as to warrant the suspension of the Treaty'.<sup>24</sup>

Whether threats to Pākehā settlers justified a pre-emptive attack by Crown troops was considered by the Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunal. The Tribunal found no evidence of such a threat, and that article 1 of the Treaty placed an obligation on the Crown to use its authority to maintain peace.<sup>25</sup>

Tribunals have given considerable attention to the question of whether Māori rebelled against the Crown. The Turanga Tribunal said the Crown 'must reasonably apprehend that there is an intent to overturn the existing legal order, and that apprehension must be so clear as to render it necessary for the Crown to turn its 18. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (Wellington: GP Publications, 1996), pp 78–79, 103.

19. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 1, p 248.

20. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana: Report on the Tauranga Confiscation Claims (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), p 105; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, p 248.

21. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 118.

22. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua: The Report on the Turanganui a Kiwa Claims, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, pp 120–121.

23. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 132; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2018), vol 1, pp 321–322.

24. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 119.

25. Waitangi Tribunal, The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Report, 2 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2004), vol 1, p 220.

guns on its own citizens.<sup>26</sup> The Manukau, Taranaki (in north and south Taranaki), Ngāti Awa Raupatu, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, Turanga, and Te Urewera Tribunals found that Māori were not in rebellion in their districts.<sup>27</sup> The Taranaki Tribunal emphasised that it was not rebellion ‘to resist an unlawful attack and so to defend oneself and one’s home.’<sup>28</sup>

In considering rebellion, the Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal said the Crown’s promise to protect tino rangatiratanga needed to be considered; so too did the nature of Māori society: ‘its strong tribal basis, the whanaungatanga links among tribal groups, and the dependence on the spiritual and physical connections of Maori to the natural world, particularly to their land’. Had these matters been considered, the Tribunal thought ‘one result might have been the acceptance of some kind of doctrine of justified self-defence. Accordingly, for one Maori group to help defend a related group from unlawful attack, for example, might have been found to be not rebellion but self-defence.’<sup>29</sup> The Tribunal agreed with the Crown’s position in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlements Act 1995 that it was unfair to label those Māori as rebels.<sup>30</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal considered it unnecessary to determine whether a rebellion existed in fact, following the Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal’s conclusion that whether or not ‘a technical definition of “rebellion” applied when Tauranga Maori went to fight for the King, the Crown’s actions were clearly in serious breach of the Treaty.’<sup>31</sup> The National Park Tribunal endorsed the Central North Island Tribunal’s finding that: ‘Those tribes which went outside their own lands to fight a defensive war in support of the Kīngitanga, were fighting for their kin, their King, and their own futures.’<sup>32</sup>

Crown actions during the wars have been found to breach Treaty principles. The Mohaka ki Ahuriri and Turanga Tribunals found that the deportation and detention without trial of prisoners breached article 3.<sup>33</sup> The Te Urewera Tribunal also identified the relevance of article 3:

---

26. Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 118; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 253.

27. Waitangi Tribunal, Report of the Waitangi Tribunal on the Manukau Claim, 2nd ed (Wellington: Waitangi Tribunal, 1989), p 17; Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 80, 102–103; Waitangi Tribunal, The Ngati Awa Raupatu Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 1999), p 63; Waitangi Tribunal, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, vol 1, p 257; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 161; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 2, pp 555, 558.

28. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 129 (Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 253).

29. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 114.

30. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 172.

31. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 252.

32. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 254; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Kāhui Maunga: The National Park District Inquiry Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2013), vol 1, p 184.

33. Waitangi Tribunal, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, vol 1, p 219; Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 193.

The killing of innocents is an obvious violation of the fundamental right of British subjects not to be arbitrarily deprived of life by the State. Also fundamental for British subjects is the right of an alleged criminal to the due processes of law – a fair trial and, if found guilty, punishment in accordance with the law. The summary execution of prisoners without a trial for their alleged crimes, and so without the death sentence being lawfully pronounced, violates that fundamental right.<sup>34</sup>

While the Te Urewera Tribunal accepted the Crown's submission that a strategy of destroying kāinga and food supplies served a military purpose, it did not accept 'the Crown's lack of consideration for the consequences of the actions deemed necessary to achieve its strategic purpose'. Food, shelter, and security needed to be available to non-combatants, including women, children, and the elderly.<sup>35</sup>

The question of rebellion is also important because the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863 enabled land to be confiscated in districts where the governor was satisfied that a tribe or section of a tribe was in rebellion. The Taranaki Tribunal determined that the Act and its associated legislation 'were within the authority of the New Zealand General Assembly to enact. In other words, the Act itself is not unlawful'.<sup>36</sup> However, the Taranaki, Ngati Awa Raupatu, and Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunals concluded that confiscations in their districts were not lawful because the Crown failed to comply with the legislation.<sup>37</sup> The Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal acknowledged that subsequent legislation retrospectively validated the confiscation, but stated:

For the Crown to act unlawfully is obviously not good governance. All the more so when the unlawfulness consisted of Crown officers acting without any statutory power and in place of a judicial process that would have determined the existence and extent of fundamentally important Maori rights.<sup>38</sup>

Regardless of its legality, all Tribunals that have considered the issue have found confiscation to be in breach of the Treaty. The Taranaki Tribunal said the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863 and the confiscation of land in Taranaki were obviously prejudicial to claimants and inconsistent with the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi. The Treaty guarantee to Maori of their lands and estates for as long as they wished to keep them was an unequivocal undertaking, with which the Act and policies were in direct conflict.<sup>39</sup>

---

34. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 322.

35. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 360.

36. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 126.

37. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 133–134; Waitangi Tribunal, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, vol 1, p 251.

38. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 172.

39. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 131.

Confiscating and then granting land back to Māori, the Ngati Awa Raupatu Tribunal said, were intended to force the individualisation of Māori title.<sup>40</sup> The Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunal concluded that in exercising kāwanatanga the Crown had to pay due respect to Māori rangatiratanga, and the New Zealand Settlements Act clearly breached the principle of reciprocity.<sup>41</sup> Noting that earlier Tribunals had found confiscation of tribal land to be ‘a grave breach of the Treaty’s promise of active protection’, the Te Urewera Tribunal found the Crown needed to ‘take the greatest possible care to ascertain who would be affected by the confiscation and to ensure that those who were not its targets would be as little disadvantaged as possible’. The Crown ‘failed to ascertain which iwi, apart from those it intended to punish, had land within the district.’<sup>42</sup>

The principle of good government, according to the Te Urewera Tribunal, ‘required the Crown to establish clear and fair processes for compensation and land return, the implementation of which would be subject to independent scrutiny. None of this occurred.’<sup>43</sup> The compensation scheme breached Treaty principles because it was ‘not swift, honest, certain, or clement’, the Taranaki Tribunal said. Further breaches occurred because rights to land were determined by judicial officers and by unilateral imposition of individual title.<sup>44</sup> The Ngati Awa Raupatu Tribunal found the compensation process ‘as a whole’ to be ‘entirely inconsistent with the principles of the Treaty’. Ngāti Awa had a right to ‘retain their own polity and sufficient land for their future survival as a people’. This did not happen. ‘There is nothing in the record,’ the Tribunal said, ‘to satisfy us of the Government’s compliance with even minimal protective standards or the performance of fiduciary obligations.’<sup>45</sup> When grants were eventually issued, the Mohaka ki Ahuriri Tribunal noted that they ‘often went immediately to Europeans or to the Crown who had already made payments on the land and had got a lien on it by paying survey charges’. In that district, a Compensation Court never actually sat and so there was no judicial determination of whether those whose land was confiscated were actually in rebellion. This lack of due process breached the Crown’s duty of active protection, while the return of land to individuals who in some cases had no customary right to the land breached the principle of options.<sup>46</sup>

Although compensation was originally intended for those who could demonstrate they had not been in rebellion, the Te Urewera Tribunal observed that, by late 1865, ‘the Government’s policy was to pacify those who had fought against it by granting them enough land to live on.’<sup>47</sup> The Crown required

40. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngati Awa Raupatu Report, p 78.

41. Waitangi Tribunal, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, vol 1, pp 257–258.

42. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, pp 195, 243.

43. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 243.

44. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 138; Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 305.

45. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngati Awa Raupatu Report, p 97.

46. Waitangi Tribunal, Mohaka ki Ahuriri, vol 1, pp 254, 258, 259.

47. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 200; see also Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 265–266.

that ‘rebels’ should have ‘come in’ or ‘surrendered’ before they would be granted land. In other words, in the wake of conflict with Crown forces and their defeat or expulsion from their lands, Maori would accept the authority of the Queen and – as a consequence of defeat – the right of the Crown to allocate them lands to live on.<sup>48</sup>

Later attempts by the Crown to provide redress for confiscations have been found wanting. The Taranaki Tribunal said it took 60 years for the ‘real grievance: the justice of the confiscations’ to be investigated by the Sim commission. Even then, the commission was unable to consider the lawfulness of the confiscations. Under its terms of reference, ‘the commission was required to assume that those who did not accept the Crown’s authority could not claim the benefit of the Treaty’. The commission was only to assess whether the confiscations ‘exceeded in quantity what was fair and just’. These constraints were inconsistent with the Crown’s Treaty obligations.<sup>49</sup>

6.2.3 Crown concessions and acknowledgements

6.2.3.1 Treaty settlement legislation

The Hauraki Tribunal agreed that certain Crown concessions in the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995 could be applied to other groups as a matter of logic.<sup>50</sup> In this inquiry, the Crown set out what it called the ‘broad, non-iwi specific historical facts, which have been conceded’ in relation to raupatu and are contained in Waikato, Ngāti Ruanui, and Ngāti Tama settlement legislation.<sup>51</sup> Ngāti Raukawa, who participated in this inquiry, concluded a settlement with the Crown in 2014.<sup>52</sup> Te Ātiawa, who did not participate in this inquiry but who feature in this chapter, signed a deed of settlement in 2014.

A number of acknowledgements specific to these groups were itemised by the Crown, with the caveat that they would not be extended to Te Rohe Pōtae groups ‘unless similar historical evidence is produced’. The Crown said that its acknowledgements of Treaty breaches in existing settlement legislation ‘could be adapted and used if the Crown obtained sufficient historical evidence that Te Rohe Pōtae groups suffered similar prejudice.’<sup>53</sup>

The ‘broad, non-iwi specific historical facts’, which could be applied to Te Rohe Pōtae groups, included the following relevant statements:

The New Zealand Government at the time perceived the Kiingitanga as a challenge to the Queen’s sovereignty and as a hindrance to Government land purchase policies, and did not agree to any role for, or formal relationship with, the Kiingitanga.

48. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, p 201.

49. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 291, 293; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, p 395; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 247.

50. Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, p 209.

51. Submission 3.1.162, p 2; Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995; Ngāti Ruanui Claims Settlement Act 2003; Ngāti Tama Claims Settlement Act 2003.

52. Raukawa Claims Settlement Act 2014

53. Memorandum 3.1.162, p 2.

In July 1863, after considered preparations by the New Zealand Government, military forces of the Crown . . . invaded the Waikato south of the Mangatawhiri river, initiating hostilities against the Kiingitanga and the people. By April 1864, after persistent defence of their lands, Waikato and their allies had fallen back before the larger forces of the Crown and had taken refuge in the King Country.<sup>54</sup>

6.2.3.2 Crown concessions in this inquiry

Early in our inquiry, the Crown acknowledged that the ‘wars in Taranaki and the Waikato were an injustice and that the confiscations of land were wrongful and in breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles.’<sup>55</sup> In its statement of position and concessions, Crown counsel made further concessions in respect of the Waikato war:

The Crown has previously acknowledged that its representatives and advisers acted unjustly and in breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles in its dealings with the Kingitanga, which included iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae, in sending its forces across the Mangatawhiri in July 1863, and occupying and subsequently confiscating land in the Waikato region, and resulted in iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae being unfairly labelled as rebels.

The Crown advises that this concession will be addressed to iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae independently of any reference to the Kingitanga if it is shown during the course of the inquiry that iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae have rights in the Waikato rapatu district that are distinct from Waikato Tainui.<sup>56</sup>

The Crown acknowledged Ngāti Maniapoto’s ‘strong ties to the land north of the Puniu river.’ Accordingly, the Crown accepted that, ‘once the invasion of the Waikato began, Rohe Pōtae Māori were justified in taking up arms in defence of their lands and homes.’<sup>57</sup>

The prejudice caused by confiscation, the Crown acknowledged, was compounded by inadequacies in the Compensation Court it set up, and processes to investigate grievances were imposed without consultation.<sup>58</sup>

6.2.4 Claimant and Crown arguments

In this section, we consider the parties’ arguments in respect of the Taranaki and Waikato wars and the confiscations which followed. The issues for determination in this chapter fall out of the points on which the Crown and claimants disagree.

---

54. Memorandum 3.1.162, p 5.

55. Memorandum 3.1.192, p 3.

56. Statement 1.3.1, pp 44–45; submission 3.4.300, p 1.

57. Statement 1.3.1, p 47; submission 3.4.300, p 8.

58. Statement 1.3.1, p 49; submission 3.4.300, p 23.

More than 40 claims in this inquiry contain grievances related to raupatu.<sup>59</sup> While there are specific grievances which detail comprehensively the impact of raupatu on particular claimants and claimant groups, most of the claims concern issues set out in the generic submissions on raupatu and in claim-specific closings.<sup>60</sup> These include arguments that the Crown should have negotiated with the Kingitanga to avoid war and that the Crown was wrong to continue the war after the surrender of Ngāruawāhia. Claimants cited the significant number of Māori deaths and casualties and alleged that atrocities were committed by the Crown against non-combatants. Claims also concerned the destruction and appropriation of economic resources and personal property, and the confiscation of land and inadequacies of attempts at compensation. Claimants alleged the Crown attacked Ngāti Maniapoto specifically and sought to demonise Rewi Maniapoto.

Initially, the Crown argued that its concessions, together with previous Tribunal findings on raupatu, meant that it would be 'most useful for the Tribunal to focus on the effects that war and raupatu had on Rohe Pōtae Māori rather than the causes of the conflicts and the legality of the Crown's actions.'<sup>61</sup> In their closing submissions, the claimants rejected this approach as inadequate. A full review of the wars, including causes and the legality of Crown actions, was necessary 'to determine responsibility and total effects of these actions,' they said, not least because the Crown attributed responsibility for the wars, in part, to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Claimants said this was untenable, 'when all they were trying to accomplish was the ability to exercise their tikanga, their right.'<sup>62</sup>

6.2.4.1 The Taranaki war

In the Crown's submission, its concessions (cited above) did not apply to the participation of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the Taranaki war. This was because, in the Crown's view, their interests in the Taranaki district were 'away from Waitara, where the conflict arose.'<sup>63</sup> In other words, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were not fighting in defence of their lands and homes. The Crown's attack did not threaten them 'directly'. Instead, they 'became involved as a result of a decision on their part to support Wiremu Kingi, who opposed the Crown purchase of the Pekapeka Block [at Waitara], and took up arms against [the Crown] for that purpose.'<sup>64</sup> The Crown endorsed Belich's assessment that Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae iwi committed between one-third and a half of their 'fighting strength' to Taranaki, which amounted to 'something more than just support for Kingi's rights'. Crown coun-

---

59. Wai 537; Wai 1534; Wai 1976, Wai 1996, Wai 2070; Wai 440; Wai 457; Wai 551, Wai 948; Wai 846; Wai 1098; Wai 1099, Wai 110, Wai 1132, Wai 1133, Wai 1136, Wai 1137, Wai 1138, Wai 1139, Wai 1798; Wai 1469, Wai 2291; Wai 1593; Wai 2068; Wai 784; Wai 972; Wai 1482; Wai 1523; Wai 800; Wai 1606; Wai 535; Wai 691, Wai 788, Wai 2349; Wai 729; Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146; Wai 366, Wai 1064; Wai 555, Wai 1224; Wai 575.

60. Submission 3.4.15; submission 3.4.127; submission 3.4.130(e), pp 10–19.

61. Statement 1.3.1, p 44.

62. Submission 3.4.391, pp 3–4; submission 3.4.127, p 17.

63. Submission 3.4.300, pp 3, 7.

64. Submission 3.4.300, p 7.

sel did not explain what that ‘something more’ might be.<sup>65</sup> The Crown accepted that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori lost lives and expended resources in Taranaki, but again submitted that this was not a war which ‘extended into the Rohe Pōtae itself’.<sup>66</sup>

The claimants disagreed that the Crown should draw a distinction in this way between the Taranaki and Waikato wars. As a general point, claimant counsel submitted: ‘The justification of Maori defence of Maori land must apply regardless of from where those interests emanated’.<sup>67</sup> More particularly, the claimants argued that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori fought in Taranaki to assist their kin and protect their southern boundaries.<sup>68</sup>

6.2.4.2 The Waikato war

As noted above, the Crown has accepted that it acted unjustly and in breach of the Treaty in its dealings with the Kīngitanga (including Te Rohe Pōtae Māori) when it invaded the Waikato in July 1863, occupied land, confiscated land, and labelled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as ‘rebels’. Further, the Crown extended this concession to apply to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, over and above their allegiance to the Kīngitanga, because they had been ‘justified in taking up arms in defence of their lands and homes’.<sup>69</sup> According to Crown counsel, this removed any need for the Tribunal to comment on the lawfulness of the Crown’s attack on the iwi of Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>70</sup>

Although these concessions were significant, they did not address many of the issues in dispute between the Crown and claimants. The Crown’s closing submissions also appeared to qualify its concessions. First, the Crown argued that it tried to avoid war and negotiate an accommodation with the Kīngitanga, including direct negotiations and the offer of self-government institutions. The latter ranged from Governor Grey’s ‘New Institutions’<sup>71</sup> to the possibility of establishing native provinces with a role for the King.<sup>72</sup> Secondly, the Crown submitted that its invasion of the Waikato occurred because in 1863 ‘some Māori were seen to be threatening settlers and Māori who supported the Crown’.<sup>73</sup> In particular, the Crown said that it was justified in its fears of an attack on Auckland, given the resumption of war in Taranaki and the threats made by ‘some Kīngitanga Māori (notably Rewi Maniapoto)’. Crown counsel noted that there was debate ‘as to how real the threat to the Auckland district actually was’, but argued that it was taken very seriously by settlers and the officials responsible for their protection.<sup>74</sup> Thirdly, the Crown argued that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori did not act strictly defensively in response to its

65. Submission 3.4.300, p 7.

66. Submission 3.4.300, p 15.

67. Submission 3.4.391, p 5.

68. Submission 3.4.208, p 8; submission 3.4.208(a), p 44.

69. Submission 3.4.300, pp 1, 8.

70. Statement 1.3.1, p 44.

71. Grey’s ‘New Institutions’ were established in 1861–1862. They included State-sponsored rūnanga which would work in conjunction with a civil commissioner (at the regional level) and a magistrate (at the local level) to exercise statutory powers of self-government.

72. Submission 3.4.300, pp 9–11.

73. Submission 3.4.300, p 3.

74. Submission 3.4.300, pp 5–6.

invasion, pointing to a ‘campaign’ of raids against soldiers and out-settlers once the Crown’s forces had entered the Waikato.<sup>75</sup>

The claimants strongly disagreed with the Crown’s position. In their view, the Crown’s concessions did not go far enough, and it was still necessary for the Tribunal to report fully on all issues – including the legality of the Crown’s actions in making war upon them.<sup>76</sup> The claimants made the following arguments:

- ▶ The war was avoidable but the Crown failed to take any of the options available to ‘negotiate and avoid conflict’, and in fact Governor Grey was bent on war from the beginning of his governorship.<sup>77</sup>
- ▶ Grey’s ‘New Institutions’ were intended to dominate Māori (rather than give them self-government), and the failure to provide native provinces was caused by a fear of retarding settlement.<sup>78</sup>
- ▶ The Crown ‘demonised’ Rewi Maniapoto and Ngāti Maniapoto, and used their expulsion of Gorst and a ‘trumped up plan to invade Auckland’ to justify the war, and the Crown today still attributes part of the responsibility for the war to Māori.<sup>79</sup>
- ▶ The Crown’s invasion of the Waikato in July 1863 was actually caused by its determination to ‘extinguish’ the Kīngitanga by force, establish British control, suppress rangatiratanga, and open up lands for colonisation – with an explicit intention to confiscate land and use it for Pākehā settlement.<sup>80</sup>
- ▶ The Crown’s invasion forced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to fight a ‘defensive war’ – that is, a war in defence of their lands, homes, authority (tino rangatiratanga), and way of life against unjustified Crown aggression. They were wrongly labelled ‘rebels’ as a result.<sup>81</sup>

6.2.4.3 The Crown’s conduct of the Waikato war

The parties also disagreed strongly about the Crown’s conduct of the Waikato war. In the claimants’ view, the Crown’s conduct was particularly egregious, including unreasonably prolonging it by refusing opportunities to negotiate. The claimants provided detailed submissions about alleged massacres at Rangiaowhia (including women and children) and Ōrākau. They also gave detailed submissions about the Crown’s failure to negotiate after Ngāruawāhia was abandoned, its allegedly wanton destruction of a treasured meeting house (Hui Te Rangiora), and other aspects of Crown actions during the Waikato war. Some claimants accused the Crown of

75. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

76. Submission 3.4.127, p 17; submission 3.4.281, pp 26–27; submission 3.4.391, pp 3–4.

77. Submission 3.4.130(e), pp 12–13; submission 3.4.391, pp 4–5, 7.

78. Submission 3.4.391, p 6; submission 3.4.281, pp 22–23.

79. Submission 3.4.391, pp 3–4; submission 3.4.130(e), p 14; submission 3.4.198, p 18; submission 3.4.208, pp 6–7.

80. Submission 3.4.130(e), pp 12–13; submission 3.4.208, pp 6–7; submission 3.4.198, p 18; submission 3.4.228, pp 40–41; submission 3.4.281, p 29.

81. Submission 3.4.228, p 40; submission 3.4.208, p 11.

atrocities such as deliberately infecting prisoners with smallpox and sending them home to spread the disease.<sup>82</sup>

The Crown denied almost all of these claims. Crown counsel did not accept that there was clear willingness on the part of rangatira to negotiate or to accept its terms after Rangiriri (when Ngāruawāhia was abandoned). Further, the Crown argued that there was no evidence before the Tribunal about the appropriate standards of war in the 1860s. The Crown acknowledged that there were numerous casualties in the Waikato war, and property was destroyed, taken, or damaged. However, there was no evidence, the Crown submitted, to demonstrate that women or children were killed at Rangiaowhia, or that there was an agreement it would not be targeted. Nor did the evidence sustain allegations of deliberate smallpox infection. At Ōrākau, the Crown acknowledged the high proportion of killed to wounded. Although the reasons for this were not clear, the Crown accepted that ‘it may be that some Māori men and women were killed out of hand’.<sup>83</sup>

6.2.4.4 Confiscation and compensation

Despite the concessions it made on confiscations in Taranaki and Waikato (noted above) and acknowledging that Ngāti Maniapoto had ‘strong ties to the land north of the Puniu river’, the Crown made no specific acknowledgements regarding either the extent of its confiscations in either region or whether any particular Te Rohe Pōtae iwi or hapū had lost lands.<sup>84</sup> Indeed, the Crown contested the ability to bring raupatu claims of some claimants who asserted interests in the Waikato raupatu district (see chapter 1). Although the Compensation Court process had inadequacies, the Crown said, the Confiscated Lands Act 1867 and the Waikato Confiscated Lands Act 1880 enabled land to be provided to surrendered or former rebels, and it established the Sim commission in 1926 to inquire into grievances related to confiscations.<sup>85</sup>

Because the Crown began the war, the claimants said, the Crown’s actions should be ‘subject to strict liability for subsequent damage’.<sup>86</sup> In the claimants’ view, war and confiscation formed a single process with one desired outcome: ‘the seizing of Māori land from those Māori whom the Crown alleged were in a state of rebellion’. Confiscation was intended for the benefit of settlers and planned as a speculative operation, the claimants said, and between 120,000 and 130,000 acres in Waikato were said to have been confiscated from Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Paretekawa, and Ngāti Ngutu as a result.<sup>87</sup> The claimants also argued that the confiscations in Waikato were not carried out in accordance with the legislation and

---

82. Submission 3.4.127; submission 3.4.130(e); submission 3.4.198; submission 3.4.189; submission 3.4.134; submission 3.4.169(a); submission 3.4.228; submission 3.4.208, pp 13–14.

83. Submission 3.4.300, pp 12–13, 19–20; statement 1.3.1, p 48.

84. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

85. Submission 3.4.300, pp 24–25.

86. Submission 3.4.130(e), p 14.

87. Submission 3.4.127, p 12; submission 3.4.410, p 9; submission 3.4.130(e), pp 17–18; submission 3.4.208, p 14; submission 3.4.230, pp 5–6; submission 3.4.228, p 53.

that the Crown offered no opportunities to negotiate or establish culpability.<sup>88</sup> The claimants made detailed submissions on the shortcomings of the Compensation Court, which overall, in their view, constituted a serious Treaty breach because it ‘assisted in the breakdown of the Māori social structure’, and on the inability of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to participate in inquiries such as the Sim commission.<sup>89</sup>

6.2.4.5 Prejudice

The Crown acknowledged a ‘high level of responsibility for the effects of war and raupatu’ on the people of Te Rohe Pōtae. These effects were significant and ranged from loss of property and resources, to social and political disruption and the loss of innocent lives.<sup>90</sup> Yet, the Crown argued, not all of the adversities confronting Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the years following the war could be laid at its feet.<sup>91</sup> Crown counsel also introduced a series of qualifications related to uncertainty about the number of Māori casualties and the assessment of the social and economic effects of the war on those within the aukati, which had the effect of drawing back from its broader concessions.<sup>92</sup>

The claimants maintained that the Crown’s assessments of prejudice did not go far enough.<sup>93</sup> Claimant counsel submitted that the Crown’s qualifications not only served to minimise the war’s impact on Te Rohe Pōtae but also marginalised tangata whenua kōrero.<sup>94</sup> The effects listed by the Crown did not take into account the range of psychological and cultural consequences such as the erosion of and damage to tribal identities, loss of reo, waiata, tikanga, and whakapapa. Nor did the concessions capture the full scope of social and economic prejudices suffered by those dispossessed of their ancestral lands, as well as the deprivations and strain on resources, already depleted significantly through war, that occurred from hosting the refugees.<sup>95</sup>

6.2.5 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry and briefly summarised the parties’ arguments, we now identify the issues for us to determine.<sup>96</sup> Each issue question is the subject of analysis in a section of this chapter. The issues regarding confiscation will be outlined in a later section. The Crown’s early and relatively extensive concessions on raupatu issues are helpful and welcome. Nonetheless, many issues remain in dispute between the parties, as will be evident from the summary of their arguments above. The issues for determination are:

---

88. Submission 3.4.208, p 6; submission 3.4.127, pp 30, 34.

89. Submission 3.4.127, pp 35–39.

90. Submission 3.4.300, p 21.

91. Submission 3.4.300, p 21.

92. Submission 3.4.300, pp 22–23.

93. Submission 3.4.391, p 3.

94. Submission 3.4.391, pp 3–10.

95. Submission 3.4.127, p 40; submission 3.4.130(b), pp 16–17.

96. Statement 1.4.3, pp 22–26.

- ▶ Why was the Kīngitanga established, and what was the Crown's response to the Kīngitanga before the Taranaki war?
- ▶ Why did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori go to fight in Taranaki, were they justified in their support for Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke at Waitara, and what were the outcomes for them?
- ▶ Did the Crown try to avoid war in Waikato, and were there opportunities for the Crown to recognise Kīngitanga authority in 1861–1863?
- ▶ Was the Waikato war partly caused by Māori and, in particular, was there a credible threat of an attack on Auckland?
- ▶ Was the Crown's conduct of the war disproportionate or egregious, especially at Rangiaowhia and Ōrākau?
- ▶ Why did Ngāti Tūwharetoa participate in the Waikato war, and were they justified in doing so?
- ▶ Why did the Crown confiscate land from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and how did it carry out its confiscations and subsequent efforts to provide compensation?
- ▶ What prejudice did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori suffer from the Crown's Treaty breaches?

6.3 THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE KĪNGITANGA

The establishment of the Kīngitanga in the late 1850s is a fundamental issue for all of the matters dealt with in this chapter. In 1863, the Crown invaded the Waikato to suppress the Kīngitanga by force, resulting in the Waikato war of 1863–1864, the expulsion of the King and many of his people to live in exile in Te Rohe Pōtae, and the confiscation of 1.2 million acres of land north of the Pūniu River. From the beginning, the Crown was concerned about the election of a Māori King, but it was the Taranaki war which turned that concern into a determination to suppress the Kīngitanga – by force if necessary. In this section, we provide a very brief account of how and why the Kīngitanga was established and explain the Crown's attitude towards the Kīngitanga (often called the 'King Movement' by Pākehā at the time), prior to the Taranaki war.

6.3.1 The establishment and purposes of the Kīngitanga

We received a great deal of evidence from kaumātua and kuia on the establishment of the Kīngitanga, including the evidence of the late Dr Tui Adams, Rovina Maniapoto-Anderson, Harold Maniapoto, Dr Tom Roa, and Paranapa Otimi. We acknowledge that there are a number of accounts of foundation hui and other events leading up to the recognition of Pōtatau Te Wherowhero as the first Māori King, and many of them differ in their particulars.

At our kōrero tuku iho hearings, Dr Roa told us that the Kīngitanga was established 'to retain the land, to stop the shedding of blood and to maintain Mana Māori Motuhake'.<sup>97</sup> 'Mana', he explained, was the 'operative word . . . here' in Te

---

97. Transcript 4.1.1, p108.

The Pukawa Hui, 1856

After Pōtatau Te Wherowhero was chosen as King at the Pukawa hui in 1856, Te Heuheu Iwikau performed a haka, indicating some of the overriding concerns which had led to the creation of the Kīngitanga:

Ka ngapu te whenua	When the land is put asunder
Ka ngapu te whenua	When the land is put asunder
Ka haere ngā tangata ki hea?	Where shall the people stand
Aua	Aua
Ko Rūaimoko	Oh Rūaimoko
Tawhia!	Hold it
Puritia!	Grasp tightly to the land
To mana kia mau!	Be firm
Kia ita! Aha Ita! Ita!	Let not your mana, your land
Kia mau tonu!	Be torn from your grasp! <sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document J22 (Otimi and Chase), p [14].

Rohe Pōtae, instead of (or equivalent to) the concept of ‘tino rangatiratanga’.<sup>98</sup> The Taranaki Tribunal noted that the words ‘te mana Maori motuhake’ were ‘emblazoned on the King’s crest’, and considered the Kīngitanga ‘an affirmation of the Treaty’s terms’, in that ‘the right of Maori to retain their lands and authority was Treaty guaranteed’.<sup>99</sup>

One of the key motivating forces in the Kīngitanga’s establishment was the growing concern about the Crown’s purchases of Māori land, the tactics used, and the seemingly unchecked spread of settlement. This concern was exacerbated by the exclusion of rangatira from the exercise of state power, and the exclusion of all Māori from representation in the settler Parliament, which first sat in Auckland in 1854 (see section 3.4.5.3).<sup>100</sup> Dr Roa explained that Tamihana Te Rauparaha and Matene Te Whiwhi of Ngāti Toa and Ngāti Raukawa began the search for a king in the early 1850s.<sup>101</sup> This culminated in the great hui at Pukawa in the Taupō district in 1856.<sup>102</sup>

---

98. Transcript 4.1.1, p108.

99. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 63, 64.

100. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 224–225, 230; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp 194–195.

101. Transcript 4.1.1 [Roa], pp 218–222. See also document 112 [Te Hiko], p 3.

102. See document A110 [Maniapoto O&T report], pp 478–491; doc A23, pp 173–216; doc A23(a) (i), pp 681–687 (Pei Te Hurinui Jones, ‘The Maori King Movement’, no date); Pei Te Hurinui, King Pōtatau: An Account of the Life of Pōtatau Te Wherowhero the First Māori King (Wellington: Huia Publishers, 2010), pp 187–191.

At the Pukawa hui, called ‘Hinana ki uta, Hinana ki tai / Search the land, search the seas’, it was said that 3,000 to 4,000 people attended from around the North Island.<sup>103</sup> Mr Paranapa Otimi of Ngāti Tūwharetoa explained that the rangatira debated for three days, plaiting strands of flax to make one rope (binding their maunga together in unity), at the end of which Te Wherowhero of Waikato was chosen to be King.<sup>104</sup>

Dr Tui Adams explained that Te Wherowhero did not immediately accept the position of King in 1856. He ‘responded that he would have to go back to his kau-maataua and tuakana for approval and advice before he would accept such a role.’<sup>105</sup> Te Wherowhero descended from Maniapoto via Te Kanawa Whatupango and is said to have told the rangatira at Pukawa:

‘The sun has set’ an allusion to the fact that he was now too old. Wiremu Tamihana replied, ‘The sun sets in the evening, but rises again in the morning.’ Te Wherowhero replied, ‘Let me return to my elders and my senior cousins’ (in the King Country). Wiremu Tamihana replied ‘Why should you return to those your senior cousins when you have the whole country here supporting you on this Marae?’<sup>106</sup>

Dr Adams’ kōrero helps to explain the events of 1857, when Ngāti Maniapoto were ‘instrumental’ in the establishment of the Kingitanga and resolved to give their ‘full support to Te Wherowhero to become King.’<sup>107</sup> This happened at a hui at Haurua. As noted above, there are different accounts of this hui.<sup>108</sup> Briefly, Dr Tui Adams explained:

Later in Haurua, near Waitomo within the heart of Ngaati Maniapoto country, Te Wherowhero and many of the chiefs from the initial Pukawa hui met and discussed whether he would be king. This hui was called Te Puna o te Roimata (the wellspring of tears). The kaumaataua and tuakana of Te Wherowhero were present at that hui and they resolved to support him.<sup>109</sup>

We do not have space here for a full discussion of these events, the outcome of which was the installation of Te Wherowhero as the first Māori King during 1858 and 1859.<sup>110</sup> Suffice to say that the various accounts confirm that the purposes of the Kingitanga were to ‘stem the bloodshed within the tribes, [t]o stop loss of Maaori

---

103. Document J22 [Otimi], pp [11]–[13].

104. Document J22, pp [13]–[14].

105. Document A46 [Adams], pp 4–5.

106. Document A52(a) [Adams], pp 5–6.

107. Document A110, p 603; doc A52(a), p 6.

108. See, for example, document A110, pp 479–486.

109. Document A46, p 5.

110. See the accounts collated and discussed in document A110, pp 478–491. See also document A23, pp 173–216; Te Hurunui, King Pōtatau, pp 193–217.

land, and [t]o unite the tribes of the motu, and at its inception the Kingitanga was not seen as hostile to the Queen or to Pākehā.<sup>111</sup> Dr Tom Roa explained:

Ka whakawahia a Pōtatau Te Wherowhero hei Kīngi Māori. Ko tōna kaupapa he pupuri i te whenua, he pupuri i te toto, he pupuru i te mana Māori motuhake. He whakakotahi i tana iwi Māori.

Ka mutu te whakawahinga, ko tā Pāora o Waikato me tautoko te Kīngi e te iwi. Ko tāna mahi he rukeruke i te kino, te karo i te ringa o te tangata mahi kino. Ko tā Te Awarahi o Ngāti Pou, 'Me tua a Pōtatau hei matua atawhai i tana iwi'. Ko tā Te Heuheu Tūkino o Tūwharetoa, 'Me noho kia kotahi a Kīngi Pōtatau, rāua ko Kuini Wikitōria. Ki runga rawa ko te whakapono ki a Ihu Karaiti, ā, ko te ture, hei whāriki mō ōna waewae mō ake tonu atu'.

Ka mutu, ka tū a Pōtatau, ko tāna kupu, 'Ae, e whakaae ana ahau mō tēnei wā, haere ake. Kia kotahi anake te kōwhao o te ngira e kuhuna ai he miro mā, he miro pango me te miro whero. Ā muri, kia mau ki te whakapono, kia mau ki te ture me te aroha, hei aha te aha, hei aha te aha'.

Pōtatau was anointed as a Māori King. His role was to hold the lands, to hold the blood, and to hold on to Māori independence. Also, to unite his Māori people.

After the anointing, Pāora of Waikato said the people should support the King. His task would be to cast away evil and to parry the hand of the evil-doer. Te Awarahi of Ngāti Pou said, 'Pōtatau should stand as a kind parent to his people.' According to Te Heuheu Tūkino of Tūwharetoa, Pōtatau should be as one with Queen Victoria. Above both should be the faith of Jesus Christ, and behold, the laws should be a blanket for his feet forever after.

After they had finished, Pōtatau stood and these were his words: 'Yes, I accept for this period going forwards. Let there be only one hole in the needle through which the red, black, and white threads pass. In the time to come, hold fast to the faith, to the law, and to compassion, whatever may happen.'<sup>112</sup>

In considering the decision to fight in Taranaki in 1860, it is crucial to understand these events of 1856–1859, the support of Ngāti Maniapoto for the Kingitanga, and the peaceful intentions of those who raised Pōtatau and placed their lands under the King. Mr Otimi explained this latter point: 'The Kingitanga tribes placed the whenua under the protection of the King. And yet while they acted collectively to protect their lands, they maintained their mana and autonomy over the land.'<sup>113</sup> We note, however, that not all of Ngāti Maniapoto supported the King; some Mōkau hapū and leaders did not do so until the invasion of Waikato in 1863.<sup>114</sup>

111. Document A46, p6; doc H17(e) [Harold Maniapoto], p5; doc A110, pp 478–491; doc A23, pp 214–215.

112. Transcript 4.1.1 [Roa], p 222. Tribunal translation.

113. Document J22, p [16].

114. Document A28(c), p 8; doc A28 [Thomas], pp 137–138.

The Kingitanga established self-government institutions (or incorporated existing tribal institutions). The King's council, which played an important role in formulating a united position among Kingitanga leaders, was established at Ngāruawāhia. Tribal rūnanga made local laws, regulated tribal affairs according to tikanga, adjudicated on important matters (including disputes between Māori and any local settlers), and were – above all – to maintain mana and autonomy with respect to land and people.<sup>115</sup> Rewi Maniapoto raised the King's flag at the coronation in 1858, and was a member of the King's council (and also claimed to have designed his seal).<sup>116</sup> Paul Meredith explained that Rewi Maniapoto's rūnanga was at Kihikihi, where it met in the whare rūnanga Hui Te Rangiora:

I tōna hokinga ki Kihikihi i whakatūria e Rewi tōna ake rūnanga i raro i te maru o te Kingitanga, ara ko te Rūnanga o Kihikihi tenei i tū ai i tōna whare rangatira ko Hui-te-rangi-ora . . . Ko Rewi te tumuaki, otiia rā ko te tokomaha o tenei Rūnanga e 40 ōna mema. He tini ngā ture i mahia e tēnei rūnanga mō te waipiro, mō te kōrero teka, mō te tahae me te tini atu. He nui noa iho te mahi o tēnei rūnanga i te ao i te pō ki te whakatakoto tikanga hei pēhi mō te he, hei whakatū mō te tika.

When Rewi returned to Kihikihi he established his own Council under the auspices of the King movement. This was the Council of Kihikihi housed in his principal meeting house – Hui-te-rangi-ora . . . Rewi was the chair of some 40 members of this Council. The Rūnanga made a number of laws relating to alcohol, slander, theft, and many other things. The council worked tirelessly to suppress wrongs and promote uprightness.<sup>117</sup>

Thus, the Kingitanga represented and embodied self-government and it established institutions for that purpose, but by the end of the 1850s the question remained to be answered: how would the authority of Kingitanga rangatira over their lands and peoples relate to the authority of the Queen, her governor, and the settler Parliament?

At the various hui of the 1850s, missionaries and Government observers were present and reported their impressions and understandings of these events to the governor and Ministers. We turn next to consider briefly the Crown's attitudes towards the Kingitanga prior to the Taranaki war.

6.3.2 The Crown's attitudes towards the Kingitanga prior to the Taranaki war

Crucially, the Crown's view of the Kingitanga (and of the iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae) was transformed by the Taranaki war of 1860–1861, which we discuss in the next section. Before the war, Governor Browne essentially took a 'wait and see' attitude. Looking back in 1861, T H Smith stated that

115. Document A110, p 491.

116. Document A110, pp 495, 603.

117. Document A110, p 496. Translation by Dr Robert Joseph.

the Governor had acted on the advice of their late chief Potatau and refrained from making the Maori King movement a cause of quarrel while no positive mischief came of it. He had therefore confined himself to an intimation of his disapproval and to warning its promoters.<sup>118</sup>

The governor's advisers at the time tended to perceive the Kingitanga from two different (but not necessarily contradictory) perspectives. On the one hand, some of his European informants saw the establishment of the Kingitanga as part of a 'nationalist urge or instinct on the part of Maori communities to preserve and protect themselves against the threat posed by incoming settlers.'<sup>119</sup> According to the missionary John Morgan, the King's supporters feared that unless settlement could be 'arrested', they would soon be greatly outnumbered and 'then the Treaty of Waitangi would be set aside, and their lands seized by the English Government.'<sup>120</sup> This resulted in what Pākehā called a 'Land League' of non-sellers, which hoped the King movement would preserve their lands and independence.<sup>121</sup>

On the other hand, the King movement was seen as searching for new forms of law and government because – it was held – the Crown had failed to provide any. The Native Minister C W Richmond wrote in 1857 that 'aspirations for the maintenance of a separate nationality' were mixed up with imitation of British forms of government in the 'agitation for a Maori King':

Self constituted native magistrates are administering justice after European fashion in several of the Waikato villages. They are also desirous of trying their hands at legislation both in village assemblies and in even a larger meeting – a Maori General Assembly – which they desire the Governor to convene . . . I hear in it the voice of a people crying out to be governed – a people wary of anarchy and desiring guidance in the right way. I believe it is a movement which we may take possession of and turn to great uses but which if neglected will become dangerous. The Governor is inclined to shy at the name of 'King'. All his advisers agree that there is nothing in this name – that what is really of importance are these two things – the plainly asserted claim of national independence, and the plainly expressed desire for better government. We shall extinguish the first if we can satisfy the second. [Emphasis in original.]<sup>122</sup>

This view of the King movement resulted in F D Fenton's appointment as a resident magistrate in the Waikato in 1857–1858, which had to be cut short because

---

118. TH Smith, 'Notes of a Conversation with Tamati Ngapora and Patera at Mangere', 23 January 1861 (doc A23, p 340).

119. Document A23, p 220.

120. Reverend Morgan, letter, 9 October 1860, 'Minutes of Evidence: Report of the Waikato Committee', AJHR, 1860, F-3, p 105 (doc A23, p 219).

121. H Halse to Native Secretary, 16 October 1861, 'Reports on the State of the Natives in Various Districts', AJHR, 1862, E-7, p 10 (doc A23, p 220).

122. Richmond to Sewell, 16 June 1857 (doc A23, pp 239–240).

of the tensions arising from his efforts (including his snubbing of Pōtatau and his attempts to create a 'Queen party' in the district).<sup>123</sup>

Governor Browne's closest advisers in the Native Department, Donald McLean and T H Smith, advised him to simply ignore the King movement and leave it to die away.<sup>124</sup> In McLean's view, a policy of non-interference would allow the movement to 'undergo its experimental stages' and then collapse, crippled by the distrust and tribal rivalries which would cause all such 'future combinations' to fail.<sup>125</sup> Governor Browne later recalled McLean's 'frequent assurances that the Kingitanga "would die out"', adding: 'I was from the first moment alarmed at the King movement, though laughed at by the Missionary party & assured by McLean.'<sup>126</sup>

Browne toured the Waikato in April 1857, noting that he met everywhere with a 'determination to preserve a separate nationality and to appoint some great chief to defend it'. This was accompanied by a repudiation of the settler Parliament's authority 'but . . . there was very little sign of hostility to Europeans or to the Crown.'<sup>127</sup> It was clear, he wrote to the Colonial Office in May 1857, that they did not understand the term 'King' in the sense we use it; but though they constantly professed loyalty to the Queen, attachment to myself, and a desire for the amalgamation of the races, they did mean to maintain their separate nationality, and desired to have a Chief of their own election, who should protect them from any possible encroachment on their rights, and uphold such of their customs as they were disinclined to relinquish. This was impressed upon me everywhere; but only on one occasion, at Waipa, did any one presume to speak of their intended King as a Sovereign, having similar rank and power with Her Majesty; and this speaker I cut short, leaving him in the midst of his oration.<sup>128</sup>

According to Professor Alan Ward, Browne's main concerns were that the movement would attract 'militants' whom the leadership could not control, and that 'it would seek to control settlers [living] in their territory'. This, the governor feared, would be unacceptable to the settlers and result in a 'collision'.<sup>129</sup>

After withdrawing Fenton as magistrate in 1858, the Crown's policy towards the Kīngitanga became one of 'watchful inactivity and of careful avoidance of any provocation'.<sup>130</sup> By 1859, as events moved towards a crisis in Taranaki, nothing significant involving the Kīngitanga had caused any specific alarms. But nor, 123. Document A23(c) (O'Malley), pp 9–10; 'Despatches from the Secretary of State and the Governors of New Zealand', AJHR, 1862, E-1, p 7.

124. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 68, 71, 84.

125. McLean memorandum, 7 September 1857 (Wai 903 RO1, doc A143 (Loveridge), p 48).

126. Document A23, p 218. See also Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 68, 71.

127. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 66 (Alan Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"? Motives for Government Policies Towards the Kingitanga, 1857–1863', in Richard Boast and Richard Hill (eds), Raupatu: The Confiscation of Maori Land (Wellington: Victorian University Press, 2009), p 79.

128. Browne to Labouchere, 9 May 1857 (doc A23, p 255).

129. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 80.

130. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 76.

as Dalton put it, was ‘the Movement . . . dying a natural death in the Waikato, as McLean, Smith and some missionaries had expected.’<sup>131</sup> Henry Turton visited Waikato early in 1859 and reported that Pōtatau was ‘very strong in some of his remarks’ that ‘It can only be by some great mismanagement, that their affections, as a body, can be alienated from us.’ All the same, Turton did not think a magistrate would be welcome at Rangiaowhia. Henry Halse was appointed as visiting magistrate to lower Waikato, but based in Auckland.<sup>132</sup>

In July 1859 there was ‘one of the periodic alarms to which Auckland was subject’ as a result of rumours of an attack from the Waikato, but the rumours were groundless.<sup>133</sup> The following month, Governor Browne admitted that he was uneasy that the Kingitanga might become ‘a central rallying point in the event of war’, but it posed no immediate danger and gave no sign of ‘developing an aggressive spirit.’<sup>134</sup>

The King’s council issued a circular in November 1859 stating that no magistrates and no roads would be permitted in Kingitanga territories. This circular was signed by a number of rangatira, including Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>135</sup>

In sum, the Crown’s policy towards the Kingitanga after Fenton’s withdrawal was one of non-interference and ‘watchful inactivity’. It is impossible to say how long the Crown might have maintained this approach if the war in Taranaki had not happened. What is certain, however, is that the Taranaki war transformed the Crown’s view of (and policies towards) the Kingitanga and its supporters – especially Ngāti Maniapoto.

6.3.3 Treaty analysis and findings

In chapter 3 we discussed the distinct spheres of authority recognised by the Treaty of Waitangi. We determined that the Treaty provided for the Crown to exercise a significant new power – kāwanatanga. The Treaty modified Māori authority to the extent necessary for the Crown to control settlers and settlement. But the Treaty guaranteed the right of Māori to continue to exercise tino rangatiratanga. This meant that their pre-existing systems of law (tikanga) and authority (mana) continued. In turn, the Treaty created an obligation on the Crown to protect Māori communities in their possession of and authority over their territories, resources, and all other valued things. The Treaty did not diminish Māori authority, but affirmed it, and to the extent that the spheres of kāwanatanga and tino rangatiratanga overlapped or created tensions, negotiation was required.

The Taranaki Tribunal considered that by the 1850s it would have ‘seemed that Maori would have to combine if they were to achieve the relationship with the Government that was sought’ and that ‘although pan-tribal policy making had not

131. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 83–84.

132. Alan Ward, A Show of Justice: Racial ‘Amalgamation’ in Nineteenth Century New Zealand (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1973), pp 111–112; doc A23, p 220.

133. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 83.

134. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 83–84.

135. Evelyn Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana Rangatira (Wellington: Huia Publishing, 2002), p 174.

previously been regular before the arrival of Europeans, that was only because it had not previously been needed.<sup>136</sup> That Tribunal went on to state:

Accordingly, the Kingitanga was at once a new innovation and an extension of old values, a necessary development to deal with new variables that the old order could not control. Of even greater significance was the essential symbolism. It was not just that the Kingitanga stood for the right of hapū to retain their land and authority. It presaged especially of a partnership between Pakeha and Maori, where both could have a place and be respected. The Kingitanga was not anti-Pakeha, as those threatened by the thought of power-sharing often said. Rather, it demonstrated an essential difference between Maori and colonial Pakeha thinking, the latter being that unity comes from conformity, the former, that it comes from acknowledging differences and respecting them.<sup>137</sup>

Counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa submitted:

The Kingitanga was a political movement and an alliance, but importantly it was also an institution that aligned with tikanga Māori, in that constituent iwi and hapū who placed their whenua under the protection of the King maintained their mana and autonomy over their own lands and people even while they worked as an alliance to promote their common objectives.<sup>138</sup>

Our review of the evidence presented to us about the formation of the Kingitanga, summarised in section 6.3.2, supports these conclusions. It is clear to us from the way in which Pōtatau was chosen to be King, from the manner in which he accepted the burden (including his reliance on his Ngāti Maniapoto kin), and from the series of ceremonies at which his position was proclaimed, that the legitimacy of this new institution depended fundamentally on its recognition of tikanga and on the mana of the hapū and the rangatira who gave it their support.

Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira supported the King at Haurua, just as the leaders of Ngāti Tūwharetoa and other iwi had at Pukawa, not only because the movement sought to protect their rights to land and authority, but also because Pōtatau acknowledged their mana and so placed the Kingitanga within the existing Māori polity of relationships and obligations (see sections 2.4.3, 2.5.2.1). The rangatira who supported the King did not think that by doing so their authority was in any way diminished; rather, they understood the Kingitanga as a means to retain and enhance their mana. Te Rūnanga o Kihikihi, established by Rewi Maniapoto at Hui Te Rangiora under auspices of the King, was but one fulfilment of this purpose.

The Crown submitted that its initial response to the formation of the Kingitanga in the late 1850s 'was to develop policies that would attract its adherents back to

---

136. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 62, 63.

137. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 64.

138. Submission 3.4.281, p 13.

an acceptance of the Crown's authority'.<sup>139</sup> Although this could be said to describe Fenton's efforts to establish a 'Queen party' in Waikato in 1857 and 1858, the evidence shows the Crown made little attempt to engage directly with the Kīngitanga at this time. And in practice Fenton's efforts simply exacerbated divisions.

We concluded in chapter 3 that the exact relationship between Māori and Crown authority was not spelled out in the Treaty. The relationship was in the nature of a partnership and further discussions were required in order to bring into effect the specific legal or institutional arrangements that might be needed to provide for the ongoing exercise of both forms of authority. The Kīngitanga was entirely consistent with the new legal and institutional arrangements necessitated by the Treaty.

We disagree with the Crown's submission that the Kīngitanga represented a rejection of the Crown's authority by its Māori adherents. In our view, this perpetuates the misconception that the Kīngitanga (and, therefore, the authority of the hapū and the rangatira) was incompatible with the authority of the Crown. We acknowledge Governor Browne held genuine concerns over who was to control settlers. But what was required by the Treaty was negotiation as to how Kīngitanga and Crown authority might intersect.

By 1860, the Kīngitanga was still a new institution. How it would develop and operate in practice was by no means certain. In the Central North Island inquiry, Crown counsel accepted that it was both reasonable and possible for the Crown to have adopted and empowered Māori self-governing bodies in the 1850s and 1860s. In that Tribunal's view, including the Kīngitanga in the machinery of the State was among the options available to the Crown as a Treaty-compliant way for it to recognise and give effect to Māori autonomy.<sup>140</sup> Governor Browne himself acknowledged that supporters of the Kīngitanga professed their loyalty to the Queen.

Our analysis set out in section 6.3.3 shows that the Crown made no attempt to engage with Kīngitanga leaders on this basis. The governor's advisors explained the Kīngitanga variously as an attempt to protect Māori from the threat posed by European settlement and as a desire for better law and government. The Crown did little to address these valid concerns, and after Fenton's failure it resorted to 'watchful inactivity'. The underlying problem remained that the Crown was not prepared to engage with the Kīngitanga, as a Treaty partner, in a way that acknowledged Māori authority and autonomy.

We make no findings of Treaty breach at this stage of our analysis. What further opportunities presented themselves between 1861 and 1863 for the Crown to recognise Kīngitanga authority is a question we address in section 6.5.

6.4 WHY DID TE ROHE PŌTAE MĀORI GO TO FIGHT IN TARANAKI AND WHAT WERE THE CONSEQUENCES?

In its initial statement of position and concessions, the Crown suggested that its concessions on raupatu 'obviate[d] the need' for it to respond in detail 'to a number of issues.' It would be most useful, the Crown suggested, for the Tribunal to focus on the effects of raupatu on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'rather than the causes of the conflicts.'<sup>141</sup> We acknowledge these submissions but the Crown's position on the Taranaki war does require the Tribunal to report in some detail on the reasons why Te Rohe Pōtae Māori went to fight in Taranaki, and on the consequences for them.

139. Submission 3.4.300, p 9.

140. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 206.

The Crown conceded early in the hearings that the Taranaki war was an injustice. In closing submissions, the Crown said that before the outbreak of war in Taranaki Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were 'not in direct contact with the Crown and its forces'. Nevertheless, they took military action in 1860 in opposition to the Crown. During the course of the fighting in 1860 and 1861, Te Ātiawa, led by Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke, 'received supplies and armed support from various iwi' in Te Rohe Pōtae, 'most or all of whom were affiliated with the Kingitanga'. In its closing submissions, the Crown termed Te Rangitāke's people 'insurgents': those who rise in revolt against constituted authority; rebels who are not recognised as belligerents. We note that this submission was made in November 2014, three months after the Crown had accepted, in its deed of settlement with Te Ātiawa, that treating them as rebels was 'unfair'.<sup>142</sup>

The Crown noted James Belich's assessment of the the nature of 'Waikato' involvement in Taranaki. As we discuss further below, he estimated that 1,200 to 1,500 warriors from the north fought in Taranaki in 1860 and 1861. This 'probably represented between a third and a half of the total [fighting] strength of the Waikato or "core" Kingite tribes'. Such numbers, Belich said, 'can scarcely be considered an extremist minority', while the remainder did not necessarily remain at home because they were unwilling to fight. 'They may equally well have done so because greater numbers could not be maintained' in Taranaki.<sup>143</sup>

The Crown also noted Vincent O'Malley's statement that, 'when the Crown sought to take forcible possession of the land in March 1860, members of Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto subsequently fought in defence of Kingi's rights to Waitara'.<sup>144</sup>

An intention to defend Kīngi's rights, the Crown suggested, was not sufficient explanation. While the Crown did not advance any alternative explanations, it stated that involvement by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'amounted to something more than just support for Kingi's rights'.<sup>145</sup>

Drawing on these points, Crown counsel submitted that there were differences in the nature of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori involvement in the conflicts in Taranaki and Waikato:

Ngāti Maniapoto had strong ties to the land north of the Puniu river, which, as a result of the war, became the northern boundary of the Rohe Pōtae. Accordingly, the

---

141. Statement 1.3.1, pp 44–45.

142. Submission 3.4.300, p 3; Te Ātiawa and the Crown, 'Deed of Settlement of Historical Claims', 9 August 2014, p 29.

143. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 103–104; submission 3.4.300, p 7.

144. Document A23, p 114.

145. Submission 3.4.300, p 7.

Crown accepts that, once the invasion of the Waikato began, Rohe Pōtae Māori were justified in taking up arms in defence of their lands and homes.<sup>146</sup>

In contrast, the Crown said, while Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had land interests in Taranaki these were not at Waitara. The Crown's actions in Taranaki in 1860 and 1861, therefore, did not threaten Te Rohe Pōtae Māori directly. Members of Ngāti Maniapoto became involved as a result of a decision on their part to support Wiremu Kīngi, who opposed the Crown purchase of the Pekapeka Block, and took up arms against [the Crown] for that purpose.<sup>147</sup>

Thus, the Crown has not conceded that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were justified in taking up arms in the Taranaki conflict. No acknowledgement has been offered that it was unfair to label Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who fought there as rebels.<sup>148</sup> This leaves the principal issues still in contention between the parties.

6.4.1 How did the war in Taranaki begin?

The immediate cause of the fighting in Taranaki was the Crown's effort to enforce its claim to have purchased the disputed Pekapeka block on the south (or west) bank of the Waitara River, at its mouth. This was opposed by Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke, senior rangatira of Te Ātiawa. On 20 February 1860, an attempt to survey the external boundaries of the block was resisted by an unarmed group of 60 to 80 men and women, who seized the surveyors' instruments when they were placed on the ground. Lieutenant-Colonel Murray wrote to Te Rangitāke later that day:

This is rebellion against the Queen. I am most anxious that no harm should come to any Maories caused by your conduct; but I must tell you plainly that the Governor has ordered me to take possession of the land with soldiers, and I must obey him if you continue in opposition.<sup>149</sup>

Te Rangitāke set out his position in his reply, the following day:

You say that we have been guilty of rebellion against the Queen, but we consider we have not, because the Governor has said he will not entertain offers of land which are disputed. The Governor has also said, that it is not right for one man to sell the land

146. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

147. Submission 3.4.300, p 7.

148. For comparison, the Crown conceded in the Te Urewera inquiry that 'Ngai Tuhoe as a whole were not in "rebellion"': Wai 894 RO1, doc N20, topic 3, p 55. Consequently, that Tribunal said, debates surrounding Tuhoe participation in battles such as Ōrākau did not require their examination: see Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, vol 1, pp167–169.

149. Murray to Kingi, 20 February 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41, [2798], p 9 (IUP, vol 12) (Wai 143 RO1, doc A3, p 41); doc A23, p 315.).

to the Europeans, but that all the people should consent. You are now disregarding the good law of the Governor, and adopting a bad law.<sup>150</sup>

On 13 March 1860, troops were sent to begin cutting boundary lines for the block. They were ordered not to fire unless fired on.<sup>151</sup>

During the night of 15 March 1860, Te Rangitāke and his people built and occupied a pā, Te Kohia, on a corner of the block. British troops brought up two 24-pound guns and on 17 March they began to bombard the pā.<sup>152</sup>

Historians have argued that the proximate cause was merely a symptom of deeper and more intractable differences.<sup>153</sup> Dr O'Malley explicitly linked the dispute over Pekapeka and its broader implications:

once Browne had determined to override the collective wishes of Kingi and the other owners, the question soon became a more fundamental one as to whose will would prevail. That brought into focus issues of sovereignty versus rangatiratanga left unresolved since the time of the Treaty.<sup>154</sup>

In an oft-quoted passage from a despatch to the Secretary of State for the Colonies written in March 1860, Governor Browne claimed: 'I must either have purchased this land, or recognised a right which would have made W[illiam] King virtual Sovereign of this part of New Zealand.'<sup>155</sup> A year later, Browne confided to his diary: 'I regret the mental elation I felt in 1860 when I hoped & expected to put an end to many Maori difficulties by a vigorous and decisive act.'<sup>156</sup>

The governor framed the conflict as a question of who should exercise political authority. But that misrepresented what Te Rangitāke had said. What the governor understood to be a direct challenge to his authority and to the sovereignty of the Crown, Te Rangitāke saw as a matter of 'bad law'. The governor's actions at Waitara, if allowed to stand, meant that rangatira would be forced to give up authority to determine ownership and possession of land in accordance with tikanga.

The Taranaki Tribunal laid the immediate blame for the war with the governor:

The causes of war are many. In this case, however, they point generally to the conclusion that the Governor started it. Most especially, he disregarded Maori law and authority. Contrary to Maori law, and in disregard for Maori authority, he presumed to buy from one group, though to do so would affect all and when, by their own collective process, not all affected had agreed. Maori law and authority with regard to the 150. Kingi to Murray, 21 February 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41, [2798], p9 (IUP, vol 12) (doc A23, p 315).

151. Wai 143 ROI, doc A3, p 52

152. Document A23, p 318; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 82–83.

153. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 81; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 76–80; Danny Keenan, Wars Without End: The Land Wars in Nineteenth Century New Zealand (Auckland: Penguin, 2009), p 206.

154. Document A23, p 387; see also pp 303–319.

155. Browne to Duke of Newcastle, 22 March 1860, AJHR, 1860, E-3, p 18 (doc A23, p 311p 18).

156. Browne, diary, 12 October 1861 (doc A23, pp 391–392).

ownership and possession of land were Treaty guaranteed, and thus the Governor's actions, which caused the war, were contrary to the Treaty.<sup>157</sup>

The Taranaki Tribunal further found that the governor had acquired the land at Waitara 'unlawfully, that is, without proper regard for Maori custom as required by English law'. The governor's 'violent seizure of the block was also unlawful' and 'Wiremu Kingi was unjustly attacked'. The Tribunal added:

We have obtained the opinion of a senior constitutional lawyer in the matter, and we concur with his view that the opening of the war at Waitara was represented in an unlawful attack by the armed forces of the Crown on Maori not at that time in rebellion and that there was no justification for the Governor's use of force. We note further his view that, at the time, the Governor and certain officers were liable for criminal and civil charges for their actions.

The evidence for the view that the Governor was willing to go to war to settle the question of authority but that Maori were keen for peace is compelling.<sup>158</sup>

In 1927, the Sim commission had come to a similar view, emphasising the right of citizens to fight in self-defence when wrongfully attacked by the Crown:

The Natives were treated as rebels and war declared against them before they had engaged in rebellion of any kind, and in the circumstances they had no alternative but to fight in their own self-defence. In their eyes the fight was not against the Queen's sovereignty, but a struggle for house and home . . . The government was wrong in declaring war against the Natives for the purpose of establishing the supposed rights of the Crown under that purchase.<sup>159</sup>

The Taranaki Tribunal also considered the position of Te Ātiawa's southern Taranaki neighbours, including Ngāti Ruanui:

Given the background described, when the war began in the north, southern hapu had little practical option but to join in. The Governor's policy and intention were clear. They would not be able to retain their own homes or the status to which they were entitled under his policy and laws, and had thus to defend their own positions once Kingi was attacked.<sup>160</sup>

The Tribunal did not, however, address the situation of Te Ātiawa's northern Taranaki neighbours, including Ngāti Maniapoto, and whether they had 'little practical option but to join in.'<sup>161</sup> We turn to that question next.

---

157. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 78–79, see also pp 67–77.

158. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 80.

159. 'Confiscated Lands and Other Grievances' (Report of the Sim commission), AJHR, 1928, G-7, p 11 (Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 81).

160. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 80.

161. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 80.

6.4.2 How and why did some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (and other Kīngitanga groups) intervene in Taranaki in 1860–1861?

As outlined above, there was a stark disagreement between the parties about the Taranaki war. Crown counsel made no concession of Treaty breach in respect of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori participation in the Taranaki War (except in respect to confiscation), and did not concede that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were unfairly labelled as ‘rebels’ for their participation – an admission the Crown has made for various Taranaki iwi. Because the Crown has adopted this position, it is necessary for the Tribunal to make a detailed inquiry into why and how some Te Rohe Pōtae Māori intervened in Taranaki in 1860–1861.

Due to the controversial nature of the events of 1860–1863, in which both sides felt the need to justify and explain their actions at home and in Britain, a number of contemporary accounts have survived – from both Pākehā and Māori writers. We also have the benefit of oral traditions, some of which were shared with us by kaumātua and kuia during our hearings. The oral histories of participants or their descendants were also collected and recorded by James Cowan in his history of the wars. From these various accounts, it is clear that there were a number of reasons why Te Rohe Pōtae and other Kīngitanga groups found it necessary to intervene in Taranaki in 1860–1861. Those interventions were of different kinds:

- ▶ some sent supplies and provided other assistance, such as a sanctuary for the wounded at Mōkau;<sup>162</sup>
- ▶ some went to escort a delegation from Taranaki home;
- ▶ some went to give armed assistance;
- ▶ some (including Rewi Maniapoto) arranged a cessation of hostilities in 1861; and
- ▶ some tried to get an impartial inquiry by the British authorities to ensure the peaceful return of Waitara to Te Rangitāke’s people even after the fighting had ended.

In this section, we explore the reasons that were advanced for the intervention of Te Rohe Pōtae and other Kīngitanga groups, and evaluate the nature and extent of that intervention. We then address some of the consequences of intervention for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in section 6.4.3.

6.4.2.1 Fighting in defence of the Kīngitanga

In May 1859, the Manukorihi hapū at Waitara were visited by ‘an agent of the Maori King’, and a ‘strong party favoured adhering to the King’. They accepted the King’s flag in November 1859. Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke apparently threatened to return to Waikanae if they ‘persisted’.<sup>163</sup> For the most part, Taranaki iwi did not support the Kīngitanga in 1859. This position changed dramatically in 1860 after martial law was declared across the whole district, and the Crown’s troops

162. Document A28, pp140–141.

163. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 83; see also Thomas Buddle, The Maori King Movement in New Zealand with a full Report of the Native Meetings held at Waikato, April and May, 1860 (Auckland: The New Zealander, 1860), p 28.

marched on Waitara. In early March 1860, John Morgan advised the Government that a letter from Te Rangitāke had arrived at Mohoanui, seeking support from the Kīngitanga. He claimed it used most violent language, urging the Kīngitanga to rise and join him against the Europeans.<sup>164</sup>

A delegation of Te Ātiawa, Taranaki, and Ngāti Ruanui reached Ngāruawāhia on 10 April 1860. They were – in the words of a missionary observer, Thomas Buddle – ‘entrusted with the important duty of presenting the allegiance of those tribes to the Maori King, and of handing over their lands to the [land] league of which he is the head.’<sup>165</sup> They had come ‘for the King’s flag’, Buddle said, and they ‘handed over Waitara to the league.’<sup>166</sup>

Buddle added (in reference to subsequent events in Taranaki):

This is the reason assigned by the party who have gone to aid W King, for their having taken up arms in his defence; ‘Our flag is there,’ they say. Others of the extreme King party only wait to ascertain whether their flag reached Waitara before the Queen’s money was paid or after, declaring, that if the flag was first there the land shall not be given up, but that they shall go and take it. . . . [I]t now belongs to the land league, and . . . they consider he is engaged in fighting for the principles of that confederation.<sup>167</sup>

Setting aside Buddle’s interpretation of the Kīngitanga as a ‘land league’, a number of sources agree that the Waitara block was placed under the protection of the King, and that some Taranaki iwi pledged themselves to the Kīngitanga, receiving the King’s flag in return. TH Smith, the assistant Native Secretary, reported to the governor that the ‘Taranaki and Ngatiruanui deputation had arrived, and gone through the ceremony of tendering the allegiance of their respective tribes to the “Maori king”’.<sup>168</sup> The speeches of the Ngāti Ruanui leaders on this occasion intimated that ‘the affairs of these tribes being now entrusted to the management of the king’s council, they would be looked to, to find a way out of their present difficulties, and that they were responsible for bringing matters to a satisfactory issue.’<sup>169</sup>

A report in the Daily Southern Cross, dated 1 May 1860, noted that a Ngāti Maniapoto group saw the delegation safely home. Reference was made to the ‘earlier invitation issued by the Waikato tribes to join the King movement’ (in 164. Guy H Scholefield, The Richmond-Atkinson Papers (Wellington: Government Print, 1960), vol 1, p 532. Mohoanui is east of Ōtorohanga, near junction of the Waipā River and Mangawhero Stream. John Morgan was the CMS missionary based at Otawhao.

165. Buddle, The Maori King Movement in New Zealand, p 28; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 85. Note that ‘Taranaki’ here refers to the iwi proper and not iwi from Taranaki.

166. Buddle, The Maori King Movement in New Zealand, p 20.

167. Buddle, The Maori King Movement in New Zealand, p 20.

168. TH Smith, ‘Narrative of a Visit to Waikato’, not dated, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], p 36 (IUP, vol 12).

169. TH Smith, ‘Narrative of a Visit to Waikato’, not dated, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], p 36 (IUP, vol 12).

1859). The newspaper recorded that ‘Kingitanga flags had been made and sent to [Wiremu] King’,<sup>170</sup> and the Ngāti Maniapoto escorts felt ‘bound to shew their love to him’ as a result.<sup>171</sup> It may have been the earlier sending of the King’s flag in 1859 to which a Te Hokioi article referred in 1862:

Na, terongonga o nga Iwi katoa ki te ingoa o taua kara, e karangatia ana hei tohu mo te whakaaetanga, ki te pupuru whenua, ka tahi nga iwi katoa ka hiahia kia purutia o ratou pihi whenua, hei waiho tanga iho ki o ratou nei Uri i muri i a ratou na, ko Taranaki raua ko Ngati Ruanui nga Iwi i tae tuatahi atu nga kara ko ta ratou tohu i whakatu ai i mua hei tohu pupuru i Taranaki, he whare nui ko Taiporohenui te ingoa . . . kei ki koutou no muri i te tukunga a te Teira I tae ai te kara, ki Taranaki; kahore, ko te kara ano kua tae tua tahi, i muri ka tukua e te Teira te whenua ki te Kanawa.<sup>172</sup>

When all the tribes heard of the name of that flag and that it was a symbol of our agreement to hold our land then they all desired to retain their own land as an inheritance for their heirs after them. The Taranakis and Ngatiruanuis were the people to whom the flags were first sent and the first sign that they set up for holding Taranaki was a large house called Taiporohenui. . . . Therefore do not suppose that it was after Te Teira sold the land that the flag was sent to Taranaki. No the flag was sent first, and after that Teira sold the land to the Governor.<sup>173</sup>

The Native Secretary, Donald McLean, attended a hui at Ngāruawāhia in May 1860. He, too, noted that the King’s flag had been dispatched, and that the ‘upper Waikato [tribes]’ considered Waitara to be under the joint authority of the Kingitanga and Te Rangitāke – so long as the latter could show that he had a good title and the sale had ‘taken place since the king’s flag was sent there.’<sup>174</sup> These important considerations will be discussed further below.

Governor Browne certainly believed that ‘the Waikatos’ fought in Taranaki because of the allegiance tendered to the King: ‘the Waikatos have repeatedly announced both in public and private interviews with myself that they interfered in [Wiremu] King’s quarrel, not on account of any special sympathy with him, but because he had acknowledged the sovereignty of their king.’<sup>175</sup> Whether the governor really understood the full meaning of these ‘announcements’ is doubtful. He added that ‘the Waikatos’ had ‘seized upon’ this opportunity ‘for extending and giving effect to the authority of their king over the Ngatiawa tribe.’<sup>176</sup> This was his own interpretation, and nothing could be further from the truth, and was based

170. Document A23, p 326.

171. ‘Waikato’, Daily Southern Cross, 1 May 1860, p 2 (doc A23, p 326).

172. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 188.

173. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 189.

174. ‘Report by Mr McLean of Native Meeting on the Waikato’, 31 May 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], p 69 (IUP, vol 12).

175. Browne to Newcastle, 12 April 1861 (doc A23, p 346).

176. Browne to Newcastle, 12 April 1861 (doc A23, p 347).

on a misunderstanding of how tribal autonomy continued under the overarching protection and authority of the King.

In another account, Wiremu Tamihana explained to the governor why Te Wetini Taiporutu of Ngāti Hauā went to fight: 'It was not a gratuitous interference on the part of Waikato; they were fetched. They were written for by Wiremu Kingi and Hapurona by letter, and that was why Te Wetini Taiporutu went to war.'<sup>177</sup>

Gorst gave more details:

Tamihana by this time had ceased to doubt, and had become satisfied of the justice of Wiremu Kingi's cause, but he was not clear as to the right of Waikato to interfere in Kingi's behalf: at any rate he strongly dissuaded Wetini from going. He used religious arguments against war; he called a meeting of the tribe, at which Wetini's proposals found only nine supporters, and for the time succeeded in holding him back. But three weeks later, a letter came from Wiremu Kingi asking what was the use of sending him only a 'disembodied flag' [ie the King's flag] and why did they not personally come to help him. Wetini could bear it no longer, and in spite of his friend's arguments, denunciations, and prayers, set off with a considerable number of his tribe to the war.<sup>178</sup>

Thus, whatever the overall decision of the Kīngitanga leadership, not all tribal communities immediately (or unanimously) supported intervention in Taranaki. We return to this point below. But clearly the adherence of Te Ātiawa, Taranaki, and Ngāti Ruanui to the King in April 1860, and the placing of Waitara under the protection and authority of the King, led at least some to fight in defence of the Kīngitanga (as they saw it) against the Crown's aggression. The Taranaki Tribunal found that the Kīngitanga was 'committed to supporting Kingi' because he had 'placed his lands under the mana of the Maori King.'<sup>179</sup> It was not the case, however, that support would have been forthcoming, even for a tribe which had given its adherence to the King, if that tribe had been in the wrong. We consider that issue next.

6.4.2.2 Careful investigation followed by consensus

6.4.2.2.1 THE CROWN SEEKS SUPPORT AMONG MĀORI FOR ITS POSITION

It was not only Te Rangitāke who was sending letters and appealing for support. As the situation at Waitara descended into open warfare, the governor and his officials sought to ensure support for their stance. When the governor committed troops to enforce the survey of the Pekapeka block, he set out his position in a manifesto, published in Māori and 'widely circulated by special agents amongst all the Tribes in the Northern Island.' The key points in the Crown's manifesto were that the Crown had acquiesced in the reoccupation of 'Ngatiawa' after buying

---

177. Wi Tamehana Te Waharoa to governor, undated translation (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 221).

178. Gorst, The Maori King, p 148.

179. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 87.

the interests of the 'Waikato', that Te Teira and his supporters wanted to sell their pieces, and that Te Rangitāke and his people had tried to forbid the sale of land in which they had no interests. This, the governor said, was breaking the Queen's law, which allowed any person to sell their piece of land if there were no other claimants to it. Further, the manifesto stated that Te Teira had been paid and the land now belonged to the Queen. The land would have to be surveyed and the surveyors would be protected. Although the governor wanted peace, '[i]f William King interferes again, and mischief follows, the evil will be of his own seeking.'<sup>180</sup>

In reality, only a deposit had been paid and the purchase had not been completed, while Te Teira's supporters were only a minority of those who had rights in the block. The Government's foremost expert on land purchase, Donald McLean, took virtually no part in any negotiation or investigation between March 1859 and February 1860. That was left to Robert Parris, new to the role of district land commissioner, with limited knowledge of Māori customary tenure, and demonstrably ill-suited to the task.<sup>181</sup>

In addition to circulating this manifesto, the Crown sent officials to the Waikato to try to persuade the Kīngitanga tribes that Te Rangitāke was in the wrong and the governor's actions were fully justified. In April 1860, the assistant Native Secretary, T H Smith, attended hui at Ngāruawāhia to explain the Crown's position.<sup>182</sup> In the following May, it was the turn of the Native Secretary, Donald McLean.<sup>183</sup> The governor also called a national conference of chiefs at Kohimarama in July 1860, seeking their support for his position. By that time, the Kīngitanga tribes had investigated the matter and some had come to their own determination that Te Rangitāke was in the right, contrary to that of the governor. Armed parties had gone to Taranaki to fight. Dr O'Malley explained:

with the first Taranaki War already underway, in July 1860 Governor Browne convened a conference of chiefs from around the country at Kohimarama, close to central Auckland. Although it is often assumed that Kingitanga supporters were not invited to attend the conference, Wiremu Tamihana and others were invited, though others such as Rewi Maniapoto were not. In the event only a small number of rangatira from the Rohe Potae district attended. But from the government's perspective, the conference was not intended as an opportunity for open dialogue, leading to the prospect of reconciliation with the Kingitanga, but rather had been called in the expectation that those present would condemn the movement and uphold the government's handling of the Waitara dispute. Browne and his ministers failed to secure the kind of glowing endorsement of their position hoped for.<sup>184</sup>

---

180. Manifesto, AJHR, 1860, E-3E3, pp 21–22.

181. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 51, 67–76.

182. T H Smith, 'Narrative of a Visit to Waikato', not dated, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], pp 34–36 (IUP, vol 12).

183. 'Report by Mr McLean of Native Meeting on the Waikato', 31 May 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], pp 69–73 (IUP, vol 12); Buddle, The Maori King Movement, pp 57–58.

184. Document A23, p 302.

6.4.2.2.2 HOW DID THE KĪNGITANGA TRIBES COME TO A DECISION ?

The Taranaki Tribunal wrote that, in occupying Te Kohia pā, Te Rangitāke pursued a ‘necessary strategem’. According to tikanga, ‘support is not regularly available to an aggressor or to someone in the wrong’.<sup>185</sup> The governor had warned Colonel Gold at the beginning of March: ‘other tribes would join William King in a demand for utu if he could satisfy them that he had not been the first aggressor’.<sup>186</sup> Utu, the Tribunal said, was not revenge but ‘the maintenance of balance as a mechanism for harmony and peace’.<sup>187</sup>

Initially, it appears that many Ngāti Maniapoto were inclined to trust the governor. In particular, Mōkau leaders had a record of supporting peace in Taranaki because they sought trade and Pākehā settlers. In May 1860, the Government newspaper Te Karere published three letters of support from Mōkau Ngāti Maniapoto (with two more from elsewhere in New Zealand). The first, to Robert Parris from Takerei Waitara, Te Wetini, and Taati, was dated 16 March and stated their disagreement with ‘the proceedings of Wiremu Kingi and Ngatiawa’ (‘e he ana te ritenga a Wiremu Kingi, a te Ngatiawa’).<sup>188</sup> The second, written 10 days later, was to McLean from Hone Eketone. It was sent with the stated support of Takerei Waitara, Hikaka, Tikaokao, Te Motutapu, Ngatawa, and Te Wetini, and responded to an earlier letter from McLean about ‘te mahi a Wiremu Kingi’ (the work of William King). Eketone told McLean:

Tena te tangata e tukua mai e nga rangatira o Ngatimaniapoto, ko Timoti te ingoa; e haere atu ana ki te kawae atu i nga kupu pai ki a Wiremu Kingi, kia whakamutua taua mahi he. Kei rapurapu koutou ki a ia, e haere ana i runga i te rangimarie, he puru atu i Taranaki kia noho atu.

The chiefs of Ngatimaniapoto have sent a person, whose name is Timothy, with good advice to William King, recommending him to put a stop to his evil work; don’t be doubtful of him, he goes on a peaceful mission to Taranaki to recommend them not to interfere.<sup>189</sup>

The third letter, written on 29 March 1860 and also from Hone Eketone, assured the missionary John Whiteley:

Kia rongoa mai koutou, ekore rawa a Ngatimaniapoto e porangi ki tena mahi pouri a Waikato.

---

185. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 77–78.

186. Browne to Gold, 3 March 1860, BPP, vol 12, p 13; Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 77–78.

187. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 77–78.

188. Te Karere Maori, 31 May 1860, p 8. These three men in the 16 March letter appear to be among those listed as invited to Kohimārama in July, but who did not attend: doc A23, pp 278–279.

189. Te Karere, 31 May 1860, p 8.

Kia rongō mai koe, ka puru tenei taha, no te mea, 'ko te marae tenei o Hine.' He whakatauki tena, he marae oranga tangata, na Maniapoto tenei whakatauki. Ekore e pikitia e te kino tenei wahi; mau korero atu ki a Kawana enei whakaaro, ekore nga iwi e rapu ki te tikanga e whawhai ki te Pakeha.

The Ngatimaniapotos will not have anything to do with the foolish work of the Waikatos.

Listen. This side will be closed, because 'It is the inclosure of Hine.' This is a proverb of Maniapoto, an enclosure for the preservation of the people. Evil will not climb over this place. The people will not seek a war with the Europeans.<sup>190</sup>

As noted above, John Morgan had alerted the governor in early March that Te Rangitāke had written to seek support from the Kingitanga. Morgan noted:

At present I cannot discover any desire on the part of the Waikato natives to join Wiremu King – Still it is impossible to say in the event of fighting what might take place. During the last fortnight I have had several conversations with leading men of the maori king party. They say that even if a deposit was paid upon the land before the maori king party put forth its claim, the Wiremu King is in error & will not meet with any support from them, but if since that time the Govt. were wrong in purchasing without having the sanction of Potatau to the sale.<sup>191</sup>

Morgan added an update to this note a week later: 'The rapid movement of the Governor on Taranaki astonished the Waikato's. Up to the present time they do not appear at all disposed to join Wiremu King.'<sup>192</sup>

However, also in early March, the former resident magistrate in the Waikato, Francis Dart Fenton, noted sympathy for Te Rangitāke 'amongst the Waikatos.'<sup>193</sup>

A hui took place at Waiuku (west of Pukekohe) on 13 and 14 March 1860, 'at which most of the Waikato tribes assembled, including the Ngatimahuta, Te Ngaungau, Ngatihine, Ngatinaho, Ngatipo, Ngatitipa and Ngatiteata, with the natives from Mangere, and the other settlements on the Manukau.' The main topics of discussion were first, whether lower Waikato groups would join the 'confederation of tribes acknowledging Potatau as their head', and secondly, the situation

---

190. Te Karere, 31 May 1860, p 8. Te Marae o Hine is discussed in chapter 2. The term refers to an area of land given to Te Rongorito (younger sister of Maniapoto) in recognition of her peacemaking between Maniapoto and Matakore. Rereahu gifted her this land, which was east of Otorohanga. On this land, all violence was forbidden.

191. Morgan to C W Richmond, 5 March 1860 (Scholefield, The Richmond-Atkinson Papers, vol 1, p 533).

192. Morgan to C W Richmond, 13 March 1860 (Scholefield, The Richmond-Atkinson Papers, vol 1, p 534).

193. Emily Richmond to C W Richmond, 4 March 1860 (Scholefield, The Richmond-Atkinson Papers, vol 1, p 531).

in Taranaki.<sup>194</sup> A statement of the Government's position on Waitara, published in the 29 February issue of Te Karere, was read out. It said in part:

4. No Maehe, no te tau 1859, ka tukua nuitia mai ki te Kawanatanga e etahi o taua hunga noho to ratou wahi whenua ki Waitara.
  5. Whakauaua mai ana a Wiremu Kingi, mea ana, kua tetahi whenua i Waitara e hokona. Tena, kahore i a Wiremu Kingi te mana o te whenua; na, kahore he tikanga mo tana ki kia kua e hokona tetahi whenua ehara nei i a ia ake.
- . . . . .
12. Kua riro i a Te Teira he utu mo te whenua. No Te Kuini taua whenua inaianei.
  13. Kua peke mai a Wiremu Kingi ki te pana atu i te kai ruri a Te Kuini i haere atu ki te ruri i tona whenua. E kore e ahei te waiho kia penei noa iho he mahi pokanoa.
  14. Kua puta ta Te Kawana kupu ki a Te Teira, a e kore e mahue noa i a ia, a kia rite ra ano. Kua riro mai te whenua te hoko, a me ruri ano ia. Ko nga hoia a Te Kuini mana e tiaki te kai-ruri. Ki te peke mai ano a Wiremu Kingi, ki te aitua hoki, heoi, nana ano i kimi te he mona.
- . . . . .
4. In March, 1859, some of these [Ngatiawa] occupants, Te Teira and others, openly offered to sell to the Government their claims to a portion of the land at the Waitara.
  5. William King opposed this offer, and said that no land at the Waitara should be sold. But the 'mana' of the land was not with William King, and he had no right to forbid the sale of any land which did not belong to him personally.
- . . . . .
12. Payment for the land has been received by Te Teira. It now belongs to the Queen.
  13. William King has interfered to prevent the survey of the Queen's land by her own surveyors. This interference will not be permitted.
  14. The Governor has given his word to Te Teira, and he will not go back from it. The land has been bought and must be surveyed. The Queen's soldiers will protect the surveyors. If William King interferes again, and mischief follows, the evil will be of his own seeking.<sup>195</sup>

Letters from Te Rangitāke seeking assistance were also read out, and 'the meeting very generally came to the conclusion that William King was wrong in interfering with Te Teira.' However, doubt clearly lingered: 'It was proposed that a deputation should go to Taranaki to enquire into the real state of the case.'<sup>196</sup>

Te Huia Raureti of Ngāti Paretekawa later told James Cowan about another meeting to discuss the matter, this time at Hui Te Rangiora in Kihikihi. He named Rewi Maniapoto, his cousins Te Winitana Tupotahi and Raureti Te Huia Paiaka, Epiha Tokohihi, Hopa Te Rangianini, Pahata Te Kiore, Matena Te Reoreo, with

---

194. Te Karere, 15 March 1860, p 6.

195. Te Karere, 29 February 1860, p 3.

196. Te Karere, 15 March 1860, p 6.

several other chiefs, as the rūnanga of Ngāti Maniapoto who had been present. He went on:

The conclave of chiefs did not act hastily. Two delegates, Raureti te Huia Paiaka (father of the narrator) and Pahata te Kiore, were despatched to Taranaki by the runanga to investigate the dispute and its causes. Their inquiries satisfied them that Wiremu Kingi's cause was just. 'My father and Pahata', said Te Huia Raureti, 'came to a decision adverse to Ihaia te Kirikumara, the Government adherent, because he had taken sufficient utu for his personal wrongs (the seduction of his wife) by killing the offender, and there was no just cause (take) for parting with tribal lands in order further to involve Wiremu Kingi's people.'<sup>197</sup>

The explanation given by Te Huia is one of five recorded by Dr Parsonson, which deal with customary rights and contests that may have eluded Parris and Governor Browne. Three are from Pākehā sources and two by Māori, but all indicate that the sale of Waitara to the Government may have been, as Dr Parsonson put it, motivated less by a desire to come under the rule of the Government 'than with upholding the mana of their respective hapu, and that in the context of the ceaseless settler pressure for land at Waitara, their choice of land offers as a means to an end was not a surprising one.'<sup>198</sup>

One of the accounts cited by Dr Parsonson is from Edward Shortland:

It is a recognised mode of action among the Maori, if a chief has been treated with indignity by others of his own tribe, and no ready means of redress can be obtained, for the former to do some act which will bring trouble on the whole tribe. This mode of obtaining redress is termed 'whakahe,' and means putting the other in the wrong.'<sup>199</sup>

Shortland said he had been told by a Ngāti Hauā chief, Paora Te Ahuru, who fought in Taranaki, that this was why Te Teira offered to sell Waitara.<sup>200</sup>

Another account given to Cowan links the two:

A woman, Hariata, was the cause. She was the wife of Ihaia te Kiri-kumara, and because of her unfaithfulness Ihaia had her seducer, Rimene, killed . . . Because of the wrong done to him Ihaia sought for further revenge and sought compensation in land. The tribe would not agree to this, inasmuch as the offence had already been paid for sufficiently by the death of the man Rimene. Ihaia, however, would not listen to this agreement, and he joined with Teira and sold some of the land of Te Rangitaake to the Government in order to obtain compensation for the adultery of his wife.'<sup>201</sup>

197. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 184–185 (doc A23, pp 322–323).

198. Wai 143 RO1, doc A3, pp 6–10; doc A23, pp 304–307.

199. Edward Shortland, Maori Religion and Mythology, p 101 (Wai 143 RO1, doc A3, p 6).

200. Wai 143 RO1, doc A3, p 6.

201. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 157.

Te Huia Raureti and Pou-patate Huihi sang a waiata for Cowan, lamenting those later killed in the Taranaki war at Māhoetahi. Composed by a Ngāti Maniapoto woman named Hokepera, it includes these lines:

Tenei taku poho e tuwhera kau nei, he wai kokiringa mo
Kiri-kumara, te tangata whakanoho i te riri.
Te kino, e—e—i!

See now my unprotected breast, naked to the spear of Kiri-kumara. 'Twas he who raised this storm of war. Alas! The evil of it!<sup>202</sup>

The implication of Te Huia's statement is that, because the offer of land was prompted by a prior, customary motivation, the Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira determined who was in the right according to customary terms. Dr Parsonson called it 'interesting' that these explanations were never mentioned by Robert Parris as motives for Te Teira or Ihaia to sell land. The killing of Rimene, which occurred towards the end of 1854, was not unknown to the New Plymouth settlers, who saw it as another example of increasing lawlessness. Police officer Henry Halse wrote to McLean that Ihaia had 'trampled upon the white man's law.'<sup>203</sup>

Ngāti Maniapoto then travelled to Ngāruawāhia to discuss the question with Pōtatau and the King's council.<sup>204</sup> The timing of this approach is unclear, whether in April or May 1860. What is clear though, is that from March to May the Kingitanga tribes carefully investigated the facts of the dispute and debated whether or not to assist Te Rangitāke. The Ngāruawāhia hui of April 1860 was briefly discussed in the previous section in respect of the Taranaki delegation. According to Buddle's description, the delegation arrived on 10 April and was made up of Te Ātiawa and Ngāti Ruanui people, 'accompanied by Ngatimaniapoto from Kawhia, Rangiaohia and Upper Waipa'. There were about 60 men from Taranaki in a total party of 150 or so, including women and children. According to Buddle several near relatives of these men had already been killed in fighting.<sup>205</sup>

Speakers at the hui included Tapihana of Ngāti Hikairo, Karaka Tomo Te Whakapo from Rangiaowhia, Wiremu Hikairo of Waikato, Paetai of Kihikihi, Te Wetini of Ngāti Hauā, Ta Karei of Kāwhia, Wiremu Te Ake of Ngāti Hikairo, Te Kihirini of Te Kanawa, and Hari of Ngāti Maniapoto (Kāwhia).<sup>206</sup> The speakers advanced a wide range of opinions on the question of support for Te Rangitāke. According to Thomas Buddle, Ngāti Maniapoto 'urged the Waikato tribes to take up Kingi's cause after meeting with the deputation from Taranaki'. Rewi Maniapoto, however, told TH Smith that 'nothing had yet been decided' at this

202. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 199–200.

203. Halse to McLean, 9 December 1854, p 2, <http://mp.natlib.govt.nz/pdf/?id=1004134&format=largepdf&section=0>; Ann Parsonson, 'He Whenua te Utu', PhD thesis, p 283.

204. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 184.

205. Buddle, The Maori King Movement, pp 28–29.

206. Buddle, The Maori King Movement, pp 28–30.

time.<sup>207</sup> A group of about 100 Ngāti Maniapoto escorted the Taranaki delegation home after the hui, reportedly taking the King's flag with them.<sup>208</sup>

This did not mean that Ngāti Maniapoto or the other Kingitanga tribes had definitely decided to assist Te Rangitāke. King Pōtatau had not yet agreed to armed protection for Te Rangitāke (or the delegation), and he asked the Ngāti Maniapoto escort to go unarmed. There are different reports as to whether this injunction was obeyed, but the escorting group is said to have saved Robert Parris' life when the Taranaki people sought to kill him.<sup>209</sup> Dr O'Malley suggested that the escorting group may have included the men sent by the rūnanga at Hui Te Rangiora to determine whether Te Rangitāke was in the right, and that their investigation took place at this point.<sup>210</sup> Newspaper accounts at the time reported that they had 'no intention of doing more than "korero" with William King' – they did not intend to fight although 'if any fighting should take place whilst they were with Wi Kingi, they would certainly lend him their aid'.<sup>211</sup> The governor was careful to avoid any such occasion, issuing instructions to 'suspend active operations against Kingi, firstly on 20 April and again on 17 May, in the hope that in the absence of any active provocation the Kingitanga might be persuaded to remain at home'.<sup>212</sup>

A further Kingitanga hui took place on 21–28 May 1860, which was attended by Donald McLean, John Rogan (of the Native Land Purchase Department), Bishop Selwyn, Buddle, and other missionaries. According to Buddle's account, intervention in Taranaki was debated by Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Hinatu (Hinetu?), Ngāti Apakura, and Ngāti Maniapoto, who met on 21 May 1860 to 'deliberate the question of peace or war'.<sup>213</sup> More tribes arrived subsequently and the matter was further debated by tribal leaders of the Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae on a number of occasions during the hui. The governor was criticised for attacking without a prior investigation, appearing to set Christianity aside in doing so, and some held that Te Rangitāke was clearly in the right (both in terms of customary authority at Waitara and in his response to the governor's attack). Marr observed 'the well known symbolism of the use of sticks and flax to represent God, the Governor, and the Maori King, with all three bound together in love by a rope of flax'. When Taranaki was being discussed, the rope was sometimes cut 'to indicate concerns that the Governor was acting unjustly or upsetting this arrangement'.<sup>214</sup>

Some leaders maintained that a further investigation was needed to determine who was in the right. Others were concerned about whether the money for the purchase had all been paid by the governor (thereby completing the purchase)

207. Document A23, p 325.

208. Document A23, pp 326–327.

209. Document A23, pp 326–327; Buddle, The Maori King Movement, pp 33–34.

210. Document A23, p 325.

211. New Zealander, 16 May 1860 (doc A23, p 327).

212. Document A23, p 330; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 90.

213. Buddle, The Maori King Movement, p 36.

214. Document A78 (Marr), p 49; For Buddle's report of the speeches, see The Maori King Movement, pp 36–39, 41–57.

before the King's flag arrived at Waitara.<sup>215</sup> Donald McLean reported to Browne that the 'upper Waikato' leaders held such concerns. They expressed discontent with the Governor for not consulting Potatau and the Waikato native assessors before he declared war; and said the land sold at Waitara would be held by them, conjointly with Wiremu Kingi, if the sale had taken place since the king's flag was sent there, or if he could establish a title; but if not, and his title proved defective, it should be handed over to the Governor.<sup>216</sup>

It is likely that this May 1860 'runanga', said to have attracted 3,000 people,<sup>217</sup> is the occasion on which King Pōtatau agreed to Ngāti Maniapoto going to fight in Taranaki (it is possible that the decision had been taken at the April hui in Ngāruawāhia).<sup>218</sup> For this, we have Te Huia Raureti's account to Cowan, referred to above. Returning from their investigation in Taranaki, Cowan wrote, Raureti Te Huia Paiaka and Pahata Te Kiore reported back to the rūnanga in Kihikihi. After the rūnanga had considered their report:

Rewi Maniapoto then went down to Ngaruawahia to lay the matter before King Potatau and his council. He requested the King to consent to a war-party of Ngāti-Maniapoto marching to Taranaki in order to assist the Atiawa. The proposal was assented to. The old King delivered his command to the assembly of chiefs in these words: 'Ngāti-Maniapoto, haere hei kai ma nga manu o te rangi. Ko koe, e Waikato, ko Pekehawani taku rohe, kaua e takahia.' ('Ngāti-Maniapoto, go you as food for the birds of the air. As for you, Waikato, Pekehawani [meaning the Pūniu River] is my boundary, do not trespass upon it!')<sup>219</sup>

According to Harold Maniapoto's account, the King's consent to Ngāti Maniapoto was couched in more generous terms, citing private papers in the Te Whiwhi Maniapoto collection:

The Runanga of Hui Te Rangiora in 1860 moved to support Wiremu Kingi and his Te Atiawa people in the defence of their homelands in Taranaki and sent a contingent under Manga and others to Waitara to assist them under the parting words of Te Wherowhero the first king.

'Haere Maniapoto he kai mo nga manu o te rangi. Ma taku aroha koutou hei hari, ma taku aroha koutou hei whakahoki mai.' (Go Maniapoto, as food for the carrion of the sky. Let my compassion safely take you, and let my compassion also bring you (safely) home.)<sup>220</sup>

215. Buddle, The Maori King Movement, pp 54–57.

216. McLean to Browne, 31 May 1860 (doc A23, p 329).

217. Buddle, The Maori King Movement, p 53.

218. For a contrary view, see document A110, pp 516–517, which dates the King's injunction to the April hui.

219. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 184–185 (doc A23, pp 322–323).

220. Document K35 (Maniapoto), p 19.

From these Ngāti Maniapoto sources, King Pōtatau consented to sending armed assistance to Taranaki, although he apparently prohibited Waikato iwi from joining Ngāti Maniapoto. This prohibition was either lifted soon after or of limited effect. Dr O'Malley concluded:

any check on Waikato proper involvement in the war was no more than temporary, while it was believed that Rewi would have gone to Taranaki with or without the King's sanction. Nevertheless, the fact that an investigation had been conducted, a runanga held to discuss the findings and a request put before the King all suggest that there was no impetuous or fanatical rush to join the fight. Ngāti Maniapoto carefully investigated the matter, weighing up and deliberating on the evidence available to them before determining the justice of Wiremu Kingi's position.<sup>221</sup>

At the latest, the prohibition on Waikato involvement had been lifted by 1 December 1860. King Pōtatau died in June 1860. On 1 December, King Matutaera (later renamed Tāwhiao), Tamihana, and other rangatira issued a 'lengthy written statement of laws or regulations.'<sup>222</sup> This statement of the Kingitanga's laws indicated that there was 'nothing wrong with our fighting there [Taranaki], because that place is open, in these times as a fighting place for Maori and Pakeha.'<sup>223</sup> The implication was that it was the governor who had opened Taranaki as a place for fighting, not Māori. Professor Ward suggested that this was a reluctant and disapproving acceptance.<sup>224</sup> This may have been true for Wiremu Tamihana. There does, however, seem to have been a broad consensus in favour of intervention although each iwi made its own decision about whether or not to go and fight (as discussed above in the cases of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Hauā.

Professor Belich calculated:

In sum, though 800 was the probable peak at the scene of action at any one time, it is difficult to believe that less than 1,200 different Waikato warriors fought in Taranaki, at one time or another, and 1,500 seems more likely. This probably represented between a third and a half of the total strength of the Waikato or 'core' Kingite tribes.

Clearly, Kingite commitment to the war was by no means so circumscribed as is sometimes supposed . . .<sup>225</sup>

---

221. Document A23, p 323.

222. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 86. In August 1864, King Matutaera went to Taranaki to consult with Te Ua Haumene, the Pai Marire prophet. Te Ua anointed the King and gave him the name Tāwhiao (Encircle the World): Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 407.

223. 'Rules drawn up by Tawhiao and Tamihana', 1 December 1860 (Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 86).

224. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 86.

225. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 103.

The point here is that a broad consensus must have been reached among the Kingitanga tribes for these kinds of numbers to have been committed. Professor Belich commented:

A third or a half of the warriors of Waikato can scarcely be considered an extremist minority, and the rest did not necessarily remain at home because they were unwilling to fight. They may equally well have done so because greater numbers could not be maintained.<sup>226</sup>

So far, we have considered the importance of the placing of Waitara under the authority and protection of the King, and of the careful investigation by Ngāti Maniapoto and the Kingitanga leadership more generally to ascertain who was acting correctly in terms of Māori law and customary rights at Waitara: Te Teira or Te Rangitāke; and Te Rangitāke or the governor? In both cases, it seems that the decisive answer was Te Rangitāke, hence the sending of the King's flag to Waitara was followed up by more active assistance, including armed support. But these were not the only imperatives causing Te Rohe Pōtae and other Kingitanga leaders to intervene. We turn next to consider the kinship and other customary obligations which played an important part in their decisions.

6.4.2.2.2 CUSTOMARY KINSHIP OBLIGATIONS

In his explanation to the governor in 1861, Wiremu Tamihana emphasised the crucial importance of customary obligations in the decision to intervene at Taranaki.<sup>227</sup> These obligations took two forms:

- ▶ kin relationships with various Taranaki rangatira and their hapū; and
- ▶ King Pōtatau's obligations in a situation where Waikato iwi had allowed people to return to Taranaki to resume their traditional homes, and Pōtatau himself had been instrumental in bringing Te Rangitāke and his people back to Waitara from Waikanae.

We consider the significance of the second point in the next section. Here, we note Tamihana's explanation to Browne that one of the 'grounds for Waikato's going' was 'because of their relations, Rauakitua, Tautara and Ngatata.'<sup>228</sup> Gorst quoted Tamihana as stating that 'blood relationship would have driven them to it had there been no flag.'<sup>229</sup> Gorst provided no details, simply stating that Tamihana had 'particularized the relationship between some of the leading Waikatos who had gone to Taranaki and Wi Kingi.'<sup>230</sup>

226. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 104.

227. Wiremu Tamihana to Browne, not dated (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 212–222).

228. Wiremu Tamihana to Browne, not dated (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 221). Rauakitua is said to have escorted Pehi Tūkorehu and the Te Amiowhenua taua to safety in Pukerangiora pā in 1821–1822: Angela Ballara, Taua: 'Musket Wars', 'Land Wars' or Tikanga? Warfare in Māori Society in the Early Nineteenth Century (Wellington: Penguin Books, 2003), p 323.

229. Gorst, The Maori King, 1864 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 225).

230. Gorst, The Maori King, 1864 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 225).

Evidence presented by claimants in this inquiry has also emphasised enduring and close relationships and efforts to ensure unity and peace.<sup>231</sup> Dr Thomas pointed out that interconnection, such as by inter-hapū marriage and whāngai, remained intrinsic to relationships between Taranaki and Maniapoto people. '[W]hile reading an account based largely on European written sources,' Dr Thomas said, 'it is important to keep in mind the traditions of claimants, which suggest a much more complex and fluid picture.'<sup>232</sup> But written sources also contain evidence of interconnection.

The daughter of Wekipiri Wharo of Mōkau married Henare Te Puni, son of Te Ātiawa rangatira Honiana Te Puni. Henare Te Puni had been sent back to Taranaki in about 1840 by his father, to assist New Zealand Company efforts to acquire land. Mr Stirling noted that another member of the Te Puni whānau, Tamihana, spent three years at Mōkau with the missionary Cort H Schnackenberg.<sup>233</sup> In 1846 McLean referred in his diary to 'one of the Waikato chiefs living at Waitara' and in 1848 to many 'Waikato' men living in Taranaki with Te Ātiawa wives. One of these would have been Peketahi of Ngāti Maniapoto, who, Riwai Te Ahu of Te Ātiawa stated, lived at Waitara with his Te Ātiawa wife.<sup>234</sup>

In 1855, discussing a dispute over land between New Plymouth and Waitara, Henry Turton wrote that Mōkau people 'have a direct interest in the question, from being nearly related, both by birth and marriage to the head family of the Puketapu.'<sup>235</sup>

Hone Pumipi, also of Mōkau, was sent by Ngāti Tama to warn the inhabitants of Ngā Motu of impending attack by Ngāti Maniapoto, during the fighting of the 1830s. He was related to Ngāti Tama and Te Ātiawa, but also Ngāti Maniapoto. According to Mr Stirling, Pumipi had strong links to Taranaki:

The Ngamotu rangatira Poharama told the Spain Commission in 1844 that Pumipi was one of those absentees with interests at Ngamotu. In 1850 it was reported that 200 Ngāti Maniapoto were at Tongaporutu en route to Taranaki for the uhunga for Purangi, the mother of Pumipi. She would thus seem to be of Taranaki and was perhaps to be buried there.

But Pumipi lived and fought with Kāwhia and Mōkau hapū:

On his death in 1897 his mere pounamu was broken by his kin and cast into a deep hole in the Mokau River, near the south head, 'for it was considered that none were worthy to use the weapon after Pumipi's death'. This indicates his close ties to Mokau, while other sources show he was living at Kawhia in the 1850s with other

---

231. See, for example, Larry Crowe, transcript 4.1.5, p 196 (Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, Mōkau); doc A147 (Stirling), pp 4–10.

232. Document A28, p 20.

233. Document A147(b), pp 7–8.

234. Document A147(b), p 16–19.

235. Document A147(b), p 8, Turton journal, in Taranaki Herald, 1 August 1855, p 3.

Ngati Maniapoto rangatira (such as Tuhoro and Eketone), and in 1860 he led a Ngati Maniapoto taua involved in fighting at Taranaki before returning to Kawhia.<sup>236</sup>

Also of note is John White's remark that Te Rangitāke was related to Tainui through Ngāti Toa.<sup>237</sup>

Links between Te Ātiawa and Ngāti Maniapoto did not end with the Taranaki raupatu. In 1867, the daughter of the Mōkau-based Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Tikaokao married Eruera, son of Rawiri Rauponga of Waitara. This union was later described by civil commissioner Robert Parris as 'a peace offering'.<sup>238</sup> Harold Maniapoto also pointed out that Te Rangitāke later 'reciprocated and provided assistance' to Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>239</sup>

Thus, in terms of Te Rohe Pōtae groups and leaders, there is evidence which supports Tamihana's explanation that kin relationships played a role in the decision to provide armed assistance to Taranaki kin when attacked by the Crown in 1860. While this explanation is less evident in the written sources about the war, its importance should not be discounted. In addition to kin relationships, there was a complex history of intervention by Ngāti Maniapoto in neighbouring Taranaki affairs prior to 1860, sometimes encouraged by the Crown. This also played a role in the events of 1860, and we turn to that issue next.

6.4.2.3 Strategic considerations

A number of claimant witnesses emphasised the importance of protecting Ngāti Maniapoto's 'southern-most lands'<sup>240</sup> or 'southern boundaries'<sup>241</sup> as a reason for intervention.

According to the claimants' evidence, those interests were of two kinds: in the Poutama district, from Mōkau south to about Pukearuhe; and 'less well-defined' interests further south of that which have never been formally investigated.<sup>242</sup> At the outset, we acknowledge that we did not hear from Ngāti Tama or indeed any other iwi and hapū with interests in this region aside from Ngāti Maniapoto. For our purposes here, what is important is the role that Ngāti Maniapoto played in Taranaki affairs up to the late 1850s, and the Crown's acceptance or even encouragement of that role. We examine the extent of the interests claimed when we discuss confiscation (section 6.9).

Thomas Te Whiwhi Maniapoto told us:

Our kōrero is that Ngāti Paretekawa and other Ngāti Maniapoto went around 1863 to Taranaki to fight at Waitara and in the region of the Bell block. They went to join their relations, but above all they went to protect their southern boundaries.

236. Document A147(b), pp 8–9.

237. Document A23, p 353.

238. Parris to Native Minister, 19 May 1870 (doc A147(b), pp 6–7).

239. Document K35, p 20.

240. Document K23 (McDonald), p 13.

241. Document K15 (Maniapoto), pp 5–6, 19–20.

242. Document A147(b), pp 4–10.

They assisted with the Taranaki iwi as they saw the Crown was attacking in the region where the Taranaki and Maniapoto iwi meet. They saw an attack that would spread into their lands. This was the ‘thin edge of the wedge’.

Rewi Maniapoto and his cousin Te Huia Raureti were there. Raureti’s father Paiaka Raureti was killed in one of the battles and has been buried in a communal grave in Patea.<sup>243</sup>

Kāwhia Te Murāhi made a similar point:

It was unacceptable from a strategic perspective to allow a threat to the southern door to go unchallenged. An aggressive defensive posture was required and that resulted in a decision to check the advance of the settlers into North Taranaki by way of armed support of Te Rangitaake whose take had been found to be a legitimate one.<sup>244</sup>

Harold Maniapoto also gave evidence about the decision to fight in Taranaki:

Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Maniapoto had no choice but to resort to defensive strategies to protect its interests and those of its kin. The Runanga of Hui Te Rangiora in 1860 moved to support Wiremu Kingi and his Te Atiawa people in the defence of their homelands in Taranaki and sent a contingent under Manga [Rewi Maniapoto] and others to Waitara to assist them under the parting words of Te Wherowhero the first king . . .<sup>245</sup>

We also note the evidence of Morehu McDonald:

It was important for Rewi and the Kingitanga to become engaged in Taranaki because of the proximity of Kingi’s tribe, Te Atiawa, to Rewi’s tribe. If Kingi and Te Atiawa were to fall, the southern-most Ngāti Maniapoto lands would be endangered. To have ignored Kingi in his struggle against the settlers would have left Rewi isolated and without allies when it was his turn to face the brunt of European expansion. Furthermore, Te Atiawa’s pleas for assistance gave Rewi the opportunity to work to preserve the collective security of his own territory by containing the spread of colonialism in Taranaki.<sup>246</sup>

In chapter 2, we described how, by 1840, as a consequence of repeated Waikato–Maniapoto incursions (section 2.5.2.8), most of the former inhabitants of the northern Taranaki coast had either retreated south or been taken north. To assess the importance of Ngāti Maniapoto involvement in the lands south of Mōkau to

---

243. Document K15, pp 5–6.

244. Document K29 (Te Muraahi), p 10.

245. Document K35, p 19.

246. Document K23, p 13. See also document K23(a), pp 92–105.

Map 6.1: The northern Taranaki and Poutama coast their decision to intervene at Waitara, it is necessary to briefly review the relevant events over the following 20 years.

In the 1840s, some Ngāti Maniapoto leaders were involved in early attempted purchases of land in the district. These included the New Zealand Company's supposed purchases of much of northern Taranaki in February 1840. Bruce Stirling argued that a 'substantial share' of the New Zealand Company's payment made its way to Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>247</sup> Meanwhile, former Wesleyan missionary William White arranged a 'purchase' of the land between the Whanganui and Mōkau Rivers on 28 January 1840, from Waikato–Maniapoto rangatira at Kāwhia. Historian Paul Thomas argued that the arrangement constituted 'a new form of tribal rivalry', but 247. Document A147(b), p.11. Stirling said Poharama, a 'Ngamotu man' was at Kāwhia when he received a share of the company's payment, thus it could only have come from Maniapoto).

said those who signed would never seriously have imagined it ended their tribe's connection with the land.<sup>248</sup>

In January 1842, Governor Hobson purported to purchase whatever interests Te Wherowhero and Waikato peoples had in Taranaki by a payment of £150, two horses, two saddles, two bridles, and 100 blankets.<sup>249</sup> In April, Hobson visited Kāwhia. There, Governor Browne later recorded, Hobson met Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira and told them of his agreement with Te Wherowhero. Hobson consented to Ngāti Maniapoto occupying land within the boundary of the agreement as far south as Urenui, so long as they did not intrude upon the 'English boundary' of the New Plymouth settlers.<sup>250</sup> In Dr O'Malley's view, 'Browne's statement constitutes important official recognition that whatever interests Ngāti Maniapoto may have had in Taranaki had never been formally acquired by the Crown.'<sup>251</sup> When Protector of Aborigines Thomas Forsaith visited Kāwhia in 1844, Ngāti Maniapoto left him in no doubt that they regarded the land as far south as Urenui as being theirs 'by right of conquest and some part of it by possession' and that 'Te Wherowhero had a perfect right to sell his own or his tribe's interest, but not ours.' They continued: 'we might insist on our right to a payment equal to Te Wherowhero, but we are not so very anxious about that; we want Europeans.'<sup>252</sup>

Many Ngāti Tama and Te Ātiawa returned during the 1840s – both those who had been taken north to Waikato or Te Rohe Pōtae, and those who had migrated south during the 1830s. The chiefs of Kāwhia and Ngāti Maniapoto explained to Forsaith: 'We sent the present occupants of Taranaki home to the land of their fathers; we did so from Christian principles.'<sup>253</sup> Dr Parsonson considered that it was clear, from missionary John Whiteley's reports of his discussions with Kāwhia rangatira, 'that they regarded the taurekareka as representatives of their own claims at Taranaki.'<sup>254</sup> By contrast, and as later noted by McLean, those like Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke who had retreated south to the Kapiti district in the early 1830s were viewed with disdain. Taonui Hikaka, the great Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira of the upper Mōkau, warned that 'when the bird once deserts its nest, it never again returns to it.'<sup>255</sup>

That view softened in the late 1840s. Mr Stirling and Mr Thomas cited accounts that suggested Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia of Ngāti Mahanga and Te Wherowhero endorsed the return of Taranaki exiles from the south.<sup>256</sup> In April 1848, a tense and lengthy hui took place at Pukearuhe, where Te Ātiawa led by Wiremu Kīngi

248. Document A28, p 26.

249. Document A23, p 98.

250. Browne to Colonial Secretary, 4 December 1860, Turton (comp.), Epitome, F. – On the Tenure of Native Lands, p 33 (doc A23, p 100).

251. Document A23, p 101, also pp 102–103.

252. Document A147(b), p 14; doc A23 [O'Malley], p 102.

253. Document A28, pp 61–62.

254. Parsonson, 'He Whenua Te Utu', p 236; doc A22, pp 629–630.

255. Donald McLean, draft letter, 22 January 1848, McLean papers, MS-papers-0032-0123, ATL (doc A23, p 115).

256. Document A147(b), pp 27–28; doc A28, pp 61–62. Ngāti Tama later argued to the Native Land Court that their mana over Poutama was restored by Te Wherowhero's invitation to return.

were hosted by Takerei Waitara and other Ngāti Maniapoto. The result of weeks of debate, according to later Ngāti Maniapoto accounts, was that a border was established between Taranaki and Ngāti Maniapoto hapū at Waikaramuramu.<sup>257</sup> In December 1848, around a dozen of the first Te Ātiawa to return from Waikanae were reported to be felling timber and clearing land near New Plymouth with 25 Ngāti Maniapoto, supervised by Mōkau rangatira Waitara, Te Kaka, and Te Kaharoa.<sup>258</sup> This agreement did not mean that Ngāti Maniapoto relinquished all interests south of the new border. Taonui and others made ‘sporadic’ offers during the 1850s to sell to the Crown the land south of Pukearuhe as far as Waitara (as did Taranaki Māori to the lands north, to Mōkau). In Mr Thomas’s view, ‘primarily, these would seem to have been inter-tribal assertions of rights over the disputed land.’<sup>259</sup>

In 1856, the Mōkau rangatira Tikaokao, Ngatawa (Te Kaka), Takerei, and Wetini heard that Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Mutunga at the Chatham Islands were offering to sell land on the Poutama coast between Parininihi and Mōkau. They wrote to Governor Browne and Donald McLean: ‘Now, listen both of you . . . we do not agree to this boundary being given at Mokau. Take note, Poutama and Parininihi are not to be taken, our boundary is at Waikaramuramu, for it is a Red Sea for us, and for ever and ever and ever.’<sup>260</sup>

The Red Sea analogy was drawn, of course, from Exodus 14, and echoed what the chiefs of Kāwhia and Ngāti Maniapoto told Forsaith in 1844: ‘We sent the present occupants of Taranaki home to the land of their fathers; we did so from the influence of Christian principles.’<sup>261</sup> It would be repeated by Wētere Te Rerenga in his 1882 evidence to the Native Land Court. He added: ‘Our land extended to Paritutu [in New Plymouth], but we gave the land back as far as Waikaramuramu.’<sup>262</sup>

Despite the setting of the ‘Red Sea’ boundary, evidence already reviewed makes it clear that some Ngāti Maniapoto continued living further south, often taking wives from the returning tribes. In short, the ‘Red Sea’ line was in practice more a traditional ‘soft’ boundary than a ‘hard’ European-style one.

South of Waitara two decades of civil strife followed Hobson’s efforts to secure land for New Plymouth settlers in the early 1840s, as the Crown attempted to purchase land in the face of determined resistance from the returned Te Ātiawa leaders.<sup>263</sup> Both Dr O’Malley and Mr Stirling provided evidence that settlers and Crown officials looked to Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato leaders to help maintain order in the New Plymouth settlement, especially during protracted disputes among groups of Te Ātiawa and Ngāti Ruanui (often the result of land purchase

257. Document A28, p 62, see also pp 71–75.

258. Document A147(b), pp 27–28.

259. Document A28, p 69.

260. Te Motutapu Te Karoa, Tikaokao, Ngatawa Te Kaka, Takerei, and Te Wetini, Mokau, to Governor and McLean, 26 December 1856 (doc A147(b), p 29).

261. Forsaith to Fitzroy, 22 October 1844 (doc A23, p 103).

262. Evidence of Wētere Te Rerenga Takerei, 6 June 1882, 8 June 1882, Mokau-Waitara MLC Minute Book, no 1, in document A28(a) [Thomas supporting papers], vol 2, pp 433, 437.

263. See Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, chapter 2.

negotiations). In 1854, McLean praised the influence of Te Awaitaia, who warned Taranaki Māori he would come to the defence of settlers if they were threatened. The following year, the presence of Tikaokao and Te Kaka from Mōkau prevented gunfire during the siege of Ninia pā west of Waitara. Wesleyan missionary Henry Turton wrote of the Mōkau Ngāti Maniapoto that ‘it is not in the number, so much as in the name, that our security consists’ (emphasis in original).<sup>264</sup> The influence and reputation of Ngāti Maniapoto served as a powerful reassurance for Europeans in a potentially unstable region. Then, in August 1859, five months after Te Teira offered to sell the governor the Pekapeka block at Waitara, what Mr Stirling described as a ‘formal peace-making between the Taranaki disputants’ was witnessed at Waiwhakaiho (New Plymouth) by Tikaokao, Wetini, and 400 Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>265</sup>

Dr O’Malley concluded:

Subsequent [post-1844] attempts to purchase further land at Taranaki for the settlers proved contentious, provoking conflicts between different Te Atiawa hapū. But the Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato tribes continued to take a keen interest in events at Taranaki, and Crown officials sometimes found it convenient to call upon their assistance in the district. Ngāti Maniapoto had (with the full support and blessing of the government) played such a role as late as 1858, though when they did so again two years later at Waitara they were accused of brazenly interfering in a district and in a matter that was of no concern to them. The apparent double standard in this instance arose from the fact that they had aligned themselves with those disputing the government’s purported purchase of Waitara lands.<sup>266</sup>

The evidence is clear that Ngāti Maniapoto maintained their involvement in northern Taranaki after 1840 and continued to assert interests there. Crown officials knew this. But, considering there were greater advantages to be gained from encouraging European settlement, the Mōkau Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira in particular acted strategically to prefer a peaceful return, according to tikanga, of the people they had driven away.

The Crown’s efforts to purchase land at Mōkau in the 1850s provide further important context to explaining Ngāti Maniapoto involvement in the Waitara conflict. As we discussed in chapter 5, by the end of the decade the Crown’s efforts to purchase land at Mōkau–Awakino had stalled amidst disquiet at the shortcomings of the process employed by officials and the lack of European settlement. The most prominent European at Mōkau, the missionary Schnackenberg, left with his family in 1858.<sup>267</sup> Although we lack definitive evidence on this point, we consider it probable that for Ngāti Maniapoto the Crown’s actions at Mōkau would have had 264. Document A23, pp121–122; doc A147(b), pp30–31; Turton’s Journal in Lyttelton Times, 26 September 1855, p 5.

---

265. Document A147(b), p 31; ‘Taranaki’, Te Karere, 30 September 1859, p 2.

266. Document A23(c), p 5.

267. Document A28, p 131.

a bearing on their decision to intervene at Waitara. The governor's willingness to enforce a disputed minority sale by using the British army, and in the face of opposition from such a senior rangatira as Te Rangitāke, must have been very worrying.

Although by no means all Mōkau Māori supported Taonui and the inland Mōkau rangatira who led opposition to land sales, the apparently unstoppable nature of colonisation and excessive Māori land loss were important reasons for the establishment of the Kingitanga. Missionary John Morgan observed that even those he characterised as 'moderate' wanted no more land purchases 'within the boundaries of the Maori King'. The 'extreme Maori King party', he wrote, 'are opposed to any land at Waitara or at any other place (however clear Teira's title or the title of any other chief may be to his land) being sold to the Government.'<sup>268</sup> This kind of observation took no account of Ngāti Maniapoto's own history of involvement in the lands around Waitara and northern Taranaki more generally.

The prospect of a road being built from New Plymouth to Mōkau underlined the concerns about self-defence which the Taranaki war created for the residents of northern Taranaki. Mōkau was a major communication route, providing inland Ngāti Maniapoto access to the coast.<sup>269</sup> Some Mōkau chiefs had supported the building of the road (through Poutama) before the war, based (in Thomas's view) 'on the desire for economic development and improved access to markets.'<sup>270</sup> In December 1859, Robert Parris reported that Mōkau rangatira had agreed to the construction of part of the road, on which their people would work. But the outbreak of war on their doorstep in 1860 transformed their view of what such a road might mean. Not all Mōkau chiefs supported the Kingitanga by any means, but Pukearuhe became the crucial path for 'transporting men and resources to the fight'. Mōkau was used as a staging area throughout the Taranaki war. Tikaokao and others took an active part in the fighting, while some Mōkau chiefs remained neutral and continued to trade with the settlers at New Plymouth.<sup>271</sup> As a result of the Crown's attack on Waitara and the outbreak of war in Taranaki, the need to defend Mōkau in its own right and as an access route to Te Rohe Pōtae and the Waikato became a key consideration:

For good reason, roads were now seen by at least some Mokau Maori as more of a military threat than a practical advantage. While the Government's 1859 plans to build roads and a tunnel through Parininihi had been stalled, Tikaokao in 1862 issued a warning that the Governor was planning roads stretching north from Waitara into Mokau to assist a possible military campaign. He instructed Hakari, a Mokau chief at Pukearuhe, to stop all Pakeha 'who may come up that way, and turn them back, as they may be surveying the line of a new road.' Schnackenberg, visiting Mokau in April

---

268. Morgan to Browne, 8 May 1860 (doc A23, p 328).

269. Document A28, p 12.

270. Document A28, p 136.

271. Document A28, pp 138–142.

1863 as war resumed in the south, found ‘a good deal of sympathy’ for Wiremu Kingi’s faction of Taranaki.<sup>272</sup>

Dr O’Malley’s research indicated that ‘geographical proximity and other strategic considerations’ reinforced the point that Ngāti Maniapoto were ‘vitaly interested . . . on a number of levels, including the[ir] long history of involvement in Taranaki, shared whakapapa and other connections.’<sup>273</sup> To this, we would add that ongoing Te Rohe Pōtae Māori involvement in Taranaki had been frequently encouraged by the Crown. That involvement underpinned claims to customary rights south of Mōkau.

Governor Grey noted in April 1863 that Māori viewed the Taranaki war as a ‘struggle for house and home’, regardless of where those houses and homes were actually located.<sup>274</sup> He explained:

the almost universal belief of the Native race was, that a new system of taking lands was to be established, and that if they did not succeed by a general and combined resistance in preventing their houses and lands being taken by the Government from the Natives of the Waitara, they would have been each in their turn despoiled in detail of their lands.<sup>275</sup>

This important observation by the governor of the colony was clearly relevant to the tribes of Te Rohe Pōtae and their decision to assist Te Rangitāke at Waitara.

Having discussed the various causes of intervention, we will next discuss the forms that intervention took, focusing on the loss of life for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in the various engagements which took place, and on the peace-making initiative in 1861.

6.4.2.4 Military assistance to Te Ātiawa in Taranaki, 1860–61

6.4.2.4.1 PUKETAKAUERE

Waikato parties from the north, led by Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira Epiha Tokohihi, took part in their first significant engagement against Crown soldiers at the end of June 1860. Puketakauere and its neighbouring pā Onuku-kaitara lay on Te Ātiawa territory, two kilometres inland from where the British had established a military camp on the Pekapeka block. They were strengthened during the cessation in hostilities ordered by Browne after 20 April 1860. A British scouting party approached the pā and was fired on – an incident that some contemporaries and historians thought was deliberately engineered by the British as justification for a resumption of hostilities.<sup>276</sup>

272. Schnackenberg letter, 9 April 1863 (doc A28, p142).

273. Document A23, p323.

274. Grey, ‘Memorandum by His Excellency stating reasons for abandoning Waitara Purchase’, 22 April 1863 (doc A23, p440).

275. Grey, ‘Memorandum by His Excellency stating reasons for abandoning Waitara Purchase’, 22 April 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-2E2, p8.

276. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p92.

Major Thomas Nelson launched an ill-fated attack on 27 June. The result was disastrous for the British: 30 troops were killed and 34 wounded, or 18 per cent of the 350-strong force. Some of the wounded were left on the field. Just five Māori defenders appear to have been killed. While Ngāti Maniapoto were prominent in some of the fiercest fighting, Tāmati Ngāpora later told the governor that ‘the number of Waikatos, exclusive of men from Kawhia, was only 140, and that of that party not one was killed.’<sup>277</sup> J C Richmond reported ‘Tuma of Waikato’ among the five dead, and that 12 were wounded.<sup>278</sup> James Cowan recorded that Pahata Te Kiore, who had been sent from Hui Te Rangiora to determine the facts of the dispute, was killed at Puketakauere.<sup>279</sup>

6.4.2.4.1 MĀHOETAHI, HUIRANGI, REDOUBT 3, TE ĀREI

Many of the northerners who had assisted the defence of the pā at Puketakauere returned to their homes in late August 1860 to plant crops for the coming summer. In October, John Morgan wrote to Browne from Ōtāwhao that Rewi Maniapoto had left for Taranaki; he claimed that between 500 and 1,000 men would soon join Rewi. Cowan wrote that, after the death of Pōtatau, the interdiction on those north of the Pūniu travelling to fight in Taranaki began to be disregarded. Among the ‘Waikato’ hapū and iwi said to have gone to Taranaki were Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Hikairo, Ngāti Hinetu, Ngāti Apakura, Raukawa, Ngāti Mahuta, Te Patuhoko, Ngāti Ruru, Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Ngamuri, Ngāti Koroki, Ngāti Koura, Ngāti Kahukura, and Te Urikopi.<sup>280</sup>

Ngāti Hauā rangatira Te Wetini Taiporutu, with perhaps 150 men, occupied an old pā site at Māhoetahi near the road between New Plymouth and the military camp at Waitara. Te Wetini sent what the new British commander Major-General Thomas Pratt called an ‘insulting letter’ (Cowan, later, said it was a chivalrous challenge): ‘Fish fight at sea – come inland and stand on our feet’. On 6 November, Pratt took 670 troops from New Plymouth and forced Te Wetini east into swampland; reinforcements from Camp Waitara then put the Māori ‘betwixt two fires’, Robert Parris reported, and forced a retreat inland to a pā at Huirangi near the bush edge. British losses were four dead and 16 wounded; six prisoners were taken. While Pratt claimed as many as 100 Māori were killed, Parris listed 31 dead in his report, including Te Wetini, Wharangi of Ngāti Apakura, and Hakopa of Ngāti Koura. These three rangatira were taken to New Plymouth and buried at St Mary’s church; the others were interred in a mass grave at Māhoetahi. These were unlikely to have been the only casualties: the Taranaki Herald reported that three prisoners died of their wounds and a further 11 bodies were found in the 277. Memorandum of Ngapora statement, Purchas to Browne, 27 September 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], p 150 (IUP, vol 12).

278. J C Richmond to CW Richmond, 2 July 1860 (Scholefield, The Richmond-Atkinson Papers, vol 1, p 607); see also Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 95–96.

279. Document A23, p 333.

280. Document A23, pp 334–335; Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 193–194.

fern, adding that Te Paetae and Mokau of Ngāti Paretekawa, and Timoti of Ngāti Mahuta, died ‘after getting near to, and at Huirangi.’<sup>281</sup>

Cowan named Te Paetai Te Mahia of Ngāti Maniapoto, Hakopa of Ngāti Ruru (Ōtāwhao), and Mokau Te Matapuna of Raukawa (Ōrākau) as the principal men of those groups who were killed. Te Huia Raureti said that when the survivors returned, ‘the grief of our people at this disaster was intense, and it was felt that the defeat could never be avenged in full.’<sup>282</sup> While the taua was not made up only of Ngāti Hauā, they seem to have been the mainstay and suffered the greatest losses. The Reverend Benjamin Ashwell recorded the following month that Wiremu Kīngi had given Waitara to Wiremu Tamihana and Ngāti Hauā ‘in consideration of those who fell in battle.’<sup>283</sup>

Mindful of the debacle of Puketakauere, Pratt adopted sapping – advancing by digging trenches under covering fire – as his principal offensive strategy. Between 29 December 1860 and the end of fighting on 18 March 1861, the British dug their way inland, establishing eight redoubts as they went to hold the ground they gained. Initially, as Belich pointed out, Māori were content to evacuate their positions, abandoning Matarikoriko and then Huirangi soon after they were attacked. Matarikoriko was evacuated on the night of 30 December after fighting in which three British died and 22 were wounded, and perhaps six Māori were killed including Karira of Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>284</sup>

On 23 January 1861, a surprise attack on the No 3 Redoubt, led by Rewi Maniapoto, Epiha Tokohihi, and Hapurona, was repelled with significant loss of life. The attacking party was estimated at 140-strong, with flanking support from others in rifle pits. Native commissioner George Hay listed 36 killed in the battle, including three who died of their wounds. Principal rangatira who lost their lives were Paora Te Uata of Ngāti Tūkōrehe, Te Retimana of Raukawa, Wiremu Hoeta Kumete of Ngāti Mahuta, and Hami (or Hemi) Te Hui and Werahiko of Ngāti Maniapoto. Of the remainder, 18 were not able to be identified. The British suffered five dead and 11 wounded.<sup>285</sup>

But the pā at Te Ārei, on the edge of the bush above the Waitara River and near the old battle site of Pukerangiōra, was ‘defended with the greatest possible tenacity’. In mid-March 1861, the Ngāti Rangatahi rangatira Te Ngarupiki was wounded and later died.<sup>286</sup> The war ground towards stalemate, and Belich wrote that it was 281. Document A23, p 337; New Zealand Gazette, 7 November 1860, no 33, pp 189–190; Taranaki Herald, 10 November 1860, pp 2, 3.

282. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 198–199.

283. Report from Rev Benjamin Ashwell, 3 December 1860 (doc A23(b) (O’Malley), vol 2, p 470); doc A23, pp 337–338.

284. Document A23, p 338; Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 201–204; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 110–113.

285. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 205, 210; ‘Further Papers relative to the Native Insurrection’, AJHR, 1861, E-1A, pp 10–13.

286. Taranaki Herald, 23 March 1861; doc K26, p 3.

the lack of any clear military success that made the British willing to discuss terms of peace.<sup>287</sup>

We summarise what is known about casualties in section 6.4.3.1. We turn next to how the cessation of hostilities in Taranaki was arranged in March 1861.

6.4.2.5 The making of peace in 1861

It is important to stress that one of the key interventions of the Kingitanga leadership, including Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira, was the negotiation of peace in Taranaki in March 1861. This brought an end to the Taranaki war, although it proved in the long run to be more of a truce than a full peace-making.

In February 1861, King Matutaera's uncle, Tāmami Ngāpora, and a group of rangatira from around the North Island met with Governor Browne to propose peace terms. This group included at least two Waikato chiefs, and the deputation was said to have followed previous hui at Waikato to 'discuss the question of peace'.<sup>288</sup> The terms sought by the rangatira were: the Waitara should be set aside and investigated later by a court or inquiry; and the governor should 'not hold to or bear in remembrance' but rather forgive any and all matters concerning 'men, the land, or murder or property'.<sup>289</sup> The governor flatly refused to do so, stating (among other things) that 'Waikato had gone down to Taranaki without a cause' and 'taken up arms against the Queen'. Why, after joining in an 'insurrection' and 'spilling so much blood', should they expect an 'unconditional peace, which would leave them at liberty to renew hostilities when they pleased'?<sup>290</sup> The chiefs' reply was essentially that the fighting must cease at once, and the negotiation of an appropriate resolution could come afterwards. Browne responded that 'Waikato' should return home immediately, and the chiefs should propose better terms (with more security for continued peace).<sup>291</sup>

In March 1861, Ngāti Hauā rangatira Wiremu Tamihana followed up on the results of this February hui. Sir William Martin, Bishop Selwyn, and a number of CMS missionaries, he said, had written to him about ending the conflict. With the agreement of their iwi, Tamihana and Tioriori went to Taupō to consult Te Heuheu before coming to Taranaki.<sup>292</sup> Tamihana's intention was to 'use [his] influence to separate the combatants'.<sup>293</sup> His proposed solution to the quarrel was essentially what had been proposed in February: to end the fighting and then have an inquiry into Waitara. Tamihana wanted the inquiry to be conducted by a 'good man from the Queen' sent by the British Government.<sup>294</sup>

287. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 112–113.

288. 'Notes of Interviews between His Excellency Governor Gore Browne, CB, and Certain Native Chiefs on the Subject of the Restoration of Peace', February 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 29 (IUB, vol 13).

289. 'Notes of Interviews', p 29.

290. 'Notes of Interviews', p 29.

291. 'Notes of Interviews', pp 30–31.

292. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 195–196, 237, 320.

293. Tamihana to Ashwell, not dated (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 195).

294. Tamihana to Fox, 21 January 1862 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 195–196, 267).

When Tamihana arrived in Taranaki, he wrote to the commander of British forces, General Pratt, to seek an immediate three-day ceasefire in which he would hold discussions with Te Rangitāke and the Waikato leaders. Tamihana's hui with these rangatira produced a consensus in favour of peace.<sup>295</sup> Te Rangitāke 'placed the disposal of Waitara in Tamihana's hands'. This decision was supported by Hapurona, nephew of Te Rangitāke, as well as the Ngāti Maniapoto leaders Epiha Tokohihi and Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>296</sup> Tikaokao also supported the request for peace.<sup>297</sup> It is important to stress this because of the way in which Rewi Maniapoto and his iwi were painted as inveterate warmongers. As claimant Hari Rapata told the Tribunal, Rewi Maniapoto 'could have but he did not try to get in Tamihana's way'. Rather, he demonstrated his 'political acumen and diplomacy' and 'handed the situation over to Tamihana'.<sup>298</sup> The decision to accept Tamihana's proposals – to cease fighting, withdraw from Taranaki, and await an investigation of the Waitara – was a consensus decision by the Kingitanga leadership present in Taranaki, represented by Tamihana, Rewi Maniapoto, and Epiha Tokohihi.<sup>299</sup>

Interpreter George Hay conducted negotiations with Tamihana on behalf of the general. He reported:

Wm Thompson stated that he had come to make peace; that he had seen Te Rangitake; that the following conditions were what he proposed:—

Waikatos return to their own country.

Wm King to Mataitawa.

The troops withdraw to Waitaki.

Waitara land to remain undisturbed until some final decision was arrived at.<sup>300</sup>

Hay went on to say that he was not prepared to discuss 'the question of Maori title' to Waitara. That, Hay said, 'would form an after consideration', but he immediately proceeded to hector Tamihana: 'I told him that I considered him to blame personally as the prime mover in the land league'.<sup>301</sup> That Tamihana understood Waitara as a test of policy with implications that extended beyond Taranaki is shown by his reported response to Hay:

that if the Governor would not give them peace, they must all fight, young and old; that if peace were made here, and a similar case occurred elsewhere in the purchase of 295. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 197–198.

296. Document A23, pp 342–343.

297. Document A23, p 345.

298. Document K13 (Rapata), p 11.

299. Stokes, pp 200–201, 235–238. Stokes reproduced two accounts of this hui, one by Gorst and one by Heta Tarawhiti (as told to Benjamin Ashwell). See also Wiremu Tamihana to General Pratt, 11 March 1861, AJHR, 1865, E-11, p 2.

300. Hay to Browne, 15 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], pp 28–29 (IUP, vol 13) (doc A23, p 343).

301. Hay to Browne, 15 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], pp 28–29 (IUP, vol 13) (doc A23, p 343).

land, he would fight there, and wherever land was sold by the wrong people, he would fight.<sup>302</sup>

On 13 March, Tamihana wrote to Pratt, setting out Te Rangitāke's proposal for peace terms which read, in part:

Ko ta te Rangitake kupu tenei ki au, ae, kia hoki mai Waitara kia au katahi ka mau te rongo me nga hoia hoki me hoki atu ki Waitoki ko nga Maori o Waikato me hoki ano ki Waikato ko te Rangitake me noho ki nga wahi kihai I pakangatia, me waiho Waitara kia takoto noa ana ma te ture ia e tiaki. Tenei te take i waihotia ai ma te ture e tiaki kia tae atu tetehi kupu kia tau ai te rangatira o te runanga nui o te Kuini mana e ki mai kia ruku ka ruku mana e ki mai kia puea ka puea.

This was Te Rangitake's word to me,—Yes, when Waitara comes back to me then only will I make peace; and the soldiers also must go back to Waitoki. Let the Waikatos go back to Waikato, Te Rangitake to stay on the parts which have not been fought upon, and leave Waitara open in care of the law. This is why it should be left to the care of the law, that we may wait for a word from the head of the great Runanga of the Queen. If she says we are to dive, we will dive, and if she says we are to rise to the surface, we will rise.<sup>303</sup>

General Pratt claimed the offer was 'inadmissible'. His terms were:

Let the Waikato return to his own country, and Wm. King to Mataitawa and remain there. The Queen's troops will occupy Te Arei and Pukerangiora for the present. Let Wm. Thompson proceed in a man-o-war steamer to Auckland, accompanied by Mr Hay, and treat in person with the Governor, who alone can decide on the matter of peace.<sup>304</sup>

It is no doubt correct that lasting peace was a matter for the governor to negotiate. But Tamihana was not prepared to trust his person to the governor in Auckland, recalling how Te Rauparaha had been kidnapped by Governor Grey in 1846 and held without charge for 10 months. Instead, Tamihana proposed a meeting at Tuakau (the effective boundary between Queen's and King's territory) or Ngāruawāhia. A letter from Tamihana to Browne was sent by steamship to Auckland, but Pratt rejected the idea of the truce being extended to allow time for a response.<sup>305</sup>

At this point, the Crown was ready to accept what Dr O'Malley called an 'indefinite truce' in Taranaki.<sup>306</sup> The 'continued failure of the troops to achieve anything

---

302. Hay to Browne, 15 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], pp 28–29 (IUP, vol 13) (doc A23, pp 343–344).

303. Wiremu Tamihana to General Pratt, 11 March 1861, AJHR, 1865, E-11, p 2.

304. Pratt to Tamihana, 13 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 31 (IUP, vol 13).

305. Document A23, p 344; Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 202–204.

306. Document A23, p 346.

of significance' had resulted in a loss of public support for the war, and the conviction that a decisive victory should be looked for elsewhere – that is, in Waikato.<sup>307</sup> Browne was in favour of returning to Taranaki immediately to resume talks, but was dissuaded: 'my Executive Council considered that the anxiety for peace which such a course might appear to indicate would be more likely to retard than advance the desired object.'<sup>308</sup>

A further consideration seems to have been the Crown's desire not to negotiate collectively, lest that be seen as countenancing a collective Māori political stance. After concluding an agreement with Te Ātiawa the following month, Browne told Newcastle:

In conducting these negotiations, your Grace will also observe that I have insisted on treating with each party separately, because the Waikatos have repeatedly announced both in public and private interviews with myself that they interfered in King's quarrel, not on account of any special sympathy with him, but because he had acknowledged the sovereignty of their king. It was, therefore, most important that I should not admit their interference in any transactions between myself and Her Majesty's native subjects.<sup>309</sup>

Native Secretary Donald McLean was sent south and arrived on 18 March 1861. A further truce was arranged; Tamihana repeated his peace proposal, emphasising, in McLean's account, 'that the occupation of Waitara was the sole cause in the present instance of their taking up arms', that he wished for peace, and was prepared to wait until the governor was ready to conclude an agreement. This position was supported by Epiha, who said 'the king movement was not mixed up with it'. The two issues, Waitara and the King, needed to be considered separately, and 'his interference arose from the decision come to long before, that no more land should be alienated by the Maories'. With respect to the greater issues – 'the questions which had been agitating the native mind', as McLean put it – Tamihana sought to return to Waikato to discuss a way forward with other Waikato rangatira. Tamihana departed for Waikato on 20 March.<sup>310</sup>

McLean sailed for Auckland the following day, after meeting Te Rangitāke. At that hui, the speakers 'recited several incantations, which are never used except upon very important occasions, when they repeat them to express the sincerity of their intentions, and of their earnest desire to secure a lasting and permanent peace.'<sup>311</sup>

On the basis, as Browne put it, that Te Rangitāke was now able to negotiate for his people without 'interference' from Waikato, the governor, Attorney-General, Native Minister, Tāmami Wāka Nene, and Tāmami Ngāpora travelled to Waitara.

---

307. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 113–115.

308. Browne to Newcastle, 7 April 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 34 (IUP, vol 13, p 48).

309. Browne to Newcastle, 12 April 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 39 (IUP, vol 13, p 53).

310. McLean to Browne, 22 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], pp 36–37 (IUP, vol 13, ppp 50–51).

311. McLean to Browne, 22 March 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 34 [3040], p 37 (IUP, vol 13, p 51).

Not all 'Waikato' had left, however. This fact was glossed over by Browne, who noted merely that on 6 April Rewi, 'a Waikato Chief', brought him a musket, 'which belonged to the Government, stating that it was the only one in this district, and intimated his intention of returning to his own tribe.'<sup>312</sup>

This seems to us more likely than not to have been Rewi Maniapoto. Rewi's intent is not entirely clear from the governor's account: there must be a strong suspicion that something was lost in translation. It would not be fair on the governor to say that this passing mention was intended as a slight, but an offer of giving up arms, on the part of Rewi, was unlikely to have been enacted without careful consideration of its symbolic weight.

Rewi Maniapoto had remained behind to protect Te Rangitāke, to whom he offered sanctuary at Kihikihi. John Gorst took his usual negative view of Maniapoto, writing that Rewi had 'stayed behind to hatch mischief' by carrying Te Rangitāke off to Kihikihi before his quarrel with the governor could be resolved.<sup>313</sup> There is no evidence for this claim. Te Rangitāke had already indicated his consent to peace at Waitara before he left, and he told Browne that the reason for going to Waikato was 'to hear the words of the tribes who died (whom evil befel) in my presence; because the cause by which they died was mine.'<sup>314</sup> Rewi and Te Rangitāke travelled north together. Before leaving Waitara, Rewi told Browne that the leaders of Waikato intended to meet at Ngāruawāhia and then come to Māngere for a formal conference with the governor. 'Since then,' Browne wrote in July 1861, 'they have changed their minds.'<sup>315</sup> The reason for that change of heart, it can safely be said, was the governor's ultimatum to the Kīngitanga and tribes of Waikato, dated 21 May 1861. We discuss this ultimatum in the next section.

6.4.3 What were the consequences of the Taranaki war for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?

6.4.3.1 Te Rohe Pōtae participation and casualties

By October 1860 there were 2,359 rank and file troops in Her Majesty's service in Taranaki; the number reached 3,500 in 1861. The governor, assessing his opponents, wrote: 'The strength of the insurgents, as far as I can learn from the best information, has never exceeded two thousand men, and it was not until after the Waikato contingent (supposed to amount to three hundred men) arrived, that they appeared at all in considerable numbers.'<sup>316</sup> Belich, however, seems to have thought Te Ātiawa only a minority of the warriors. He put the number of Waikato at about 500 in the weeks after Puketakauere. From their return in late October 1860, until the end of fighting in March 1861, Belich estimated the number of 'Waikato' never fell below 400 and reached as high as 800: this is the basis for his claim that at least 1,200 but more likely 1,500 'Waikato' took part in the northern

312. Browne to Newcastle, 7 April 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 35 (IUP, vol 13, p 49).

313. Gorst, The Maori King, p 165 (doc A23, p 350).

314. Te Rangitake to Browne, 8 April 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 39 (IUP, vol 13, p 52).

315. Document A23, p 350.

316. Browne to Newcastle, 2 October 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], p 143 (IUP, vol 12); Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 115.

Taranaki conflict.<sup>317</sup> Belich, of course, included Te Rohe Pōtae peoples in his term of 'Waikato' or 'core-Kingite' fighters.

In all, Belich estimated that during the course of the Taranaki war about 200 Māori were killed or wounded, against a British figure of 238. The Māori number, however, contained a higher proportion of deaths and appears to have been a higher overall proportion of combatants. Their hapū were less able to sustain such losses.<sup>318</sup> We referred earlier to the lament of Hokepera of Ngāti Maniapoto. This was written for those who fell in just one battle, at Māhoetahi. On the information available to us, it is not possible to state how many of those killed were of Te Rohe Pōtae iwi, although we can safely state that some were from the peoples of our inquiry district.

There is also the impact of injuries to be considered on the well-being of individuals and their communities. A correspondent for the Daily Southern Cross wrote in July 1863 that the Waikato tribes were disinclined to 'go to war with the troops'. This was 'greatly owing to the losses the tribes of that district sustained during the Taranaki war three years ago', but also: 'One can scarcely find a village in the Waikato without a cripple in it; one has got his lower jaw shot away, and has since subsisted on spoon diet; a second is lame, and great numbers are disfigured more or less.'<sup>319</sup>

In our inquiry, the Crown acknowledged that 'the war in Taranaki had an impact on Rohe Pōtae Māori to the extent that men who went to fight in Taranaki were killed or injured, and resources were expended to supply them.'<sup>320</sup>

6.4.3.1 Impact on the Crown's relationship with the Kingitanga generally and Ngāti Maniapoto in particular

Premier Edward Stafford wrote that Taranaki, alone, did not pose any real danger: 'it is the support which they expect and partially receive from the Tribes of the Waikato which constitutes their strength and our danger'. Further, in the 'repulse' at Puketakauere 'the Maoris had also severely suffered, especially the Waikato contingent, upon whom the brunt of the fight fell, there was but too good reason to fear the effect upon the Tribes to which they belonged.'<sup>321</sup> There is no doubt that the involvement of iwi and hapū from Waikato was a crucial factor in the success enjoyed by Māori in the first Taranaki war.

According to James Belich:

The Battle of Puketakauere, was the most important action of the Taranaki War, with profound strategic and political effects on its course. Despite the relatively small

317. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 102–103.

318. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 116; doc A23, p 338; New Zealand Gazette, no 5, 28 January 1861, pp 21–23.

319. Daily Southern Cross, 6 July 1863 (doc A23, p 478).

320. Submission 3.4.300, p 15.

321. Stafford, memorandum, 30 July 1860, AJHR, 1861, E-1A, pp 6–7.

scale of the forces involved it was one of the three most clear-cut and disastrous defeats suffered by Imperial troops in New Zealand.<sup>322</sup>

It was also the first significant engagement to involve Kīngitanga forces, many of whom were Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>323</sup> In the view of Dr O'Malley, the enduring image of Ngāti Maniapoto as an extremist element of the Kīngitanga can be traced to Puketakauere and 27 June 1860. This perception was employed, initially, to cast the Crown's military endeavours in a defensive light. It also served as a basis from which to claim divisions among Kīngitanga-aligned Māori. According to Dr O'Malley:

The predominant viewpoint has it that Rewi Maniapoto and other 'extremists', mostly belonging to Ngati Maniapoto, ignored all injunctions to the contrary from the King and other moderates such as Wiremu Tamihana and immersed themselves in the conflict, whether out of pure hatred of the Pakeha or in hopes of provoking an even bigger showdown. There have been multiple variations on this argument, many of which depict Ngati Maniapoto as almost fanatical in their obsession to become involved at Waitara.<sup>324</sup>

This view has led, in turn, to a suggestion that the participation of Waikato (in the broadest sense) in the Taranaki war was limited to a handful of renegade extremists. Both Belich and O'Malley dismissed this assertion,<sup>325</sup> and we have discussed above the evidence of the numbers involved. O'Malley argued that reliance on a dichotomy of moderates versus extremists to depict the Kīngitanga risks 'losing sight of the extent to which its supporters shared common concerns.'<sup>326</sup>

Nevertheless, Puketakauere 'had a major negative impact upon settler and government perceptions of Ngati Maniapoto' and 'may be said to be the point at which Ngati Maniapoto began to be widely branded as notorious and obstinate "rebels"'.<sup>327</sup> The iwi became the colonists' 'favourite bogeymen'.<sup>328</sup>

Dr O'Malley summarised the crucial outcome for the Kīngitanga generally and Ngāti Maniapoto in particular. Speaking of Browne's and then Grey's preparations to invade the Waikato, he stated:

It was Waikato and Ngati Maniapoto involvement in the first Taranaki War of 1860–61 that had led to such preparations and heightened speculation that the invasion of the Waikato was now a question of when and not if. Both Browne and Grey, it has been suggested, realised following the intervention of the Kīngitanga in Taranaki that a showdown with the Waikato tribes – the very heartland of the King movement

---

322. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 92.

323. Document A23, pp 333–334.

324. Document A23, p 358.

325. Document A23, pp 358–367; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 102–104.

326. Document A23, p 367.

327. Document A23, pp 333–334.

328. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 145.

– was inevitable if New Zealand was to continue to be colonised on terms acceptable to Europeans. This was not solely a question of land, and much less so of the particular fate of the Pekapeka block at Waitara, so much as the fundamental question of whose will was to prevail in the future, summed up in Belich's description of this as a question of substantive sovereignty.<sup>329</sup>

The evidence we have reviewed strongly supports this conclusion. It is also clear that, while Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto continued to have obligations and interests in Taranaki that they sought to meet and protect, that was not how the Crown saw things.

In section 6.3.3, we explained the Crown's approach to the Kingitanga prior to 1860, and the policy of 'non-intervention' that was adopted. This approach was beginning to fracture in April and May 1860, when Crown representatives attended hui in the Waikato which debated whether to intervene in Taranaki.

Both TH Smith (in April 1860) and Donald McLean (in May 1860) presented the Crown's position on Waitara and the outbreak of war at the hui. They and other officials (and missionaries) tried to persuade the Kingitanga leaders not to intervene. Smith reported back to Browne that, 'far from dying out', the Kingitanga was actually 'assuming proportions' which made it an object of serious concern. While the 'large majority' had no animosity towards Europeans, they were 'assuming a position whence to dictate to the Government on questions considered to affect the Maori race.' They believed that a separate Māori 'nationality may exist without any disagreement between the two races.' But, reported Smith, the idea of Māori independence also attracted those who wanted a 'pretext' to rise up in arms and 'drive the Pakeha out of the country.'<sup>330</sup>

McLean also now argued that it would be 'impossible to direct the present movement into any channel that would be productive of good'. Even if King Pōtatau accepted 'alliance with the Government on a different basis', he said, a less scrupulous and more violent 'agitation for national independence' was sure to follow.<sup>331</sup> O'Malley commented: 'The man who had at first professed not to care about the emergence of the Kingitanga now appeared to be genuinely unnerved.'<sup>332</sup>

Attitudes hardened after military assistance was sent to Taranaki in June 1860. When the governor opened Parliament on 30 July, he spoke of having been 'compelled reluctantly, and with much regret, to uphold Her Majesty's supremacy by force of arms'. He described 'a dangerous sympathy with the insurgents' displayed by 'the Waikato tribes', who had been 'for some years past the centre of the agitation for the establishment of an independent Maori State under a Native sovereign, and it is in furtherance of this project that aid from Waikato has been afforded to the insurgents.'<sup>333</sup> As we noted above, the governor now considered the 'Waikatos'

---

329. Document A23, pp 357–358.

330. TH Smith, 'Narrative of a Visit to Waikato', not dated (doc A23, pp 323–324).

331. McLean to Browne, 31 May 1860 (doc A23, p 329).

332. Document A23, p 329.

333. Browne, 30 July 1860, NZPD, 1858–1860, p 165.

to be interfering gratuitously in another district, to have taken up arms against the Queen in support of insurgents, and to be 'insurgents' themselves. These attitudes would be reflected in the terms of his ultimatum to the Kingitanga in May 1861.

While the 'truce' was being established in March 1861, the Crown had decided to impose separate peace terms on Te Ātiawa, the southern Taranaki tribes, and the 'Waikatos'. In the governor's view, unconditional submission to all of his terms – rather than negotiation – was necessary to regularise the truce and turn it into a permanent peace. In April 1861, Browne began preparations to invade the Waikato. In the same month, he sent a letter to Wiremu Tamihana, which stated:

The Queen, or her Officers, or European subjects have never injured any Maories of Waikato, of Ngatihaua, or of Ngatimaniapoto. But some men of these tribes have defied the authority of the Queen, have broken the law, and have gone to fight against the Queen's troops at Waitara, where they have no land or property: those men have there, at Waitara, on several occasions attacked the Troops of the Queen, have plundered her subjects, and have destroyed and stolen the property of those who have never done them any harm. Now after all this wrong has been done contrary to law – after the peace has been broken by those men – you say that you wish for peace.

I am waiting to hear what amends those men will make for breaking the peace, and trampling on the law, and what guarantees they will give that there may be peace in future between the Queen and those men, and between the Queen's subjects, both European and Maori.<sup>334</sup>

Before a response was received, the governor had already issued his ultimatum, which was delivered to the assembled supporters of the King at Ngāruawāhia on 21 May 1861.<sup>335</sup> Because of its importance in showing the consequences of the Taranaki War for the claimants in our inquiry, we reproduce some parts of the text here:

In the year 1858 a portion of the Maori people, resident in Waikato, pretended to set up a Maori King, and Potatau was chosen for the office. He was installed at Rangiaowhia in the month of June in that year. On Potatau's death, in 1860, Matutaera his son was nominated his successor.

Diversity of opinion existed from the commencement as to what would result from this movement. Some were led to believe that its supporters desired only the establishment of order, and a governing authority amongst themselves; while others viewed with apprehension a confederacy which they deemed fraught with danger to the peace of the colony. The Governor at first inclined towards the more favourable view of the movement, but soon felt misgivings, which have been justified by the event.

The Governor however has not interfered to put down the Maori King by force. He has been unwilling to relinquish the hope that the Maoris themselves, seeing the danger of the course they were pursuing, and that the institution of an independent

---

334. Browne to Tamihana, 25 April 1861 (doc A23, p 354).

335. Document A23, pp 355, 369.

authority must prove inefficient for all purposes of good, would of their own accord abandon that course.<sup>336</sup>

Among the acts said to have been conducted in the name of the King, the governor condemned the setting up of an authority which he now considered 'inconsistent with allegiance to the Queen, and in violation of the Treaty of Waitangi'. Secondly, a large number of the adherents of the native King have interfered between the Governor and other native tribes in matters with which they had no concern; have levied war against the Queen, fought against her troops, and burnt and destroyed the property of her peaceful subjects.<sup>337</sup>

Thirdly, other 'adherents of the King have assisted, encouraged, and harboured the men who have committed these outrages.' The governor also accused the tribes of 'other offences [which] have been committed to the subversion of Her Majesty's sovereignty, and of the authority of the law'.<sup>338</sup>

The governor went on to state his terms of submission, which we discuss later in the chapter. Suffice to say here that the Taranaki war transformed the Crown's approach to the Kīngitanga in a very damaging way. Their decision to assist Te Rangitāke's people in what Crown counsel admitted was an unjust war placed the peoples of Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae in danger. They faced either invasion or the voluntary dismantling of the Kīngitanga and its institutions, and the suppression of their mana Māori motuhake. It is possible, of course, that the Crown might have chosen to use force against the Kīngitanga eventually, even without the tragedy of the Taranaki war. But surely not so soon (just three years after the King was installed), and perhaps without such extremes as occupation and confiscation of the lands north of the Pūniu River.

In addition, Ngāti Maniapoto were singled out for particular scorn and blame. This is illustrated by the kind of unfounded allegations made by a local official, a premier, and a governor:

- ▶ Rewi Maniapoto, 'having seen the war mania fairly progressing in Waikato, threw off all disguise, and went down in person to Taranaki, to pursue his design of involving the whole Maori people in a contest for supremacy with their European rivals' (Gorst, 1864);<sup>339</sup>
- ▶ Rewi Maniapoto had not liked the 'stoppage of the war at Taranaki' and had 'striven from the very first' to recommence it (Gorst, 1864);<sup>340</sup>

---

336. Browne, declaration 'to the Natives Assembled at Ngaruawahia', 21 May 1861 (doc A23, pp 369–370).

337. Browne, declaration 'to the Natives Assembled at Ngaruawahia', 21 May 1861 (doc A23, p 370).

338. Browne, declaration 'to the Natives Assembled at Ngaruawahia', 21 May 1861 (doc A23, p 370).

339. Gorst, The Maori King, p 146 (doc A23, p 358).

340. Gorst, The Maori King, p 287 (doc K23(a), p 16).

- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto's losses in the Taranaki war were 'slight' compared to those of others, and they were charged with 'holding aloof from several fights from cowardice and treachery' (Gorst, March 1862),<sup>341</sup>
- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto were warlike and had gone 'mad after soldiering' as a result of the Taranaki war, and they resisted magistrates because they preferred disorder and misdeeds to law and order (Gorst, March 1862),<sup>342</sup>
- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto 'lost very few men' in Taranaki but had done 'all the house-burning' and had taken lots of plunder, setting 'all the rest of the Waikato Chiefs at defiance' in their determination to keep their 'booty' (Governor Grey, November 1861),<sup>343</sup>
- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto were 'rebels' who 'burnt the greater part' of the settlers' houses in Taranaki and who took most of the plunder during the war, but could not be punished 'except after a general and successful war' (Premier Alfred Domett, May 1863),<sup>344</sup>
- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto had 'less excuse to take up arms' in defence of Te Rangitāke than many of his Taranaki allies (Premier Alfred Domett, May 1863).<sup>345</sup>

These allegations point to a mindset which led the Crown to blame Ngāti Maniapoto for the resumption of war in Taranaki in 1863,<sup>346</sup> and provided one of the pretexts for invading the Waikato (as we discuss later in the chapter).

We turn next to draw our final conclusions and make Treaty findings.

6.4.4 Treaty analysis and findings

In its deed of settlement with Te Ātiawa, the Crown acknowledged that the Taranaki war constituted an injustice and a Treaty breach, and that it unfairly treated Te Ātiawa as being in rebellion.<sup>347</sup> In our inquiry, the Crown repeated its acknowledgement that the Taranaki war was an injustice, but made no concessions of Treaty breach other than in respect of confiscation. Crown counsel argued that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori land interests 'were away from Waitara', and Crown actions in 1860 and 1861 'did not threaten Rohe Pōtae Māori directly'. The Crown drew a distinction between the Taranaki and Waikato wars; Ngāti Maniapoto were justified, it said, in taking up arms when Crown troops crossed the Mangatāwhiri, because they 'had strong ties to the land north of the Puniu river'. No such concession was made for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and the Taranaki war of 1860–1861.<sup>348</sup>

In respect of Te Rohe Pōtae involvement in the Taranaki war, we received no evidence or submissions about the law of rebellion or the legal right of self-defence against unlawful Crown aggression. In our view, it is not necessary in any case to determine whether Ngāti Maniapoto and other Te Rohe Pōtae groups were 341. Gorst, 'Report on the State of the Upper Waikato District', March 1862 (doc A23, p 359).

342. Gorst, 'Report on the State of the Upper Waikato District', March 1862 (doc A23, p 359).

343. Grey to Newcastle, 2 November 1861 (doc A23, p 365).

344. Domett, memorandum to Grey, 2 May 1863 (doc A23, p 365).

345. Domett, memorandum to Grey, 2 May 1863 (doc A23, p 366).

346. See document A23, p 434.

347. Te Ātiawa and the Crown, 'Deed of Settlement of Historical Claims', 9 August 2014, p 29.

348. Submission 3.4.300, pp 1–2, 7–8.

legally in rebellion or legally exercising a right of self-defence. Our jurisdiction is a Treaty one and we make our findings accordingly. We do note the submission from counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa that the lawfulness of the Crown's actions is significant in respect of the seriousness of the Crown's Treaty breaches,<sup>349</sup> but it is not determinative.

Professor James Belich stated that the Kingitanga tribes 'entered the war reluctantly, cautiously, and with essentially defensive objectives in mind'.<sup>350</sup> This accords with our understanding of their motives and intentions, as outlined above in section 6.4.2. Ngāti Maniapoto and other Kingitanga tribes entered the war only after lengthy debate and careful inquiry as to who was in the wrong, and only after Te Ātiawa placed Waitara under the King's protection and sought their help. The question then arises: what were they defending and why?

We note first the findings of the Taranaki Tribunal in respect of Te Ātiawa's southern neighbours, Ngāti Ruanui:

To prevent the sale [of Waitara], Kingi obstructed the survey of the land. Troops were brought in, Kingi was attacked, and the war began. It must have been obvious that if Waitara could be taken that easily, despite the opposition of a major rangatira known as a former Government ally, Waitotara and other places could not be far behind. On that basis, the southern tribes could have had no option, if they wished to keep their land, but to oppose the Governor in the war. This, they did. For his part, Kingi adopted the politics of the southern tribes, calling upon a larger collectivity for support by placing his lands under the mana of the Maori King.

Given the background described, when the war began in the north, southern hapu had little practical option but to join in. The Governor's policy and intention were clear. They would not be able to retain their own homes or the status to which they were entitled under his policy and laws, and had thus to defend their own positions once Kingi was attacked.<sup>351</sup>

In our view, this same reasoning applies to the tribes to the north of Te Ātiawa. The whole of Taranaki was placed under martial law in February 1860.<sup>352</sup> No one could have predicted how far north the war might spread. Governor Grey's admission in 1863, quoted above in section 6.4.2, is also relevant. He argued that Māori believed a new system of 'taking lands' had been established by the Crown's seizure of Waitara. They believed, he wrote, that if 'they did not succeed by a general and combined resistance in preventing their houses and lands being taken by the Government from the Natives of the Waitara, they would have been each in

---

349. Submission 3.4.281, p 27. This submission was made in relation to the Crown's concessions about the Waikato war.

350. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 89.

351. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 59–60, 80.

352. Memorandum 3.1.162, p 6.

their turn despoiled in detail of their lands'.<sup>353</sup> This evidence from the time accords with the findings of the Taranaki Tribunal in respect of Ngāti Ruanui. For Ngāti Maniapoto, whose lands lay at the northern end of Taranaki, this threat was particularly important. The claimants told us that they fought against unjustified Crown aggression in Taranaki to defend their southern lands, and our view is that this was justified in Treaty terms.

We also note the relevant consideration for this Tribunal of customary law and customary kinship links. After careful inquiry, Ngāti Maniapoto and other Kingitanga tribes decided that Te Rangitāke was in the right, and that the governor and Te Teira were in the wrong. In those circumstances, tikanga and their tino rangatiratanga under article 2 justified them in coming to the defence of their kin who faced an unjust attack, which they duly did.

Lastly, Ngāti Maniapoto had a recent history of frequent interventions in Taranaki. These included seeking to negotiate the controlled return to the region of those iwi and hapū they had taken north or forced to migrate south. The lengthy negotiations in 1848 surrounding the return of Te Rangitāke's Te Ātiawa people to Waitara are evidence that Ngāti Maniapoto considered they had ongoing influence and interests there. This assertion of Ngāti Maniapoto interests continued to be convenient to the Crown on occasion, as late as August 1859. They did not perceive Taranaki as outside their proper sphere of interests and action, and three Taranaki tribes had placed the land in question under the King's protection and authority. Those tribes had sought assistance in defending themselves against unjust Crown aggression. All these circumstances point to a finding that the Crown breached the Treaty when it treated Ngāti Maniapoto (and affiliated Te Rohe Pōtae groups) as 'rebels'. We accept that the Crown did not attack those groups directly. Nonetheless, it was not consistent with the Crown's Treaty obligations of partnership and fairness to treat those groups as 'rebels' for fighting in defence of their southern lands and their kin (in response to an unjust attack by the Crown). This was especially the case after Te Rohe Pōtae and other Kingitanga leaders agreed with Wiremu Tamihana that peace should be established, and accordingly withdrew from the district. The Crown continued to perceive Ngāti Maniapoto and their leader, Rewi Maniapoto, in very negative terms as a result of the Taranaki war. It continued to label them as warlike 'rebels' up to the outbreak of the Waikato war in 1863 (see section 6.4.3.2). More generally, the Taranaki war had a similar consequence for the Kingitanga, including the Te Rohe Pōtae groups who supported it. The two wars are directly linked, not least for this reason, as we discuss in the following sections.

6.5 DID THE CROWN SEEK TO AVOID WAR IN WAIKATO?

Crown counsel submitted that the Treaty imposes a duty on both Treaty partners to 'seek to resolve issues between themselves peacefully'. The Crown also submitted that ‘the use of non-peaceful means to resolve issues between itself and its citizens, or any group of its citizens, should occur in exceptional situations only, and generally only after it has exhausted all reasonable peaceful means.’<sup>354</sup> The fundamental issue in this section of our chapter is whether the Crown met this test in respect of the invasion of the Waikato in 1863.

---

353. Grey, 'Memorandum by His Excellency stating reasons for abandoning Waitara Purchase', 22 April 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-2, p 8.

Crown counsel argued that Governor Grey met with the Waikato chiefs and offered them a form of self-government as an alternative to that which had ‘sparked their opposition to the Crown’. This included Grey’s ‘New Institutions’ and possibly the offer of a quasi-provincial government. In the Crown’s view, however, the Kīngitanga chiefs were unlikely to accept the governor having a veto over their laws, and communications had broken down on both sides by mid-1862. Crown counsel accepted, however, that Grey has been condemned for failing to work with and support Kīngitanga ‘moderates’.<sup>355</sup>

Additionally, the Crown submitted that ‘British sovereignty did not preclude all Māori authority . . . from having a legal status in the new colony’. Crown counsel accepted that ‘[w]hether the Crown constituted new forms of government in a way consistent with Treaty principles is a proper matter of debate’.<sup>356</sup> In the context of Grey’s governorship in 1861–1863, the Crown noted that native districts under section 71 of the Constitution Act (explained below) and the Māori King giving his assent to the laws of a State rūnanga were both debated during that period.<sup>357</sup>

In the claimants’ view the war was entirely avoidable. Claimant counsel cited Professor Ward, who condemned the Crown for ‘failing to support and work with Kīngitanga moderates’. Because the war was avoidable, the Crown’s resort to war against Māori communities was in breach of the Treaty.<sup>358</sup> The claimants also argued that Grey’s New Institutions did not recognise Māori authority but rather sought to control it. In Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae, this was seen as a direct threat to the Kīngitanga, combined as it was with the governor’s construction of a military road from South Auckland to Mangatāwhiri and his plan to put armed steamers on the Waikato River. In fact, the claimants argued, Grey planned to invade the Waikato ‘almost from the moment he stepped off the boat in September 1861’.<sup>359</sup> He took none of the ‘many options available to the Crown to negotiate and avoid conflict’.<sup>360</sup> Those options included declaring native districts under section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852 or constituting Māori provinces. What was crucial was some form of negotiation to recognise and include the Kīngitanga in the machinery of the State. The Kīngitanga were willing to negotiate, the claimants said, but the governor ‘omitted to engage’ with them.<sup>361</sup>

354. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

355. Submission 3.4.300, pp 10, 11.

356. Submission 3.4.312, p 1.

357. Submission 3.4.300, pp 10–11.

358. Submission 3.4.391, pp 4–5.

359. Submission 3.4.391, pp 6–7; submission 3.4.130(e), pp 12–13.

360. Submission 3.4.130(e), p 12.

361. Submission 3.4.281, pp 19–22.

Moreover, claimant counsel submitted that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who supported the Kingitanga were simply exercising their tino rangatiratanga to manage their own lands and affairs by means of their own institutions, as they had a right to do under the Treaty. The governor had no right to resort to war and suppress these institutions by force.<sup>362</sup>

In this section of our chapter, we consider these issues and address the question of whether Governor Grey negotiated with the Kingitanga and sought a fair and reasonable accommodation with the Māori authority it represented. The issue of good faith is also relevant and hinges on whether Grey was getting ready to attack the Waikato while seemingly looking for a peaceful accommodation.

The first question to consider, however, is why – under first Browne and then Grey – war did not break out in 1861, given Browne's ultimatum to the Waikato.

6.5.1 Were there opportunities for the Crown to recognise Kingitanga authority in 1861?

6.5.1.1 Why did war not break out in 1861?

Governor Browne was capable of recognising and providing for Māori authority in various ways. He was reluctant to use section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852, under which the Crown could set aside Māori districts in which Māori law would prevail (unless inconsistent with the principles of humanity). Partly, this was because Browne believed that it did not allow for Māori authorities to enact new laws, but this was incorrect according to legal opinion at the time (the chief justice in 1858) and since (Professor FM Brookfield in 1999). Browne also had no funds with which to assist separate Māori districts, which would operate outside the authority of the colonial government.<sup>363</sup> We agree with the Central North Island Tribunal that section 71 provided a means for the Crown to accommodate the autonomy sought by (and expressed through) the Kingitanga.<sup>364</sup> Browne did convene a kind of parliament of chiefs at Kohimarama in 1860, and planned to continue those conferences annually, but many of the most committed Kingitanga supporters were not invited.<sup>365</sup> Nonetheless, the governor was looking for ways to provide for some form of Māori authority.<sup>366</sup> By 1861, however, the Taranaki war had convinced him that the Kingitanga was incompatible with the authority of the Queen, and he was determined to secure its absolute and unconditional submission – militarily if necessary.

Professor Belich summarised the events of April–September 1861 as follows:

After the Taranaki War, it seemed clear to Browne that the Kingites had to be compelled to submit to British rule. He sent an ultimatum to the Movement's leaders, and when it was rejected, he decided to invade the Waikato. Though many settlers agreed

362. Submission 3.4.391, pp 4, 6–8.

363. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 226–228.

364. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 226–228.

365. Document A23, pp 277–279, 294–295, 302; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 228–231; Wai 903 RO1, doc A143, pp 94, 99–100.

366. Document A23, pp 393–394.

that this was necessary, the more perceptive among them felt that the resources were not available. Browne remained determined. Then . . . he was dismissed and replaced by Grey.<sup>367</sup>

The issue of invasion was debated in April 1861. General Cameron was ‘eager’ to invade immediately.<sup>368</sup> He wanted to ‘punish the people “for their participation in the rebellion”’.<sup>369</sup> The Attorney-General (Frederick Whitaker) and the Native Secretary (Donald McLean) advised caution. Whitaker wanted the ‘Waikatos’ to have time to consider their response to the ultimatum, but agreed that force would be absolutely necessary if they chose not to submit to the governor’s demands.<sup>370</sup> According to Whitaker, however, an invasion would have to be much more than a raid; ‘the reduction of the Waikatos to submission by force’ would require occupation as well as invasion of the district. The Attorney-General was unsure whether there were enough troops – or it was the right season – for such an operation. McLean advised that poor roads and communication difficulties would make it very difficult.<sup>371</sup> The governor agreed that the forces available were insufficient and a winter invasion too tricky, especially since there had to be enough troops to protect the towns from any reprisals.<sup>372</sup> Browne decided to wait and proceed in September 1861, even though it was by no means certain that there would be enough troops by that time.<sup>373</sup>

The terms of the draft ultimatum were debated within the Government in April 1861. McLean and T H Smith advised Browne to soften his stance. The only change made in response to their advice was to delete the requirement that the King’s flag must be taken down at Ngāruawāhia. Dr O’Malley noted: ‘This modification to the original ultimatum was made not on the basis that it was acceptable for the flag to remain but because it was believed the requirement was covered by the demand for a general submission to the Queen’s authority.’<sup>374</sup>

The final text of the ultimatum was presented at Ngāruawāhia on 21 May 1861. We have already quoted the opening paragraphs of it in section 6.4.3.2. The ultimatum stated that if Māori set aside the authority of the Queen and the law, they would no longer be protected by the Treaty of Waitangi. The Treaty made the Queen ‘a protecting shade for the Maori’s land’ but when Māori forfeited that protection, ‘the land will remain their own so long only as they are strong enough to keep it; might and not right will become their sole title to possession.’<sup>375</sup> McLean and Smith argued that this sounded like a threat, and predicted that the

367. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 119.

368. Document A23, p 355.

369. Cameron to Browne, 15 April 1861 (Wai 686 ROI, doc A2 (Parsonson), p 62).

370. Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, p 61.

371. Whitaker minute, 13 April 1861 (doc A23, pp 355–356).

372. Document A23, p 355.

373. Document A23, p 356.

374. Document A23, p 373.

375. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 210 (AJHR 1861, E1-B, pp 11–12).

governor's demands would be rejected by the great majority of the iwi.<sup>376</sup> The specific demands were 'submission without reserve to the Queen's sovereignty' and the law (the text made it clear that retaining the King was inconsistent with this), the return of 'plunder', and compensation for any property which they destroyed during the war.<sup>377</sup>

Rewi Maniapoto, Wiremu Tamihana, Wiremu Kīngi Te Rangitāke, and other rangatira were already on their way to Ngāruawāhia for a 'great meeting'.<sup>378</sup> This may be the meeting which Rewi referred to when he met the governor at Waitara (see above), in which they had intended to prepare for discussions with the governor. The hui was diverted to discussion of Browne's ultimatum instead. According to Gorst, Tamihana expressed the views of all those assembled when he said that the King's flag was not intended to put aside either the Queen's supremacy or her protection of their 'rights and privileges'. Rather, it symbolised the agreement to part with no more land, and to establish their own institutions to 'suppress evil among themselves'.<sup>379</sup> Tamihana praised the results of those institutions in resolving disputes and regulating community concerns (such as adultery and the importing of alcohol). The good that Kingitanga institutions were doing was compared to the governor's 'evil' in starting the Taranaki war. Regarding the second term of the ultimatum, the rangatira agreed that very little 'plunder' had actually made its way to the Waikato. Further, they considered it unfair of the governor to demand compensation when he had offered none to the Te Ātiawa whose pā had been destroyed and whose property had been taken by the troops. Finally, the hui agreed that any attempt to survey the lands of Te Rangitāke's tribe or to move troops to the Mangatāwhiri would be considered a resumption of the war on the governor's part.<sup>380</sup>

The King's council sent a letter in reply to the governor on 7 June. The letter did not respond to the specific terms in the ultimatum. The rangatira said that they had heard of the general's eagerness for war, and they urged Browne not to be hasty but rather to wait and 'let the talk come first'. Warfare should be 'that of the lips alone', and the council assured the governor that they had no intention of fighting.<sup>381</sup> This was a plea for calm and a request for dialogue. Dr O'Malley suggested that Browne could hardly have received a more conciliatory response.<sup>382</sup> But it was not the submission without reserve that the governor had demanded.

Browne's view was that the Kingitanga tribes had refused to submit, since they would not agree to give up the King. Tamihana had written separately, urging the governor to 'leave this King to stand upon his own place'.<sup>383</sup> The governor refused

---

376. Document A23, pp 372–373.

377. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 209, 211 (AJHR 1861, E1-B, pp 11–12).

378. Gorst, The Maori King, p 173 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 212).

379. Gorst, The Maori King, p 174 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 226).

380. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 225–226.

381. 'Runanga Maori' to governor, 7 June 1861, AJHR, 1861, E-1B, p 18 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 227–228).

382. Document A23, p 379.

383. Wiremu Tamihana, reply to the declaration, not dated (doc A23, p 374).

to accept this, arguing that it was ‘evident that if the Maoris will not submit this part of the colony must be abandoned by all who will not yield obedience to Maori law, of which the aptest symbol is the tomahawk.’<sup>384</sup>

Sir William Martin, the former chief justice, disagreed and advised the governor to work with the Kingitanga rather than trying to suppress it. In his view, the existence of the Kingitanga was not a challenge to the Queen’s sovereignty.<sup>385</sup> Nor did the British Government support the idea of a war to suppress the Kingitanga. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Duke of Newcastle, was puzzled by Browne’s decisions. The Duke had seen no evidence that Māori were threatening violence or insurrection in support of the King, and so long as they did not start a war he saw no reason why the Crown should do so. It appeared to him that ‘we are preparing to attack them in vengeance for a name’ (emphasis in original).<sup>386</sup> But the Colonial Office was usually wary of overruling the judgement of the man on the spot. The Duke of Newcastle surmised that a Māori ‘appeal to arms’ in the King’s name was in fact expected by the governor. The Secretary of State for the Colonies agreed that ‘force must be met by force’ if the King’s people started a war.<sup>387</sup>

From the evidence before us, it is clear that the Kingitanga was not planning a war in the King’s name. Far from it. Wiremu Tamihana, Rewi Maniapoto, Epiha Tokohihi, and other chiefs had agreed to make peace at Taranaki in March 1861, and Rewi Maniapoto had met with the governor at Waitara. Rewi had also agreed to a meeting of the chiefs and the governor to resolve matters. That never happened because of Browne’s ultimatum in May, to which the Kingitanga’s response was an appeal for calm and dialogue.

Governor Browne’s preparations for war continued in 1861 but were interrupted by two things: first, by a change of ministry in the colonial Parliament; and, secondly, by the arrival of the news that Browne was to be replaced by Sir George Grey. From that point on, Browne became a caretaker governor and could not commit his successor to a war. Dr O’Malley concluded:

By July 1861 his plans for the invasion of Waikato, timed to commence the following September, were well advanced. It was only the news that reached New Zealand towards the end of the month of Browne’s imminent replacement as governor by Sir George Grey which saw those plans put on hold.<sup>388</sup>

Crown counsel emphasised the importance of the change of ministry and Browne’s decision to call a second national conference of chiefs at Kohimarama:

---

384. Document A23, p 375 (Browne to Newcastle, 6 July 1861).

385. Document A23, pp 375–376; submission 3.4.198, pp 12–13.

386. Document A23, p 376 (Newcastle, minute on Browne to Newcastle, 16 May 1861).

387. Document A23, p 376 (Newcastle, minute on Browne to Newcastle, 16 May 1861).

388. Document A23, p 388.

Historians generally consider that there was a very real possibility that war would break out at this point. By June 1861, preparations were being made by the Crown's forces to defend Auckland 'and to enforce the submission of the Waikato tribes, should they refuse to accede to the terms offered and to acknowledge the Queen's supremacy'. During the 1861 session of Parliament, however, a 'peace party' led by William Fox brought down the Stafford Government. Fox and his supporters largely shared Gore Browne's view of the Kingitanga and agreed with his plan to call a second Kohimarama Conference to discuss the Crown's policies with the Māori leadership to expedite the introduction of local government institutions for Māori. Fox insisted 'that before we go to war real negotiations, carried on by parties in whom the Natives had confidence, should be undertaken . . . to induce the Natives to submit to the authority of the Crown.'<sup>389</sup>

The idea of a second Kohimarama conference was discussed with Tamihana in July 1861. The Rotorua rangatira Wiremu Maihi Te Rangikaheke visited Peria and urged Tamihana to meet with the governor and attend the conference. According to Te Rangikaheke, Tamihana agreed that the Treaty of Waitangi recognised and protected the 'mana Maori' in respect of authority over both people and land:

Ko te Tiriti ki Waitangi, ara ko te whakaae tanga a te Kuini i te mana maori ki a tohungia mana tangata, mana whenua.<sup>390</sup>

The Treaty of Waitangi, that is, the Queen's consent to the 'mana' Maori being respected, in regard to the men and the land.<sup>391</sup>

Te Rangikaheke reported that there were many things to discuss, including 'the setting up of the king' and the 'Queen's setting up of the "mana" Maori' (and, presumably, how those two things stood in relation to one another).<sup>392</sup>

As a result of the overtures from Te Rangikaheke and missionary J A Wilson (who was sent to Tamihana by the governor in June 1861), Tamihana offered to meet with the governor at the forthcoming second Kohimarama conference. His intention was that he would put the Kingitanga's case to the assembled chiefs, Browne would put his, and the chiefs would judge between them.<sup>393</sup> The King's council, however, was not willing that he should go, and Browne became a 'lame-duck' governor when the news arrived that he was to be replaced.<sup>394</sup>

The 'peace ministry' or 'peace party' was not aptly named.<sup>395</sup> Professor Ann Parsonson pointed out that Premier Fox was 'ready to advise vigorous war

389. Submission 3.4.300, p 4.

390. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 242 (Wiremu Maihi Te Rangikaheke to Browne, 9 July 1861).

391. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 243 (Wiremu Maihi Te Rangikaheke to Browne, 9 July 1861).

392. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 244 (Wiremu Maihi Te Rangikaheke to Browne, 9 July 1861).

393. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 245.

394. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 246–247; doc A23, p 386.

395. Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, p 64; Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 132–133.

measures whenever Governor Gore Browne decided the time was ripe.<sup>396</sup> The new ministry did want to try to negotiate and to avoid war with the Waikato tribes if possible.<sup>397</sup> In Taranaki, however, they wanted to resume the war and ‘bring the Ngatiruanuis and Taranakis into submission’ so that the district could be widely settled.<sup>398</sup> The Fox Government planned to open talks with Wiremu Tamihana at Tuakau. ‘[I]f there proved to be a prospect of a satisfactory result’, wrote Fox, then the ministry intended to arrange meetings with Governor Browne. But the new Government found itself in the same situation as Browne; they had to suspend any operations (either towards peace or war) and wait for the newly appointed Sir George Grey to arrive.<sup>399</sup>

Grey arrived in Auckland on 26 September 1861. After consulting his Ministers and developing his plans, he wrote to the Colonial Office at the end of November that he did not intend to enforce Governor Browne’s ultimatum. The time for war was not right, he argued, because adequate preparations had not been made. The result of war at that time would be a ‘general war’ (not confined to the Waikato) which the governor considered would be ‘disastrous’ for the colonists.<sup>400</sup>

Thus, the invasion of the Waikato in 1861 was prevented largely by a change of governors and the lack of sufficient troops at that time.<sup>401</sup> In the next section, we turn to examine Grey’s policies and the question of whether the Crown genuinely attempted to avoid war and negotiate a reasonable accommodation with the Kingitanga during his governorship.

6.5.1.2 Grey’s mandate from the Colonial Office

By April 1861, the Colonial Office was mainly persuaded of the need for a new governor. Sir Frederic Rogers said that what was needed was someone who could get Māori to adopt a middle course. By this, he meant a course between ‘disclaiming the Queen’s supremacy & abandoning what they look on as the means of securing good Government & perpetuating the practical independence which they at present enjoy’.<sup>402</sup> The Colonial Office believed that Sir George Grey would be the right person, partly due to his supposed success in handling Māori during his first governorship. The Duke of Newcastle instructed Grey that his ‘primary mission was the “establishment of peace”’.<sup>403</sup> This was qualified by a statement that it would be better to prolong the war with all its evils than give Māori an impression that the Crown was weak. At that point, the British Government was not aware that

396. Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, p 64.

397. Document A23, pp 392–393.

398. Document A23(e), p 6 (‘Minute by Ministers on the position of the Colony at the date of the arrival of Sir George Grey: chiefly in relation to the Native insurrection’, 8 October 1861).

399. Document A23(e), p 3 (‘Minute by Ministers on the position of the Colony at the date of the arrival of Sir George Grey: chiefly in relation to the Native insurrection’, 8 October 1861).

400. Grey to Newcastle, 30 November 1861 (doc A23, p 396).

401. Document A23, p 356.

402. Rogers, minute, 13 April 1861 (Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”?’; p 94); Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 138.

403. Newcastle to Grey, 5 June 1861 (Wai 903 ROI, doc A143), p 146).

fighting had already ceased in Taranaki as a result of the truce arranged in March 1861.<sup>404</sup> In terms of the Kingitanga, Grey was given a 'mandate to seek a modus vivendi with the Kingitanga and avoid war'.<sup>405</sup> This is crucial for the claims before us, for it was the governor's failure to do this which resulted in the Waikato war.

6.5.1.3 Grey's choice of native policy: the 'New Institutions'

What tools were available to assist a new governor in his primary mission to establish peace from a position of strength, not weakness, and to persuade Kingitanga leaders to adopt Rogers' middle course? The Secretary of State advised Grey that the Crown's most important power had not yet been exercised: the power to declare 'native districts' under section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852 (discussed above). Use of this tool would remove Māori from the power of the colonial assemblies and enable them to live under the power of their own institutions and laws. In both private and public instructions, the Colonial Office urged this on the new governor, although the final discretion was once again left to the man on the spot.<sup>406</sup>

Another tool available to the new governor was the Kohimarama conference, which Browne (and the settler Parliament) had agreed should be an annual event.<sup>407</sup> Browne envisaged the conference as a means of bringing the chiefs together from around the country in a 'sort of Maori parliament'.<sup>408</sup> This would give them a degree of power and influence at the central government level if used effectively.

Also available was the idea of local state institutions of self-government, recognised as lawmakers by both the Crown and tribal communities, but not as separate as districts set aside under section 71. A Pākehā commissioner or magistrate could work alongside official rūnanga at the district and community levels, with Māori assessors and a Māori police force. The New Zealand Parliament had already passed legislation which could provide for this in 1858 but it had not been progressed by the Government – largely because Parliament was not prepared to fund it – but Browne had been interested in trialing it in Muriwhenua.<sup>409</sup>

Of these tools, Sir George Grey chose the third and rejected the other two out of hand. The claimants have condemned Grey for refusing to declare native districts under section 71 and for cancelling Browne's plans for national conferences.<sup>410</sup> He told the Colonial Office that he doubted the wisdom of calling 'a number of semi-barbarous Natives together to frame a Constitution for themselves'.<sup>411</sup> Professor Ward commented that Grey did not convene 'an annual assembly of rangatira' at

404. Wai 903 ROI, doc A143), p146.

405. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 94; submission 3.4.300, p 10.

406. Document A23, pp 149–151, 234, 381–382.

407. Document A23, p 295; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 178–179.

408. Loveridge, 'The Development and Introduction of Institutions for the Governance of Maori' (Wai 903 ROI, doc A143), p 94 (Browne to Denison, 27 June 1860).

409. Document A23, pp 260–262, 393–394, 407.

410. Submission 3.4.281, pp 20–21; see also document A23, p 394.

411. Document A23, p 394 (Grey to Newcastle, 30 November 1861).

Kohimarama because neither ‘he nor his ministers wanted a rival central Maori authority to develop’.<sup>412</sup> As far as we are aware, Grey never explained his decision not to use section 71 of the Constitution Act. It is likely that he saw his very different proposals for State rūnanga as an acceptable alternative – especially to the settlers. He did not want to give the Kīngitanga a separate district (virtually its own province), independent of settler authority, because it would give the Kīngitanga a secure base from which to ‘continue its campaign to win support among Maori everywhere’.<sup>413</sup> It would also shut out any form of land sales, so it would not be acceptable to the settlers on that ground. The governor of New South Wales, Sir William Denison, had suggested that the passage of time would persuade Māori to sell voluntarily so long as a full market price was paid, but this advice was not tested.<sup>414</sup>

Grey did accept, however, that Māori should have the same rights as Pākehā to govern themselves by their own assemblies and to make their own laws.<sup>415</sup> His plan involved the creation of ‘New Institutions’, using the Native Districts Regulation Act 1858 and Native Circuit Courts Act 1858, to offer a form of State-sanctioned self-government to Māori communities at the local level. In brief, he intended to divide the North Island into 20 districts, each supervised by a Pākehā civil commissioner working with a district rūnanga. The district rūnanga would be elected by smaller community-level rūnanga, and would have the power to make bylaws for the governor’s assent, build hospitals and schools, and control land sales. The authority of the commissioner, magistrates, and rūnanga would be supported by a Māori police force, recruited and paid by the Crown.<sup>416</sup> The immediate questions which arose for our inquiry district were: would there be a role for the King in the State rūnanga, and would the Kīngitanga tribes accept these official rūnanga (along with Pākehā magistrates) in place of their own? These questions could only be answered by negotiations between the governor and Kīngitanga leaders, likely requiring some time and build up of trust before an accommodation could be reached. But, as noted above, Grey’s mandate from the Colonial Office was to reach some kind of workable accommodation with the Kīngitanga and avoid war.

6.5.1.4 Discussion of the New Institutions in the Waikato, December 1861

Governor Grey did not immediately approach the Kīngitanga or open talks with leaders of the Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae. He started with Northland, where he felt assured of a good response to his New Institutions.<sup>417</sup>

In December 1861, John Gorst was sent to the Waikato as civil commissioner for the upper districts, appointed before any discussions had been held at all. His initial role was to sell Grey’s plan for State-sanctioned institutions. The Government instructed him to point out that self-constituted tribal rūnanga and magistrates

---

412. Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”?’; pp 94–95.

413. Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”?’; p 95.

414. Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”?’; pp 92, 95.

415. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 255.

416. Document A23, pp 394–395.

417. Document A23, p 396.

An Exchange between Governor Grey and Tipene Tahatika, Taupiri, 16 December 1861

Tipene: Then I will ask a question. Are you opposed to my King?

The Governor: I do not care about him; but I think it is a thing that will lead to trouble. It will be stopped by such means as I have adopted, and will die out.

Tipene: If the King is brought to nought by your plans, well and good. You say, 'What is the King to you?' We say, 'It is a thing of importance to us.' And the reason why we say so is this, that we have seen the good of it. The quarrels of the Maories amongst themselves have, for the last two years, diminished; and now, by means of it, many evils that have arisen have been put down without war. And therefore I say, the King is an important thing to us. Now I ask you, Are you altogether opposed to my King? If you consent to my question, we shall then work quietly; for we are not the chief cause of the King, whereas you have the final decision about your own system. So I ask you, Are you altogether opposed to my King? That you may say whether you are so or not.

The Governor: If you ask me as a friend, I tell you I think it a very bad thing.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Gorst, The Maori King, pp 229–230

were by definition 'lawless,' but that the Government was sympathetic and wanted to give them a lawful form of authority instead. In early December, Gorst visited Wiremu Tamihana and Ngāti Hauā. He reported a great deal of interest in the governor's proposals, but the sticking point was the King. They wanted their rūnanga to pass laws that required the King's assent as well as the governor's; on that basis, Tamihana was prepared to agree to the new system – but not before discussions had been held directly with Grey. Another issue was the settlers in the district (mostly traders and missionaries) and the enforcement of a ban on traders importing alcohol. Some inquired whether all settlers should not come under the King as well as the governor.<sup>418</sup> Privately, 'many chiefs told Gorst that Tamihana approved of the proposal that the governor and Maori King should together agree to the laws of the rūnanga, and if Grey could only bring such a scheme to fruition all would agree.'<sup>419</sup>

These exchanges between Gorst and Ngāti Hauā in December 1861 showed the key fundamentals needed for an agreement between the Crown and the Kingitanga tribes. It was by no means clear that all the Kingitanga leaders and iwi would have accepted the accommodation discussed by Tamihana, but they would certainly not have settled for less. Key requirements included: the assent of both the

---

418. Document A23, pp 397–398.

419. Document A23, p 398.

King and the governor would be necessary for laws passed by the rŭnanga; the rŭnanga's laws would apply to the handful of settlers living in Kingitanga districts (such as a ban on importing alcohol); and final decisions on this matter could only be reached in a direct dialogue between the rangatira and the governor.

Later in December 1861, Governor Grey came at last to the Waikato but he only visited two lower Waikato settlements, Kohanga and Taupiri. Grey used what Dr O'Malley called a 'mixture of thinly veiled threat and pacific promises', which 'perhaps reflected the fact that Grey was not simply preparing for peace but was also simultaneously planning for war' (emphasis added).<sup>420</sup> At the hui, Grey stated variously that:

- ▶ he did not mind whether a chief was called a king because he would look upon all chiefs as the kings of their tribes, and those kings who would work with him would be 'wealthy kings, and kings of wealthy peoples' (all the others he would 'not care for');<sup>421</sup>
- ▶ he had been sent to New Zealand with a very large force of troops, and he would be able to obtain as many more troops as were necessary to establish law and order, but he also promised that he would never attack the 'people of Waikato' first, and they could 'rest in peace and quietness';
- ▶ if a tribe or tribes called their chief a king and raised a flag he thought it was nonsense and would not mind it, but because 'the name of king has been mixed up with many troubles and is much disliked by many people', he would 'get rid of it, and find some other name';
- ▶ he was going to 'conquer and kill' the supporters of the King with good; and
- ▶ the 'king movement' should be stopped and would be by the plans (for New Institutions) that he had just explained to them.<sup>422</sup>

Grey's statement paraphrased in the final bullet point above was made during a debate between the governor and Tipene Tahatika, one of two envoys sent by the Kingitanga to the hui at Taupiri (see sidebar).

Thus, Grey did not see his New Institutions as a means to negotiate a modus vivendi with the Kingitanga. A role for the King in the New Institutions was not a topic he would permit for discussion and agreement. Rather, the governor planned to offer the New Institutions to neighbouring tribes as a way of starving the Kingitanga of potential support.<sup>423</sup> Any such offer to the Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae tribes would require them to put aside the King. Grey assumed that they would do so once they saw the advantages of his new system. Dr O'Malley pointed to a letter to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in which Grey stated:

Thus by degrees I hope the King movement will be eaten out, and, when the inferiority of their form of government is seen side by side with the superior one which

---

420. Document A23, pp 398–399.

421. Grey, speech to Waikato chiefs at Kohanga, 12 December 1861 (doc A23, pp 398–399).

422. Grey, speech to Waikato chiefs at Taupiri, 16 December 1861 (doc A23, pp 398–400).

423. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 120.

will be given to them, that the whole will at last readily embrace offers which are so advantageous to them.<sup>424</sup>

Meanwhile, Gorst recorded that the Kingitanga chiefs were left wondering what Grey intended to do with the large army that he had boasted about, and which he had said he could ‘increase indefinitely’.<sup>425</sup>

The Colonial Office, however, expected Grey to reach a modus vivendi with the Māori King.<sup>426</sup> In the British Government’s view, the use of force to extract a temporary ‘admission of the Queen’s rights’ would be pointless, while a war to break the power of the Kingitanga tribes implied a ‘desperate, tedious, and expensive war, to which it is impossible to look forward without horror’. Grey was instructed: ‘[T]he armed force should not be used for the mere purpose of exacting from the Maoris a verbal renunciation of the so-called King’.<sup>427</sup>

Gorst’s reports of his December 1861 meetings were forwarded to Britain, outlining the potential for a Crown–Kingitanga agreement if both King and governor assented to the rŭnanga’s laws. The Duke of Newcastle responded: ‘I see no difficulty, if they desire it, in requiring the assent of one of their Chiefs, whether [King] Matutaera or any other person, to the laws passed by the Runanga.’ The Duke wrote to Grey that: ‘Such an assent is in itself no more inconsistent with the sovereignty of Her Majesty than the assent of the Superintendent of a Province to laws passed by the Provincial Council.’<sup>428</sup>

This communication from the British Government fed the hopes of some for peace (see section 6.5.3.2). Nor does it seem irreconcilable with what Tamihana told the Reverend Ashwell in May 1861:

we will have but one Tikanga (rule) one Ture (law) and the Queen is a Fence for us all (Maoris and Pakehas, i.e. Europeans) ‘ohia me waiho te Kingi kia tu’ i.e. ‘but leave the King, let him stand’ ‘na me he mea he mahi he tana ki te Kuino [sic] me turaki ki raro’ (i.e. If he does any wrong against the Queen – then thrust him down) (inaianeī – he ingoa kau) – It is only a name – but let that name stand – he then drew a line and said the line is the Queen a Fence for all – thus 424. Document A23, p 400 (Grey to Newcastle, 6 December 1861).

425. Document A23, p 400; Gorst, The Maori King, p 231.

426. Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”?’ p 94.

427. Newcastle to Grey, 22 September 1861, BPP, 1862, vol 37 [3040], p 95 (IUP, vol 13, p 109); Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 123.

428. Document A23, p 398 (Newcastle to Grey, 16 March 1862); submission 3.4.300, p 11.

429. Document A23, pp 367–368 (Ashwell to Church Missionary Society, 1 May 1861, Ashwell letters and journals, qMs-0089, ATL).

Te Kingi, Tamihana said, was only a name: 'he ingoa kau'. Neither Browne, nor Grey who followed, could accept this. Nothing that Grey proposed between 1861 and 1863 came close to satisfying what the colonial authorities in London acknowledged was a reasonable request.

6.5.2 Preparing for war: roads, redoubts, and armed steamers

After visiting two lower Waikato settlements in December 1861, the governor went no further into the interior. This meant that he failed to engage with any Kingitanga centres or leaders. This was his only visit to the district until January 1863. For the whole of 1862, the governor refused to meet with or engage directly with the Kingitanga authorities. There were no negotiations at all, let alone good faith negotiations in search of an accommodation or 'modus vivendi'. Crown counsel accepted criticism that the Crown failed to work with and support 'moderate' Kingitanga leaders.<sup>430</sup> The fact is that the Crown did not try to work with or support any Kingitanga leaders.

In our hearings, some weight was given to Grey's statements in September 1861 that he intended to 'take the Waikato'.<sup>431</sup> At the end of September, Grey stayed with the outgoing governor for a week before Browne departed to Australia. Browne annotated a copy of Gorst's 1864 book, The Maori King, stating that he had invited the King's uncle, Tāmami Ngāpora, to come and visit Grey. But, 'he remained aloof for some time. I told Grey I did not think this looked well. He replied I think it is well for I want an excuse to take the Waikato.'<sup>432</sup>

Harriet Gore Browne, the governor's wife, wrote in January 1862: 'I heard him with my own ears tell Col Browne he hoped the natives would not submit as it would be much better for both races that they should be conquered.'<sup>433</sup> We do not think too much weight should be placed on these statements. Grey may not have spoken frankly with his predecessor.

The more important point is that, when Grey returned from his visit to Waikato in December 1861, he immediately ordered General Cameron to begin building a military road from Drury to the Waikato River – the Great South Road – and to construct fortifications on the border of the Waikato district.<sup>434</sup> The latter included the Queen's redoubt, able to hold 1,000 troops. This fort was completed in March 1863, and was located about a mile and a half from the Mangatāwhiri River.<sup>435</sup> A fort was also constructed to overlook (and command) the Waikato River at Te

430. Submission 3.4.300, p 11.

431. Transcript 4.1.12, pp 841–845; submission 3.4.281, p 29.

432. Browne, notes on Gorst, The Maori King, p 203 (doc A23, p 298).

433. Document A23(f)(i) (O'Malley), p 4 (Harriet Gore Browne to CW Richmond, 10 January 1862).

434. Grey to Newcastle, 7 January 1862, AJHR, 1862, E-1, sec 3, p 48; Grey to Cameron, 19 December 1861, AJHR, 1862, E-1, sec 3, p 49.

435. Document A23, p 420.

Ia.<sup>436</sup> Grey established a 'Commissariat Transport Corps' for logistical purposes, and sent an order for armed steamers to use on the Waikato River.<sup>437</sup>

The Taranaki Tribunal suggested that Grey maintained 'the policy of promoting peace while preparing for war'.<sup>438</sup> Belich argued that it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Grey planned the invasion of the Waikato well in advance of its execution, suggesting that the governor had a simultaneous 'peace policy' and 'war policy'.<sup>439</sup> For his part, O'Malley suggested that

While Grey had cancelled his predecessor's plans for an 1861 invasion of the Waikato district, he commenced almost immediate preparations for a future confrontation. Those preparations [included] the construction of the Great South Road, the erection of a large fort just north of the Mangatawhiri River, plans for a further road intended to run from Whaingaroa across to the Waipa district, and the introduction of armed steamers on the Waikato River . . .<sup>440</sup>

Grey informed the Colonial Office in April 1863 that, when he had arrived in New Zealand for his second governorship, it was clear that an invasion would be foolhardy in the present circumstances:

I soon found that from the dense forests, and impassable swamps, which intervened between Auckland and the country inhabited by the Waikato tribes, and from the want of roads or other means of communication, it was impossible to commence operations against them with any hope of success. On the contrary, they had become so confident in their own strength and resources, and were so encouraged and emboldened by the events of the recent war that the question was, how we could protect the country round Auckland from the attack they might at any moment make on it, and which they were certain to make if we began a war at Taranaki, or in any other part of the North Island.<sup>441</sup>

Grey described his preparations for war in 1862 as capable of being either defensive or offensive. He justified them as necessary for the defence of the Auckland district in the event of an attack from the Waikato. Professor Belich, however, argued that this was not the case because Grey's "defensible frontier" pointed the wrong way – it ran north-south instead of east-west.<sup>442</sup>

The evidence strongly suggests that the delay in starting a war was more for logistical reasons than a desire to negotiate or discover alternatives to war. Belich described the Waikato campaign as 'one of the best-prepared and best-organized

436. Gorst, The Maori King, p 289.

437. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 124–127.

438. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 88.

439. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 119–222, esp p 120.

440. Document A23, pp 420–423, 508; see also pp 358, 389–390, 391–419, 424–427, 504.

441. Document A22, p 25 (Grey to Newcastle, 6 April 1863, no 37, pp 353–354, CO 209/172, Archives New Zealand).

442. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 124.

ever undertaken by the British army.<sup>443</sup> If politics determined the purpose of the invasion, logistics seem to have determined almost every other aspect of the campaign: the start, the progress up the river, the march on Rangiaowhia, and, finally, the decision not to advance further into Maniapoto territory.

6.5.3 Were there opportunities for the recognition of Kingitanga authority in 1862–63?

6.5.3.1 Growing fear of attack in the Waikato

When the Waikato peoples heard of the intention to build the Great South Road and station troops at the junction of the Mangatāwhiri and the Waikato, they were very alarmed that the Crown intended to attack them.<sup>444</sup> The intention to place armed steamers on the river reinforced this alarm.<sup>445</sup> Claimant Harold Maniapoto stated:

Our Tupuna and other Maniapoto chiefs strongly suspected that the Crown intended to wage war on them to get what it wanted, land and total authority. They were in no doubt that this meant that the Crown sought the demise of their beloved Kingitanga and forfeiture of their customary land rights. A number of events were to finally allay any doubts that they may have had and finally convince them of their worst fears.<sup>446</sup>

One of those events was the construction of the Great South Road by about 2,300 troops in 1862.<sup>447</sup> Gorst suggested that this was fatal to any building of trust, because the rangatira ‘could never be misled as to what (was) the real design of this military undertaking’. From the moment they heard of it, he said, ‘they never swerved from the opinion that Sir George Grey’s ultimate intention was . . . war.’<sup>448</sup> Morehu McDonald told us that it pained him to drive down the Great South Road today, knowing that it was ‘built originally to carve, to drive a wedge right through our whenua, and that is what it was, a military road’.<sup>449</sup>

In addition to the Great South Road, Grey offered money to lower Waikato chiefs to build a road inland from Raglan to Whatawhata on the Waipā River – this time on Māori land. This caused great consternation in the Waikato, as the road would lead directly into Kingitanga territory. Rewi Maniapoto and Wiremu Tamihana agreed that this road must not be permitted. They succeeded in preventing its construction beyond the Queen’s land at Whāingaroa. Rewi was prepared to use force to stop this road but it proved unnecessary because the chief involved (Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia) realised that he had united the whole Waikato against

443. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 127.

444. Document A23, pp 404–405.

445. Gorst, The Maori King, pp 304–305.

446. Document K35, p 7.

447. The figure of 2,300 troops working on the road comes from Cameron to Grey, 24 December 1861, AJHR, 1862, E-1, sec 3, p 50.

448. Document K35, p 9 (Gorst, The Maori King, p 232).

449. Transcript 4.1.1, p 212.

him.<sup>450</sup> The claimants told us that Te Awaitaia's tribe, Ngāti Mahanga, were left deeply divided by the Crown's actions in trying to get a military road into the Waikato.<sup>451</sup>

6.5.3.2 The Peria hui, October 1862

Was it too late for the Crown to reach an accommodation with the Kingitanga by offering to recognise its authority in a reasonable and meaningful way? A great hui was called at Peria in October 1862 to discuss the growing sense of crisis among Kingitanga leaders. Dr O'Malley noted:

Rumours of bullet-proof steamers which would soon be patrolling the waters of the Waikato River, along with speculation that a landing port being constructed at the Queen's Redoubt was in fact the first phase of a planned bridge across to the King's territory, created considerable alarm and panic among the Waikato tribes in the middle months of 1862.<sup>452</sup>

The Peria hui was attended by tribal leaders from throughout the central North Island. Astonishingly, at this crucial point, the Native Minister refused an invitation to attend. Instead, he sent Gorst as the Crown's representative but with instructions to say nothing. Nor did the governor attend. The Native Minister, Francis Dillon Bell, wrote: 'I decided (and Grey quite concurred) that we should puzzle them and do best by saying nothing at the present moment.'<sup>453</sup> This was hardly a constructive approach, let alone a responsible one, given the growing tensions and fears of a military attack by the Crown.

It was left to Bishop Selwyn to try to seek an accommodation or modus vivendi in the absence of a Crown initiative. The bishop drew the attention of the hui to the despatch from the Duke of Newcastle, mentioned above, in which the Colonial Office agreed to a formal role for the King in approving laws, similar to that of a provincial superintendent in his district. Selwyn reported to the Government that it would still be possible to negotiate a compromise based on the Duke's proposal (which had, in turn, been based on Gorst's hui with Tamihana in December 1861). Given the wide attendance at the Peria hui, including that of Rewi Maniapoto and other Ngāti Maniapoto representatives, this ought to have been an important consideration for the Crown in the coming months. The people, reported Selwyn, also agreed that there should be one law for both races but that there was a 'Duality of Mana', and they were in no way prepared to give up the mana of the Kingitanga. There was no hatred of Pākehā evident at the hui.<sup>454</sup>

The resolutions of the Peria hui were sent to Premier Fox on 1 November 1862. These included that the Great South Road must stop at the Mangatāwhiri, no

450. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 281–284.

451. Submission 3.4.249(c), p 18.

452. Document A23, p 421.

453. Document A23, p 424 (Bell to Mantell, 23 October 1862).

454. Selwyn, report, 27 October 1862 (doc A23, pp 424–426). For a full discussion of accounts of the Peria hui, see Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 288–312.

steamer should be placed on the Waikato River, Pākehā living in the district would be well treated, and the governor would be invited to the Waikato so that matters could be settled with him. If agreement could be reached, the rangatira would agree to an investigation of the Waitara.<sup>455</sup> Trying to work out a final settlement at Taranaki had become another sticking point between the Kingitanga and the colonial Government. In brief, the leadership would not agree to an investigation of Waitara while the land remained under military occupation and the governor seemed to be threatening war against the Kingitanga.

6.5.3.3 Grey's visit to the Waikato, January 1863

In November and December 1862, Grey was invited repeatedly to come to the Waikato and enter into discussions with the chiefs. Nearly all of the speakers at Peria had expressed grave concerns about the Crown's intentions but wanted to maintain friendly relations with the settlers and the Government. Dr O'Malley commented:

Under such circumstances, some kind of meaningful reassurance from senior government officials, along with a great deal of patience and a willingness to seriously address the concerns expressed by Waikato and Kingitanga leaders, was called for. Grey, though, avoided all direct dealings with the Kingitanga for the remainder of the year.<sup>456</sup>

In November 1862, the governor refused invitations to visit the Waikato in the wake of the Peria hui. When a delegation came to Auckland and asked him not to put a steamer on the river, he replied that as a result of their objections he would put on two instead of one. Grey was unmoved by objections that the Waikato River belonged to Māori, not the Queen. A second invitation followed the first, sent jointly by King Matutaera and Rewi Maniapoto. Grey refused this invitation as well, stating that he might come in a few months if things remained quiet.<sup>457</sup>

Remarkably, the governor then made an unannounced visit to the Waikato on New Year's Day 1863. His explanation to the Duke of Newcastle was that he had heard of plots to kill all the local settlers as soon as a steamer was placed upon the river.<sup>458</sup> The lack of warning meant that there was no opportunity for all the chiefs to arrange to meet with him. When the governor reached Ngāruawāhia, hardly anyone was there. The King and his rūnanga were with Ngāti Maniapoto at Hangatiki, and many did not make it back in time to see the governor. Grey was welcomed enthusiastically by all he encountered, and a hui was held at Taupiri at which some Kingitanga rangatira, including Wiremu Tamihana, were present. Neither King Matutaera nor Rewi Maniapoto was able to attend.<sup>459</sup>

455. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 311–312.

456. Document A23, p 426.

457. Document A23, pp 426–427.

458. Grey to Newcastle, 6 February 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-3, section I, pp 6–7.

459. Gorst, The Maori King, pp 322–323; 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR, 1863, E-3, pp 7–8.

No official account or minutes of this meeting have survived, but it was a crucial meeting in terms of whether the Crown could or would avoid war by recognising the authority of the Kīngitanga in a fair and reasonable way. There are several accounts available to us, including: Grey's description of part of the meeting to the Duke of Newcastle in February 1863; an article in the New Zealander of January 1863; Gorst's account in his 1864 book; and a later account of part of the meeting by Grey in 1869. From the various accounts, there are three key issues. First, the people asked the governor not to put an armed steamer on their river, but he was adamant that he would do so – and that it would be for their economic benefit.<sup>460</sup> Secondly, the question of Taranaki was discussed, including the possibility of the Crown 'taking possession' of Tataraimaka.<sup>461</sup> Thirdly, there was the matter of whether the governor was willing to agree to a formal role for the King and the King's rūnanga in self-government institutions, on which everything hinged. On this, the accounts differ.<sup>462</sup>

The newspaper article (published on 14 January 1863) is the closest account in time to the meeting. In that article, it was reported that the people told the governor:

they would elect from amongst their chiefs those who were most learned, to frame rules and laws for the good government of the people; these laws will be handed by [King] Matutaera to the Governor for his sanction, and, if assented to by the Governor, they should become law.<sup>463</sup>

This was the solution discussed by Gorst and Tamihana in December 1861, approved by the Duke of Newcastle in March 1862, and which Selwyn said was still possible at the widely attended Peria hui in October 1862. Grey replied that, 'so far as he understood their King movement, as they were now conducting it, nothing but evil would result'.<sup>464</sup> The governor then said that they should send a deputation of 'principal chiefs' to Auckland to give a 'full and minute' explanation of the Kīngitanga, after which he would give them a definitive answer.<sup>465</sup>

Tamihana had been unwilling to risk his person in Auckland in 1861, and it was unlikely that the principal Kīngitanga leaders would be more likely to risk detention in the circumstances of early 1863. The chiefs held a meeting at Ngāruawāhia overnight and their response was that Grey should visit the whole of the district and all its rangatira.<sup>466</sup> They presumably hoped to resolve matters face to face. The governor, however, fell ill and had to go back to Auckland. A man on horse-back

---

460. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR, 1863, E-3, pp 7–8.

461. Gorst, The Maori King, p 325. Tamihana urged the governor to wait and to allow him time to persuade the occupying Māori force to 'surrender the land quietly'.

462. For Dr O'Malley's discussion of this issue, see document A23, pp 428–434. For Professor Ward's, see 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', pp 99–101.

463. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR, 1863, E-3, p 8.

464. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR, 1863, E-3, p 8.

465. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR 1863, E-3, p 8.

466. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR 1863, E-3, p 8.

galloped beside Grey's waka, carrying letters from the rangatira urging him to return and visit the whole of the people throughout the district.<sup>467</sup>

The second account was dated 6 February 1863. In a letter to the Colonial Office, forwarding the newspaper article cited above, the governor added that something had been missed from the newspaper account. He claimed that he and the rangatira had actually agreed at the meeting that the 'so-called Maori King should be the head of a Native council' and should send the council's laws to the governor for assent. But the chiefs 'subsequently withdrew from this arrangement' because Waitara had not been settled, saying they would not come under the Queen's authority again.<sup>468</sup>

This was a remarkable contradiction: the newspaper account said that the rangatira had asked for this arrangement but the governor replied that it would result in evil and they should come to Auckland for a minute inquiry into the Kingitanga first; whereas Grey claimed to have agreed to the arrangement, following which the chiefs changed their minds and rejected it.

The next account is Gorst's, published in 1864. Gorst reported that the governor told the people that 'he never went to bed at night without thinking what he could do to pull down the Maori King.' He said to them: 'I shall not . . . fight against him with the sword, but I shall dig round him till he falls of his own accord.'<sup>469</sup> Gorst commented that these words made a deep impression and were 'quoted as the special thing which the Governor had said at the meeting.'<sup>470</sup> Missionary Robert Maunsell interpreted for Grey at the meeting and he also stated that these were Grey's words at the hui.<sup>471</sup> Given that, it is hardly likely that Grey's version (rather than the newspaper's) was correct.

There was a further account in 1865. A Crown official, James Mackay, said at a meeting with Tamihana that Grey had offered to recognise the King as head of a rūnanga, which would make laws and submit them to the governor for approval. Tamihana, claimed Mackay, had 'rejected the offer and preferred war'. Tamihana denied that the governor had made any such offer.<sup>472</sup> Professor Alan Ward commented that Tamihana's reputation for integrity and Grey's reputation for 'gilding the lily' leads to the conclusion that Tamihana's account was correct.<sup>473</sup>

The next account comes from a few years later. In 1869, Grey wrote to the Colonial Office that he had 'offered to constitute all the Waikato and Ngatimaniapoto country a separate Province, which would have had the right of electing its own Superintendent, its own Legislature, and of choosing its own Executive Government, and in fact would have had practically the same powers and rights as any State of the United States now has.'<sup>474</sup> Grey argued that '[t]

467. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR, 1863, E-3, p 8.

468. Grey to Newcastle, 6 February 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-3, p 6.

469. Gorst, The Maori King, p 324.

470. Gorst, The Maori King, p 324.

471. Ward, A Show of Justice, p 157.

472. Daily Southern Cross, 27 December 1865, quoted in Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 100.

473. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 101.

474. Grey to Lord Granville, 27 October 1869, AJHR, 1870, A-1B, p 81.

here could hardly have been a more ample and complete recognition of Maori authority', as this arrangement would have given them 'the exclusive control and management of their own affairs'. The Kīngitanga rejected this offer, he said, because it did not give 'absolute recognition' to the Māori King as completely independent from the Crown.<sup>475</sup>

Grey's story became more elaborate still a month later, when in November 1869 he added that the offer was 'not only once but repeatedly made to create all the upper Waikato and Ngatimaniapoto districts into a separate native Province' (emphasis added).<sup>476</sup>

In our view, this was pure fiction. Grey was trying retrospectively to justify his actions at the January 1863 hui and even more so his invasion of the Waikato in July 1863, by arguing that he had in fact done what he so clearly should have done. The 1862 newspaper account was the closest in time and very likely correct. A former Attorney-General said that he believed it was based on an official report.<sup>477</sup> The governor was aware that he could and should have accepted the offer made by the rangatira at Taupiri in January 1863. Indeed, the Crown had the power to constitute a self-governing native district under section 71, and should have exercised it by January 1863 at the latest. If Grey had indeed 'repeatedly' offered to constitute a 'native province' for the Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto, surely there would have been some mention of this before 1869? Henry Sewell, the former Attorney-General, was correct when he wrote in 1864 that the Government had lost a 'golden opportunity' in January 1863 for 'settling our native difficulties, at least with the Waikatos.'<sup>478</sup>

Not only did Grey not make an offer of self-government at Taupiri in January 1863, the governor rejected the compromise offered by the chiefs. He had insisted that he would put armed steamers on the river, and said that he thought constantly about how to pull down the King – and would dig around him until he fell. We agree with Dr O'Malley:

Grey's clear and open acknowledgement of his overriding obsession with toppling the King (which rather ran contrary to suggestions he was prepared to more or less grant provincial status to the Kīngitanga) left a profound impression on the Waikato tribes.<sup>479</sup>

The outcome was not solely the governor's fault. The Domett ministry, which disclaimed responsibility for native affairs, took no action either to negotiate with the Kīngitanga leadership or get Grey to do so.<sup>480</sup>

---

475. Grey to Lord Granville, 27 October 1869, AJHR, 1870, A-1B, pp 81–82.

476. Document A23, p 431 (Grey to Dealtry, 4 November 1869).

477. Document A22(i), p [11] (Henry Sewell, The New Zealand Native Rebellion: Letter to Lord Lyttleton, 1864, p 15 (Hocken Library Facsimile Series)).

478. Document A22(i), p [11] (Sewell, The New Zealand Native Rebellion, p 15).

479. Document A23, p 434.

480. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 151–153, 155–157, 169–170, 174–175.

Crown counsel pointed out that Kingitanga chiefs might not have accepted the governor as well as the King having power to assent to their laws.<sup>481</sup> From the evidence available to us, it is clear that at least some rangatira offered to accept such a role for the Crown in January 1863. It must be remembered, too, that the military road, the fortifications, and the planned steamer all pointed to an immediate threat of invasion. Gorst painted a poignant picture of riders galloping along the riverbank after the governor's waka as he left the Waikato, 'begging that he would return.'<sup>482</sup> The newspaper carried a similar account.<sup>483</sup> These were people who wanted to come to some form of agreement with the governor, which allowed them to keep the King and their independence while also retaining the protection of the Queen. It was the governor who was not prepared to compromise, not the chiefs.

6.5.4 Treaty analysis and findings

Crown counsel submitted:

The Crown accepts that the Treaty imposes on both Treaty partners – the Crown and Māori – a responsibility to seek to resolve issues between themselves peacefully. Although the Treaty does not displace the Crown's power to use coercive force in appropriate circumstances – in order to maintain the peace within society, for example – the Crown accepts that the use of non-peaceful means to resolve issues between itself and its citizens, or any group of its citizens, should occur in exceptional situations only, and generally only after it has exhausted all reasonable peaceful means.<sup>484</sup>

Did the Crown meet this test in dealings with Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae chiefs of the Kingitanga in 1861–1863? Had the Crown exhausted all reasonable peaceful means?

Our analysis set out in section 6.5 shows that it had not. Governor Browne decided in 1861 that the authority of the Kingitanga was incompatible with that of the Queen, and was planning an invasion of the Waikato timed for September 1861. The extent of Grey's preparations in 1862–63 suggests that the result would have been a disaster for the British if Browne had kept to his plan. But war was narrowly avoided in 1861 because the British Government replaced Browne just in time (section 6.5.1).

The new governor, Sir George Grey, was sent with a 'mandate to seek a modus vivendi with the Kingitanga and avoid war.'<sup>485</sup> In particular, the Colonial Office urged him to use section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852, which provided for autonomous native districts in which Māori authority and law would prevail.

---

481. Submission 3.4.300, p 11.

482. Gorst, The Maori King, p 326.

483. 'Extract from New Zealander', AJHR 1863, E-3, p 8.

484. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

485. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 94; submission 3.4.300, p 10.

But, in our view, Grey did not even try to carry out his mandate from the British Government, or did so so half-heartedly as to ensure failure.

First, as we explained in sections 6.5.1 and 6.5.3, the nucleus of a just solution existed: in December 1861, October 1862, and January 1863, it appeared that Kīngitanga chiefs were prepared to accept a compromise that was also acceptable to the Colonial Office: they would make their own laws through their rūnanga; the King would have the power to assent to those laws; and the governor would also have the power to assent. Such an accommodation could have reconciled the authority of Māori (tino rangatiratanga or mana motuhake) with the authority of the Crown (kāwanatanga). Grey later said in 1869 that he had repeatedly proposed just such a solution, by offering to establish self-governing native provinces in Kīngitanga districts. This shows that he knew what he could and should have done (section 6.5.3.3). To have reached such a compromise would have been consistent with the Treaty partnership and the principle of autonomy, but the Crown failed to do so in 1861–63. This was a deliberate omission on the part of the Crown and was thus a breach of the partnership and autonomy principles.

Secondly, neither the governor nor his colonial Ministers actually tried to negotiate with the Kīngitanga and avoid war. Some of their behaviour was both inexplicable and irresponsible. Examples included the refusal to attend the Peria hui in 1862 or allow any information about the Crown's position to be conveyed (section 6.5.3.2), and Grey's surprise visit to the Waikato in January 1863 which meant that the King, Rewi Maniapoto, and many others could not meet with him (section 6.5.3.3). Instead of touring the district, meeting with the chiefs, and opening a dialogue, the governor indulged in sporadic visits to just the lower Waikato and on just two occasions. We agree with the claimants that the Crown should have negotiated with the Kīngitanga to avoid war but failed to do so.<sup>486</sup> This was a clear breach of the Crown's obligations under the Treaty of Waitangi, including the partnership principle.

Thirdly, Grey adopted a strategy of digging around the King until he fell (see section 6.5.1.3). This was the true intent of his New Institutions – at least for the Kīngitanga districts if not elsewhere. We agree with the claimants that the governor intended the New Institutions to control Māori in the Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae, not as means for protecting and providing for their tino rangatiratanga.

Fourthly, the governor pursued a policy of preparing for war while waiting for his New Institutions to do the work of digging around the King. Those preparations for war are set out in section 6.5.2. Again, the governor's approach seems cavalier or reckless if his actual intent was to avoid war. He did not attempt to meet with or negotiate a peaceful solution with the Kīngitanga leaders. Nor did he seek to allay their concerns about his very visible military preparations aimed at their district, apart from that brief, abortive visit to the Waikato on New Year's Day 1863.

All of this added up to a serious failure on the part of the Crown at a time when war could likely still have been avoided. It is not possible to say so with absolute certainty, of course, but the Crown did not even try. Some claimants argued that the Crown actively wanted a war to subdue the Kingitanga and open up their lands for settlement. The evidence shows that Governor Browne was indeed determined on war (sections 6.4.3.2) and 6.5.1.1). The evidence is less clear with Grey, whose real intentions are often extraordinarily difficult to pin down. All we can say is that he carried out very thorough preparations aimed at an offensive in the Waikato, and he did not try to negotiate with the Kingitanga. It was possible, however, that he genuinely intended to wait and see if his New Institutions would undermine the Kingitanga and make a military solution unnecessary. If so, he was very reckless in his dealings with the Kingitanga, such as they were (the visits in December 1861 and January 1863, and his responses to their invitations and embassies). One incident stands out: when Kingitanga envoys came to Auckland to express their fears about having an armoured steamer on their river, his reply was that he would have not one but two (section 6.5.3.3). This was hardly the response of a governor intent on conciliation and peace.

---

486. Submission 3.4.130(e), p 12.

In sum, we do not accept that the Crown 'exhausted all reasonable peaceful means' in its dealings with the Kingitanga leaders in 1861–63. It failed in the most obvious means for peace, which was to provide for or protect Māori tino rangatiratanga, as the Treaty required it to do. Options included setting aside section 71 districts or native provinces or some other mechanism which would reconcile the authority of Māori (tino rangatiratanga) and the Crown (kāwanatanga). This was despite the overt willingness of at least some Kingitanga leaders to accept such a compromise in 1861–1863. The Crown, in fact, did not actually try to negotiate with the Kingitanga and avoid war at all in any serious way. Rather, the Crown was preparing for war in such an open and threatening manner as to significantly exacerbate the sense of crisis in the Waikato.

We agree with the Crown that the exercise of force may be necessary in exceptional circumstances (such as the Tribunal found in Te Urewera regarding the pursuit of Māori leader Te Kooti).<sup>487</sup> But such extreme circumstances did not exist in the Waikato and Te Rohe Potae in this period. Further, the Crown failed in its Treaty duty to respect tino rangatiratanga and to try reach a peaceful accommodation. We do not feel it is anachronistic to say that an accommodation could have been made, since even the British Colonial Office thought that it could be and urged its governor to use section 71 of the Constitution Act for that purpose.

We therefore find that the Crown breached the principles of partnership and Māori autonomy. Nor did the Crown actively protect the interests and authority of its Māori partner as the Treaty required. These Treaty breaches had very serious consequences, as we discuss in sections 6.7 and 6.9 below.

The question remains: did an exceptional emergency arise between January and June 1863, such that the Crown was justified in its resort to war in July 1863? The Crown said that it did, arguing that threats from the Kingitanga led to war even whilst conceding that its invasion of the Waikato was an injustice. We turn to that issue next.

---

487. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Urewera, 8 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2017), vol 1, pp 292–293

6.6 WAS THE WAIKATO WAR PARTLY CAUSED BY MĀORI?

The Crown has conceded that it acted unjustly and in breach of the Treaty ‘in sending its forces across the Mangatawhiri in July 1863’, and in unfairly labelling Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as ‘rebels’ as a result of that invasion. Crown counsel stated that this concession applied to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori under two headings:

- ▶ first, as members of the Kīngitanga (regardless of whether they had customary interests in the Waikato district); and,
- ▶ secondly, as ‘justified in taking up arms in defence of their lands and homes’ (the Crown having accepted that they had interests north of the Pūniu River).<sup>488</sup>

These concessions, however, still left serious issues in contention between the parties. The Crown argued: ‘In 1863 some Māori were seen to be threatening settlers and Māori who supported the Crown, and this led to the Crown’s invasion of the Waikato.’<sup>489</sup> Despite having conceded that the invasion was unjust, the Crown essentially argued that it was justified by threats made by Māori (especially a credible threat of an attack on Auckland).<sup>490</sup> Crown counsel also argued that, before the outbreak of war in 1863, the Crown did attempt to negotiate an accommodation with the Kīngitanga but the negotiations broke down on both sides.<sup>491</sup>

The claimants were critical of the Crown’s position, arguing that its closing submissions ‘attribute, in part, the responsibility for these wars on Māori of the region.’<sup>492</sup> They argued that the Crown’s concessions do not obviate the need for full reporting to determine responsibility for the war and its consequences. In their view, they fought in the Waikato in defence of their homes and of their tino rangatiratanga, the authority of their laws and governance institutions, against Crown aggression and attempts to suppress their ‘ability to exercise their tikanga.’<sup>493</sup> The supposed threat of an attack on Auckland was ‘trumped up’ by the governor to justify his actions, and had no credibility.<sup>494</sup>

This Tribunal accepts the Crown’s concession that its invasion of the Waikato was unjust and in breach of Treaty principles, and that it unfairly labelled Te Rohe Pōtae Māori as rebels for fighting in defence of the Kīngitanga and their ‘lands and homes.’ That concession is fully justified by the evidence presented in our inquiry. We also accept, however, that we need to address the question of whether there was a credible threat of an attack on Auckland. As Dr O’Malley explained, Governor Grey ‘claimed that Auckland was in serious danger of an imminent attack from the Waikato tribes’ to justify the 1863 invasion as a ‘reluctant pre-emptive strike intended to eliminate such a threat.’<sup>495</sup> This justification was included in despatches to the Colonial Office as well as the ultimatum to the Waikato chiefs to submit and

488. Submission 3.4.300, pp 1, 8.

489. Submission 3.4.300, p 3.

490. Submission 3.4.300, pp 3, 6–7.

491. Submission 3.4.300, pp 9–11.

492. Submission 3.4.391, p 3.

493. Submission 3.4.391, pp 3–4.

494. Submission 3.4.130(e), p 14; submission 3.4.208, pp 6–7.

495. Document A23, p 510.

surrender to the Queen's forces. Crown counsel still relied on this alleged threat in closing submissions in our inquiry.

We begin by exploring the question of whether there were 'moderate' and 'extremist' factions in the Kingitanga, which has often been used to explain the threat of an attack on Auckland and the containment of that threat by the 'moderate' majority. We then consider the expulsion of Civil Commissioner Gorst from the Waikato and the resumption of the Taranaki war in April 1863, both of which were blamed on Ngāti Maniapoto and used at the time to help justify the invasion. Finally, we examine the evidence used by the governor to conclude that an attack on Auckland was imminent before drawing our conclusions on this matter.

6.6.1 Were there 'moderates' and 'extremist Kingites', one side wanting peace and the other war?

Historians who have dealt with the events of 1860–63 have mostly agreed that there were 'moderate' and 'extremist' Kingitanga factions, represented by Ngāti Hauā and Ngāti Maniapoto respectively. The question of a threat to Auckland is usually discussed in terms of whether the moderates might lose control of the extremists, who supposedly were champing at the bit to attack Auckland and start a war.<sup>496</sup> Some claimant witnesses, including Morehu McDonald, disagreed with this interpretation.<sup>497</sup> So have some historians.<sup>498</sup> At the time, Governor Grey tried to persuade the Colonial Office that a group of extreme Kingites were in fact planning an attack, and the invasion of Waikato was necessary to prevent it. William Fox went further in 1866, claiming that the governor 'was barely able to drive back' the 'invading Waikatos' with 'nearly 15,000 men and two years' preparation.<sup>499</sup>

The idea of moderate and extremist factions (one barely restrained by the other) was a powerful explanatory device. Gorst, Morgan, Buddle, and many other Pākehā at the time used it. First, the explanation was developed because these observers expected the King to behave like a European-style monarch. They were puzzled by the fact that he did not issue orders that were instantly obeyed, especially by Ngāti Maniapoto. Secondly, these Pākehā observers tended to favour particular policies or views. Whether consciously or unconsciously, they slanted their narratives in certain ways and praised the 'faction' which they understood to promote the views they preferred. Wiremu Tamihana of Ngāti Hauā was usually described as the main 'moderate' leader, mistrusted by the Government yet committed to peace, Christianity, and friendship with the Pākehā. Rewi Maniapoto, on the other hand, was portrayed as a fanatical Kingite who paradoxically ignored the King's wishes.

---

496. See, for example, Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', pp 102–108; Ward, A Show of Justice, pp 158–159.

497. Document K23, pp 17, 18–20.

498. Document A23, p 361. Dr O'Malley stated that those historians who have articulated an alternative interpretation to this 'most fully' are Ann Parsonson, James Belich, and Morehu McDonald. Belich, for example, said that the terms 'moderates' and 'extremists' were 'contemporary misnomers': Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 76.

499. William Fox, The War in New Zealand (London: Smith, Elder and Company, 1866), pp 38–40.

We have to bear in mind that much of the portrait of Rewi in the early 1860s was painted by Gorst, especially in his 1864 book The Maori King, but also in his official reports to the Government. Gorst was by no means a disinterested commentator. He was Rewi's political opponent in the Waikato, and he was expelled in 1863 by Ngāti Maniapoto. Also, Rewi's motives have often been assumed or misrepresented, especially because so few letters by him have survived.

The reality of Kingitanga politics at the time was that the King and other leaders needed consensus from hui and rūnanga to persuade the autonomous iwi of the Kingitanga to a common course. We have seen this process in action in previous sections of this chapter. For example, hui in April and May 1860 brought iwi and rangatira together to try to work out a consensus on whether to intervene in Taranaki. The process of reaching agreement could take months and was not always successful. Other times, a single hui would suffice. For example, a hui at which the principal leaders were Wiremu Tamihana, Rewi Maniapoto, Epiha Tokohihi, Wiremu Kingi Te Rangitāke, and Hapurona agreed to end the war in Taranaki in March 1861 (see section 6.4.2.5).

Wiremu Tamihana and Rewi Maniapoto were both powerful rangatira with great mana. They disagreed on some issues but agreed on others. Tamihana was not simply an idealist who supported only peace, and nor was Rewi a warmonger who advocated only for war. Tamihana argued passionately at times for the right of the Kingitanga to have intervened and fought in Taranaki, while Rewi Maniapoto agreed to peace in Taranaki and offered to meet and negotiate with the governor in March–April 1861 (see section 6.4.3.5).<sup>500</sup>

To state that there were Kingitanga moderates who controlled or restrained an extremist faction led by Rewi Maniapoto is to mistake or distort a more complex reality. This point is well illustrated by two crises which preceded the July 1863 invasion of the Waikato. In the early months of 1863, it was reported that Ngāti Maniapoto had incited a second war in Taranaki and had gone to fight there, and that Rewi Maniapoto drove Gorst out of Te Awamutu and was only narrowly stopped from killing him. Both of these incidents were referred to at the time by the Crown as reasons for its invasion.<sup>501</sup> We discuss each of these briefly in turn.

6.6.2 The expulsion of Gorst

The threat of war loomed over the Waikato in March 1863. Grey did not return for further discussions with the rangatira after he recovered from his illness in January. His final word to the chiefs was taken as his statement that he would dig around the Kingitanga until it fell. In the meantime, both Rewi Maniapoto and Wiremu Tamihana 'looked round to see where some of the digging was going

---

500. See, for example, Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 220–222; doc A23, pp 343–344, 350; doc A23(c), p 14.

501. See, for example, document A23, p 470.

on.<sup>502</sup> It seems to have been agreed by a number of hui and rŭnanga that Gorst and his 'school' at Te Awamutu were 'some of the spades'.<sup>503</sup>

John Gorst had been appointed civil commissioner under Grey's New Institutions, but he was not able to introduce those institutions. He did establish what was described as an industrial school at Ōtāwhao (Te Awamutu), on land which had been the subject of a tuku to the Church for the purposes of a school. The Church agreed that the land should be used by the Crown to establish a government school. Originally, though, Gorst's 'school' had been used to recruit and train young Māori for a police force. The intention was to eventually convert it into a police station.<sup>504</sup> This use (or abuse) of gifted land at Ōtāwhao was a matter of grievance to the claimants, as explained by Harold Maniapoto.<sup>505</sup> We consider that grievance in chapter 5. Here, we note that by early 1863 Gorst had established a printing press at the school, which he used to produce a newspaper called Te Pihoihoi Mokemoke i Runga i te Tuanui.<sup>506</sup> Pitched as a rival to the King's Te Hokioi, it only lasted for five issues, but even the first, with an article entitled 'Te Kino o te Mahi Kingi' (the evil of the King's work), was enough to make its intention plain.<sup>507</sup> Gorst later recorded (with apparent satisfaction) that the 'chiefs of Ngaruawahia' were very angry about what they saw as its 'bad, mocking style'.<sup>508</sup>

Gorst was also involved in Wiremu Te Wheoro's attempt to erect a courthouse at Te Kohekohe, which was intended to double as a blockhouse. Grey, who was planning for war, wanted to use it as a potential military outpost 'the possession of which might prove of very great advantage to us in a military point of view'.<sup>509</sup>

By April 1863, the Crown had not attempted to discuss or agree to a general settlement with Kīngitanga leaders, or the basis on which Crown institutions might be introduced to the district. The people were not opposed to schools per se, nor to Gorst personally. Rewi Maniapoto told Gorst that he would have been welcomed as a missionary or trader rather than as a magistrate.<sup>510</sup> In the absence of discussions or agreement, however, Gorst's actions increased the sense of alarm felt by Kīngitanga leaders. Even at the best of times, a magistrate who published a politically partisan newspaper which incensed local chiefs would surely have been replaced. In the circumstances of the Waikato, Professor Ward stated that establishing a printing press there was 'foolhardy'.<sup>511</sup>

502. Document A23, p 454 (Gorst to Bell, 1 April 1863).

503. Document A23, pp 454–455 (Gorst to Bell, 1 April 1863).

504. Document A23, pp 443–446, 458.

505. Document A23, pp 443–445; doc K35, pp 6–7, 8, 9–10, 16–19.

506. Document A23, pp 443–451. Te Pihoihoi Mokemoke i Runga i te Tuanui translated as 'The lonely sparrow upon the roof': doc K35, p 13.

507. Te Hokioi o Niu Tireni e Rere atu na: 'The war bird of New Zealand in flight to you': doc K35, p 12; Te Pihoihoi Mokemoke i Runga i te Tuanui, no 1, 2 February 1863, pp 2–3, accessed on 12 June 2018 via <https://paperspast.natlib.govt.nz/newspapers/pihoihoi-mokemoke-i-runga-i-te-tuanui/1863/2/2>.

508. Gorst, The Maori King, p 337 (doc K35, p 13).

509. Document A23, pp 445–446 (Grey to Cameron, 30 June 1862); Wai 686 RO1, doc A2, pp 89–90.

510. Gorst, The Maori King, p 254.

511. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 102.

It seems that rŭnanga and hui discussed what to do about the situation, and all were agreed that Gorst must be sent away from the district.<sup>512</sup> Rewi Maniapoto was prepared to carry out this decision and later expressed bewilderment at the criticism he received from other Kīngitanga leaders for doing so.<sup>513</sup> The timber for the Te Kohekohe courthouse/blockhouse was seized and floated back down the Waikato River to the Queen's land at Te Ia. The printing press at Ōtāwhao was also seized. Gorst himself was given three weeks to communicate with the Government and obtain permission for him to leave his post. Wiremu Tamihana and other leaders were concerned about Ngāti Maniapoto's threat of force to secure Gorst's departure, but it could not be concealed from Gorst that everyone (including the King) had agreed that he must leave. The Queen's property was not stolen: the timber for the courthouse, the printing press (and Gorst) were simply sent back.<sup>514</sup> The results do not indicate a deep split within the Kīngitanga, as Gorst tried to argue. The King, Wiremu Tamihana, and Rewi Maniapoto all agreed that Gorst must go. They differed, however, as to how this should be achieved.

Rewi Maniapoto sent a letter to the governor. Because we have few surviving explanations in his own words, we reproduce it here in full:

Kua mate a Te Kohi i au. Kua riro i au te Perehi. Ko aku tangata enei nana i tango, e waru te kau takitahi; tu tonu i te pu enei tangata. Ko te take he pana ia Te Kohi kia hoki ki te taone, na te nui hoki o te pouri ki tana tukunga mai ki konei noho ai, whakawai ai, na to kupu hoki tetahi, mau e kerī i nga taha ka hinga to kingitanga. E hoa whakahokia a Te Koti [sic] ki te taone. Kauga e waiho ki au kia noho i te Awamutu: heioano, ka ki keo ki te waiho, ka mate. Heioano, kia tere mai to pukapuka tiki mai i nga wiki e toru.

Mr Gorst has suffered (mate) through me. The press has been taken by me. These are my men who took it – eighty armed with guns; the reason whereof is to turn off (pana) Mr Gorst, in order that he may return to the town; it is on account of the darkness occasioned by his being sent here to stay and deceive us, and also on account of your word, 'by digging at the sides, your King movement will fail.'

Friend, take Mr Gorst back to town; do not let him stay with me at Te Awamutu. Enough; if you say that he is to stay, he will die (ka mate). Enough; send speedily your letter to fetch him in three weeks.<sup>515</sup>

Rewi explained that this was not a literal threat to harm or kill Gorst but rather to remove him forcibly if he decided to stay.<sup>516</sup> The Government gave Gorst permission to leave if he felt his life was in danger, but also hoped that other tribes would oppose Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>517</sup>

512. Document K23(a), p 133; doc A23, pp 451, 453–456.

513. Document A23, p 455.

514. Document A23, pp 445–456.

515. Document A23, pp 452–453 (Rewi Maniapoto to Grey, 25 March 1863).

516. Document A23, p 456.

517. Document A23, p 453.

Claimant witnesses pointed to another factor behind Rewi's decision to expel Gorst by force if necessary, and the manner in which he went about it (which garnered much criticism from other Kingitanga leaders). This was the question of customary rights and authority at Te Awamutu. According to Harold Maniapoto, this issue underlay the dispute as to how exactly Gorst should be made to leave, and who should decide the manner of it. He told the Tribunal that Gorst's expulsion was rooted in Māori politics: Rewi was reasserting Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Maniapoto interests in the Ōtāwhao district. The expulsion of Gorst was a demonstration of the 're-establishment' of the mana of Ngāti Paretekawa on 'its ancestral domain': 'Despite the challenges of all of Waikato, all of Ngāti Hauā, all of Apakura and all the others that opposed the sacking of Gorst, Manga stood his ground on his ancestral lands, and made the rules that applied at the end of the day.'<sup>518</sup>

Both the Reverend Ashwell and James Fulloon were aware of these dynamics. 'There are wheels within wheels,' wrote Ashwell.<sup>519</sup> Fulloon wrote that the real issue was 'propriety to the land, to te Awamutu.'<sup>520</sup>

This explanation fits with our understanding of the purpose for which the Kingitanga was established: to ensure a space within which chiefly authority, rangatiratanga, could continue to be exercised. This included the coming together of autonomous iwi and their leaders to debate and reach a common course on matters to do with the Crown, which inevitably involved some internal disagreements and tussles along the way.

6.6.3 How did the Kingitanga respond to the Crown's resumption of war in Taranaki?

Perhaps more important than the expulsion of Gorst, the resumption of war in Taranaki resulted in a crisis. This crisis was clearly of the Crown's making. Governor Grey wanted to return Waitara to Te Ātiawa but hesitated while he tried to get Ministers to share the responsibility for doing so.<sup>521</sup> He also wanted to get the Tataraimaka block back. Tataraimaka had been sold to the Crown in the 1840s but then reoccupied by Māori during the Taranaki war. They refused to leave while the Crown still occupied Waitara and other Māori lands.<sup>522</sup> Grey retook Tataraimaka several weeks before returning Waitara, instead of the other way around.<sup>523</sup> But this was not only an issue of timing. When Grey visited Waikato in January 1863, he told the assembled chiefs of his intention to take back Tataraimaka. Wiremu Tamihana, who had acted as mediator in 1861, offered to do so again. The governor rejected this offer, unwilling to admit a role for the Kingitanga in Taranaki.<sup>524</sup> Professor Ward argued that Grey's approach showed he was not trying to work

518. Transcript 4.1.10, p 667.

519. Ashwell, journal, 13 April 1863 (doc A23, p 457).

520. Fulloon to Native Minister, 30 March 1863 (doc A23, p 458).

521. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 101.

522. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, pp 44, 87–89; doc A23, pp 348, 434–435.

523. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 165–171.

524. Document A23, p 433.

with the Kingitanga or avoid war. Ward also suggested that an exchange of Waitara for Tataraimaka could have been managed peacefully.<sup>525</sup>

The governor's decision to send troops onto the Tataraimaka block in early April was not met with immediate resistance. The central and southern hapū of Taranaki chose to retreat. A few weeks later, however, when Waitara still had not been returned, they ambushed and killed nine soldiers who were on Māori land at Ōakura.<sup>526</sup> Even then, they gave several warnings before carrying out the attack.<sup>527</sup>

The Crown blamed both the ambush and the resumption of fighting on Ngāti Maniapoto. According to Gorst, a messenger from Taranaki brought news of the Tataraimaka seizure to Hangatiki and was sent back with an instruction from Rewi Maniapoto to 'kill the pakehas'.<sup>528</sup> Importantly, this was one of Grey's pretexts for invading Waikato.<sup>529</sup> Grey stated in his July 1863 ultimatum: 'By the instigation of some of you, officers and soldiers were murdered at Taranaki. Others of you have since expressed approval of these murders.'<sup>530</sup>

Dr O'Malley pointed out that the killings at Ōakura were retaliation for the seizure of Tataraimaka; it is not credible to blame either the killings or the resumption of war on Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>531</sup> We agree.

Also in April and May 1863, there were multiple reports that large numbers of Ngāti Maniapoto had gone to Taranaki to join the fighting.<sup>532</sup> The reports were completely untrue. No one from Waikato or Te Rohe Pōtae went to Taranaki.<sup>533</sup> As late as 21 June 1863, it was still believed in Auckland that 'the great bulk of the Ngatimaniapoto' had gone off to Taranaki to fight.<sup>534</sup> In fact the Kingitanga took no role in what is now known as the second Taranaki war.

The false reports of Ngāti Maniapoto involvement at Taranaki persisted because the Crown had few reliable sources of information about what was happening in Waikato. The Crown made no attempt to open regular communications with the Kingitanga, let alone negotiate an accommodation. The Native Minister did send a Crown purchase agent, John Rogan, to Ngāruawāhia in May 1863. Rogan's purpose was not to open discussions or follow up on the chiefs' offer to Grey at Taupiri in January 1863. Rather, the Government sent him to obtain a formal condemnation of the Ōakura ambush. It was around this time that the Kingitanga leaders seem to have met at Rangiaowhia and decided a collective position on the renewed war in Taranaki. Rewi, who had offered sanctuary to Te Rangitāke, argued for 525. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 101. See also Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 171.

526. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 89.

527. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 103.

528. Document A23, p 436. (Gorst to Bell, 16 April 1863).

529. Wai 686 RO1, doc A2, p 3; doc A23, p 492.

530. Document A23, p 492 ('Notice to Chiefs of Waikato', 11 July 1863). See also doc A23, p 438.

531. Document A23, pp 438, 509. See also Wiremu Tamihana's letter to the Native Minister on 15 June 1863, which explains Ngāti Ruanui's reasons for carrying out the Ōakura ambush (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 334).

532. Document A23, pp 435–437.

533. Document A23, p 435.

534. Henry Sewell, diary entry, 21 June 1863 (doc A23(a), vol 2, pp 735–736).

intervention but did not go against the consensus after the hui. This consensus was summed up by King Matutaera at Ngāruawāhia with the words: ‘Waikato, takoto’ (lie still).<sup>535</sup>

In short, the rangatira of the Kīngitanga continued to debate and decide matters in concert. Those debates were increasingly tense and there were certainly arguments between leaders. The Kīngitanga leadership knew that an invasion of Waikato was on the horizon and they were genuinely uncertain as to what course to follow. Some wanted to avoid anything that might be interpreted by the Crown as provocation, while others believed that some form of military confrontation was now inevitable.

We agree with Dr O’Malley’s conclusion:

Observers then and since have identified this ‘extremist’ faction with Rewi Maniapoto specifically and Ngāti Maniapoto more generally, often suggesting that it was through their actions that Waikato lands were subsequently confiscated. That argument comes dangerously close to legitimising the Crown’s invasion and confiscation of Waikato but is a viewpoint that has been critiqued throughout [O’Malley’s] report. For one thing, the depiction of the Kīngitanga not as a coherent whole but instead as a factionalised and deeply divided movement loses sight of the extent to which it was driven by shared objectives and concerns. Rewi Maniapoto and Wiremu Tamihana had more in common than divided them. Moreover, the former rangatira undoubtedly had a greater appreciation of the realpolitik of 1860s New Zealand than did Tamihana, great Christian idealist of his age that he was.<sup>536</sup>

6.6.4 Was there a credible threat of an attack on Auckland?

There can be no doubt that the resumption of war in Taranaki intensified the sense of crisis in Waikato. The governor had built his road to Mangatāwhiri, had constructed redoubts and fortifications, had tried to establish outposts inside Waikato (disguised as a courthouse and a school), and was now using British troops in Taranaki. Telegraph cable was laid to ensure fast communication between Auckland and the forward posts at the Waikato River. Finally, troops were recalled from Taranaki to Auckland in June 1863 for use in Waikato (despite the renewal of war in the Taranaki district).<sup>537</sup> By this time, Kīngitanga leaders were already anticipating an attack and had begun to prepare. Rewi Maniapoto was reportedly preparing earthworks at Rangiriri in the days after news arrived of the Ōakura ambush.<sup>538</sup> Most but not all settlers left the Waikato district in May 1863.<sup>539</sup> From the evidence available to us, those who left at this time were not driven out by

---

535. Ward, ‘A “Savage War of Peace”’, p103; document A23, pp 435, 437–438, 461–464. There was a tense interchange between Rewi Maniapoto and Wiremu Tamihana at the Rangiaowhia hui: see Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 328–329.

536. Document A23, p522. For Dr O’Malley’s detailed discussion of the moderate/extremist debate, see doc A23, pp 358–367.

537. Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, pp 77, 87, 94, 97.

538. Document A23, p 438; Gorst, The Maori King, p362.

539. Document A23, pp 459–461, 464.

force, as the governor claimed in his July 1863 ultimatum. Some were advised to leave by Māori neighbours because their safety could no longer be guaranteed.<sup>540</sup> Some Māori wives and half-caste children were also fetched away at this time, by their hapū, from lands deemed to be at risk. In some instances it was for temporary safekeeping and they were later returned. In others, the splitting up of these mixed families became permanent. We have no reliable information, however, about whether any Māori wives and children were kidnapped, as claimed by Crown officials such as Premier Alfred Domett.<sup>541</sup>

Harold Maniapoto told us:

Manga, and other Ngāti Paretekawa and Maniapoto chiefs did not seek conflict with the Crown over possession of their lands and resources in the district, they sought what they believed was nothing more than their right as tangata whenua under ‘Te Tiriti o Waitangi’. However, the actions and disrespect displayed by Gorst and the Crown left them without doubt, that the Government intended to take their (authority) Tino Rangatiratanga and lands by force and they would have no other choice than to stand and defend them.<sup>542</sup>

Crown counsel submitted that ‘debate remains as to how real the threat to the Auckland district actually was’ in mid-1863, but that the risk was taken very seriously by settlers and officials.<sup>543</sup> The threat of an attack on Auckland was mentioned by Grey in his ultimatum of 11 July 1863 (which actually followed rather than preceded the invading army).<sup>544</sup>

The first point to note is that alarms and rumours of an attack on Auckland had been a constant refrain among settlers and officials from the 1840s onwards. Governor Browne told the Colonial Office in 1856 that Auckland existed ‘on the forbearance of a race of savages.’<sup>545</sup> The interests of the two races were ‘antagonistic’<sup>546</sup> and the consequence of failing to settle disputes amicably ‘would probably be the burning of some small settlement, or even Auckland itself (which being built of wood could be fired with ease, as has been more than once threatened).’<sup>547</sup> Yet while Browne reported that Māori had discussed ‘the feasibility of burning Auckland and destroying the Europeans’, he admitted the proposal ‘has invariably been negated by the influence of wise and friendly chiefs, and is likely always to

540. Document A23, pp 459–461, 464–465, 470, 492.

541. Document A23, pp 464, 470; John Barrett, Ngāti Te Maawe: the Barretts of Waiharakeke, Kawhia, New Zealand (Wainuiomata: Ngāti Te Maawe, 1986), p10. According to Gorst, several children were taken from their Pākehā fathers but were all later returned. Gorst does not mention any wives: The Maori King, pp 355, 361. Benjamin Ashwell, however, said that he encountered several (whole) families who were leaving Te Awamutu and Upper Waipa: doc A23, p 458.

542. Document K35, p 17.

543. Submission 3.4.300, p 6.

544. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 336–337; doc A23, pp 493–495.

545. Browne, minute, 25 September 1856 (doc A23, p 218).

546. Browne to Molesworth, 14 February 1856 (doc A23, p 151).

547. Browne to Labouchere, 15 April 1856 (doc A23, p 152).

be so.<sup>548</sup> What the inconsistencies implicit in Browne's comments point to is a fear that Māori politics could not be controlled. Wisdom and friendship were always, to his mind, at risk of being overrun by more deeply ingrained savagery.

Fear of attack renewed after the outbreak of war in Taranaki in 1860. There were intermittent rumours of impending attack from that point on. Browne reported that such rumours 'had caused a panic as general and extreme as it was groundless'. Nevertheless, Browne and Colonel Mould authorised the supply of arms to militia, a defensive garrison, and defensive blockhouses around Auckland; further stockades were built at Panmure, Ōtāhuhu, Onehunga, and Whau.<sup>549</sup> Despite better defences, the Government was concerned that there might not be enough troops in Auckland to defend it.<sup>550</sup> The rumours could be quite far fetched, including one in 1861 that Catholic priests were plotting with Waikato tribes to evict the English and invite the French to take possession.<sup>551</sup> There was further panic in mid-1862 that a pre-emptive attack on the troops or on Auckland was imminent.<sup>552</sup> Dr O'Malley said the re-occupation, in April 1863, of Tataraimaka in Taranaki by British troops ignited fresh rumours of, variously, attacks on Raglan, Te Ia, and Auckland, or even widespread rebellion by Māori throughout the North Island.<sup>553</sup> This is the context in which Governor Grey's 1863 claims that Auckland was under imminent threat of attack need to be understood.

It seems highly likely that a pre-emptive strike was debated by Kīngitanga leaders in mid-1863. The potential targets varied, including Auckland, outlying settlers, and the military fortifications north of the Waikato River. The evidence is also clear that Rewi Maniapoto was a leading figure in those debates, arguing in favour of a pre-emptive attack of some kind.<sup>554</sup> Professor Ward suggested that all that was discussed was a possible raid to rescue Aporo Taratutu, who had been arrested in Auckland.<sup>555</sup> According to Morehu McDonald, Auckland was an unlikely target for attack given its strong new defences and the large number of British troops,<sup>556</sup> although some of those troops were in Taranaki until early June.<sup>557</sup> According to Dr O'Malley, Rewi 'was known to favour a pre-emptive action against the troops at Te 548. Browne to Labouchere, 18 October 1856 (doc A23, pp 218–219).

549. Browne to Newcastle, 24 April 1860, BPP, 1861, vol 41 [2798], pp 30–31 (IUP, vol 12).

550. Document A23, pp 297, 329.

551. Document A23, p 232.

552. Document A23, p 421.

553. Document A23, p 456.

554. Document A23, pp 465–466; Ward, A Show of Justice, pp 158–159.

555. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 104; Gorst, The Maori King, pp 373, 393.

556. Document K23, pp 18–19.

557. Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', p 104. Aporo Taratutu had been involved in the seizure of Gorst's printing press and was arrested in June 1863 when he came to Auckland to trade. Sewell speculated that he could hardly be charged with treason (doc A23(a)(v2), p 736). In the event he was charged with theft about three months later, found guilty, and imprisoned in the Auckland jail for two years. Gorst was scathing about the circumstances of Aporo's trial, pointing out that at his trial Aporo had no lawyer to defend him, was unable to call any witnesses (they being under attack in the Waikato), and was tried by a jury made up of 'enemies' who hated him (Gorst, The Maori King, pp 372–373).

Ia, believing that war was now inevitable and wishing to strike at an advantage.<sup>558</sup> Morehu McDonald argued:

He understood better than most of his contemporaries the uncompromising power and ambitions of European colonialism. . . . What Rewi attempted to confer on Maori political leaders in this period was the realistic course of facing European aggression and preparing for the inevitability of war in defence of their homelands.<sup>559</sup>

Amidst these heightened tensions, Rewi's support for a pre-emptive strike was easily presented as fanaticism and the dominant current in the Kingitanga.

Thus, when the Crown's plans for the invasion were agreed in June 1863, they were couched in the rhetoric of self-defence. Premier Alfred Domett drew on the expulsion of Gorst in April 1863, the supposed fact that Ngāti Maniapoto had caused the Ōakura ambush in Taranaki, and the rumours of impending attack on Auckland, to justify the Crown's invasion of the Waikato:

The expulsion of the civil commissioner Mr Gorst, and his scholars from Government land at Awamutu; the seizure of property; the driving away of all Europeans married to Maori women, and the kidnapping and abduction of their wives and half-caste children; the complicity of these tribes in the murders at Oakura, of which they were the prompters, and their adoption of the cause of the murderers; the abundant evidence of their attempts, to a considerable extent successful, to organise a general conspiracy to expel, or murder, the European population throughout the Northern Island; these things shew that it is no longer at the option of Government to choose between Peace and War – but that the Natives have determined to force the latter upon us.<sup>560</sup>

In the 1860s, the colonial Government constantly argued this idea that war had been forced upon them. The premier here claimed that there was 'abundant evidence' that Waikato chiefs had successfully organised a general conspiracy to expel or murder the entire Pākehā population of the North Island – this was clearly false yet this kind of invention became the basis for justifying the Waikato invasion.

John Gorst, whose former residence in Te Awamutu made him better placed than most to judge, gave no credence to claims of a plan to attack Auckland:

It is, without doubt, highly probable that an attack on Auckland was proposed and discussed at war meetings. It would be strange had it been otherwise. We had often proposed and discussed an attack upon Waikato ourselves. But that the Waikatos would have crossed Mangatawhiri to assail us, I utterly disbelieve. Such an act was

---

558. Document A23, p 465.

559. Document K23(a), pp 20–21 (Brian Morehu McDonald, 'Rewi Manga Maniapoto: A Study in the Changing Strategies of Nineteenth Century Maori Political Leadership', MA Thesis, University of Auckland, 1977, pp 10–11).

560. Document A23, p 470. (Domett to Grey, 24 June 1863).

contrary to their principles, and could not have been carried out without a serious division amongst themselves.<sup>561</sup>

This is the nub of the matter. Rewi Maniapoto expelled Gorst in April 1863 because he held that his was the authority to decide matters in Te Awamutu, and because a consensus had been reached (by way of rūnanga and hui) that Gorst must be sent away. In May to July 1863, he was clearly not prepared to go against the consensus of Kingitanga leaders on such an important matter as a pre-emptive attack, whether on Auckland or the troops at Te Ia or some other target. The prospect of a split in the Kingitanga over this was unthinkable, especially at a time of such danger.

The crucial question then arises: what was known to the Crown in June 1863, when the governor and Ministers made the final decision to invade the Waikato? In an attempt to cast the Crown's military intervention in a pre-emptive light, it appears that Grey collated letters from missionaries and officials outlining Kingitanga activities and supposed intentions. He forwarded these letters to the Colonial Office.<sup>562</sup> Dr O'Malley considered the letters created a weak case:

most of those letters were received by [Grey] after the decision to invade Waikato had already been made, so cannot have influenced that decision. Concrete evidence was missing from the letters, most of which consisted of little more than vague warnings to be on the alert and some of which were contradicted by other information received by Grey. One letter, for example, told the governor that a meeting of Waikato Maori held weeks earlier had debated whether to strike against the British military post at Te Ia, but that the proposal had been rejected by the majority of those present.<sup>563</sup>

Rewi himself, whose supposedly imminent attack on Auckland was used as justification when troops crossed the Mangatāwhiri on 12 July 1863, was reported to be attending a tangi at Taupō at the time.<sup>564</sup>

In addition to Vincent O'Malley's detailed assessment, other historians – including Ann Parsonson, James Belich, B J Dalton, and Alan Ward – have agreed that Grey's 'evidence' of an attack was almost all gathered after the Crown's decision was made to invade, and formed little more than a pretext.<sup>565</sup> Indeed, Dr Parsonson and Professor Belich both accused Grey of a 'campaign of misinformation', in which he extorted troops from the Colonial Office by claiming that there was a general conspiracy to attack and destroy all the settlements of the North Island.<sup>566</sup> Professor Ward accepted that a threat to attack Auckland had to be con-

561. Gorst, The Maori King, p 377.

562. Document A23, pp 470–471. For more on this correspondence see pp 470–476.

563. Document A23, p 510.

564. Document A23, p 481.

565. Document A23, pp 470–481; Ward, 'A "Savage War of Peace"?', pp 104–105; Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, pp 97–107; Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, pp 176–178; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 124.

566. Wai 686 ROI, doc A2, pp 94–96; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 123–125.

sidered seriously by the governor and his Ministers, but he pointed out the obvious alternatives available to them:

Grey's reluctance to accept the risk of having out-settlers killed is understandable. Yet he did not take the last chance of contacting Ngaruawahia, supporting Tamihana's efforts, or at least receiving accurate intelligence as to how they were progressing. Had he done so he would have found that Rewi had already abandoned his design for an attack in the direction of Auckland and gone off to Taupo for the interment of the bones of Te Heuheu Iwikau who had died the previous year. It did not appear that the Governor was anxious to avoid war.<sup>567</sup>

The failure to properly investigate rumours or send envoys in June and July 1863 highlights the fact that the governor never seriously attempted to negotiate an accommodation with the Kingitanga, even though the Colonial Office had authorised him to do so. The Kingitanga did send an envoy to Auckland to negotiate with the governor in mid-June 1863 but Grey had him thrown out of Government House for the temerity of claiming 'joint sovereignty' over the Waikato River and seeking the recall of the Taupō magistrate.<sup>568</sup>

The governor and Ministers made their final decision to invade the Waikato by 24 June 1863 at the latest. Their plan was to conquer and occupy the district, subjugate the people, and confiscate their land (partly to enable settlement and partly to help pay for the war). A string of forts would be built all the way to Tauranga, and military settlers placed on the land.<sup>569</sup>

On 9 July 1863, Māori communities in the South Auckland district were ordered to surrender any arms and swear allegiance to the Queen, or leave their homes and return to the Waikato. This was understood as an order to leave and was enforced as such. The Crown's objective was to clear out all the Māori people living between Auckland and the Mangatāwhiri before the invasion took place. Whole communities were ejected, including the King's uncle, Tāmami Ngāpora, who had said in May 1863 that he would remain at Māngere as a 'hostage for peace.'<sup>570</sup> No resistance was offered. The governor tried to find evidence of plots to massacre outlying settlers but could find none – a group of 12 Māori men, seven women, and three children were seized and then held without trial because no evidence could be found against them.<sup>571</sup> The former Attorney-General, Henry Sewell, condemned the wholesale expulsion of these communities. He commented in August 1863: 'I am bound to say that beyond rumour and suspicion nothing has yet come to my knowledge to justify such severe measures.'<sup>572</sup>

---

567. Ward, A Show of Justice, p 159.

568. Sewell, journal, 14 June 1863 (doc A23, p 465).

569. Document A23, pp 469–470.

570. Document A23, p 489. Te Wherowhero also lived at Māngere for a time. When he returned to the Waikato, his place was taken by Tāmami Ngāpora.

571. Document A23, pp 483–491.

572. Document A23, pp 488–489 (Sewell, journal, 2 August 1863).

Following the expulsion of these people (and some plundering and destruction of their homes and property), the troops crossed the Mangatāwhiri on 12 July 1863. The Waikato war had begun.

6.6.5 Treaty analysis and findings

6.6.5.1 Myth making

In 1864, the Crown gave the following explanation of the Waikato war to the Aborigines Protection Society, an influential group of British humanitarians:

At the commencement of the present unhappy struggle, they appear to have entertained a firm conviction that they could drive the Europeans out of the island, and they commenced by a desperate attack upon Auckland, the seat of Government. Early in the struggle, Thompson [Wiremu Tamihana], who may be regarded as the leader of the rebel party, announced in writing under his own hand, his determination to carry the war to the utmost extremity, not even sparing unarmed persons. Acting in this spirit, the Maoris threw themselves into the heart of the settled districts of the Province of Auckland, murdering and destroying the settlers within 17 miles of the town, cutting down the Government flagstaff at the Manukau, the western harbour of the City of Auckland itself, and driving from their farms and homesteads a tolerably dense population of agricultural settlers over a space of some twenty miles square. So sudden was their onslaught, and so completely did they succeed in getting possession of the country close around Auckland, that it was not till after the fall of Rangiriri, five months at least after the struggle commenced, that they were driven back and routed out of the wooded ranges to such an extent that even the city and the immediate suburbs of Auckland could be considered safe.<sup>573</sup>

A completely mythical account of how the war began was thus already taking hold. And this myth was used by the Crown not merely to justify its invasion of the Waikato but also confiscation. Fox discussed the confiscation plans with a CMS missionary, John Morgan, in February 1864, telling him: ‘They ought not to grumble, they played a game to get Auckland and if instead we have taken Waikato, they cannot complain.’<sup>574</sup>

Usually these kinds of myths cannot withstand serious historical inquiry, but they can be very damaging. Aspects of them can turn up in orthodox historical accounts. One such myth was that Ngāti Maniapoto’s actions caused the war.

In the lead-up to the invasion, the Crown accused the Kīngitanga of expelling the civil commissioner, driving away and plundering settlers living in the Waikato and kidnapping their wives and children, instigating the attack on soldiers in Taranaki, and ‘constantly threatening to come down the river to ravage

---

573. William Fox, ‘Memorandum of Ministers in reply to the Aborigines Protection Society’, 5 May 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, p 18. For a discussion of the Crown’s allegation that Tamihana intended to carry the war ‘to the utmost extremity’, see Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 455–472.

574. Document A22, p 139 (Morgan to Thomas Gore Browne, 29 February 1864).

the settlement of Auckland, and to murder peaceable settlers.<sup>575</sup> Much of this was blamed on the supposed violent extremism of Ngāti Maniapoto, and the cause of the invasion was attributed to it. We have already discussed these allegations above, but it is necessary here to note the way in which aspects have made their way into the history books, leading many (including some Māori) to blame Ngāti Maniapoto for provoking a war. Vincent O'Malley and Morehu McDonald set out this process in their evidence so we need not repeat the detail of it here. Suffice to say that historians have sometimes attributed responsibility for the war to Rewi Maniapoto and his iwi (at least in part), accompanied by a view that they got off 'scot-free' when it came to confiscation.<sup>576</sup> More generally still, the Kingitanga has been blamed for provoking the Crown's attack, including in the Crown's closing submissions in this inquiry.

One example of the damage that these kinds of myths caused is to be found in the Sim commission report of 1927. According to Dr O'Malley's research, the commission was strongly influenced by the historical work of William Pember Reeves, whose account in Long White Cloud was largely based on Grey's despatches.<sup>577</sup> We will deal with the commission later in the chapter, but here we simply note that it concluded:

If in the circumstances the Natives had contented themselves with providing for their own defence when attacked, with providing also for the establishment of law and order in their midst, and for the regulation of sales of Native land, they might have been declared to be blameless. But they were not content to do that, and formed a plan for the destruction of Auckland and the slaughter of its inhabitants. This was to be part of a general attack in the North Island, and a party of Natives had actually set out on the march north to attack the pakehas before General Cameron had crossed the Mangatawhiri Stream. In view of these facts . . . we are not justified, we think, in saying that the tribes who took part in the Waikato war ought not to have suffered some confiscation of their lands as a penalty for the part they took in the rebellion.<sup>578</sup>

As will be evident from our discussion in sections 6.6.1 to 6.6.4, it is time for these myths to be laid to rest.

6.6.5.2 Treaty findings

The Taranaki Tribunal wrote: 'No one understands the wars and confiscations who does not also see the centrality of the Kingitanga in the relevant events, the significance of the symbolism it evoked, or the burden that it bore for the Maori

---

575. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, pp 336–337 (Grey to the Chiefs of Waikato, 11 July 1863); doc A23, pp 470, 493–495.

576. See document A23, pp 358–363; doc K23, pp 18–21; doc K23(a), pp 15–24.

577. Document A22, p 807.

578. Document A22, p 807; 'Confiscated Lands and Other Grievances: (Report of the) Royal Commission to inquire into confiscation of Native lands and other grievances alleged by Natives', AJHR, 1928, G-7, pp 1–40.

people.<sup>579</sup> The Tribunal also found that the right of Māori to retain their authority and their lands was affirmed and guaranteed by the Treaty of Waitangi, and that the Kingitanga – which stood for both – was thus ‘an affirmation of the Treaty’s terms.’<sup>580</sup> But the Crown at the time was not prepared to understand the Kingitanga message because it was not prepared to share power with Māori, nor was it prepared to accept a movement which ‘might restrict the ready acquisition of Maori land.’<sup>581</sup> We endorse those findings, and we also agree with the Taranaki Tribunal that Māori autonomy was an essential term of the Treaty, and that through ‘war, protest, and petition, the single thread that most illuminates the historical fabric of Maori and Pakeha contact has been the Maori determination to maintain Maori autonomy and the Government’s desire to destroy it.’<sup>582</sup> This was nowhere more evident than in the Waikato war of 1863, where the Crown set out to destroy the authority and institutions of the Kingitanga by military force.

In our inquiry, the Crown conceded that its invasion of the Waikato was an injustice and a breach of the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi.<sup>583</sup> ‘It follows,’ we were told, that ‘certain Crown actions in the opening of hostilities . . . in the Waikato in 1863 were unjust.’<sup>584</sup> Further, the Crown’s ‘representatives and advisers acted unjustly and in breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles in its dealings with the Kingitanga, which included iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae, in sending its forces across the Mangatawhiri in July 1863.’<sup>585</sup>

We agree that these concessions are appropriate and fully justified by the evidence that we have heard in our inquiry. We find that the Crown attacked the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in breach of the Treaty principles of partnership, active protection, and autonomy. In the next section we discuss the tragic loss of life and destruction which resulted from this Treaty breach.

There is an additional point to consider. As explained earlier, the Crown also submitted that in 1863 ‘some Māori were seen to be threatening settlers and Māori who supported the Crown, and this led to the Crown’s invasion of the Waikato.’<sup>586</sup> More specifically, the Crown argued that a threat of attack on the Auckland district was rightly taken seriously, that ‘some Kingitanga Māori (notably Rewi Maniapoto)’ made threats of such an attack, and that the Crown’s proclamations on 9 and 11 July 1863 ‘focused squarely on this issue.’<sup>587</sup>

The claimants argued correctly that the Crown’s closing submissions ‘attribute, in part, the responsibility’ for the war to Māori.<sup>588</sup> The Crown has also continued the long-established habit of singling out Rewi Maniapoto for blame.

579. Waikato Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 63.

580. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 64.

581. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 64.

582. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, pp 5–6; submission 3.4.391, p 8.

583. Submission 3.4.300, p 1.

584. Statement 1.3.1, p 45.

585. Submission 3.4.300, p 1.

586. Submission 3.4.300, p 3.

587. Submission 3.4.300, p 6.

588. Submission 3.4.391, p 3.

Our analysis of evidence in section 6.6 shows that these allegations are unfounded. While Rewi may have suggested a pre-emptive strike, he supported the collective decision-making that underpinned the Kingitanga and acceded to the consensus against such action. There was no credible threat of an attack on Auckland. At the time, the Crown seized upon certain documents (mostly received after the decision to invade had already been made) to try to legitimise its unjust war. In our inquiry, the Crown has come worryingly close to doing the same thing.

We agree with the claimants that

There is a marked contrast between the considered debate that took place between Maori groups over the expulsion of just one Pakeha official, Gorst, with the rush to war by Grey and Domett and a few key Ministers, against the entire Maori population of the Waikato . . . This action is explicitly linked to their private plans to use confiscated lands for Pakeha settlement.<sup>589</sup>

The Crown's goal was to crush the Kingitanga, to conquer and occupy the territory of those iwi who had placed their lands under its protection, and to confiscate land for settlement. The expulsion of Gorst, the reopening of the Taranaki war (wrongly said to have been instigated by Rewi Maniapoto), and the threat of an attack on Auckland were pretexts used by the Crown in mid-1863. They were not causes of the Crown's invasion.

In our view, the Crown's arguments do not mitigate or lessen either the Crown's degree of responsibility for the Waikato war or the finding that the Crown attacked the Kingitanga (including Te Rohe Pōtae Māori) in breach of Treaty principles.

It is a very serious thing for the Crown to make war on those it claims to be its citizens. The gravity of the Treaty breach is accordingly great. Prejudice is considered later in the chapter.

We turn next to the Crown's conduct of the Waikato war.

6.7 WAS THE CROWN'S CONDUCT OF THE WAR DISPROPORTIONATE OR EGREGIOUS?

The Crown has conceded that once its troops crossed the Mangatāwhiri, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were justified in taking up arms in their defence.<sup>590</sup> The course of the war, and the specific engagements, all took place outside the initial boundary of the inquiry district, which in part followed the 1865 confiscation line. The inquiry district boundary was extended for a number of reasons, one of which was to enable claimants to bring raupatu claims before the Tribunal. In terms of those raupatu claims, the boundary was extended as far north (beyond the Pūniu River) and as far south (into Taranaki) as necessary (no fixed boundary was set).<sup>591</sup>

---

589. Submission 3.4.130(e), pp 12–13.

590. Statement 1.3.1, p 44.

591. Paper 6.2.8, p 7.

Separate to the acknowledgement of the injustice of the war, however, is the matter of its conduct. The claimants' case focused on two issues. First, they argued that the Crown refused opportunities to make peace and thus prolonged its unjust war.<sup>592</sup> Secondly, claimants and technical witnesses told us that, as Crown forces advanced south, actions at Rangiriri, Te Rore, Rangiaowhia, Kihikihi, and Ōrākau 'breached the standard rules of military engagement'.<sup>593</sup> This included contravening established military protocol in respect of the white flag, mishandling prisoners of war, killing or wounding non-combatants, killing combatants in the act of surrendering or fleeing, mishandling the dead and wounded, destroying and looting property, and deliberately infecting Māori populations with smallpox.

The Crown denied all of these allegations and made no concessions about its conduct of the war. In particular, Crown counsel argued that non-combatants were killed because they were 'intermingled with armed combatants' at battles. There is no record, we were told, 'of Māori being killed or wounded after they had surrendered to Crown's forces'.<sup>594</sup> The Crown also argued that some settlers were killed by Māori: this was raised 'not in any way to justify the actions of its own soldiers but to show that a singular focus on Crown actions will inhibit a complete and balanced understanding of events'.<sup>595</sup>

In this section we examine the Crown's behaviour during the Waikato war with respect to the claimants' allegations, and identify whether or not the Crown's troops or their leaders acted egregiously or disproportionately. We do not attempt to provide a complete history of the war, nor is it necessary to do so for the purposes of our inquiry.<sup>596</sup>

6.7.1 Rules of engagement

The Crown said it was not aware of any evidence on the record of inquiry 'that details the standard rules of military engagement as they were in the 1860s'.<sup>597</sup> Rules governing the conduct of the British army do not appear to have been codified in detail in the 1860s. Codification was not contemplated, it appears, until the passage of the Army Discipline and Regulation Act 1879, which eventually led to the British War Office publishing its first Manual of Military Law in 1884: the Act, the Rules of Procedure prepared under the Act, and notes were combined to 'form a text book on Military Law'.<sup>598</sup> This does not mean that before then the British conducted war without restraint. The proper conduct of war had long been a subject of profound and lengthy consideration by European scholars of the laws governing nations: men such as Grotius, Vattel, and Halleck. The early 1860s were

---

592. Submission 3.4.15, pp 7–8, 12.

593. Statement 1.4.1, p 9.

594. Submission 3.4.300, p 21.

595. Submission 3.4.16, p 8.

596. See the accounts of Vincent O'Malley (doc A22) and in Belich, The New Zealand Wars, for modern histories of the war.

597. Statement 1.3.1, p 48.

598. Great Britain and Gerald Augustus Robert FitzGerald, Manual of Military Law, 3rd ed (London: War Office, 1894), pp iii, iv.

also a time of reflection on the evils of war: the Red Cross was formed in 1863 and the first Geneva Convention signed in 1864.

The question remains: to what standards ought the Tribunal hold to the behaviour of the British army in Waikato? An attempt to identify particular standards, locatable to the historical period, would not be feasible in the time and space available. Instead, the analysis underpinning this section asks whether there is evidence of understanding or agreement between the Crown and Māori about how the war should be conducted. Māori and British understandings of acceptable wartime conduct did differ. For example, one of the points of contention in the first Taranaki war was the plunder of settler farms and killing of settlers in late March 1860 by Ngāti Ruanui. Settlers and Crown officials interpreted these acts as murder and robbery. Māori considered this an acceptable act of war. In 1861, Wiremu Tamihana compared these killings with an earlier killing of Māori by Māori in Taranaki. He told Governor Browne:

Look Ihaia murdered Te Whaitere (Katatore). He caused him to drink spirits, that the senses of Te Whaitere might leave him. He was waylaid, and died by Ihaia. That was a foul murder. You looked on, and made friends with Ihaia. That which we regard as a murder you have made naught of; and this, which is not a murder, you call one. This, I think, is wrong: for the Governor did not say to Wiremu Kingi and the Ngatiruanui, O friends, do not kill those who are unarmed. Nor did he direct that the settlers living in the town should be removed to Auckland, where there was no fighting, and there stay.<sup>599</sup>

These quite different views of what constituted acceptable standards make it difficult to draw hard and fast rules. What does seem clear is that Māori expended considerable effort attempting to understand and conform to the rules the British claimed to fight by. For example, Harold Maniapoto told the Tribunal:

I takoto ngā tikanga ā ngā rangatira o te rūnanga nui kia kaua e raweke ngā kāinga me ngā whenua o te mihinare me te kura. Tae noatia ki te tahunatanga, te tāhaehae taongatanga me te kōhurutanga o ngā wāhine me ngā tamariki ki Rangiohia, i mau kaha ana tonu ki taua tikanga e aku tūpuna me ngā rangatira katoa o Maniapoto, o Hinetū, o Waikato whānui. Ahakoa te tino kino o te mahi taurekareka o te hōia Pākehā me te Kāwana ki reira kāore i whakatakahia, ā i whakahē pēnā rānei i te tikanga tiaki i takotohia ai e rātou o te rūnanga nui i Hui-te-Rangiora.

The chiefs of the great council laid down the rules that said, 'Do not tamper with the homes and lands of the missionaries and the school.' Right up to the burning and the taking of the goods and the murder of the women and the children at Rangiaowhia, they cleaved strongly to that principle, my ancestors did, and all the chiefs of Maniapoto, of Hinetū and of the broad Waikato. In spite of the very evil acts committed by the Pākehā soldiers and the Governor there, the Māori did not

---

599. Tamihana to Browne, not dated, AJHR, 1861, E-1B, p17.

trample or tamper with the principles of care handed down by the great council Hui-te-Rangiora.<sup>600</sup>

In 1861, Wiremu Tamihana told one of the missionaries, J A Wilson, of a great hui held to consider the conduct of war following the fighting at Taranaki. Wilson recorded what Tamihana said to him:

I [Wilson] then introduced the subject which I have never ceased to urge upon the chiefs – the claims of the wounded and prisoners to humane and generous treatment. I reminded him of the example in this respect which your Excellency [Browne] and General Pratt, as well as the officers and men had shown to his countrymen, and which he on his part fully acknowledged. . . . He added: ‘In our late runanga all the chiefs considered this matter, and it was agreed that none should be killed but in battle; that prisoners should be spared and exchanged; and that they would doctor the wounded with the same remedies which they used for their own people’. He then added, ‘But our ambuscades we shall not abandon; they are the only artillery that we have.’<sup>601</sup>

Tamihana also told Wilson that settlers would be sent away before any fighting. Their property would not be looted.<sup>602</sup>

This exchange between Wilson and Wiremu Tamihana shows that the humane treatment of non-combatants, the wounded, and prisoners was becoming a shared standard for warfare by the 1860s, though not necessarily shared by all. What was required from both sides was to act in good faith. This included the respect for shared conventions like the white flag (discussed further below). Drawing on an array of earlier authorities, the American Henry Halleck published his International Law in 1861 (it was a major source for the British army’s 1884 Manual). Halleck cited Vattel’s opinion that ‘the faith of promises made to an enemy is absolutely essential for the common safety of mankind, and is, therefore, held sacred by all civilized nations.’<sup>603</sup>

If, however, there can be said to be a doctrine governing the British conduct of war, it was the concept of military necessity: do what has to be done to achieve the desired ends, but no more than that. This was what Tamihana had realised when he wrote:

No Rangiaohia au i mohio ai, he tino nui rawa tenei pakanga, ina hoki te kino o ona whakahaere.

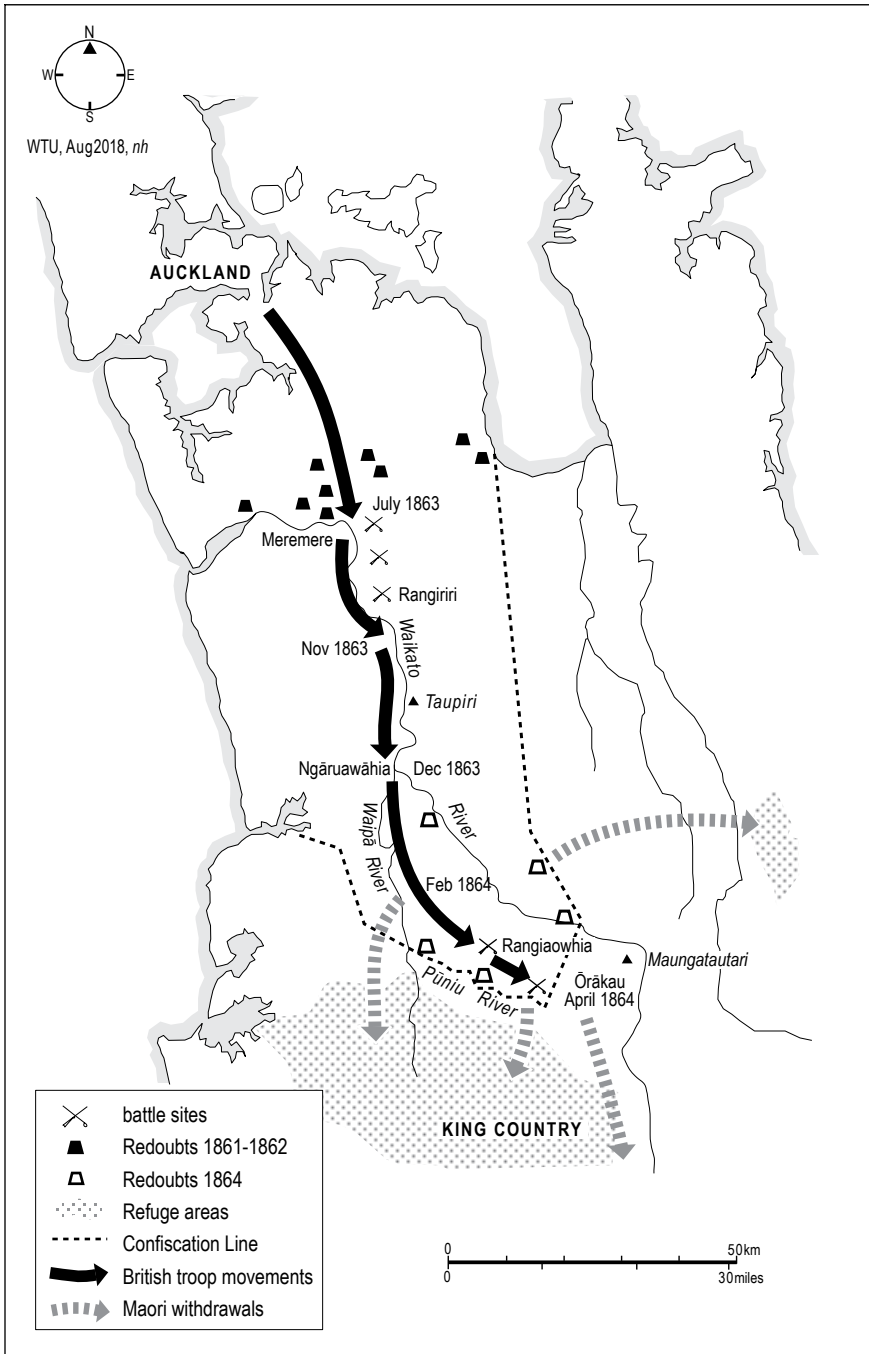

---

600. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 357–8.

601. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 241

602. Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 241

603. HW Halleck, International Law: Or, Rules Regulating the Intercourse of States in Peace and War (San Francisco: HH Bancroft, 1861), p 653, <https://archive.org/details/internationallawwoohall> (accessed July 9, 2015).

Map 6.2: The invasion of Waikato, 1863-1864

At the time of the fight at Rangiaohia I discovered that this would be a very great war, because it was conducted in such a pitiless manner.<sup>604</sup>

6.7.2 Camerontown, Pukekohe East, Meremere

In the first months after the British army crossed the Mangatāwhiri, Kingitanga forces launched a number of small-scale attacks targeting British communication and supply lines.<sup>605</sup> Then at Camerontown, on 7 September, a raid destroyed 41 tons of military supplies and severely damaged the British supply line. Among those killed were James Armitage, the resident magistrate who was directing the operation, and Captain Swift. A second raid a week later on Pukekohe East was unsuccessful. Dr O'Malley estimated 12 Māori were killed and two British. Ngāti Maniapoto seem to have played a leading role in both actions. In Te Huia Raureti's later account, defeat came at Pukekohe because Wahanui Huatare had brought bad luck on the party. Before the attack it had been agreed among the group that they would not loot or destroy any settler's property. Wahanui and some others looted a settler's house and this was blamed for their defeat.<sup>606</sup> These raids, ambushes, and sniper attacks on British troops as they made their way south, and also on settlers, succeeded in greatly hindering British progress. General Cameron was forced to wait until he had enough troops to both protect his supply and communication lines and move forward with the attack.<sup>607</sup>

We accept that non-combatant settlers were killed during a few of these raids.<sup>608</sup> According to O'Malley:

Throughout the 1860s and beyond officials maintained a sharp (and sometimes scarcely credible) distinction between British casualties inflicted by 'rebel' forces during the course of combat and supposed murders of ordinary settlers that were deemed to be criminal acts.<sup>609</sup>

In a military sense, the raids played a crucial role in stopping the British advance into the Waikato; there were no killings of settlers in front of the British lines (including in Te Rohe Pōtae, where some remained under the protection of the peoples there). As Crown counsel noted, the fact that some settler non-combatants were killed does not in any way justify the actions of the British army in killing non-combatants, but it is noted here to give 'a complete and balanced understanding of events.'<sup>610</sup>

604. Document A22, p 709; Wi Tamihana Te Waharoa, petition, 24 July 1866, AJHR, 1866, G-2, p 6.

605. Document A22, pp 42–47.

606. Document A22, pp 49–52.

607. Document A22, pp 46, 53; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 133–141.

608. Document A22, p 42; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 135, 137.

609. Document A22, p 42.

610. Submission 3.4.16, p 8

We also note that the major military event during this period was the Crown's turning of the line at Meremere on 31 October, which forced the Kīngitanga warriors to retreat to a new defensive position at Rangiriri.<sup>611</sup>

6.7.3 Rangiriri

6.7.3.1 The white flag

The capture of Rangiriri pā by British forces on 21 November 1863 was the most significant defeat inflicted on Kīngitanga forces during the Waikato conflict.<sup>612</sup> The circumstances in which Māori fighters surrendered are, as Vincent O'Malley put it, 'mired in controversy'.<sup>613</sup> The claimants pointed to James Belich's view that: 'On their own criteria, the British took unscrupulous advantage of one of the most practically valuable and widely accepted laws of war.'<sup>614</sup>

Large tracts of the lower Waikato valley in 1863 were swampland, making travel both more difficult and more constrained. The partially completed pā at Rangiriri overlooked and controlled a narrow isthmus between the Waikato River on the west, and Lake Waikare to the east. Reconnaissance missions had reported that the pā was unimpressive and not well constructed. On 20 November 1863, 1,400 British troops attacked.<sup>615</sup>

The British were wholly unprepared for what they encountered. Rangiriri proved a 'wonderful specimen of engineering'. 'Without sapping and mining,' according to a newspaper report, 'it would be almost impossible for any troops in the world to have taken it, as it was impossible to get at it.'<sup>616</sup> Cameron's troops made several attempts to breach the fortifications but each advance was repelled.

Just after dawn next day, 21 November, the British were preparing to sap the pā, when the defenders unexpectedly raised a white flag. In General Cameron's initial telegraph to the governor he reported that 'being completely surrounded and cut off, they surrendered unconditionally.' Yet Cameron also wrote: 'The king was present at Rangiriri [sic], and escaped during the night by swimming across the swamp, as did several others.'<sup>617</sup> His later official account was less unconditional. His troops had 'almost completely enveloped the enemy' and the wounded must have been evacuated in the night, as none were inside the pā next morning. Nonetheless: 'Shortly after daylight on the 21st, the white flag was hoisted by the enemy, of whom 183 surrendered unconditionally, gave up their arms, and became prisoners of war.'<sup>618</sup>

611. Document A22, pp 47–49, 53–56; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 139

612. Document A22, p 97; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 157. For Belich's description of the battle of Rangiriri, see pp 145–157.

613. Document A22, p 57

614. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 154

615. Document A22, p 57.

616. Document A22, p 61 (New Zealand Herald, 27 November 1863)

617. Document A22, p 67 (Cameron, 21 November 1863 (telegraphic despatch), New Zealand Gazette, no 60, p 503)

618. Cameron to Grey, 24 November 1863, New Zealand Gazette, no 62, 30 November 1863, p 514.

If many of the Rangiriri defenders were able to leave during the night without the British noticing, it becomes, as Belich pointed out, an unconvincing explanation for surrender.<sup>619</sup> One of James Cowan's informants told him that lack of gunpowder led to the surrender. Ta Kerei Rauangaanga 'spoke to the interpreter sent forward by the General', refusing a summons to surrender and asking for more gunpowder so they could continue fighting.<sup>620</sup> Dr O'Malley found no corroborating evidence for this argument. He cited the deputy quartermaster-general, who recorded that ammunition appeared to be in 'plentiful supply'.<sup>621</sup> Another possibility is that the white flag was flown to gain time for reinforcements to arrive,<sup>622</sup> but this does not seem a good explanation for why so many left during the night. We agree with Dr O'Malley that the likeliest explanation for raising the white flag at this point was so that the Kingitanga could negotiate from a position of relative strength – before too much territory and too many people had been lost.<sup>623</sup>

The New Zealand Herald repeated the claim that the defenders were completely surrounded, then added that they thought it better to hoist a flag of truce and endeavour to come to terms with the General. A white flag therefore was hoisted, and the soldiers hoisting one too, crowded into the works, and when it came to the question of terms; the General sent word that he would make none, but that they must lay down their arms and surrender themselves prisoners of war unconditionally; it was too late for resistance, the soldiers were amongst them, and the place was lost, and the lives of all in it perfectly at the disposal of our men.<sup>624</sup>

The New Zealander ran a similar account, except that it reported the man who flew a white flag 'was very much annoyed to find that no white flag was shown on our side', and that they 'were all very much surprised when they found they must give up their arms and be considered as prisoners'.<sup>625</sup> In a later report, the Rangiriri prisoners said that 'the pakeha had always respected the white flag in the war in Taranaki and that it would be better to hoist it in the morning and treat'.<sup>626</sup>

With regard to Taranaki, this statement appears correct. Soon after the first engagement at Te Kohia pā, Waitara, H Ronalds wrote in his diary: 'We saw a white flag flying from a Pah in the bush wh[ich] is supposed to be a flag of truce'.<sup>627</sup> General Pratt signalled his agreement to a truce in Taranaki in March 1861 with the following notice:

619. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 153

620. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 334.

621. Document A22, p 68 (DJ Gamble, 1 December 1863). See also Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 153.

622. Document A22, p 73.

623. Document A22, pp 73–78.

624. Document A22, pp 69–70 (New Zealand Herald, 27 November 1863).

625. Document A22, p 69 (New Zealander, 26 November 1863).

626. Document A22, pp 68–69 (New Zealander, 23 June 1864).

627. H Ronalds, Diary of Taranaki War, 21 March 1860, Richmond–Atkinson Papers, vol 1, p 536.

When you see my letter, hoist flags at all the Maori places, leave the trenches and go and stay in the Pas, and keep the white flags flying.

The Truce will commence as soon as the white flags are hoisted, and will continue during these two days.<sup>628</sup>

After the truce was negotiated to end the first Taranaki war, Donald McLean told Te Rangitāke 'that hostilities should cease for the present; that his people could have free access to their cultivations, peach groves, and graves; [and] that during the truce the white flag should be kept flying from his fortified places to prevent mistakes.'<sup>629</sup>

Lieutenant Pennefather was among those who entered the pā after the white flag was flown. He and his men mixed among the defenders, 'shaking hands, and the General came up about ten minutes afterwards, complimented them on their bravery, and demanded their arms.'<sup>630</sup>

The use of a white flag is mentioned in several accounts of the conventions of wartime conduct, symbolising a suit for parley and an agreement to do nothing prejudicial on either side during the course of the parley.<sup>631</sup> This is how the peace negotiations were conducted in Taranaki in 1861. It would be fair to say that it had become a shared convention between both British and Māori by the 1860s.

After Ōrākau, however, William Mair wrote to Brigadier Carey that Rewi 'and all his people were very anxious to make peace and live quietly by the side of the white people, but he was afraid that he would place himself too much at the General's mercy by giving up his arms.' This fear was explicitly linked to Rangiriri, where Māori 'had been dealt treacherously with, they having been led to believe that upon giving up their arms they would be permitted to go free and live within the lines of the troops.' Rewi did not believe 'that they (the prisoners) were so well treated or that their lives were to be spared.'<sup>632</sup> As O'Malley noted, when Governor Grey enclosed this letter in a despatch to Newcastle, William Fox responded on behalf of the colonial Ministers: 'This allegation of Rewi, if true, would establish a most dishonourable breach of faith on the part of the Military Authorities, to whom the prisoners surrendered, or on the part of the Colonial Government, or of both.'<sup>633</sup>

The evidence supports O'Malley's view that 'signalling agreement to a truce and then wilfully exploiting the opportunity created by this to convert it into a surrender' involved 'deception.'<sup>634</sup> Belich's assessment, supported by the claimants, that the British took unscrupulous advantage of a clearly signalled desire to nego-

628. Copy of a Notice from the General Commanding to William Thomson, AJHR, 1861, E-1B, p 9.

629. Document A23, p 346 (McLean to Browne, 22 March 1861, BPP, 1862 [3040], p 37).

630. Document A22, p 71 (Maunsell to Church Missionary Society, 4 January 1864).

631. See, for example, Hugo Grotius, The Rights of War and Peace (New York: M Walter Dunne, 1901), pp 416–417.

632. Document A22, p 173 (Mair to Carey, 28 April 1864, BPP, 1864 [3386], p 26).

633. Document A22, pp 173–174 (Fox, memorandum of ministers as to alleged statement of Rewi Maniapoto respecting native prisoners, 22 May 1864, AJHR, E-1, pt 2, p 19).

634. Document A22, p 70

tiated, is justified. The Māori defenders of Rangiriri raised the white flag to signal a willingness to talk terms and negotiate – a signal known and understood by both sides. General Cameron opportunistically took advantage of this request: once his soldiers were inside the pā he demanded surrender. Approximately 180 men, women, and children were taken prisoner.<sup>635</sup>

We discuss the Kingitanga's attempts to negotiate peace further below.

6.7.3.2 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae?

The size of the Kingitanga force defending Rangiriri is commonly put at 400 to 500 people.<sup>636</sup> Adding the 183 prisoners, a further 36 listed by Wiremu Tamihana as having escaped, and 48 killed accounts for 267, suggesting that as many as 250 people left the redoubt during the night of 20 November.<sup>637</sup> Other than Tamihana's lists, nothing is known of the iwi or hapū affiliation of those people.

The names and hapū of 159 prisoners were listed in the Appendix to the Journal of the House of Representatives, with this qualification: 'Tera ano etahi kaore i mohiotia nga ingoa. (There are others whose names are not yet known.)'<sup>638</sup> Writing on 21 November, Tireni, Tapihana, Kumete, Pairoroku, Takerei, and Hakihaiā said they were among 175 taken prisoner; writing the next day WJ Gundry gave the same number.<sup>639</sup> Dr O'Malley wrote that 'approximately 171 names' were listed in the Appendix, but that '183 prisoners in total were said to have been taken'. A letter from Wiremu Tamihana to Wiremu Te Wheoro gave a further 36 names and their hapū.<sup>640</sup>

From the Appendix list, we can identify the following hapū from Te Rohe Pōtae: 16 were Patupō, 13 Ngāti Puhiaue, three Tainui, and 16 Ngāti Mahuta ('no Kawhia'). Tamihana said people of Ngāti Hinetū and Ngāti Hikairo were among those who left with him in the night.<sup>641</sup> There does not seem to have been a significant Ngāti Maniapoto presence at Rangiriri. Belich's explanation for this is that Rangiriri was under-defended. Some 1,500 Māori, including Maniapoto, had defended Meremere but had had to disperse afterwards, and such a large force could not be pulled together again in time to hold Rangiriri. Unlike the British with their professional army and paid-for supplies, the iwi of the Waikato and Te

635. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 152–155.

636. Document A22, p 60; CGS Foljambe, Three Years on the Australian Station (London: Hatchard, 1868), p 32, <http://www.enzb.auckland.ac.nz/document?wid=2227>; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 144; Fox, The War in New Zealand, p 81, <http://nzetc.victoria.ac.nz/tm/scholarly/tei-FoxWarI-t1-body-d7.html>.

637. Document A22, p 96. The number of deaths includes Pene Te Pukewhau, who died later from his wounds.

638. 'Names of Prisoners Taken at Rangiriri', not dated, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p 11.

639. 'Letter from Native Prisoners to Wiremu Tamihana and others', 21 November 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p [3]; WJ Gundry to Native Minister, 22 November 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p 5.

640. Document A22, p 59n; Wiremu Tamihana to Wiremu Te Wheoro, 4 December 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p 9. Tamihana included himself among those named.

641. AJHR, 1863, E-5D, pp 9–11; doc A22, p 59.

Rohe Pōtae could not sustain a fulltime army and had to feed themselves, even with support from Tūwharetoa and others.<sup>642</sup>

The claimants were bitter about the loss of life in this war which had been forced upon their iwi by the Crown. Forty-eight people are known to have died at Rangiriri (or afterwards from their wounds). Among them were several women.<sup>643</sup> Hazel Coromandel-Wander described the fate of her tupuna, Hoani Papita, recounting what she had been told:

He fought alongside of the warriors at Rangiriri. His fight was to retain the land, and all its prosperities, not for his personal gain but for the interest of those still to come. He was shot in the back and killed by the soldiers in the Rangiriri war . . . He is buried in the mass grave at Rangiriri cemetery. Rangiriri, Rangiaowhia, Orakau and other whenua was stained with the blood of innocent men women and children.<sup>644</sup>

6.7.3.3 Attempt to negotiate peace

According to the claimants, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori 'repeatedly sought to resolve the conflict peacefully' and end the war but the Crown ignored their approaches, and Rangiriri was one such example.<sup>645</sup> The evidence does suggest that at Rangiriri, Māori expected to negotiate terms of peace but ended up unwillingly surrendering. Dr O'Malley said the evidence supports the view that the Rangiriri prisoners believed that their surrender meant an end to the war. He quoted a conversation Te Puhī Paeturi had with EH Schnackenberg:

The chiefs understood that by our submission peace was to be declared, and there was to be an end of the war throughout the land. We handed over all our firearms and ammunition, but the General (Cameron) said he could not conclude negotiations at that spot, and that we must go to Te Ruato (Queen's Redoubt).<sup>646</sup>

Te Puhī's account is further corroborated by a report in the New Zealand Herald about the Rangiriri prisoners who were being transported through Ōtāhuhu. The report stated that the prisoners admit that they have been thoroughly beaten, and that they have submitted once and for ever. They add, that Waikato being the head of the revolt, and Waikato being conquered, they are prepared to surrender their lands. But they express great surprise that, having made unconditional submission, they should be held in captivity, as they look upon themselves as penitent subjects of the Queen, to be punished with the loss of land, but not of liberty. They affirm that Waikato will never strike another blow; and that William Thompson and his 400 would have come in and laid down their

---

642. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 125–132, 141, 142–143, 144–145.

643. Document A22, p 96.

644. Document K37 (Coromandel-Wander), p1.

645. Submission 3.4.15, p 7.

646. EH Schnackenberg, Maori Memories, As Related by the Kaumatuas of Kawhia to EHS, Kawhia (Kawhia: Kawhia Settler Print, 1926) (doc A22, p 74).

arms on Saturday morning, but that their captivity had deterred Thompson and his party from doing so.<sup>647</sup>

A letter to Tamihana from leaders among the prisoners said:

Kua mau te rongo ko a matou pu kua riro i a Te Tianara me koutou hoki kia penei me matou. Kia mau te rongo. Ko te rongo mau nei. Ko te mana o te motu me tuku ki raro, me hoatu te mana kia Kawana, kei whakaputa ke koutou i tetahi ritenga ma koutou.

Peace is made. Our guns are given up to the General. Be you like unto us: let peace be made. These are (the terms of) lasting peace: The mana of the island let it be put down; let the mana be given up to the Governor.<sup>648</sup>

Wiremu Te Wheoro, a Waikato rangatira who had not supported the Kīngitanga, wrote to the governor that 'Waikato has fallen': prisoners had been taken and guns had been given up; those who had escaped had agreed that peace should be made.<sup>649</sup> Tamihana, too, seems to have decided on peace at this point, sending his mere to Cameron.<sup>650</sup> The interpreter for the Crown, William Gundry, wrote to the Native Minister on 22 November. After the surrender, he said, the prisoners wanted to make peace, as they were the principal Chiefs of Waikato. The General told them he could not do that until the Governor arrived . . . White flags are flying all about the native settlements . . . In my opinion, the Maories will give up their arms when His Excellency comes up here.<sup>651</sup>

This accorded with European conventions of war, by which, although a decision about a truce or ceasefire was the responsibility of commanders in the field, the negotiation of lasting peace could only be agreed by political leaders.

Neither the governor nor his Ministers went to the redoubt to negotiate terms. Ministers do not seem to have met the prisoners at all, while the governor did not visit them until the middle of the following year.<sup>652</sup>

---

647. Document A22, pp 74–75 (New Zealand Herald, 27 November 1863). The reference to William Thompson's 400 is to the possibility of reinforcements led to Rangiriri by Wiremu Tamihana, who himself put the number at only 200: doc A22, pp 80–81.

648. Document A22, p 75 (Tireni and others to Wiremu Tamihana and others, 21 November 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p 3).

649. Te Wheoro to Grey, 23 November 1863 (doc A22, p 76).

650. Document A22, p 75.

651. Document A22, p 77 (WJ Gundry to Native Minister, 22 November 1863, AJHR, 1863, E-5D, p 5).

652. Grey to Cardwell, 7 September 1864, AJHR, E-5, p 10.

6.7.3.4 Treatment of prisoners

The prisoners taken at Rangiriri were held for an extended duration in squalid and crowded conditions without any inquiry into their participation in the wars. Writing from Rangiriri immediately after their capture, Gundry said: 'The prisoners seem very well contented at present, as the soldiers treat them well.'<sup>653</sup> They marched the 15 miles to the Queen's Redoubt on 23 November 1863, where Cameron had told them they must go to negotiate peace terms. After a day, they continued on to Ōtāhuhu, a further 25 miles, where the New Zealand Herald reported that they arrived on the afternoon of Wednesday 25 November way-worn and foot-sore, having marched from the Queen's Redoubt that morning, a distance of at least thirty miles . . . Some of the natives were so completely knocked up that they had to be conveyed in ambulance carts. . . . They seemed to be 'quite chop fallen.'<sup>654</sup>

The reception was 'anything but kindly', the Herald reported, while Bishop Selwyn wrote that at 'Otahuka' [Ōtāhuhu?] the prisoners were said to have been stoned as they marched by.<sup>655</sup>

A month later the prisoners were transferred to a converted coal hulk, the Marion, moored in the Hauraki Gulf. The governor visited them there in mid-1864, reporting to the Colonial Secretary that the prisoners had been 'illegally detained'. 'Amongst the men thus treated,' he said, 'were some whose previous conduct gave them strong claims on our generosity; others who, I believe, were most probably innocent men; no enquiry had been made into the guilt of any of them.'<sup>656</sup> Grey blamed his Ministers (as he so often did in these years), and told the Secretary for State:

On the whole, I was satisfied that the treatment these prisoners were receiving was such as would, when men's minds cooled down, be regarded as derogatory to the good name of Great Britain, and was rendering the Native population in some instances desperate. I have since seen the hulk and the prisoners. I believe that the health of many I saw and closely observed has been permanently injured by the length and nature of the imprisonment they were subjected to; and that their imprisonment in such numbers, in so limited, badly lighted, and ill-ventilated a space, reflects discredit on us, and will hereafter be most deservedly censured.<sup>657</sup>

The prisoners remained on the Marion until the beginning of August, when they were transferred 'on parole', at the governor's suggestion, to Kawau Island.<sup>658</sup> The

---

653. Gundry to Native Minister, 22 November 1863, AJHR, 1863, E5-D, p 5.

654. 'The Prisoners of War', New Zealand Herald, 27 November 1863, p 3 (doc A22, p 74).

655. H W Tucker, Memoir of the Life and Episcopate of George Augustus Selwyn (London: William Wells Gardner, 1879), p 190 (doc A22, p 74).

656. Grey to Cardwell, 7 September 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-5, p 10.

657. Grey to Cardwell, 7 September 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-5, p 10.

658. Dalton, War and Politics in New Zealand, p 200.

following month the prisoners escaped to Mahurangi, on the mainland, allegedly with the assistance of sympathetic Ngāpuhi.<sup>659</sup>

The Crown's treatment of the Rangiriri prisoners was reprehensible. They were held for nine months in squalid and crowded conditions without inquiry into their participation in the war. The harsh treatment of the Rangiriri prisoners undoubtedly contributed to the fierce resistance of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to British forces and the unwillingness to surrender to the Crown in later military engagements (see section 6.7.10.3).

6.7.3.5 Smallpox allegations

Traditional kōrero recounted to us by several claimants claimed that Pākehā soldiers and officials deliberately infected Māori populations with diseases such as smallpox. Shane Te Ruki alleged that disease was used as a weapon. He described the effect it had on Te Rohe Pōtae communities:

What I have not spoken of with regards to Ōrākau is the disease which ripped through the survivors who were put to flight from that place, also the survivors of the slaughter at Rangiaowhia, let's not call it a 'battle', let's call it what it is, a 'slaughter', he parekura, they were put to flight, but they were also put to flight with the disease we call 'karawaka', smallpox, it didn't arrive by accident, it did not arrive by accident, we know this.

A number of Māori imprisoned in the rohe of Tāmaki as the Crown's war machine began its journey into our rohe captured a number of Māori and ensured that they were inflicted – infested with this disease and set them loose amongst the population. Koirā ngā kōrero e mōhio nei. Koirā tētahi o ngā take i haere pera atu ai ngā orange o te pakanga o Ōrākau me Rangiaowhia arā ki Tokanui te aha ki te whakaora i o rātou tīnana e pānia nei e te tīnana e pānia nei e te mate, e te mate kiwaka. (Those are the stories handed down. That was the reason the survivors fled from Ōrākau and Rangiaowhia to Tokanui, to revive themselves – that was afflicted with smallpox.)

Ngāti Unu was also in there and sorely afflicted, many of our ancestors died, never to be heard of again. . . .

So severe was that epidemic, that uruta, as to remove a vast section of our population, I'm talking about Ngāti Unu and it's the same perhaps for many of you. Removed so that much of the kōrero, tātūhū kōrero, whakapapa, etc, no longer exists. Ko ngā kaupapa e mau tonu nei i a mātou, he toenga, he toenga kōrero. (Those things that we still hold are just crumbs, morsels.)<sup>660</sup>

Piko Davis also alleged that Ngāti Maniapoto prisoners were deliberately infected with smallpox and then released to spread the disease to their whānau. His evidence was based in part on the diary of Aporo Taratutu, which unfortunately

---

659. Document A22, pp 386–387.

660. Transcript 4.1.1, p90.

had been lost.<sup>661</sup> Mr Davis' estimate was that 8,000 people in Te Rohe Potae died from smallpox in 1864–1865, although others believed that the figure was much higher (12,000).<sup>662</sup>

Vincent O'Malley found no documentary evidence that Pākehā soldiers and officials deliberately infected prisoners with disease, specifically smallpox, in order to infect Māori communities. Disease did ravage Te Rohe Pōtae populations after the war, he said, but he characterised allegations of deliberate infection as part of 'the legacy of bitterness and mistrust over many generations left by war and raupatu'.<sup>663</sup> In additional evidence to the Tribunal, Dr O'Malley noted that the distribution of blankets infected with smallpox had been used as a weapon against Native Americans. He added that there were no known cases of ships with smallpox visiting New Zealand other than the Tyburnia in September 1863 (too early) and the Nebraska in 1872 (too late). There was thus no opportunity, he argued, for the Crown to have infected prisoners with smallpox even if the Government had been willing to do so.<sup>664</sup>

We accept that prisoners, taken mainly at Rangiriri but also in later engagements, were forced to travel far from home, kept in crowded quarters, and undoubtedly at heightened risk of contracting infectious disease as well as illnesses caused by poor sanitation and nutrition. We think it certain that, on release or escape, some returned home in 1865 carrying disease. Dr O'Malley pointed out that there were 'serious bouts of illness and disease amongst the Maori population of the Rohe Potae district in the aftermath of the wars.' Typhoid took a heavy toll because of the 'straitened circumstances in which the tribes found themselves' as a result of the war.<sup>665</sup> In our view, however, the claim of deliberate infection of smallpox is unconvincing. It does show the depth of animosity and grievance passed down from the 1860s to the present day.

6.7.4 Ngāruawāhia

At the battle of Rangiriri (and immediately afterwards), some Kingitanga leaders tried to negotiate with the Crown and bring an end to the war. Crown counsel argued that the only chiefs who wanted to surrender were those who had been taken prisoner at Rangiriri. Otherwise there was very little evidence that Kingitanga chiefs were prepared to surrender on the Crown's terms (laying down their arms and accepting the Crown's authority, at a minimum). Instead, the Crown's view is that the Kingitanga were not sufficiently discouraged by Rangiriri, and the governor had little reason to modify his terms at that point. For these

---

661. Document A78, p 190; doc 020(b) (Davis), pp 20–29; transcript 4.1.6 (Katharine Taurau, Ngā Korero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-noho marae, 10 June 2010), pp 129–132; transcript 4.1.13 (Te Piko Davis, hearing week 8, Te Kotahitanga Marae, November 2013), pp 1166–1170, 1182–1191.

662. Transcript 4.1.13 (Davis), pp 1183–1184.

663. Document A22, p 387; doc A22(h) (O'Malley), pp 6–22.

664. Document A22(h), pp 6–22; see also submission 3.3.243(a), the documents filed by the claimants for Dr O'Malley to review.

665. Document A22, p 387; doc A22(h), pp 16–20.

reasons, Crown counsel did not accept the claimants' argument that the Crown missed an opportunity to end the war.<sup>666</sup>

This attempt to negotiate raised several questions:

- ▶ Would other Kingitanga leaders agree to negotiate?
- ▶ Would the Crown agree to negotiate?
- ▶ What kind of terms would the Crown offer, and would those be flexible (open to negotiation and amendment) or acceptable to the Kingitanga?

The answers to these questions are crucial to our understanding of how the war was conducted, and whether the Crown prolonged its unjust war past the point where peace could have been made.

The first question is whether other Kingitanga leaders would join Tamihana and the chiefs who raised the white flag at Rangiriri in seeking to end the war at this time. Dr O'Malley noted that one of the escaped chiefs, Te Wharepu,<sup>667</sup> wrote to the governor on behalf of all the chiefs of Waikato seeking the restoration of the prisoners and an end to the war. 'Let it suffice for you,' he wrote, 'the men who are dead.'<sup>668</sup> O'Malley concluded that 'all of the available evidence' showed this letter was sent on behalf of the Kingitanga leadership.<sup>669</sup> At Ngāruawāhia the leaders of Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Mahuta, and Ngāti Maniapoto gathered and agreed that the war should be ended.<sup>670</sup>

The second question is whether the Crown would agree to negotiate. At first it seemed that the answer was 'yes'. Governor Grey wrote to the Waikato chiefs on 6 December 1863 that they must allow Cameron to 'go uninterrupted' to Ngāruawāhia and hoist the Queen's flag. After this was done, he told the chiefs, 'I will talk to you.'<sup>671</sup> The Kingitanga leaders agreed to these terms; the only dispute among them was about whether the King's 80-foot flagstaff should be left standing for receipt of the Queen's flag. Cameron was allowed to occupy Ngāruawāhia without opposition, and the King's flag was sent to Grey.<sup>672</sup>

General Cameron approved of making peace at this point because he feared driving the Waikato peoples to desperate resistance, but at the same time he wanted to make peace with them so that his army could continue onwards unopposed to attack Ngāti Maniapoto. Punishing this iwi had always been one of the objectives of the war. The general warned that 'fair terms' would have to be offered to avoid driving the Waikato tribes to extremes.<sup>673</sup> Grey advised Cameron that occupying the King's capital and raising the Queen's flag there would suffice to show the country that the King movement had been crushed. After that, the Government would be 'quite ready to consider any proposals that the Natives

666. Submission 3.4.300, pp 12–13.

667. Pene Te Wharepu, also known as Pene Pukewhau: doc A22, p 78 n

668. Pene Pukewhau to Grey, 25 November 1863 (doc A22, p 78).

669. Document A22, pp 78–82.

670. Document A22, pp 83–85.

671. Document A22, p 82 (Grey to Pene Pukewhau and the chiefs of Waikato, 6 December 1863).

672. Document A22, pp 83–88.

673. Document A22, p 86 (Cameron to Grey, 8 December 1863).

may make.<sup>674</sup> Preparations were made for the governor to leave Auckland for Ngāruawāhia on 16 December 1863.<sup>675</sup> He reported to the Secretary of State that the ‘neck of this unhappy rebellion is now broken,’ and the Government drew up terms of surrender for the chiefs.<sup>676</sup>

The third question is what kind of terms was the Crown prepared to offer? It is difficult to classify them as ‘fair’ (as the general had suggested): everyone would have to appear before the governor at Ngāruawāhia, surrender their weapons, agree to obey the Queen’s law, and then go and live at places appointed by the governor. All of their land would be confiscated but the governor would choose and return certain pieces to surrendered hapū and individuals. Those who had committed ‘murders’ would be put on trial.<sup>677</sup>

In any event, the governor broke his promise and decided not to come to Ngāruawāhia and discuss terms with the rangatira – and receive their surrender. He gave two main reasons for this. First, he argued that only the chiefs imprisoned after Rangiriri (and their immediate relations) were involved and that the other Kingitanga leaders remained defiant. Work had begun on new Māori fortifications, and other reasons (which he said he could not remember) gave him the impression that ‘many of the Natives did not consider themselves as yet subdued.’<sup>678</sup> Secondly, Grey refused to go because of a dispute with his Ministers as to whether they should accompany him. On 24 December 1863, the Ministers withdrew their objection to the governor going on his own, but Grey had clearly changed his mind that the Kingitanga was ready to surrender.<sup>679</sup>

Former Attorney-General, Henry Sewell, condemned both governor and Ministers:

A distinct written pledge had been given by the Governor, after Rangiriri, that he would meet the natives at Ngaruawahia, when the Queen’s flag should be planted there, and would then talk to them about terms of peace. Upon the strength of this promise they evacuated Ngaruawahia abandoning their position without a struggle. The Governor was bound as a man of honour to fulfil that promise. His excuses for not doing so, are poor and trifling, but it was the duty of Ministers to measure the full extent of the obligation, and if Sir George Grey refused to allow them to accompany him, they ought, under protest, to have allowed him to go by himself. It was their duty to advise him, at all events to go. All the War after this, with all its consequences, loss of money, loss of life, and destruction of native confidence, lies at the door of the Governor primarily, but in a second degree at that of the late Ministers.<sup>680</sup>

---

674. Document A22, pp 85–86 (Grey to Cameron, 6 December 1863).

675. Document A22, p 90.

676. Document A22, p 88 (Grey to Newcastle, 9 December 1863).

677. Document A22, pp 89–90.

678. Document A22, pp 90–91 (‘Memorandum by the Governor as to going to Ngaruawahia,’ 18 December 1863).

679. Document A22, pp 92–93.

680. Document A22, p 92 (Sewell, journal, 19 January 1865).

From the evidence reviewed by us (all of which was available to Grey), a broad-based group of Kīngitanga leaders had come together and agreed on peace. The governor was wrong to suggest that the initiative was limited to the immediate relatives of those taken at Rangiriri. We agree with the claimants that this was a crucial opportunity for the Crown to end its unjust war. Whether the Kīngitanga leaders would have accepted Grey's terms is a matter that we can never know. Crown counsel argued that the Crown had little reason to modify those terms and did not do so.<sup>681</sup>

On 16 December 1863, Grey sent a letter to the Waikato chiefs (in lieu of coming to Ngāruawāhia), inviting them to send a deputation to Auckland if they were prepared to submit to the authority of the Government. The deputation would be 'well-treated' and would be allowed to return to the Waikato. The governor would explain his future intentions and 'hear any representations they may have to make'. There was no mention of the terms that the governor and Ministers had agreed upon the week before, other than to state that those who gave up their arms would not be imprisoned unless they had 'committed murders'.<sup>682</sup> This was one of many admonishments by the Crown that those who killed non-combatants would be punished, an important standard to which the Crown's own troops should also have been held accountable (see section 6.7.7). Grey's letter did, however, warn the rangatira to decide quickly as the general's army would continue its advance in the meantime.<sup>683</sup> It seemed that there was no real choice: Cameron's force began moving up the Waipā, and the example of Rangiriri did not inspire any confidence that the chiefs would not be arrested in Auckland if they trusted to the honour of the Crown. The war continued.

Dr O'Malley suggested that the Crown's motivation to continue the war in December 1863 was the rich agricultural lands lying south of Ngāruawāhia, and the conviction that the Kīngitanga was far from crushed.<sup>684</sup> As will be recalled, the Crown's intention in June 1863 was to occupy and confiscate land running all the way across the island from Raglan to Tauranga.

When the Kīngitanga realised that there would be no peace negotiations, it seemed to them that Ngāruawāhia had been taken from them by a 'smart trick'; messengers were sent to tell the troops 'that it was not fair, and that they were to return'. Unsurprisingly, 'they refused to budge'.<sup>685</sup>

6.7.5 Te Rore

Since the Government refused to make peace in mid-December 1863, British forces began moving south from Ngāruawāhia along the Waipā River in late December. The small papakāinga of Te Rore was located just north of present-day Pirongia, on the bank of the Waipā River at the mouth of the Mangakāware

681. Submission 3.4.300, p13.

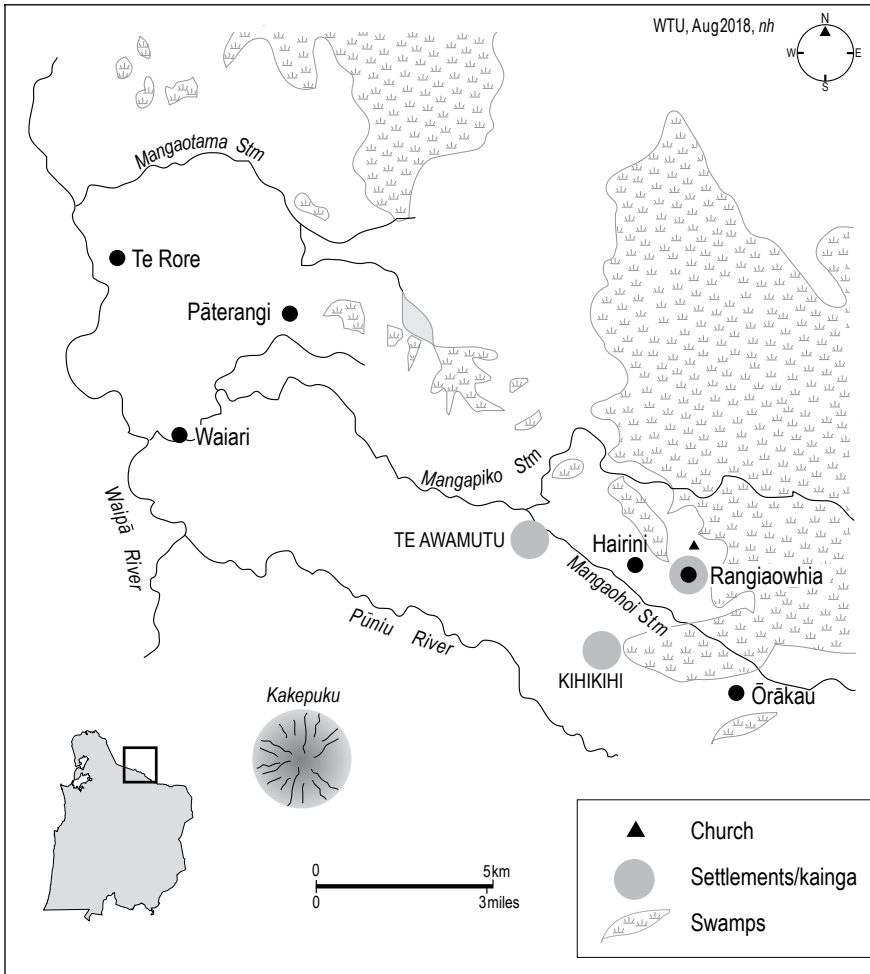

682. Grey to George Graham, 9 May 1865 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 447); Grey to Pene Te Wharepu and the Chiefs of Waikato, 16 December 1863, AJHR, 1864, E-2, pp 4-5.

683. Document A22, p 99.

684. Document A22, pp 93-99; doc A22(c), p 6.

685. 'A New History of the Maori War', Wanganui Herald, 9 February 1884, p 2 (doc A110, p 524).

Stream. Te Rore was not a fortified pā and had no offensive or defensive purpose. It was, however, in a strategic location which marked the effective limit of navigable water for large vessels on the river. This made it a significant staging post for much of the commerce that went in and out of the upper Waipā district, and also for an army bringing men and supplies up the Waikato River. A cart road connected Te Rore with Pāterangi, Te Awamutu, and Rangiaowhia, which again had both commercial and military significance. John Vittoria Cowell had moved to

Te Rore from Kāwhia in 1839, married Mata Rihana the sister of Ngāti Apakura rangatira Wiremu Toetoe, and set up a hotel and trading post.<sup>686</sup>

Claimants from Ngāti Pēhi and Ngāti Te Kanawa (Wai 1606) alleged that Te Rore was bombarded, destroyed, and taken over as a military camp early in 1864. Liane Green said the Green, Te Kanawa, Turner, and Ormsby whānau lived there and the places destroyed included the Mangapouri flour mill, Tommy Green's timber mill, a bakery, butchery, and general store belonging to James Turner, and a school, two churches, and a barn.<sup>687</sup> The settlement was not a fortified pā and was not established for any military purpose, she said. They did not claim mana whenua, but were there to take advantage of commercial opportunities. The property of these two hapū in Te Rore was taken by the Crown and their businesses were destroyed.<sup>688</sup>

According to Frank Thorne, Te Rore was Ngāti Hikairo territory, referred to in a waiata composed by Pareoranga, a wife of Hikairo, after the death of her son Kakea. The Rūnanga o Ngāti Hikairo sought the return of land at Te Rore from the Compensation Court in 1865: 'ko Te Rore te ingoa o taua whenua, ko Pirongia Te Maunga, ko Mangauika te Mania.' Cowell's wife was Mata Kēkē, Mr Thorne said: she belonged to Ngāti Rāhui and had connections to Te Rore. Cowell had leased 20,000 acres there from Ngāti Hikairo.<sup>689</sup>

General Cameron established his headquarters at Te Rore late in January 1864. The armoured British steamship Avon could not travel any further upstream, and the route inland to Rangiaowhia and beyond was barred by the fortifications of Pāterangi. Mr Thorne said the army also occupied the former kāinga Tiongahemo, where the Pirongia golf course is now, and built a redoubt on Te Huri a Pōmare (where Ngā Puhī rangatira Pōmare was killed in 1826: see chapter 2).<sup>690</sup>

Several thousand men camped in the area for more than three weeks, and a smaller force remained in occupation for a much longer period. For these reasons, the Crown submitted, 'a certain level of damage and destruction was likely', but the evidence did not substantiate a claim of bombardment and destruction.<sup>691</sup> Crown counsel pointed to the account of von Tempsky, which mentioned that Armstrong guns had been brought with the army to Te Rore:

From our most advanced post, under Colonel Waddy, of the 50th Regiment, you could see the daily life going on at Paterangi. A little battery of Armstrongs kept the 686. Document A22(c), pp 6, 8; transcript 4.1.10 (Frank Thorne, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 9 April 2013), pp 548–549; submission 3.4.310(e), pp 37–38.

---

687. Document s50(e) (Green and Tahī), paras 40–47 and document s50(c), paras 38–43, citing interviews with Patricia Turu (Ngāti Peehi, Ngāti Te Kanawa) in 2009, and Piko Davis (Ngāti Te Kanawa) in 2008 and 2012.

688. Claim 1.2.81, paras 90–93; submission 3.4.169(a), paras 31–33; transcript 4.1.10, p 807.

689. Document K32 (Thorne), pp 16–18.

690. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 548–550.

691. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 37–38.

alertness of the Maoris somewhat in practice, and from a still more advanced hill a picket amused itself daily by long shots at the Maoris.<sup>692</sup>

This activity, Crown counsel suggested, might be ‘the background’ to the Wai 1606 claim.<sup>693</sup>

Dr O’Malley found only limited information describing the British advance on Te Rore. Troops marched up both sides of the river to reach Te Rore, which soldier Edward Tedder described as a ‘large cattle station’, late on 28 January 1864. They found it unoccupied. Dr O’Malley found no evidence of sustained bombardment, although the British did have a number of large guns: a 12-pound Armstrong gun was mounted on the Avon and three more such guns had been transported over land to Te Rore. The Avon snagged on submerged branches on 8 February, and sank (it was subsequently refloated).<sup>694</sup>

There is no evidence that the Avon had previously travelled upriver as far as Te Rore. The deputy quartermaster-general wrote that on 28 January, as troops moved up to Te Rore, ‘the “Avon” was to bring up supplies to Te Rore, covered by this detachment.’<sup>695</sup> A history of the gunboats pointed out that their safe passage was vital to the supply chain; between Whatawhata and Te Rore the Avon was protected by Forest Rangers, deployed along the both banks of the river to prevent an ambush.<sup>696</sup>

Māori destroyed two European-style buildings in advance of the British occupation: Cowell’s trading post and a house belonging to Dennett Heather near Mangaotama Stream. Dr O’Malley suggested the intent was to deny their use to the British and to obtain materials such as timber for fortifications. Māori whare seem to have been left intact when they departed in advance of the army. The Daily Southern Cross reported: ‘The General and staff took up their quarters near the Maori whares.’<sup>697</sup>

British troops were once again in close proximity to Kingitanga defenders. Desultory fire was exchanged during the first weeks of February. Rihi Te Rauparaha, who was aged about 10 at the time of the invasion, later recorded her memories of the event. We do not know when this was written:

Ka haere mai i roto o wai pa te tima o nga hoia Ka tae mai kite rore ka puhia te kapene e nga maori toko rua ko reupene tetahi ko pehimana tetahi Ka mate te kapene ki te rore noho tonu iho i te rore nga hoia i whawhai ana i te rore e rua nga maori i tu kotahi i mate kotahi i kai akiko Ka haere mai ana te hoia ka noho ki waiari ka whawhai ana te ma ori raua ko te pakeha me te maori 692. Gustavus von Tempsky, journal, 27 January 1864 (Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 350).

693. Transcript 4.1.10, p 809.

694. Document A22(c), pp 6–33.

695. Gamble, February 1864 (doc A22(c), p 15).

696. Grant Middlemiss, The Waikato River Gunboats: The Story of the Gunboats used during the British Invasion of the Waikato (Cambridge: Grant Middlemiss, 2014), p 84.

697. Document A22(c), pp 22, 29, 32–33; ‘The War in Auckland’, Daily Southern Cross, 4 February 1864, p 3.

The warship came into the Waipa to Te Rore. The Maori who shot the captain were Reuben and Pehimana. The captain died at Te Rore. Those troops stayed at Te Rore. They fought again at Te Rore. Two Maori stood alone, one died of flesh wound. The troops came again and stayed at waiari. Fought again, Maori and Pakeha.<sup>698</sup>

The soldiers' steamer came up the Waipa. When it arrived at Te Rore the captain was shot by two Maori, Reuben and Pehimana. The captain died at Te Rore. The soldiers remained at Te Rore. They fought again at Te Rore. Two of the Maori were hit. One died and one was wounded.

The soldiers came again and stopped at Waiari. The Maori and Pakeha fought again in the Mangapiko River. Maori and Pakeha were killed in that fight . . .<sup>699</sup>

This account is broadly consistent with other sources. On 5 February, wrote soldier Edward Tedder, Māori hidden in scrub on the riverbank fired on the Avon near Mangaotama Creek, killing Lieutenant Mitchell. Soldiers foraged daily through the abandoned cultivations and orchards, and were fired on by Māori concealed in the fern. An obelisk on Kakaramea Road records the deaths of three British soldiers, one of whom was shot in an ambush near Te Rore on 8 February 1864.<sup>700</sup> In general, historians have noted the absence of the kind of sniping and raids on supply lines that Māori forces adopted in the early stages of the invasion.

Historian Andrew Francis described the canoe trade between Te Rohe Pōtae and Auckland as 'a substantial operation involving large numbers of Maori transporting considerable amounts of varied cargo'. Te Rore played an important part in this trade system, in which, by the 1850s, European traders were being 'surpassed by the adeptness and business acumen' of Māori.<sup>701</sup>

As counsel for the claimants acknowledged, the Wai 1606 claim is about loss of property, not life.<sup>702</sup> Heavy guns were present, and in sporadic use, but the evidence does not support a claim that Te Rore suffered heavy bombardment before it was occupied. The residents of Te Rore left before the British arrived. Māori burned or removed material from the two European buildings in the area, but left whare intact. As the Crown acknowledged, these whare and the goods and cultivations nearby are likely to have been damaged or destroyed during the British occupation. This meant that the homes, possessions, and livelihoods of the inhabitants were destroyed in two senses: first, by the immediate military occupation, and, secondly, by the fact that they could not return and rebuild – this land was soon after confiscated by the Crown.

Cowell received compensation of £766 for the loss of his home and business. Dr O'Malley found no evidence that Te Rore Māori were ever compensated for the loss of their homes and livelihoods.<sup>703</sup>

698. Document P1(a) (Lennox appendixes), pp 49–50; doc s50(a) (Green document bank), pp 8–11.

699. Alternative translation in doc s50(a), p 11.

700. Document A22(c), pp 9, 28–29.

701. Document A26 (Francis), pp 60–61, 74.

702. Transcript 4.1.10 (claimant counsel, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 11 April 2013), p 1013.

703. Document A22(c), pp 25–26.

6.7.6 Waiari

While Crown forces were advancing up the Waipā River towards the rich agricultural lands of Rangiaowhia, the Kīngitanga tribes were building a new defensive line to stop the British advance. This line was centred on Pāterangi. Cameron's goal was to outflank the Pāterangi line.<sup>704</sup> On the way, there was an encounter between Crown and Māori at Waiari, which the claimants raised with us in their evidence and submissions.

6.7.6.1 What happened?

Waiari was occupied by Ngāti Puhiaue and was the home of Hikairo in the late eighteenth century. He was a Ngāti Apakura rangatira, but Ngāti Hikairo say he lived at Waiari after separating from Ngāti Apakura, and that Ngāti Puhiaue and Ngāti Hikairo were merged there. His son Whakamarurangi was born there, and Hikairo's decapitated head returned and interred there after he was killed at Pukerimu.<sup>705</sup> At Native Land Court hearings in 1886, Mohi Te Rongomau (Ngāti Hōrua) and Harete Tamehana (Ngāti Hauā) said that Ngāti Hikairo lived at Waiari during the wars but settled at Kāwhia with others of Waikato afterwards. Mohi had heard they were employed as scouts and signalmen during the war.<sup>706</sup>

An advance camp of 600 troops, under command of Colonel Waddy, was established about a mile to the south of Pāterangi near Mangapiko Stream. On 11 February, a party of about 50 British soldiers, protected by 20 sentries, came down to the river to wash. The bathers were fired on, whether due to opportunistic enthusiasm or because the Māori thought they had been discovered is uncertain. Dr O'Malley followed Cowan, and official accounts, that the ambush party had planned to mount a surprise assault early the following morning on the advance British camp. They had concealed themselves near an old Ngāti Apakura pā site at Waiari on the southern bank of Mangapiko Stream, from where they intended to attack the British camp from the rear.<sup>707</sup>

Frank Thorne said the Ngāti Hikairo view was that there was considerable discussion over whether to fire on the troops, but he indicated that the attack was in response to an unlooked for opportunity:

Waiari isn't detailed that much in regards to the other more well-known battles and because the others actually had strategic, strategically-built pā and they're prepared and there's a military force with big canons and all that kind of stuff. In this case there's some ill-prepared troops and some probably just as ill-prepared Māori coming across one another . . .<sup>708</sup>

---

704. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 160–163.

705. Document A110, p 350; doc K32, p 19; transcript 4.1.10 (Thorne, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 9 April 2013, p 552; doc K11 (Bell), p 6.

706. Document A94 (Collins, Turner, and Te Huia), p 158.

707. Document A22, pp 104–107; Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp 346–349; 'Further Papers relative to the Native Insurrection', AJHR, E-3, 1864, pp 22–28.

708. Transcript 4.1.10 (Thorne), pp 591.

According to Pohepohe Mac Bell:

Our people were lacking in ammunition and lacking in every damn thing that it was possible to lack (tēnā te korero a taku kaumātua) and put up a hell of a fight really and paid dearly for it too. One part there they set up traps and had the Europeans pinned down, and, as they did, to make the fight fair, let them get away . . . and the Europeans got up and shot them. It was a different concept of conduct of war – different thinking.<sup>709</sup>

There may have been reluctance on the part of younger members of the group to get involved. Te Mūnu Waitai, old and asthmatic, ‘stood up and pūkanaed at the Pākehā enemy and they shot him dead.’<sup>710</sup>

The ambush party retreated into the old pā, but reinforcements were rapidly deployed: one detachment crossed the river by a log bridge just downstream to try to cut off a retreat. Heavy fire was exchanged over several hours.<sup>711</sup>

6.7.6.2 Casualties

For the defenders of Pāterangi, Waiari was a significant loss. The British return of casualties numbered six dead and seven wounded. Māori losses are less certain but Dr O’Malley put the best estimate at 35 dead and 30 wounded. Cowan wrote that many of those who fought were Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Maniapoto, recently arrived from Kāwhia. As well as Te Mūnu, Cowan named Taati, Ta Kerei, Taare, Te Kariri, and Hone Ropiha of Ngāti Maniapoto as among the dead. The New Zealand Herald reported that a son of Tikaokao and a nephew of Takerei were killed.<sup>712</sup> Tame Tūwhangai said that Ngāti Huru rangatira Te Rōre Te Māngina and his son, Īnia, were at Waiari and Īnia was killed there; Mr Tūwhangai said his grandmother’s first cousin was named Mangapiko in memory of this tupuna.<sup>713</sup>

Although we are not reporting on Ngāti Hikairo’s raupatu claim, we note their evidence on Waiari as a matter of context.<sup>714</sup> According to Ngāti Hikairo witnesses, Waiari was a pivotal battle for their tūpuna. Louvaine Kaumoana said: ‘I think this really “knocked the stuffing” out of our fighting force and our people were less involved in later battles.’<sup>715</sup> Mr Thorne said it was a turning point: ‘a good time to withdraw from active engagement in the war, and regroup and weigh up how to approach the continuing war.’<sup>716</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Hikairo said that ‘most of the lives lost at Waiari were of Ngāti Hikairo’ and the battle caused ‘a large loss of the iwi’s warriors and leadership.’<sup>717</sup> These losses, Mr Thorne considered, would 709. Transcript 4.1.10 (Thorne), p 552.

710. Pohepohe Mac Bell, interview, 2012 (doc K32, p 21).

711. Havelock to Waddy, 12 February 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-3, p 23.

712. Document A22, pp 105–106; Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 349.

713. Transcript 4.1.17, p 579; doc R13(b) (Tūwhangai), pp 5–6.

714. Submission 3.4.226, pp 17–18.

715. Document K10 (Kaumoana), p 3.

716. Transcript 4.1.12, p 47 (Frank Thorne, hearing week 7, Waipapa marae, 7 October 2013).

717. Transcript 4.1.10, p 535.

have weighed heavily with Ngātūerua when he decided to warn his people at Rangiaowhia to escape inevitable trouble.<sup>718</sup>

Ngāti Maniapoto lost people according to Thomas Maniapoto: ‘Our people were at the fighting at Waiari and I am aware some of them died there during the fighting subsequent to the ambush, but there were many more of our relations there.’<sup>719</sup>

Rovina Anderson said Te Warahoe took part, and Rewi Maniapoto later said he had been present.<sup>720</sup>

6.7.6.3 Issues about Waiari

Waiari was important to the claimants because of the ‘large loss of Māori lives.’<sup>721</sup> Despite this significant loss of life, the events at Waiari are not widely known. James Belich does not mention the battle in his account of the Waikato war. Several claimants pointed out that while a stone monument surrounded by a pipe fence commemorates the British dead, the Māori who fell lie in an unmarked grave:

He maha ngā tūpuna i mate ai i Waiari, kei Mangapiko. Otirā ka tanumia ki reira, kāore kau he tohu hei whakamārama, hei whakamahara i a rātou engari kāore e tata atu he tohu hei whakamaharatia ngā hoia i patu ai ki reira. Koirā tā mātou mamae nā.

There were many ancestors who died at Waiari, which is at Mangapiko. Although they are buried there, there are no commemoration stones to remember them. But not far away there is a monument commemorating the soldiers who died there. So the pain still lingers because of that.<sup>722</sup>

Tiwha Bell and Janise Eketone mentioned Waiari as one of the battles that Ngāti Maniapoto had expected would be remembered by the Crown during the 150th anniversary of the war.<sup>723</sup> Ralph Johnson, for the Ministry for Culture and Heritage, said that a commemoration of the 150th anniversary was held at Waiari.<sup>724</sup>

The Crown raised the issue of Waiari in respect of its argument that not all Māori engagements with the Crown were ‘defensive’ in nature. This argument was made in two instances. The first was the raids in July to October 1863 (discussed in section 6.7.3). In that section of our report, we acknowledged that some settler non-combatants were killed in raids. The second instance was Waiari.<sup>725</sup>

718. Document K32, p 24.

719. Document K15, p 8.

720. Document K36, p 3; doc K23, p 22: Thomas Maniapoto thought that Te Warahoe were originally from Te Urewera (transcript 4.1.6, p 93); Harold Maniapoto said they were brought to the Waipā district by Terai, a son of Pēhi Tukorehu (transcript 4.1.1, pp 95–96).

721. Document K32(a) (Thorne), p 12

722. Transcript 4.1.2 (Frank Thorne), p 243; see also doc K35, p 25.

723. Document Q27 (Bell and Eketone), p 7.

724. Document T8 (Johnson), p 23.

725. Submission 3.4.300, pp 8, 13.

The Crown accepted that Te Rohe Potae iwi were justified in fighting in defence of their lands and homes.<sup>726</sup> But in opening submissions Crown counsel also stated that '[t]he Crown today does not necessarily accept that all responses of Rohe Pōtae Māori to the invasion were defensive'. For the Crown, this underlined why 'Māori who resisted its authority with force and arms' were thought at the time to be in rebellion. Crown counsel added: 'However, having regard to its concession that the war was an injustice and a breach of the Treaty, and in the spirit of reconciliation, the Crown does not consider it would be a constructive exercise to focus on those instances in this forum.'<sup>727</sup>

The Crown repeated this argument in closing, and raised the issue of Waiari: 'The failed ambush at Waiari took place on 11 Feb 1865 [sic]. O'Malley acknowledged that this 'wasn't a strictly defensive action' and accepted that the attack would have reinforced the Crown view that Māori were still in rebellion.'<sup>728</sup>

The Tribunal asked Crown counsel to clarify whether Waiari should properly be regarded as an offensive act in the context of Māori defending themselves against a Crown invasion of their lands. The Tribunal also queried whether the fact that the Māori involved seemed to 'stumble' upon the bathing soldiers should really be characterised as an 'ambush' or rather as an opportunistic action. Crown counsel agreed that the encounter may have been opportunistic but reiterated the Crown's position that the Tribunal lacked evidence of what was 'justified in war situations.'<sup>729</sup>

Waiari was a rare exception. Vincent O'Malley pointed out that the vast majority of fighting in the Waikato war took the form of Crown attacks upon Māori.<sup>730</sup> The authors of the Ngāti Maniapoto report had this to say about Waiari: 'Although the incident was an ambush, Ngāti Maniapoto and other Iwi were ultimately acting against Crown forces which had wrongly labelled them rebels and invaded their lands.'<sup>731</sup> In reply submissions, claimant counsel argued that in defending themselves from an invasion, their response 'could only ever be defensive.'<sup>732</sup>

This issue about Waiari goes to the heart of whether the Crown's conduct in attacking the peoples of the Waikato and Te Rohe Pōtae was lawful, and whether the Crown at the time was justified in considering those peoples to be in rebellion. Those issues have been debated in other Tribunal inquiries, where the Crown refused to accept that Māori were justified in fighting to defend their lands and maintained that Māori were in rebellion.<sup>733</sup> But in our inquiry the Crown has conceded that:

- ▶ the Waikato war was an injustice and a breach of Treaty principles;

726. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

727. Submission 3.4.16, pp 6–7.

728. Submission 3.4.300, pp 8, 13n; transcript 4.1.23, pp 861–862.

729. Transcript 4.1.23, pp 902–904.

730. Transcript 4.1.10, p 812.

731. Document A110 (Joseph), p 532.

732. Submission 3.4.391, p 8.

733. Submission 3.4.300, p 13; submission 3.4.281, pp 27–28; see also Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, pp 108–116.

- ▶ Te Rohe Potae iwi and hapū were ‘justified in taking up arms in defence of their lands and homes’ and in defence of the Kingitanga; and
  - ▶ Māori were unfairly labelled as rebels in the Waikato war.<sup>734</sup>
- In previous inquiries, the Crown has not made these concessions.<sup>735</sup>

In light of the Crown’s concessions, we do not consider it necessary to determine whether Māori acted on the offensive rather than strictly defensively at Waiari or on any other occasions during the Waikato war. We accept the Crown’s submission that it serves no constructive purpose to pursue these matters further.<sup>736</sup>

6.7.7 Rangiaowhia

‘the hidden things have become manifest, namely good and evil’<sup>737</sup>

6.7.7.1 What happened?

Late in the evening of Saturday 20 February 1864, more than 1,000 imperial troops, Forest Rangers, and Colonial Defence Force cavalry left Te Rore.<sup>738</sup> Guided by Ngātūerua Erueti (James Edwards) and John Gage, the British force crossed the Mangapiko Stream by the bridge at Waiari where the failed ambush had taken place nine days earlier. They marched silently in single file past Pāterangi, close enough to hear sentries calling to one another. The rough cattle track through fern met the dray road connecting Te Awamutu to the Pūniu River, and the invading force arrived in Te Awamutu at about 7am on Sunday morning.<sup>739</sup>

Cameron immediately pushed on towards Rangiaowhia, sending the Mounted Royal Artillery and Colonial Defence Force cavalry in advance of the main column. Cameron’s report to Grey briefly described the events that followed:

The few natives who were in the place were completely taken by surprise, and refusing to lay down their arms, fired on the Mounted Royal Artillery and Colonial Defence Force, whom I sent on in advance of the column. The natives were quickly dispersed, and the greater part escaped; but a few of them taking shelter in a whare, made a desperate resistance, until the Forest Rangers and a company of the 65th Regiment surrounded the whare, which was set on fire, and the defenders either killed or taken prisoners.<sup>740</sup>

6.7.7.2 Casualties and prisoners

In his report to Grey, General Cameron wrote that the British lost two killed and six wounded. He estimated 12 Māori were killed and about 15 were wounded. Of

734. Submission 3.4.300, pp 1, 8.

735. See, for example, Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, pp 103–104, 108–116.

736. Submission 3.4.16, pp 6–7.

737. ‘Important Letter from the King Party’, Daily Southern Cross, 22 July 1868, p 3.

738. Belich says 1,230: Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 163; Cameron’s report counted 1,097: Cameron to Grey, 25 February 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-3, p 29.

739. Document A22, pp 107–108.

740. Cameron to Grey, 25 February 1864 (doc A22, pp 108–109).

the 33 captured, 21 were women and children; Cameron made no mention of women and children being among the casualties.<sup>741</sup> Several days after the attack, Wiremu Tamihana wrote that there were ‘six . . . killed in one place’, which Dr O’Malley said was a reference to those who burned to death in a whare.<sup>742</sup>

Claimants and technical witnesses identified several iwi and hapū present during the attack, including but not limited to Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Rāhui, Ngāti Hounuku, Ngāti Tauhunu, Ngāti Taheke, and Ngāti Parekahuki. Frank Thorne gave kōrero about his tupuna Te Kewene Whakataha who was at Rangiaowhia. Mr Thorne also identified two others who died at Rangiaowhia, Te Wera and Matapura.<sup>743</sup> Tame Tūwhāngai’s tupuna Hounuku Wharekoka and his wife Karo were at Rangiaowhia along with his great-great-aunt Rina Haututu and her husband.<sup>744</sup> Piripi Crown told the Tribunal about Hongihongi, who was in the burning church. Hongihongi and his sister Rangiamoa escaped the church, pulling Te Wano with them, and fled along a path named Tomotomo Ariki.<sup>745</sup> Those are a few examples but we heard many more kōrero about Rangiaowhia.

6.7.7.3 What are the claims about?

Ngāti Apakura claimants said Rangiaowhia was ‘a turning point’ in their history.<sup>746</sup> Casualties were not killed in war but were murdered. Gordon Lennox told us: ‘This is what has been passed down through my whanau and sustains much of our anger about these events.’<sup>747</sup>

Rangiaowhia was not a fighting pā, the claimants said, but an agreed place of refuge for women, children, and the elderly. The British promised that women and children would not be killed. The Crown said Te Awamutu, Kihikihi, and Rangiaowhia were ‘the principal supply bases’ for the defensive pā system. In closing submissions, the Crown said it was ‘unlikely’ General Cameron agreed not to attack Rangiaowhia.<sup>748</sup>

Rangiaowhia was charged by armed cavalry, the claimants said; no opportunity was offered for the inhabitants to surrender. Twelve whare were burned, including one that was deliberately set alight with people still inside. Inhabitants were shot when they tried to surrender or escape.<sup>749</sup> The Crown responded that Māori opened fire when troops entered the village and continued to shoot at soldiers. Evidence that a building was deliberately torched was ‘not particularly convincing’, the Crown said.<sup>750</sup>

---

741. Document A22, pp108–110.

742. Wiremu Tamihana to Rawiri and Tawaha, 28 February 1864 (doc A22, p128).

743. Document K32, p 24.

744. Transcript 4.1.4, p 148; doc K19, p 4.

745. Transcript 4.1.6, p 397; doc A97, p 202.

746. Document K22 (Lennox), p 27.

747. Document K22, p 28.

748. Submission 3.4.300, p 16.

749. Submission 3.4.127, p 22; submission 3.4.228, p 43.

750. Submission 3.4.300, p 17 n

Ngāti Apakura claimants said there was evidence that women and children were killed at Rangiaowhia. The claimants also submitted evidence that women were raped by soldiers at Rangiaowhia. In response, the Crown argued that only those who fired at the soldiers were attacked (others did not and were not), and there is no contemporary evidence that women and children were killed at Rangiaowhia.<sup>751</sup> At the hearing of the Crown's closing submissions, however, Crown counsel agreed that this submission was incorrect and that certain evidence on the record had been overlooked.<sup>752</sup>

6.7.7.4 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?

The Ngāti Apakura oral and traditional history report acknowledged that exact boundaries were unclear, but 'clarified' that Ngāti Apakura had 'spheres of influence, a rohe or takiwā as it were' around Te Awamutu, Kaipaka, Hairini, Rangiaowhia, Puhue, Ōhaupo, Tuhikaramea, Ngāhinapōuri, Pirongia and Kāwhia'. Important Apakura rangatira lived in or near Rangiaowhia, such as Hoani Pāpita and Hori Te Waru, who both signed the Treaty of Waitangi and were instrumental in agricultural development during the later 1840s and 1850s.<sup>753</sup>

The Crown said that in February 1864 it understood Rangiaowhia to be the 'head quarters' of Ngāti Maniapoto. This assertion was based on the report of the army's Deputy Quartermaster-General Gamble.<sup>754</sup> Yet Gamble also reported that Kihikihi was 'the head-quarters of Rewi, chief of the Ngatimaniapotos', which indicates that British forces regarded the district protected by the Pāterangi fortifications as, in general, a Ngāti Maniapoto stronghold. Resident Magistrate Francis Dart Fenton, who conducted a census of the Waikato in 1858, listed Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Hinetu as the groups then occupying Rangiaowhia, as did Cowan in his history of the war.<sup>755</sup> It is clear that, as Ngāti Apakura said in closing submissions, Rangiaowhia was the main Apakura settlement at the time, although the inhabitants had affiliations to other hapū, including Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Kauwhata, and Ngāti Wehi Wehi.<sup>756</sup> Cameron's guides, Erueti and Gage would have made him aware of the nature of the settlements he was entering, and there is evidence that the actions of the two guides were motivated primarily by a desire to avoid further bloodshed. There is a whānau tradition that Ngātūerua Hemi Erueti<sup>757</sup> tried to warn the inhabitants of Rangiaowhia before the Crown's troops arrived (see section 6.10).<sup>758</sup>

751. Submission 3.4.127, pp 21–22; submission 3.4.300, pp 17–18; submission 3.4.228, pp 43–49.

752. Transcript 4.1.23, pp 900–901.

753. Document A97, pp 49–55, 119; doc A26, pp 46–52.

754. Gamble, journal, February 1864 (submission 3.4.300, p 16).

755. Gamble, journal, 4 March 1864 (doc A22, p 130). Ngāti Hinetu is sometimes described as a hapū of Ngāti Apakura: see, for example, doc A97, pp 57–67.

756. Submission 3.4.228, p 43; submission 3.4.127, p 21.

757. Called Himi Manuao by some: doc K12 (Hopa), p 3; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 162.

758. See especially doc K12 and doc K12(a).

6.7.7.5 Nature of the settlements

From the late 1840s, Rangiaowhia and the surrounding district flourished during what historian Dr Andrew Francis described as the 'heyday of Maori agriculture'.<sup>759</sup> European visitors to the region remarked upon the development of agriculture and trade, which they attributed to the industriousness of the inhabitants, the fertility of the land, and the efforts of missionaries. Governor Grey visited the Waikato and Waipā districts in 1849 and reported on its 'most fertile character', remarking on the extensive cultivations and adding that he had 'never seen a more thriving or contented population in any part of the world'.<sup>760</sup> Auckland's first harbour master, David Rough, visited Rangiaowhia during March and April 1852 and estimated the population at 700, with around 800 acres planted in wheat.<sup>761</sup> The supposed resemblance of Rangiaowhia to the English countryside was a further indicator, for many Pākehā visitors, of economic success. The Government newspaper Te Karere reported:

Neat homesteads dotted here and there with haystacks, ploughs, harrows and other implements of husbandry . . . and scenery enlivened by several flour mills. The natives are extensive cultivators of wheat, which is ground at their mills and sold at Onehunga and Auckland.<sup>762</sup>

Ferdinand Hochstetter, who visited the upper Waikato early in 1859, wrote that 'numerous horses and herds of well-fed cattle bear testimony to the wealthy condition of the natives'.<sup>763</sup> Despite evidence of decline in agricultural production in the later 1850s, the district encompassing Rangiaowhia, Kihikihi, and Te Awamutu remained integral to sustaining the Kīngitanga population and defensive effort after the British invasion in 1863.<sup>764</sup>

6.7.7.6 Why was Rangiaowhia attacked?

Dr O'Malley wrote that, by early February 1864, General Cameron had concluded that the defensive line centered on Pāterangi 'was indeed a formidable defensive line which defied easy capture'. He described Cameron's 'cautious' advance south from Ngāruawāhia as 'perhaps understandable under the circumstances'.<sup>765</sup> The evidence shows, however, that Cameron's strategy was deliberate, had been decided by late January, and was focused on the occupation of Rangiaowhia.

From a hill above his camp at Tuhikaramea, on 14 January, the general and his staff reconnoitred the defensive fortifications that blocked the routes into the agricultural heartland of the Waipā. Deputy Quartermaster-General Gamble

759. Document A26, ch 2.

760. Grey to Earl Grey, 7 March 1849 (doc A26, p 42).

761. Document A26, pp 40–41.

762. 'Rangiaohia', Te Karere Maori, 1 January 1855, p 5 (doc A26, p 44).

763. KR Howe, 'Missionaries, Maoris, and "Civilization" in the Upper-Waikato, 1833–1863' (MA thesis, Auckland, 1970), p 110 (doc A26, p 91).

764. Document A26, ch 3.

765. Document A22, pp 103–104.

subsequently reported: “Piko Piko” and “Pa-te-rangi” were visible from the hill top at about ten miles in a direct line, but little could be ascertained from inspection at such a distance beyond that the positions appeared to be of formidable strength generally.<sup>766</sup>

Pāterangi and Pikopiko joined with Te Ngako and Rangiatea to form a chain of defences covering approximately 10 kilometres (six miles). Dr O’Malley described the works as ‘perhaps the most ambitious chain of Maori fortifications ever established.’<sup>767</sup>

Troops began their march from Tuhikaramea to Te Rore on 28 January 1864. Deputy Quartermaster-General Gamble wrote in his journal that day:

This was in pursuance of the Lieutenant-General’s pre-arranged plan, which was to ‘turn’ the ‘pahs,’ instead of directly attacking them, with which object he determined to move by this flank march on Te Rore, with a view of eventually getting in rear of the whole of the ‘pahs,’ by a track which crosses the Maungapiko towards Rangiahia.<sup>768</sup>

On 2 February, Cameron posted 660 men, under Colonel Waddy, within a mile of the fortified line. This was done, he said, ‘in order to occupy the attention of the natives, and make them believe that I intended to attack them at Paterangi.’<sup>769</sup> Having realised that a direct assault on Pāterangi would only succeed with heavy loss of life, Cameron reported to the War Office from Te Rore on 4 February that he ‘therefore selected the line of the Waipa in the hope of turning [the pā] and compelling the enemy to evacuate them by cutting off his supplies.’<sup>770</sup> He calculated that in doing so he would force an open battle on ‘the enemy’ and succeed in destroying the Kingitanga army.<sup>771</sup>

The operation was delayed due to a crisis of supply. As we noted earlier, the armoured steamer Avon snagged on branches in the Waipā and sank on 8 February. A replacement vessel, the Koheroa, was not able to reach Te Rore until 14 February. Cameron feared having to fall back for want of provisions.<sup>772</sup>

But on 4 March 1864, Cameron was able to report the success of ‘the movement to Rangiahia [sic], which I stated in my last despatch it was my intention to make, with the view of turning the line of intrenched positions constructed with great labour by the natives.’<sup>773</sup>

Von Tempsky later wrote that, in occupying the district: ‘We had . . . our knee upon the stomach of our enemy, by holding the whole breadth of cultivated 766. Gamble, journal, February 1864 (doc A22, pp 101–102).

767. Document A22, p 102.

768. Gamble, journal, February 1864 (doc A22(c), p 15).

769. Cameron to War Office, 4 March 1864 (doc A22(d) (O’Malley document bank), p 5).

770. Cameron to War Office, 4 February 1864 (doc A22(d), p 3).

771. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 162–163.

772. Cameron to War Office, 4 March 1864 (doc A22(d), p 5).

773. Cameron to War Office, 4 March 1864 (doc A22(d), p 5).

country between the Waipa and the Horotiu.<sup>774</sup> The invaders were well aware that the loss of these settlements dealt a severe blow to the Māori communities who relied on them for their livelihood and prosperity. As Gamble wrote: 'The loss to the enemy of two such places, with their extensive cultivation, is and will be yet still more serious as winter advances.'<sup>775</sup>

Living off supplies requisitioned from enemy territory was a standard practice of European warfare. The difficulty of doing so in Waikato was one reason for the elaborate systems of logistical support Cameron established on his progress up the Waikato and Waipā valleys. His staff specifically noted the benefit to the force of the supplies they had captured. But Cameron's explanation was different: by cutting off access to supplies, he hoped to compel the evacuation of Pāterangi. And in this, the general succeeded.

Yet there is clear evidence of unease among some of those who participated in the attack. While Gustavus von Tempsky of the Forest Rangers called the operation 'the grand feature of the war', he went on to write:

The most of us felt dissatisfied with that day's work – yet I for my part could not but see that the result of this move would prove of overwhelming importance to the relative positions of the Maori and his antagonist. The attendant evils of such a coup de main kept rising up in my throat – but they might have been infinitely worse; and the good gained – one gigantic stride towards the pacification of the country, would eventually counterbalance the doubtfulness of the detail of its accomplishment.<sup>776</sup>

It is possible that von Tempsky's dissatisfaction was because he thought that the British had not chosen the most honourable course of action. Success was not achieved in open combat but by a kind of subterfuge.

Māori felt that the British had not abided by the code of honourable conduct that they professed to believe in. The occupation of Rangiaowhia was yet another instance, after the white flag at Rangiriri and the condemnation for allowing women and children to shelter within fighting pā, where Māori attempted in good faith to abide by agreed rules of conduct – what Tamihana called 'te ture o Ingarangi'. This was especially galling when one British justification for the war was the supposed threat to lawfulness and inability to maintain good order posed by the Kingitanga. Much of the rancour and anguish that has lingered in the long aftermath of the invasion is due to a belief that the British did not conduct themselves according to the rules they professed to uphold. These efforts by Kingitanga rangatira to adhere to 'the law of England' are, in themselves, evidence to counter the proposition that the Kingitanga was inimical to British authority.

Rangiaowhia showed that the Crown's conduct of the war was shaped by the doctrine of military necessity: that which needed to be done to secure military 774. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p118 (doc A22, p186; doc A22(a) (O'Malley document bank), vol 2, p1120).

775. Gamble, journal, 4 March 1864 (doc A22, p131).

776. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p111 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p1113).

success, should be done, but no more than that. Defining the point at which necessity became excess was, and is, notoriously difficult. The Waikato invasion was further complicated by the problem of what kind of war, exactly, was being fought. The military subjugation of Waikato Māori was the Crown's first serious assertion of effective sovereignty in the district, and if the war was an attempt at what the Crown now calls working out the details of the Treaty of Waitangi, that suggests to some degree at least a conflict between sovereign entities. Insurgency, insurrection, and rebellion were words used by Crown officials at the time to describe the conflict. Thus civil war is another possibility. Complicating the matter still further, it is unclear to what extent the British believed themselves to be bound by the European conventions of war while they were imposing the authority of their colonial empire on their own 'subjects'.

As von Tempsky acknowledged, the war was won by the British at Rangiaowhia. If his romantic temperament regretted the manner of victory, it might be said that war is only rarely a matter of grand and honourable exploits. What remains to be examined here is 'the doubtfulness of the detail of its accomplishment'. We note the Crown's view that the killing of non-combatants underscores the point that the Waikato war was an injustice, and that the governor at the time told Māori that they would be tried and punished if they killed non-combatants.<sup>777</sup>

6.7.7.7 Was Rangiaowhia a sanctuary?

Claimants said the Kīngitanga leaders 'genuinely believed there had been some kind of undertaking made with respect to Rangiaowhia, and so the honour of the Crown was once more breached'.<sup>778</sup> At Rangiriri, women and children had remained inside the pā when the British attacked, and some became casualties or prisoners of war. Petitioning Parliament in 1865, Tamihana wrote:

ki reira ka tae mai ano te ture o Ingarangi ki te whakahe i au, mo nga wahine, mo nga tamariki ano hoki, i mate tahi me nga tangata ringaringa kaha ki roto i te pa whawhai, heoi ka waiho i roto i toku ngakautaua ako . . . [K]atahi ka wehea e au ko Rangiaohia te kainga mo nga wahine, mo nga tamariki, ka wehea atu etehi tane ki reira hei hari kai mai ki konei ki Waipa nei, ara ki Paterangi.

Then again was I condemned by the laws of England because of the women and children who died with the men of strong hand that fell in the fighting pa. I then left that lesson (learnt there) in my mind . . . I divided off Rangiaohia to be a place of abode for the women and children, and I drafted off some men to carry food to Waipa – that is to say, to Paterangi.<sup>779</sup>

777. Statement 1.3.1, p 48; submission 3.4.300, p 12.

778. Submission 3.4.198, p 21.

779. Document A22, pp 113–114 (Petition of Wi Tamihana Te Waharoa, 24 July 1865, AJHR, 1866, G-2, pp 4, 6).

In the context of Māori warfare as it was traditionally fought, protecting women and children within a defensive pā when a community was attacked was a logical response. As Tamihana explained, non-combatants were sequestered at Rangiaowhia in an effort to adapt to what were understood to be English laws of warfare. Dr O'Malley noted that to the British, the participation of women 'was widely deemed a deplorable aspect of Maori warfare.'<sup>780</sup> Grey wrote privately to Newcastle after Rangiriri that the conflict:

Even their women and young girls now take an active part in it. They advise me that in the action at Rangiriri on the 20th of November they had nine women killed, and many wounded – amongst the latter was a sister of the so called native King, as kind goodtempered a woman as I have ever known, and amongst the former, a girl daughter, of one of the principal chiefs, who was quite remarkable for her good looks, and was I am told in every way was a good and amiable girl. . . . all this is very sad, and is to me more trying than I can well say.<sup>781</sup>

In August 1864, Wiremu Tamihana told James Mackay that General Cameron's disapproval was communicated via 'friendly natives' (that is, those assisting the Crown):

That spot (Rangiaowhia) was selected as the dwelling place for our women and children, in accordance with the words of the General, conveyed to us through the friendly Natives, not to permit our women and children to remain in the fighting pas.<sup>782</sup>

In an 1865 petition to the New Zealand Parliament, Tamihana made the same point:

When the women were killed at the pa at Rangiriri, then, for the first time, the General advised that the women should be sent to live at the places where there was no fighting. Then the pa at Paterangi was set aside as a place for fighting, and Rangiaowhia was left for the women and children.<sup>783</sup>

We know that Wiremu Te Wheoro met with the Kīngitanga rangatira in December 1863, in the wake of Rangiriri, and Wiremu Nera Te Awaitaia met with Tamihana in February 1864, so there were certainly occasions at which the British disapproval could have been conveyed. Both James Belich and Vincent O'Malley

780. Document A22, p 114.

781. Document A22(a) (O'Malley document bank), vol 2, pp 938–939 (Grey to Newcastle, 9 December 1863).

782. Wiremu Tamihana quoted in Mackay to colonial secretary, 10 September 1864 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 395). James Mackay was the civil commissioner at Waihou.

783. Wiremu Tamihana, petition, 5 April 1865 (Stokes, Wiremu Tamihana, p 445).

concluded there was convincing evidence that some kind of message was conveyed from Cameron about the safety of women and children after Rangiriri.<sup>784</sup>

In addition to the reported British disapproval of protecting women and children in 'fighting pa', Māori believed that the general had specifically agreed that Rangiaowhia should be left as the refuge for non-combants. Harold Maniapoto called the attack on Rangiaowhia 'a masterstroke of cowardice and betrayal'. General Cameron knew, he said, that 'the village was defenceless and occupied by nothing more than defenceless mothers, innocent children, and useless old men, left there by his own insistence after Rangiriri, as a sanctuary for noncombatants'.<sup>785</sup>

The role in the events at Rangiaowhia played by the Anglican Bishop of New Zealand, George Augustus Selwyn, has been the subject of contention over the years. In 1865, Tamihana wrote that despite agreeing to the British request to keep women away from the fighting, Ka oti tenei te whakarite e matou, katahi ka hapainga te Ope a Pihopa Herewini raua ko Te Tianara ki te whawhai ki te tamaiti ki te wahine.

As soon as we had arranged this, Bishop Selwyn's and the General's troop set out to fight the women and children.<sup>786</sup>

Ngāti Maniapoto veteran Te Wairoa Piripi later told James Cowan:

After we had all left Ngaruawahia and assembled in our pa at Paterangi, a letter was sent to us by Bishop Selwyn and General Cameron, saying that it had been agreed by the missionaries and the Catholic Catechists that the women and children should retire to Rangiaowhia. The messenger who brought this letter was Wiremu Patena and he returned to Ngaruawahia. The soldiers came and they fought with us outside our pa but could not capture the fort. Then Bishop Selwyn left Paterangi and went with the army of soldiers to attack the women and children at Te Awamutu and Rangiaowhia.<sup>787</sup>

Raureti Te Huia's account to Cowan was similar: 'When the tribes stayed at Paterangi the soldiers arrived at Ngaruawahia. From there it was given to Wiremu Patena to take the message of the General and the Bishop. "Return the women and children and leave only those who wield weapons."<sup>788</sup>

Cowan dismissed these accounts as 'a purely Maori view, coloured by the mistaken idea that the Bishop was assisting the troops against the natives,'<sup>789</sup> but in doing so acknowledged the belief that Rangiaowhia was set aside as a place of safety.

784. Document A22, p 119; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 164.

785. Document K35, p 26.

786. Wiremu Tamihana, petition, 5 April 1865 (doc A22, p 115). Tribunal translation.

787. James Cowan, 'Rangiaowhia and Hairini Notes' (doc A22, p 116).

788. Raureti Te Huia, 'Te Pakanga ki Waikato' (doc A22, p 117).

789. Document A22, p 116 n

Pei Te Hurinui Jones set out the Kingitanga view of Selwyn's involvement, at a hui in 1962. This was that Selwyn's 'advice and knowledge of the country led to the killing of old men, women and children' at Rangiaowhia.<sup>790</sup> According to Selwyn's biographer, he conducted a burial service at Pāterangi on 12 February, for those slain at Waiari. It was there that he was told of the situation at Rangiaowhia, and he was expected to 'confer with General Cameron and make sure that the people there were left unmolested'.<sup>791</sup>

On 21 February, Selwyn accompanied the troops to Te Awamutu. According to Hohaia Ngahiwi, who worked as a teacher at the mission station there: 'The Bishop saved us. If it had not been for him we would have been killed. . . . The Bishop stayed with us at Te Awamutu, and he told us that he had not heard the soldiers were to go on to Rangiaowhia.' Selwyn then continued to Rangiaowhia, but according to Hohaia 'upon arrival all was over and the building had already been burnt together with the people inside. So he returned, and was heavy of heart'.<sup>792</sup>

The bishop acknowledged the damage his presence in the Waikato war caused. On Boxing Day 1865, he wrote from New Plymouth: 'The part which I took in the Waikato campaign has destroyed my influence with many. You will ask, then, "Did I not foresee this?" and if so, "Why did I go?"' His answer was that there was no military chaplain attached to the 10,000-strong British army. He felt it his duty to minister to the wounded and dying, both British and Māori. Further, Māori clergy had refused to leave the mission stations at Taupiri and Te Awamutu:

It was my duty to see they were not injured when our troops advanced, and this made it necessary for me to be in the front, and thereby to expose myself to the imputation of having led the troops. This has thrown me back in native estimation, more, I fear, than my remaining years of life will enable me to recover . . .<sup>793</sup>

Counsel for Ngāti Paretekawa (Wai 440) provided a variant on this theme by arguing that Christianity 'softened up' Māori to the idea of being bound by a higher power, and 'the Crown sought to entrench itself as that higher power'. Once this was achieved, 'the missionaries were used by the Crown as agents acting against Maori'.<sup>794</sup> As Selwyn himself seems to have acknowledged this may not have been deliberate policy, but it was one of the unavoidable impacts of war.

The exact nature of communication and agreement between the parties over a sanctuary remains unclear. Certainly, the British were concerned about the issue of non-combatants, and this fact adds weight to accounts that say the matter was discussed. Whether Rangiaowhia was mentioned specifically is less certain, but it is

---

790. Pei Te Hurinui Jones quoted in Church and People, June 1962 (JH Evans, Churchman Militant: George Augustus Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand and Lichfield (Wellington: A W & A W Reed, 1964), p93).

791. Evans, Churchman Militant, p 93.

792. Hohaia Ngahiwi to Maunsell, 5 May 1868 (Evans, Churchman Militant, p 263); see also doc A22, p 117.

793. Selwyn to Coleridge, 26 December 1865 (Evans, Churchman Militant, p 96).

794. Submission 3.4.198, p 19.

very likely Selwyn was told that non-combatants were sheltering at Rangiaowhia, when he went to Pāterangi on 12 February. Belich argued that the strategic and economic value of Rangiaowhia meant General Cameron was unlikely to promise not to attack it. He suggested that the general asked that non-combatants be kept away, ‘without specifying any sacrosanct ground’.<sup>795</sup> Dr O’Malley went further and raised the possibility that the British deliberately misled Māori to make it easier for the British to attack the settlement: suggesting Rangiaowhia as a safe haven in order to lull Te Rohe Pōtae Māori into a false sense of security.<sup>796</sup>

As Dr O’Malley admitted, there is no evidence for this assertion, and it should be discounted. More pertinent to the discussion is the fact that Cameron’s entire strategy had been decided a month earlier and was now at a final, crucial stage. He would not have told Selwyn his plan; there was scant chance he would alter it upon learning that Rangiaowhia was a designated refuge.

The long-planned British advance into Ngāti Maniapoto territory involved circumventing the opposing forces and occupying what was well known to be a rich agricultural district vital to the economic and military survival of the Kīngitanga. For this reason, and because the British themselves had raised the matter of the safety of non-combatants, there was a particular obligation on the general to ensure either that areas sheltering non-combatants were avoided, or, if it were not possible, that the safety of non-combatants was made pre-eminent during an occupation.

In principle, seizing an enemy’s supplies or supply lines is an acceptable war-time tactic. The British did still, as Tamihana noted, criticise Kīngitanga fighters for attacks on supply lines.

I mua ake o tenei takiwa, ka nui to matou hiahia kia mahuetia nga ritenga a o matou tupuna, te konihi, me to urumaranga, me era atu ritenga e mate ai te hoa riri. Kei ki koutou kaore e mana i a matou nga kupu whakamohio, kao, e mana ana ano.

Before this time our desire was great to put away the customs of our fore-fathers – ambuscades and skirmishing, and other modes of warfare by which the enemy could be destroyed. Do not say that the words of advice are thrown away upon us. No! the words of advice are regarded by us[.]<sup>797</sup>

There is a sense in which the European reproof of Māori for seeking to protect non-combatants within pā was unrealistic, and it was certainly not followed up by any concrete actions to provide for non-combatants of which we are aware. There is no evidence that battle-hardened officers of the British army – specifically General Duncan Cameron – really sought a solution to the problem of Māori non-combatants. We agree with Belich that Cameron was unlikely to commit himself not to attack ‘so important an economic target [Rangiaowhia], the very hub of the

---

795. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 164–165.

796. Document A22, pp 119–121.

797. Wiremu Tamihana, petition, 5 April 1865 (doc A22, pp 115–116).

Kingite supply system.<sup>798</sup> But it is also clear that he and his officers took no precautions when launching a surprise evening attack on an unfortified kāinga, and made no provision for the protection of non-combatants. We discuss this further in the next section.

6.7.7.8 Military conduct (egregious Crown actions)

Claimant counsel submitted:

The deaths which followed, including those of a number of occupants of a pā torched by the British, were consequently remembered with great bitterness and remain as an eyesore to be remedied.<sup>799</sup>

Claimants and technical witnesses identified the actions of Crown troops in the attack on Rangiaowhia as among of the most egregious of the Waikato war. Counsel for Ngāti Apakura said: ‘Rangiaowhia was not a war, it was a tragedy’. British troops were accused of: attacking an undefended and unfortified village; deliberately burning a whare with people inside; lacking discipline and leadership; indiscriminate and deliberate killing of non-combatants (women, children, and the elderly); and destruction of property. Despite evidence that officers witnessed and abhorred some of these acts, no investigation took place and no disciplinary action was taken.<sup>800</sup>

6.7.7.8.1 ATTACK ON AN UNDEFENDED AND UNFORTIFIED VILLAGE

All agree that Rangiaowhia was not fortified. Nor was it defended, as descriptions of the inhabitants’ surprise at the cavalry attack make clear. But, as events proved, the inhabitants were not unarmed.<sup>801</sup> Although not an eye witness, von Tempsky wrote that ‘the peace of the morning [was] shattered by the crack of carbines as Nixon’s cavalry galloped into the village’ and men, women, and children ‘ran to escape the galloping horsemen.’<sup>802</sup> Recording his actual experience, von Tempsky wrote: ‘The rapid crack-crack of revolvers and carbines announced to us now that the troopers had not forgotten their spurs in getting ahead of us. We listened eagerly for the sound of double-barrelled guns – and that sound also was soon heard.’<sup>803</sup>

The latter was the sound of Māori returning fire. While the British intent may have been to disperse the inhabitants, there is no evidence the inhabitants themselves knew this. In the circumstances, and with the example of the Crown’s actions at Rangiriri in mind, armed defence was as reasonable an option as flight.

---

798. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 164.

799. Submission 3.4.198, p 20.

800. Submission 3.4.228, p 43.

801. Submission 3.4.300, pp 16–17.

802. Von Tempsky quoted in Chris Pugsley, ‘Walking the Waikato Wars: Farce and Tragedy at Rangiaowhia’, New Zealand Defence Quarterly, no 17 (Winter 1997), p 33 (doc A22, p 121).

803. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p 104 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p 1106).

It is not clear why General Cameron decided to send mounted troops into Rangiaowhia in advance of his main force. Cavalry were used primarily as scouts and as 'shock troops'; it seems likely the intent was to intimidate and disperse the inhabitants. Cameron reported that 'the cavalry were rapidly thrown forward, and surprised the inhabitants, who were few in number.'<sup>804</sup> Further evidence that he intended to frighten the inhabitants into fleeing comes from von Tempsky's account of the advance on the Catholic church, when Captain Greaves warned: "The General does not want you to press the Maoris any further." "Not take them prisoner, even?" "No."<sup>805</sup>

Had Cameron expected to encounter determined resistance, it is doubtful he would have sent 'the young troopers of the Colonial Defence Force cavalry' in an initial assault on Rangiaowhia. This suggests that the mounted troops were not prepared to face those who did not choose escape or surrender.

6.7.7.8.2 DELIBERATE BURNING OF A WHARE

A Colonial Defence Force veteran recalled events in 1882, writing that the initial cavalry attack 'did not take long to clear the enemy out' and they then returned through the settlement 'taking prisoners as we came along.' Six men and a boy had been seen entering a large whare. Several claimants stated this was a whare karakia.<sup>806</sup> Accounts vary as to what happened next. The Colonial Defence Force veteran wrote that Corporal McHale was shot dead when he entered the whare to demand the occupants' surrender. 'The firing soon brought together the whole of the cavalry; and, after a while, the 65th and Forest Rangers, also the General and staff, came up.'<sup>807</sup> Von Tempsky wrote that 'a motley circle of soldiers of all regiments' had surrounded the whare when he arrived at the scene.<sup>808</sup>

Cowan wrote that the whare had raupo walls, citing an 'old Forest Ranger' who said: 'We put the muzzles of our carbines close to the raupo walls and fired through the thatch.'<sup>809</sup> But witnesses are clear that it had walls of sawn timber slabs, with a thatched roof.<sup>810</sup>

Controversy lies in whether the whare was deliberately torched or caught fire accidentally. Writing in the 1920s, James Cowan concluded that because each side was shooting through the inflammable walls, they inevitably caught alight.<sup>811</sup> But this conclusion is based on the erroneous assumption that the walls were thatched. The Crown argued that the cause of the fire is not known for certain, that reports

804. Cameron to War Office, 4 March 1864 (doc A22(d), p 6).

805. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, pp105, 107 (doc A22(a), vol 2, pp 1107, 1109).

806. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 270, 1512; doc A97, p 233.

807. 'The Fight at Rangiaowhia', Marlborough Express, 11 March 1882, p 2.

808. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p 107 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p 1109)

809. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 355.

810. See von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p107 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p1109): 'it was built of heavy plank, instead of the usual material employed in Maori whares'; and 'The Fight at Rangiaowhia' (Marlborough Express, 11 March 1882): 'we commenced to riddle the house, which was built of slabs'.

811. Document A22, pp122-123.

of deliberate burning were made long afterward, and that the 'very earliest account by an eyewitness states that he could not determine whether the fire was set deliberately or was an accident.'<sup>812</sup> This account is that of the Daily Southern Cross correspondent: it is not clear that it is an eye-witness account or merely recording the descriptions given by others: 'The whare became ignited, either accidentally or intentionally.'<sup>813</sup>

According to von Tempsky, 'neighbouring whares had been set fire to, with the view of communicating the fire to the all-dreaded one.'<sup>814</sup> Another Forest Ranger, William Race, wrote: 'who it was suggested it, I don't know but it was, to burn them out, or in – no sooner than it was agreed upon, the redoubtable black sailor was to the fore, and raupo roofs in hot weather did not take long to set on fire.'<sup>815</sup>

Most compelling, however, is the record of General Cameron himself, who wrote, plainly: 'the Forest Rangers and a company of the 65th Regiment surrounded the whare, which was set on fire.'<sup>816</sup>

Dr O'Malley argued: 'there seems no real reason why those who claimed to have been aware of a deliberate plan to torch the occupants out of their whare should have made up such a story.' The Crown responded that 'his logic is not particularly convincing.'<sup>817</sup>

While much of what occurred at Rangiaowhia must remain unknown, in this case the evidence points to whare being deliberately set alight by British troops, in at least one instance in full knowledge that several people were inside it.

6.7.7.8.3 LACK OF LEADERSHIP

Dr O'Malley suggested that the deaths inside the burning whare were a direct result of the 'breach of military discipline (and arguably of the rules of war at the time) on the part of the British troops.'<sup>818</sup> Māori inside the whare killed no fewer than five soldiers, including Colonel Nixon, leader of the Colonial Defence Force, who died subsequently from his wounds. There are two charges of ill-discipline: setting fire to the whare, and shooting dead an elderly unarmed man as he emerged from the burning building trying to surrender. Von Tempsky wrote that the officers shouted 'Spare him!' But, 'some ruffians – and some man, blinded by rage, at the loss of comrades perhaps – fired at the Maori!'<sup>819</sup> According to Cowan: 'The truth was that the troops clustered promiscuously about the burning houses were not under the immediate control of their officers at the moment of the Maori's surrender.'<sup>820</sup>

812. Submission 3.4.300, p17 n

813. 'March on Rangiwahia by the General', Daily Southern Cross, 25 February 1864.

814. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p108 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p1110; doc A22, p123).

815. William Race, 'Under the Flag: Reminiscences of the Maori Land (Waikato) War, by a Forest Ranger', 1863, p128 (doc A22(a) vol 2, p1146).

816. Document A22, pp108–109 (Cameron to Grey, 25 February 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-3, p29).

817. Document A22, pp123–124; submission 3.4.300, p17 n

818. Document A22, p126.

819. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p109 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p1111).

820. Document A22, p126 (Cowan, New Zealand Wars, vol 1, pp355–356).

William Race remembered: ‘evidently his purpose was to make terms for he commenced speaking and gesticulating very loudly above the din around, but poor fellow twas a short lived speech for in less than two minutes he was riddled so to speak, with bullets.’<sup>821</sup> Race went on to describe how Lieutenant St Hill, an aide de camp to the general, rebuked one of the Forest Rangers who he saw shooting the elderly man:

... for answer the Ranger pulled up his sleeve & showed the officer a nasty jagged flesh wound in the arm received a few minutes before from one of the amazons before captured. Tit for tat said Von’s man, the woman tried to kill me, and I tried to kill him that’s all, The Lieut. rode away muttering about having him punished & there it ended.<sup>822</sup>

The Crown submitted that it was possible those inside the whare kept firing as the elderly man made his way out, citing Race’s comment that he had to speak loudly ‘above the din around’: This, the Crown submitted, ‘can only refer to the din of gunfire, and it seems unlikely that the officers would have allowed soldiers to continue shooting in the absence of return fire.’<sup>823</sup> This proposition is implausible for three reasons: no accounts mention continued fire from within the whare at this point; the din was more likely the sound of a burning building and the shouts of those within and without; and it would have been very difficult to maintain fire from inside the whare when what Race called ‘a very big man’ stood at the entrance trying to surrender alongside several dead bodies.

The deliberate firing of the whare (particularly when it was known there was at least one child inside) and the shooting of a man attempting to surrender were breaches of discipline. Dr O’Malley is correct that the deaths of those inside were the result of that ill-discipline. It would have seemed clear that death awaited them, whichever course of action they chose.

There is evidence that senior officers were present while these events took place, including Gustavus von Tempsky, Colonel Nixon, and Lieutenant St Hill. One account places General Cameron himself at the scene.<sup>824</sup> No evidence was presented to the Tribunal of any subsequent official attempt to inquire into the burning of the whare, the shooting of the unarmed man, or the deaths of those burned alive in the whare.

6.7.7.8.4 ATTACKS ON WOMEN, CHILDREN, AND THE ELDERLY

Official accounts list neither the age nor gender of the casualties, although there is acknowledgement that women and children were among those taken prisoner.

821. William Race, ‘Under the Flag: Reminiscences of the Maori Land (Waikato) War, by a Forest Ranger’, 1863, pp 129–130 (doc A22(a), vol 2, pp 1147–1148; doc A22, p 124).

822. Race, ‘Under the Flag’, p 131 (doc A22(a), vol 2, p 1149; doc A22, p 124).

823. Submission 3.4.300, p 17 n

824. Marlborough Express, 11 March 1882.

Nevertheless, there is a longstanding and deeply held conviction, emphasised to the Tribunal during hearings, that women and children were killed at Rangiaowhia. Tom Roa told the Tribunal:

Me whakaatu atu e ahau tēnei wā, te kōrero mai a taku whaea nō te Hāhi katorika, ko te nuinga o ngā tāngata i reira, he wāhine, kaumātua, koroheke, tamariki, e ai ki ngā kōrero ka rere ētehi ki roto i te whare katorika nei, e ai ki taku whaea, ko tētehi tamaiti e waru noa pea ngā tau kua puta mai i te whare, i te tāhunga e te Pākehā, ko tāna kōrero, ka pūhia te mokopuna nei e te pū Pākehā.

My mum said to me about the Catholic church: 'Most of the people there were women, elders, old men, children,' according to the traditions many fled into the Catholic church. According to my mum, one of the children was about eight years old and came out of the house as it was being burnt by the Pākehā and she said the child was shot by the Pākehā.<sup>825</sup>

Hazel Coromandel-Wander described what happened to her kuia Wikitoria at Rangiaowhia:

My kōrero about my great grandmother who was at Rangiaowhia and that was handed down to my mother in 1930 when she went to stay with our kuia at Puketarata. . . . Wikitoria was only a young girl at that time. . . . Wikitoria who was a child . . . when she woke up in the morning she was told to go down and have a wash, her and her friends . . . while they were down there having a wash, kua tae mai a Cameron. . . . Wikitoria . . . was down in the raupō, they went to hide in the raupo. . . . They hid there until it was night because they were only young then. They heard the gunfire. They heard the tangi's. They smelt the smoke. . . . And that's what they did, they hid in the day and they travelled in the night.<sup>826</sup>

Wikitoria's name was changed to Te Mamae as a reminder of what she experienced and witnessed that day, and she later named one of her sons Te Wera in acknowledgement of the whare that were burned. Similarly, an uncle of Ms Wander was named Rātapu, because the specific event happened on a Sunday.<sup>827</sup>

Gordon Lennox talked about Rihi Te Rauparaha, his great-grandmother, who also witnessed the attack as a young girl:

My Great grandmother Rihi was a child of 10 years and living at Rangiaowhia when Cameron and his troops attacked and murdered her relatives. When the shooting started she and others in the whanau ran and hid in the raupo to escape. From there she witnessed members of her whanau get shot, stabbed and burnt to death. One of the children that was burnt to death in the church was Wiremu the son of Pukewhau Penetana my Great great Grandfather. Rihi told her whanau that she had never been 825. Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae (transcript 4.1.6, pp 245–246).

826. Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae (transcript 4.1.1, pp 27–28).

827. Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae (transcript 4.1.1, p 29).

so terrified her life and that she would never forgive the pakeha for what they did. Her whanau were torn apart in the aftermath and scattered all over.<sup>828</sup>

The Crown noted these allegations, but said ‘there is no contemporary evidence to support such claims.’<sup>829</sup> As noted earlier, the Crown accepted that this was incorrect when questioned about it at hearing.<sup>830</sup>

Counsel for Ngāti Apakura quoted a New Zealand Herald report from 26 February 1864:

The Maoris were driven into their whare and shot down promiscuously. Many unfortunately being men that soldiers would never shoot if they could avoid it, and some women too it is feared were mingled with the crowd.<sup>831</sup>

The important word is ‘promiscuously’: done with no regard for method or order, random, indiscriminate, unsystematic. The Herald was no friend to Māori or the Kingitanga,<sup>832</sup> yet it reported, in effect, that women were likely to have been shot. Other evidence shows that the British found it hard at times to distinguish between men and women. Von Tempsky recorded shots being fired from a house, which he surrounded, when a ‘fairy burst from its door, and, running with the fleetness of a deer, dropped her gun just in time to have her sex recognised and respected.’<sup>833</sup>

An important point needs to be stated. Whatever the nature of Māori expectations regarding Rangiaowhia as a refuge, and it is clear they were genuinely held, not all the inhabitants were unarmed. When attacked by the British, some at least were able to return fire, and those who did included women and the elderly. Claims that soldiers fired on St Paul’s church, perforating the walls, should be read in light of other evidence that some of those inside were shooting at the soldiers. While that posed a moral dilemma for some, if not all, soldiers, the act of returning fire should be viewed in a different light to the act of shooting the unarmed, the capitulating, or the young.

Two accounts exist written by survivors who were children at the time. The first was recorded by Pōtatau, who was a child at the time:

Oma tonu atu ahau ki te whare o taku papa, kihai ahau i roa ki reira ka tae mai ko taku tupuna ko Hoani tona ingoa, he mohio nona kei reira matou i haere mai ai ia kia mate tahi ai matou, i reira ano hoki a Ihaia Rawiri me tona tama. No tenei wa ka puta mau ko taku whaea ki waho ka noho ki te whatitoka o te whare. Ka rongō

828. Document G29 (Lennox), p [1].

829. Submission 3.4.300, p18.

830. Transcript 4.1.23, pp 900–901.

831. Submission 3.4.228, p 47 (New Zealand Herald, 26 February 1864).

832. Dr O’Malley commented that it was seen by its critics as virtually an organ of the Government: doc A22, p 69.

833. Document A22(a), vol 2, p 1108 (Von Tempsky, ‘Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign’, p106).

atu ahau i taku papa e ki atu ana ki taku tupuna me waiho a tatou pu me puta marie tatou ki waho. Ki ana mai taku tupuna kei te nui ake koia au i o matua i riro herehere nei i Rangiriri? Ki ake ano taku papa, me haere marie tatou i runga i te ture, oti kihai taku tupuna i whakaae. I tenei wa ka tae mai nga hoia ka patai reo Maori mai ki taku whaea. 'Kahore he Maori i roto i te whare,' ki atu ana taku whaea 'kahore.' Ki tonu ake toku papa, ae, he Maori kei konei, katahi ka peke mai taua Pakeha reo Maori ki te whatitoka o te whare, hopukia ana taku papa, tukua atu ana ki nga hoia. Ka tomo atu taua Pakeha ki te whare, na taku tupuna tonu ia i pupuhi, mate rawa, katahi ka kumea te tupapaku e etahi o ratou ki roto ki te whare.<sup>834</sup>

I at once ran to my father's house. I had not been long there when my grandfather came to the same house. His name was Hoani. It was because he knew we were there that he came, so that he might die with us – Ihaia, Rawiri, and his son. At this time myself and my mother went outside the house, and sat at the door of the house. I heard my father say to my grandfather: 'Let us lay down our guns and give ourselves up as prisoners.' My grandfather said: 'Am I greater than your uncles who were taken at Rangiriri?' My father again said to my grandfather: 'Let us go in peace, and according to law.' My grandfather would not agree. At this time the soldiers came to us, and asked my mother in Maori: 'Are there any Maoris in the house?' She replied: 'No, there are no Maoris in the house.' My father at once said: 'Yes, there are Maoris here.' The European who spoke Maori came to the door of the house, and caught hold of my father, and handed him over to the soldiers. The European went inside of the house. My grandfather shot him and killed him. Some of the others dragged the body in the house.<sup>835</sup>

Pōtatau said his grandfather was called Hoani. 'It was because he knew we were there that he came, so that he might die with us – Ihaia, Rawiri, and his son.'<sup>836</sup> This account was published in Thomas Gudgeon's Defenders of New Zealand in 1887.

The second description was by Rihī Te Rauparaha, probably written around the time of the Sim commission hearings in 1927, and provided for us by her descendants (the translation was supplied by the claimants):

i te po o te rahoroi ka rahina te hoia e Himi Manuao ko Himi Erueti te ingoa Pakeha no Ngati Rahui no Ngati Puhiaawe tenei awhekaihi he hapu ano no Ngati Apakura nana i arataki te hoia i [tikina] i te taone o Pirongia Ngahinapouri titiwha ka tae ki Te Awamutu arahina tonutia i taua po ka tae ki Rangiaowhia i taua po ka patua nga Maori ka hoaritia nga wahine i te po tae noa ki te maramatanga o te ata ka whawhai nga Maori i roto i te whare ki nga Pakeha ka tui aua Maori te kanara ka tahi katahuna te whare o aua Maori ka werae tehi ki rota i aua whare e rima i pau i te ahi ko Hoani Ngarongo na Hoani i pupuhi te canara Ko Ihaia tetehi Ko Rawiri tetehi Ko Wiremu

834. Document A102 (Meredith, Nankivell, and Joseph), p100 (doc A110, p548). A source for the Māori text is not given. Minor editorial changes by the Tribunal.

835. T.W. Gudgeon, The Defenders of New Zealand being a Short Biography of Colonists who Distinguished Themselves in Upholding Her Majesty's Supremacy in These Islands (Auckland: H. Brett, 1887), p178 (doc A110, p549).

836. Gudgeon, The Defenders of New Zealand, pp178–179 (doc A110, p549).

Toetoe te tamaiti Ko Roka te wahine hui katoa toko 5 nga Maori i tahuna oratia ki te ahi heoi.

on the Saturday night they were guided by Himi Manuao Erueti, the Pakeha name, of Ngati Rahui of Ngati Puhiaawe was this halfcaste. A hapu of Ngati Apakura. It was he who guided the troops through the town of Pirongia via Ngahinapouri titiwha. Arrived in Te Awamutu he guided them on that night to Rangiaowhia. On that night they (the soldiers) killed Maori. They (the soldiers) raped the women all that night until daylight. Maori fought from the house against the Pakeha colonel. Then it was set alight the house of these Maori. They were burnt in that house. Five people Hoani Ngarongo. It was Hoani who shot the colonel. There was Ihaia, Rawiri, Wiremu Toetoe the boy. Roka was the woman. Five Maori in all who were burnt alive in the fire. Stop.<sup>837</sup>

These accounts seem to be discussing the same event; both agree that Hoani, Ihaia, Rawiri, and a boy, Wiremu Toetoe, died inside the whare. Rihi added a fifth name: a woman named Roka. Gordon Lennox, great grandson of Rihi, said Wiremu was Rihi's brother and the son of Pukewhau Penetana (Mr Lennox's great great grandfather).<sup>838</sup> Hoani and Ihaia, according to Hitiri Te Paerata, were at Rangiaowhia because it was their role to take food to Pāterangi.<sup>839</sup>

Rihi Te Rauparaha's account also states that women were raped by soldiers at Rangiaowhia. There is no official record of sexual assaults by soldiers on Māori women. Nor is there substantial tangata whenua evidence accusing Crown forces of rape. However Shane Te Ruki described Mate Wahine, a cleansing puna on Kakepuku maunga used by women. He stated it was used in the aftermath of the war:

Why? Because they had been i tūkinohia te Pākehā ngā hōia Pākehā me ngā tamariki. Ka haere i reira ki te whakaora i o rātou mate. Ko te mate whaiwhai tētahi o ngā mate (They had been assuolated by the soldiers. The women and children would go there to cleanse the sexual diseases and other such ailments afflicted.) . . . many a disease was unfortunately spread by the incidences of rape and abuse that happened to women and children north of our district, and many of them came to Mate Wahine, ko te wahine te whakaora i o rātou tina, te whakamahu. Hēoi ana tērā, tērā, and I know that a kuia tūpuna of Ngāti Apakura came to that place after that war – after that slaughter.<sup>840</sup>

It is very likely that if women endured sexual attacks they would have felt reluctant to talk about their experiences. Rihi Te Rauparaha did make the accusation, but it remained hidden until presented to this Tribunal. At the time of the Sim

837. Document p1(a), pp 49–51. Two versions were submitted in evidence, but they are similar. Minor corrections to capitalisation, etc, by the Tribunal.

838. Document G29, p [1]; doc K22, p 28.

839. Document A22, pp 143–144.

840. Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae (transcript 4.1.1, pp 71–72).

commission, she wrote to Maui Pōmare about the events at Rangiaowhia but then attempted to recall her letters. She told Pōmare that her whānau were ‘persecuted’ for speaking out about the Māori who were ‘shot at and were burnt with fire at Rangiaowhia.’<sup>841</sup>

We accept the claimants’ translation. While Māori were killed during the night, women are then mentioned specifically: ‘ka hoaritia ngā wāhine i te pō tae noa ki te maramatanga o te ata’. Literally, the women were put to the sword throughout the night.

6.7.7.8.5 DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY

Cowan said that 12 buildings were burned by troops at Rangiaowhia.<sup>842</sup> The claimants said crops were burned, although the Crown pointed out drawings of the settlement made after the army’s occupation that appear to show wheat fields. But for the British no less than Māori, the wealth of Rangiaowhia lay in its potential to feed an army. One newspaper report described troops returning to Rangiaowhia several days later to loot ‘pigs, poultry, rabbits, and esculent vegetables, spears, mats, long and short-handled tomahawks, greenstones, guns, cartouche boxes, cooking utensils, clothing, &c, – scarcely a soldier returning without some trophy of victory.’<sup>843</sup>

All this is to overlook the main material loss suffered, namely the expulsion and exile of those who lived there. Tame Tūwhangai said his ancestors were not even permitted access to their personal belongings after the occupation. This suggests they began the long journey across the mountains to Taupō with little more than the clothes on their backs.<sup>844</sup> Loss, not destruction, of property is the real issue. That loss encompassed an entire material culture, and 20 years of agricultural development.

6.7.7.9 Māori response to Rangiaowhia

The attack and occupation of Rangiaowhia was a significant turning point for Māori in their attitude and response to the Crown. Wiremu Tamihana of Ngāti Hauā later recalled: ‘My hand did not strike the Pakeha during the war until the battle at Hairini; then for the first time my hand struck, my anger being great about my dead, murdered and burnt with fire, at Rangiaohia.’<sup>845</sup> Nigel Te Hiko told the Tribunal how the events at Rangiaowhia brought Raukawa into the war: ‘According to Hitiri Te Paerata, the horror at Rangiaowhia prompted his father to lead the iwi of Raukawa into the Waikato war.’<sup>846</sup>

As discussed earlier, the place of non-combatants in warfare had been a matter of contention since at least 1860. The Crown accused Ngāti Ruanui of murder for killing settlers at the outset of the Taranaki war in 1860. Māori and Pākehā 841. Rihī Te Rauparaha to Maui Pōmare, 26 April 1927 (doc P1(a), pp 63–64.

842. Document A110, p 547.

843. Document A22, p 109 (Daily Southern Cross, 25 February 1864).

844. Document A97, p 243.

845. J Mackay to Colonial Secretary, 10 September 1864 (doc A97, p 201).

846. Document K24 (Te Hiko), p 5.

understood different rules of warfare. Throughout the Waikato conflict, up until Rangiaowhia, there is evidence that Māori attempted to adapt their mode of war to meet what they understood were British expectations. Thus, after Rangiriri, non-combatants were moved out of fighting pā. The most conscientious in attempting to conform to Pākehā law was Tamihana, as we described earlier (section 6.7.7.7). For him the sense of betrayal was very great: ‘it was the affair at Rangiaohia that hardened the hearts of the people. The reason was the many instances of murder.’<sup>847</sup>

The Crown’s actions at Rangiaowhia led to deaths, injuries, and imprisonments of combatants and non-combatants, together with material devastation and expulsion. These were not unfamiliar consequences of war. What was different was that these acts occurred at a place the occupants thought would not be attacked. The belief that General Cameron violated this understanding underlies the serious erosion of trust that followed, trust not only in the Crown but also the church and the law.

Trust underpins the Treaty relationship. The claimants’ evidence on Rangiaowhia is also evidence that the destruction of trust and the bitterness it engendered has lasted now for a century and a half.

A more immediate effect, however, was that Māori once again altered their strategy for protecting non-combatants. Dr O’Malley thought it significant that at Ōrākau the practice of bringing families within fortifications was resumed: ‘Maori male fighters no longer trusted the British, it would seem, not to attack and kill their women and children.’<sup>848</sup>

6.7.8 Hairini

6.7.8.1 What happened?

From the strategic perspective of the British, the attack on Rangiaowhia had the desired effect. The next day, 22 February 1864, reports indicated Māori were leaving Pāterangi for Kihikihiki and Rangiaowhia. Later that morning British troops marched to Pāterangi and occupied the formidable pā. After hearing reports that Māori were entrenching an old pā at Hairini, Cameron ordered his troops to attack before a defensive position could be established. As the general reported:

The natives fell hurriedly back before the leading files of the 50th could reach them with the bayonet, and retired through a swamp in the direction of the Mangatautari [sic] road. The cavalry had an opportunity of charging them as they retreated, and did some execution. They made no further stand, but fled precipitately towards Mangatautari, leaving almost everything but their arms behind them.<sup>849</sup>

The Māori defenders occupied Hairini to give their people time to evacuate Pāterangi and the Rangiaowhia district. Wiremu Tamihana and Ngāti Hauā

---

847. Wiremu Tamihana, petition, 5 April 1865 (doc A22, p 115).

848. Document A22, p 153.

849. Document A22, p 110 (Cameron to Grey, 25 February 1864).

retreated to Maungatautari while Rewi Maniapoto and his people crossed the Pūniu River.<sup>850</sup>

6.7.8.2 Casualties

Two British soldiers were killed in the attack and 15 were injured. Once again it is impossible to conclusively determine the number of Māori casualties. On the basis of a ‘close reading’ of Wiremu Tamihana’s record, Belich and O’Malley said Tamihana accounted for nine Māori dead: Te Rangikaiwhirea, son of Pakira, Amitai, two from Raukawa, two from Te Urewera, Taikatu of Rangiwewehi, Keto Ki Waho of Te Aua tribe, and Paora Pipi of Ngatitahinga. The Daily Southern Cross reporter estimated 29 Māori dead. O’Malley located another source, an imperial soldier, who guessed as many as 80. General Cameron thought ‘at least 30’ a better estimate.<sup>851</sup> His deputy quartermaster-general wrote: ‘For two or three days after the engagement dead bodies and wounded men were discovered hid in the thick fern and swamps.’<sup>852</sup> O’Malley pointed out that if the British estimates are seen as more accurate, then ‘more Maori appear to have been killed at Hairini than Rangiaowhia, even though it is the latter which has dominated the historical record.’<sup>853</sup>

6.7.8.3 Issues about Hairini

First and foremost the claimants were devastated by the loss of life at Hairini. They repeated the argument that these deaths – along with all the others since December 1863 – had been avoidable if only the Crown had agreed to their entreaties to make peace. There was thus no military justification for Hairini since the war could have been ended much earlier.<sup>854</sup> The claimants alleged that the Crown’s forces also committed atrocities at Hairini by the killing of women and children who were not involved in the fighting.<sup>855</sup>

As far as we are aware, the only woman identified as having been killed at Hairini was Kereopa Te Rau’s sister.<sup>856</sup> One of the notable features of the Hairini battle was the presence of members of a number of iwi from other parts of the North Island who had come to help defend their Kīngitanga whanaunga.<sup>857</sup> One of these was Kereopa Te Rau of Ngāti Rangiwewehi. Tamihana’s report of the battle said that one Ngāti Rangiwewehi person, named Taikatu, was killed by a ‘stray bullet.’<sup>858</sup>

850. Document A110, p 558.

851. Cameron to Grey, 25 February 1864 (doc A22, p 110).

852. Gamble, journal, 4 March 1864 (doc A22, p 110).

853. Document A22, pp 110–112.

854. Submission 3.4.127, p 29; submission 3.4.189, pp 39–40; doc K15, p 9.

855. Submission 3.4.208, p 9.

856. Document A22, pp 118, 129–130.

857. Document A110, pp 556–557.

858. Wi Tamehana to Rawiri and Tawaha, 28 February 1864 (doc A22, p 112).

6.7.9 Kihikihi

E noho ana i te mahau o taku whare
i Hui-te-rangi-ora.
Whakarongo ana ki te haruru o te rangi – e tangi haere ana . . .

Sitting quietly on the verandah of my (Runanga) house – Huitrangiora (Kihikihi)
My ears are assailed by the thunder reverberating in the heavens . . .<sup>859</sup>

6.7.9.1 Did the looting and destruction have a military purpose?

When British troops from the 40th and 70th regiments occupied Kihikihi on 23 February 1864, they found the village abandoned (as they had found Te Awamutu). Kihikihi was home to Rewi Maniapoto, Ngāti Paretekawa, and Ngāti Ngutu. It was described by one soldier as the largest settlement he had seen during the British invasion. On hundreds of acres around the village, in one estimate, wheat, maize, potatoes, and kūmara were cultivated. At the end of summer, thousands of peach and apple trees were weighed down with fruit. Storage pits were filled with vegetables for the winter – enough potatoes, in the estimate of the deputy quartermaster-general, to feed the entire British force in the field for the coming winter. Along with Rangiaowhia, the loss would be ‘yet still more serious as winter advances.’<sup>860</sup> While Rangiaowhia is commonly thought of as the centre of agricultural development in the Waipā, before the British invasion, the eye-witness accounts of invading soldiers indicate that there had been intensive agricultural development throughout the district.

In the centre of the village a Kīngitanga flag flew from a tall flagstaff. There, too, stood the whare Hui Te Rangiora, which according to Kaawhia Muraahi was ‘central to the ongoing political, social and economic welfare and development of the local Waipa area in its time.’<sup>861</sup> Harold Maniapoto said it was built by all the tribes prior to intrusion of the forces into the Waikato. It was founded there for that purpose. It was to seat the tribal council seat of discussion and of kōrero and it was where they made all their decision.<sup>862</sup>

859. Document A110, p 602: a waiata said to be by Rewi Maniapoto, discovered by Rovina Maniapoto in the private writings of Winitana Tupotahi of Ngāti Paretekawa. Translation by Rovina Maniapoto.

860. Gamble, journal, 4 March 1864 (doc A22, p131); doc A22, pp130–133; doc A110, p 601.

861. Document K29, p 8.

862. Transcript 4.1.7, p 281 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho, 6 November 2012).

Te Rūnanga o Kihikihi was convened by Rewi, but members were from Maniapoto and Waikato and included Raureti Te Huia, Epiha Tokohihi, Te Taaepa Te Tou, Nepe Te Ngakorangi, Hopa Te Ranganini, Taati Wharekawa, Te Winitana Tupotahi, Ngataa Terenuku, Te Kohika Raureti, Te Hapi Te Hikonga-uira, Te Katea, Porokoru, Te Huirama, and others.<sup>863</sup> At Hui Te Rangiora, Te Rangitāke's request for assistance at Waitara was received and discussed, and Raureti Paiaka and Matene Te Reoreo were sent from there to discover the facts of the situation (see section 6.5.3).<sup>864</sup> At Hui Te Rangiora the decision to expel Gorst from Te Awamutu was taken. Hui Te Rangiora continues to be revered among Ngāti Maniapoto.

In Gustavus von Tempsky's account, after the British occupied the settlement, 'Rewi's house and high flagstaff were given to the flames, and the village, to pillage.'<sup>865</sup> Not only food, but livestock and as many goods as could be carried were taken back to the British camp at Te Awamutu. 'In the space of a few short hours,' said Dr O'Malley, 'one of the most prosperous Maori settlements in all of pre-1864 New Zealand was thus destroyed.'<sup>866</sup> Pressed by Crown counsel, Dr O'Malley said meanings that were applicable to Kihikihi included 'pull or break down,' 'make useless; spoil utterly' and 'ruin financially'.<sup>867</sup> Dr O'Malley said:

It seems likely that Crown forces took a particular pleasure in sacking the settlement of Rewi Maniapoto. That might have included an intention to inflict the kinds of pain, stress and disturbance described above, though it is not clear that such an intention is documented.<sup>868</sup>

Not all was lost, however. Harold Maniapoto recounted:

So they packed up all their goodly affairs and all the poupou and the precious artifacts from within the whare of Hui Te Rangiora, and then when they went back to the Pūniu in the late '60s, they regathered the artifacts that they'd hidden away and they rebuilt Hui Te Rangiora on the south side of the Pūniu River.<sup>869</sup>

It is curious, considering the political importance of Kihikihi, and Hui Te Rangiora in particular, to Ngāti Maniapoto and supporters of the Kingitanga, that General Cameron made no mention of these events in his report to the governor. The Daily Southern Cross reported that the general was present at Kihikihi.<sup>870</sup>

863. Document A110, p 231 n

864. Document A110, pp 515–516, doc K29, p 8.

865. Von Tempsky, Memorandum of the New Zealand Campaign, p 118 (doc A22, p 133).

866. Document A22, p 133.

867. Document A22(f) (O'Malley), p 5.

868. Document A22(f), p 34.

869. Transcript 4.1.7, pp 278–279 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho, 6 November 2012). The land on which the rebuilt whare stood was later taken under the Public Works Act and this is discussed later the report.

870. Document A22, pp 132–134.

In our view, this reflects the fact that the destruction of this great whare had no military purpose. The claimants were in no doubt what the destruction meant. Kaawhia Muraahi said:

Hui Te Rangiora presented no immediate threat to the Crown. It was an iconic and spiritual place to our people. It symbolized something dear and noble to us.

The Crown rather than burning it down had an opportunity to simply seal its doors and post a guard outside so that at a later stage when or if relationships improved it could be used again either for the original purpose or for some other mutually agreed purpose. Instead, the Crown deliberately and with malice burned down what was the singular and most important building which stood on Paretekawa lands at the time. This Whare was of significant importance to our hapu.<sup>871</sup>

According to Thomas Maniapoto:

Our kōrero is that when Rewi Maniapoto saw the smoke rising in the distance from the direction of Kihikihi his heart sank because he knew it would be Hui Te Rangiora.

...

In my view the burning of Hui Te Rangiora was calculated to intimidate. There was no real reason to search out and destroy this house, but to cause such harm. It was a Crown action that showed an absolute lack of consideration of the enemy's concerns. It was a blatant attempt to destroy our tūpuna's will to live. We feel that it is akin to saying if you resist us we will put a bullet between your eyes.<sup>872</sup>

As noted above, there was no military reason to burn Hui Te Rangiora. The British understood the building to be, as the reporter for the Daily Southern Cross put it, 'the assembly room of the Maori chieftains when discussing the auspicious prospects of the rebel side of the question regarding supremacy in this island.'<sup>873</sup> Thus, whether through sheer vandalism or deliberate calculation, the destruction of Hui Te Rangiora carried with it a powerful symbolism of intent to eradicate Māori autonomy and to humiliate and denigrate Rewi Maniapoto in particular.

Nor could there be military justification for the seizure of personal goods from the kāinga, reported as 'useful household articles, clothing, paddles, &c.'<sup>874</sup> This was simply theft, and is exacerbated by the fact that General Cameron oversaw the looting while Māori were attempting to meet him to arrange a peaceful conclusion to the conflict.

Dr O'Malley considered that the pillaging of food supplies from Kihikihi 'made some sense from a strategic point of view.'<sup>875</sup> We agree that the seizure and

---

871. Document K29, pp 11–12.

872. Document K15, p 10.

873. Document A22, pp 132–133 (Daily Southern Cross, 25 February 1864).

874. Daily Southern Cross, 25 February 1864 (doc A22, p 133).

875. Document A22, p 133.

destruction of food had a military purpose at Kihikihi (and the significance of this is explored in our Treaty analysis and findings section).

6.7.9.2 Another attempt to negotiate peace

While Cameron and his force were sacking Kihikihi, an envoy from the Kingitanga came to Te Awamutu to attempt to negotiate peace. Vincent O'Malley commented: 'After almost every major assault by the British on Maori settlements in the Waikato Kingitanga leaders made efforts to restore peace.'<sup>876</sup> As discussed in section 6.7.4, the Kingitanga leaders tried to end the war and negotiate with the Crown after Rangiriri without success. After the swift blows in succession of Rangiaowhia, the retreat from Pāterangi, and the battle of Hairini, the rangatira sent Wiremu Toetoe to General Cameron to try to open negotiations. Toetoe was one of two men who had gone to Austria to learn the art of printing, and had brought back with them the printing press for the Kingitanga's Te Hokioi.<sup>877</sup> There was a rumour that Cameron offered terms that included confiscation of 'all the lands of Ngāti Maniapoto and other Rohe Potae hapu and iwi'.<sup>878</sup> According to one newspaper report, Cameron sent a copy of a proclamation which had been issued in February, which confirmed that lands would be confiscated but left unclear whether those who surrendered would be imprisoned. Dr O'Malley was not able to find any official report of what terms were conveyed by the general.<sup>879</sup> The claimants were highly critical of the Government's response, especially that any kind of peace hinged on acceptance of large-scale confiscation.<sup>880</sup>

Why was peace not made at this point? Governor Grey certainly believed that the invasion could be halted at the Rangiaowhia district. It was still necessary to 'punish' Ngāti Maniapoto, he said, but this could be done 'hereafter by the non recognition of their title to land'.<sup>881</sup> O'Malley suggested that the punishment of Ngāti Maniapoto remained a point of agreement between the governor and Ministers, but that by mid-February 1864, both Cameron and Grey believed that the colonial Ministers wanted to prolong the war unnecessarily in order to maximise the land they could confiscate.<sup>882</sup> In the wake of the seizure of Rangiaowhia, the Ministers thought the military goal should change from delivering a knockout blow to the Kingitanga 'army'. Instead, the Ministers wanted the British forces to advance on Maungatautari (where Ngāti Hauā had retreated), seizing and destroying all food supplies. The intention was to starve the people into unconditional surrender. They did not believe that Māori were desperate enough yet to make peace on the Crown's terms.<sup>883</sup>

---

876. Document A22, p134.

877. Document A110, pp 492–494; doc K35, pp 12–13; doc A22, p134.

878. Document A22, pp 134–135.

879. Document A22, pp 135–137.

880. Submission 3.4.189, pp 34–35.

881. Document A22, p137 (Grey to Cameron, 13 February 1864).

882. Document A22, pp 140–141.

883. Whitaker, memorandum of Ministers in reply [to the governor], 27 February 1864 (doc A22, p140).

6.7.10 Ōrākau

Tokotokona na te hau tawaho
 Koi toko atu
 I kite ai au i Remu-taka ra
 I kite ai au ma taku kui ki Wai-matā-e
 Tohungia mai e te kokoreke ra
 Katahi nei hoki ka kitea te karoro tu a wai
 I tu awaawa ra
 Ma te kahore anake e noho toku whenua
 Kai tua te ra e whiti ana
 E noho ana ko te koko koroki
 I ata kiki tau.
 Compelled (are we) by outside winds (to fight)
 Oppose them not.
 In spirit-land I saw the ancient burial place
 With my mother visited the place of flesh-cutting flints.
 It was the kokoreke bird that pointed out,
 And then I saw the sea-gull of the waters
 Standing in the valley (an evil omen),
 Nothing shall my lands occupy
 Hereafter will be the sunshine (peace)
 And the song of the koko will be heard,
 But I alone will live to tell of it.<sup>884</sup>

The defeat of the defenders of Ōrākau in April 1864 quickly gained legendary status among Pākehā as the site of an honourable resistance that confirmed Māori as worthy if doomed opponents in the war for possession of Waikato. James Cowan, the chief promoter of this interpretation, wrote:

on that greatly prized garden-land a band of men – and women, too – fought their last despairing fight for a broken cause. They lost the battle, but they won an enduring name, and won the admiration and affection of their Pākehā antagonists, for their amazing bravery, devotion and self-sacrifice.<sup>885</sup>

This view was never seriously questioned among Pākehā until James Belich effectively dismantled it in the 1980s. But it was never shared by Māori. Asked to provide text for a memorial inscription, Tureiti Te Heuheu responded: ‘at the time of the war waged by the Pakeha race against the Maori King, [Rewi] fought in the war on the side of the Maori King, with the result that he was defeated here at 884. Document A22, p149. Said to have been uttered by Rewi Manga Maniapoto, predicting that a stand at Ōrākau would end in disaster.

885. Document A97, p208 (James Cowan, ‘Famous New Zealanders – No 5 – Rewi Maniapoto – The Story of Orakau’ New Zealand Railways Magazine, (vol 8, no 4, 1 August, 1933), p 25).

Orakau, his tribe subdued, and his lands taken by conquest'. This description was considered to be 'not quite what's required' and nothing was done.<sup>886</sup>

In this inquiry claimants submitted that: 'Rather than the day of the most famous battle in New Zealand history, the day should be known as one of the darkest days.'<sup>887</sup> They told us that Māori strategy at Ōrākau was determined to a large degree by the way the British forces had conducted the war up to that point: by imprisoning Waikato fighters after Rangiriri, repeatedly refusing to negotiate peace terms, and attacking and imprisoning non-combatants at Rangiaowhia, the British convinced Māori that they were fighting a pitiless war in which no quarter would be offered. And, claimants said, those fears proved correct. Women and children, kept within the pā because after Rangiaowhia the British were not trusted not to attack non-combatants, were among those hunted down and brutally killed as they attempted to escape. As many as 160 of the defenders were killed, and the high proportion of the dead compared to the wounded suggests 'a large scale massacre of wounded non-combatants.'<sup>888</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that many Māori were killed and wounded during the pursuit, 'at least' 80 killed and 'about 40' wounded. Crown counsel submitted that it was not clear whether the 'high proportion of killed to wounded' was the result of a refusal of fleeing 'fugitives' to surrender, but accepted that 'some Māori men and women' may have been 'killed out of hand.'<sup>889</sup>

6.7.10.1 The Māori strategy for Ōrākau

After Hairini, Kīngitanga forces dispersed to protect their remaining people and lands. Tamihana and his Ngāti Hauā people returned to their strongholds around Maungatautari. Ngāti Maniapoto and Raukawa regrouped across the Pūniu River at Tokanui, from where they saw smoke rising above Kihikihi as Hui Te Rangiora burned. As Raukawa leader Hitiri Te Paerata recounted, a hui at Wharepapa agreed to continue their resistance and to establish a pā on the north side of the Pūniu River.<sup>890</sup> This hui was held in late March 1864, after their offer to negotiate peace in February had been met with the response discussed in the previous section.

Rewi Manga Maniapoto favoured a united stance, and set out to consult Tamihana and the other leaders at Maungatautari. He was intercepted by a Ngāi Tūhoe tauā led by Piripi Te Heuheu who, with Ngāti Raukawa, argued that a pā should be built at once from which to resist the invading army. Rewi yielded, first to the proposal for a pā, and then to the choice of site. Hoariri Te Paerata of Raukawa said, 'Me mate au ki kōnei' (let me die here on the land), hence the selection of Ōrākau. The pā site was close to the British forces and there was food available, but it suffered from two serious defects. Its exposed position meant the British were able to encircle the pā, cutting off escape and access to water. The 886. Karen Cameron, 'Ōrākau NZ Wars memorial', Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <http://www.nzhistory.net.nz/media/photo/orakau-nz-wars-memorial> (updated 24 June 2014).

---

887. Submission 3.4.198, p 21.

888. Submission 3.4.127, pp 24–26.

889. Submission 3.4.300, p 20.

890. Document A22, pp 143–144; doc K24(c); doc A97, pp 217–223.

defenders could not withstand a siege for more than a few days. A third drawback was that the defenders of Ōrākau had neither the time nor manpower to construct a pā on the scale of Pāterangi or Rangiriri. When the British attacked it was still incomplete. This last, however, should not be over-estimated. As Cowan pointed out, Ōrākau pā, 'flimsy as it was, proved an unexpectedly difficult problem for the assaulting forces.'<sup>891</sup>

According to Major William Mair, the Government interpreter, Ōrākau was not occupied until 28 March. Their presence was not noticed by the British until the morning of 30 March, and Brigadier-General Carey assembled around 1,100 troops. Divided into three groups with the aim of surrounding the pā, the groups set off during the night and arrived in concert early on 31 March. After three attempts to storm the pā had been repelled, Carey settled for 'surrounding the place, and adopting the more slow but sure method of approaching the position by sap.'<sup>892</sup> Meanwhile, a party of mostly Ngāti Tūwharetoa arrived, but were unable to reach those within the pā. By the morning of 1 April 1864, the greater part of the defenders' ammunition was spent, there was no water, and only raw kamokamo and kūmara to eat. Within the pā, debate over whether to attempt to either break out or seek terms for surrender continued without agreement. Some time during the morning of 2 April, General Cameron arrived and ordered terms to be offered the defenders.<sup>893</sup>

Government interpreter Mair told those inside the pā that, although General Cameron admired their bravery, they were surrounded and escape was impossible; to save their lives, they should yield. The reply, now embedded in legend, was then said to have been made, that they would fight on for ever, and that if the men were to die, the women would die with them.<sup>894</sup>

Then, in a single phalanx, the defenders left the pā and moved up to the crest of the ridge, forcing their way through a weak point in the encircling line of troops. They continued down towards the Pūniu River through mānuka scrub and swampland. The advantage of surprise saw them through into the scrub, but troops were quick in pursuit. Estimates of casualties range from 80 to 200 killed, and 33 men and women were taken prisoner.<sup>895</sup>

6.7.10.2 Who was involved from Te Rohe Pōtae Māori?

If those who arrived too late to join the defence of the pā are included, around 500 Māori can be said to have been involved in the three-day battle of Ōrākau. Angela Ballara identified sections of the following iwi and hapū participating at Ōrākau: Ngāti Te Kohera, Ngāti Paretakawa, Ngāti Wairangi, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Ngāti Rangiwewehi, Ngāi Te Rangī, Ngāi Tūhoe, Raukawa, Ngāti Kahungunu,

<sup>891</sup> Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 373; doc K24, p 5; doc K24(c); doc A22, p 150; doc A97, p 221.

<sup>892</sup> Carey to assistant military secretary, 3 April 1864 (doc A22, pp 151–155).

<sup>893</sup> Document A22, pp 155–160.

<sup>894</sup> Document A22, pp 160–161; doc K24(c), p 29.

<sup>895</sup> For detailed accounts of the battle, see doc A110, pp 565–590; doc A22, pp 142–170; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 166–175.

Ngāti Hauā, Ngāti Porou, and Ngāti Maniapoto. From Waikato, she identified Ngāti Māhanga, Ngāti Hinetū, Ngāti Mahuta, Te Werokoukou, and Patupō.<sup>896</sup> This breadth of support among North Island iwi and hapū made a strong statement of rejection by Māori of the Crown's demand for submission and the confiscation of lands.

From the outset of this inquiry, during Ngā Kōrero Tuku Ihu hui, claimants spoke about those who fought at Ōrākau. Of central importance was Rewi Manga Maniapoto and his military leadership. According to Thomas Maniapoto, the mission-educated Manga was 'a bit of a matakite, he could foresee . . . the lust of the Pākehā's eyes for the land . . . and he was aware that sooner or later [Māori] were to be dispossessed' of their land.<sup>897</sup> Kāwhia Te Murāhi told us that according to his kaumātua, 'Manga's temperament was not one of a warrior, he wasn't a hard man. He enjoyed the company of children and people generally and he was not a recluse or anti-social by nature.'<sup>898</sup>

In late 1863 or early 1864, Rewi, Te Winitana Tupotahi, and Hapi Te Hikongairua travelled to Te Urewera to seek support for the defence of upper Waikato.<sup>899</sup> Rovina Maniapoto explained that Tūhoe met at Ruatāhuna to discuss joining the fighting. Their tohunga assembled some rods to assist with their karakia and deliberations. If the rods remained standing, Tūhoe would be victorious in their fight; if the rods fell the omen was not good. The rods fell and the tohunga knew there would be death and defeat. Most of Tūhoe stayed home, but Ngāti Wharepākau and Ngāti Manawa, the kin of Te Pūrewa and Tangiharuru, went.<sup>900</sup>

Among Ngāti Maniapoto, most prominent were Ngāti Paretekawa, led by Te Winitana Tupotahi, Raureti Paiaka, and Te Kohika, with Rewi in overall command.<sup>901</sup> Pōneke, known among his family as Napinapi, was an expert in handling weapons and is said to have protected Rewi. He and his son Niketi died at Ōrākau, but Niketi's wife Rihi survived. Rihi's second husband Te Kohika and his brother Te Whakataute fought at Ōrākau. Their father was Te Huia Raureti (Raureti Paiaka).<sup>902</sup> Ngāti Rangatahi stated 'Ngāti Rangatahi lives were lost during the Battle of Orakau'; although specific names were not given, Tame Tūwhangai acknowledged Rangatahi was a common ancestor to Ngāti Paretekawa, 'our blood connection to the warrior chief Pēhi Tukorehu.'<sup>903</sup>

---

896. Document A120 (McBurney), pp151–152. Mr McBurney stated that Te Werokoukou comprised those members of Ngāti Kauwhata who chose to remain in Waikato.

897. Transcript 4.1.1, p 50 (Thomas Maniapoto, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

898. Transcript 4.1.1, p 148 (Kaawhia Te Muraahi, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010).

899. Document A22, p 147.

900. Transcript 4.1.1, p 200 (Rovina Maniapoto, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010).

901. Submission 3.4.189, p 37.

902. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 141–142 (John Mana (Jock) Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010); transcript 4.1.1, pp 150–151 (Kaawhia Te Muraahi, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010); submission 3.4.230, p 4; doc P15(a).

903. Submission 3.4.205, p 15; doc K26 (Tūwhangai), p 6.

Counsel for Ngāti Ngawaero, Ngāti Taumata, Ngāti Te Kanawa, and Ngāti Unu submitted that those hapū 'were at the forefront' at Ōrākau.<sup>904</sup> Ngāti Unu claimants said their tūpuna Te Poupatete, with Raureti Te Huia, was one of 12 who assisted Rewi in the retreat through the swamp.<sup>905</sup> Ngāti Rōrā claimants said Taonui Hikaka was with Rewi 'at the time of Orakau.'<sup>906</sup> Among Ngāti Hari, Peita Kotuku and his father Tupukaheke Te Naku fought together at Ōrākau.<sup>907</sup> Morehu McDonald pointed out that the descendants of Ingoa were there. Mr McDonald named Rapata Te Whareiti, who had a rifle, as one of the warriors at Ōrākau.<sup>908</sup>

Te Paerata led the contingent comprising Raukawa, Ngāti Kohera, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa. He and his son Hone Teri were killed, along with others of Raukawa. Hitiri Te Paerata and his sister Ahumai survived their father, although Ahumai was wounded in the retreat.<sup>909</sup> Dr Robert Joseph spoke of the Maniapoto whakapapa connections of the Paerata whānau. Rewi and Te Paerata were cousins and Ahumai married Matawaia Te Momo from Maniapoto.<sup>910</sup> Henare Te Momo and Hauraki Tonganui were others of Raukawa.<sup>911</sup> Ngāti Tūwharetoa members of this group included Te Rangihiraweā, cousin of Te Paerata, Nui, and Rangitoheriri. Others with Te Rangihiraweā were Nuku and Wetini.<sup>912</sup> Ngāti Hinemihi were also present.<sup>913</sup> A separate large Ngāti Tūwharetoa taua arrived on 31 March, just too late, as by then the pā was surrounded. Paranapa Otimi provided much useful detail about these people.<sup>914</sup>

Ngāti Apakura said their tūpuna were present at Ōrākau. Wiremu Karamoa Tumanako, of Apakura and Ngāti Hinetū, led Anglican services within the pā. Others of Apakura may have been Te Paewaka, Aporo, and Te Huirama.<sup>915</sup> It was 'highly likely' Ngāti Kauwhata were present at Rangiaowhia and Ōrākau.<sup>916</sup> Rodney Graham said his tūpuna Kereama Paoe fought at Ōrākau.<sup>917</sup> Donald Tait

---

904. Submission 3.4.250, p 3.

905. Transcript 4.1.1, p 74 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010). The hui transcript offers no translation; submission 3.4.251, p 9.

906. Submission 3.4.279, p 13: The reference is to O'Malley (doc A22, pp 173, 175) and the source does not state Taonui was actually present at Ōrākau, but was with Rewi at Hangatiki later that month.

907. Submission 3.4.167, p 18.

908. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 55–56 (Morehu McDonald, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

909. Submission 3.4.158, p 14.

910. Submission 3.4.189, pp 6–7; doc B2 (Joseph), pp 2–6.

911. Submission 3.4.189, p 37.

912. Submission 3.4.281, pp 30–31; doc R23 (Otimi), p 3.

913. Submission 3.4.187, p 10.

914. Document R23, especially pp 6–7.

915. Submission 3.4.228, p 49; doc A97, pp 224–226.

916. Submission 3.4.134, p 16.

917. Submission 3.4.147, p 23.

said it was Te Werokoukou hapū of Ngāti Kauwhata that fought there.<sup>918</sup> Dr Joseph also noted the presence of Ngāti Kahungunu.<sup>919</sup>

James Cowan described the Ōrākau defenders as numbering ‘scarcely more than three hundred’: Te Urewera, Ngāti Whare, and Ngāti Kahungunu, about 140; Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Te Kohera, and a few of Ngāti Tūwharetoa, about 100; 50 of Ngāti Maniapoto; and further 20 Waikato. The total included about 20 women and children.<sup>920</sup> Belich thought ‘200 to 250 warriors and something like fifty non-combatants may be a reasonable estimate.’<sup>921</sup> He noted that the estimate of 50 for the Ngāti Whare section might be wrong, as it was based on an interview with Harehare, who was not present. Also among Cowan’s papers is a figure given by Peita Kotuku, who was present, of eight men and three women.<sup>922</sup>

6.7.10.3 Rejecting the offer of surrender

As reported by General Carey, ‘the enemy was called upon to surrender, previous to the concentrated fire of the Armstrong gun and hand grenades on their work; they were told that their lives would be spared.’<sup>923</sup> Why did the Ōrākau defenders reject the offer of terms if they were surrounded by Crown forces and on the verge of defeat? Mair’s report explained the defenders’ thinking as follows:

These answers came from the Uriwera [sic] who occupied that side of the works, but a discussion was held in the inner redoubt as to what course they should adopt; upon some one suggesting that they should accept the terms offered, it was answered, no! or we shall be all ‘taken to Auckland, as those were from Rangiriri, and never perhaps be liberated.’ Rewi himself proposed that this should be their last fight, and that they should request the General to ‘march all his troops back to the Awamutu, and that they should pledge their word to follow and lay their guns at his feet, and hereafter trust to the white people for protection.’ To this the Uriwera [sic] (who were evidently the toa’s of this fight) answered that ‘they would not listen to such terms, and if any one came from the General again they would do their best to shoot him.’<sup>924</sup>

Rewi, then, was prepared to put his trust in the British and pledge his word. Ōrākau is the episode of the war where most is known about Rewi’s conduct and decisions. Some aspects stand out. Decisions were made with care and acts undertaken with firm resolve; he counselled moderation; but decisions were made by consensus and adhered to, despite evidence that Rewi himself did not always agree. As we discussed in earlier sections, Rewi’s actions in 1860–1863 – including

918. Document A120, p152.

919. Transcript 4.1.1, p162 (Robert Joseph, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010).

920. Cowan, The New Zealand Wars, vol 1, p 373.

921. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p168.

922. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 358, n 33.

923. Carey to assistant military secretary, 3 April 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-3, p52.

924. Mair to colonial secretary, 29 April 1864 (doc A22, pp160–161).

during the expulsion of Gorst – showed a strong commitment to consensus decision-making, despite the many reports of his supposed maverick behaviour.

By the time of Ōrākau, Rewi had already lost his home to the British. A comparison might be drawn with the situation after Waiari, where Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Apakura suffered losses and some at least sought terms of peace. After Waiari, at least according to Pākehā, Raukawa were still defiant. At Ōrākau, if Mair is reliable, it was Tūhoe who remained least amenable to surrender, but Peita Kotuku recalled that Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato rangatira were among those who would not consent.<sup>925</sup>

During hearings, Jenny Charman said Ngāti Apakura believed that outrage over what had happened at Rangiaowhia ‘led in part to the desperate decision to stand and fight at Ōrākau.’<sup>926</sup> Dr O’Malley argued that the Ōrākau leadership would have seen good reason to revert to the traditional practice of bringing non-combatants into fighting pā for their protection.<sup>927</sup>

While no contemporary evidence was presented to support this interpretation, it is certain that Cameron’s actions at Rangiriri played an important part in their calculations. In April 1864, the prisoners taken at Rangiriri remained on the hulk Marion. No inquiry into their alleged guilt had been made, nor charges laid. Grey set out his concern on this point explicitly when he wrote to the Secretary of State that month:

I believe that the uncertainty which hangs over the course intended to be pursued with regard to these prisoners – and consequently, with regard to any other prisoners we take – induces a spirit of desperation amongst the native population, which, whilst it is sad to see, is quite unnecessary. . . .<sup>928</sup>

This fear appears to have been widespread among those who resisted the invasion of Waikato. After Ōrākau, Hone Te One went to Hangatiki as an intermediary for the Crown. He found Rewi and his people anxious for peace, but Rewi was:

afraid that he would place himself too much at the General’s mercy by giving up his arms; that the natives captured at Rangiriri had been dealt with treacherously, they having been led to believe that, upon giving up their arms, they would be permitted to go free and live within the lines of the troops. He did not believe that they, the prisoners, were so well treated, or that their lives were to be spared . . .<sup>929</sup>

On 3 May 1864, Grey reported to the Colonial Office that

---

925. Document A22, p 161.

926. Transcript 4.1.10, p 43 (Jenny Charman, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

927. Document A22, p 120.

928. Grey to Newcastle, 6 April 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-5, p 3.

929. Grey to Newcastle, 3 May 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-5, p 4.

the natives distinctly state, that the reason they would not accept the terms offered to them by General Cameron at Orakau was because they found 'they would all be taken to Auckland, as the prisoners were from Rangiriri, and never perhaps be liberated.'<sup>930</sup>

Five men taken at Ōrākau were subsequently listed among 228 men imprisoned on the Marion: Wi Karamoa (Ngāti Hinetū), Te Rewarewa (Patupō), Wi Hione (Rongowhakaata), Aperaniko (Ngāi Tawake), and Karipa Mautaiaha (Raukawa).<sup>931</sup>

The actions of the Crown, at Rangiriri, in the treatment of its prisoners, and at Rangiaowhia, were cumulative in exacerbating fear and distrust among its opponents. What might have happened at Ōrākau, had Rewi's advice to 'pledge his word' been heeded, cannot be guessed. The events that followed the refusal to surrender are best explained as tragedy heaped upon tragedy. The Crown demanded submission without good cause. By its actions during the war, whether intentional or not, the Crown showed itself to be a pitiless foe. This created desperation, and the result was the greatest and most barbarous loss of life of the Waikato war.

6.7.10.4 The flight from Ōrākau

6.7.10.4.1 A MASSACRE ?

Deputy Quartermaster-General Gamble reported that the troops 'poured a murderous fire' on Ōrākau defenders as they fled.<sup>932</sup> As at Rangiaowhia, the death of an officer was supposed to have led troops to breach discipline and retaliate with particular force. In this case it was Captain Ring of the 18th Royal Irish regiment, killed on the morning of 31 March in the second attempt to assault the pā.<sup>933</sup> William Race recalled that soldiers were 'enraged' by the escape and the death of Ring and others, writing a strangely phrased extenuation: 'having myself witnessed such playing fast and loose with these rebels so often, considered, strange as it may appear this disregard of discipline by the soldiers justifiable.'<sup>934</sup> Hitiri Te Paerata also used the word 'enraged' to describe the troops' behaviour.<sup>935</sup> He recounted the ferocity of the pursuit:

As we fled before them they tried, by outmarching on our flanks, to cut off our retreat, and poured a storm of bullets which seemed to encircle us like hail. It became as a forlorn hope with us; none expected to escape, nor did we desire to; were we not all the children of one parent? therefore we all wished to die together. My father and many of my people died in breaking away from the pā. When we cut through the 930. Grey to Newcastle, 3 May 1864 (doc A22, p 172).

931. Document K24, p7. The names are from 'List of Maori prisoners taken at Rangiriri, Rangiaohia, Orakau, etc, and at present on board the Hulk "Marion"', G13, box 3, 100, Archives New Zealand, Wellington.

932. Gamble, journal, 4 April 1864 (doc A22, p 163).

933. Carey to assistant military secretary, 3 April 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-3, p 51.

934. Race, 'Under the Flag', p 198 (doc A22, p 166; doc A22(a) vol 2, p 1167).

935. Hitiri Te Paerata, Description of the Battle of Orakau, As Given by the Native Chief Hitiri Te Paerata, of the Ngatiraukawa Tribe, At the Parliamentary Buildings, 4th August 1888 (Wellington: Government Printer, 1888), p 11 (doc A22, p 165).

troops further on my brother, Hone Teri, who was with Rewi, died in endeavouring to shield him. The whole of my tribe were slain; my father, brothers, and uncle all died. My sister Ahumai, she who said the men and women would all die together, was wounded in four places. She was shot in the right side, the bullet going through her body and coming out on the left, she was shot right through the shoulder, the bullet coming out at her back; she was also shot through the waist; and her left thumb was shot away.<sup>936</sup>

There can be no doubt that women and children were killed by troops in the flight from Ōrākau. As noted earlier, there is evidence that the assault on Rangiaowhia caused women and children to stay within the pā rather than depend for their safety on their status as non-combatants in an unfortified village. Many if not most of those within the pā had travelled long distances to support their Waikato and Maniapoto kin.

Carey acknowledged in his official report that women were killed, but pleaded mitigating circumstances:

I regret to say that in the pa and in the pursuit some three or four women were killed unavoidably, probably owing to the similarity of dress of both men and women, and their hair being cut equally short, rendering it impossible to distinguish one from the other at any distance.<sup>937</sup>

This prompts the question, why were these deaths unavoidable if killing women was a matter for regret? In Mair's account, written on 6 April, with its jumbled, breathless syntax, regret became revulsion:

I saw 8 or 10 women killed and one of the wounded is dead, and 5 or 6 of the men, the entire loss cannot be less than 150, the wounded prisoners are three men, one boy, and a woman . . . I have had my fill of fighting, and do not care to see any more, these poor killed and wounded women have horrified me, and I am filled with disgust, at the generally obscene and profane behaviour of the troops, as well as their vaunting, yet almost cowardly behaviour . . .<sup>938</sup>

Hitiri Te Paerata described events that must have contributed to Mair's disgust, in which soldiers attacked and in at least one case killed wounded women within the pā:

when the pa was carried Major Mair went in with the stormers to look after the wounded. He found some soldiers trying to kill a wounded woman named Hineiturama, belonging to Rotorua. They did not know, perhaps that she was a woman, but they were enraged at the death of their officer, Captain Ring. Major Mair

---

936. Te Paerata, Description of the Battle of Orakau, pp 5–6 (doc A22, p 163).

937. Carey to assistant military secretary, 3 April 1864 (doc A22, p 164).

938. WG Mair, 6 April 1865 (doc A22, p 165).

carried the woman to a corner of the pa, and ran off to save another woman called Ariana, who was also badly wounded, but when he returned Hineiturama had been killed.<sup>939</sup>

Dr O'Malley cited accounts in which a wounded woman carrying a young child was rescued from a soldier who was about to bayonet her.<sup>940</sup>

The New Zealander reported:

Women – many women – slaughtered, and many children slain, are amongst the trophies of Orakau, and ‘civilization’ in pursuit, or as it returned from the chase, amused itself by shooting the wounded ‘barbarians,’ as they lay upon the ground where they had fallen. [Emphasis in original.]<sup>941</sup>

These accounts demonstrate that in the pursuit of the Ōrākau defenders Crown troops showed a complete disregard for human life. Crown troops lacked discipline and showed a willingness to commit atrocities against the Māori defenders. Nor was there any disciplinary action in the months that followed the attack against those Crown soldiers who had committed acts of brutality. As O'Malley argued, along with the Crown's conduct at Rangiriri and Rangiaowhia 'the events at Orakau once again cast grave shadows over the overall conduct of British troops throughout the Waikato War.'<sup>942</sup>

6.7.10.4.2 CASUALTIES

The number of British killed at Ōrākau is known precisely: 16 were killed and another 52 wounded. Estimates of the number of Māori casualties at Ōrākau vary from 50 to as many as 200. Claimants agreed with Dr O'Malley that a figure of 150 to 160 killed was most likely.<sup>943</sup> The Crown preferred Belich's figure of at least 80 killed and 40 wounded, based on an assessment made by Rewi to Hone Te One, soon after the battle, that about 80 had been killed and a further 120 were wounded, taken prisoner, or missing.<sup>944</sup>

Perhaps the best place to begin is Carey's official report. He wrote that 101 were killed during the escape, and that prisoners reported a further 18 to 20 killed during the siege and buried in the pā. Carey added that early on the morning of 3 April, Māori were seen carrying dead and wounded away 'at the most distant point of pursuit, and fresh tracks showed that they had been similarly occupied during the night.'<sup>945</sup> Mair later reported that, of the 33 prisoners, 26 were wounded and by the end of the month 11 had died.<sup>946</sup> William Race remembered that a fortnight

939. Te Paerata, Description of the Battle of Orakau, p 6 (doc A22, p 165).

940. Document A22, p 166.

941. New Zealander quoted in New Zealand Herald, 15 April 1864 (doc A22, p 166).

942. Document A22, p 169.

943. Submission 3.4.127, p 26; doc A22, pp 167–168.

944. Submission 3.4.300, p 20; Belich, The New Zealand Wars, pp 172–173; doc A22, p 168.

945. Carey to assistant military secretary, 3 April 1864, AJHR, 1865, E-3, p 53.

946. Document A22, pp 168–169.

after the battle ‘when reconnoitring the locality of that swamp the foetid smell too truly told that many bodies were rotting there.’<sup>947</sup> The British records thus produce a total of about 130 dead, to which should be added those recovered by the defenders and the bodies left to rot in the swamp.

While Rewi estimated 80 dead, his figure of 120 wounded, taken prisoner, or missing requires examination. Missing, in this context, essentially means killed. We know there were 33 prisoners, and that some of the survivors who managed to evade capture were wounded. An indication of the fate of the roughly 90 wounded or missing can be gleaned from Rewi’s remark that, of his party of about 15, only three or four escaped.<sup>948</sup>

These considerations, together with estimates by General Cameron, William Mair, and Hitiri Te Paerata, that about 150 Māori were killed, tend to confirm that number as the most plausible estimate of Māori casualties at Ōrākau.

Despite his preference for a lower estimate of casualties, Belich considered the large number and proportion of Māori killed at Ōrākau in comparison to those wounded to be evidence of ‘a large-scale massacre of wounded non-combatants.’<sup>949</sup> Dr O’Malley compared the figure of 26 wounded prisoners with his estimate of 150 dead to draw the same conclusion.<sup>950</sup> His calculation must exaggerate the true position, as many of those who crossed the Pūniu to safety were also wounded. But a comparison with the Imperial troops, who suffered roughly one death for every three wounded, makes a stark and disturbing contrast. The unavoidable conclusion must be that the recorded accounts did not describe aberrations but are indeed evidence of a massacre which included the wounded, the unarmed, women, and children.

6.7.10.4.3 CARE OF THE DEAD

Most of the dead were buried in mass graves near the pā. Mair wrote that approximately 30 Māori were buried in one ditch near the pā, including ‘Hineiturama (Te Arawa), Te Paerata, his son Hone Teri (Maniapoto, Raukawa, Te Kohera), Wereta (Te Kohera), Piripi te Heuheu (Tuhoe), and others.’<sup>951</sup> Cowan wrote: ‘When the trench graves were filled in, the clenched hand of a Māori protruded above the ground, and a soldier trampled on it to tread it under.’<sup>952</sup> Much remains unknown: Were there burial services? Were the graves marked in any way? Was any opportunity given for the survivors to collect their dead kin? Later in April, Rewi, through Hone Te One, asked General Carey ‘to furnish him with a list of the killed and prisoners.’<sup>953</sup> Whether that was done is unknown. As noted earlier, there is evidence that some bodies were not buried at all, but left to rot where they fell.<sup>954</sup>

947. Race, ‘Under the Flag’, p 206 (doc A22, p 167).

948. Document A22, pp 168–169.

949. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p 173.

950. Document A22(f), p 9.

951. Document A97, p 226.

952. Cowan, ‘Famous New Zealanders’, p 25 (doc A97, p 217).

953. WG Mair to colonial secretary, 29 April 1864 (doc A22, p 168).

954. Document A22, p 167.

At hearing week four, counsel raised the question of what happened to the land the mass graves were located on. It seems to have been sold as farm lots to ex-soldiers. We discuss this issue when we address urupā and wāhi tapu later in the report.

6.7.11 The end of the war?

As discussed in the previous section, Rewi Maniapoto was on his way to consult with Wiremu Tamihana when he was diverted to the fortification and defence of Ōrākau. After the retreat from that pā, Rewi returned to Hangatiki. Ngāti Maniapoto and others (including some Waikato refugees) constructed a new line of pā south of the Pūniu River to once again resist the advancing Crown troops.<sup>955</sup> At this stage, General Cameron's message to them was that he could only accept unconditional surrenders. The rangatira were still very worried about the fate of those who had been taken at Rangiriri and imprisoned indefinitely on the Marion. They refused to surrender unless the Crown softened its stance on confiscation and guaranteed that they would not be imprisoned. The colonial Government, however, wanted Cameron to continue the war. Grey was worried that Ngāti Maniapoto had not been punished enough.<sup>956</sup> Just before Ōrākau, the governor had said that Ngāti Maniapoto 'escaped untouched in every engagement – they never fight, and do nothing but murder and pillage, having escaped hitherto without punishment, they are as unsubdued as ever.'<sup>957</sup> Both Grey and the Ministers urged Cameron to move further inland and attack Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>958</sup>

General Cameron's forces were building redoubts and entrenching north of the Pūniu. He refused to carry on any further, arguing that the military goals had been met and the Queen's flag was flying at Ngāruawāhia.<sup>959</sup> Although no one knew it at the time, the shooting part of the war in the Waikato was over.

Because there was no real conclusion to the war and no peace-making, the two sides remained poised on either side of the 'border' in a state of hostility and suspicion. As the claimants submitted:

Even when hostilities ceased, it was far from clear that the war was over. As O'Malley put it, the war 'came to an end almost by default' in what was far from a peaceful situation.<sup>960</sup>

Te Rohe Pōtae and exiled Kīngitanga leaders imposed a formal aukati and closed their remaining lands to the Crown and to a large extent to settlers (see chapter 7).

---

955. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p175.

956. Document A22, pp170–177.

957. Grey to Biddulph, 8 March 1864 (doc A22, p179).

958. Belich, The New Zealand Wars, p198.

959. Document A22, pp178–179.

960. Submission 3.4.412, p8.

6.7.12 Treaty analysis and findings

As the Crown has conceded, the Waikato war was an injustice and a breach of Treaty principles. Through this concession ‘the Crown acknowledged a high level of responsibility for the effects of war and raupatu.’<sup>961</sup> The Crown considered that the killing of non-combatants by its forces, and the loss of homes, cultivations, and belongings during the war, ‘underscore the Crown’s concession that the wars were an injustice.’<sup>962</sup> The Crown argued that the Treaty did not ‘displace the Crown’s power to use coercive force in appropriate circumstances,’<sup>963</sup> but its admission that the war was an injustice and a Treaty breach shows that the Waikato war was not the ‘appropriate circumstances’ for the use of force. Crown counsel did not make a submission that the Treaty was suspended during the war, as the Crown has argued in some other inquiries. We agree with the Taranaki Tribunal: ‘While the norms of a Treaty, like those of an international covenant, may be suspended in an emergency, the emergency in this case was caused by the Governor and he could not reap the benefit of his own wrong.’<sup>964</sup>

We accept the Crown’s concession that the Waikato war was an injustice and a breach of Treaty principles. In our view, it was a very serious Treaty breach, as any breach must be which causes the loss of life. It follows that the death of every Māori person killed during the unjust war – combatant and non-combatant – was an injustice, and the casualties of the war were a serious prejudicial effect of the Crown’s breach. We expand on this when we discuss prejudice more generally later in the chapter. Here, we note that many of the events discussed in section 6.7, though painful and prejudicial to Māori, were among the ordinary consequences of war. This means that they are covered by the scope of the Crown’s concession that the Waikato war was an injustice and in breach of the principles of the Treaty. One example is the destruction of livelihoods when the inhabitants of Te Rore had to flee in advance of an occupying force (section 6.7.5). This was an inevitable consequence of an invasion by a force intent on conquering and occupying the territories of the Kīngitanga tribes.

But not all matters can be explained as ordinary incidents of war. Where the Crown’s forces acted in a disproportionate or even an egregious manner, then further Treaty breaches occurred, intensifying the suffering of an already unjust war and compounding the prejudice. In this respect, the Crown must take not just a ‘high level of responsibility’ but full responsibility for the conduct of its troops, which were under its control.

One example of such conduct is the killing of non-combatants. Crown counsel submitted that ‘it was not Crown policy to kill non-combatants.’<sup>965</sup> We would go further and say that the killing of non-combatants violated the British standards of

---

961. Submission 3.4.300, p 21.

962. Statement 1.3.1, p 48; submission 3.4.16, p 8.

963. Submission 3.4.300, p 8.

964. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, p 9.

965. Submission 3.4.16, p 8.

the time for the conduct of war. As discussed earlier, the Crown characterised it as ‘murder’ when settler non-combatants were killed.<sup>966</sup>

From our discussion above, it will be evident that the Crown’s forces killed Māori non-combatants at Rangiriri, Rangiaowhia, Hairini, and Ōrākau. At Rangiaowhia and Ōrākau, we have found that non-combatants were massacred by British forces – at Rangiaowhia when the Crown attacked a defenceless kāinga and its forces set a whare alight, and at Ōrākau when combatants and non-combatants were fleeing from the battle. These Crown actions, set out in full in sections 6.7.7 and 6.7.10, were egregious and in breach of the principles of the Treaty. The Crown’s relationship with the peoples of Te Rohe Pōtae is still overshadowed today by the events at Rangiaowhia in particular.

At Rangiriri (section 6.7.3), the Crown’s forces violated a shared rule of war (the white flag for truce and negotiations). In our view, this was morally wrong but not in itself a breach of Treaty principles. The Crown also imprisoned those who had attempted to negotiate a truce at Rangiriri, holding 180 men, women, and children in inhumane circumstances and without trial. We return to that point below.

Finally, we find the Crown forces’ conduct of the war to have been excessive or disproportionate in their destruction or plundering of property which served no military purpose. At Kihikihi (section 6.7.9), the burning of a great taonga, Hui Te Rangiora, and the plunder of personal belongings serve as an important example. This Crown conduct was an additional breach of Treaty principles which compounded the injustice of the war. We accept, however, that the taking of or destruction of food was an action with a military purpose (and therefore covered by the original Treaty breach).

In addition to the troops’ conduct, we find that the political leaders, the governor and Ministers, conducted aspects of the war in a disproportionate or egregious manner.

First, the 180 men, women, and children taken at Rangiriri were held in inhumane conditions and without a trial (section 6.7.3). This was by no means an inevitable consequence of invasion, and the governor found great fault in his Ministers for it. We find that the circumstances of their imprisonment breached the principle of active protection and their article 3 rights to a fair trial. The governor did intervene and ensure the relocation of the prisoners from the hulk Marion to Kawau Island. We have no information as to the conditions in which they were held on Kawau. We agree with the Turanga Tribunal that, in such circumstances, the prisoners were entitled to escape from unlawful detention, which they duly did.<sup>967</sup>

Secondly, the governor and Ministers acted in a disproportionate and reprehensible manner by prolonging this unjust war unnecessarily. In sections 6.7.3, 6.7.4, and 6.7.9, we described the repeated efforts of the Māori leaders to negotiate with the Crown and to end the war. Were there sound military reasons for continuing the war after Ngāruawāhia was given up to the British army as the governor had

---

966. See, for example, doc A22, p 42; Grey to Pene Pukewhau (Te Wharepu) ‘and all the People of Waikato’, 16 December 1863, AJHR, 1864, E-2, p 4.

967. See Waitangi Tribunal, Turanga Tangata, Turanga Whenua, vol 1, p 194.

required? The governor and General Cameron thought not, although both still wanted to punish Ngāti Maniapoto. But the governor changed his mind, seemingly because of a petty squabble with Ministers (section 6.7.4). We find that the Crown's action in prolonging the war was a further Treaty breach and compounded the prejudice of its unjust invasion.

As discussed above, we accept that some settler non-combatants were killed during the raids against the British supply lines early in the war. We also accept that the property of some settlers was destroyed. In Te Rore, for example, two houses were destroyed, essentially to deny their use to the oncoming British forces (see section 6.7.5). We accept these points because, as the Crown has submitted, it is necessary to do so for a 'complete and balanced understanding of events.'<sup>968</sup> It does not excuse or mitigate the Crown's Treaty breaches.

6.8 THE INVOLVEMENT OF NGĀTI TŪWHARETOA IN THE WAIKATO WAR

A number of iwi came to support the Kingitanga when the Crown attacked it in the Waikato in 1863. Those who came included parties from Tūhoe, Tūwharetoa, Raukawa, and Ngāti Rangiwewehi.<sup>969</sup> Some of the iwi who participated have made claims in this inquiry. As we discussed earlier, Raukawa's claims have been settled. Ngāti Tūwharetoa, however, have advanced a claim in respect of the Waikato war:

Ngāti Tūwharetoa claims that the Crown breached the Treaty in waging an unjustified war against the Waikato, seeking actively to defeat by military force te tino rangatiratanga of te tangata whenua. The Crown's aggression amounted to an unjustified war not only against Waikato, but against those iwi such as Tūwharetoa who were obliged by cultural obligations and political commitments to come to the aid of their kin. Bound by their allegiances to the Kingitanga and to Tainui, Tūwharetoa taua went to the Waikato to defend the land, and suffered casualties as a result.<sup>970</sup>

In the Crown's view, its concessions only applied to those who fought in defence of their own homes and lands. The Tribunal asked the Crown to clarify whether the Crown's concessions applied to Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>971</sup> Crown counsel submitted:

The Tribunal has asked the Crown to advise the extent to which the concession it has made in this inquiry concerning war and raupatu covers Ngāti Tuwharetoa.

The Crown does not consider that its concession that Māori were justified in defending their lands applies, by extension, to those whose primary interests are outside the district. Specific breach and non-breach acknowledgements may be made for such groups depending on their level of involvement in the conflict and the nature of

---

968. Submission 3.4.16, p 8.

969. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 252.

970. Submission 3.4.281, p 26.

971. Transcript 4.1.23, pp 894-895.

their grievances arising therefrom. Such acknowledgements are made on a case-by-case basis where the Crown considers they are justified.<sup>972</sup>

The Crown did not make any such specific acknowledgement for Tūwharetoa in our inquiry.

6.8.1 Ngāti Tūwharetoa involvement in the Waikato war

Many Ngāti Tūwharetoa supported the establishment of the King and placed their lands under the King's protection while retaining their full autonomy.<sup>973</sup> Not all Tūwharetoa hapū supported the King, however, and there was some support for the Crown in the northern Taupō area.<sup>974</sup> The iwi did not participate in the Taranaki war of 1860–1861.<sup>975</sup> Paranapa Otimi described some initial reluctance to get involved in the Waikato war in 1863, partly ascribed to the advice of the local CMS missionary, TS Grace. There was 'dissension', he said, 'among Ngati Tuwharetoa over the lack of support to Waikato and the Kingitanga call to arms.'<sup>976</sup> Nonetheless, there were Tūwharetoa parties involved in the defence of Meremere and Rangiriri.<sup>977</sup> In October 1863, the Graces abandoned their mission station at Pukawa, and there were frequent reports of Taupō groups setting out to Waikato.<sup>978</sup>

In 1864 a large contingent of Tūwharetoa warriors was involved in the defence of the Kingitanga. Iwikau Te Heuheu had urged neutrality on his people but Horonuku Te Heuheu joined in the war because he 'would not stand by and watch the Crown impose injustices upon Waikato and Maniapoto with whom he had close affiliations.'<sup>979</sup> There was significant Tūwharetoa involvement and casualties at Ōrākau and to a lesser extent at Hairini, where one Tūwharetoa person was killed. Some Tūwharetoa were inside the pā at Ōrākau, while others under Horonuku Te Heuheu led an unsuccessful attempt to relieve the defenders. We do not have exact figures for those of Tūwharetoa who were killed at Ōrākau.<sup>980</sup> TS Grace noted in 1867 that many of his 'old friends' among Tūwharetoa had died there – indeed, he believed Tūwharetoa to have been 'the chief sufferers there', although we cannot confirm that point. There were also some Tūwharetoa present at Rangiaowhia (which they called Ohia).<sup>981</sup>

After the defeat and disastrous retreat at Ōrākau, the survivors of the Taupō contingent returned home, and began to prepare for the defence of Taupō if the Crown's invading force were to reach that far. As well as caring for their own people who had been wounded, they hosted a number of refugees. The latter

972. Submission 3.4.309, p 4.

973. Document J22, p [16]; Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 224–225.

974. Document A54 (Stirling), pp 51–53.

975. Submission 3.4.281, p 29.

976. Document R23, p 2).

977. Document R23, p 2; doc A22, p 48.

978. Document A54, pp 121–127.

979. Document J22, p [18].

980. Document R23, pp 4–9; doc A22, pp 110–111, 152, 181; doc A54, pp 127–130.

981. Grace, journal of Taupō journey, October 1867 (doc A54, p 130).

included some Ngāti Apakura. The King took refuge there for a time in 1864.<sup>982</sup> According to Paranapa Otimi's evidence, the refugees stayed with Tūwharetoa for more than 40 years.<sup>983</sup> The disruptions of war had caused food shortages in Taupō, and the arrival of refugees exacerbated this situation.<sup>984</sup>

In 1864, the Crown prepared a map showing the districts which 'supplied combatants on the rebel side to the War', and this map included all of western Taupō and a 'smaller pocket from Waihi around to Korohe, and from Te Rangitā to about Hatepe on the eastern shore'.<sup>985</sup>

6.8.2 Treaty analysis and findings

As noted above, the Crown submitted that Ngāti Tūwharetoa were not justified in fighting against the Crown in Waikato because they were not fighting in defence of their own lands and homes.<sup>986</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa argued that this was illogical because the Crown had already conceded that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were justified in fighting in defence of the Kīngitanga, irrespective of whether they had customary interests north of the Pūniu.<sup>987</sup> The Crown's closing submissions stated:

The Crown has previously acknowledged that its representatives and advisers acted unjustly and in breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles in its dealings with the Kīngitanga, which included iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae, in sending its forces across the Mangatawhiri in July 1863, and occupying and subsequently confiscating land in the Waikato region, and resulted in iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae being unfairly labelled as rebels.

The Crown advises that this concession will be addressed to iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae independently of any reference to the Kīngitanga if it is shown during the course of the inquiry that iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae have rights in the Waikato raupatu district that are distinct from Waikato Tainui.<sup>988</sup>

We agree with the claimants that the first part of this concession should logically apply to all iwi who 'subscribed to the Kīngitanga kaupapa' and who were obliged by their tikanga to 'come and fight in support through a combination of their kinship to Waikato and their allegiance to the Kīngitanga'.<sup>989</sup> We also agree with the conclusions of the Central North Island Tribunal, which the claimants asked us to adopt:

So the decision to fight in the Waikato was not just about tribal relationships, although these were always important. It was about support for a new institution 982. Document R23, pp 2–4, 10; doc A54, pp 130–132; doc A22, p 209.

983. Document R23, p 4.

984. Document A54, pp 105, 121, 132–133.

985. AJHR, 1864, E-9, p [5] (doc A54, pp 117–118).

986. Submission 3.4.309, p 4.

987. Submission 3.4.412, pp 7–8.

988. Submission 3.4.300, p 1.

989. Submission 3.4.412, p 7.

which was itself the embodiment and defence of their own mana or tino rangatira-tanga. Maori could see the dominoes falling in 1863, but fighting at Waikato was not really self-defence of the Tuwharetoa rohe at a distance. Nor was it a hostile initiative by the tribe. Tuwharetoa went to assist a defence against invasion by the Crown. They did so because they had an obligation to defend a shared commitment to a political initiative, to defend mana Maori motuhake. In other words, they went precisely because the Kingitanga was premised on kotahitanga – Waikato Tainui were the kai-tiaki of this taonga, but they took that role with the support of other hapu and iwi.

The idea that ‘self defence’ was legitimate, but that it did not apply outside one’s home tribal lands, may be too narrow to be appropriate in this context. Those tribes which went outside their own lands to fight a defensive war in support of the Kingitanga, were fighting for their kin, their King, and their own futures. The Kingitanga was their response to settler land-hunger and the one-sidedness of a kawa-natanga that was responsible only to the settlers. The Crown’s determination to inflict a massive defeat on the Kingitanga was an attack on them and their tino rangatira-tanga, just as surely as if it took place in their own rohe. Their political future was at stake, and they fought in defence of it, as well as of their relations.<sup>990</sup>

The Central North Island Tribunal did not make specific findings about whether Tūwharetoa were legally in ‘rebellion’ for going to fight in Waikato, stating that it did not need to determine the point.<sup>991</sup> We agree that it is not necessary to determine that question, nor did the Crown argue its case on legal grounds (that is, the law of rebellion and what constitutes rebellion in legal terms).

In Treaty terms, our view is that the Kingitanga embodied and protected the tino rangatiratanga of many tribes. An attack on the Kingitanga was an attack on those tribes. Ngāti Tūwharetoa were entitled to defend the Kingitanga against the Crown’s unjust attack. The Crown’s concession of Treaty breach applies to them in our view.

We have already found the Crown in breach of the Treaty for its unjust attack on the Kingitanga, and for labelling those who resisted its unjust attack as ‘rebels’. We repeat that finding here in respect of Ngāti Tūwharetoa for the reasons given above. Our findings about Ōrākau, Hairini, and Rangiriri also apply to Tūwharetoa, as does our finding that the Crown unnecessarily prolonged its unjust war (see section 6.7.12). As far as we are aware, from the evidence presented to us, no Tūwharetoa people were killed at Rangiaowhia.

The prejudice for Ngāti Tūwharetoa included the loss of life which they suffered, the hardships caused by the war (including injuries, food shortages, and the need to provide for refugees for a considerable period), and the damage done to their relationship with the Crown. This relationship was further harmed by related

---

990. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 254; submission 3.4.281, p 32.

991. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 253–254.

incidents in the later 1860s, as discussed in the Central North Island report (He Maunga Rongo).<sup>992</sup>

We turn next to consider the confiscation of land which followed the Waikato and Taranaki wars, and the impacts of that confiscation on Te Rohe Pōtae claimants.

6.9 CONFISCATION AND COMPENSATION

The Crown has conceded that its confiscations of land after the wars in Waikato and Taranaki ‘were wrongful and in breach of the Treaty of Waitangi and its principles’. The Crown specifically acknowledged:

- ▶ its confiscation of Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki in 1864; and
- ▶ ‘its dealings with the Kingitanga, which included iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae, in . . . occupying and subsequently confiscating land in the Waikato region’.

The Crown undertook to address the latter concession to Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū ‘independently of any reference to the Kingitanga if it is shown during the course of the inquiry that iwi and hapū of the Rohe Pōtae have rights in the Waikato raupatu district that are distinct from Waikato Tainui’. The Crown also acknowledged that inadequacies in the Compensation Court it established compounded the prejudice created by the raupatu. The Crown acknowledged that it imposed without consultation a process for investigating raupatu grievances.<sup>993</sup>

Crown counsel stated in closing submissions that Ngāti Maniapoto ‘had strong ties’ to the land north of the Pūniu River and acknowledged that ‘some property of Rohe Pōtae Māori was destroyed, taken or damaged’ once Crown forces reached southern Waikato.<sup>994</sup> However, the Crown has not extended its concession regarding the Waikato raupatu to Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū. In responses to specific claims the Crown argued against making any such concession, because, counsel said, those claims were settled by existing settlement legislation.<sup>995</sup> That was because the claimants, Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura, are named in the Waikato raupatu settlement legislation. In chapter 1, however, we determined that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to hear these claims on the basis of a non-Waikato affiliation. Both groups have close affiliations to Ngāti Maniapoto. As a matter of logic, the prejudice resulting from the occupation and confiscation of their lands must have prejudiced Ngāti Maniapoto also.

Two other groups, Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi, have also made raupatu claims. The Crown did not oppose Ngāti Kauwhata doing so, but did object to Ngāti Wehi Wehi. In chapter 1 we determined that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to hear both groups.

---

992. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 254–260. See also doc R23, pp 10–11; doc A54, pp 130–261.

993. Statement 1.3.1, pp 44–45, 49.

994. Submission 3.4.300, pp 8, 15.

995. Submission 3.4.300, p 2; submission 3.4.310(e), pp 31–37.

The Crown made no response to the evidence on the record of inquiry as to the extent of Ngāti Maniapoto land interests in Taranaki, other than to state that those interests ‘were away from Waitara, where the conflict arose’ and that war in Taranaki ‘never extended into the Rohe Pōtae itself’.<sup>996</sup>

It is therefore left to the Tribunal to conduct an assessment of these rights and interests in both confiscation districts. Despite the relatively broad nature of the Crown’s concessions, the way they were subsequently qualified in submissions means that this assessment needs to be carried out as a first step in our analysis.

The claimants raised several matters in relation to the confiscations. They said war and confiscation was in effect a single process intended not to ensure peace but ‘to ensure British control of New Zealand and gain land for settlement’. The Crown ‘failed to provide opportunities for Te Rohe Potae Māori to negotiate terms and retain their lands, or inquire into culpability, before implementing confiscation’. Confiscation was planned as a speculative operation. Much of the land taken for the Military Settlements block in upper Waikato, they said, was ‘not suitable for settlement’. Because this was the only purpose for which land could legally be taken, they said, it was ‘arguably’ confiscated contrary to the requirements of the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863.<sup>997</sup>

The compensation process, the claimants said, provided no real choice but to participate, or risk missing out altogether. The claimants identified a range of failures of process and policy. They argued that the Crown promised “‘loyal” and neutral’ Māori would be compensated by way of return of the full extent of the lands which they claimed’. This did not happen. Individuals, rather than iwi or hapū, ‘belatedly received scant reserves’. This, the claimants said, was a serious breach of the Treaty, ‘because it assisted in the breakdown of the Māori social structure’. The avenues made available by the Crown to Māori to raise grievances relating to the raupatu, specifically petitioning Parliament and the investigation by the Sim commission, were inadequate, the claimants said.<sup>998</sup>

The issues before us require more than simply an assessment of the prejudice suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū as a result of the confiscations in Taranaki and Waikato. Our analysis is grouped around three sets of questions:

- ▶ Why and how did the Crown confiscate Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū lands?
- ▶ How was the Compensation Court established and was that process adequate?
- ▶ Were the Crown’s efforts to return land to ‘rebels’ and investigate raupatu grievances adequate?

---

996. Submission 3.1.300, pp 7, 15.

997. Submission 3.4.127, pp 12, 30, 34; submission 3.4.130(e), pp 17–18.

998. Submission 3.4.127, pp 35–39.

6.9.1 What interests and manawhenua did Te Rohe Pōtae hapū and iwi hold in Taranaki in 1865?

6.9.1.1 What was the situation when war broke out?

Although the Crown has conceded it breached the Treaty by confiscating Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki, it is left to the Tribunal to assess the extent of those interests.

Written archival evidence about the extent of Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki at the time of the confiscation in 1865 is sparse. Earlier (see section 6.4.2), evidence was addressed about the nature and extent of the tribe's involvement in Taranaki in the two decades after 1840. There, we did so to answer the question of why Te Rohe Pōtae Māori went to fight in Taranaki in 1860. Relevant here are the following points.

By 1840, many of the former inhabitants of northern Taranaki had been either taken north by Waikato-Maniapoto taua or forced to retreat south to take refuge with Ngāti Toa and Ngāti Raukawa. Some Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira were involved in attempts to 'purchase' Taranaki lands by the New Zealand Company and by William White.

In 1842, Governor Hobson effectively recognised a Ngāti Maniapoto claim to rights in Taranaki that was separate from that of Waikato. Hobson paid Te Wherowhero for interests there, but he consented to Ngāti Maniapoto occupying land as far south as Urenui. Ngāti Maniapoto told Protector of Aborigines TS Forsaith when he visited Kāwhia in 1844 that the land as far as Urenui was theirs 'by right of conquest, and some part of it by possession.'<sup>999</sup> Later, Governor Browne accepted that Hobson had not 'obtained any formal cession of their rights from the Ngāti Maniapoto chiefs.'<sup>1000</sup>

Te Ātiawa, Ngāti Mutunga, and Ngāti Tama began to return to northern Taranaki during the 1840s. At first the returnees were mainly those who had been taken prisoner by Waikato-Maniapoto.<sup>1001</sup> The return of the southern exiles was endorsed by Te Wherowhero and Te Awaitaia, but Ngāti Maniapoto were less approving. A long and tense hui in 1848 at Pukearuhe, where Te Rangitake and Te Ātiawa were hosted by Takerei Waitara and other Ngāti Maniapoto, agreed to a boundary being established at Waikāramuramu.<sup>1002</sup>

In 1856, Mōkau rangatira Tikaokao, Ngatawa (Te Kaka), Tākerei, and Wetini heard that Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Mutunga at the Chatham Islands were offering to sell land to the north. They told Donald McLean: 'our boundary is at Waikāramuramu, for it is a Red Sea for us, and for ever and ever and ever.'<sup>1003</sup> This Red Sea analogy was repeated by Wetere Te Rerenga in 1882 when he gave 999. Forsaith to Fitzroy, 22 October 1844 (doc A23, p102); doc A147(b), p14.

1000. Browne to colonial secretary, 4 December 1860 (doc A147(b), p14).

1001. Document A28, pp 61–62.

1002. Document A28, p 62.

1003. Te Motutapu Te Karoa, Tikaokao, Ngatawa Te Kaka, Takerei, and Te Wetini, Mokau, to Governor and McLean, 26 December 1856 (doc A147(b), p 29).

evidence to the Native Land Court. He added: 'Our land extended to Paritutu [in New Plymouth], but we gave the land back as far as Waikaramuramu.'<sup>1004</sup>

After 1848 and until as late as August 1859, Ngāti Maniapoto continued to take an active interest in events in Taranaki, as far as the New Plymouth settlement itself. This interest extended to mediating in disputes among Taranaki Māori and was frequently welcomed by Crown officials.

Some Ngāti Maniapoto continued to live south of Waikāramuramu after 1848, often taking wives from the returning tribes (section 6.4.2). New Plymouth inspector of police, George Cooper, reported a somewhat mixed population north of Waikāramuramu in 1854. The coast between Parininihi and Mōkau, he recorded, was 'inhabited by a few Natives (numbering probably about 60) belonging chiefly to Ngatimaniapoto, but who are also so much mixed up with the Ngatiawa that it is difficult to assign to them any distinctive name.'<sup>1005</sup>

6.9.1.2 Was there an exclusive interest?

William Wetere, for the Wai 535 claimants, asked this Tribunal for a finding on 'Maniapoto's exclusive southern boundary'.<sup>1006</sup> We note Mr Wetere's observation that 'many of those from Mokau can equally make whakapapa claims to Ngati Tama and other Taranaki Iwi'.<sup>1007</sup> He was presumably referring to intermarriage between the tribes, but in addition customary tenure was seldom, if ever, as 'hard-edged' as European notions of land tenure, so that Māori 'boundaries' were more often zones with overlapping interests.

We did not hear from Ngāti Tama, nor from any of the groups who earlier took claims to the Taranaki Tribunal. (Nor did that Tribunal hear from Ngāti Maniapoto.) The matter of boundaries and exclusivity was raised in 1999 by the Wai 788 and Wai 800 claimants in the context of a proposed settlement between the Crown and Ngāti Tama. Mediation failed to resolve the differences between the parties, and this led to the Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims inquiry in 2001.<sup>1008</sup> By the time the hearing began, though, the Ngāti Tama settlement package had already been revised so as to withdraw four properties north of the confiscation line which the Crown had previously proposed to vest in Ngāti Tama. Also withdrawn were 'offers of nohoanga (camping entitlements), statutory acknowledgements, and deeds of recognition in respect of certain areas around the Mōkau River where Ngāti Tama's interests were considered to be insufficiently strong'. In addition (and significantly, from the point of view of the present discussion), the deed of settlement would no longer refer to the area south of the confiscation line as Ngāti Tama's 'exclusive area' but rather as its 'right of 1004. Evidence of Wetere Te Rerenga Takerei, 6 June 1882 (doc A28(a), vol 2, pp 433, 437). See also doc A28, p 19; doc A28(a), vol 2, p 427).

1005. G Cooper to colonial secretary, 24 April 1854 (doc A23, p 119).

1006. Document Q29(b) (Wetere), para 48.

1007. Document Q29(b), para 21.

1008. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2001).

Map 6.4: The northern boundary of the Taranaki confiscation first refusal area.<sup>1009</sup> The Cross-Claims Tribunal found that the Crown ‘would not breach the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi by concluding a settlement of Ngāti Tama’s Treaty claims on the basis of the revised settlement package.’<sup>1010</sup>

As to the 1865 confiscation line, the Crown acknowledged in that inquiry that it was an artificial boundary marker and did not align with iwi boundaries. Crown counsel nevertheless indicated that the Crown was still planning to use the line in a limited way in the settlement, for the sake of convenience. Counsel further added that the Crown considered Ngāti Maniapoto’s interests south of that line to be ‘very limited’ – despite not having heard in-depth evidence from Ngāti Maniapoto on the matter.<sup>1011</sup> The Cross-Claims Tribunal encouraged the Crown to avoid use of the confiscation line in the settlement if at all possible (and indeed any other hard-edged boundary). ‘Such lines’, it said, ‘are simplistic and bald, and bear no relation to tikanga’, adding that ‘[w]hile convenient, they will usually be wrong.’<sup>1012</sup> We agree.

1009. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report, p 7.

1010. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report, p 24.

1011. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report, p 8.

6.9.1.3 Conclusions on interests in Taranaki

When the wars began in Taranaki in 1860, the Crown knew Ngāti Maniapoto had asserted rights and authority as far south as Waikāramuramu. This accords with what the Ngāti Maniapoto Lands and Resources (Wai 535) claimants argued.<sup>1013</sup>

When they described Waikāramuramu as a Red Sea, Ngāti Maniapoto likened their position to the pharaoh who was drowned when he attempted to pursue Moses after allowing him to lead his people out of Egypt into Canaan. This statement, repeated in 1882, shows that Ngāti Maniapoto acknowledged they would not contest the right of Te Atiawa and others to reoccupy their former homes in Taranaki to the south of that boundary.

In our view, before the Taranaki war the Crown implicitly acknowledged what Mr Stirling calls ‘less well-defined’ Ngāti Maniapoto interests reaching as far south as New Plymouth.<sup>1014</sup> We do not wish to overstate this point. We acknowledge that the overall situation was both more complex and more fluid than the idea of a Red Sea can encompass. The return of Ngāti Mutunga and Ngāti Tama in more significant numbers later in the 1860s added a further layer of complexity.

The evidence reviewed above (section 6.4.2) suggests that the main considerations for Ngāti Maniapoto in Taranaki at that time were to allow the former inhabitants to resume occupation in accordance with tikanga and in a way that acknowledged Ngāti Maniapoto mana, and to keep the peace so as not to deter European settlement. Crown officials appear to have condoned this exercise of Ngāti Maniapoto interests and tikanga.

Also relevant is that, when the Compensation Court (discussed below at section 6.9.5) sat in 1866 to hear claims about the confiscated lands in Taranaki, it regarded ‘Waikato’ (in its widest sense) as having been in control at both Oākura (west of New Plymouth) and at Waitara in 1840.<sup>1015</sup> By then, however, the Crown considered ‘Waikato’ and Ngāti Maniapoto to be rebels who had forfeited their rights. One important reason Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki remained poorly defined is that they were never formally investigated by the Crown.

6.9.2 What interests and manawhenua did Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū hold in Waikato?

The Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura claimants provided the clearest accounts of the interests that were taken from them in the confiscation.

---

1012. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngāti Maniapoto/Ngāti Tama Settlement Cross-Claims Report, p 17.

1013. Document Q29(b), para 27.

1014. Document A147(b), p 10.

1015. ‘Papers relating to sitting of Compensation Court at New Plymouth’, AJHR, 1866, A-13, pp 3, 16.

6.9.2.1 Ngāti Paretekawa

The primary assertion of Ngāti Maniapoto mana north of the Pūniu was made by Harold Maniapoto. He stated that his tupuna Peehi Tūkōrehu wrested control of the area from his Ngāti Raukawa kin. Tūkōrehu lived at Mangatoatoa pā on the Pūniu River until his death in about 1835.<sup>1016</sup> Mr Maniapoto claimed Tūkōrehu and his immediate descendants had 'exclusive' authority over the lands between the Pūniu River and the Mangapiko and Mangaōhoi (also known as Mangahoe) Streams. This Ngāti Paretekawa territory, he said, encompassed the settlements at Ōtāwhao, Moeāwhā, Kihikihi, and Ōrākau. The mana of Tūkōrehu, he said, extended 'over all the people of the area 'surrounding the Mangatoatoa Pā extending from Kakepuku to Wharepūhanga, Wharepapa to Nukuhau on the banks of the Waikato river, to the Waipa river, Kakepuku, and [Te K]awa'. Mr Maniapoto said Ngāti Paretekawa today claim the region north of the Mangapiko to 'just below Whatawhata' and Nukuhau as 'an area of interest of Ngāti Maniapoto, along with a whole heap of others too'.<sup>1017</sup>

One section of Ngāti Paretekawa migrated from Whakapirimata pā, which lay between Kihikihi and the Pūniu River, south to Napinapi in the upper Mōkau valley. But this was not a permanent move. Rewi Maniapoto was a descendant of this section, but later he regarded Kihikihi and Ōtāwhao/Te Awamutu as his home.<sup>1018</sup>

Mr Maniapoto stated that between 50,000 and 55,000 acres immediately north of the Pūniu River belonged to Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu-Rangiwaero. All of it was confiscated by the Crown.<sup>1019</sup>

Mr Maniapoto acknowledged that other hapū also asserted interests in this area. He said some Waikato tribes were invited to live at Ōtāwhao by Tūkōrehu.<sup>1020</sup> He stressed that Ngāti Paretekawa's grievances were with the Crown.<sup>1021</sup> It is important to record that no evidence was provided to this inquiry on behalf of Waikato, or from any hapū on the basis of their Waikato affiliations. We did note in chapter 3, however, three Ōtāwhao rangatira who signed the Treaty as Ngāti Ruru.<sup>1022</sup> In the Native Land Court, Rewi Maniapoto referred to Ngāti Ruru as a Waikato hapū who lived at Ōtāwhao. They were invited there, as were other hapū, by Tūkōrehu, following the marriage of his daughters to Te Wherowhero. This was for mutual protection against Ngāpuhi, but Ngāti Ruru subsequently returned

---

1016. Document A110, pp 226–228; transcript 4.1.1, p 337 (Maniapoto, hearing week 4, 9 April 2013, Mangakotukutuku campus).

1017. Document K16 (Maniapoto), p 6; transcript 4.1.1, pp 684–685 (Maniapoto, hearing week 4, 9 April 2013, Mangakotukutuku campus).

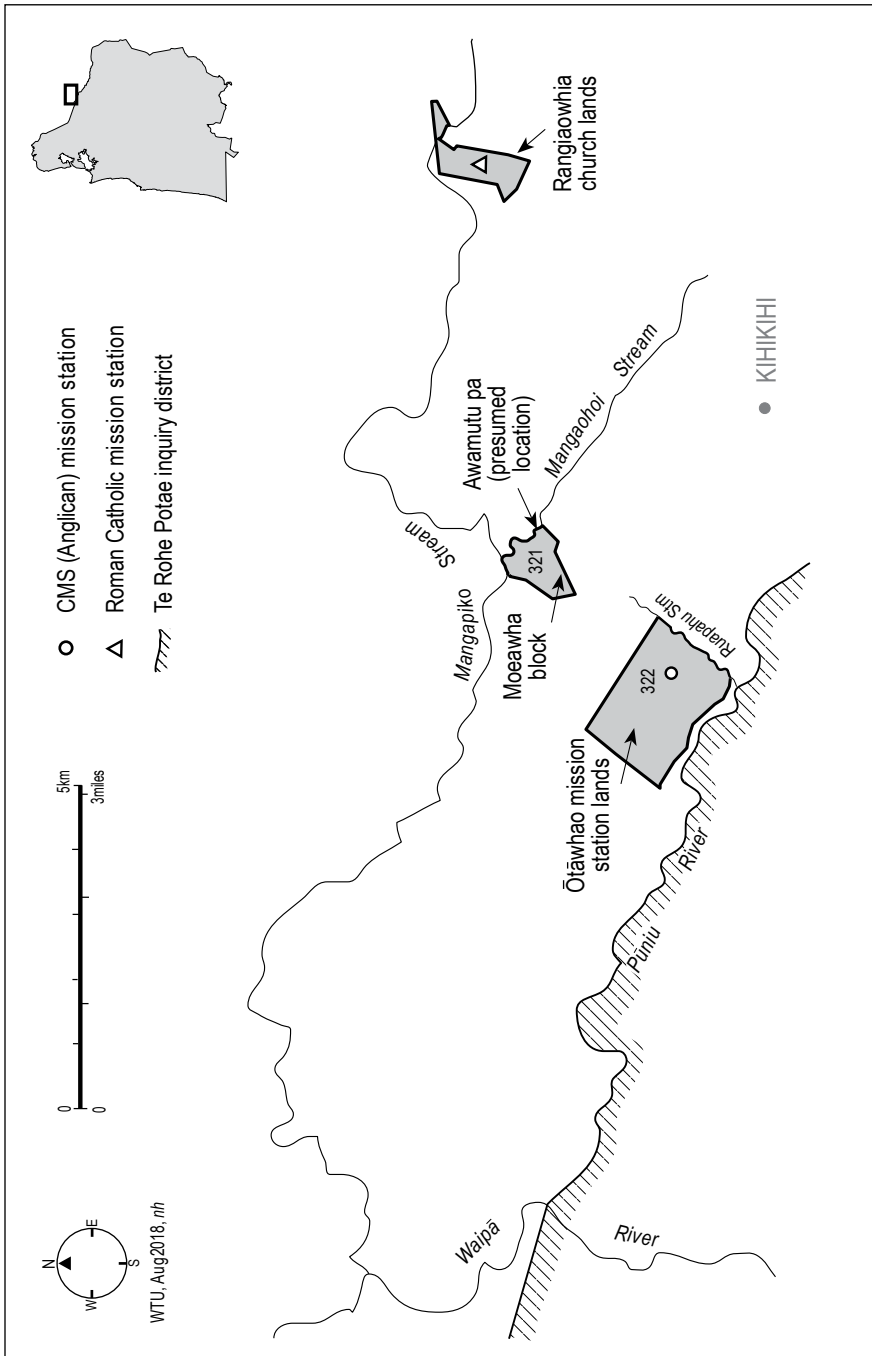

1018. Document B6 (Roa), pp 3–6; submission 3.4.189, p 13.

1019. Document K35, pp 38–39.

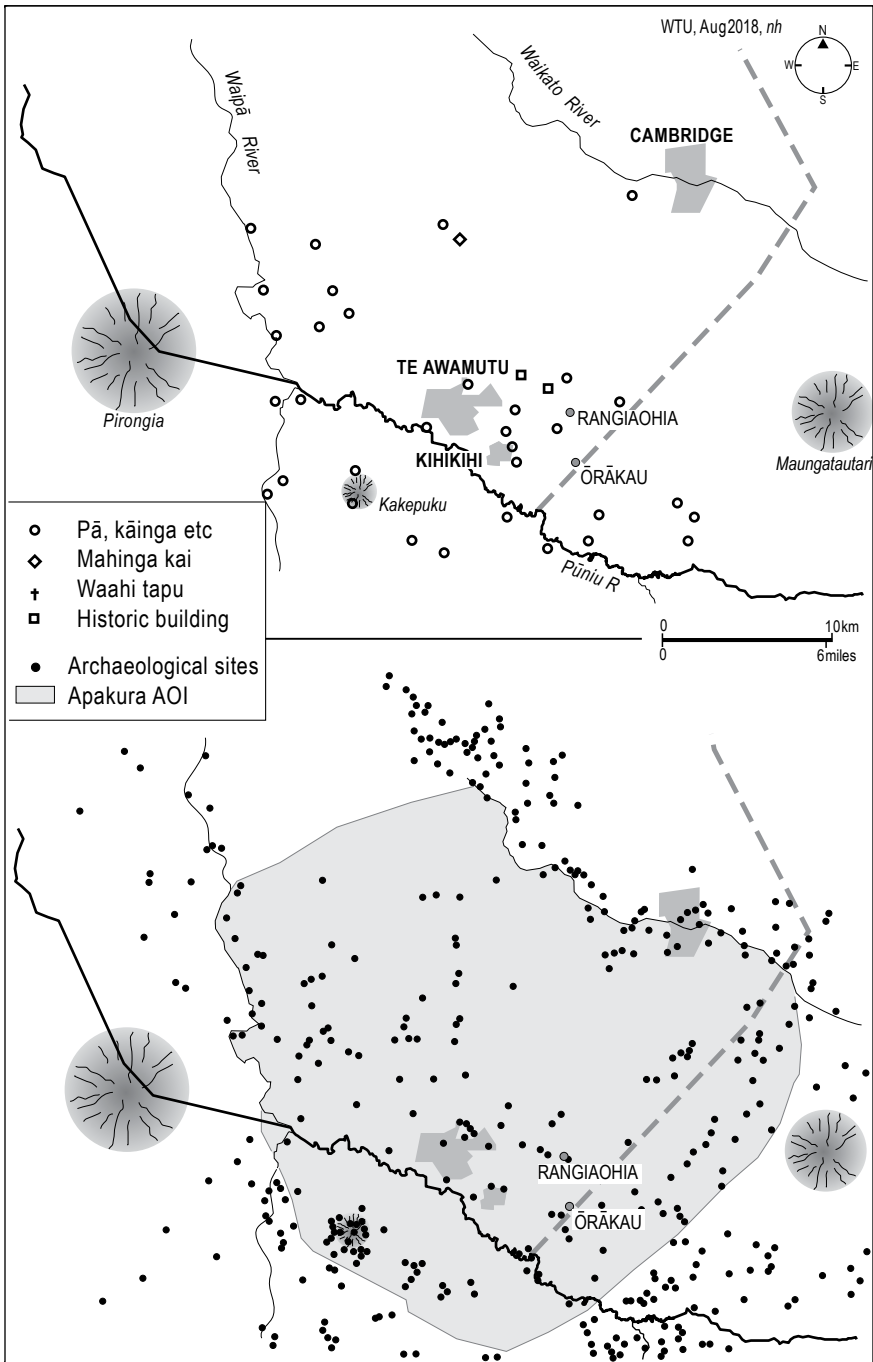

1020. Document K35, p 6.

1021. Document K35, p 45.

1022. Document A110, p 469; doc A23, p 70; doc A97, p 146.

Map 6.6: Approximate areas of interest claimed by Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura within the Waikato Raupatu District (submission 3.1.159)

Map 6.7: Ngāti Apakura claimed area of interest (doc P11, map 4) to their homelands further north.<sup>1023</sup> Sources in this inquiry variously described Ngāti Ruru as a hapū of Ngāti Kauwhata, Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Hauā, and Ngāti Korokī.<sup>1024</sup>

6.9.2.2 Ngāti Apakura

In their Ngāti Apakura history report, Moepātu Borell and Robert Joseph concluded that traditional Ngāti Apakura territories encompassed 'spheres of interest around Te Awamutu, Kaipaka, Hairini, Rangiaowhia, Puhue, Ōhaupo, Tuhikaramea, Ngahinapouri, Pirongia, and Kāwhia'.<sup>1025</sup> Of particular note were Ngāroto in the north, the Waipā in the west, and the northern and eastern outskirts of modern-day Te Awamutu in the south. Key Ngāti Apakura pā included Taurangamirumiru at Ngāroto, and Rangiaowhia to the east of Te Awamutu.<sup>1026</sup> However, the authors of the Ngāti Apakura history report were reluctant to make statements of exclusivity regarding rights to land. They emphasised that 'Māori concepts of property were fluid, practical and were more about respectful relationships between groups rather than keeping people out'. They suggested that parts of the Ngāti Apakura rohe, especially around Te Awamutu, formed debated lands, although by no means were they a no man's land.<sup>1027</sup>

There does not appear to be any attempt at specific calculation of the area confiscated from Ngāti Apakura. One estimate was that Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura together had 120,000 acres of their lands taken.<sup>1028</sup>

6.9.2.3 Other hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto

Claimants speaking for a number of other Ngāti Maniapoto hapū stated they had interests in the Waikato that were taken in the Crown's confiscation.

Fred Herbert said Ngāti Ngutu held extensive interests north of the Pūniu River, but 'because of the raupatu and our forced expulsion from our lands in the Waikato region, our knowledge of Ngutu's lands in this area has been dimmed. This is one of the effects of the raupatu I suppose.' Mr Herbert stated he had interests through his tupuna Ngutu in a large number of land blocks in the northern part of the Te Rohe Pōtae district, from Kāwhia and Aotea across to Wharepūhunga. He said his tupuna Whaita established a fighting pā at Whakapirimata, 'next to the Puniu River, at the end of St Legers Rd, just south of Te Awamutu. There is a reserve now where Whakapirimata once stood.' Ngutu himself had a pā at Ōtāwhao 'where the township of Te Awamutu now stands.' Ngāti Ngutu are named in the 1023. Document A110, pp 227–228; also see doc K35, p 5; transcript 4.1.10, p 346.

1024. Document K22(f) (Lennox), p 1; doc A120, pp 34, 38–40, 56, 166, 212; doc K1 (Tait), pp 20, 29; doc A124 (Young and Belgrave), pp 21–22; doc K16, pp 12–14, 25. Also see Angela Ballara, Iwi: The Dynamics of Māori Tribal Organisation from c 1769 to c 1945 (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 1998), p 148.

1025. Document A97, p 119.

1026. Document A97, pp 36, 98–102; doc A98, pp 103–104.

1027. Document A97, pp 92–94.

1028. Document K35, p 38.

Waikato settlements, however Mr Herbert stated his iwi affiliation was to Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>1029</sup>

The Te Ruki whānau stated that Ngāti Unu, Ngāti Kahu, and Ngāti Ngawaero had 'significant interests north of the Pūniu'.<sup>1030</sup> While little evidence was produced about these interests, the claimants urged the Tribunal 'to be mindful that their interests once extended into that region, however, when these lands were confiscated, their freedom of movement was constricted, and in the passage of time, their knowledge of those taonga beyond the Aukati line was also taken'.<sup>1031</sup>

Similarly, the Tūhoro whānau, whose primary hapū affiliations are to Ngāti Urunumia and Ngāti Apakura, no longer have knowledge of their land interests north of the Pūniu. Bruce Stirling, in his report for the whānau, noted a petition dated June 1912 signed by 37 people including Putuputu Tuhoro. It mentioned four pā north of the Pūniu, Mangateatea, Ōtāwhao, Tupapakunui, and Whakapirimata, and said that, after the fighting, those Pūniu lands had been taken.<sup>1032</sup>

As discussed above (section 6.7.5), the Ngāti Te Kanawa and Ngāti Pēhi claimants said they had interests at Te Rore that were lost when Crown troops set up camp there.<sup>1033</sup>

Ngāti Huiāo said they had 'kainga, pa, and wahi tapu in areas around Meremere and Kihikihi'. When the Crown forces invaded they 'voluntarily made a peace pact with local missionaries' and handed over all their firearms. This did not prevent their settlements from being attacked, however, and – unable to defend themselves – they fled south to seek refuge with their Ngāti Kinohaku whanaunga at Ōwhiro. The lands they had left were subsequently confiscated.<sup>1034</sup>

Robert Koroheke noted close ties between Ngāti Huiāo, Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Ngutu, and Ngāti Paretekawa, and went on to say: 'it is not straight forward to identify hapu interests in land as we are all so closely related'.<sup>1035</sup>

Morehu McDonald said that his tupuna Ingoa, together with his tuakana Te Kanawa, asserted Ngāti Maniapoto mana over Ngāroto in the course of supporting Ngāti Apakura in a dispute there.<sup>1036</sup> He went on to argue that, through the alliance that developed between Waikato and Maniapoto during the early decades of the nineteenth century, 'the very whenua that we are talking about, Ngāroto, Ohaupo, Te Awamutu, Kihikihi, Ōrākau was . . . where the conception and the inception of the Kīngitanga actually originated out of in that area'.<sup>1037</sup>

1029. Document A7 (Herbert), pp 2–6.

1030. Document P24 (Te Ruki whānau), p 3.

1031. Submission 3.4.251, p 2.

1032. Document A144, pp 2, 7, 152–153; doc A63(a), pt1, pp 873–877.

1033. Claim 1.2.81, paras 10–11; doc S50(c), paras 38–43.

1034. Claim 1.2.126, p 7.

1035. Document S36 (Koroheke), p 6.

1036. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 52–54.

1037. Transcript 4.1.1, p 209.

6.9.2.4 Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi

Kauwhata was a descendant of the Tainui ancestor Whatihua. He was born in Kāwhia but later moved to the western side of Maungatautari and established himself with his people at Puhue, west of Ōrākau across the Mangaohoi Stream. The Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi claimants said Rangiaowhia marked the eastern extent of their traditional rohe at the time of the Crown invasion in 1864.<sup>1038</sup> Claimant historian Peter McBurney supported this assertion, but he acknowledged that: ‘Intermarriage between hapū created complex genealogical networks that overlaid the land.’<sup>1039</sup> He concluded Ngāti Kauwhata came to share ‘close whanaungatanga with Ngāti Raukawa and Ngāti Hauā for many generations, often cohabiting in the same pā and kāinga.’<sup>1040</sup> Mr McBurney described Ngāti Wehi Wehi as a hapū of Ngāti Kauwhata. Wehi Wehi was a son of Kauwhata.<sup>1041</sup>

The claimants identified the Moanatuatua and Rotoorangi swamps, lying between Rangiaowhia and Ōhaupō in the west and Puhue and Pukekura in the east, as significant food resources that were confiscated.<sup>1042</sup> Mr McBurney recorded that these swamps were prized for their tuna. They were a source of conflict between Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Kauwhata, which was eventually resolved by marriage between Māui of Apakura and Urumakawe of Kauwhata.<sup>1043</sup>

Many Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi moved south to the Kapiti district in a series of migrations that began about 1824. They maintained that they were not forced out of Waikato and did not relinquish their interests there, that some remained in Waikato and continued to move between their northern and southern homelands, and that their assertion of interests in Waikato continues to the present day and is acknowledged by other Waikato iwi and hapū.<sup>1044</sup>

6.9.2.5 Conclusions on interests in the Waikato raupatu district

The evidence reviewed here supports the conclusion drawn in chapter 2 of this report that the Pūniu River region, especially around Kakepuku, Mangatoatoa, Ōtāwhao, Kihikihi, and Rangiaowhia, was historically a sought-after area of considerable strategic and economic value. As a consequence, the region saw much tribal movement and conflict. Claimant counsel described Mangatoatoa as ‘a bustling interface’, and it is a description that well suits the wider area.<sup>1045</sup>

It is clear that, when Crown troops attacked the district, Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura were the predominant groups in the areas those claimants have identified. We make no conclusion on whether any group had an exclusive interest. We note the evidence of Mr Maniapoto that Tūkōrehu sought to control 1038. Submission 3.4.154(a), p 8; doc K1, pp 12–17.

---

1039. Document A120, pp 28–29, 43–49; doc A120(c) (McBurney), p 4.

1040. Document A120(c), p 6; see also doc A120, pp 28, 159.

1041. Document A120, p 30.

1042. Submission 3.4.134, pp 18–19, 67.

1043. Document A120, pp 65–68.

1044. Submission 3.4.134, pp 7–12; submission 3.4.147, pp 12–15; submission 3.4.154(a), pp 10–14; doc K1, p 24.

1045. Submission 3.4.198, p 6.

the passage of people and goods across the Pūniu River, especially where conflict or open warfare were likely (chapter 2). This is indicative of his mana in the district. After the death of Tūkōrehu in the mid-1830s, it is not clear to what extent Ngāti Paretekawa were able to maintain the authority their tupuna had wielded. However, the discussion of the expulsion of Gorst from Te Awamutu (section 6.6) provides evidence that by the 1860s Ngāti Maniapoto, through Rewi Maniapoto and Ngāti Paretekawa, were playing a determining, albeit far from uncontested, role in the district.

Other Ngāti Maniapoto hapū also asserted interests to the north of the Pūniu. Their evidence was not as specific. However, their interests in the north of Te Rohe Pōtae are clear and acknowledged and it is implausible that the arbitrary line of confiscation circumscribed or reflected a definition of their customary rights.

The evidence available does not support a conclusion that Ngāti Wehi Wehi had interests at Rangiaowhia. Mr McBurney's report suggested that Ngāti Wehi Wehi interests in Waikato were at Maungatautari and places further east such as Ukaipo marae 'at the foot of the Kaimai'.<sup>1046</sup>

The position of Ngāti Kauwhata is less clear. A great deal of evidence was submitted on the efforts of Ngāti Kauwhata to have their Waikato interests acknowledged by the Crown following the raupatu. Much of this evidence, however, related to the Pukekura, Puahue, Ngamoko 2, and Maungatautari blocks, which lie east of the Military Settlements block. The blocks were excluded from this inquiry except 'to the extent that their title and alienation history' related to blocks which were included. Judge Ambler directed that 'Ngāti Kauwhata Raupatu claims in relation to Rangiaowhia only are to be included'.<sup>1047</sup>

There is some evidence of Ngāti Kauwhata being at Rangiaowhia at the time of the raupatu. In statements made to the 1881 Ngāti Kauwhata claims commission, which was established after the Crown admitted they had been unfairly excluded from consideration by the Native Land Court in Waikato, Hoeta Te Kahuhui stated that 20 Ngāti Kauwhata returned from Kapiti in the 1850s at the invitation of two Ngāti Koura rangatira, Porokoru and Haunui. Hoeta named 'Teretiu, Pukarahi, my uncle, and their wives, children and grandchildren' and said they settled first at Rangiaowhia and then at Te Whānake. They fled from the invasion to Taupō, where they all died save three who returned to Kapiti.<sup>1048</sup>

Rewi Maniapoto told the commission that, although Ngāti Kauwhata had been invited back from Kapiti, 'Hoani Te Waru and Hone Papita did not consent'.<sup>1049</sup> Hoani Papita was also known as Kahawai Pungarehu and he signed the Treaty on behalf of Ngāti Apakura. His principal pā was Ngāhuruhuru at Rangiaowhia. Hori Te Waru also signed the Treaty, and arranged for the construction of the first flour mill at Rangiaowhia for Ngāti Apakura.<sup>1050</sup>

1046. Document A120, pp 30–34, especially page 33.

1047. Memorandum 2.5.24, pp 3–4.

1048. 'Report of the Ngati Kauwhata Claims Commission', AJHR, 1881, G-2A, pp 19–20; doc A120, p 210.

1049. 'Report of the Ngati Kauwhata Claims Commission', AJHR, 1881, G-2A, p 33; doc A120, p 224.

1050. Document A97, pp 52, 54, 147–148.

The evidence does not, in our view, support a conclusion that Ngāti Kauwhata maintained interests at Rangiaowhia. However, the evidence does indicate that Ngāti Kauwhata maintained some interests in Waikato to the east of Rangiaowhia and that this would have included the Moanatuatua and Rotoorangī swamps.

6.9.3 Why and by what process did the Crown confiscate Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū lands?

6.9.3.1 Why did the Crown decide on confiscation?

The claimants argued that confiscation was an essential component of a plan 'to ensure British control of New Zealand and acquire land for settlement' and 'based ultimately on [the Crown's] desire to secure clear title'. Counsel also submitted that the Crown saw confiscation as an opportunity for land speculation.<sup>1051</sup>

In closing submissions Crown counsel said that in 'broad terms . . . the Crown was attempting to exert its authority' when it invaded Waikato in 1863. Counsel went on to quote from Governor Grey's July 1863 proclamation:

Those who wage war against Her Majesty, or remain in arms, threatening the lives of Her peaceable subjects, must take the consequences of their acts, and they must understand that they will forfeit the right to the possession of their lands guaranteed to them by the Treaty of Waitangi, which lands will be occupied by a population capable of protecting for the future the quiet and unoffending from the violence with which they are now so constantly threatened.<sup>1052</sup>

As the Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal pointed out, confiscating land in response to rebellion had a long history in Britain. These confiscations were sometimes accompanied by military settlement. In Ireland, for example, Irish Catholic lands were confiscated and given to Protestant soldiers. Confiscation also occurred in Scotland and in other British colonies in various parts of the world.<sup>1053</sup>

The Crown did not initially try to confiscate land from Māori after the northern Taranaki war ended in March 1861. It is unnecessary to look for reasons beyond the facts that the war ground to a stalemate and was ended by negotiation. But according to Harriet Browne, wife of Governor Browne, the question of whether to confiscate land from Māori was already being considered. She succinctly set out arguments for and against:

For demanding land is 1st the necessity of punishing rebellion. 2nd compensating ruined settlers. Against it is 1st the belief among the Natives that the object of the Government is to seize their lands which fills them with distrust & 2nd the imputation

---

1051. Submission 3.4.127, p 30, 35; submission 3.4.130(e), pp 17–18.

1052. Grey to Chiefs of Waikato, 11 July 1863, 'Papers relating to Military Settlements in the Northern Island of New Zealand', AJHR, 1863, E-5, p 6 (submission 3.4.300, p 7).

1053. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu o Tauranga Moana, pp 153–154.

which is cast in England on the motives of the settlers in desiring a war by which they would acquire land.<sup>1054</sup>

Dr O'Malley considered that confiscation was implicit in Governor Browne's May 1861 demand for unconditional submission to the Queen. On that occasion, at Ngāruawāhia, Browne told Māori that if they set aside the authority of the Queen and the law, the land would remain theirs 'so long only as they are strong enough to keep it: – might and not right will become their sole Title to possession.'<sup>1055</sup> The governor's statement was clearly a threat that if Māori did not submit the Crown would have no compunction in taking their land.

Meanwhile, colonial officials grappled with the legal justification for confiscation. Attorney-General Henry Sewell argued that land could be taken by executive decision, while Crown law official FD Fenton said legislation would be required to sanction confiscation.<sup>1056</sup>

The first concrete proposal for land confiscation related to land in Taranaki and was developed in a memorandum from Premier Alfred Domett to Governor Grey dated 5 May 1863 (the day after the Oākura ambush).<sup>1057</sup> Domett 'confirmed the agreement reached between ministers and the governor the previous evening for lands at Taranaki between Omata and Tataraimaka belonging to those implicated in the Oākura ambush to be "forfeited to Her Majesty, and a Military Settlement formed there".'<sup>1058</sup> This policy of establishing military settlements to expand the area under Crown control became the underlying principle behind confiscation in both Taranaki and Waikato. As The Taranaki Report explained:

the settlers were to remain behind a protecting ring of redoubts, which the army gradually extended. As the line of fortresses expanded, military settlers were introduced to fill the land behind them. By this means, the frontier was pushed beyond the lands claimed by purchase, to effect a creeping confiscation of Maori land. . . . In support came a series of proclamations, laws, and regulations to make the process legal and to put Maori in rebellion at law, irrespective of the position in fact.<sup>1059</sup>

In June 1863, as the governor and ministers were making the final decision to invade the Waikato, Native Minister Francis Dillon Bell stated that the Government's intention with respect to any land taken by the advancing troops was to 'fill it up with military settlers, & perpetually advance our frontier.'<sup>1060</sup> Domett further developed his Government's policy of confiscation, arguing that a conclusive end to the war would require 'the introduction of an armed popula-

---

1054. Harriet Browne, diary, 24 March 1861 (doc A22, pp 256–257).

1055. 'Copy of a Declaration by the Governor to the Natives assembled at Ngāruawāhia', 21 May 1861 (doc A22, p 257).

1056. Document A22, pp 256–265.

1057. Document A22, p 265.

1058. Document A22, p 265.

1059. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 91–92.

1060. Bell to Mantell, 7 July 1863 (doc A22, p 268).

tion, to be located on the land taken from the enemy' and that the 'rebellion of the Waikato tribes places within the power of the Government the locality required'.<sup>1061</sup>

In August 1863, Governor Grey set out the twin aims of his policy in a memorandum to the Duke of Newcastle: these were to ensure the permanent security of the country and to deter Māori from murdering Europeans and destroying their settlements. Grey could 'devise no other plan by which both of those ends can be obtained' than to take the lands of the Waikato tribes supposed to have committed such 'outrages' and then settle large numbers of Europeans on them who would be strong enough to defend themselves and guarantee the 'entire command' of the province.<sup>1062</sup>

Grey wrote to Newcastle that raupatu in Waikato would convince the badly disposed Natives that it is hopeless to attempt either to drive the Europeans from the country, or to place them throughout a great part of its extent under the rule and laws of a king of the Native race, elected by the Maori population, who would soon turn his arms against his brother chiefs, and render the Northern Island from end to end one large scene of murderous warfare . . .<sup>1063</sup>

Also in August 1863, notices were gazetted detailing the conditions upon which 'land in the Waikato country' would be granted to various categories of settler, these being volunteer militia men, military and naval settlers, and general settlers willing to perform military service.<sup>1064</sup> Native Minister Bell had sailed for Melbourne, accompanied by Waikato Civil Commissioner John Gorst, seeking to attract up to 5,000 men who could guard the planned frontier. Bell hoped to 'gradually pour in an armed population to the settlements of the North Island'.<sup>1065</sup> The Daily Southern Cross reported Bell telling the volunteers about to embark in Melbourne that they would have to hold by force of arms 'land we have long tried to obtain by peaceable means'.<sup>1066</sup>

A memorandum drafted by Premier Alfred Domett in early October made clear that by then there had been detailed consideration of how the whole plan for military settlement would work, and it was predicated on land confiscation.<sup>1067</sup>

Claimant counsel placed some emphasis on this memorandum, which went in considerable detail into the financial underpinnings of a settlement scheme founded upon confiscated lands. We are not convinced, however, by the claimants' argument that, in effect, the Crown saw raupatu as an opportunity for land 1061. Document A22, pp 271–273; Domett memorandum, 31 July 1863, 'Papers relating to Military Settlements in the Northern Island of New Zealand', AJHR, 1863, A-8, p.2.

1062. Grey to Newcastle, 29 August 1863, 'Papers relating to Military Settlements in the Northern Island of New Zealand', AJHR, 1863, A-8, p.1.

1063. Grey to Newcastle, 29 August 1863, 'Papers relating to Military Settlements in the Northern Island of New Zealand', AJHR, 1863, A-8, p.1.

1064. 'Volunteer Militia Settlers', 5 August 1863, New Zealand Gazette, no 35, pp 303–306.

1065. Bell to Mantell, 26 July 1863 (doc A22, pp 363–365).

1066. Daily Southern Cross, 19 September 1863 (doc A22, pp 362–365).

1067. Domett, memorandum, 5 October 1863, AJHR, 1863, A-8A, p.2.

speculation. The sums of money required to pay for the war were, in colonial terms, unprecedented and it would have been reckless for the Crown not to have carefully considered the financial risk it faced. Moreover, while Domett wrote that raising a large loan to pay for the war was likely to be ‘not only prudent, but profitable’, he went on to assert that ‘were it neither one nor the other, financially speaking, it is an absolute necessity, unless some other plan can be devised for confronting and crushing the Maori difficulty.’<sup>1068</sup> In other words, the premier was set on war whatever the cost. The evidence does not support the claim that the Crown’s financial gain was a determinant of its war and confiscation policy.

This is not to rule out the likelihood that Ministers and others involved in the machinery of the settler government took advantage of opportunities for personal enrichment. Although the scheme of military settlement appeared to fulfill Bell’s desire to ‘pour in an armed population’, lack of capital, lack of support, distance from markets, the variable quality of the land, and reluctance to leave the perceived safety of the townships for an isolated life on the ‘frontier’ all contributed to the failure of the scheme – not to mention the fact that many of those who had signed up were neither prepared for nor suited to the drudgery of settlement.<sup>1069</sup>

Dr O’Malley discussed evidence that by 1867 nearly half the 50-acre farm lots in Waikato had been sold, for as little as £10 to £15.<sup>1070</sup> In the early 1870s, one visitor wrote that between Alexandra and Ngāruawāhia: ‘There are to be found thousands of acres, formerly supporting a large native population and producing corn in abundance, which have once more returned to a wild state.’<sup>1071</sup> A map of the Military Settlements block from 1871 shows that ‘Thos Russell’ was prominent among the early purchasers. Thomas Russell was Minister of Defence in the Fox–Whitaker Government.<sup>1072</sup> By 1880, Dr O’Malley said, the average price of a 50-acre farm lot was £300.<sup>1073</sup>

The evidence does support the claimants’ argument that confiscation was an essential component of a plan ‘to ensure British control of New Zealand and acquire land for settlement.’<sup>1074</sup> Grey’s August 1863 memorandum to Newcastle amounted to an explicit rejection of the possibility that Māori might continue to live on their own lands under the rules and laws of the Kīngitanga. Under Domett’s plan, settlements ‘would reach as far as Rangiawhia, and the upper parts of the great Waikato basin.’<sup>1075</sup> This shows that, from an early stage of the invasion, the confiscation of Te Rohe Pōtae lands formed a key part of the colonial government’s plans.

---

1068. Domett, memorandum, 5 October 1863, AJHR, 1863, A-8A, p 11 (submission 3.4.130(e), pp 17–18).

1069. Document A22, pp 445–451.

1070. Document A22, p 447.

1071. JH A St John, Pakeha Rambles through Maori Lands (doc A22, p 450).

1072. Document A30(g)(1), pp [21, 37].

1073. Document A22, p 448.

1074. Submission 3.4.127, p 30.

1075. Domett, memorandum, 5 October 1863, AJHR, 1863, A-8A, p 2.

Despite the Crown's important concessions that the confiscations were wrongful and in breach of the Treaty, by quoting Grey's July proclamation in closings the Crown explicitly linked confiscation with the supposed threats of violence made by Māori. We have already concluded (section 6.6.5) that these allegations were unfounded and that it was wrong for the Crown to attribute, even in part, the responsibility for the war to Māori. We think it is important to be very clear that the same applies here: in no way can responsibility for the confiscations be attributed to Kīngitanga Māori generally or to Rewi Maniapoto in particular.

We turn now to examine the establishment of the processes by which the confiscations were effected.

6.9.3.2 How was the confiscation scheme established?

The Taranaki and Waikato raupatu were carried out when New Zealand was in a state of transition with respect to policy decisions about matters affecting Māori. Up to 1862, responsibility for native affairs had rested with the governor, as the British Crown's representative. Between then and 1865, when full responsibility for such matters passed to the New Zealand settler government, there was a period of transition. During that time, the settler assembly nominally decided 'the direction of Native policy and the management of Native affairs', as Governor Grey described it, but the assent of the governor was still required.<sup>1076</sup>

When Parliament convened in October 1863, the governor and his Ministers were agreed on the desirability of large-scale land confiscation and military settlement in Taranaki and Waikato. We have seen that plans were already well advanced and formed an integral part of the overall war strategy.<sup>1077</sup>

The resignation of Domett's ministry on 30 October did not affect plans for the scheme, which continued under the new government led by Frederick Whitaker.<sup>1078</sup> Reader Wood, the new colonial treasurer, noted with satisfaction that the population of New Zealand had increased by nearly 60 per cent over the past two years, and he indicated that new settlement would henceforth be directed to particular locations, with a view to swinging the balance against the 'rebel Natives' living there:

We propose to commence a system of immigration, a system of colonization by which a population will occupy the waste lands of the rebel districts, and prevent the possibility at any future time of these Natives again rising in insurrection against us.<sup>1079</sup>

Ministers continued to hope that confiscation would pay for itself. The essential outline of Domett's plan remained: to take more land than necessary for this new

---

1076. Sir George Grey, NZPD 1861–1863, 19 October 1863, p734.

1077. Sir George Grey, NZPD 1861–1863, 19 October 1863, p735.

1078. NZPD, 1861–1863, and Frederick Whitaker, 29 October 1863, p749.

1079. Wood, 10 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, pp 829, 831.

settlement so that the excess could be sold to help repay a loan being obtained from the British government:

when the lands in rebel districts are taken and sold the loan itself will be a first charge upon the proceeds of the sale thereof. Exactly what amount of land will be available it is difficult to say; but, if we take all the land that belongs to the rebel natives in the Thames and Waikato, at Taranaki, and at Wanganui, I think there will be nearly – after location the settlers upon it – a balance of something closely approaching to two millions of acres.<sup>1080</sup>

Four Acts were passed late in December 1863 to put this scheme into operation.

6.9.3.2.1 SUPPRESSION OF REBELLION ACT 1863

In a ministerial statement made in November 1863, Premier Frederick Whitaker said that the Suppression of Rebellion Bill was founded on similar Acts by the British government, including its Suppression of Disturbances (Ireland) Act of 1833. Describing it as ‘a mitigated form of martial law’, he said that it would be applied not to particular districts but rather to certain offences.<sup>1081</sup> William Fox later went so far as to say the Bill copied the 1833 Act ‘word for word’. No one, he said, would be able say that the nature of the Bill was unheard of, or that it was ‘abhorrent to the spirit of the British Constitution’. Fox claimed that the British Act had been passed not for the suppression of open rebellion but rather for ‘putting down illegal disturbances, secret associations, and agrarian riots’. Henry Sewell, member for Auckland, said that the 1833 Act had merely established ‘military Courts . . . in disturbed districts’, which was not the same as establishing martial law.<sup>1082</sup>

The Act gave the governor sweeping and draconian powers to repress what the preamble called ‘a combination for the subversion of the authority of Her Majesty and Her Majesty’s Government’. The Act did not mention confiscation as such. It did, however, authorise the taking of ‘vigorous and effectual measures’, not only to suppress the so-called rebellion but also ‘to punish all persons acting aiding or in any manner assisting in the said Rebellion or maliciously attacking or injuring the persons or properties of Her Majesty’s peaceable and loyal subjects in furtherance of the same’. The Act was signed into law on 3 December 1863.

6.9.3.2.2 NEW ZEALAND SETTLEMENTS ACT 1863

The New Zealand Settlements Act was signed into law the same day, on 3 December 1863. The stated purpose of the Act was to introduce peace and good order in districts where they had been absent, by means of establishing military settlements. It was hoped to attract ‘from fifteen to twenty thousand’ men for these 1080. Wood, 10 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 832.

1081. Whitaker, 3 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 755.

1082. Fox, 3 November 1863, 5 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, pp 760, 791–792, 799; Sewell, 13 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, pp 858–860.

settlements, of whom ‘about ten thousand’ would be directed to the Waikato. The settlers would also be allowed to bring ‘a moderate proportion of their wives and families.’<sup>1083</sup> The Government intended that the establishment of the settlements should ‘as much as possible follow the course of the troops’: ‘that is to say, that, as the land is taken up by military occupation and secured, settlement shall follow as soon as possible upon the land so secured.’<sup>1084</sup>

The Act provided that, where the governor was satisfied tribes had rebelled, land could be taken for settlement under a three-stage process:

- ▶ first, a district where tribes were in rebellion was to be declared (section 2);
- ▶ secondly, ‘eligible sites’ within the district would be set apart for settlement (section 3); and,
- ▶ thirdly, the governor-in-council could then ‘reserve or take any Land within such District’ as might be needed for the purposes of the Act (section 4).

By doing so, the provisions of the Act effectively authorised the transformation of customary land into Crown land.

During the parliamentary debate on the Bill, Premier Frederick Whitaker was at pains to dispel any notion that the Government did not have the power to take land. It was clear, he said, that such power might ‘justly and properly be exercised in cases of State necessity’. A further principle he invoked to justify the takings was that ‘when one side of a treaty was violated the other party was discharged from all obligation; and the Natives had most certainly violated the Treaty of Waitangi.’<sup>1085</sup>

When William Fox introduced the Bill for its second reading in the House of Representatives on 5 November 1863, he offered the assurance that ‘in any district it should appear that any section of the Natives have not been in rebellion, it will be open for them to receive compensation as awarded by the Court to be constituted under this Bill.’<sup>1086</sup> He later claimed that the Government did not anticipate taking land from non-rebels, but then immediately added the caveat ‘not at present, at all events.’<sup>1087</sup>

James FitzGerald (Member for Ellesmere, in Canterbury) was the only speaker to oppose the Bill.<sup>1088</sup> He objected that it was contrary to the guarantees of the Treaty, and he criticised the proposed Compensation Court, which he saw as offering reimbursement only after the ‘robbery’ had occurred.<sup>1089</sup>

6.9.3.2.3 NEW ZEALAND LOAN ACT 1863, AND LOAN APPROPRIATION ACT 1863

The New Zealand Loan Act 1863 envisaged raising a loan of £3 million in London to fund the war. It was passed into law on 14 December. Also passed that day was the Loan Appropriation Act, which set out how the money was to be spent. Included in those calculations were:

---

1083. Wood, 12 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 847.

1084. Wood, 12 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 847.

1085. Whitaker, 13 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 869; doc A22, p 306.

1086. Document A22, p 303.

1087. Fox, 17 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 891.

1088. Document A22, p 305.

1089. Document A22, p 304.

- ▶ (at section 2) £300,000 for introducing settlers from Australia, Great Britain, and elsewhere (with £150,000 of that being for the province of Auckland, £75,000 for Taranaki, and the rest for Hawkes Bay and areas south of Whanganui);
- ▶ (section 3) £900,000 towards the cost of surveying and putting settlers on land; and
- ▶ (section 4) £100,000 for ‘payment of Compensation in respect of land taken under the New Zealand Settlements Act’.

This nine-to-one weighting of expenditure in favour of settlers in the appropriations made it clear that the primary object of the Government’s scheme was to actively assist settlers on to confiscated land. The appropriation of £100,000 for compensation appeared to almost immediately contradict Fox’s guarantee that the land of ‘loyal’ Māori would not be taken.

From London, Secretary of State for the Colonies Edward Cardwell sent the governor a prescient analysis of the legislation. The number of military settlers Domett had proposed had quadrupled and consequently the immediate amount of confiscation, is quadrupled, the compulsory power of acquiring land within a proclaimed district is, by the terms of the Act, applied alike to the loyal and the disloyal; the right of compensation is jealously limited, and is denied even to the most loyal native if he refuses to surrender his accustomed right of carrying arms, and these powers are not to be exercised exceptionally and to meet the present emergency, or by regularly constituted courts of justice, but are to be permanently embodied in the law of New Zealand; and to form a standing qualification of the treaty of Waitangi.<sup>1090</sup>

Rather than disallow the Act, however, Cardwell decided to place his faith in the governor:

not having received from you any expression of your disapproval, and being most unwilling to take any course which would weaken your hands in the moment of your military success, Her Majesty’s Government have decided that the Act shall for the present remain in operation.<sup>1091</sup>

A clearer official acknowledgement that the Treaty would not be upheld is difficult to imagine.

6.9.4 How were the confiscations carried out?

A formal proclamation of the Government’s intentions towards Waikato-Maniapoto Māori did not come until late October 1864, followed nearly two months later by one relating to Taranaki Māori. From comments made by former native affairs minister Bell, this hiatus would seem to have been due, at least in 1090. Cardwell to Grey, 26 April 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, p 20 (doc A22, p 344).

---

1091. Cardwell to Grey, 26 April 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, pp 21–22 (doc A22, p 347).

part, to 'a dispute between the Governor and the late Ministry' about 'the extent to which the lands were to be confiscated under the [New Zealand Settlements] Act'.<sup>1092</sup> As explained above (section 6.7.9), the governor and his Ministers also appear to have disagreed over whether to continue military operations in Waikato, and to what end. The proclamations urged Māori to 'come in' and submit to the Queen's authority or risk confiscation. Proclamations about the land to be taken in each district then followed a few weeks after that.

6.9.4.1 The Waikato confiscation districts

By March 1864, more than 4,000 men from Australia and the Otago goldfields were engaged on military service in Waikato, with the promise of land as their reward.<sup>1093</sup> General Cameron ordered redoubts to be constructed from Ōrākau to Alexandra, along the southern extent of the land he had occupied.<sup>1094</sup> This territory, bounded by the Pūniu River, eventually came to define the limit of the Crown's confiscation. The claimants' interests in the Waikato confiscated lands lie primarily in this region adjacent to the Pūniu River (section 6.9.2).

How this situation on the ground would be reconciled with the process the Government had set out in its confiscatory legislation remained to be seen. An official notice issued by the Government on 2 February 1864 set out terms under which Māori submission to the Crown would be accepted. How widely this notice was circulated is unclear, but it made plain that the Crown was intent on confiscation, stating that for those who had joined the enemy, but did not fight, 'the disposal of their lands rests with the Governor'.<sup>1095</sup>

In April, Ministers drafted an ultimatum. It was signed by Governor Grey and required all who desired peace to submit to the Crown by 1 July 1864. While those who had resisted the Crown had 'justly forfeited all their lands', an opportunity was to be given them to live in peace if they took an oath of allegiance, surrendered their arms, and went where they were told until a permanent place could be given by Crown grant. Military settlers would be placed throughout Waikato for the protection of all.<sup>1096</sup> Then, on 29 April, the British suffered a severe defeat at Gate Pā near Tauranga, and the proclamation was never issued.

On 17 May, Ministers proposed declaring the entire district south of the Tāmaki portage, as far as a line between Arowhenua (likely near or at what is today Wharepūhunga maunga), Hangatiki, and the mouth of the Awaroa River on the southern side of Kāwhia Harbour.<sup>1097</sup> Hangatiki lies about 30 kilometres south of the Pūniu River, deep within Ngāti Maniapoto territory, where Rewi was reported 1092. Weld, 5 December 1864, NZPD, 1864–1866, p100.

1093. Document A22, p 367.

1094. Document A22, pp 178, 362.

1095. 'Regulations in reference to Maoris who have taken part in the War and in the King Movement', 2 February 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, pp 32–33.

1096. Whitaker, 'Memorandum by Ministers enclosing Draft Proclamation', 22 April 1864 (doc A22, pp 370–372).

1097. Document A22, p 377.

to have built large new fortifications.<sup>1098</sup> In June, Premier Whitaker informed Grey of Ministers' view that Ngāti Maniapoto lands were not 'sufficiently touched'.<sup>1099</sup> At about this time, according to the long-time missionary at Ōtāwhao, John Morgan, defence minister Thomas Russell told Morgan the Government still intended to 'deal separately with Ngatimaniapoto'.<sup>1100</sup> With the military settlers still on full pay and rations, Grey and Cameron agreed that village settlements needed to be set up, although no formal proclamation of confiscation had been made.<sup>1101</sup>

On 30 September, however, the Whitaker government resigned (although Ministers continued to hold office as 'Responsible Advisers' until a new administration could be formed). The same day, Grey sought clarification of precisely how much land Ministers had intended to confiscate. A curt memorandum was tendered (with reluctance, lest it be construed as 'deal[ing] with important questions of policy', which given their resignation would be 'both irregular and improper') together with a calculation of the fate of one million acres of Waikato land: 360,000 acres would be allocated to the military settlers; 240,000 acres set aside for immigrants from England; and the remainder sold. A map was also provided, showing the intention to take land as far south as Hangatiki.<sup>1102</sup>

Not until 24 October 1864 was a proclamation finally published, and even then it did not specify what land was to be taken, or from whom. Instead, the governor undertook to pardon 'rebels' who, by 10 December, took an oath of allegiance and ceded land 'as may in each instance be fixed by the Governor and the Lieutenant General Commanding Her Majesty's Forces in New Zealand'. Those who wished to return to land they had 'ceded' were to first give up their arms and ammunition.<sup>1103</sup> It is difficult to see how this statement by the governor aligned with the provisions of the New Zealand Settlements Act.

A week after the expiry of Grey's deadline for 'rebels' to cede their lands and give up their arms, the governor proclaimed he would 'hold as land of the Crown all the land in the Waikato taken by the Queen's Forces, and from which the Rebel Natives have been driven'. The southern boundary was to extend from Pukekura, south-east of Cambridge, in a straight line to Ōrākau, thence to the Pūniu River, along that to its junction with the Waipā, and then in straight lines to the summit of Pirongia and the nearest point on the Waitetuna River, thence to Whāingaroa Harbour.<sup>1104</sup>

The December proclamation acknowledged the practical equivalence of war and confiscation. It was also used to propagate the myth that Ngāti Maniapoto escaped punishment for their role in the war. Morgan, who resigned from his missionary role in October 1864 and was appointed chaplain to the British troops in Waikato,

1098. Document A22, p 177.

1099. Whitaker, memorandum, 25 June 1864 (doc A22, p 430).

1100. Morgan to Browne, 29 December 1864 (doc A22, p 405 n).

1101. Document A22, p 381.

1102. Document A22, pp 388–389; 'Memorandum by Ministers', 30 September 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, p 95; Whitaker, memorandum, 5 October 1864, AJHR, 1864, E-2, p 96.

1103. New Zealand Gazette, 26 October 1864, no 41, p 399 (doc A22, pp 391–392).

1104. New Zealand Gazette, 17 December 1864, no 49, p 461 (doc A22, pp 398–400).

claimed that the governor's 'Confiscation Proclamation' meant Ngāti Maniapoto would 'not lose a single acre of their own country' but merely 'suffer in the loss of a few hundred acres at Alexandra and Kihikihi held by them by conquest'. Morgan distinguished between Ngāti Maniapoto and what he called 'the Rangiawhia and Kihikihi tribes', noting that the latter would 'lose every inch of their land'.<sup>1105</sup> The Times correspondent's view of Ngāti Maniapoto was similar, writing in March 1865 that the 'omission lets off the worst tribes – Rewis included – scot free, or nearly so'.<sup>1106</sup> The grudging qualification tended to be lost from later assessments. These claims were clearly false. The proclamation included all the lands north of the Pūniu River in which the raupatu claimants in this inquiry held interests.

The governor's proclamation also promised: 'The land of those Natives who have adhered to the Queen shall be secured to them; and to those who have rebelled, but who shall at once submit to the Queen's authority, portions of the land taken will be given back for themselves and their families.'<sup>1107</sup> There was no reference to the New Zealand Settlements Act or to the procedures laid out in the Act. It simply stated an intention to convert conquered land into Crown land. Despite this, the evidence suggests the proclamation was widely understood by both Māori and Pākehā to have effected a confiscation.

In any case, the first proclamation under the provisions of the New Zealand Settlements Act was made only weeks later, on 5 January 1865. It declared the southernmost part of the occupied territory as a district for settlement under the Act, comprising 316,000 acres between Ngāruawāhia and the Pūniu River.<sup>1108</sup> This was about a quarter of the Waikato land that was eventually taken and it came to be known as the Military Settlements block. The lands in which the raupatu claimants in this inquiry held interests were in the southern part of this block.

Noted here, for completeness, is that two further districts were proclaimed during 1865. On 7 June 1865, the Central Waikato district was proclaimed, essentially confiscated the land north and west of the Military Settlements block, as far as Mangatāwhiri. A third proclamation, on 5 September 1865, declared all land between the Mangatāwhiri and the Pūniu not already taken to be subject to the provisions of the New Zealand Settlements Act.<sup>1109</sup> The Waipa-Waitetuna block, which was purchased by the Crown in September 1864 (see chapter 5), was effectively incorporated within the Military Settlements and Central Waikato blocks when they were proclaimed.

In terms of process, with respect to the land taken in the Military Settlements block, there are a number of inconsistencies with the legal process laid out in the New Zealand Settlements Act:

- ▶ The governor's 17 December proclamation made no mention of the Act.

---

1105. Morgan to Browne, 29 December 1864 (doc A22, p 405 n).

1106. The Times, 16 March 1865 (doc A22, pp 405–406).

1107. New Zealand Gazette, no 49, 17 December 1864, p 461 (doc A22, pp 399–400).

1108. Document A22, p 412; New Zealand Gazette, no 1, 5 January 1865, p 1.

1109. Document A22, pp 414–416.

- ▶ The Act required three distinct steps: to declare districts; to define eligible sites; and then to proclaim takings. This did not happen.
- ▶ The Act referred only to land being taken for 'sites for settlement'. A return of land compiled in August 1865 showed that nearly half of the Military Settlements block was 'unappropriated' or intended for 'Native Reserves and Claims' (table 6.1). District surveyor AK Churton observed in December 1865 that, after the military settlers' and immigrants' needs had been met, there remained 'a great extent of mountainous, broken and poor land, with an unusually large extent of swamp'.<sup>1110</sup>
- ▶ Not even all the land intended for the military farm settlements was fit for that purpose. A map provided in evidence by researcher Craig Innes indicated 1110. Churton, report, 28 December 1865 (doc A22, p 417).

Type of usage	Area
Military townships	4,673
Military settlements (farms)	162,948
Roads and landings	3,240
Old land claims	1,669
'Native reserves and claims'	21,600
Surveyed ready for sale	4,763
Unappropriated	117,707
Total	316,600

Table 6.1: Land allocations military settlements block, August 1865
 Source: 'Return of Land Taken under the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863', 17 August 1865, AJHR, 1865, D-13, p 3.

substantial areas bordering the Moanatuatua swamp and near Lake Ngāroto that were later rejected by military settlers as unsuitable for settlement.<sup>1111</sup>

The claimants said this meant the takings were arguably illegal. We do not think it necessary to pursue this point. It is clear that the entire process by which the claimants' lands were confiscated was poorly conceived and shambolic in execution. In Treaty terms, the confiscations were a serious breach of the guarantees in article 2 and the principle of partnership. The Crown is right to acknowledge this.

The confiscation affected all Māori with interests in the Military Settlements block indiscriminately, no matter whether the Crown considered them rebel, loyal, or neutral. This conformed to the law at the time, which made no provision for compensation in land (section 6.9.5). Nevertheless, 21,600 acres (6.8 per cent) of the Military Settlements block appear to have been set aside for 'Native reserves and claims' at an early stage of the process (table 6.1). We have no information about how this amount was decided, where these lands were located, or why they were chosen. It certainly cannot have been the result of any inquiry into what obligations the Crown owed the former owners. It is notable that, in the portion of the block immediately north of the Pūniu River analysed by Mr Innes, the proportion of land granted to Māori was also 6.8 per cent.<sup>1112</sup> Decisions on claims by Māori for compensation, which are discussed in section 6.9.5, were not taken until the Compensation Court hearings in January 1867.

6.9.4.2 The Taranaki confiscation districts

In October 1864, Te Ārei pā on the Waitara River, which the Crown troops had not succeeded in occupying in 1861, was taken without a fight. Troops built redoubts along the river between there and the coast, and military settlers began to move onto the land.<sup>1113</sup>

1111. Document A30, p 276.

1112. Document A30, p 262.

A formal confiscation proclamation was made on 17 December 1864, but it was open-ended: it merely announced the governor's intent to 'retain and hold as land of the Crown . . . such land belonging to the Rebels as he may think fit' in Taranaki.<sup>1114</sup>

The Middle Taranaki confiscation district, which extended from the Waitara River south to the Waimate River, was proclaimed on 31 January 1865. This included Te Ārei (and the adjacent pā of Pukerangiora). Two 'sites for settlement' were reserved under the New Zealand Settlements Act within this district, at Ōākura and Waitara South.<sup>1115</sup>

The rest of northern Taranaki, extending from Waitara to Parininihi, and from there in a straight line due east for 20 miles, was proclaimed as the 'Ngatiawa' confiscation district on 5 September 1865. This was land in which Te Ātiawa, Ngāti Tama, Ngāti Mutunga, and Ngāti Maru all claimed interests. The Taranaki Tribunal concluded that Parininihi was chosen as the northern confiscation boundary 'purely to accommodate a stockade at one frontier'. Crown troops had already, in April 1865, built a military redoubt at Pukearuhe on the south bank of the Waikāramuramu Stream. This was done apparently to satisfy the wishes of the governor and despite no order to that effect being given by General Cameron.<sup>1116</sup>

Dr O'Malley described Pukearuhe as 'an obvious location from which to attempt to prevent Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato incursions south into Taranaki'. Parininihi is the high point of the massive mudstone bluffs that bar the coastal route north to Mōkau. Pukearuhe is about four kilometres to the south. As both Ngāti Maniapoto and the Crown recognised, the area was crucial to the control of traffic between Taranaki and Mōkau. From Mōkau, there was open travel south along the coastal terrace as far as Te Kawai pā, which dominated that part of the coast, being set on an inaccessible coastal escarpment between the Mohakatino and Tongaporutu Rivers. South again, the path narrowed until forced to climb high above and behind the Parininihi cliffs, returning to the coast via either the Waipingao (Waipingau) or Waikāramuramu (Waikaramarama) Streams.<sup>1117</sup>

The Taranaki Tribunal concluded that the confiscation of north Taranaki was probably unlawful 'in terms of the confiscation legislation itself'. This was because no act of rebellion was known to have occurred within the district after 1 January 1863, when the New Zealand Settlements Act came into effect.<sup>1118</sup> At Pukearuhe itself, there had been no fighting and no opposition to the construction of the redoubt. Despite this, the entire district (along with the 'Ngatiruanui' district

1113. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, pp 93–94.

1114. New Zealand Gazette, 17 December 1864, no 49, p 461 (doc A22, pp 399–400).

1115. Document A22, p 414.

1116. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 128; doc A22, p 655; New Zealand Gazette, 5 September 1865, no 35, p 266.

1117. Document A22, pp 654–656; doc A28, p 224.

1118. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, pp 96, 102.

in southern Taranaki) was declared an eligible site for settlement. The Taranaki Tribunal called this ‘the grossest act of confiscation.’<sup>1119</sup>

The district’s northern and eastern boundaries remained no more than notional lines on a map for at least 15 years, so that the exact extent of the confiscation remained unclear. For example, following sittings of the Compensation Court in 1866 (about which see more below), Judge Rogan signed certificates for awards in various areas of the compensation district, of which the first, and most northerly, was defined as running from ‘Waipingao to Titoki.’<sup>1120</sup> Waipingao is about half way between the proclaimed confiscation boundary and the ‘Red Sea’ line, while Titoki is south of Pukearuhe. Robert Parris (who had appeared for the Māori claimants during at least one of the sittings) later said that if land court judges (and presumably, by extension, Compensation Court judges) had referred to Waipingao as the boundary, ‘they made a mistake.’<sup>1121</sup>

Māori were likewise unclear about exactly where the boundary lay. In 1881, Mōkau Māori demanded a meeting with the Native Minister to sort the matter out. Gold prospectors had been found in the vicinity and, when challenged by Wetere Te Rerenga, they said ‘they were on Government land.’ He wanted certainty about the confiscation boundary so that he knew what was his and what had been taken by the Crown. In the event, it was Parris, not the Native Minister, who made the journey to White Cliffs to represent the Crown, at a meeting which was attended by about 30 Mōkau Māori. Parris told them that the boundary had been ‘fixed at Te Horo.’<sup>1122</sup> This was the location at Parininihi where construction of a stock tunnel had been started in 1859 (see section 6.4.2).<sup>1123</sup> Parris thought that perhaps the reason why the boundary had been fixed there was that ‘of old there were no maps showing that part of the country, and the Tunnel was a mark known to all.’ From the tunnel, said Parris, the boundary ran 20 miles inland. Looking at a map Parris had brought with him, Te Rerenga thought that ‘the eastern corner of the [confiscation] block was most likely Tahoraparoa.’ Parris replied that ‘he could not say if it were so or not, as the boundary had not been surveyed.’<sup>1124</sup> Those Māori present then indicated they wanted the line moved back by ‘about a mile and a-half or two miles,’ to Waipingao.<sup>1125</sup> Paul Thomas observed that the mouth of the Waipingao Stream was ‘a highly significant area’ for Mōkau hapū, being important to their transport network and also ‘a place of whare and urupa.’<sup>1126</sup> No evidence was presented to explain why Waipingao rather than Waikāramuramu was identified as a boundary at this time. In later dealings with the Crown during the 1880s, however, Waipingao continued to be used by Ngāti Maniapoto leaders to describe the 1119. Waitangi Tribunal, Taranaki Report, pp 95, 122.

1120. AJHR, 1880, G-2, appendix B, p 17, appendix E, p 1.

1121. ‘Native Meeting at White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2; doc A28, p 225.

1122. ‘Mr Parris’s Visit to the White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 23 June 1881, p 2; ‘Native Meeting at White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2; doc A28, p 225.

1123. Document A28, pp 136, 152–153.

1124. ‘Native Meeting at White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2; doc A28, p 225.

1125. ‘Mr Parris’s Visit to the White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2.

1126. Document A28, p 224.

southern extent of the area over which they claimed authority. These matters are addressed in chapters 8 and 10.

The evidence presented in this inquiry by William Wetere relating to confiscation in Taranaki, however, referred to the 'Red Sea' Waikāramuramu boundary. Mr Wetere stated that setting the confiscation line at Parininihi resulted in approximately 14,650 hectares (about 36,200 acres) of Ngāti Maniapoto lands being confiscated.<sup>1127</sup>

6.9.5 Was the Compensation Court's process adequate, insofar as it affected Te Rohe Pōtae groups?

Although the Crown acknowledged the confiscations were 'compounded by inadequacies' in the Compensation Court, the claimants argued that the court processes themselves were in breach of the Treaty.<sup>1128</sup> The claimants alleged that:

- ▶ no definition of rebellion was attempted in the legislation, but because a high bar was set for eligibility for compensation this had the effect of defining many more Māori as rebels;
- ▶ no real choice was given as to whether or not to take part, while applicants were required 'to acknowledge that their customary lands had been taken from them because of wrongdoings against the Crown'; and
- ▶ the process itself did not set out how land was to be valued or how compensation should be assessed or awarded, gave no role to Māori in deciding title but suffered from the Crown's 'strong direct influence', was beset by delays, and made awards to individuals rather than hapū.<sup>1129</sup>

We begin with an outline of the rules and processes that governed the Compensation Court that was established by the New Zealand Settlements Act. The operation of the court is then examined in more detail as it affected Te Rohe Pōtae Māori interests in Taranaki and Waikato.

6.9.5.1 How was the compensation process established?

Section 5 of the New Zealand Settlements Act stated that compensation would be granted to anyone with 'title interest or claim' in land taken under the Act. Five sub-sections then circumscribed this promise by setting out a wide range of disqualifications. Claimants had to demonstrate their eligibility as 'non-rebels' before the court. Compensation would not be granted to anyone 'engaged in levying or making war or carrying arms against Her Majesty the Queen or Her Majesty's Forces in New Zealand' since 1 January 1863. Anyone who had 'adhered to aided assisted or comforted' those making war or who had 'counselled advised induced enticed persuaded or conspired with any other person to make or levy war . . . or to carry arms' or who had been 'concerned in any outrage against person or property' was ineligible. The Act also excluded anyone who refused to comply with a proclamation from the Governor to deliver up their arms.

---

1127. Document Q29(b), para 28.

1128. Document 3.4.300, p 23.

1129. Submission 3.4.127, pp 34-37.

Section 6 of the Act barred from compensation anyone 'engaged' in the section 5 offences who did not submit themselves to trial by a date set by proclamation. Section 7 specified that any claim for compensation must be made to the Colonial Secretary within six months of the proclamation of a confiscation (or within 18 months for non-residents).

Sections 8 to 15 then set out the composition of the Compensation Court itself. Judges would be appointed or removed by the governor-in-council and the judges could compel the attendance of witnesses. Section 14 declared: 'The Judge shall grant to every Claimant who shall be entitled to compensation a Certificate specifying the amount thereof and describing the land in respect of which the same is granted and the nature of the Claimant's title interest or claim therein.' An entitled claimant could also have the amount of compensation determined by 'two indifferent Arbitrators', one selected by the claimant and the other appointed by the Colonial Secretary. Though compensation in land was not explicitly rejected, these clauses suggested that compensation would be restricted to cash payments.<sup>1130</sup>

What opposition there was in the settler assembly to the confiscation legislation focused on how Māori who had not participated in the supposed rebellion would be compensated, if their lands were taken. In November 1863, after consulting with James FitzGerald, who had raised the issue, Fox added a clause that would give the governor 'discretion to call upon tribes or individuals who had engaged in acts of rebellion to come in and submit to the law by a specified date or render themselves ineligible for compensation under the legislation.'<sup>1131</sup> FitzGerald accepted this as an assurance that 'only the land belonging to the Natives in rebellion' would be confiscated, and on that basis encouraged the Government to publish a 'Proclamation to the Native race' as soon as possible.<sup>1132</sup> No specific prohibition of the circumstances FitzGerald objected to was written into the Act, and in providing for compensation to be paid for land taken from those not in rebellion, taking such land continued to be a real prospect.

6.9.5.1.1 AMENDING LEGISLATION, 1864–1866

The rules and processes of the Compensation Court were subject to frequent legislative changes in its the first few years.

The short New Zealand Settlements Amendment Act 1864, passed on 13 December, allowed the governor-in-council to override decisions of the Compensation Court and award compensation to claimants previously denied by the Compensation Court, or to raise the amount of compensation originally awarded by the Court.

In August 1865, the Attorney-General asserted that 'one of the cardinal objects' of the settlements legislation had been to 'affect the lands of all persons, whether innocent or guilty, within the limits of a district'. Nevertheless, the present government had, he claimed, acted 'so far as possible' upon the principle that the

---

1130. Document A22, pp 308–311.

1131. Document A22, p 305

1132. FitzGerald, 20 November 1863, NZPD, 1861–1863, p 910.

lands of 'friendly' Maori should be excluded. Yet the New Zealand Settlements Amendment and Continuance Act 1865 placed the former owners at the end of the queue when setting priorities for use of the proceeds from the sale of confiscated land, which:

should, in the first place, be used for defraying the charges incurred in surveying and laying out the land for sale, also charges incidental to confiscation, all expenses of the Compensation Court, repayment of expenses incurred in introducing immigrants, including military settlers, but exclusive of pay and rations.<sup>1133</sup>

Only after all these expenses had been met, the Attorney-General said, should any proceeds be 'applicable and payable to persons who had sustained losses in the insurrection'.

Section 3 of the 1865 Act provided for the governor-in-council to regulate the practice and procedure of the Compensation Court, and allowed the Crown, under certain conditions, to abandon its right to confiscate land sought for compensation. No longer falling under the Act, the land in question would no longer be subject to confiscation and therefore would remain in customary title.

Crucially, sections 9 and 10 allowed for compensation to be given in land rather than money. Under section 9, compensation in land (or in a mixture of land and cash) could be agreed between the colonial secretary and the claimant. Alternatively, under section 10, the colonial secretary could, on his own initiative, elect 'at any time before judgment or award' to give the claimant land instead of cash.<sup>1134</sup> Under both scenarios, this considerably reduced the role of the Compensation Court.

We agree with the Tauranga Raupatu Tribunal's view that these amendments to the 1863 Act 'facilitated the Crown's assumption of control over the compensation process'.<sup>1135</sup>

In response, it appears, to criticism of the operation of the Compensation Court, the Crown further extended its control of the compensation process in 1866.<sup>1136</sup> The New Zealand Settlements Act Amendment Act 1866 was, according to Dr O'Malley, designed to correct 'defects' in the 1865 Act. It provided for the colonial secretary to make partial or full awards of land or scrip (in effect a kind of voucher, promising land) instead of money. Section 3 of the Act gave the colonial secretary discretion to award compensation either before or after any court judgment or award. Section 5 allowed the governor to set aside reserves. It also stated that the governor's peace proclamation of 2 September 1865, promising the return of confiscated land and amnesty to 'rebels' who submitted to the Crown and its laws, did not relieve those excluded from compensation under the 1863 Act.<sup>1137</sup> Section

---

1133. Sewell, 8 August 1864, NZPD, 1864–1866, pp 263–264.

1134. The New Zealand Settlements Amendment and Continuance Act 1865

1135. Waitangi Tribunal, Te Raupatu O Tauranga Moana, p 156.

1136. See the debates in the House on 25–26 July 1866, NZPD, 1864–1866, pp 810, 814.

1137. Document A22, p 356.

6 also made the sweeping statement that all previous proclamations, regulations, and awards made under the authority of the Settlements Acts remained valid irrespective ‘of any omission or defect of or in any of the forms or things provided in the said Acts.’<sup>1138</sup>

Assessing the law relating to confiscation and compensation, legal historian Richard Boast wrote: ‘The mountains of statute built up were also disregarded, flouted, or ignored when the occasion demanded. Sometimes the various floutings and shortcuts necessitated further validating enactments. The law was, in short, a mess.’<sup>1139</sup> This, in our view, is an accurate description.

6.9.5.1.2 RULES AND PRACTICE OF THE COMPENSATION COURT

Many of the judges appointed to the Compensation Court, including two of the three founding members, Senior Judge Francis Fenton and Judge John Rogan, were also judges in the Native Land Court that was established at the same time.<sup>1140</sup> In contrast with the Native Land Court, which was tasked with investigating title to land held by Māori, the Compensation Court’s role was to decide who should receive compensation for land that was, by virtue of confiscation, already held by the Crown. Under section 5 of the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863, the decision was supposed to include a consideration of who might have ‘title interest or claim’ in the land in question. In practice, it seems there was rarely if ever any in-depth inquiry into who might have held land rights in a particular area. Unlike the Native Land Court, there was no provision for assessors or any role for Māori in the court’s decision-making. The Ngati Awa Raupatu Tribunal found that lands were ‘returned’ in that district with minimal regard for customary rights.<sup>1141</sup> The Hauraki Tribunal, for its part, pointed out that the brevity of the hearing conducted by the East Wairoa Compensation Court was such that it simply would not have had time to carry out any ‘detailed search for ancestral right.’<sup>1142</sup> We will consider whether the same applied for the hapū bringing claims in this inquiry when the court’s operations in Taranaki and Waikato are examined.

Rules and regulations specifying the processes and practices to be followed by the Compensation Court were in place in May 1865, although their utility is doubtful.<sup>1143</sup> A new set was issued in June 1866, comprising just nine clauses. Dr O’Malley agreed with Crown counsel that these could be said to be ‘something

---

1138. Document A22, pp 356–357.

1139. Richard Boast, ‘“An Expensive Mistake”: Law, Courts, and Confiscation on the New Zealand Colonial Frontier’, in Richard Boast and Richard Hill (eds), Raupatu: The Confiscation of Maori Land (Wellington: Victoria University Press, 2009), p 151.

1140. Document A22, pp 469, 483–485.

1141. Waitangi Tribunal, Ngati Awa Raupatu Report, p 90.

1142. Waitangi Tribunal, Hauraki Report, vol 1, pp 227–228.

1143. ‘Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth’, AJHR, 1866, A-13, p 9.

resembling a comprehensive set of rules.<sup>1144</sup> Although far from detailed, they did specify that two months' notice was to be given, in the Gazette and also one or more local newspapers, before a sitting could be held; adjournments were to be allowed if necessary for the gathering of evidence; and careful records were to be kept: 'All evidence given in Court shall be taken down in writing, and a copy thereof, together with the particulars of judgment or award, shall be transmitted without delay to the Colonial Secretary.'<sup>1145</sup>

Despite the latter injunction, present-day historians trying to research the work of the court have found the records to be 'incomplete', in some cases 'distorted', and, overall, '[w]holly inadequate'. Also gazetted were three sample court orders, for use when making awards.<sup>1146</sup>

The rules did not, however, address some of the critical issues faced by the court. For example, although the very necessity for confiscatory legislation implicitly recognised the existence of Māori title to land, it gave no guidance on the question of how traditional concepts of landholding might impact on the court's work. In mid-1866, the court sat in New Plymouth to hear Oākura and southern Waitara claims. Senior Judge Fenton pointed out that the English language had no words to 'fitly express the idea of a Maori holding'. 'The tribal estate belonged to the tribe', he said, and any alienation 'must be the act of the tribe'. With the arrival of the British, however, 'new ideas were introduced and the idea of ownership began to be asserted, and to be encouraged by the Government'. Nevertheless, Māori did not always stay in a fixed location: they might move because of war or for other reasons. Deciding 'ownership' was therefore problematic. For this reason, the court felt '[c]ompelled by absolute necessity to lay down a rule for [its own] guidance' and fix some point in time at which titles could be regarded as settled. Judge Fenton went on: '[W]e have decided that that point of time must be the establishment of the British Government in 1840.'<sup>1147</sup> Thus it was that the Compensation Court gave rise to the '1840 rule'.

Likewise, after the passing of the 1865 Act (which allowed compensation in the form of land rather than money), there was the question of how to find enough land to satisfy all parties entitled to receive it. As Fenton wrote:

If the Act of 1865 had been perfectly clear, and the several rights of the Crown, and of the claimants thereunder had been unmistakably set forth, we should have interpreted the law even if in our judgment honor and equity had failed. But when the 1144. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 849–850 (O'Malley questioned by McKay, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10 April 2013).

---

1145. New Zealand Gazette, 20 June 1866, no 36, pp 250–251 (doc A22, pp 490–491).

1146. Document A22, p 565.

1147. 'Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth', AJHR, 1866, A-13, pp 3–4.

intention of Parliament is not clear, surrounding circumstances must be admitted as a guide thereto and even contemporaneous exposition.<sup>1148</sup>

In short, even months down the track, the standards and procedures to be followed by the Compensation Court were still far from clear. In the view of one historian:

The Court was hurriedly set up, with little guideline for its work. Much power [was] granted to individual Judges, particularly Senior Judge Fenton. The procedure for applying for compensation was unclear, the forms ambiguous, the process of negotiations undefined and unrecorded, the roles of pivotal personnel at times blurred and conflicting.<sup>1149</sup>

6.9.5.2 In Taranaki

When war began in Taranaki, we consider that the Crown knew that Ngāti Maniapoto asserted interests in northern Taranaki as far south as Waikāramuramu, as well as less well-defined interests further south that have never been investigated by the Crown (sections 6.4.2 and 6.9.1).

As already described, it was at the hearing to determine compensation in the Oakura and Waitara South blocks that the court established the 1840 rule. However, having made the rule, the court seemed almost immediately to acknowledge its limitations, stating:

Great numbers of prisoners of war have returned to Taranaki since the establishment of the [Queen's] Government. With the tacit if not with the expressed approval of the Government they have rejoined their tribes, and taken possession of their ancestral lands. These persons now appear in the ranks of the Resident Claimants, and their rights have been admitted by the Government so completely that the Land Purchase Commissioners have purchased lands from them and required their signatures to deeds of conveyance. Their claims are therefore admitted, but those prisoners of war who did not return to occupy are on the rule above laid down excluded.<sup>1150</sup>

How it was that the Waikato-Maniapoto who had arrived with the 'great Waikato invasion between 1820 and 1830' were no longer to be regarded as the 'resident population' was not explained. Nor does the possibility seem to have been considered that Waikato-Maniapoto people might have remained in Taranaki and married into local hapū.

What can be said is that the great majority of claims to compensation were rejected, either because the claimants had 'fled South from the Waikato invasion'

---

1148. 'Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth', AJHR, 1866, A-13, p 11.

1149. Heather Bauchop, 'The Aftermath of Confiscation – Crown Allocation of Land to Iwi: Taranaki, 1865–80 – A Case Study in Confusion' (Wai 143 RO1, doc 118), pp 2–3 (doc A22, p 468).

1150. 'Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth', AJHR, 1866, A-13, pp 4–5.

and never returned or because they were classed as rebels under section 5 of the New Zealand Settlements Act.<sup>1151</sup> In August 1866, civil commissioner Robert Parris wrote that, after a visit to New Plymouth from the Minister of Native Affairs, claims to the two blocks had been settled out of court.<sup>1152</sup>

Claims in what the Crown had termed the Ngatiawa confiscation district, to the north of the Waitara River, were not heard until September and October 1866, when the court again sat in New Plymouth. Of the more than 1,500 claims submitted, 560 were disallowed by reason of non-possession or insufficient occupation, and another 403 claimants were dismissed for contravening section 5 of the New Zealand Settlements Act. We have no evidence that any of the latter were filed by Waikato-Maniapoto Māori. The remaining 575 claimants were found eligible for compensation, to be made in land. Once again, settlements were arrived at out of court by civil commissioner Parris.<sup>1153</sup>

The risk of injustice inherent in out-of-court arrangements was raised with Premier Edward Stafford by New Plymouth's provincial superintendent. Although professing 'great confidence' in Parris's integrity, the superintendent said placing such 'very large powers' in the hands of 'any person not . . . bound by any rules of evidence or defined principles of procedure' was 'in itself exceedingly objectionable'. He also thought that the 'private and irregular nature of the arrangements which the civil commissioner is authorised to make' placed him 'in the greatest danger of unconsciously allowing his judgment to be influenced by partialities or dislikes.'<sup>1154</sup>

Fourteen years then passed until, in 1880, a West Coast commission was set up to resolve the problems created by the confiscation process in Taranaki. When it reported, the commission's opening comment about the entire process was damning: 'it would be hard,' it said, 'to match the tangle into which what ought to have been a simple matter has been allowed to get.'<sup>1155</sup>

In terms of the Taranaki confiscations in particular, the commission noted that in the Ngatiawa district the court had awarded 14,843 acres to 251 claimants. Out-of-court agreements had been reached in respect of these awards in October 1866, but this was not notified in the Gazette until November 1867. As of 1880, only the 1,485 acres of awarded land nearest Waitara had been actually subdivided and given title. Nothing had been done for the remaining 13,385 acres: no Crown grants had been awarded and no land had been returned. This included 3,458 acres in the 'Waipingao to Titoki' district.<sup>1156</sup> A point not picked up by the commission is that, as noted earlier, Waipingao is slightly south of the supposed northern boundary point of the confiscation district (which had been defined as Parininihi).

---

1151. 'Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth', AJHR, 1866, A-13, pp 3-4, 16.

1152. 'Papers relating to the Sitting of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth', AJHR, 1866, A-13, p 19.

1153. Document A22, pp 471, 643-644; AJHR, 1880, G-2, p xxxv.

1154. HR Richmond to EW Stafford, 8 February 1866 (doc A22, p 651).

1155. AJHR, 1880, G-2, p xxxv.

1156. AJHR, 1880, G-2, pp xxxv-xxxvi; doc A22, pp 644-645.

There is no evidence that Ngāti Maniapoto participated in any way in the Taranaki Compensation Court process, either by making applications or by attending. Dr O'Malley thought that Ngāti Maniapoto probably deliberately abstained as 'part of a broader pattern of resistance to the confiscations'. Another, less likely, possibility is that they were unaware the hearings were taking place.<sup>1157</sup> Even had they lodged claims, the exhaustive scope of section 5 of the Settlements Act meant that they would doubtless have been regarded as 'rebels' and had those claims disallowed. Indeed, an indication that they had regarded applications as an exercise in futility came some years later, in 1881, when Mōkau Māori met with Robert Parris at White Cliffs. Trying to justify the Crown's taking of land in Taranaki, Parris equated it with Waikato-Maniapoto's earlier conquest of the area: 'Therefore do not say we have not previous example of confiscation amongst your own people'. Wetere Te Rerenga pointed out that, in the case of their own conquest, they had unilaterally allowed 'Ngatiawas and others' to return. Another of those present, Te Huria, added that they had done this in line with Christian teaching. The implication was that the Crown should have behaved in the same way, and allowed Mōkau Māori to return to land when they asserted interests. Another named Tiki added: 'You are taking the land . . . which is stealing'. Parris countered, saying that the land had not only been taken by conquest but confiscated under the law, and he could not alter the law.<sup>1158</sup> Te Huria's response indicated that he felt they had been hoodwinked and that the deck was stacked against them: 'We received the Gospel not knowing that it and the law came together. You concealed that from us; now the law has taken the land.'<sup>1159</sup>

We can confirm, therefore, that the evidence shows no compensation of Ngāti Maniapoto for their confiscated interests in Taranaki.

6.9.5.3 In Waikato

Native Minister Walter Mantell asked that the eight Waikato blocks confiscated on 5 January 1865 'should be dealt with by the Court as quickly as possible, and you will please give your early attention to clearing off all claims on these blocks'. Where compensation was necessary, the court was to make orders for 'a certain sum of money'.<sup>1160</sup> The amendment to the court's governing legislation later in 1865, however, allowed for land to be awarded in lieu of money and so aligned the court's powers with the governor's December 1864 proclamation that 'The lands of those Natives who have adhered to the Queen shall be secured to them'.<sup>1161</sup>

Mantell also stated that an 'Agent of the Crown' would be appointed to represent the Crown's interests in the court and '(when necessary) resist the claims set up'.<sup>1162</sup> One of the three founding judges of the court was James Mackay Junior, a civil servant, being the civil commissioner for the Hauraki district. Dr O'Malley

1157. Document A22, p 663.

1158. 'Native Meeting at White Cliffs', Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2; doc A28, p 225.

1159. 'Native Meeting at White Cliffs', Taranaki Herald, 25 June 1881, p 2.

1160. Mantell to Fenton, 11 January 1865 (doc A22, p 483).

1161. New Zealand Gazette, 17 December 1864, no 49, p 461 (doc A22, p 487).

1162. Mantell to Fenton, 11 January 1865 (doc A22, pp 483-484).

considered that Mackay's appointment to the Compensation Court was planned to 'ensure official Crown representation on the bench'.<sup>1163</sup> But in any case, from early 1866 Mackay acted as the Crown's agent. In that capacity he negotiated out-of-court settlements of compensation claims in the Military Settlements block in January 1867.<sup>1164</sup>

A list of claims for compensation in Waikato, containing about 1900 names, was published in the Auckland Provincial Government Gazette in December 1865. This list contained individuals' names and residences and described the land they claimed. Dr O'Malley noted that there were no claims from residents of Tokangamutu (Te Kūiti), Hangatiki, or Kihikihi, and only a few from Ōtāwhao and Rangiaowhia. Claims also came from Kāwhia and Aotea. Some of those listed lived at Ōtaki and claimed land at Maungatautari and Rangiaowhia.<sup>1165</sup> Hapū or iwi affiliations were not included, although Dr O'Malley considered the list was clearly arranged to reflect hapū or iwi, and that the names seemed intended as representatives of their whānau. Despite this, Dr O'Malley thought the limitations of the list and the poor records of the court's process made it 'virtually impossible to provide a meaningful overview of [the court's] operations in broad tribal terms'.<sup>1166</sup>

In this inquiry, the interests asserted by the claimants within the Waikato Raupatu District lie within the area confiscated as the Military Settlements block. Claims to compensation in this block were not heard by the court until January 1867. This was three years after the military occupation began, two years after the confiscation was proclaimed, and a year and a half after an initial survey had allocated 21,600 acres for 'Native purposes'.<sup>1167</sup>

The delay did mean that improved procedural rules were in place by the time the court sat.<sup>1168</sup> Adequate notice appears to have been given of the January 1867 hearing, published in the Auckland Provincial Government Gazette on 6 October 1866, and in the New Zealand Gazette on 15 October.<sup>1169</sup> Unfortunately, the hearings suffered significant additional delays and adjournments. Concurrent out-of-court settlements obscured the process further.<sup>1170</sup>

The hearing began at Ngāruawahia on 9 January 1867, although Crown agents Mackay and Charles Marshall had arrived a week earlier and travelled as far as Taupiri and Raglan to negotiate out of court arrangements. According to Dr O'Malley, 'there is little to no indication from the available documentary sources as to the process by which they had been negotiated'. Chief Judge Fenton,

1163. Document A22, p 485.

1164. Document A22, pp 484–485, 495, 509; Harry C Evison, 'James Mackay', in The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography (Wellington: Ministry for Culture and Heritage, <http://www.teara.govt.nz/en/biographies/1m29/mackay-james>).

1165. Document A22, pp 503–504.

1166. Document A22, pp 503–504.

1167. 'Return of Land Taken under the New Zealand Settlements Act 1863', 17 August 1865, AJHR, 1865, D-13, p 3 (doc A22, p 417).

1168. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 847–850, 1028 (O'Malley, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10–11 April 2013).

1169. Document A22, p 538.

1170. Document A22, pp 539–540.

suffering gout, returned to Auckland after just two days. Court proceedings did not resume until 17 January, when John Rogan, as senior judge, joined Colonel William Lyon.<sup>1171</sup> It was at this 17 January hearing, in Dr O'Malley's assessment, that arrangements negotiated by Mackay over the Military Settlements block were confirmed. A further sitting of the court in March 1867 also seems to have been largely concerned with confirming out-of-court arrangements in money or land relating to claims in the Military Settlements block.

The operation of the court, Dr O'Malley said, 'remains, in many respects, a total mystery, given that even something as basic as where and when it sat remains open to some speculation'.<sup>1172</sup> Dr O'Malley considered that information from newspaper accounts suggested that the Compensation Court minutes that have survived were a partial and even misleading description of the sittings: 'Those minutes, it would seem, can hardly be taken as anything like a reliable guide to proceedings.'<sup>1173</sup>

We saw no evidence, however, of official minutes of the January 1867 hearings. What evidence we have comes in the form of newspaper reports, and Dr O'Malley located only limited first-hand coverage in the Daily Southern Cross of the Compensation Court sittings after the 10 January session. No detailed account appears to exist of the 17 January session.

There can be little confidence, therefore, that the court made thorough inquiries when it considered claims or that customary interests or the requirements of tikanga were considered. The 316,000-acre Military Settlements block was disposed of in just a few days. The Native Land Court, for all its flaws, could spend months hearing a block of similar size.<sup>1174</sup> Dr O'Malley found that 'awards were generally made to named individuals, without any specified tribal affiliations' and was unable to discern any pattern to the court's process of making awards.<sup>1175</sup>

It seems probable that, where the Military Settlements block was concerned, the court did little more than confirm arrangements already negotiated by the Crown agents. On 23 January the Daily Southern Cross reported: 'The claims for land further south, which present no difficulties, are still being settled by Mr Mackay out of Court, who, contrary to the orthodox official hours of from 10 to 4, seldom ceases his labours till close upon midnight.'<sup>1176</sup> Somewhat confusing this interpretation, however is a later report which indicated that, by the end of January, arrangements had not 'proceeded further than Hopuhopu', midway between Ngāruawahia and Taupiri.<sup>1177</sup>

The same newspaper noted that the majority of of claims negotiated by MacKay 'do not, on an average, receive more than one-tenth of the quantity claimed' and that 'Mr Mackay has done all in his power to save the Government from being

---

1171. Document A22, pp 538–543; AJHR, 1865, D-13, p 2; Daily Southern Cross, 23 January 1867, p 5.

1172. Document A22, p 549.

1173. Document A22, p 549.

1174. Document A22, p 472.

1175. Document A22, p 15.

1176. Daily Southern Cross, 23 January 1867 (doc A22, p 542).

1177. Daily Southern Cross, 30 January 1867 (doc A22, p 545).

victimised may be inferred from the fact that the Maoris, who are particularly apt in seizing on any prominent characteristic, have named him the “Land-robber.”<sup>1178</sup>

The extent to which the Crown, as a litigant in the court, sought to minimise its obligations and expand the definition of rebellion is clear from Dr O’Malley’s account of Mackay’s concerted effort to oppose granting compensation to the Reverend Tarawhiti, who had done no more than provide spiritual comfort to injured rebels during the conflict.<sup>1179</sup>

A further problem, and one that was noted at the time, was the way a court comprising only a handful of individuals forced hundreds of Māori to leave their communities and crops to travel to and camp in town centres, rather than the court hearing them on the very lands that were the subject of their claims.<sup>1180</sup>

All in all, we consider that Māori participation in the court was more likely a reflection of lack of options than of support for the process.

By the time the Compensation Court heard the Military Settlements claims, the New Zealand Settlements Amendment and Continuance Act 1865 provided for compensation to be awarded in land rather than cash.<sup>1181</sup> The reasons for this change are not clear. In his report, Dr O’Malley suggested the Crown might have been motivated by a desire to act justly towards the claimants, but also that it sought to reduce its costs. Both reasons were suggested by Judge Fenton, who preferred the former on the basis that: ‘The honor of the Crown is to be preferred to its profit.’<sup>1182</sup> Dr O’Malley considered these reasons might in fact be related, insofar as the return of land might have ameliorated tensions within groups who might otherwise be drawn to the Kingitanga.<sup>1183</sup> When questioned by the Crown on this point, however, Dr O’Malley was more certain. He said that by the time of this legislative change the Crown’s confiscation policies were proving far less profitable than expected. In essence, according to Dr O’Malley, the ‘Crown was losing money and I think they wanted the flexibility to award compensation in land in order to save money.’<sup>1184</sup>

We described earlier (section 6.9.4.1) how the awards eventually granted to Māori in the parts of the Military Settlements block of most interest to the claimants appear to have corresponded exactly, in area, with the overall allocation set aside for that purpose when the block was first surveyed in 1865. Given that the awards were based on out-of-court settlements arranged by the Crown’s agent, we think this is unlikely to be a coincidence. As noted, by 1867 the Crown had legislated to exert considerable control over the compensation process. This strongly 1178. Daily Southern Cross, 23 January 1867 (doc A22, p 544).

1179. Document A22, pp 554–560.

1180. Document A22, p 550.

1181. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 846–847 (O’Malley, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10 April 2013).

1182. FD Fenton, Proceedings of the Compensation Court at New Plymouth, 1 June – 12 July 1866, AJHR, 1866, A-13, p 9 (doc A22, p 488).

1183. Document A22, pp 488–489.

1184. Transcript 4.1.10, p 1054 (O’Malley, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 11 April 2013).

suggests that compensation was not offered to fulfil obligations the Crown determined that it owed to 'loyal' Māori. Rather, it was limited by prior allocations that were decided when the block was first surveyed.

We agree with Dr O'Malley that the composition of the court, its improvised and inconsistent processes, and ill-considered implementation on the ground all indicate that "clearing off" Maori claims appears to have been accorded a higher priority throughout than actually doing justice to them.<sup>1185</sup>

Further, the fact that awards were made to individuals rather than to Māori groups was hardly accidental. The court's governing legislation virtually required individualisation: once confiscated, the land became Crown land and customary tenure was extinguished. Dominant figures of the Compensation Court, most notably Senior Judge Fenton, also featured prominently in the Native Land Court. We agree with Dr O'Malley that the two institutions 'can be seen as part of a single Crown drive to eliminate customary (and communal) tenure.'<sup>1186</sup>

The limitations of the court's records make it nearly impossible to assess the extent to which Te Rohe Pōtae Maori participated in the Compensation Court hearings and subsequent awards. We think it likely that some did and that they received individual allocations. Whether these were in their ancestral lands is also difficult to determine, although for the reasons already given it seems unlikely to have been a priority for officials. Dr O'Malley observed that arranging compensation 'along iwi and hapū lines' appears to have been less of a priority in Waikato than in Taranaki.<sup>1187</sup> In addition, as noted earlier, the New Zealand Settlements Act Amendment Act 1866 allowed the colonial secretary to make partial or full awards of scrip. In a letter to Donald McLean, Judge Rogan called it a 'farce' that matters were settled on paper only, as this did not give claimants 'even what the Govt. promised or the Court awarded.'<sup>1188</sup>

The Ngāti Hikairo claimants argued that, in addition, the return of land to individuals by Crown grant with no restrictions on alienation made the subsequent purchase of returned lands by settlers much simpler. The sale of the great majority of the land returned to their tūpuna was raised by them as a non-raupatu claim, and we deal with it on that basis later in the report.<sup>1189</sup>

6.9.6 Were the Crown's attempts to return land to 'rebels' adequate?

In deciding not to disallow the New Zealand Settlements Act, in April 1864, Secretary of State for the Colonies Edward Cardwell wrote that, even for the 'most culpable tribes', punishment should still lead them 'to feel that they may engage in the pursuits of industry on the lands that remain to them with the same security from disturbance which is enjoyed by their most favoured fellow-subjects.'<sup>1190</sup>

1185. Document A22, p 486.

1186. Document A22, pp15–16; transcript 4.1.10, pp1147–1148 (O'Malley, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 11 April 2013).

1187. Document A22, p 638.

1188. Rogan to McLean, 14 August 1867 (doc A22, p 546 n).

1189. Submission 3.4.226, pp 21–26.

1190. Cardwell to Grey, 26 April 1864 (doc A22, p 346).

The New Zealand Settlements Act set a high threshold for eligibility for compensation. As we have seen, the Crown employed it to the full in opposing compensation claims. We agree with Dr O'Malley that, although a legal definition of rebellion was not attempted in the Act, because section 5 of the New Zealand Settlements Act set a high threshold for awarding compensation, that became 'the practical test'.<sup>1191</sup> Nevertheless, in the years after the raupatu, the Crown began to make some attempts to provide for those it considered to be rebels.

In submissions, the Crown stated that it confiscated 1,202,172 acres of Waikato land. Of this, 314,364 acres were returned to Māori, or about a quarter of what was taken.<sup>1192</sup> There was some uncertainty in our hearings as to exactly how much of this was set aside for 'rebels'. Brent Parker subsequently confirmed in evidence that it was most likely to have been 37,574 acres. The figure came from a schedule compiled early in 1927 by the Department of Lands and Survey for the Sim commission. It was based on searches of Crown grant and allotment book records and, an explanatory memorandum said, represented the amount of land included in titles that were issued.<sup>1193</sup> This amount was still only 3 per cent of the land that was taken. In the area of most concern to the claimants, immediately north of the Pūniu River, 455 acres (2.4 per cent) of Mangapiko parish and 604 acres (2.9 per cent) of Pūniu Parish parish were returned to Māori. Overall, in his study of returned lands in four parishes north of the Pūniu, Mr Innes estimated that about 80 per cent of all the land returned was awarded to 'loyal' Māori.<sup>1194</sup>

6.9.6.1 Land set aside for 'rebels' in 1879

Nothing was done to consider explicitly the rights or needs of rebels until the Confiscated Lands Act 1867, under which a portion of the land confiscated from former 'rebels' who submitted to the Queen's authority could be returned, all to be done entirely at the governor's discretion. Nothing was actually done for another 12 years. Section 2 of this Act allowed the governor to make reserves in districts confiscated under the 1863 Act and to grant this land to those who had received either no or insufficient compensation through the Compensation Court process. Section 3 authorised the governor to reserve some confiscated land to Māori who had helped to suppress the rebellion. Section 4 provided for the reservation of lands for 'surrendered rebels'.

Nine years later, the Waste Lands Administration Act 1876, at section 14, specified that the governor could proclaim any remaining confiscated land to be 'waste lands of the Crown'. That land could then be sold at a minimum price of £1 an acre. The Act also specified, at section 5, that all existing proclamations, orders-in-council, and regulations relating to confiscated lands should continue in force unless altered or repealed by other sections of the Act.

---

1191. Document A22, p 479.

1192. Submission 3.4.16, p 10.

1193. Document A139 (Parker), pp 3–4.

1194. Document A30, pp 35, 145, 255.

A year later, however, the Volunteers and Others Lands Act 1877 specified at section 6:

The provisions of ‘the Confiscated Lands Act, 1867’ shall continue in operation, and shall be deemed to have been always in operation, in respect of any reserves promised to Natives or set apart for Natives under the said Act, at any time previous to the coming into operation of ‘The Waste Lands Administration Act, 1876’ but which, for want of surveys or other unavoidable causes, could not be proclaimed previous to the time last mentioned.

Most of the grants in Waikato to ‘returned rebels’ that are relevant to this inquiry were made under this Act by Gazette notice in October 1879.

A Gazette notice in October 1879 set aside individualised titles to 35,066 acres under section 4 of the Confiscated Lands Act 1867.<sup>1195</sup> Schedule A listed those hapū and iwi that had ‘been in rebellion, but had subsequently submitted to the Queen’s authority’. They included Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Ngutu, and Ngāti Apakura and affiliated groups including Ngāti Kiri and Ngāti Raparapa. Schedule B described the lands reserved and their area, but not who they were returned to.<sup>1196</sup> Ngāti Apakura claimant Gordon Lennox considered it likely that some individuals came forward to make claims, and that ‘the Crown took the opportunity to label entire groups as “surrendered rebels”’. He noted his tupuna Penetana Pukewhau was not among those listed.<sup>1197</sup>

Ngāti Apakura individuals received some awards. Their counsel identified:

- ▶ one acre in Māngere awarded to Hira Kaoma (Ngāti Apakura);
- ▶ 50 acres in Whangamarino awarded to Hepurona Opa (Ngāti Raparapa); and
- ▶ interests in lots 73 and 75, Waipa parish (near Whāingarua Harbour), alongside Ngāti Moenoho, Ngāti Tamainu, Ngāti Hourua, and Ngāti Ahinga individuals.<sup>1198</sup>

Lot 75 was purchased by the Crown in 1889. Lot 73 was partitioned and by 1919 the Crown had reacquired all Apakura interests.<sup>1199</sup>

Mr Lennox said the award of land from outside the Apakura rohe ‘meant that we were in turn trampling on the mana whenua of other iwi and hapū.’<sup>1200</sup> He added:

They would have also been in a really difficult situation and having small share interests in lands that were far from where our whanau resided were probably of no use to them. Our whanau were probably just trying to deal with a really awful

---

1195. Document A139, p 8.

1196. ‘Reserves made under Section 4, “Confiscated Lands Act, 1867”’, 16 October 1879, New Zealand Gazette, no 109, pp 1480–1482 (doc A139(b) (Parker document bank), pp 3–5); doc K22, p 31.

1197. Document K22, p 31.

1198. Submission 3.4.228, p 56.

1199. Submission 3.4.228, p 56; doc K22, p 32.

1200. Document K22, p 32

situation, trying to make a living to feed, clothe and house the whanau on the little lands we had left to us. Maybe they sold these lands to eat. I do not know.<sup>1201</sup>

6.9.6.2 The Waikato Confiscated Lands Act 1880

In 1880, 17 years after the first Settlements Act, another compensation-related Act was passed, this time specifically addressing the Waikato lands. These it defined as lands taken by the Crown from ‘tribes and persons of the Native race formerly residing on and owning, according to their usages, lands in the district or country known by the name of Waikato’. The Waikato Confiscated Lands Act 1880 set out conditions under which the governor could grant such land to Waikato ‘former rebels’, whether those who had already ‘come in’ or those who might yet want to do so. The Act required submission to the Queen (section 4). Section 6 specified that the grants were to be ‘absolutely inalienable’. But section 7 added the rider that if the grantees or their descendants ceased ‘for a consecutive period of two years . . . to use such land as their domicile’, it could be declared forfeit and revert to the Crown.

The conditions set out by the Act were a further disincentive, as was the poor quality of the land on offer. Grants were made to individuals and were therefore inadequate as a basis for communities to prosper.<sup>1202</sup> George Wilkinson, the Government’s native agent for Waikato described the available land as ‘mostly either bald fern hills or mountainous timber land.’<sup>1203</sup>

These attempts to offer some compensation to landless supporters of the Kingitanga occurred in the context of the Crown’s efforts to extend its authority into Te Rohe Pōtae (discussed in the next chapter). Cathy Marr noted the difficulties government officials faced trying to persuade Kingitanga-aligned Māori to accept land under the 1880 Act. By 1884, Wilkinson reported little progress. Primarily, he wrote, this was because Kingitanga people would not occupy any land from the Government until a settlement with Tāwhiao was made.<sup>1204</sup>

Dr O’Malley found the lack of evidence of widespread efforts by Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū to secure the return of land to be unsurprising:

the response to appeals from ‘unsurrendered rebels’ hardly needed to be guessed at, while the kinds of higher level political negotiations between Crown officials and Kingitanga representatives that got under way from the late 1860s – more in the nature of diplomatic talks between rival states than the kind of supplicatory appeals to Parliament favoured in other situations – appeared the most realistic course to follow.<sup>1205</sup>

We agree, and discuss those negotiations in detail in the chapters which follow.

---

1201. Document K22(f), p 3.

1202. Document A78, pp 695, 696, 697.

1203. Wilkinson, report, 11 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-1, p 3 (doc A78, p 695).

1204. Document A78, p 697.

1205. Document A22, p 685.

Mr Lennox identified five blocks offered to Ngāti Apakura individuals under the 1880 Act:

- ▶ Mangapiko parish, sections 326A (19 acres), 341A (18 acres), and 338 (25 acres); and
- ▶ Ngaroto parish, sections 361 (60 acres) and 37 (36 acres).

Only the last was ever occupied, and only for a short time. In Mangapiko parish, section 226A was reserved from a portion of a rifle range; sections 341A and 338 were little more than irregular, flood-prone strips along the Pūniu River bank.<sup>1206</sup>

Because these blocks were rejected, Wilkinson, enforcing the legislation to the letter, refused to consider a request for 129 acres near Kihikihi. In 1883, he reported to the Government that ‘sufficiently troublesome times have not yet come upon them to make them grateful.’<sup>1207</sup>

6.9.6.3 Twentieth century petitions and claims

By the early years of the twentieth century, the people of the lands north of the Pūniu had reached a state of desperation rather than gratitude.

In 1910, the five allotments offered to Ngāti Apakura individuals remained unoccupied. The commissioner of lands sought an investigation by the Native Land Court. Counsel told us that ‘Apakura rangatira laid claim to the lands through the mana whenua of Apakura hapū including Apakura, Te Rau, Hinetu, Rangimahora, and Tukemata’. The matter was adjourned for consideration by the chief judge of the court, but Mr Innes was unable to locate any further records within the court process. Within five years, according to evidence provided by Mr Innes, the three Mangapiko parish allotments which comprised a narrow strip along the northern bank of the Pūniu had been sold by the Crown to settlers. Mr Innes was unable to discover the later history of the two Ngaroto sections.<sup>1208</sup>

In 1912, Rihi Te Rauparaha sought the return of land at Ngāroto. She was told by the Department of Lands that the land had been granted to settlers by the Crown, that Lake Ngāroto was Crown property, and that neither she nor her whānau had any rights there.<sup>1209</sup>

In 1913, a petition from Pura Kangāhi and 23 others of Ngāti Apakura sought the return of section 361, Ngāroto parish; sections 388, 339, and 341, Pūniu parish; section 223, Rangiaowhia parish; and sections 161, 164, 165, and 168, Tuhikaramea parish. The petitioners did not own ‘a single acre’ and ‘we are young, there is not an old person amongst us’. They were Ngāti Apakura, but ‘most of our tribe are wandering we know not where.’<sup>1210</sup> The Crown’s response was simply that ‘there is no legal power to grant your request.’<sup>1211</sup>

1206. Submission 3.4.228, p 59.

1207. Wilkinson, report, 11 June 1883, AJHR, 1883, G-1, p 3 (doc A78, p 696).

1208. Submission 3.4.228, p 61; doc A30, pp 220–223; doc A30(a) (Innes document bank), vol 1, pp 183–189.

1209. Document K22(a), p 178.

1210. Pura Kangaahi and 23 others to prime minister, 3 July 1913 (doc A22(a), vol 1, p 412).

1211. Under-Secretary, Lands and Survey Department, to Pura Kangaahi and others, August 1913 (doc A22, p 614).

A petition from George Warren in 1917 stated that the sections were 'reserved for the Maoris and we have been to see this land. Now, we consider that this land is unsuitable for a kainga. This land adjoins the Puniu Stream and is unsuitable as a kainga for us.'<sup>1212</sup>

Dr O'Malley identified two earlier efforts to raise this issue with respect to sections 338, 339, and 341A in Mangapiko parish. In 1923, Raureti Te Huia petitioned the Native Affairs Committee for the return of those sections. The committee made no recommendation.<sup>1213</sup> In 1911 he had written to the Public Trustee seeking information on these sections. In 1915, he told Maui Pōmare, MP for Western Maori, that if the land had been awarded to 'landless Maoris', 'then, we are part of these landless people, and the said lands originally belonged to us before they were confiscated.'<sup>1214</sup>

In 1927, the Sim commission reported to Parliament. The commission (discussed in more detail in section 6.9.7) was charged with examining whether the extent of the confiscations of the 1860s was reasonable. In Waikato, the passage of the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Claims Settlement Act in 1946 was the Crown's eventual response to the commission's finding that the confiscations were excessive. Rather than resolving the grievances, however, the Act prompted further petitions that highlighted the parlous state of Māori north of the Pūniu, 80 years after the Military Settlements block was confiscated. By then, as Mr Innes has shown, the small portions of land set aside for Māori in the block had been largely long since alienated.

In 1947, a petition from Karena Tamaki and 57 others of Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Puhiawe sought the return of land around Lake Ngāroto and Mangaotama Stream for development and tuna fishing. The petitioners' principal allegation was that in 1867 the Crown set aside 4,500 acres for Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Puhiawe, which it later repossessed. The petitioners were represented in the subsequent Maori Land Court hearing by Pei Te Hurinui, who stated that 'no other tribe in the Waikato . . . suffered so severely'. Te Hurinui argued that granting further compensation to Ngāti Apakura would set no precedent because no other tribe had suffered 'to the extent that there was total confiscation as was the case with these people.'<sup>1215</sup> The court agreed that confiscation affected Ngāti Apakura 'to a greater extent perhaps than other sections of the Waikatos', but recommended the petition be dismissed, first, because the 4,500 acres was found never to have been reserved and, secondly, because the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Claims Settlement Act barred the relief sought.<sup>1216</sup>

Also in 1947, a petition from Raureti Te Huia and 75 others on behalf of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu requested an inquiry into several sections and 1212. Warren to Native Minister, October [1917] (doc A22, p 819).

1213. Document A22, p 818.

1214. Raureti Te Huia to Maui Pomare, 4 January 1915 (doc A22, pp 818–819).

1215. Petition 29/1947 and associated minutes (doc A29(d) (claimant counsel, documents for cross-examination), pp 13, 22); submission 3.4.228, pp 61–62.

1216. 'Report and Recommendation on Petition No 29 of 1947, of Karena Tamaki and Others', AJHR, 1949, G-6C, pp 2–5 (doc A29(d), pp 37, 38, 40); submission 3.4.228, pp 61–62.

allotments within the Mangapiko and Puniu parishes, and the Kihikihi township. They said the land had been returned to the wrong people, specifically to those belonging to hapū that had no claim to the land, and asked for the manner in which the sections had been awarded to be investigated.<sup>1217</sup> Specifically, the petition raised:

- ▶ Mangapiko parish, lot 321 (173 acres, Otawhao) and lot 322 (870 acres, Otawhao) were grievances in relation to endowment of lands for education. We address this issue in chapter 5.
- ▶ Mangapiko parish, lots 234, 323, 196, 197, 206, 208, 235, and 253 were allegedly ‘native reserve claimed by wrongful title holder’ or as Harold Maniapoto told this inquiry, returned to the wrong hapū.
- ▶ Mangapiko parish, lots 338, 339, 341A, 342, 343, 325, 316, 398, 205, 209, and 231 were allegedly ‘native reserve unclaimed by Natives’ or ‘returned to Māori but subsequently were sold by the Crown to Europeans’.
- ▶ Puniu parish, lots 432, 84, 343, 15, 100, 111, 344, 43, 44, 45, 182, and 341 were allegedly ‘native reserve claimed by wrongful title holder’ or, as Mr Maniapoto said, returned to the wrong hapū;
- ▶ Puniu parish, lots 131, 135, 136, 73, 68, 79, 80, 81, 113, 117, 119, 120, 695, 99, 151, and 69 were allegedly ‘native reserve unclaimed by Natives’ or ‘returned to Māori but subsequently were sold by the Crown to Europeans’.
- ▶ Kihikihi township lots 180, 173, and 174 (Huiturangi and Turata) were also listed.<sup>1218</sup>

These matters, too, were referred to the Maori Land Court in 1948. Again, the court ruled the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Claims Settlement Act had settled all claims against the Crown arising from the raupatu.<sup>1219</sup>

Mr Maniapoto told us neither Ngāti Paretekawa nor the Rangiwāero section of Ngāti Ngutu ‘received any lands whatsoever from these or other reserves set aside for their “aboriginal” use as a result of the confiscation.’<sup>1220</sup> None of the land of his hapū has ever been returned, he said.<sup>1221</sup>

6.9.7 Did the Crown establish proper processes for investigating raupatu grievances?

The Crown has acknowledged that processes to investigate raupatu grievances were imposed without consultation.<sup>1222</sup> This section examines two processes established by the Crown: the Ngāti Kauwhata claims commission in 1881 and the Sim commission in 1927.

1217. Document A22, p 817.

1218. Document A59(b) (Mitchell document bank), pp 2814–2832; doc K35, pp 41–42; AJHR, 1950, G-6. In his report on returned lands (doc A30), Craig Innes discusses lots 196, 197, 206, 208, 253, 255, 323, 338, 339, and 341A in Mangapiko parish, and lots 15, 100, 111, 344, 43, 44, 45, 182A, and 341 in Puniu parish.

1219. Document A22, p 817.

1220. Document K35, p 43.

1221. Document K35, p 39.

1222. Statement 1.3.1, pp 44–45, 49; submission 3.1.192, p 3; submission 3.4.300, pp 1–2.

6.9.7.1 The Ngāti Kauwhata claims commission

After the raupatu, Ngāti Kauwhata struggled persistently for a proper inquiry into the nature and extent of their interests in Waikato. In 1877, Ngāti Kauwhata rangatira Tapa Te Whata petitioned Parliament alleging that they had claims to land in the Waikato confiscation district that were not heard by the Compensation Court because they did not know about its hearings. The Native Affairs Committee considered the petitioners 'are entitled to have an opportunity afforded them of bringing forward their claims'. The committee recommended that the Native Land Court 'or other competent tribunal' conduct an inquiry.<sup>1223</sup> A second petition complained that in 1868, Ngāti Kauwhata leaders had been informed of two upcoming Native Land Court hearings affecting them, one in Cambridge and the other in Bulls, to be held nearly concurrently. Native Minister J C Richmond had advised them to remain in Rangitikei and that the Cambridge hearing would be delayed. It was not.<sup>1224</sup>

The Ngati Kauwhata Claims commission of 1881 was the Crown's response to these grievances. At the outset of the commission's hearings, the claimants made clear their expectation that the matter of confiscated lands would be addressed. However, the terms of the commission referred only to the Native Land Court matter and provided no jurisdiction to inquire into the confiscations.<sup>1225</sup>

6.9.7.2 The Sim commission

In September 1925, Prime Minister Gordon Coates announced his government's intention to establish a royal commission to investigate raupatu issues throughout New Zealand. The Prime Minister ruled out consideration of the Treaty of Waitangi by the commission. In the Prime Minister's view, Māori involved in the wars had 'repudiated the Treaty, and with the Treaty the cession of sovereignty to the Crown, which was the basis of the Treaty'.<sup>1226</sup> The commission, chaired by Supreme Court Judge William Sim, was instead to undertake a 'benevolent consideration of the question whether the extent of the territorial confiscation was just and fair under the circumstances of the warfare and the actions taken by Natives and by Europeans'.<sup>1227</sup> These restrictions were carried into the terms of reference for the Sim commission, as it became known.<sup>1228</sup>

Also excluded from consideration were:

- ▶ the legality of the New Zealand Settlements Act and amendments;
- ▶ any increase in the value of the land confiscated; or
- ▶ the socio-economic impacts of raupatu.

Any redress was to be monetary, rather than provided in land.<sup>1229</sup>

1223. Bryce, report on petition, AJHR, 1877, 1-3, p 6 (doc A120, p 188).

1224. Document A120, pp 188-189.

1225. Document A120, pp 194-195; doc K1(a), pp 10-42; submission 3.4.134, pp 18-23.

1226. Coates, 28 September 1925, NZPD, vol 208, p 774 (doc A29 (Sarich), p 229).

1227. Coates, 28 September 1925, NZPD, vol 208, p 774.

1228. Document A29, p 230.

1229. Document A29, pp 230-231.

The commissioners investigated all the major confiscations over a period of eight months. Evidence on the Taranaki raupatu was heard at Waitara from 10 to 17 February 1927, and evidence on the Waikato raupatu was heard at Ngāruawāhia from 20 to 22 April the same year.

Lead counsel for the Waikato claimants, David Smith, argued for a clear distinction to be drawn between ‘the Waikato tribes’ and the ‘Ngatimaniapotos’. Waikato had not been in rebellion, he said, while Ngāti Maniapoto were ‘rebels’ and had deserved confiscation.<sup>1230</sup> Historian Jonathan Sarich described how Smith drew heavily on the account by John Gorst in The Maori King to assert that Ngāti Maniapoto and Rewi Maniapoto, in particular, had planned to attack Auckland. The attack, Smith claimed, was prevented by the ‘Waikato’ tribes led by Wiremu Tamihana. Smith said:

Now, I pause to remark that at this time it was the Waikato tribes who stood between the Ngatimaniapotos and the Europeans at Auckland, and saved them from an attack . . . , and the tragedy of the situation is this, that when we come to the confiscations we find that the Ngatimaniapotos lost practically no land at all whereas the Waikatos lost an enormous area of their best land.<sup>1231</sup>

Subsequent petitions by Ngāti Maniapoto pointed out that no opportunity had been provided to present evidence to the commission from a Ngāti Maniapoto perspective. Nor, according to Mr Sarich, did the Crown consult Ngāti Maniapoto when, directly following the hearings, officials took steps to establish a distinct boundary between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto. Mr Taylor, acting as Crown counsel before the commission, wrote to the Department of Lands and Survey on 30 May 1927 ‘with the object of establishing the position of the boundary between the Waikato and Maniapoto Tribes’. On 2 June, the commissioner of Crown lands supplied a map along with an explanation of its sources:

The Native Land Court minute books dealing with investigation of titles to certain blocks have been searched and [Native Land Court] Judge MacCormick has been interviewed and also Mr George Graham a local student of Maori History.<sup>1232</sup>

The map marked a distinct boundary between ‘Waikato’ and ‘Maniapoto’ that happened to coincide exactly with the extent of the Crown’s confiscations. The map, Mr Sarich concluded, ‘suggests that Ngati Maniapoto lands were unaffected by confiscation.’<sup>1233</sup>

When the Sim commission subsequently reported it concluded that Ngāti Maniapoto, led by Rewi, together with Ngāti Hauā and ‘Ngatimehitia’ had been the tribes ‘principally engaged in the rebellion’. The commission found that the

---

1230. Document A29, pp 232–233.

1231. Smith, minutes of evidence, Raupatu Document Bank, vol 49, p18933 (doc A29, p 233 n).

1232. Commissioner of Crown lands to Taylor, 2 June 1927 (doc A29, pp 235–236).

1233. Document A29, p 236.

confiscation had allowed the 'Ngatimaniapotos to escape without any loss of territory, and made the Waikatos the chief sufferers.'<sup>1234</sup>

On the release of the Sim commission report in 1927, Ngāti Maniapoto presented two petitions to Parliament. The petitions asserted that the commission's statements regarding confiscation were incorrect and the iwi had interests in 'large areas' of land that had been confiscated in the 'Cambridge, Kihikihi, Pirongia, Ohaupo, Waikato and Ngaruawahia districts'. The petitioners, who included Hotu Taua Pakuhatu, Hone Te Anga, Mokena Patupatu, and members of the Hotu, Barton, Amohanga, Hetet, and Ngatai whānau, asked that the Government delay any decision it might make as a result of the Sim commission report until Ngāti Maniapoto had been able to present a claim. The response, from the Under-Secretary of Native Affairs, was that hearings had been held in the 'Waikato-Maniapoto District' and the investigation was complete.<sup>1235</sup>

Mr Sarich provided evidence of ongoing, but largely unsuccessful, efforts by some Ngāti Maniapoto to have a voice in negotiating a settlement with the Crown.<sup>1236</sup> Although Pei Te Hurinui was closely involved, it was in his capacity as an advisor to the Kīngitanga rather than as a representative of Ngāti Maniapoto.<sup>1237</sup>

The eventual result of the negotiations following the Sim commission's findings on the Waikato raupatu was the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Claims Settlement Act 1946. Mr Paul Meredith and Mr Sarich provided further evidence of Ngāti Maniapoto protest at this time.

Hori Tana (George Turner) stated: 'This is a matter that affects the whole of the Waikato tribes and also the Maniapoto tribe.'<sup>1238</sup> Tohiopipiri Moerua of Te Korapatu, Te Kūiti, told the Prime Minister that Ngāti Maniapoto were unanimous in seeking an investigation of the title of the confiscated Waikato lands.<sup>1239</sup> At a hui, held in Ōtorohanga in late September 1946, representatives of 16 Ngāti Maniapoto hapū objected to the Act, and the members and name of the trust board. Wi Nikora and 243 others, 'the soldiers of World War One and Two of the Ngati Maniapoto tribe including the parents and widows,' telegraphed the governor-general: 'We feel that unless we are given an opportunity to meet the Minister in our territory that a great injustice will have been done.'<sup>1240</sup> 1234. AJHR, 1928, G-7, pp 16–17 (doc A29, pp 236–237).

1235. Hotu Taua Pakuhatu and others, petition 175/1927 (doc A29, pp 237–238); Hone Te Anga and others, petition 176/1927 (doc A29, pp 237–238); Under-Secretary of Native Affairs to chairman, Native Affairs Committee, 6 September 1927 (doc A29, p 238).

1236. Document A29, pp 238–244. In February 1938, Reihana Amohanga of Ngāti Kaputuhi asked that his hapū join negotiations. Marae Erueti and Hori Tana wrote to Prime Minister Michael Savage on 4 March 1938, worried that their representatives were not present at negotiations. On 22 February 1939, Chas Searancke Junior wrote to Native Minister Frank Langstone on behalf of Hongihongi Tapara of Te Kopua Mission Station, Te Kawa, asking about progress. In February 1940, Ruhe Rangitaawa Mohi iti asked Langstone about the return of confiscated land by Mangaohoi Stream, near Te Awamutu.

1237. Document A29, p 239.

1238. 'Notes of Meeting held at Turangawaewae Marae', 20 April 1946 (doc A2 (Meredith), p 2).

1239. Document A2, p 2.

1240. Wi Nikora to governor-general, 7 October 1946 (doc A29, p 259).

Some changes were made, probably in part in response to ongoing opposition. Pei Te Hurinui told the Native Affairs Minister that 90 per cent of the beneficiaries of the trust board that would administer the settlement were Waikato, 'but there are sections of two important Tainui tribes also concerned, namely the Ngatimaniapoto and the Ngati Raukawa – the district around the Puniu, Te Awamutu and Kihikihi area being their former tribal lands.'<sup>1241</sup> Mr Sarich concluded that the decision to call the board the Tainui Maori Trust Board was an acknowledgement of this fact. The board later described the name change as a gift from Waikato to Maniapoto: 'Ka puta te kupu a Te Puea me whakanoho ki roto i te ingoa o te Ture te ingoa o Ngati Maniapoto, hei Koha ma Waikato.'<sup>1242</sup> The name of the settlement Bill was changed from the Waikato Maori Claims Settlement to the Waikato-Maniapoto Maori Claims Settlement Bill.<sup>1243</sup>

Addressing the Bill in Parliament, the Prime Minister said it would 'remove that load of injustice from the minds of the people in the Waikato and King-Country' and 'the thoughts of the Maori people can turn to a future brighter even than their glorious past.'<sup>1244</sup>

After the Bill became law, the Native Minister sought to reassure those of Ngāti Maniapoto who remained opposed, writing: 'The section of Maniapoto people whose land was confiscated will have a representative on the Board.'<sup>1245</sup> In 1948, the regulations gazetting the representation of Tainui tribes on the trust board were amended to state, for the Pūniu region (including Mangatoatoa, Kihikihi, Te Awamutu, and Ōrākau): 'a) Ngati Paretekawa; b) Ngati Ngutu (sections of the Ngati Maniapoto tribe).'<sup>1246</sup>

In the present inquiry, Crown counsel submitted that the 1995 and 2009 Waikato raupatu settlements 'are based on the same rationale as the 1946 settlement.'<sup>1247</sup> Clearly this is incorrect. By agreeing, in this inquiry, that claimants could bring raupatu claims on the basis of Ngāti Maniapoto whakapapa, the Crown effectively acknowledged that those Ngāti Maniapoto whose lands were confiscated have received no redress from the 1995 and 2009 Waikato settlements. This is not to question the integrity of these settlements. It is simply to explain how they differ from the settlement reached in 1946.

6.9.8 Treaty analysis and findings

Although the Crown made relatively wide-ranging concessions on confiscation in this inquiry, several issues remained to be determined. First, we think it is necessary to address the reasons why the Crown decided to confiscate Māori land. We 1241. Pei Te Hurinui to Mason, 30 May 1946 (doc A29, p 256).

1242. Pei Te Hurinui, Poari Kai-Tiaki Maori O Tainui, Ko Te Ripoaata Whanui Whakaaturanga o nga Moni, March 1947, pp 22–23 (doc A29, p 256).

1243. Document A29, p 256.

1244. Fraser, 18 September 1946, NZPD, vol 275, p 39 (doc A29, p 258).

1245. Mason to Reihana Te Amohanga, not dated (doc A29, p 260); doc A2, p 5.

1246. 'Tainui Trust Board – Appointment of Members', 22 July 1948, New Zealand Gazette, no 41, p 906 (doc A29, p 271); doc A2, p 6.

1247. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 29.

have already found that the reasons given at the time by the Crown for its military actions were, in essence, pretexts for an overriding intention to destroy Māori authority and institutions. Confiscation, which annulled all customary rights to land and created a clean slate for European settlement, was considered by Governor Grey to be an indispensable part of his war policy: he could ‘devise no other plan’ to ensure the ‘entire command’ of Waikato.<sup>1248</sup> Our earlier finding that the Crown’s attack on the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori breached the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy is therefore also applicable to the subsequent acts of confiscation.

We first make findings in relation to Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki, and then turn to Waikato.

6.9.8.1 Taranaki

In Taranaki, the Crown acknowledged that its confiscation of Ngāti Maniapoto interests was an injustice and breached Treaty principles. This is appropriate, and we therefore now assess the extent of the loss and resulting prejudice.

Our analysis has shown that when war began at Waitara in 1860, Ngāti Maniapoto retained an interest over much of northern Taranaki as a consequence of the wars of the 1820s and 1830s. This interest was acknowledged by the Crown at the time and welcomed to the extent that Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira were able to mediate in disputes among hapū and reassure inhabitants of the New Plymouth settlement. We described the way that Ngāti Maniapoto negotiated the gradual return to Taranaki, according to tikanga, of the former inhabitants who had either been taken north or retreated south into exile. Before hostilities broke out, Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira had made clear to the Crown their stance that Waikāramuramu Stream at Pukearuhe formed a boundary beyond which their southern neighbours could claim no rights.

We make two findings with respect to Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki. First, the Crown knew Ngāti Maniapoto asserted a boundary at Waikāramuramu, and by drawing an arbitrary line of confiscation beginning at Parininihi running due east for 20 miles, the Crown took Ngāti Maniapoto lands. When Ngāti Maniapoto questioned the inland course and extent of the confiscation in 1881, Crown official Parris was unable to explain where, on the ground, the Crown’s boundary lay. (We discuss the inland extent of Ngāti Maniapoto interests in more detail in chapters 7 and 8.) We agree with the Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Tama Cross Claims Tribunal that the concept of exclusive boundaries is unhelpful in determining rights to land in a customary Māori context. We endorse the view of that Tribunal that confiscation boundaries are ‘simplistic and bald, and bear no relation to tikanga’ and will ‘usually be wrong’. We also acknowledge that at a later period, in the 1880s, Ngāti Maniapoto rangatira asserted a boundary slightly north of Waikāramuramu, at Waipingao. That said, we prefer the pre-war assertion of Waikāramuramu to Waipingao, because the latter was made subsequent to actions the Crown now acknowledges to be Treaty breaches and which were clearly prejudicial to Ngāti Maniapoto. Secondly, because the Crown never properly investigated the extent to which Ngāti Maniapoto retained rights and interests in Taranaki, despite implicitly acknowledging them before war broke out, it is also appropriate to make a finding that the Crown did not uphold the Treaty guarantee of the tino rangatiratanga of Ngāti Maniapoto. This was in effect an extinguishment of tikanga that caused severe prejudice to the mana of Ngāti Maniapoto.

---

<sup>1248</sup> Grey to Newcastle, 29 August 1863, ‘Papers relating to Military Settlements in the Northern Island of New Zealand’, AJHR, 1863, A-8, p.1.

Although the Taranaki Tribunal found the New Zealand Settlements Acts were lawful, it was particularly critical of the shortcomings in the Crown's application of the law in northern Taranaki, because Māori there were not at war. We endorse that Tribunal's conclusion that the confiscation of northern Taranaki was probably unlawful, to the extent it is applicable to Ngāti Maniapoto rights and interests in Taranaki.

No claims were made to the Compensation Court in Taranaki by Ngāti Maniapoto. As a consequence of being classed as unsurrendered rebels we consider that the court would have excluded any claims they had made from consideration.

6.9.8.2 Waikato

In Waikato, although the Crown has previously acknowledged the wrongfulness of confiscation, it addressed its apology to the Kingitanga. Evidence was needed, the Crown said, that iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae had rights in the Waikato raupatu district that were distinct from 'Waikato Tainui'.

The Crown acknowledged that neither the Waikato Raupatu Claims Settlement Act 1995 nor the Waikato-Tainui Raupatu Claims (Waikato River) Settlement Act 2010 prevented Ngāti Maniapoto from bringing raupatu claims. Many Ngāti Maniapoto-affiliated hapū have done so. The extent to which most of these claimants have been able to point to the loss of specific rights and interests has been, in the main, limited. After 150 years this is not altogether unexpected but does not in our view excuse the Crown. At the time of the invasion the Crown planned to and did in fact occupy Ngāti Maniapoto territory.

Two Ngāti Maniapoto-affiliated groups asserted strong evidence that their interests in the Waikato raupatu district were confiscated. Those groups, Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura, are also named in the Waikato Settlement Acts. We determined that they could still bring claims on the basis of non-Waikato affiliations, in accordance with the jurisdictional text agreed by the parties at an early stage of this inquiry (see chapter 1). These claimants, representing Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura, asserted rights around Kihikihi and Te Awamutu, and Rangiaowhia and Ngāroto respectively. (The Ngāti Paretekawa claimants said that they also spoke on behalf of the Rangiwāero section of Ngāti Ngutu, the latter hapū also named in the Waikato settlements, although the Crown did not specifically argue this point.) Although the Crown contested the right of these groups to bring claims, it did not contest the extent of the interests they claimed.

The Crown presented a number of factors it considered would be relevant to deciding whether the raupatu claims of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura are well founded. In particular, the Crown said these four factors would apply:

- ▶ Does the claimant group/hapū have distinct non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui whakapapa?
- ▶ Does the traditional area of interest of the claimant group/hapū, or part of that area, fall outside the Waikato confiscation area?
- ▶ Can the claimant group/hapū assert customary interests within the Waikato confiscation area on the basis of distinct non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui whakapapa?
- ▶ Is the group functioning as such, 'on the ground' and on the basis of its non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui affiliation?

In the Crown's submission, 'a negative answer to any of the first four questions must automatically result in a finding that the claimant group does not have a distinct and separate non-Waikato or non-Waikato-Tainui raupatu claim.'<sup>1249</sup>

With respect to the first three questions we consider the answer for both groups to be yes. The fourth question, we think, is misconceived. The rangatiratanga of hapū is present and maintained independently of the iwi to which they may affiliate.

We understand from the Crown's closing submissions on specific claims that its chief concern with regard to the claims of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Apakura is that it has already concluded a settlement that includes them. The implication, that these groups are somehow 'double-dipping', is not an argument we accept. The evidence is clear that although Ngāti Paretekawa have close links to Waikato, primarily through Pōtatau Te Wherowhero, the hapū is essentially of Ngāti Maniapoto. The Crown told us that the 1995 settlement was 'based on the same rationale as the 1946 settlement'. As we explained in section 6.9.7, this cannot be correct because the earlier settlement explicitly included Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu as hapū of Ngāti Maniapoto. This was despite the fact that the Sim commission inquiry, which formed the basis for negotiating the 1946 settlement, blamed Ngāti Maniapoto for the war. Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu may have been included, we think, because Waikato sought to ensure that their Ngāti Maniapoto whanaunga could receive a share of the redress the Crown offered.

When we assessed whether Ngāti Apakura could bring raupatu claims before us, we noted their links to Ngāti Maniapoto but also the fragmentation and scattering throughout Te Rohe Pōtae and elsewhere that they suffered as a consequence of their expulsion from Rangiaowhia by the Crown. We discussed Pei Te Hurinui's attempt in 1947 to secure further redress for Ngāti Apakura subsequent to the 1946 settlement, on the basis that no other group had suffered so much from the raupatu. We consider Ngāti Apakura have suffered from Crown actions.

We find that the Crown breached the plain meaning of the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga when it confiscated lands north of the Pūniu River where Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Maniapoto-affiliated hapū had interests. Our finding encompasses but is not limited to: the lands between the Pūniu, Waipā, and 1249. Submission 3.4.310(e), pp 30–31.

---

Mangapiko Rivers, claimed by Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu; and the lands from Rangiaowhia to Lake Ngāroto, the ancestral homelands of Ngāti Apakura.<sup>1250</sup>

Ngāti Kauwhata and Ngāti Wehi Wehi also claimed that their interests around Rangiaowhia were confiscated by the Crown. The evidence is not sufficient to find the Ngāti Wehi Wehi claim to be well founded. Nor are we in a position to make a finding regarding Ngāti Kauwhata interests in Rangiaowhia, although we think it is probable that they retained shared interests in the Moanatuatua and Rotoorangī swamps east of Rangiaowhia. We do, however, consider the Crown's acknowledgement that it imposed processes to consider raupatu grievances without consultation to be applicable to Ngāti Kauwhata, because despite acknowledging that their grievances had not been considered, the Crown took no action to investigate when it had the opportunity.

The Crown acknowledged that 'the prejudice that raupatu created was compounded by inadequacies in the Compensation Court'.<sup>1251</sup> We do not consider this concession goes far enough. Governor Grey made a promise that 'loyal' Māori would not lose their lands. The Compensation Court was supposed to be the means by which the promise would be kept. It is clear from the evidence of Dr O'Malley that this did not happen. In fact, it could not happen because the court was not resourced to make proper inquiries and could only make awards to individuals. Crown officials bypassed the court process when they could and simply presented arrangements to the court for ratification. More often than not, it appears, Māori who applied to the court did not retain their own lands, which the Crown had already allocated to settlers, but were given small pieces of poor land in distant locations. The evidence indicates, further, that officials' priority at all times was to minimise the obligation to the Crown rather than ensure that its citizens' rights to due process were protected. We find that, by failing to ensure that Māori who did not fall within the Crown's own definition of rebellion did not lose their lands, the Crown failed in its duty of active protection and breached the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of good governance.

The claimants argued that the award of lands to individuals, rather than to iwi or hapū, contributed to 'the breakdown of the Māori social structure'.<sup>1252</sup> The Crown has acknowledged that individualisation of tenure through Native land laws 'contributed to the undermining of tribal structures in the Rohe Pōtae' and breached Treaty principles.<sup>1253</sup> This acknowledgement of Treaty breach, in our view, must also apply to the Compensation Court process.

Those Te Rohe Pōtae Māori who were labelled as rebels were ineligible to receive anything from the court. Subsequent attempts by the Crown to offer redress to those it had labelled as rebels were conditional on accepting 'rebel' status and made with the intention of attracting support away from the Kingitanga. For these 1250. See the map provided in submission 3.1.159, p [3].

1251. Submission 3.4.300, pp 2, 23.

1252. Submission 3.4.127, p 37.

1253. Statement 1.3.1, p 53.

reasons we do not consider the offers can be understood to have been made in good faith.

The Crown's concession regarding the investigation of raupatu grievances certainly applies to its establishment of the Sim commission. The investigation proceeded on limited grounds that were not decided in consultation with Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū. Nor does there seem to have been any real opportunity for Ngāti Maniapoto to present their claims. This was a further consequence of the Crown's labelling of the iwi as rebels, and we find these failures to be a breach of the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principle of partnership.

6.10 PREJUDICE

Our analysis to this point has identified a number of very serious Treaty breaches by the Crown arising from its raupatu in Taranaki and Waikato. In particular, we have pointed to the damage to relations between the Crown and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, loss of life, lands, and other property, and the limitations of Crown processes to investigate grievances and compensate for wrongdoing. In broad terms the Crown has rightly accepted a large degree of responsibility for the war and its effects. These effects, the Crown said, were significant and wide-ranging. Nevertheless, in our view the prejudicial effects of the raupatu go a considerable way beyond what the Crown has conceded in this inquiry. In this section of the chapter we complete our assessment of the prejudicial effects of the raupatu.

6.10.1 The parties' arguments

The Crown acknowledged impacts on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori that included a serious deterioration of their relationship with the Crown; injuries and the loss of innocent lives; the loss of property, including 'land and resources considered to be taonga'; and significant social and economic disruption, in part because of the need to support refugees. The Crown submitted that not all the adversities and disruption suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori since the 1860s could be attributed to raupatu.<sup>1254</sup> Moreover, counsel submitted that in fact that the Crown took steps 'to address and mitigate the effects of war and raupatu on Rohe Pōtae Māori' after the war.<sup>1255</sup>

The claimants vehemently disputed these assertions and argued that the Crown's acknowledgements did not go far enough. In their view, the qualifying statements made by Crown counsel were intended to minimise the Crown's responsibility for the effects of the raupatu and took insufficient account of the impacts that were described in the kōrero of the tangata whenua. Of particular concern to the claimants were statements about the uncertainty surrounding the number of Māori casualties and the suggestion that the 'immediate' effects of war were

---

1254. Submission 3.4.300, pp 21–22.

1255. Submission 3.4.300, pp 24–25.

minimal.<sup>1256</sup> Whereas the Crown suggested that casualties ranged in the ‘dozens’, claimant counsel cited Vincent O’Malley’s estimate that the numbers of lives lost by Māori communities in the Waikato war was likely to be proportionately comparable to New Zealand’s losses in the First World War.<sup>1257</sup> Counsel argued that the loss of rangatira destabilised Māori communities and undermined broader political cohesion.<sup>1258</sup> Casualties suffered during the war, they said, inhibited the social and economic capacity of their communities.<sup>1259</sup>

The Crown acknowledged there was ‘no doubt’ that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori whose territories were occupied by Crown soldiers suffered considerable economic disruption. In counsel’s submission, although a lack of evidence of the ‘state of affairs within the King Country’ before the mid-1880s made an accurate assessment of social and economic effects difficult, the economic disruption was less substantial ‘for those south of the line’.<sup>1260</sup>

Counsel for the claimants contended that the significant number of exiled whanaunga retreating into Te Rohe Pōtae compounded the social and political disruption caused by the war and put economic resources under considerable pressure. They cited evidence which suggests that the population of some areas, chiefly around Tokangamutu (modern-day Te Kūiti), increased by a factor of four.<sup>1261</sup> This influx put pressure on food and resources already depleted by the war and contributed to poor health and sanitation, leading to starvation and sickness.<sup>1262</sup> Conversely, some claimants who remain today displaced from their ancestral lands pointed to lingering tensions with their hosting whanaunga arising from resettlement after the confiscations.<sup>1263</sup> Ngāti Apakura and Ngāti Kauwhata, in particular, argued that the ‘indiscriminate’ placement of the confiscation line contributed to an erosion of tribal identity.<sup>1264</sup>

The raupatu had psychological effects that remained to the present day, the claimants said. This included the impact of labelling, whether as rebel or kupapa, and the unresolved nature of the grievances, particularly the memories of Crown atrocities and the lack of acknowledgement of these histories. The claimants’ grievances extended to cultural prejudice resulting from their dislocation from ancestral lands and destruction of wāhi tapu. Claimants noted the loss of reo, waiata, whaikōrero, and tikanga particular to displaced iwi and hapū.<sup>1265</sup> Additionally, they pointed to the loss of whakapapa and whanaunga knowledge arising from disconnection from the lands and relationships of their tūpuna.

1256. Submission 3.4.391, pp 3–10.

1257. Document A22(e), p 4.

1258. Submission 3.4.198, p 17; submission 3.4.186, p 18.

1259. Submission 3.4.108, p 36.

1260. Submission 3.4.300, p 23.

1261. Submission 3.4.108, p 38; doc A22, p 204.

1262. Submission 3.4.127, p 40; submission 3.4.130(b), pp 16–17.

1263. Submission 3.4.208, pp 19–20; doc K14 (Maniapoto), p 3.

1264. Submission 3.4.134, pp 18–19, pp 62–64; submission 3.4.147, p 73; submission 3.4.228, p 22. See also Ngāti Wehiwehi: submission 3.4.154(a), p 46.

1265. Submission 3.4.208, pp 19–20.

6.10.2 The main aspects of prejudice

Having reviewed the parties' positions and the matters identified in our statement of issues, we consider the key impacts for the people of Te Rohe Pōtae were as follows. Initially, the major effects were:

- ▶ the socio-economic strain caused by maintaining fighting forces in 1860–1861 and 1863–1864;
- ▶ the death and injury of combatants and non-combatants;
- ▶ the impact of disease in the aftermath of the war; and
- ▶ hosting the very large number of their whanaunga who sought refuge from the Crown.

These impacts, although clearly posing severe challenges, were relatively short-term in nature. As the next chapter demonstrates, by the end of the 1860s within the aukati proclaimed by Te Rohe Pōtae leaders the people had largely adapted to and recovered from these circumstances. Despite some ongoing social and political tensions, their communities were relatively prosperous with strong and stable leadership. However, the raupatu had undoubted long-term effects. These related to:

- ▶ dispossession of lands and property for those who lived north of the Pūniu River;
- ▶ the psychological effects of the raupatu and in particular of being labelled rebel or kupapa;
- ▶ social and cultural wellbeing, including the protection of wāhi tapu, historical memory, and the intergenerational impacts of the raupatu; and
- ▶ the impact of the raupatu on the mana of Ngāti Maniapoto.

6.10.3 Immediate socio-economic effects

In 1840, the coalition between Waikato and Ngāti Maniapoto described in chapter 2 had created one of the strongest political and military forces in New Zealand. For the two decades after the Crown brought the Treaty of Waitangi to Te Rohe Pōtae, the people of the district enjoyed a period of thriving stability that was enhanced by access to the new agricultural and economic opportunities provided by European newcomers. The region around Ōtāwhao, Kihikihi, and Rangiaowhia lay at the heart of this prosperity. European observers regularly singled out this district to praise the developments that were taking place.

In his report on the mid-nineteenth century commercial economy in Te Rohe Pōtae, Andrew Francis concluded that, although agricultural production declined from the late 1850s until the late 1860s, 'the extent to which the war is to blame is open to interpretation'. Dr Francis identified other factors, principally falling trans-Tasman commodity prices and a decline in soil quality due to overcropping, as leading to a decline in economic production from the late 1850s.<sup>1266</sup> We accept these points, but we note that quantitative evidence of declining production primarily concerns the export of wheat to Auckland.<sup>1267</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae communities were clearly still well able to provide for themselves, as shown by the substantial stores of food the British discovered when they occupied Kihikihi and Rangiaowhia in February 1864 (sections 6.7.5.5 and 6.7.9.1).

1266. Document A26, pp 94–95.

1267. See, for example, doc A26, pp 83–85.

The Crown has acknowledged that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were prejudicially affected with regard to the 'substantial resources [they] expended' to support their war effort. Crown counsel nevertheless suggested that the immediate effect of the outbreak of war, both in Taranaki and in Waikato 'was minimal'.<sup>1268</sup> These statements are difficult to reconcile.

With regard to Taranaki, the Crown endorsed James Belich's view that as much as half of the core Kingitanga fighting force went to Taranaki and that the rest may have remained behind simply 'because greater numbers could not be maintained' there.<sup>1269</sup> It is clear to us that the scale of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori engagement in the Taranaki campaign would have forced a substantial mobilisation of the population to support the war effort, not to mention careful synchronisation with the requirements of the harvest cycle. In addition, as described earlier (section 6.4.3) many men returned from Taranaki with severe injuries and permanent disabilities.

From the time of the Taranaki war until the Waikato invasion began in July 1863, both sides were clearly preparing themselves for military conflict, as the Crown has acknowledged.<sup>1270</sup> Both John Gorst and John Morgan, who were based at Ōtāwhao, considered that the deteriorating political situation contributed to a decline in economic wellbeing.<sup>1271</sup> Neither man was a disinterested observer, but we do not think that is sufficient to discount their viewpoints.

As war grew closer and Europeans left the district, economic relationships that had built up over decades were impaired. There are complexities to this overall picture: Mōkau Māori were able to expand their trading activities from 1860 to 1863, although this did not last. And it seems that trade never halted altogether out of Kāwhia.<sup>1272</sup>

As the Crown acknowledged, it was the Waikato war that had 'a much greater impact' on the people of Te Rohe Pōtae. Once Crown troops crossed the Mangatāwhiri to invade Waikato, Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū were closely involved in the Kingitanga defence effort from the beginning (section 6.7.2) and this would have deprived them of a large proportion of their labour force. In addition, warriors from other districts needed to be housed and fed. There is evidence that this was difficult during the winter months of 1863. Isaac Shepherd, clerk and interpreter to the Taupō Resident magistrate, reported that a large group of Tūwharetoa warriors were forced to return from Waikato in October 1863 because they were 'mate kai' (starving) since food was so scarce.<sup>1273</sup> While the evidence of stockpiled food, noted above, indicates that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were able to 1268. Submission 3.4.300, pp 15, 22.

1269. Submission 3.4.300, pp 7, 15, 22.

1270. Submission 3.4.300, pp 3–6; see also, for example, doc A28, pp 141–142.

1271. Gorst, The Maori King, p 13 (doc A22, p 90); Morgan to CMS, 1 July 1862 (doc A22, p 186).

1272. Document A23, pp 459–460; doc A28, pp 143–144; doc A22, p 224.

1273. Shepherd, letter, 6 October 1863 (doc A54, pp 120–121).

relieve these pressures during the summer of 1863–1864, the economic strain must nevertheless have been significant.

The military occupation of the lands of some iwi and hapū of Te Rohe Pōtae (addressed in sections 6.7 and 6.9) clearly had a particularly severe impact on those groups. There were additional socio-economic impacts. The loss of stockpiled food and access to resources, destruction of property, and financial ruin and termination of livelihoods for Te Rohe Pōtae people who had interests north of the Pūniu were prejudicial effects of an unjust war. Dr O'Malley noted: 'Tribes which in the 1840s and 1850s had striven to raise the capital necessary for heavy investments in flour mills, agricultural equipment, horses, and cattle and so on, saw this almost literally taken from them overnight.'<sup>1274</sup>

Ngāti Apakura had made a significant commercial investment in Onehunga. This too was lost as a result of the war.<sup>1275</sup> The settlement at Te Rore, which had grown, the claimants argued, due to its strategic position on trade routes, was ruined by the war.<sup>1276</sup> We have made an assessment of the extent to which land was taken (section 6.9.2), and we have noted that these were among the most productive agricultural lands in New Zealand at that time. To this we add that the confiscation put an effective end to opportunities for recovery on those lands after the war. It is important to state, too, that these impacts all occurred as a consequence of the Crown's decision to continue the war beyond Ngāruawāhia despite efforts by Kingitanga leaders to negotiate peace (section 6.7.3.3).

6.10.4 Death and injury of combatants and non-combatants

The prejudice resulting from the deaths of non-combatants, women, and children as a consequence of the Crown's acts of war has already been discussed (section 6.7). The long-term effects of those actions will be assessed later. Here, the focus is on the overall casualties suffered by Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

It is not possible, now, to do more than estimate the number of Māori who were killed and wounded as a result of the wars in Taranaki and Waikato. The claimants stated that at least 500 Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were killed or wounded in the Waikato war.<sup>1277</sup> The Crown referred to Belich's estimate that some 500 Māori were killed or wounded as a result of the Waikato war. After acknowledging Dr O'Malley's conclusion that the total may have been much higher (around 800), counsel stated: 'The only conclusion that can be reached on the available evidence is that some dozens of Rohe Pōtae Māori were probably killed and wounded.'<sup>1278</sup>

Dr O'Malley based his higher estimate on James Cowan's work in the early twentieth century: Cowan estimated about 400 Māori were killed. Dr O'Malley's own analysis indicated that 'the casualty figures for the number killed are likely to have been closer to Cowan's estimates than to the ballpark figure provided by

1274. Document A22, pp 186–187.

1275. Submission 3.4.228, pp 62–69.

1276. Document s50(e), paras 40–47; doc s50(c), paras 38–43.

1277. Submission 3.4.127, p 40.

1278. Submission 3.4.300, pp 22–23.

Belich'. Combined with an assessment that the ratio of Māori killed and wounded was roughly one-to-one, O'Malley calculated 'total casualty figures of around 800 on the Maori side.'<sup>1279</sup>

This number does not include those who had been killed and wounded in the first Taranaki war in 1860–1861. Belich estimated that there were about 200 casualties among Māori who fought in that war.

Our assessment of casualties at Ōrākau (section 6.7.10(4)(b)) aligned with that of Dr O'Malley, although he may have understated the number who were wounded. For this reason, and also because the Crown does not appear to have undertaken its own analysis, we conclude that an estimate of 1,000 Maori killed or wounded in both conflicts is appropriate. By no means all were Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Many iwi and hapū sent men in support of the Kingitanga, and not only from Waikato and Taranaki. Taking into account that the exodus of Waikato Māori into Te Rohe Pōtae after the war seems to have roughly doubled the population there (see section 6.10.5), it is reasonable to conclude that the number of casualties was in the hundreds rather than 'some dozens' as the Crown suggested.

What is clear is that the rate of casualties was extremely high and had a devastating impact on the iwi, hapū, and whānau of the Te Rohe Pōtae district. Much claimant evidence supports this conclusion, but a few examples will suffice.

Giving evidence for Ngāti Wehi Wehi, Patricia Jacobs stated that 'of those young tupuna who left the southern lands to actively participate in the defence of their ancestral land, not one of them returned.'<sup>1280</sup>

In his record of the events at Ōrākau, Hitiri Te Paerata stated that: 'my father, brothers, and uncle all died.'<sup>1281</sup>

Evidence supplied by tangata whenua reveals that the casualties suffered in successive battles fractured families, hapū, and iwi.

Multiple witnesses testified to the huge toll that the heavy losses sustained at Waiari took.<sup>1282</sup> Frank Thorne told that Tribunal that Waiari 'is an important event. As it saw a large loss of Māori lives.'<sup>1283</sup>

Mr Thorne also specified that a number of key leaders were lost 'during a time of change when leadership was most needed.'<sup>1284</sup> The loss of rangatira no doubt hampered the ability of hapū and iwi to regroup while war was still being carried out. At the same time, it temporarily disrupted the political capabilities of Kingitanga supporters, which the Crown subsequently exploited as it sought to undermine the political cohesion of the Kingitanga through confiscation.

The rising death toll drew away even more of the labour force. The clerk of the Taupō resident magistrate, Isaac Shepherd reported that Rewi sent a letter to 1279. Document A22, pp 183–184.

1280. Document K9, p 6.

1281. Hitiri Te Paerata, Description of the Battle of Orakau, pp 5–6 (doc A22, p 163).

1282. Document K10, p 3; doc K32, p 22.

1283. Document K32, p 22.

1284. Document K32, p 6.

Taupō Māori in November 1863 requesting reinforcements to compensate for the heavy losses the Kingitanga sustained at Rangiriri.<sup>1285</sup>

The further casualties occurring in each successive battle had a substantial effect on the ability of communities to sustain agricultural production.

The killing of many of their tūpuna, including women and children, effectively caused a large-scale, albeit relatively temporary, weakening of the political, social, and economic structures which sustained Kingitanga hapū and iwi. These would be magnified and worsened by the disruption that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori would suffer in the aftermath of raupatu.

6.10.5 Immediate impacts of hosting refugees

In 1864, many supporters of the Kingitanga whose lands had been taken by the Crown sought refuge on Ngāti Maniapoto lands within Te Rohe Pōtae. This was not a new role for Ngāti Maniapoto. Among the refugees fleeing Crown occupation of their ancestral lands was Tāwhiao, the second Māori king. Claimants spoke of this in terms of his 'return' to Te Nehenehenui. Tāwhiao was born at Ōrongokoekoē in the 1820s, where his parents were given refuge by Ngāti Maniapoto hapū Ngāti Matakore after the fall of Mātakitaki pā at the hands of Ngā Puhī invaders (see chapter 2).<sup>1286</sup> However, the scale of the inflow after the Waikato war of the 1860s was potentially overwhelming. Marie Paul told the Tribunal that Waikato hapū Ngāti Pou, Ngāti Mahuta, Ngāti Naho, Ngāti Tipā, Ngāti Te Wehi, Ngāti Reko, Te Patupo, and Ngāti Hine accompanied Tāwhiao.<sup>1287</sup> Based, in part, on his analysis of census data, Dr O'Malley estimated that an existing population within Te Rohe Pōtae of about 2,000 was likely to have doubled after 1864 (see also chapter 7). The effects were not felt evenly, as many of the newcomers accompanied Tāwhiao, who first settled at Tokangamutu. There, Dr O'Malley estimated that 'there may have been as many as three refugees for every permanent resident'.<sup>1288</sup>

The parties agreed that the arrival of refugees in such numbers created major difficulties for the people of Te Rohe Pōtae. The Crown acknowledged that 'a large number of individuals relocated to the inquiry district from the Waikato following the wars, placing pressure on the resources of the Rohe Pōtae Māori who were required to support them'.<sup>1289</sup> The pressure would have been felt especially strongly by Ngāti Rōrā, whose rohe encompassed Tokangamutu. Their counsel described the refugee situation as 'a significant burden on Ngāti Rōrā and Ngāti Maniapoto generally'.<sup>1290</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Rereahu emphasised that within the refugee settlements, people were 'detached from their traditional food sources and traditional economic bases' and poverty, disease, and overcrowding were to be expected.<sup>1291</sup>

1285. Document A54, pp 123–124; Wai 1200 ROI, doc A71(e) (Stirling document bank), p 1483).

1286. Transcript 4.1.7, p 49 (Tom Roa, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho marae, 5 November 2012); transcript 4.1.14, p 63 (Jock Roa, hearing week 9, Parawera marae, 9 December 2013).

1287. Transcript 4.1.14, p 1291 (Marie Paul, hearing week 9, Parawera marae, 13 December 2013).

1288. Document A22, p 204.

1289. Submission 3.4.300, p 15.

1290. Submission 3.4.279, p 13.

1291. Submission 2.4.240, p 8.

Dr O'Malley offered an assessment that we think captured the risk and fragility of the circumstances: 'One can barely begin to imagine the problems and stresses that would create, even with a modern infrastructure. Indeed, massive systemic failure would be a possible and even probable outcome of such an influx of people.'<sup>1292</sup>

Much of what is known about initial conditions within Te Rohe Pōtae comes from newspaper reports. But although the evidence is patchy it is consistent. The winter of 1864 must have been especially difficult, as food stores intended to support the defence effort at Pāterangi had been lost to the British invaders. The New Zealand Herald reported in June: 'Rewi and his compatriots in their stronghold at Hangatiki are, by all accounts, getting desperately 'hard up'. Their supplies are nearly exhausted, and they have no secret hoards of potatoes or corn upon which they can fall back in their need.'<sup>1293</sup>

Conditions may have been equally dire for the following two winters. North of our inquiry district, but still within the aukati, the Herald reported that Ngāti Hauā were 'literally starving' and at Patetere there was, according to Cathy Marr, 'no food, many were sick and dying and they did not know if they could last until their next harvest.' As the winter of 1866 began, the Herald reported that Whāingaroa Māori had resorted to importing food.<sup>1294</sup>

In our assessment, the scale and suddenness of the population shift must have created enormous stresses. While the impact on communities varied according to the distribution of refugees across the region, it appears that, for several years and particularly during the winters, the capacity to feed and house a population that had doubled in size simply could not be sustained.

It does not seem likely, however, that refugee numbers were the only cause of poverty or starvation. The confiscation of highly developed and productive agricultural land north of the Pūniu River would have exacerbated problems, as would the number of war casualties, and, more generally, the utter disruption of war.

Cathy Marr concluded:

It seems likely that, as with communities left outside the new external boundary, Maori communities within the territory would have suffered significant hardship, food shortages and increased vulnerability to diseases associated with insufficient food and poor living conditions.<sup>1295</sup>

What is important to emphasise in the present context is that the hardship and suffering was all directly attributable to the Crown's acts of raupatu.

1292. Document A22, p 204.

1293. New Zealand Herald, 25 June 1864 (doc A22, p 190).

1294. Document A78, pp 188–189.

1295. Document A78, p 186.

6.10.6 The impact of disease

Claimants alleged that after the Waikato war, the poor diet and insanitary and crowded living conditions within Te Rohe Pōtae made the population ‘vulnerable to poor health and disease’. They said the Crown breached its duty of active protection when it ‘failed to respond appropriately’.<sup>1296</sup>

Crown counsel submitted that in the aftermath of war the Crown did in fact take steps to counteract the negative effects of the conflict. In 1866, Govenor Grey made efforts to send medicine to Kingitanga leaders at Hangatiki. At Kāwhia he helped Hori Te Waru, a Ngāti Apakura rangatira who had lost his lands and possessions at Rangiaowhia, by providing him with ‘the articles necessary to re-establish himself in life’.<sup>1297</sup> The Crown also appointed a doctor to ‘provide medical relief in the Raglan district’.<sup>1298</sup>

It is clear that, for the first few years after the war, disease took a severe albeit relatively short-term toll on the health of the people of the inquiry district.

Epidemic sickness struck Te Ara o Ngā Roimata, the Ngāti Apakura diaspora, as they travelled south-east from Rangiaowhia to seek refuge with Ngāti Tūwharetoa. Tame Tūwhangai described an unknown illness referred to as karawaka that killed his tūpuna:

If nothing else could get any worse for them as they had settled in, an epidemic swept through those unfortunate refugees, a disease called ‘Karawaka’ decimated many of their numbers, including my great grand-aunt Rina Haututu who succumbed to this disease . . .<sup>1299</sup>

Paranapa Otimi said that Te Wētini, one of a Ngāti Tūwharetoa scouting party, went ahead to warn that ‘he aitua mate’, an unknown sickness, travelled with the refugees. More than 100 refugees were assessed, Mr Otimi said, and Waihi and Tokaanu at the southern end of Lake Taupō were set aside in isolation to care for them. Six died within a week, he said. Some of the refugees remained in the district for more than 40 years, Mr Otimi said, with many unable to move due to ‘lingering illness’. Between 70 and 80 refugees lie buried in the rohe of Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>1300</sup>

The New Zealand Herald reported outbreaks of ‘low fever’ at Kāwhia, in the winter of 1865, and at both Kāwhia and Whāingaroa during the first half of 1866. At Whāingaroa, estimates of mortality ranged from 127 to 300. Among those who died as a result was Ngāti Māhanga rangatira Te Awaitaia. Dr O’Malley said the fever was likely a symptom of typhoid.<sup>1301</sup>

---

1296. Submission 3.4.127, p 40.

1297. Grey to Cardwell, 3 May 1866 (doc A22, p 194 (submission 3.4.300, p 24)).

1298. Submission 3.4.300, p 24; doc A22, p 192.

1299. Tame Tūwhangai to NK Smith, September 2012 (doc A97, pp 243–244).

1300. Document R23, pp 3–5.

1301. Document A22, pp 191–193; doc A94, pp 227–228; doc A78, pp 188–189.

Evidence of widespread disease inland within Te Rohe Pōtae is less clear. During the winter of 1864, a British military report cited 'reliable' information that sickness was 'rife' among Māori south of the Pūniu River frontier. In 1866, members of Tāwhiao's family were reported to be among those at Hangatiki suffering from fever.<sup>1302</sup> However, Marr wrote that in that year:

Kingitanga people visiting Kawhia and Raglan were claiming that the relatively more severe outbreaks outside the aukati and among 'friendly' Maori communities, was evidence of the folly of abandoning the King and cooperating with settlers and their government.<sup>1303</sup>

Earlier, we discussed allegations that Māori prisoners were deliberately infected with smallpox. We concluded that the evidence did not support this claim, but that the conditions in which the prisoners were kept made it certain that some returned home carrying disease (section 6.7.3.5).

The responses provided by the Crown, mentioned above, do not in our view demonstrate anything like a thoroughgoing response to the hardships created by war. The selectivity shown towards the beneficiaries of the Crown's concern suggests that political motives lay behind Grey's actions rather than a genuine desire to ameliorate the sufferings of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. The available evidence indicates that at Whāingaroa Dr Harsant was simply continuing in the roles of resident magistrate and colonial surgeon to which he had been appointed in 1854. The quality of the assistance he was able to offer is questionable. In 1860, it was said that Harsant 'could not speak a word of Maori, and was perfectly ignorant of Native customs, habits, and laws.'<sup>1304</sup>

Nevertheless, the extent to which the Crown was practically able to provide assistance to the peoples of Te Rohe Pōtae after 1864 was extremely limited. This was so even though the formal aukati was not immediately proclaimed (see chapter 7). It is not appropriate in these circumstances to make a finding of Treaty breach.

The question also arises as to the extent to which the ill-health and disease evident in the district ought to be considered a prejudicial effect of the raupatu. Clearly it applies to those whose war wounds were permanent, but not all ill-health in the district at this time can be ascribed to the war. Nor does it seem to be true that Māori within the aukati necessarily suffered more than those outside. Nevertheless, in our view the evidence supports a finding that one effect of the raupatu in Waikato was widespread and severe outbreaks of disease among Māori between 1864 and 1867. The Crown appears to support this conclusion in its statement that officials provided medical relief in order to ‘address and mitigate the effect of the raupatu.’<sup>1305</sup>

1302. Document A22, pp191, 194; doc A78, p191.

1303. Document A78, p191.

1304. Document A94, p290; doc A23, p245; 'Minutes of evidence', AJHR, 1860, F3, p8 (doc A23, p265).

6.10.7 Long-term impacts of hosting refugees

By the end of the 1860s, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders had established the aukati that would protect their communities and the exercise of their authority until the mid-1880s. The difficulties thrown up in the immediate aftermath of the war were met and in the main overcome (see chapter 7). In saying this, we do not underestimate the seriousness of the challenges Te Rohe Pōtae Māori faced during those first years. Nor does it in any way reduce the seriousness of the prejudice we have found arising from the Crown’s actions. Nevertheless, the economic challenges thrown up by the scale of the refugee population, while serious, do not seem to have become entrenched. Dr Francis concluded that, while some areas may have remained impoverished and economically isolated, overall the economy of Te Rohe Pōtae and the health of its residents were generally able to make a recovery.<sup>1306</sup> Even as early as 1868, agricultural production may have increased to the point of surplus. Opportunities for trade were again being pursued. Some observers regarded Māori living within the aukati as being healthier and better off than Māori who remained outside.<sup>1307</sup>

The claimants said the number of long-term refugees living within the aukati did, however, have an impact on Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.

Ngāti Rōrā were particularly affected by the arrival of Tāwhiao and the Waikato hapū at Tokangamutu. Some claimant evidence indicated that tensions between Ngāti Maniapoto and Tāwhiao did develop over time. Dr Wharehuia Hēmara suggested that there was a perception among Ngāti Maniapoto that the Crown thought their land ought to be included in negotiations with the Kīngitanga:

the Crown had blamed Ngāti Maniapoto for the raupatu in Waikato and [the Crown] did suggest that seeing we had been to blame that we should give up land and our rangatiratanga to Waikato and that Tāwhiao should be the prominent rangatira of our region.<sup>1308</sup>

Dr Hēmara continued that these fears bubbled ‘on the surface’ and prompted a request for Tāwhiao to leave Te Kūiti (which he did in 1881).<sup>1309</sup> Mihirawhiti Searancke’s family kōrero corroborated the existence of political tension between the King and his hosts, recalling that ‘it was told to me when I was young that that was the reason why Tāwhiao went to Kāwhia, because Taonui actually suggested

1305. Submission 3.4.300, p 24.

1306. Document A26, pp 97–98.

1307. Document A78, pp 193–195; doc A26, p 100.

1308. Transcript 4.1.21, p 379 (Wharehuia Hēmara, hearing week 12, Oparure marae, 6 May 2014).

1309. Transcript 4.1.21, p 449 (Wharehuia Hēmara, hearing week 12, Oparure marae, 6 May 2014).

he actually do that.<sup>1310</sup> These are matters that are addressed in more detail in the chapters that follow.

According to Mike Wī: ‘Ngāti Maniapoto harboured many displaced iwi refugees of bordering tribes following the impact actions of colonial forces.’ Another who gained refuge within Te Nehenehenui was Te Kooti Rikirangi, who built and gifted the whareniui Te Tokanga Nui-a-noho for the people of Ngāti Maniapoto. Mr Wī said Ngāti Rōrā are the kaitiaki of this house.<sup>1311</sup>

Counsel stated that, although Ngāti Rōrā resided far from the zones of war and confiscation, you can’t confine the impacts of war and raupatu [to] lives lost and the actual lands confiscated. The impact of war, wherever it is and whenever it’s occurred is much more widespread than that. For example, the placement of refugees on Ngāti Rōrā lands and the housing of them is an important part of the Ngāti Rōrā history.<sup>1312</sup>

Te Ra Wright described two Ngāti Apakura marae that still stand south of Te Kūiti. These are Tanehopuwai and Mangarama, situated on land gifted by Taonui which became the Pukenui 1B7C block.

Nā ō tātou tupuna anō a Taonui mā i whakanoho ki reira, ko te ingoa hapū i kona ko Ngāti Tūpatō.

It was our ancestors, was Taonui and others who located them there, and their hapū name there was Ngāti Tūpatō.<sup>1313</sup>

Land was also provided for refugees elsewhere within Te Rohe Pōtae. Jenny Charman and Hazel Wander told the Tribunal that land was given to Ngāti Apakura refugees at Kahotea marae (near Ōtorohanga).<sup>1314</sup> Jock Roa told of his understanding that, after Ōrākau, Ngāti Maniapoto gave land at Rangitoto to Ngāti Tūwharetoa to acknowledge their assistance.<sup>1315</sup> The Ngāti Ngawaero claimants stated that their tūpuna provided land and resources to host refugees, and also gave land for Tāwhiao.<sup>1316</sup>

There is some evidence that the effects of displacement have had long-lasting impacts on relationships and land ownership. James Taitoko said:

1310. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 256–257 (Mihirawhiti Searancke, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui a noho marae, 11 June 2010).

1311. Transcript 4.1.21, p 293 (Mike Wī, hearing week 12, Oparure marae, 5 May 2014).

1312. Transcript 4.1.21, p 272 (counsel for Ngāti Rora, hearing week 12, Oparure marae, 5 May 2014).

1313. Transcript 4.1.10, pp 29–30 (Te Ra Wright, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

1314. Document K17, p 7; doc K37, pp 4–5.

1315. Transcript 4.1.6, p 87 (Jock Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 9 June 2010).

1316. Submission 3.4.250, p 5.

A lot of us are not where we should be. We've had to vacate our areas to make room for others that are coming in. And a case in point is out towards Kāwhia there; a block called Hauturu West the marae is called Te Māhoe. It was one of those refugee blocks and it was well manned. I'm one of the trustees there and we've had to count up the hapū in amongst our owners. So far we have 180 hapū, they're not all Maniapoto, in fact most of them aren't. So this is another thing that's happening as well as us trying to look after ourselves, we're looking after our Tainui whanaunga, our Tūwharetoa whanaunga and so on.<sup>1317</sup>

Although the gifting of land by Ngāti Maniapoto to their landless whanaunga may be said to have reduced their own land entitlements, it is also apparent that these are matters of some complexity and that we lack sufficient evidence to draw any firm conclusions as to the part Crown actions may have played in the outcomes. In any case, provision for those seeking shelter from the Crown's soldiers would always have been a matter of tikanga, of mutual obligation and relationships.

6.10.8 The impact of dispossession

Raupatu caused displacement on a vast scale. In this inquiry we heard claims that Maniapoto-affiliated peoples including Ngāti Paretekawa, Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Ngutu, Ngāti Whaea, Ngāti Ngāwaero, Ngāti Unu, and Ngāti Kahu were forced from their homes north of the Pūniu.<sup>1318</sup> Here we provide an assessment of the particular prejudices suffered by these groups, who lost their lands and then suffered the trials of being refugees.

6.10.8.1 Ngāti Paretekawa

Harold Maniapoto described Ngāti Paretekawa as 'a destitute, homeless people'. The hapū have maintained a presence over their ancestral territories on the north bank of the Pūniu River, in the manner of a two-acre block his parents were able to buy from whanaunga. But in Mr Maniapoto's view they remained 'nothing more than refugees in their own lands' and they have been unable to register the land as a reserve for Ngāti Paretekawa.<sup>1319</sup>

Mr Maniapoto described the overall impact of deprivations that occurred as a consequence of displacement:

Paretekawa and Maniapoto suffered extreme prejudice and hardship as a result of the unjust confiscation of all its primary customary lands north of the Aukati, causing devastation and widespread suffering, disease, and deprivation to them and their peoples. For Ngāti Paretekawa, the loss of life at Orakau was aggravated by this widespread dispossession of their tribal lands.

1317. Transcript 4.1.6, p 73 (James Taitoko, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 9 June 2010).

1318. Transcript 4.1.7, p 282 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 1, Te Tokanganui-a-noho marae, 6 November 2012).

1319. Document K35, p 40.

Maniapoto hapū from north of the Puniu River (the confiscation boundary) were forced to live and survive in the pockets of other people's generosity for over seven generations, spanning almost 150 years, and even to this day are still bereft of all their prized ancestral lands, resources, treasures and traditions.<sup>1320</sup>

Thomas Maniapoto said the effects are still evident:

Our people became refugees on other people's lands. We went wherever we could. Even our most generous relatives found it difficult to house us on their own meagre, and ever dwindling, landbase. In later generations they were asking us 'why don't you go back to where you came from?' We knew they were right but we had nowhere to go to. This is not a nice feeling to have with your relations.<sup>1321</sup>

What these statements demonstrate, in our view, is the probability that the prejudice caused by the raupatu has been compounded by the later impacts arising from subsequent acts and omissions of the Crown.

6.10.8.2 Ngāti Apakura

Tom Roa told the Tribunal that, in 1864, Ngāti Apakura was 'an iwi of substance' but the raupatu caused the social and economic wellbeing of the people to be 'rent asunder'.<sup>1322</sup> Testifying to the widespread dispersal of Ngāti Apakura from Kāwhia to Taupō, Dr Roa said:

Nā i te tūrakitanga o Rangiaowhia e te Pākehā, ka pānaia ai te iwi nei, ko ētehi ka noho ki waenga i ngā whanaunga, o Hikairo ki Kāwhia, ko ētehi ki roto o Maniapoto ki Kahotea, ki Tāne-hopu-wai hoki, ā, ko ētehi ki Tokaanu ki roto o Ngāti Tūwharetoa.

When Rangiaowhia was sacked by the Pākehā, Apakura was ejected, some stayed with Hikairo at Kāwhia and others stayed at Kahotea with Maniapoto and Tāne-hopu-wai and some at Tokaanu at Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>1323</sup>

Since that time, they have been regarded as a hapū both of Waikato and of Ngāti Maniapoto. The importance of maintaining a distinct Ngāti Apakura identity in the face of dispossession and dispersal was a particular concern of the claimants. Counsel submitted that, as a result of the war, 'the many strands of Apakura split to seek refuge, permanently severing parts of the iwi from each other and their whenua'.<sup>1324</sup>

Earlier we described the outbreak of mortal illness that afflicted the group of Ngāti Apakura who crossed the Rangitoto mountains to Taupō-nui-a-tia. After spending some years among Ngāti Tūwharetoa, Mr Tūwhangai said, the threat

1320. Document K35, pp 37–38.

1321. Document K15, pp 18–19.

1322. Document K38 (Roa), pp 7–8.

1323. Transcript 4.1.6, p 242 (Tom Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-a-noho marae, 10 June 2010).

1324. Submission 3.4.228, pp 13–14, 50; doc K22, p 7.

of war posed by the Crown's pursuit of Te Kooti led his tūpuna to move again, this time into the Tūhua district.<sup>1325</sup> Mr Tūwhangai was emphatic: 'Do not mistake these as misfortunes . . . [w]ar spawns disease and spews out its own form of misery'.<sup>1326</sup>

Some of Ngāti Apakura went west and found refuge with Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Maniapoto relatives on Pirongia maunga and around the shores of Kāwhia Harbour at Mangaora and Awaroa. Gordon Lennox said his great-great-grandfather Penetana Pukewhau lived at Whatiwhatihoe for a time after the war.<sup>1327</sup>

Others went to Maungatautari, and still others travelled to Piopio and Mōkau.<sup>1328</sup> Jenny Charman expressed the view that the Crown 'has yet to appreciate the way in which Ngāti Apakura was dismembered and redefined by the confiscation, including by having the confiscation boundary on the Puniu river'.<sup>1329</sup>

The unsuccessful efforts by Ngāti Apakura to obtain grants of land after the raupatu have been discussed already (section 6.9.6.3). In 1948, Pei Te Hurinui told the Maori Land Court:

In the case of Ngatiapakura and the Ngatipuhiawe, who owned the most fertile land in the Waikato . . . I could not help feeling that these people must feel pangs of remorse and sorrow for their ancestral land to think that they do not, at this day, have even a small reserve that they could call their own.<sup>1330</sup>

There can be no doubt that for Ngāti Apakura the prejudice suffered through raupatu has been especially severe. In our view, their position deserves particular attention from the Crown. Our recommendation that the Crown recognise and affirm the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori includes Ngāti Apakura.

6.10.8.3 Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Unu, and Ngāti Huiao

Confiscation for some hapū was a double-edged sword. Communities such as Ngāti Kahu, Ngāti Unu, Ngāti Te Kanawa, Ngāti Taumata, Ngāti Ngawaero, and Ngāti Huiao were divided, with some retaining land within the aukati and others left outside.<sup>1331</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Kahu and Ngāti Unu stated that the lands that they did not lose to the blade of confiscation 'became the sanctuary for those who were left landless and who were forced by arms from their tribal territories in the Waipa and Waikato districts'.<sup>1332</sup>

---

<sup>1325</sup> Document K19, pp 4–7; transcript 4.1.10, pp 62–70 (Tame Tūwhangai, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

<sup>1326</sup> Document K19, p 6.

<sup>1327</sup> Document K22, pp 2, 18, 40; transcript 4.1.10, pp 91–139 (Gordon Lennox, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

<sup>1328</sup> Document K17 (Charman); doc K37; transcript 4.1.10, pp 42–60 (Jenny Charman, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013), pp 74–80 (Hazel Coromandel-Wander, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 8 April 2013).

<sup>1329</sup> Document K17, p 7 (submission 3.4.228, p 106).

<sup>1330</sup> Petition 29/1947 and associated minutes (doc A29(d), p 22).

<sup>1331</sup> Submission 3.4.250, p 4.

<sup>1332</sup> Submission 3.4.251, p 11.

These claimants also argued that subsequent Crown purchases of their remaining lands compounded the prejudice caused by the confiscation of lands north of the Pūniu River. Counsel submitted that the ‘state of vulnerability’ caused by the amount of land confiscated exacerbated the prejudice ‘caused by every subsequent alienation’.<sup>1333</sup> We agree that the extent to which land bases were diminished by confiscation needs to be taken into account when considering the prejudice arising through later alienations by other means.

6.10.9 Labelling: Loyal, friendly, kūpapa, rebel

The Crown’s invasion of Waikato forced Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to make what were frequently invidious choices: whether to fight, which side to join, and whether to try to prevent or minimise conflict. These decisions played out within iwi, hapū, and whānau and were a cause of severe and long-term internal tensions. Those who aligned themselves with the British did not necessarily fight; some aided the invaders as guides, gathered information, provided food, shelter, and transport, and passed messages. Some acted voluntarily, others acted with greater or lesser degrees of reluctance. Their reasons varied from genuine trust in the Crown to disagreement with Kīngitanga strategy, if not necessarily its aims, and simple survival. For ‘half-caste’ families, the splintering seems to have been especially acute.

Shane Te Ruki spoke of his tupuna Tuapōkai, whose family was divided by war:

The government came with their guns and they attacked with their guns, and so Te Poupatete and Tuapōkai thought of a strategy to protect the people, and one said to the other, ‘Tuapōkai, you go onto the Pākehā side’ – their father was a Pākehā. And so Tuapōkai went to the Pākehā side to assist the soldiers. But Tāmāti joined the war parties of Rewi and the other war leaders. They did that because they said to each other, ‘If you live, I live.’ I weep for Tuapōkai because he was called a kūpapa. No, no, and that was an outcome of the gun, separating, dividing families.

After Ōrākau the survivors fled to the places that have already been referred to by previous speakers, and then the soldiers said to Tuapōkai, ‘Guide us, guide us to where the people are.’ The guns of the soldiers were now pointed at his family, to Ngāti Unu, his kin of Ngāti Unu, and so Tuapōkai guided the Pākehā soldiers into the lands . . . so that the soldiers could kill the survivors, the refugees.<sup>1334</sup>

The decisions that whānau made as to which side to take in the war had lasting impacts. Meto Hopa spoke of his tupuna Ngātūerua Erueti, who led General Cameron’s troops around the fortifications at Pāterangi to Rangiaowhia and was consequently blamed for the deaths that occurred there:

Our whānau continue to carry mamae about Ngātūerua Erueti and Rangiaowhia. We don’t believe Ngātūerua Erueti ever intended that his own whānau would be hurt,

1333. Submission 3.4.250, p 6.

1334. Transcript 4.1.1 p 204 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010 (doc A97, p 235)).

but he had been unable to control the horrors that the Crown forces did. He took the burden of responsibility for his actions.<sup>1335</sup>

Mr Hopa related that Ngātūerua Erueti's actions and inability to warn 'his Ngāti Apakura, Ngāti Rāhui and Ngāti Puhiaue whānau of the impending raid' caused discord between his Ngāti Hikairo and Ngāti Apakura whanaunga.<sup>1336</sup> Mr Hopa said that Erueti's descendents have since taken steps to heal the discord with Ngāti Apakura and 'the burden that he and his whānau held in relation to Rangiaowhia'. Whānau kōrero holds that Erueti persuaded his Ngāti Hikairo whanaunga to award Ngāti Apakura the Mangaora block at Kāwhia in 1889.<sup>1337</sup> To this day, Erueti's whānau dispute the term kūpapa being applied to their tupuna.<sup>1338</sup>

Shane Te Ruki also spoke of the 'stigma and stain' attached to the label kūpapa, but declared: 'If there are any descendants of Tuapōkai in this house I acknowledge you and your chiefly ancestor because he did something to save the people.'<sup>1339</sup>

'Friendly' and 'rebel' were regarded as important criteria by Crown officials, because they were supposed to determine eligibility for the compensation regime set up by the Crown after the confiscations. However, although these labels did have some relevance in that context, our analysis earlier (section 6.9.6) pointed to the conclusion that the greater prejudice lay simply in a systemic failure of process.

An important conclusion that has run throughout this chapter is that application of the term 'rebel' has caused significant and lasting prejudice to Te Rohe Pōtae Māori (including Ngāti Kauwhata), and especially to Ngāti Maniapoto. The label has hindered recognition from the Crown of the prejudice suffered and frustrated their ability to gain redress.

At the outset of this chapter, we quoted the historian Michael King's characterisation of Ngāti Maniapoto as a bellicose iwi that lost nothing in the Crown's raupatu. We described how in 1995, when Parliament passed legislation to finally acknowledge and resolve the raupatu claims of Waikato, the Minister in Charge of Treaty of Waitangi Negotiations, Doug Graham, moved the third reading of the Bill by quoting at length from the 'highly respected historian' Michael King. He made the following statement: 'Tribes who had remained loyal to the Government lost land along with those who had not. The real rebels, Ngāti Maniapoto, lost nothing.'<sup>1340</sup>

The Minister then went on to say:

1335. Document K12, p 7.

1336. Document K12, p 4.

1337. Document K12, p 6.

1338. Transcript 4.1.10, p 648 (Meto Hopa, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10 April 2013).

1339. Transcript 4.1.1, pp 204–205 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010 (doc A97, pp 235–236).

1340. Doug Graham, 19 October 1995, NZPD, vol 551, p 9922. The Minister was quoting Michael King, Te Puaea (Auckland: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977), p 26.

But, as others have found throughout history, it is not possible to crush those who have right on their side. Sooner or later justice will prevail. For Waikato that time has now come. No longer are they regarded as rebels. Fair restitution has been provided. The suffering is now at an end.<sup>1341</sup>

That time has not yet come for Ngāti Maniapoto and the hapū that affiliate to it. In this inquiry, the Crown stated that the rationale of the 1995 and 2010 legislation to settle the raupatu claims of Waikato was to include those who affiliate to the Tainui waka.<sup>1342</sup> If that was the intent, it would say so. It does not. Harold Maniapoto explained to the Tribunal that initial negotiations prior to 1995 did include all Tainui – Waikato, Maniapoto, and Raukawa – but the latter two iwi were subsequently excluded.<sup>1343</sup> The Crown did not dispute his account.

The statements made to Parliament in 1995 by the then Minister make it clear that Ngāti Maniapoto were not included and have not received redress from the Waikato raupatu settlement. The strong implication must be that this did not occur because the Crown continued to regard it as appropriate to apply the label of ‘rebels’ to the iwi.

During hearing week four in Te Awamutu, Mr Maniapoto explained how he became involved in the Ngāti Maniapoto raupatu claim:

I'll take us back to '95, in a period when Bob Mahuta was negotiating for Waikato. I mentioned this yesterday about going down to Wellington on the Tainui Express and hearing this opening submission for the reading of the Waikato Settlement Bill, and I was all of forty-something years then, green as. Went down on this ride thing, it was going to be an exciting thing, and they sat me down in the gallery above between these two koroua. One was Hauraki and I don't know who the other one was, and they read this passage out in the house, and it said, 'It was through the fear that Maniapoto (and they're referring to Manga I understand) would attack Auckland that the war started.'

And this koroua turned to me and he said to me, 'Boy, don't you forget that. One day you'll have to right it.'<sup>1344</sup>

It is disappointing to say the least that the Crown considered it was appropriate in this inquiry to repeat unfounded allegations relating to the supposed plan to attack Auckland. Our analysis in this chapter has repeatedly confirmed that the Crown was wrong to label Ngāti Maniapoto as rebels and that the prejudicial effects have been serious and long-lasting.

1341. Doug Graham, 19 October 1995, NZPD, vol 551, p 9922.

1342. Submission 3.4.310(e), p 29.

1343. Transcript 4.1.10, p 680–681 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10 April 2013).

1344. Transcript 4.1.10, p 690 (Harold Maniapoto, hearing week 4, Mangakotukutuku campus, 10 April 2013).

6.10.10 Remembering

The Taranaki Tribunal provided a telling description of the long-term psychological impact of raupatu:

The atrocities of the war, real or imagined, linger in people's minds. The legacy of fear and racial hatred was manifest in acts of retribution against Maori for many years to come. On the Maori side, memories of the war have lasted longer because they were, and remain, excluded from their forebears' lands.<sup>1345</sup>

The trauma of the Waikato war was captured by the waiata composed by Rangiamoa of Ngāti Apakura, E Pā tō Hau (see over page). According to traditional kōrero, it was written to mourn the dead and the forced eviction of the survivors, and has constituted an enduring reminder to Ngāti Apakura of the pain of raupatu.<sup>1346</sup>

It is said that Rangiamoa wrote E Pā tō Hau for her cousin, the rangatira Te Wano, who fell ill with grief after Ngāti Apakura were driven away from Rangiaowhia. Te Wano asked his people to climb Titiraupenga maunga for a final sight of their homelands. He died and was buried there. In reference to this Jenny Charman stated: 'I'm here on behalf of Te Wano Turi Manu and I'm sure that there are other people who will talk about that lament of our tūpuna. I see it in my mind as someone that is up there on the mountain of Titiraupenga, looking back to his homeland . . .'<sup>1347</sup>

The refugee experience entailed not only physical pain as a result of the conflict but also mental and spiritual suffering from the loss of their lands, leaders, and communities: a sickness of the body and the spirit. The latter has endured in song and memory.

In addition to the loss of land, the traditions of Ngāti Apakura maintained that their tūpuna who died at Rangiaowhia were not simply casualties of war but victims of kōhuru or 'foul murder'.<sup>1348</sup> Claims regarding the deaths of non-combatants at Rangiaowhia were addressed in section 6.7.7. Attesting to their long-lasting psychological impact, Gordon Lennox elaborated that 'this is what has been passed down through my whanau and sustains much of our anger about these events.'<sup>1349</sup>

Memories of raupatu were also sustained by the passing down of names. Hazel Coromandel-Wander recounted the story of her tupuna, christened Wikitoria, who as a child fled into the swamp surrounding Rangiaowhia when the soldiers attacked. She then

---

1345. Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report, p 105.

1346. Document A97, p 238.

1347. Transcript 4.1.1, p 24 (Jenny Charman, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010) (doc A97, p 242).

1348. Document K22, p 28; claim 1.2.97, p 6.

1349. Document K22, p 28.

He Tangi mo Te Wano

na Rangiamoa, Ngāti Apakura
 E pa to hau he wini raro,
 He homai aroha,
 Kia tangi atu au i konei;
 He aroha ki te Iwi,
 Ka momotu ki tawhiti ki Paerau
 Ko wai e kite atu,
 Kei whea aku hoa i mua ra,
 I te tonuitanga?
 Ka haramai tenei ka tauwehe
 Ka raungaiti au.
 E ua e te ua e taheke
 Koe i runga ra;
 Ko au ki raro nei riringi ai
 Te ua i aku kamo.
 Moe mai, e Wano, i Tirau,
 Te pae ki te whenua
 I te wa tutata ki te kainga
 Koua hurihia.
 Tenei matou kei runga kei te
 Toka ki Taupo,
 Ka paea ki te one ki Waihi,
 Ki taku matua nui.
 Ki te whare koiwi ki Tongariro,
 E moea iho nei.
 Hoki mai e roto ki te puia
 Nui, ki Tokaanu.
 Ki te wai tuku kiri o te Iwi
 E aroha nei au, i.

A Lament for Te Wano

by Rangiamoa, Ngāti Apakura
 Gently blows the wind from the north
 Bringing loving memories
 Which causes me here to weep;
 'Tis sorrow for the tribe,
 Departed afar off to Paerau.
 Who is it can see,
 Where are my friends of yesteryear,
 Who all dwelt together?
 Comes now this parting
 And I am quite bereft.
 Come then, O rain, pour down,
 Steadily from above;
 Whilst I here below pour forth
 A deluge from mine eyes.
 Sleep on, O Wano, on Tirau,
 The barrier to the land,
 Stretching forth to that home
 Which is now forsaken.
 Here we now are cast upon
 The rocky shores of Taupo,
 Stranded upon the sands at Waihi,
 Where dwelt my noble sire,
 Now placed in the charnel-house on Tongariro.
 Like unto the abode wherein we sleep.
 Return, O my spirit, to the thermal pool
 Of renown, at Tokaanu,
 To the healing-waters of the tribe
 For whom I mourn.<sup>1</sup>

---

1. Document A97, pp238–240.

sought refuge with Apakura relatives from Ngaati Rangimahora, Marotaua, Raparapa and Hikairo who lived at Totorewa in the Otorohanga area. It was those Apakura kaumatua and kuia that changed her name to Te Mamae in memory of what she had witnessed at Rangiaowhia.<sup>1350</sup>

John Roa recounted the deaths of his tūpuna Poneke and his son Niketi at Ōrākau and said that Rewi Maniapoto gave Niketi's son the name Te Muraahi. This served to commemorate and honour their loss by recognising their services to and protection of the interests of Ngāti Maniapoto and the Kingitanga.<sup>1351</sup> Passing down this name from generation to generation reminded the whānau 'of the price they and we paid so that the economic and social prosperity of the settlers in this district and region would continue to grow. We still pay that price today.'<sup>1352</sup>

Te Ra Wright emphasised to the Tribunal the importance of gaining acknowledgement from the Crown of the impact of the raupatu. This was an important prerequisite to healing the pain that was still acutely felt:

Even today we turn constantly to see what is coming up behind us because really we can't see clearly in front of us because we are coping with this [issue] today, and it is those things really that are set up for us to attend to. How then [will] we be able to progress without any hindrance?<sup>1353</sup>

Kāwhia Te Murāhi described the ideological and cultural significance of the burning of the wharehui Hui Te Rangiora in 1864, claiming the whare was destroyed 'deliberately and with malice' in a way that interrupted Ngāti Paretekawa's ability to preserve and transmit their spiritual traditions.<sup>1354</sup> The claimants argued that the Crown was aware of its significance and that its destruction constituted a form of psychological warfare.<sup>1355</sup> We concluded earlier (section 6.7.9) that the destruction of Hui Te Rangiora symbolised the Crown's intent to eradicate Māori autonomy and to humiliate and denigrate Rewi Maniapoto in particular.

The Ngāti Paretekawa claimants have asked that the Crown support the rebuilding of Hui Te Rangiora as a means to restore, in part, the mana lost when it was destroyed.<sup>1356</sup> This falls within the scope of our recommendation, set out at the beginning of this report, that the Crown recognise and affirm the claimants' rights to tino rangatiratanga within their rohe. The Crown should act to support such 1350. Marama, personal communication, 1960 (doc K37, p 3).

---

1351. Document K7, pp 6–7.

1352. Document K7, p 8.

1353. Transcript 4.1.2, p 215 (Te Ra Wright, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Waipapa marae, 30 March 2010) (doc A97, p 238).

1354. Document K29, pp 11–12.

1355. Document K15, pp 9–10.

1356. Document P15(d), p 36; doc K29, p 14.

a project and the details should be determined during negotiations between the parties.

6.10.11 Forgetting

Evidence presented at hearings and at Ngā Kōrero Tuko Iho hui made it plain to the Tribunal that, for many Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, loss of knowledge has been a further important aspect of the prejudice resulting from the raupatu. The loss of knowledge about former landholdings among those whose tūpuna possessed land north of the Pūniu has already been mentioned (see section 6.9.2). Loss of knowledge has also had a social and cultural impact. John Roa spoke of the impact that the deaths of his tūpuna Poneke and his son Niketi at Ōrākau continued to have on his hapū:

Had Poneke and Niketi survived, our whānau and hapū would have been stronger, more stable and certainly a lot more numerous. The leadership and father influence on our great grandfather would without doubt have been positive and enduring. Their stories and their teachings would have been able to be filtered down to us and helped us navigate our way through the many challenges we have had to endure. Unfortunately this was not the case. There was a definite and legitimate sense of grievance by the killing of Poneke and Niketi and the subsequent loss of mana.<sup>1357</sup>

Dana Maniapoto attested to the impact of raupatu for Ngāti Paretekawa over five generations:

We have no tūpuna land, marae, wharepuni, reo or tikanga. We are losing our whakapapa, history, waiata and whaikorero. We are generational refugees and our relationships with other whānau suffer. We are profoundly invisible in our tūpuna land. We have no economic base and our cross cultural relationships suffer. Our children are increasingly disconnected from our Paretekawa heritage because we are disconnected from our tūpuna land.<sup>1358</sup>

Hari Rapata, of Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ingoa, said ‘we as a whanau would commonly be known as, “the landless, marae and tikanga-less, te reo-less Maori of Cambridge”’. Mr Rapata attributed high rates of poverty, poor education, ill health, unemployment, and gang affiliation to this loss of culture:

I believe you have witnessed cases argued with the very same reference to the devastating effects of loss of land and culture which, poignantly, resulted in the loss of identity, the loss of understanding and knowledge of who we as a people were and potentially are.<sup>1359</sup>

---

1357. Document κ7, p 6.

1358. Document κ14, p 4.

1359. Document κ13, pp 2, 4.

Edward Penetito said that dislocation from ancestral lands in the Waikato and ‘lack of a turangawaewae’ had damaged the spiritual wellbeing of Ngāti Kauwhata, who were once renowned for the expertise of their tohunga.<sup>1360</sup>

Rawiri Bidois thought that in some cases, forgetfulness was willed and deliberate:

One of the biggest mamae we have is just not knowing what happened and why. It seems that our parents tried to shield us from the hurt that they had suffered by just not telling us about it and keeping our focus on looking ahead, grabbing what was needed to survive and prosper in the new world.

As a result, he said, ‘not knowing what has happened and why our people are in the predicament that they are in is a grievance in itself’.<sup>1361</sup>

An important second dimension to the loss of knowledge arising from the raupatu was identified by the claimants. It is a truism that history is written by the victors, and this is especially true of the physical record that exists in memorials, graves, and urupā. Before our hearing in Te Awamutu we were taken to visit the sites of conflict in the area, and it was clear that graves of and memorials to Europeans were more prominent in the landscape.

At Waiari, a stone monument to six British soldiers was surrounded by a pipe-rail fence, while the Māori dead lay in an unmarked grave close by.<sup>1362</sup>

At Ōrākau, there was no sign of the mass graves where the Māori who were killed there lie buried.

John Roa described the distress the erasure of Māori from war memorials continued to cause:

Distress and grief is visited upon us on an annual basis when we make the pilgrimage to Ōrākau and stand on a narrow piece of dirt upon which can barely fit 20 people. We try to reconcile our loss in front of a cold and ugly grey monument which does not even bear our tupuna names. There is no culturally appropriate memorial to them, and for all intents and purposes they did not even exist as far as the history of New Zealand is concerned.<sup>1363</sup>

Several claimants were concerned that little knowledge existed about the Waikato war within local Māori or Pākehā communities. Tiki Koroheke said:

I took history at Wesley College because it was a requirement for the academic classes. We were presented with the colonial interpretation of the history of New Zealand. Skirting around the Treaty and the Māori Wars, as they were called then. . . .

---

1360. Document K2 (Penetito), pp 16–17.

1361. Document P26, pp 5, 6.

1362. Submission 3.4.208, pp 8, 10.

1363. Document K7, p 7.

My tupuna were part of all these important events yet through my school years I didn't even know who Rewi Maniapoto or his parents were. I did not know the relationship of the Maniapoto iwi to Waikato. I did not hear about Rewi Maniapoto or Orakau and I definitely did not know about the confiscations.

Only in 1993, when our Kite family went to Rangiaowhia to find one of my great-great-grandmothers's resting place, did I find out that the settlement existed or about the battle there. I saw the plaque with its story and I was shocked. It was so close to home. I was a teacher and I didn't know, and 52 years old at that!<sup>1364</sup>

Harry Kereopa similarly felt that his school curriculum lacked Māori history, protagonists, or perspective:

I don't remember studying us [Maori]. No, no, no, we were thrown all this English history. We did nothing on Maori. I never heard anything about the wars fought in Te Rohe Potae. I heard nothing about the New Zealand Wars. I never learnt about the Battle of Orakau. I never learnt about Rewi or the Treaty of Waitangi. Not a blasted thing.<sup>1365</sup>

Some, like Jock Roa, were taught about the Waikato war at school. But the experience of Mr Roa was that Māori were portrayed as rebels and labelled as aggressors:

We are revisited with hurt and despair every time we read the history of the War in the Waikato as written by the Crown, its many agencies and independent authors where our people are so readily labeled with the derogatory terms of rebels, kingites and savages. Our young people are forced to read and accept these stories as truth of who their ancestors were and by default, who they, invariably must be. We must get history right.<sup>1366</sup>

This experience is unfortunately consistent with the damage identified earlier (section 6.6.5.1) as having been caused by the mythical accounts promulgated by the Crown in its attempts to justify the Waikato raupatu.

Hearings for this inquiry concided with the 150th anniversary of the events at Rangiaowhia and Ōrākau. Although it was clear to us that Māori were still all too often invisible in the history of the wars, both in regard to the physical landscape and in national awareness, we note that the Crown was involved in the commemorations of those events. That was a positive development. We think there is still significant scope for the Crown to engage with the claimants to address this issue.

In this inquiry Ngāti Apakura sought 'a recommendation that the events of the Waikato Wars form part of the compulsory high school curriculum as a long-term remedy to address the lack of knowledge of these events in the Pākeha community.<sup>1367</sup> At the time of the hearings, the claimants said they were preparing resources to support improved education about the events of the raupatu.<sup>1368</sup> Serious engagement by the Crown with these issues would, in our view, be consistent with the recommendation we made at the beginning of this report and would go a considerable way to addressing the prejudice described by the claimants in this inquiry. The details should be considered in negotiations between the parties.

1364. Document L11 (Koroheke), p 9.

1365. Document L14 (Kereopa), p 46.

1366. Document K7, pp 7–8.

6.10.12 Kore whenua kore mana

In defending the Kingitanga, Taohua Robert Te Huia stated that his tupuna Rewi Maniapoto 'defended his mana and that of others who he saw as significant to the aspirations of our people'.<sup>1369</sup> Mr Te Huia said the two things that mattered most to Rewi were his people and their lands: 'The loss of either is a loss of mana.'<sup>1370</sup>

Counsel for the Ngāti Paretekawa (Wai 440) claimants argued that Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, and in particular Ngāti Maniapoto, were 'a bastion of Māori resistance' and 'staunch mainstays . . . of Māori independence and autonomy'. For this, they 'were punished by the Crown who on one hand brought war, atrocity and disease to the region while taking the peoples' land and mana with the other'.<sup>1371</sup> The raupatu was a means through which the Crown deliberately aimed to extinguish the mana of Kīngitanga iwi and hapū.<sup>1372</sup>

Speaking on behalf of Ngāti Paretekawa ki Napinapi and the descendants of Rewi Maniapoto, counsel argued that the 'very blandness' of the Crown's concessions regarding the injustices that Ngāti Maniapoto suffered should not be permitted to throw a cloak of concealment over what really occurred, the grossness of the Treaty breaches, and (at least equally importantly) the grossness of the breaches of the law and fundamental legal principle, the gross injury of denying a people their Mana Motuhake.<sup>1373</sup>

Shane Te Ruki emphasised the links between the Crown's pursuit of its unjust war, the confiscation of land, and the damage to mana:

te mana Māori motuhake, te mana o te tapu, te mana o te ihi has been undermined at all levels. At all levels: with a gun [during] negotiations; discussion with a gun at your head. Behind every action was the gun.<sup>1374</sup>

---

1367. Submission 3.4.228, p 72.

1368. Submission 3.4.228, p 72.

1369. Document H23, para 22.

1370. Document H23, para 31.

1371. Submission 3.4.198, p 8.

1372. Submission 3.4.198, p 24.

1373. Submission 3.4.189, p 61.

1374. Transcript 4.1.1, p 206 (Shane Te Ruki, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 2 March 2010).

For Ngāti Apakura, the loss of their lands paralleled the loss of their mana. Te Ra Wright stated:

I kōrero mai ngā tūpuna mehemea he mana tāu, he whenua anō hoki tāu. Kore whenua, kore mana. Ko ērā ake ngā mea e whaitia nei.

The ancestors spoke and said, 'If you have mana, you have land. If you have no land, you have no mana.' Those are the things which we pursue.<sup>1375</sup>

Tom Roa also addressed this point when speaking of Rangiaowhia: 'From that assault, the tragedies of war and their effects on the children, old men and women; along with the loss of their physical resources, Ngāti Apakura's mana was no more.'<sup>1376</sup>

Summarising the effects of the loss of mana, counsel for Ngāti Apakura stated that the loss of land, along with Ngāti Apakura's subsequent 'diaspora caused by the war and raupatu . . . undermined the ability for Apakura to collectively govern or act as an effective political entity.'<sup>1377</sup> Counsel continued that the 'continued failure to recognise Apakura as a distinct and separate group of whom significant grievances have not been addressed, would perpetuate the losses that have already been suffered.'<sup>1378</sup>

At the first Kōrero Tuku Iho hui during the inquiry, Morehu Macdonald said:

So things like 'apologies,' I think they may sound a bit 'cliché' if that's the right word . . . but I think that's what is needed to be done to restore that mana to the people [so that] the memory of our tūpuna can be corrected and that our own tamariki when they're learning and reading this about what their tūpuna went through, and it wasn't that long ago, that they understand the truth, and I know that's what we're about here.<sup>1379</sup>

The claimants remain unified and unanimous on this issue. The '[d]enigration and degradation' of mana at the hands of the Crown lies at the heart of their raupatu claims and the redress that they seek.<sup>1380</sup>

In his discussion of customary law, Sir Edward Taihakerei Durie wrote that wrongful killings, the appropriation and destruction of possessions and property, and the desecration of wāhi tapu effectively added up to 'a theft of mana that had

---

1375. Transcript 4.1.1, p 21 (Te Ra Wright, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

1376. Document K38(a), p 7.

1377. Submission 3.4.228, p 28.

1378. Submission 3.4.228, pp 38–39.

1379. Transcript 4.1.1, p 57 (Morehu MacDonald, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Kotahitanga Marae, 1 March 2010).

1380. Submission 3.4.134, p 50.

to be required.<sup>1381</sup> In our view, this is an appropriate description of the prejudice the Crown's raupatu has caused to the claimants in this inquiry. Compounding this prejudice, the disparagement of Rewi Maniapoto and the characterisation of Ngāti Maniapoto as rebels, even in relatively recent political discourse as described earlier, has caused serious damage to their tino rangatiratanga. Our recommendation that the Crown take steps to recognise and affirm the tino rangatiratanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori is intended to remove the burden of this prejudice. The details are for the parties to discuss during negotiations.

It is past time for the Crown to make amends.

6.11 SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Our key findings in this chapter have been:

- ▶ We found that the Kīngitanga was entirely consistent with the new legal and institutional arrangements necessitated by the Treaty. The Kīngitanga, as a movement and an institution, did not reject the Crown's authority nor was the authority, on which it was established and which it sought to exercise, incompatible with the authority of the Crown. Furthermore the Crown made no attempt to either engage with the Kīngitanga as a Treaty partner nor incorporate it into the machinery of the State, which would have recognised and given effect to Māori autonomy in a way that was Treaty-compliant.
- ▶ In our view, Ngāti Maniapoto and other Kīngitanga tribes had little practical option but to join the war in Taranaki in 1860. They did not perceive Taranaki as outside their proper sphere of interests and action. After careful consideration they concluded that the Governor's actions at Waitara presented a serious threat. Tikanga and their tino rangatiratanga under article 2 justified them in coming to the defence of their kin. While we accept that the Crown did not attack Ngāti Maniapoto (and affiliated Te Rohe Pōtae groups) directly, we found that the Crown breached the Treaty guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the principles of partnership and autonomy when it treated them as rebels.
- ▶ We found that from 1861 to 1863 the Crown did not exhaust all reasonable means to resolve issues with Māori peacefully in accordance with its responsibilities as a Treaty partner. To have reached a compromise with Kīngitanga chiefs, and thereby reconciled the authority of Māori (tino rangatiratanga or mana motuhake) with the authority of the Crown (kāwanatanga), would have been consistent with the Treaty partnership and the principle of autonomy. Governor Grey knew what he could and should do, but he made no effort to carry out the mandate he was given from the British Government to find an accommodation with the Kīngitanga and avoid war. New institutions were introduced to control Māori rather than to protect and provide for tino rangatiratanga. Options such as setting aside districts under section 71 of the Constitution Act were not pursued. In failing to negotiate with the Kingitanga to avoid war the Crown failed in its duty of active protection and breached the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy. These breaches had very serious consequences.

---

<sup>1381</sup> ET Durie, Custom Law (Wellington: Victoria University of Wellington Treaty of Waitangi Research Unit, 2013), p 43.

- ▶ We found that the Crown attacked the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in breach of the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy. Despite the Crown's concession that its invasion of the Waikato was an injustice, it nevertheless attributed some of the responsibility for the war to Māori. It alleged that a credible threat of an attack on Auckland existed, and continued its long-standing habit of singling out Rewi Maniapoto for blame. On both counts the allegations are unfounded. In trying to attribute blame for the war to anything other than its desire to crush the Kingitanga and to conquer, occupy, and confiscate land for settlement, the Crown came dangerously close to trying to legitimise its unjust war.
- ▶ While the Treaty does not displace the Crown's power to use coercive force in an emergency, in this case we agree with the Taranaki Tribunal that the emergency was caused by the Crown. In our view, the gravity of a Treaty breach which causes the loss of life is significant and the death of every Māori person killed during the Crown's unjust war – combatant and non-combatant – was an injustice. We accept that some events, though prejudicial and painful to Māori, were among the ordinary consequences of war and are covered by the scope of the Crown's concessions. The massacre of non-combatants at Rangiaowhia and Ōrākau, however, violated the British standards of the time for the conduct of war. The actions of Crown forces in this respect were egregious and constituted breaches of the principle of partnership and the article 3 guarantee of citizenship rights. No effort was made to investigate or punish those involved. The Crown forces' conduct of war also breached Treaty principles in the excessive and disproportionate destruction and plundering of property which served no military purpose, including burning a great taonga, Hui Te Rangiora.
- ▶ The Governor and Ministers conducted aspects of the war in a disproportionate or egregious manner. The inhumane conditions in which prisoners taken at Rangiriri were held without trial breached the duty of active protection and the article 3 guarantee of citizenship rights. Although Māori leaders repeatedly tried to negotiate and end the fighting, the Governor and Ministers further breached the Treaty and compounded the prejudice of the invasion by unnecessarily prolonging an unjust war.
- ▶ In Treaty terms, our view is that the Kingitanga embodied and protected the tino rangatiratanga of many tribes. An attack on the Kingitanga was an attack on those tribes. Ngāti Tūwharetoa were entitled to defend the Kingitanga against the Crown's unjust attack. The Crown's concession of Treaty breach applies to them in our view.
- ▶ Confiscation was an essential part of the Crown's plan to destroy Māori authority and institutions. By extinguishing all customary rights to land and planning for large-scale European settlement on confiscated land, the Crown breached the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga and the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy.

- ▶ Ngāti Maniapoto interests in Taranaki in 1860 are difficult to determine. Once the iwi were labelled as rebels, the Crown made no effort to investigate the extent of their interests. When war began at Waitara, the Crown knew Ngāti Maniapoto asserted rights south to Waikāramuramu and that they retained an interest over much of northern Taranaki. The Crown's confiscations and its unfair labelling of Ngāti Maniapoto as rebels breached the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy, and the duty of active protection. Ngāti Maniapoto lost rights in Taranaki as a result and so suffered serious prejudice.
- ▶ We found that the Crown breached the article 2 guarantee of tino rangatiratanga, the Treaty principles of partnership and autonomy, and the duty of active protection when it confiscated land north of the Pūniu where Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Maniapoto-affiliated hapū had interests. This finding includes but is not limited to: the lands between the Pūniu, Waipā, and Mangapiko Rivers, claimed by Ngāti Paretekawa and Ngāti Ngutu; and Ngāti Apakura's ancestral lands from Rangiaowhia to Lake Ngāroto.
- ▶ The Crown failed to uphold its promise that those who did not take part in the war would retain their lands. The Compensation Court was poorly resourced and extremely limited in the compensation it could award. Many agreements were made outside the Court by Crown officers. Inadequacies in the way the Crown established and implemented the Compensation Court not only compounded the prejudice caused by confiscation but breached the principle of good governance and the article 3 guarantee of citizenship rights.
- ▶ Te Rohe Pōtae iwi and hapū suffered further prejudice:
  - The threat of war and then the strain of maintaining a fighting force damaged their economy.
  - Many combatants and non-combatants lost their lives or suffered injury.
  - Ill-health and trauma in the immediate aftermath of war was followed by the strain of hosting and providing for a large refugee population.
  - In the long term, the raupatu caused lasting psychological damage, particularly through being labelled as rebel or kupapa.
  - Ngāti Maniapoto suffered severe damage to their mana as a result of the confiscations and ongoing labelling as rebels.

PART II

CHAPTER 7

KA TŪ TE AUKATI: THE FORMATION AND ENFORCEMENT OF THE AUKATI

Ko te riri kia mutu . . . ka whitingia te whenua e te ra i runga i ta ratou korero, ka uaina e te ua, a ka tino kaha amuri ake nei te mahana me te maramatanga o te ra.

Anger shall cease. The sun shines over the land with what they have discussed, the rain washes away, and afterwards the sun shall be much more warmer and brighter.

—Rewi Maniapoto<sup>1</sup>

7.1 INTRODUCTION

The peoples of Te Rohe Pōtae emerged from the Taranaki and Waikato wars with their ancestral lands largely intact. The way in which the Crown had asserted its authority during the wars, however, signalled that they could not guarantee this situation would continue.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were above all concerned to protect their remaining lands, and to ensure the ongoing exercise of their authority – that is, their mana, and their tino rangatiratanga. To do this, after the war they reassessed and redefined the territory over which the Kīngitanga held sway. This territory was soon defined by the aukati: a border area on the edges of Kīngitanga territories that was patrolled and protected against all unsanctioned incursions, and symbolised by the taiaha, Mahuta. Within this aukati, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori could offer refuge to King Tāwhiao and some 2,000 of his Waikato people, as well as others who sought sanctuary within Kīngitanga-controlled territory.

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori succeeded in protecting and upholding the exercise of their traditional authority well into the 1880s. During this period, the Crown chose to tolerate the continued operation of the Kīngitanga. Māori came to know the territory that was retained as Te Rohe Pōtae. Pākehā associated the district with King Tāwhiao and called it the King or King's Country.

Neither the Kīngitanga nor the Crown sought a return to war, and an uneasy stalemate existed throughout the period that the aukati was enforced. Nevertheless, discussions towards some form of resolution began in earnest from the late 1860s.

In this inquiry, we heard from numerous claimants about the period of the aukati. This chapter draws on their evidence, given at the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho

---

1. Te Waka Maori, 18 November 1869, p1; doc A110 (Meredith), p 615.

hui and in hearings. Cathy Marr's report on political engagement between 1864 and 1886 is a major source. We also use the traditional history report prepared by Ngāti Maniapoto researchers, as well as research reports prepared by Paul Thomas, Donald Loveridge, Andrew Francis, and the co-authored report by Philip Cleaver and Jonathan Sarich.<sup>2</sup>

7.1.1 The purpose of this chapter

In the wake of the Waikato war, and the enforcement of the aukati, the Crown redefined its relationship to the Kīngitanga, and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. Many of the same questions that confronted the Crown before the war remained: whether it would be willing to recognise the Kīngitanga, and on what terms. However, the war and the confiscations had created new circumstances. Waikato now lived in exile within the aukati, their lands having been confiscated. The return of the confiscated land became a prominent matter for the Kīngitanga in any prospective settlement with the Crown. These were the issues that featured most prominently in the discussions with Kīngitanga representatives from the 1870s and are the subject of analysis in this chapter.

The negotiations between the Crown and the Kīngitanga that commenced in 1875 stopped and started. Native Minister Donald McLean was instrumental in developing the Crown's policy towards the Kīngitanga and led initial negotiations on behalf of the Crown. Following McLean's illness and resignation, Premier Sir George Grey and Native Minister John Sheehan renewed negotiations. In 1879, Māori and Pākehā alike anticipated a settlement of some sort, but negotiations collapsed at a hui held in May that year at Te Kōpua, near Alexandra.

By the end of the 1870s, the colonial state had rapidly expanded and the settler population had boomed to over half a million.<sup>3</sup> Te Rohe Pōtae soon came to be further encroached upon at its edges by land purchasing and the activities of the Native Land Court. The Crown considered that 'opening' the King Country would remove the principal barrier to the successful settlement of the North Island; it wanted especially to complete construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway through Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>4</sup> Despite a reduced land base, damaged economic infrastructure, and the heavy burden of a resident refugee population, Te Rohe Pōtae was still governed by Māori as something akin to a separate state.

The Crown renewed discussions with Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga in the early 1880s. In 1881, Tāwhiao met Major William Mair at Alexandra, where Tāwhiao and his people lay their guns down at Mair's feet. Wahanui Huatare, the Ngāti

---

2. Marr, 'Te Rohe Potae Political Engagement 1864–1886' (document A78); Ngāti Maniapoto researchers, 'Ngāti Maniapoto Mana Motuhake: Report for Ngāti Maniapoto Claimants and the Waitangi Tribunal' (document A110); Thomas, 'The Crown and Maori in Mokau 1840–1911' (document A28); Loveridge, 'The Crown and the Opening of the King Country, 1882–1885' (document A41); Francis, 'The Rohe Potae Commercial Economy in the Mid-Nineteenth Century, c1830–1886' (document A26); Cleaver and Sarich, 'Turongo: The North Island Main Trunk Railway and the Rohe Potae, 1870–2008' (document A20).

3. Document A20 (Cleaver and Sarich), pp 33–34.

4. Document A20, pp 28–42.

Maniapoto rangatira who led his iwi's dealings with the Crown, spelt out the implication of this symbolic gesture, saying "This means peace."<sup>5</sup> But there was still no settlement. In November 1882, Native Minister John Bryce made a final attempt to negotiate a settlement with Tāwhiao at Whatiwhatihoe. But Bryce was unsuccessful and ultimately turned to negotiate with Wahanui and the leadership of Te Rohe Pōtae. He would not negotiate with Tāwhiao again.

These matters were important for the claimants, who argued that significant opportunities remained for the Crown to recognise the Kīngitanga, which it failed to do, and viewed the pressure placed on them by the Crown during this period as constituting breaches of the Treaty. The Crown saw matters differently, submitting that each phase of the negotiations was conducted in good faith and did not set out to divide the Kīngitanga.

7.1.2 How this chapter is structured

This chapter begins in section 7.2 by identifying the issues for determination. The chapter then addresses these issues by looking at the Crown's actions towards Te Rohe Pōtae Māori in this period, and assessing those actions against the principles of the Treaty of Waitangi. Section 7.3 examines the way in which the aukati was enforced after the Waikato war and the Crown's initial response to it. In section 7.4 we look at the period of negotiations that occurred from 1875 to 1882. The chapter ends in section 7.5 with a summary of findings.

7.2 ISSUES

The principal issues in this chapter concern the way in which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the Kīngitanga, protected their remaining territories against further incursions through the assertion of the aukati; and how the Crown attempted to bring about a resolution with the Kīngitanga in the period up to 1882, from which time Tāwhiao no longer featured actively in the negotiations. These issues were the focus of submissions by parties in this inquiry.

7.2.1 What other Tribunals have said

The Central North Island Tribunal found that – in the period leading up to the negotiations that began in 1883 – there were multiple opportunities for the Crown to have provided Māori with meaningful measures of self-government. This included setting aside Māori districts under section 71 of the New Zealand Constitution Act 1852. Other options included providing for Māori in the machinery of central and provincial government, providing for rūnanga or komiti in the machinery of the state, or finding some means for recognising the authority of the Kīngitanga. The failure to do so constituted a breach of Treaty principles.<sup>6</sup> These findings extended to the Tribunal's consideration of the period after the New Zealand wars, when the

5. New Zealand Herald, 18 July 1881, p 3; doc A110 (Meredith), p 617; doc A78 (Marr), p 539.

6. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo: Report on Central North Island Claims, Stage One, revised ed, 4 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2008), vol 1, pp 241–242.

Crown failed to take measures to provide for Māori self-government, such as the system envisaged in Native Minister Donald McLean's Native Councils Bills.<sup>7</sup>

7.2.2 Crown concessions

The Crown made no concessions in respect of its actions concerning the period when the aukati was in place.

7.2.3 Claimant and Crown arguments

The Tribunal received more than 20 claims in this inquiry containing grievances related to the aukati.<sup>8</sup> While the parties agreed that Te Rohe Pōtae was effectively controlled by Māori between 1866 and 1883, they differed over aspects of the Crown's engagement with the Kīngitanga in this period.

7.2.3.1 The assertion of the aukati and the Crown's response

For the claimants, the Kīngitanga's enforcement of the aukati after the Waikato war was not an attempt to remain isolated from the rest of the colony; it was designed to maintain and enforce tino rangatiratanga.<sup>9</sup> The claimants considered that, while the Crown assumed it had sovereignty within the aukati, it was unable to exercise that sovereignty throughout the period that the aukati was in place. Indeed, the claimants submitted that the aukati was not 'a mere boundary'; rather, 'it defined an independent district.'<sup>10</sup> The Crown at first respected the aukati, which led to a long series of engagements.<sup>11</sup> But the claimants also submitted that the Crown had no intention of sharing any real political control, despite the opportunity to do so that was presented under section 71 of the 1852 Constitution Act.<sup>12</sup>

The Crown acknowledged that, after the Waikato war, Te Rohe Pōtae was regarded as an area within which it was unable to exercise authority 'for the time being' without invoking 'civil unrest', and so sought to establish an accommodation with the Kīngitanga.<sup>13</sup> The Crown preferred to establish 'New Zealand founded institutions' rather than establishing Te Rohe Pōtae as a 'Native District' under section 71.<sup>14</sup> Crown counsel submitted that the Crown refused to contemplate formally recognising the Kīngitanga in 1868 on account of the Kīngitanga facing 'so many challenges [that] it could not exert an authority that could be recognised over the territory'.<sup>15</sup>

---

7. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, p 312.

8. Wai 440 (submission 3.4.198); Wai 443 (submission 3.4.158); Wai 551, Wai 948 (submission 3.4.250); Wai 784 (submission 3.4.147); Wai 846 (submission 3.4.251); Wai 972 (submission 3.4.134); Wai 1099, Wai 1100, Wai 1132, Wai 1133, Wai 1136, Wai 1137, Wai 1138, Wai 1139, Wai 1798 (submission 3.4.189); Wai 48, Wai 81, Wai 146 (submission 3.4.211); Wai 575 (submission 3.4.281); Wai 1197, Wai 1388 (submission 3.4.209).

9. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 2–3; submission 3.4.129(a), p 1.

10. Submission 3.4.129, pp 5–6.

11. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 3; submission 3.4.129(a), p 10.

12. Submission 3.4.128(b), p 6.

13. Submission 3.4.301, p 2; submission 3.4.299, pp 37–38.

14. Submission 3.4.301, p 19.

15. Submission 3.4.301, p 20; submission 3.4.299, p 10.

7.2.3.2 Negotiations 1875–82

The claimants maintained that the Crown did not make sufficient efforts to arrive at a resolution with the Kīngitanga following the commencement of negotiations in 1875, and instead attempted to create a divide between Ngāti Maniapoto and the Kīngitanga. They particularly emphasised the efforts made by Bryce to drive a ‘wedge’ between them. Despite these attempts, however, Ngāti Maniapoto remained supportive of Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga, as indicated by their ongoing protection of them.<sup>16</sup> Counsel for Ngāti Tūwharetoa also emphasised the Crown’s ‘divide and rule’ approach and submitted that the Crown missed a significant opportunity in 1882 to recognise the Kīngitanga and provide for the tino rangatira-tanga of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori.<sup>17</sup>

The Crown submitted that its wide-ranging negotiations with Māori leaders during this period did not constitute ‘a “divide and rule” policy’.<sup>18</sup> The Crown acknowledged that it perceived the Kīngitanga as a challenge to the Queen’s sovereignty,<sup>19</sup> but sought to recognise the authority of Ngāti Maniapoto and Kīngitanga leaders as ‘influential chiefs’.<sup>20</sup> As such, the Crown made a number of proposals that would have brought about an acceptable transformation, none of which was accepted or implemented. The proposals made by Bryce to the Kīngitanga were made in good faith and in keeping with the Crown’s intentions of exercising its authority in Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>21</sup>

7.2.4 Issues for discussion

Having reviewed the Tribunal Statement of Issues for this inquiry and briefly summarised the parties’ arguments, we now identify the issues for us to determine.<sup>22</sup> There are significant issues to address relating to the Crown’s engagement with the Kīngitanga following the Waikato war, and the engagements that led to the end of negotiations between the Crown and Tāwhiao at the end of 1882.

The following questions are addressed:

- ▶ Was it legitimate for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the Kīngitanga, to enforce the aukati and did the Crown respond to it appropriately?
- ▶ How did the Crown engage with Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, through the Kīngitanga, during negotiations from 1875 to 1882, and did the Crown place undue pressure on them?
- ▶ Did the Crown take reasonable steps to recognise and provide for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori self-government, whether by formalising or establishing institutions or by using existing mechanisms (such as section 71 of the Constitution Act 1852)?

---

16. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 6–7.

17. Submission 3.4.281, pp 12, 26.

18. Submission 3.4.301, p 9.

19. Submission 3.4.301, p 23.

20. Submission 3.4.301, pp 23–24.

21. Submission 3.4.301, p 16.

22. Statement 1.4.3, pp 27–28.

7.3 THE FORMATION OF THE AUKATI AND THE CROWN'S RESPONSE: 1866–74

Previous chapters of this report have explained how the hapū and iwi of what came to be known as Te Rohe Pōtae governed themselves mai rā anō (from times past), and in doing so exercised tino rangatiratanga over their own land, people, and affairs. The establishment of Crown institutions and authority throughout New Zealand in the years immediately after 1840 did little to change that situation in Te Rohe Pōtae. However, as explained in chapter 6, hapū and iwi across the North Island began to organise in response to these institutions to protect their lands. At the forefront of this movement was the Kīngitanga, to which Te Rohe Pōtae Māori made firm commitments. The Kīngitanga became a vehicle for co-ordinating the tino rangatiratanga of many hapū and iwi, which took on even greater relevance in the face of Crown aggression.

The claimants considered that Te Rohe Pōtae communities had maintained their political independence ‘for centuries.’<sup>23</sup> After the wars, those communities retained total ‘control of what remained of their territory’ – this would only change if the Crown ‘forced entry, or terms could be negotiated.’<sup>24</sup> They emphasised, however, that the aukati they established over their remaining lands was not an isolationist policy. Rather, it was a rangatiratanga policy, designed to maintain and enforce the rights and authority they held.<sup>25</sup> In his evidence, Harold Maniapoto described this as the ‘desire to maintain self-autonomy and self-governance.’<sup>26</sup>

In this section, the manner in which the Kīngitanga reorganised itself after the Waikato war is addressed, including how the various iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae came to host their Waikato kin, and how they came to enforce an aukati over their lands. The Crown’s initial response to the aukati up to 1874 is also examined.

7.3.1 The Kīngitanga in the wake of the wars

In the wake of war and confiscation, the Kīngitanga sought ways to continue to assert and protect its authority, including protecting the lands that remained in the traditional ownership of Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. This was no easy task. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to govern themselves in much the same way as they had prior to 1864, but they were now seriously challenged by the consequences of the war. Notably, they were challenged by the obligation to accommodate the thousands of refugees led by King Tāwhiao and other chiefs and who were now resident within the territory. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders continued to seek the maintenance and protection of their authority through the unifying principles of the Kīngitanga, while also balancing the complex inter-relationships between hapū and iwi and their overlapping interests.

---

23. Submission 3.4.128, p 4.

24. Submission 3.4.130, p 4.

25. Submission 3.4.128(b), pp 2–3.

26. Document H17 (Maniapoto), p 14.

7.3.1.1 Political relationships between hapū and iwi

The maintenance of relationships between hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae and the Kīngitanga remained important as much after the raupatu as before it. Those hapū and iwi continued to align themselves under the mana of King Tāwhiao (previously known as Matutaera<sup>27</sup>), who led the movement from 1860 until his death in 1894. Tāwhiao was an important pan-tribal leader, to whom several tribal groups expressly pledged their lands. We heard evidence of this, for example, in respect of Ngāti Mahuta with lands at Taharoa and Te Maika, and Ngāti Rereahu with lands at Pureora.<sup>28</sup>

As seen in chapter 2, the alliances between the hapū and iwi of Te Rohe Pōtae and other hapū and iwi of the Kīngitanga can be traced back to the eighteenth century and earlier, with the political and military coalitions between Ngāti Maniapoto and Waikato (among others) achieving prominence at the battles of Hingakākā and Mātakitaki. Those alliances underlined the historical depth behind Te Rohe Pōtae support – decades later – for the first Māori King Te Wherowhero and the Kīngitanga. They remained influential as Te Rohe Pōtae Māori joined the wars – first in Taranaki and then in Waikato – and facilitated political developments during the period of the aukati.

As before the wars, the pledge of land by hapū and iwi to the King still allowed those groups to retain and exercise their mana at a local level. To that extent, the Kīngitanga did not replace the mana of those hapū and iwi, but rather acted as a vehicle through which their tino rangatiratanga could be represented and protected. Ms Marr suggested that the pledges of land to the King also had a strong tapu and suggested that this was well understood, even by Pākehā at the time.<sup>29</sup> For instance, Charles Davis (or Hare Rewiti), who was one of the first Pākehā permitted to enter the aukati, noted in 1868: ‘The aukatis are to remain as heretofore, strictly guarded and kept tapu.’<sup>30</sup>

In the wake of the confiscations, the centre of Kīngitanga affairs relocated with Tāwhiao to Tokangamutu (modern-day Te Kūiti). There, Tāwhiao and his advisers looked to regather the Kīngitanga alliance as they sought to build their strength and capacity for the post-war period.<sup>31</sup> Tāwhiao’s leadership was not just confined to political matters. Kīngitanga members looked to Tāwhiao for spiritual guidance, and he is remembered as a great visionary with a strong ethic of peace.<sup>32</sup>

The existing order, organised around the local leadership of rangatira, whose decision-making occurred among their people and within their communities,

27. As discussed in chapter 6, he was given the name Tāwhiao by the Pai Marire profit Te Ua.

28. For Taharoa (Ngāti Mahuta), see transcript 4.1.9, p 34 (Rāhui Papa, hearing week 3, Maketu marae, 4 March 2013); for Te Maika (Ngāti Mahuta), see transcript 4.1.9, pp 1255, 1257–1258 (Alan Rubay, hearing week 3, Maketu marae, 8 March 2013), p 1273 (Edith Dockery, hearing week 3, Maketu marae, 8 March 2013); for Pureora (Ngāti Rereahu), see transcript 4.1.11, pp [38], [57] (Piripi Crown, hearing week 5, Te Ihingarangi marae, 6 May 2013).

29. Document A78, pp 51, 92, 184, 769, 780.

30. Daily Southern Cross, 25 January 1868, p 5; doc A110, p 608; doc A78, pp 134–135, 141.

31. Document A78, p 164.

32. Document A78, pp 164, 180.

remained fundamental. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori leaders maintained their responsibilities to hapū and iwi at local levels, while co-ordinating activities with the central Kīngitanga leadership, made up of Tāwhiao and his advisers.<sup>33</sup> The Kīngitanga leadership took the role of making territory-wide decisions that simultaneously incorporated and transcended local leadership and political organisation.<sup>34</sup>

The Kīngitanga maintained support and developed policies through large kaupapa-driven hui, which involved a congressional approach to making decisions that needed broad-based support across the district. The most prominent was the annual 'Maehe', held every March (or late summer) at Tāwhiao's headquarters (first at Tokangamutu, then later at Whatiwhatihoe).<sup>35</sup> The Maehe were substantial logistical exercises, requiring the preparation of copious amounts of food for the hundreds who would gather. One of the defining features of the Maehe was Tāwhiao's 'proclamation', which summarised the Kīngitanga's policies – reminding those gathered of what had previously been agreed and pointing to how they would be applied in the coming year.<sup>36</sup>

Tāwhiao was supported in exercising the Kīngitanga leadership by a range of trusted advisors, drawn from the constituent hapū and iwi who had aligned to its cause. Wahanui Huatare (see sidebar) and Rewi Maniapoto were two of the most prominent leaders among Ngāti Maniapoto who were also regarded as the King's advisors. Others included Tākerei Te Rau, Tuhi, Te Ngakau, Te Wheoro, and Tāmami Ngāpora. Ngāpora and Wahanui were both often referred to as Tāwhiao's 'Prime Minister'. Tāwhiao's council of chiefs and religious advisors was sometimes referred to as the Tekaumarua (council of 12).<sup>37</sup>

The maintenance of the Kīngitanga alliance came to the fore in the enforcement of the aukati. Through this period, the Kīngitanga faced increasing challenges, especially when Crown activities began to push at the borders of Te Rohe Pōtae from the late 1870s. Rewi Maniapoto took on a prominent role in working with the Crown on issues of importance to local communities. Ms Marr suggested that his actions, along with those of other Kīngitanga leaders, were primarily designed to protect the core lands of the Kīngitanga territory and were largely protective in nature. She argued: 'While the Kīngitanga chiefs would not participate in the Native Land Court for most of the 1870s and would not allow it to operate within their external boundary, they did show a willingness to resolve matters peacefully by cooperating with officials and the government to ensure its activities did not

---

33. Document A78, pp 164–165.

34. Document A78, pp 164–165.

35. Document A78, p 165.

36. Document A78, pp 167–168.

37. Document A78, pp 164–165.

provoke violence.<sup>38</sup> Throughout the negotiations that began in 1875, Rewi adopted a role of representing the interests of those communities with customary rights in Te Rohe Pōtae lands, which he perceived were being threatened by Crown actions. This meant that he occasionally represented these interests separately from Tāwhiao. In 1877, Rewi met with the premier, Daniel Pollen, and suggested that the Native Land Court could be used to define land outside his territory, but said that he would await any final agreement with Tāwhiao before taking any action (see section 7.4.1.4). This was the beginning of ongoing attempts to secure the external boundary of the Kīngitanga territory.

In the view of Ngāti Maniapoto researcher Paul Meredith:

Rewi was a nationalist and he and other Ngāti Maniapoto believed that a pan-tribal movement, unifying the Māori people under one sovereign equal to the Queen of England, could bring an end to intertribal conflict, keep Māori land in Māori hands and provide a separate governing body for Māori.<sup>39</sup>

Mr Meredith also drew attention to comments made by Rewi's nephew, Raureti Te Huia, who described the two principal ture or laws of the Kīngitanga as follows: 'Kaati ra te patu a te Maori ki tetehi Maori . . . kaati hoki te hoko o te whenua a te Maori ki te Pakeha. [Cease the killing by Māori of other Māori . . . stop the selling of Māori land to Europeans.]'<sup>40</sup>

Except when he was speaking metaphorically, Rewi did not directly address matters about how the authority of the Kīngitanga could be recognised by the Crown: this was left to Tāwhiao. To this extent, Rewi's actions were defensive, and focused on defining the territory in which Kīngitanga authority could be exercised and on broadly indicating how Māori could conduct the determination of their land interests under their authority and control. But he recognised that for the Kīngitanga to represent and protect the interests of its constituent communities, it would need to ensure that those communities could control matters of importance to them at a local level. Increasingly, in the late 1870s and early 1880s, Rewi faced the challenge of representing and protecting the interests of Māori in areas such as Mōkau, where chiefs faced growing challenges in developing a viable local economy while facing external pressures from those who wanted to utilise their land. These developments, and their implications for the Kīngitanga alliance, are discussed in section 7.4.

---

38. Document A78, p 217.

39. Document A110, pp 603–604.

40. Raureti Te Huia – He Kōrero, Ngā Taonga Sound & Vision audio recording reference 40615; doc A110, p 604.

Wahanui Reihana Te Huatare (Late 1820s–97)

Wahanui, sometimes called Reihana Wahanui or Reihana Whakahohoe, was the son of Te Ngohi-te-arau (also known as Te Huatare) of Ngāti Maniapoto and Tarati of Ngāti Waiora from Mōkau.<sup>1</sup> He was born in the late 1820s, and grew up at Whataroa, Oparure, and Ōtorohanga. At an early age, Wahanui was sent to be educated at the Wesleyan Native Institution in Three Kings, Auckland, before returning to his tūrangawaewae in the upper Waima valley. John Kaati said of Wahanui: ‘This man, when his elders realised and saw his actions and his works, he was still a child, but they saw that he was already very mature and so they taught him, they trained him and they took him to the places where houses of learning occurred, the houses of learning of his people.’<sup>2</sup> John Henry told us that Wahanui’s brother, Te Wiwini, was a tohunga, but the ‘old people wanted Wahanui to be a priest.’ Wahanui was ‘famous for quoting the Scriptures in his whaikōrero’. He was a rangatira of great physical presence, acute intellect, and significant oratorical skill.<sup>3</sup>

The knowledge of Te Ao Pākehā gleaned from his time away proved valuable in subsequent years as he rose to prominence in Ngāti Maniapoto amidst mounting tensions with the Crown. John Henry said that ‘when the raruraru between the Crown and the Kīngitanga began, he left the priesthood and returned home’. Wahanui fought in a number of battles against Crown forces following the invasion of the Waikato in 1863. He was injured at the battle of Hairini in the immediate aftermath of the Crown’s destruction of Rangiaowhia, but recovered to take part in the battle of Ōrākau in March and April 1864 (see chapter 6).

Following the war and subsequent confiscations, Wahanui became a prominent leader of Ngāti Maniapoto and the Kīngitanga, serving as a close personal advisor to the King after the retreat into Te Rohe Pōtae. Although some reports suggested he was partly responsible for the killings at Pukearuhe in 1869 (discussed in section 7.3.3.4), he was not present at the attack, which in any case went against his beliefs. He expressed regret over the events, but claimed responsibility on behalf of the wider iwi for what appeared to be a breach of the Kīngitanga’s peace policy, which he was instrumental in enforcing.

1. Waitangi Tribunal, He Maunga Rongo, vol 1, pp 329–347; Tui Adams, Ngahinaturae Te Uira, and Ann Parsonson, “Behold, A Kite Flies Towards You”: The Kīngitanga and the “Opening” of the King Country’, in New Zealand Journal of History, vol 31, no 1 (2009), pp 111–116; doc A93 (Loveridge), p 77; doc C7 (Kaati); Manuka Henare, ‘Wahanui Huatare’, in 1870–1900, vol 2 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed Claudia Orange (Wellington: Bridget Williams Books and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1993), pp 559–561.

2. Transcript 4.1.2, p 158 (John Kaati, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Waipapa Marae, 30 March 2010).

3. Transcript 4.1.13, p 384 (John Hone Arama Tata Henry, hearing week 8, Te Kotahitanga marae, 5 November 2013).

Wahanui played a leading role in the discussions between the Kīngitanga and the Crown, beginning at Te Pahiko in November 1869. In 1881, Wahanui spoke on Tāwhiao's behalf when the King travelled to Pirongia/Alexandra to lay down his arms and make formal peace with the Crown. He played a similar role at a hui between Native Minister John Bryce and the Kīngitanga in November 1882. Following this hui, the Crown no longer conducted negotiations with Tāwhiao. Instead, Wahanui engaged in discussions directly with the Crown. These events are examined in detail in chapter 8.

It was during this period that Wahanui sought to persuade the Crown to recognise a defined territory – Te Rohe Pōtae – over which he and his people could continue to exercise their tino rangatiranga. Exactly how this could be achieved was set out in a petition to Parliament in June 1883. Negotiations with the Crown continued, and in November 1884, Wahanui appeared before the House of Representatives to obtain the necessary legislative measures to provide for his people's authority, which he described as 'mana whakahaere'. At Kihikihi in February 1885, he participated in discussions with Native Minister John Ballance which led to their agreement to consent to the construction of the railway through the territory. In April 1885, he turned the first sod with Premier Robert Stout.

In entering into these arrangements, Wahanui hoped that the worst effects of colonisation would not repeat themselves for Ngāti Maniapoto. This did not prove to be the case, however, and by 1900 close to 690,000 acres of land had passed from Māori to Crown ownership. But he strove to protect the land of Ngāti Maniapoto as it passed through the Native Land Court in the late 1880s, and as, from 1892, the Crown began to purchase large areas of Te Rohe Pōtae land. Wahanui's role in these events is covered in chapters 10 and 11.

Wahanui passed away on 5 December 1897, leaving a new generation of Ngāti Maniapoto to seek a better relationship with the Crown. He is remembered by his descendants for his unrelenting effort to promote the mana of Ngāti Maniapoto. John Henry told us that 'Wahanui was more than just a spokesman for Tāwhiao and the Kīngitanga. I believe that he was a visionary for his people. I believe that Wahanui's vision was to protect Maniapoto.'<sup>4</sup>

---

4. Document 016, p 6 (Henry).

7.3.1.2 Social, cultural, and economic life of communities

In addition to sustaining their political relationships, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori continued to look toward building their social, cultural, and economic lives. They did so while supporting a population that ballooned with a post-war influx estimated at more than 2,000 exiles, many of whom accompanied Tāwhiao when he relocated to Tokangamutu (modern-day Te Kūiti). They also sheltered Te Kooti and his followers (see sidebar in section 7.3.3.5). Vincent O'Malley estimated that the ratio of exiles to permanent residents of Te Rohe Pōtae was roughly one to one, but that around Tokangamutu the ratio may have been as high as three to one.<sup>41</sup> In the years immediately succeeding the confiscations, both the exiles and their whanaunga who had offered them places of refuge were susceptible to overcrowding, lack of food, and disease.<sup>42</sup>

As Ms Marr explained, the incorporation of the refugees into Te Rohe Pōtae created challenges:

The economic and social dislocation and the need to provide for extra refugees following the wars was a major challenge. It is likely there was some demoralisation and difficulty providing not only for local communities but for large numbers of refugees as well. There were considerable challenges with incorporating dispossessed chiefs and communities into existing systems of governance and the dispossessed naturally gave priority to having their lands returned and restored in ways that might conflict with overall Kingitanga peace policies.<sup>43</sup>

These conflicts were remarked upon by Pākehā commentators and notably by Government officials. Governor Grey stated in 1866 that there was tension, rivalry, and bitterness between Ngāti Maniapoto and their Waikato refugees, due, he claimed, to the fact that Ngāti Maniapoto had escaped land confiscations. William Searancke, the Waikato resident magistrate, made similar claims in 1869.<sup>44</sup>

What were often not recognised by Pākehā observers were the relationships between the displaced and their hosts; they were often close kin as well as political refugees. They were treated as kin, and lent their expertise and labour to economic enterprises and rebuilding.<sup>45</sup> Tame Tūwhangai said: 'Everyone within the Te Rohe Pōtae had duties to perform and it was no different with this small band or section of Ngāti Apakura, the men would have to patrol on horseback the aukati line in the south-eastern area of the Te Rohe Pōtae as their families were provided for and protected by the local hapū.'<sup>46</sup>

Still, much remains unknown about the relationship between refugees and hosts in Te Rohe Pōtae. As noted, the exact number of refugees is unknown. Nor is it known how iwi and hapū affiliation may have affected the count of existing estimates. There is little evidence regarding how or where refugees lived within the aukati, although there is some evidence of land being gifted (see chapter 6, section 6.10.6). The Tribunal was told that the refugee situation caused some logistical and political problems. Frank Thorne said that the 'massive influx of refugees sharing the same space and food resources . . . quickly put a strain on relationships and 41. Document A22, p 204 (O'Malley).

42. Document A22, p 196.

43. Document A78, p 207.

44. Document A78, p 152.

45. Document A78, p 193.

46. Document A97 (Borell and Joseph), p 244.

resources.<sup>47</sup> Though the refugee diaspora reached many parts of Te Rohe Pōtae, as shown by the Ngāti Apakura example raised by Tame Tūwhangai, most refugees from the raupatu, initially at least, lived in and around Tokangamutu. This became a cause of tension between the refugees and Ngāti Maniapoto, particularly Ngāti Rōrā. Though Tāwhiao had whakapapa links to Maniapoto, he and his followers were still technically guests. ‘Tāwhiao [was] an important rangatira’, Dr Wharehuia Hēmara said, ‘[but] he didn’t have any ownership over the land.’<sup>48</sup> Mindful of the obligations his lengthy presence had placed on his hosts, Tāwhiao moved to Whatiwhatihoe in 1881, where he and his people were gifted land by Ngāti Hikairo (see section 7.4.3.3). However, the difficulties presented by the refugee situation appear never to have caused a serious rupture in the political arrangements that underpinned the aukati. The endurance of the aukati over two decades makes it evident that, although relationships were tested, they proved strong enough to weather these problems.

As set out in chapter 6, the raupatu had a severe immediate impact on agriculture and trade, and the inundation of refugees contributed to this disruption. In 1871, for example, Mōkau was reportedly poverty-stricken and economically isolated, largely because the flow of trade had completely dried up following the attack on Pukearuhe (see section 7.3.3.4). Trade did later resume and in subsequent years Mōkau-produced tobacco could be acquired in New Plymouth and Wellington.<sup>49</sup> But Mōkau Māori would never recapture the coastal shipping trade that had been such a strength of their pre-war economic activity.

However, Te Rohe Pōtae communities seem to have largely regained their vigour by the 1870s. Agricultural production appears to have recovered.<sup>50</sup> Communities returned to producing the agricultural goods that had been well established before the war – oats, wheat, potatoes, and pigs among them. They also introduced new crops, such as hops, which were planted at Te Kūiti in 1872 and later near Mōkau. William Cumming, who owned a brewery in Hamilton, said he purchased good-quality hops from Māori within Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>51</sup> Reports throughout the 1870s commented similarly on the quality and quantity of crops – canoes laden with produce arriving in Alexandra from Te Kūiti to trade, potatoes grown at Aotea, grain crops from Kāwhia. This productivity was achieved amid difficult circumstances: the 1875 kūmara crop was described as ‘indifferent’,<sup>52</sup> in 1876 grain prices decreased, and food shortages leading to sickness and death were reported in both years.<sup>53</sup>

47. Transcript 4.1.12, pp 48–49 (Frank Thorne, hearing week 7, Waipapa marae, 7 October 2013).

48. Transcript 4.1.21, p 453 (Wharehuia Hēmara, hearing week 12, Oparure marae, 6 May 2014).

49. Document A26 (Francis), pp 100–102; Taranaki Herald, 22 October 1873, p 2; doc A28 (Thomas), p 180.

50. Document A26, pp 97–98, doc A78, pp 193–195.

51. Document A26, p 102.

52. Robert S Bush, Government Interpreter, Raglan, to Native Minister, 5 May 1875 (doc A26, p 103).

53. Document A26, pp 105, 109.

Despite such setbacks, these and other communal agricultural activities sustained the peoples of Te Rohe Pōtae during the period of the aukati, producing enough to both satisfy daily needs and divert surpluses into Kingitanga hui or markets outside the aukati. These results were achieved by an independent people. Their labour was efficient and organised. They could apply their incomes to the purchase of modern farming implements and expanding production.<sup>54</sup>

7.3.2 The aukati and the territory it contained

The aukati was a protected area that defined an independent territory comprising the districts of most hapū and iwi who adhered to the Kingitanga. The district became widely known among Pākehā as the ‘King Country’ or ‘King’s Country’, and it remained wholly under Māori authority until the mid-1880s. The aukati controlled, restricted and, if necessary, prohibited the passage of people and goods into this territory. Throughout, the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae Māori held the line against the introduction of Crown policies and institutions. In doing so, the aukati became an enduring symbol of the district that it defined.

Traditionally, aukati were a mechanism for formal control over access to territory. Aukati referred to both a puru (stoppage), placed at strategic points to regulate or prevent passage, and a border area that defined the territory through which passage was being regulated. Māori adapted aukati to the new circumstances and tensions that arose from colonial settlement, using them strategically throughout the wars of the 1860s.<sup>55</sup> Aukati could be deployed flexibly, with the outer boundaries subject to change depending on the circumstances. The aukati as implemented and administered by the Kingitanga and Te Rohe Pōtae never followed a specific tribal or traditional boundary. Rather, it shifted over time in response to the pressures of the surrounding colonial State and internal support from constituent iwi and hapū. In that sense, the border area that came to define the territory under the authority of the Kingitanga was not one aukati, but a series of aukati that were enforced and enforceable at a local level, and were changeable depending on the circumstances.

In the 1850s, in the broadest sense, the territory under Kingitanga authority largely comprised lands that constituent iwi and hapū pledged to the King and the kaupapa of pupuri whenua – holding (not selling) the land. Those areas were defined in traditional ways, through the use of named maunga and pou. By the early 1860s, key maunga marked zones of support for the Kingitanga as far south as Tararua. Support extended into Taranaki and Whanganui, as well as eastern districts beyond Taupō towards Rotorua, the Bay of Plenty, and Hawkes Bay, and north-east to the Hauraki district.<sup>56</sup>

As war drew nearer, the Kingitanga set the Mangatāwhiri Stream, south of Auckland, as the boundary that the Crown’s roads and troops were forbidden to

---

54. Document A26, pp 97–114; doc A78, pp 192–205.

55. Document A78, p 60.

56. Document A119, plate 3.

cross. The Government's decision to send forces over the Mangatāwhiri was widely understood as a declaration of war (see chapter 6).<sup>57</sup>

Following the war, the aukati that came to characterise the protection of the territories remaining in Māori ownership was established and enforced. Vincent O'Malley considered that while the Pūniu River was understood to be the boundary of the land taken possession by the British from the time of the battle of Ōrākau, a formal aukati does not appear to have been put in place until mid-1866.<sup>58</sup> The border area that came to constitute the aukati was at its western and northern regions more sharply defined by natural barriers in the landscape, particularly the western coastline and its harbours, and the Pūniu River, which sharply demarcated the territory the Crown had confiscated from Māori. Further to the east and south, the aukati existed in Ms Marr's terms 'more like zones'. The outer zones allowed some flexibility for trading purposes and were susceptible to change as communities responded to settler encroachment, particularly the activities of the Native Land Court.<sup>59</sup>

7.3.2.1 The 'inner' aukati and beyond

By the late 1860s, the aukati had taken full shape as a border area that protected the residual territory pledged to the Kīngitanga. This was the area against which no person – whether a private individual or government official – could lay any claim to any land interests and which the Kīngitanga was confident it could successfully defend.

In her evidence, Ms Marr emphasised the boundary locations which characterised the 'inner aukati': the innermost line of defence that was established at the end of the Waikato war, which differed from the full extent of the Kīngitanga territory stretching much further to the north, east and south.<sup>60</sup> The inner aukati included a series of defences at Wharepapa, Ōrahiri near Ōtorohanga, and Hangatiki. In 1866, recounting a meeting with Wiremu Tamihana, Grey described a series of pou which marked Hangatiki and the surrounding district as the territory within which Rewi and his 'followers' intended to remain in a 'state of complete isolation'. According to Grey, Rewi had said he would 'never again look upon an [sic] European face'.<sup>61</sup> In fact, 'complete isolation' overstated how the aukati would operate in practice: Rewi would not only meet with Europeans, but from 1869 he also began to engage the Crown on establishing formal peace (see section 7.3.4.2). In the meantime, though, visits to Hangatiki – whether by Māori or European – could only occur with the requisite permissions of Te Rohe Pōtae leaders. This would be the case for some 20 years yet.

In the south, similar stoppages operated at Mōkau, where an aukati was reportedly declared in March 1867<sup>62</sup>, and Maraekowhai, near Taumarunui, which was 57. Document A78(d), p 2.

58. Document A22, p 210.

59. Document A78, pp 27, 86.

60. Document A78, pp 63–94.

61. Grey to Cardwell, 3 May 1866, AJHR, 1866, A-1, pp 94–96; doc A78, p 69.

62. Nelson Examiner and New Zealand Chronicle, 14 March 1867 p 8; doc A78, p 85.

under the authority of the rangatira Topine Te Mamaku.<sup>63</sup> The defence at Hangatiki included Rewi's pā, Paratui. This was the pā to which Rewi retired after Ōrākau, as did Tāwhiao and more than 2,200 of his Waikato people.<sup>64</sup> Later, about 1875, Tāwhiao established a new base closer to the border at Hikurangi, on the southern shoulder of Mount Pirongia.<sup>65</sup>

Some parts of the border area were sharply defined by war and confiscation. Following the Waikato war, the Kingitanga established new northern defensive lines along the Pūniu River, which (as reluctantly accepted by the Government) then formed the basis for the confiscation line.<sup>66</sup> Confiscation in Taranaki marked a similar line, although the exact extent of the confiscation in that area did not become apparent until 1881 (see section 7.4.3.2). In the meantime, the redoubt at Pukearuhe became the acknowledged extent of the Crown's territory, with the Waipingao Stream seen as the approximate boundary line. Mōkau – approximately 20 kilometres north of what became the confiscation boundary – was where Māori in the southern area carried out the practical defence of the aukati.

It was initially unclear whether similar stoppages would be made at Kāwhia, or whether that place would become an area of Crown control. In 1865, warnings came from Kingitanga adherents against some Ngāti Hikairo who appeared to be set for a Native Land Court hearing. Shortly thereafter, the Kingitanga expelled a portion of Ngāti Hikairo from Kāwhia, who relocated to Mōtakotako on the northern shores of Aotea Harbour.<sup>67</sup> By 1868, the general local understanding was that the aukati in that area ran from the Pūniu across Pirongia.<sup>68</sup> In the early to mid-1870s, however, Ngāti Hikairo were welcomed back to Kāwhia; their rangatira, Hone Te One, went on to play an important mediating role between core Kingitanga communities and other Waikato groups to the north.<sup>69</sup>

There were other aukati too, such as those established along the major river valleys – the Rangitikei, Manawatū, and Whanganui – that formed natural entry points to the wider territory under Kingitanga authority. In the eastern areas, where the frontier boundaries remained 'more like zones', Kingitanga communities grappled with what could be realistically enforced in the face of closer proximity to Pākehā settlements.<sup>70</sup>

7.3.2.2 Adjustments in the aukati to the 1880s

Most of the adjustments in the aukati occurred in lands from the north-east to the south, where territories under Kingitanga authority intersected with those hapū and iwi who had not committed to its cause, and where the engagement with Crown institutions and settler interests became increasingly prominent.

63. Document A78, p 86.

64. Document A110, p 605.

65. Document A78, p 164; doc A110, p 605.

66. Document A78, pp 63–64.

67. Document A98, pp 268–269.

68. Document A78, p 68.

69. Document A98, pp 269–271; doc A78, pp 166–167, 210–211.

70. Document A78(b), pp 3–4.

One area that was a lasting source of tension was Maungatautari, which lay to the east of the Waikato confiscation district and north of the inner aukati as it came to be demarcated at the Pūniu River. Settler encroachment was particularly noticeable around Maungatautari, where the exact division of land under the authority of the King and land under the authority of the Crown remained contested. The Kingitanga considered that Maungatautari should remain under Kingitanga authority. By contrast, settlers considered that the land held strategic importance, because it was located between Auckland and other Pākehā settlements in eastern districts of the North Island. There were suggestions that Cambridge could be linked by road to Maungatautari, opening up the good quality lands there for settlers to run stock. From the settler perspective, Crown control of land in the area could cut off routes between Kingitanga communities in the east and those in the west.<sup>71</sup>

Further pressure on Māori in the area mounted as the Native Land Court began investigating titles to Maungatautari lands in 1868, in the Pahue and Pukekura blocks (which lay just outside the inquiry district, but within the territories under Kingitanga influence).<sup>72</sup> At the same time, some of the local hapū arranged various leases and sales with Pākehā settlers. The native land laws allowed any Māori to bring claims, meaning that principal owners could be forced into court by those with relatively minor interests.<sup>73</sup> As will be discussed in chapter 10, Māori often came to regard the court's decisions as unjust and as based on flawed understanding of the relevant history or tikanga. From 1867, the law made no provision for hapū to be named on the title; instead, titles were awarded to named individuals, rendering the land vulnerable to sale.

The Maungatautari, Pahue, and Pukekura investigations spurred internal tensions among Kingitanga Māori as various groups competed to assert their land rights, while some also had to balance defending their interests with the enforcement of Kingitanga policies against engagement with Crown institutions. The outcome of the court's hearing in Maungatautari in turn influenced existing concerns among Kingitanga leaders about the Native Land Court and further shaped the Kingitanga's policies against the court and associated institutions.<sup>74</sup> These concerns came to the forefront during Rewi's engagements with the Crown in the late 1870s and early 1880s (see section 7.4).

Similar patterns emerged in other Kingitanga districts in the north and east. In the upper Thames district long-standing Kingitanga communities, such as that led by the chief Te Hira, grappled with an influx of settlers and gold miners, followed in 1871 by the government telegraph. Thames Māori tolerated these incursions, recognising by then that it was unrealistic to continue the aukati in their area.<sup>75</sup>

---

71. Document A78, p 71.

72. Document A85, p 16 (Belgrave and Young).

73. Native Lands Act 1865, s 21; Waitangi Tribunal, The Hauraki Report, 3 vols (Wellington: Legislation Direct, 2006), vol 2, pp 778–779.

74. Document A78, pp 71–72.

75. Document A78, pp 74–75, 239–240.

In the Patetere region (to the east of Maungatautari, and north-east of the inquiry district), stress on the aukati was largely the result of residual tensions following the war at Tauranga, and runholders claiming leases that butted up against the edge of territory under Kīngitanga authority.<sup>76</sup> This was also the case in the lands extending from Patetere to the north and east of Taupō, which attracted speculators, runholders, and government officials who understood the strategic importance of the area in opening up transport routes to and through the interior.<sup>77</sup> Gold prospecting was also an issue in the Taupō area. In 1867 and 1868, the Native Land Court conducted title investigations that included blocks that stretched westwards towards the Waikatō River, provoking strong opposition from several communities, including those led by the rangatira Hitiri Te Paerata, who had affiliations to a range of iwi, including Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Maniapoto, and Ngāti Tūwharetoa.<sup>78</sup>

Along the Whanganui River, the situation was complicated by variable support for the Kīngitanga, and these complications were only exacerbated by a return to armed conflict in Taranaki in the late 1860s (see section 7.3.3.4). Controlling entry into Te Rohe Pōtae from the south was a critical function of the communities of upper Whanganui, and by the late 1860s it was generally understood that Pipiriki marked the boundary between Government and Kīngitanga authority. Thus, in the initial post-war period, Whanganui support for the Kīngitanga meant the aukati extended considerably further south than what was later outlined in the 1883 petition submitted to Parliament by the ‘four tribes’, who included Whanganui (see chapter 8, section 8.4.5). In that petition, the boundary was drawn back closer to Taumarunui and the Kīngitanga strongholds of Tūhua and Maraekowhai.<sup>79</sup> According to Ms Marr, this expanded view of Te Rohe Pōtae was reflected in the kōrero tuku iho of Sir Archie Taiaroa and others, who held to the explanations of their elders that Te Rohe Pōtae ‘stretched further south than was set out even in 1883.’<sup>80</sup>

Nevertheless, as the 1870s advanced, the aukati became increasingly difficult to uphold – especially in the eastern and southern areas where territories were susceptible to land alienation, particularly under the Fox–Vogel Government’s policies for expanded settlement, including the construction of public works (see section 7.4).<sup>81</sup> During this period the aukati retrenched, eventually falling back to the territory over which Te Rohe Pōtae leaders and Crown representatives would negotiate in the mid-1880s.

The adjustability of the aukati boundary did not mean that supporting communities cut their ties with the Kīngitanga, as government officials tended to

76. Document A78, pp 76–77.

77. Document A78, pp 78, 80, 93.

78. Document A78, pp 78–85.

79. Document A78, pp 85–91.

80. Document A78, p 88; transcript 4.1.4, pp 106 (Douglas Bell, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho Hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha marae, 26 April 2010), pp 231–239, 261–266 (John Wi, Sir Archie Taiaroa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho Hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha marae, 27 April 2010).

81. Document A78, pp 229–230.

suggest.<sup>82</sup> Even as late as 1879, chiefs of Ngāti Hako first warned and later fired upon a government survey party at Te Aroha, on the Hauraki Plains.<sup>83</sup> The incident demonstrates that Kingitanga supporters attempted to maintain the aukati in their own areas even after they were effectively cut off from the core Kingitanga territories and aukati.

The support of some communities remained unequivocal, just as many of those who had not joined the Kingitanga before or during the war remained aloof. Some opted to cooperate with the Government and its institutions, viewing that approach as best suited to their circumstances; others felt they could agree to certain developments – the construction of telegraph lines, for instance – while adhering to core Kingitanga codes, such as refusing to participate in Native Land Court processes.<sup>84</sup>

Nonetheless, it did become increasingly impractical to enforce the aukati in some areas, particularly those furthest from the core Te Rohe Pōtae lands. In those areas, allegiance to the Kingitanga was tested as Pākehā settlement expanded. On the ground, the aukati retreated in the east from the Patetere and Taupō areas, and in the north-east from Hauraki. North of Kāwhia, the boundary settled in at the Raukumara sandhills on the south side of Aotea Harbour. This meant that the few Pākehā already established at and trading from Kāwhia township were included in territory bounded by the aukati.<sup>85</sup>

By the early 1880s, the territory remaining in Kingitanga control had become more closely associated with the area now known as Te Rohe Pōtae. Rewi Maniapoto indicated the extent of this territory first in 1877 when, in meeting Crown representatives, he drew an oval on the table. In 1882, Rewi reiterated his sense of this territory during a hui where he took a stick and drew a circle on the ground.<sup>86</sup> In doing so, Rewi reflected his increasing concern that the land in which his people held customary interests was under threat, and that this land needed to be more clearly defined by a hard boundary line (see sections 7.4.1.4, 7.4.2.3, and 7.4.2.5). Morehu McDonald described the intentions behind these actions this way: ‘the leading rangatira of the day, including Rewi, sought to put a boundary around the Rohe Pōtae to keep the Native Land Court out. The intention was to maintain chiefly authority within.’<sup>87</sup>

By this time, Kingitanga communities protected behind the aukati predominantly affiliated to five iwi groupings: Ngāti Maniapoto, Ngāti Raukawa, Ngāti Tūwharetoa, the people of the northern Whanganui region, and Waikato people who had taken refuge in the district following the Waikato wars. Ngāti Hikairo were formally outside this collective, but continued to play a mediating role at Kāwhia Harbour. However, many Kingitanga communities found themselves and their interests divided between lands inside and outside the aukati.

---

82. Document A78, pp 241–242.

83. Document A78, p 116.

84. Document A78, pp 116, 215.

85. New Zealand Herald, 11 September 1865, p 4; doc A78, pp 67–68.

86. Document A78, p 137.

87. Document K23, p 30 (McDonald).

Many names came to be used in association with the aukati and the district it encompassed, including the ‘porotaka’ or ‘porowhita’, meaning ‘ring boundary’, and, most enduringly, Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>88</sup> The name Te Rohe Pōtae for the district reflects long-standing oral traditions, versions of which were related to us during the Kōrero Tuku Iho hui (see sidebar). The common thread to these traditions is that the King, usually Tāwhiao, placed his pōtae – his hat – upon a map to show the governor the separate territory remaining under his authority. The brim of the King’s pōtae indicated the aukati covering his territory: Te Rohe Pōtae. Other traditions convey the idea that it was Wahanui who defined the territory in this way.<sup>89</sup>

Ms Marr considered it important to distinguish between the terms ‘King Territory’ and ‘Te Rohe Pōtae’. According to Ms Marr, the former refers to the original lands pledged to the King by supportive hapū and iwi from the late 1850s.<sup>90</sup> The latter, Ms Marr argued, was not used until the ‘external boundary’ of the land remaining in the possession of customary owners of the district was set out in the petition of the ‘four tribes’ in June 1883.<sup>91</sup> While that may be the case, it is also clear that Kīngitanga oral traditions use the pōtae as a metaphor for their rohe and the mana of their king within it.<sup>92</sup> At the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, claimants offered varying narratives of the naming of Te Rohe Pōtae which likely refer to both the creation of the Kīngitanga territory and the negotiations associated with the 1883 petition. For the purposes of this chapter, therefore, the name ‘Te Rohe Pōtae’ has been used to describe the area that contained the customary land that Māori within the aukati sought to defend against further incursion, either through the Kīngitanga and the enforcement of the aukati or, subsequently, as the four tribes who sought to define and protect their external boundary.

Kōrero Tuku Iho Explaining Establishment and Naming of Te Rohe Pōtae

We were presented with numerous traditions relating to the naming of Te Rohe Pōtae, some of which emphasised Tāwhiao’s role and the creation of the territory associated with the Kīngitanga, while others were more associated with Wahanui and negotiations with the Crown in the 1880s.

Much of the kōrero attributed the naming of Te Rohe Pōtae to Tāwhiao. George Searancke recalled the kōrero of his wife’s uncle, Bob Emery. During the peace talks following the Waikato wars, ‘Grey was supposed to have said to Tāwhiao, “that is your country. Maybe we should cut the country in half and I have the other half.” At this point it was alluded that Tāwhiao asked for Grey’s hat and he put it down on

88. Document A78, p 16.

89. Document A78, pp 42–46.

90. Document A78, p 24.

91. Document A78, p 47.

92. Document A78, p 44.

the map.<sup>1</sup> Sir Archie Taiaroa relayed to the Tribunal that it was not Grey's hat placed upon the map, but Tāwhiao's,<sup>2</sup> Kevin Amohia also believed the hat to be Tāwhiao's.<sup>3</sup> Paul Ropata told the Tribunal that 'the aukati . . . arose because of Tāwhiao's actions in placing his hat upon the map'.<sup>4</sup>

Similarly, claimants offered varied accounts over what occurred once the hat was placed upon the map. Continuing his kōrero, George Searancke told the Tribunal that, after laying Grey's hat, Tāwhiao then asked for Grey's sword and made to cut the hat in half. 'Grey said, "If you do that you will ruin my hat". Tāwhiao said, "Well if you cut the country if you do what you are talking about you'll ruin my country."<sup>5</sup> John Kaati offered a similar narrative but rather than asking for Grey's sword, Tāwhiao had an axe.<sup>6</sup> Paul Ropata offered a less dramatic sequence of events in which Tāwhiao undertook 'drawing a circle around the rim of his hat. And it was meant to be a dividing line between Māori and Pākehā. It was also the land, the Rōhe Pōtae.<sup>7</sup>

Referring to what Ms Marr argued was the external boundary outlined in the June 1883 petition, Piripi Crown told the Tribunal that it was Wahanui who placed the hat. 'He said to Governor Gore Browne: "Give me your hat", and this hat belonged to Governor Gore Brown. It was not the King; it was not Wahanui's, but Governor Gore Brown's'.<sup>8</sup> Wahanui 'took off his hatchet and was brandishing it as if to strike and halve the Governor's hat. Gore-Brown said to Wahanui: "Hang on, just a minute. What are you doing? Wahanui said: "You want to chop our land in half, but you are fearful lest we chop your hat in half."<sup>9</sup> John Henry similarly told us, 'My grandfather used to say that the 'potae' in Te Rohe Pōtae was Wahanui's hat. He used to tell us kids that korero all the time'.<sup>10</sup>

1. Transcript 4.1.6, p 51 (George Searancke, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 9 June 2010).

2. Transcript 4.1.4, p 261 (Sir Archie Taiaroa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha Marae, 27 April 2010).

3. Transcript 4.1.4, p 9 (Kevin Amohia, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha Marae, 26 April 2010).

4. Transcript 4.1.6, p 321 (Paul Ropata, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 11 June 2010).

5. Transcript 4.1.6, p 51 (George Searancke, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 9 June 2010).

6. Transcript 4.1.6, p 137 (John Kaati, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 9 June 2010).

7. Transcript 4.1.6, p 321 (Paul Ropata Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 11 June 2010).

8. Transcript 4.1.6, p 353 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 11 June 2010).

9. Transcript 4.1.6, p 353 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 11 June 2010).

10. Document 016, p 6.

Ms Marr suggested, as does John Kaati, that a number of versions of the story are said to be correct, and that both Tāwhiao and Wahanui are considered to have used a pōtae as a metaphor for the territory.<sup>11</sup> Tohe Rauputu's kōrero was that, following the placing of the hat, Tāwhiao announced, 'Governor Grey, you stay in your lands beyond the aukati. I have mana on this side of the Pūniu, you have mana on that side of the Pūniu.'<sup>12</sup> Sir Archie Taiaroa said that the significance of Te Rohe Pōtae went beyond its functionality as their tribal lands. 'Te Rohe that we have been referring to, it doesn't just refer to the rohe. The king placed his hat on the map and that was an indication of his mana and to lead us. So in that, that legacy has been trampled on and where is the Rohe Pōtae that we speak of today?'<sup>13</sup>

These traditions illustrate how, irrespective of when exactly Te Rohe Pōtae was named as such, the placing of the hat upon the map is an important metaphor for the mana of the Kīngitanga and the constituent hapū and iwi it represented, as well as their particular mana i te whenua – authority over the defined territory that came to be known as Te Rohe Pōtae.

11. Document A78, p44; transcript 4.1.6, p137 (John Kaati, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 9 June 2010).

12. Transcript 4.1.5, p168 (Tohe Raupatu, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 18 May 2010).

13. Transcript 4.1.4, pp261–262 (Sir Archie Taiaroa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Ngāpūwaiwaha Marae, 27 April 2010).

7.3.3 The aukati in operation

From 1864, the constituent hapū and iwi of the Kīngitanga collaborated to enforce the aukati, employing a sophisticated warning system at both local and regional levels. The development and successful implementation of the aukati demonstrated the extent and success of Te Rohe Pōtae self-government within the district.

Through the aukati, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori prevented individuals from entering without express permission, something the Crown effectively acknowledged by warning the public against travelling beyond the aukati. The aukati was not impassable, however. Some people did cross into Te Rohe Pōtae, including Crown officials on occasion. Nor did Te Rohe Pōtae Māori confine themselves to their lands inside the aukati. They resumed trading after the war. Though Te Rohe Pōtae trade never again reached the levels enjoyed prior to the Taranaki and Waikato wars, their goods did once again reach markets across the aukati, in and around Auckland, for example. Furthermore, numerous Māori from outside of the rohe sought refuge there in the aftermath of war, and in doing so complied with the rules of the Kīngitanga expressed through its self-government.<sup>93</sup>

93. Document A26, pp98, 102–103, 108–111, 113, 116–117.

7.3.3.1 Markers and patrols

While the outer area of the aukati altered according to the political climate and allowed some flexibility for trading purposes, the inner aukati was more fiercely protected by Kīngitanga communities. It was understood by both Pākehā and Māori from outside the territory that to enter the aukati without permission could result in death. The New Zealand Herald described in 1866 that ‘a line was drawn from coast to coast, over which neither European nor “friendly native” would be allowed to cross that boundary on pain of being shot.’<sup>94</sup> However, even in the early years of the aukati, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori generally ensured that the border-crossers were given multiple warnings (see section 7.3.3.6). And, as noted above, properly authorised passage was allowed.

The aukati was enforced at a local level by iwi and hapū, and their respective rangatira. This arrangement allowed the communities to exercise their authority over their land base with patrols, and to conduct stoppages at well-known natural entry points to the region.<sup>95</sup> At times, these communities were supported in this work by manuhiri who had sought refuge in their territories.<sup>96</sup> The authority of local communities was in turn supported and reinforced by a wider Kīngitanga-based policy. This combination of a district-wide policy and local enforcement allowed flexibility as to how the aukati was implemented.

Tom Roa relayed Reti Roa and Henare Tauaitirangi’s description of this process at the Kōrero Tuku Iho hui:

hāereere ai e rātou te aukati mai i Te Pūniu ki Whatiwhatihoe, mai i Whatiwhatihoe i Te Pūniu, ko ētehi wāhi, mā ētehi atu whānau, tukuna ai e āna pāpā, ngā whanaunga me ā rātou taonga hokohoko, kia haere ki Arekahānara ki Te Awamutu, ki whea rā, engari, kāore te Pākehā me ngā kūpapa, i whakaae kia uru mai ki roto i Te Rohe Pōtae. me ngā kūpapa, i whakaae kia uru mai ki roto i Te Rohe Pōtae.

they would walk the line from Pūniu to Whatiwhatihoe, from Whatiwhatihoe to the Pūniu, back and forth and other families would guard parts of the line and they would permit some people to go to Alexandra, to Te Awamutu and to other places [to trade], but Pākehā and kūpapa were not allowed to come into Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>97</sup>

7.3.3.2 Selective enforcement

While the aukati defined a zone of Māori authority, it was not necessarily meant to preclude contact or cooperation between peoples. It was never the case that ‘no European may cross on pain of death.’<sup>98</sup> It could be restricted and controlled more carefully in times of tension and relaxed accordingly during more peaceful 94. New Zealand Herald, 29 May 1866, p 6; doc A78, p 69.

95. Document A78, p 60.

96. See, for example, doc A97, p 244 (Borell and Joseph).

97. Transcript 4.1.6, p 247 (Tom Roa, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 10 June 2010); doc A110, pp 608–609.

98. As the Hill map annotations assert. See doc A78, p 93; doc A119, plate 5.

periods.<sup>99</sup> Some Pākehā entered Te Rohe Pōtae with permission, under the protection provided by chiefly authority. Just as significantly, the aukati mostly operated as a one-way barrier. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori travelled and traded reasonably freely beyond the border.

Trade was not the only motivation for trans-aukati exchange. In 1868, the northern border appeared particularly relaxed as friends and relatives on both sides enjoyed unrestricted social exchanges, although mindful that peace with European settlers was a priority.<sup>100</sup> Messages too passed across the aukati line, including those carried by specially appointed Kingitanga messengers.<sup>101</sup> The fact that the aukati was ‘no barrier to trade’, as Andrew Francis puts it, is a key reason why persistent characterisations of Te Rohe Pōtae as sealed off in ‘sullen isolation’ or ‘sulky seclusion’ are inaccurate.<sup>102</sup>

Ms Marr has demonstrated that enforcement of the aukati was selective. Māori sought to restrict the entry of particularly undesirable people such as ‘land speculators’, surveyors, and gold prospectors, as well as harmful activities such as gambling and alcohol.<sup>103</sup> As the claimant Patricia Turu explained, ‘kāore ngā kaumātua o tērā wā i whakaae kia tai mai ki roto i te Rohe Pōtae (The elders of that time did not agree for alcohol to be brought into Te Rohe Pōtae)’.<sup>104</sup> However, as described by both Ms Marr and Mr Meredith, trade between Te Rohe Pōtae Māori and Pākehā continued over the boundary throughout the period 1864 to 1883. In 1875, the Daily Southern Cross reported that Māori at Te Kōpua and Te Kūiti were selling oats and wheat as well as purchasing large quantities of other provisions.<sup>105</sup> And, at least as early as 1868, hapū from Mōkau had resumed driving their pigs and cattle to market, passing the Pukearuhe redoubt as the soldiers looked on, constrained by orders to avoid violence unless attacked.<sup>106</sup>

Some Pākehā were also allowed to visit inside the aukati with permission. ‘Known Pakehā’, such as Charles Davis and Josiah Firth, visited the territory from as early as 1868, but did so only with permission, guides, and assurances they would follow the rules and go no further than their permission allowed.<sup>107</sup> In the south, Wetere was well-known among Mōkau Māori, who continued to include Pākehā in their community and affairs. The brick-maker John Shore maintained close ties with Wetere and others from his residence in New Plymouth. After deserting from Pukearuhe in 1865, David Cockburn (or Rewi Coburn) went on to

99. Document A78, p 138.

100. Document A78, p 97.

101. Document A78, p 175.

102. Document A26, p 102; doc A78, pp 126–128.

103. Document A78(d), pp 3–4.

104. Transcript 4.1.6, p 207 (Patricia Turu, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 10 June 2010).

105. Daily Southern Cross, 8 July 1875, p 6; doc A110, p 611; doc A78, pp 91–93.

106. ‘White Cliffs’, Taranaki Herald, 1 February 1868, p 3; Editorial, Taranaki Herald, 7 March 1868, p 2; doc A28, p 159.

107. Document A78, pp 134–135.

father 25 children with ‘several wives’, according to Wiki Henskes. His descendants remain prominent in the Mōkau area today.<sup>108</sup>

In 1868, the aukati was relaxed as ‘friendly’ and non-Kīngitanga Māori joined Kīngitanga supporters from both inside and outside the aukati at a hui reportedly attended by some 3,000 people. Reports at the time suggested attendees travelled from as far as Te Urewera, the East Cape, Wairarapa, Ōtaki, Tauranga, and Thames.<sup>109</sup>

In 1869, the resident magistrate of Waikato, William Searancke, was one of only two Pākehā (the other being Louis Hetet, who had settled near Tokangamutu in the 1840s, marrying the daughter of Taonui Hikaka<sup>110</sup>) permitted to attend the Maehe at Hangatiki, on the authority of Rewi Maniapoto.<sup>111</sup> Even more non-Kīngitanga Māori were present than in 1868. This pattern of relaxing the aukati to allow attendance at the Maehe and other hui continued into the early 1880s. Searancke also noted the orderly nature of the hui, and, to his consternation, he discovered that access to some chiefs was restricted.<sup>112</sup> Importantly, visitors to Te Rohe Pōtae understood that once in the region, they were under the protection of chiefs and the Kīngitanga as the ‘Queen’s writ’ did not extend into the territory.<sup>113</sup>

Over time it seems the aukati was progressively relaxed to allow a range of citizens, Māori and Pākehā, to attend various Kīngitanga hui. For instance, by the 1870s government officials began to be permitted to attend most of the Maehe (see section 7.3.1.1), when resources could be amassed and the weather was comparatively settled. But Pākehā were prohibited from several earlier hui, such as a large gathering in 1866 for which Tāwhiao issued invitations. There was some nervousness among Pākehā that such hui would encourage Te Rohe Pōtae iwi to rise up in arms again.<sup>114</sup>

7.3.3.3 King Tāwhiao’s peace policy

Tāwhiao addressed Pākehā concerns about Kīngitanga intentions by issuing successive proclamations of peace at the annual Maehe during the late 1860s. Ms Marr said that Tāwhiao issued the first proclamation in 1866, which was then repeated in 1867 and 1868. The 1867 proclamation was seen as important in urging Kīngitanga adherents to focus on economic rebuilding while remaining peaceful; the 1868 version repeated the call for peace while also asking people to refrain from any dealings in land.<sup>115</sup> Governor Bowen, in a letter to Tāwhiao, summarised the reports he had received of this proclamation:

108. Transcript 4.1.5, p122 (Wiki Henskes, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 17 May 2010); doc A28, p157.

109. Document A78, pp165–166.

110. Document S19, p9 (Te Kanawa).

111. Document A110, pp610–611; doc A78, p166.

112. Document A78, p167.

113. Document A41, p10 (Loveridge).

114. Document A78, pp165–166.

115. Document A78, p168.

1. The sword has been sheathed.
2. The leasing of land is to be at an end.
3. The selling of land is to cease.
4. The digging for gold is to cease.<sup>116</sup>

That same year, Rewi Maniapoto reportedly clarified that the Kīngitanga's policy was one of 'armed peace' – that is, active defence of the aukati.<sup>117</sup> Rewi announced this policy in response to the recent hostilities that had erupted in Taranaki, and widespread fears that the Kīngitanga would return to war (see section 7.3.3.4). However, the policy of 'armed peace' meant that the Kīngitanga would not initiate any form of conflict outside of Te Rohe Pōtae. It would only take up arms if threatened by external forces.

Peace, or at least the absence of war, was one of the enduring themes of the aukati and a goal Te Rohe Pōtae Māori shared with the Crown. Neither party wanted to return to arms: the sword was to be sheathed, as Tāwhiao told those who gathered in 1868. The selling and leasing of lands was to cease also, and the King's territory was closed to gold prospecting, surveying, and road-making.<sup>118</sup> To that extent, the Kīngitanga's peace policy was closely tied with its broader goal: to maintain Māori authority within the remaining territories. Over time, the Kīngitanga's policies expanded to include how these matters could be achieved through an amicable settlement with the Crown.

In 1869, Rewi and Wahanui became key proponents of the peace policy when they met with the Minister of Native Affairs, Donald McLean, at Pahiko. It was here that Rewi introduced the metaphor of the 'tree of peace' – a symbol of peaceful partnership, growth, and nurturing – which would be revisited multiple times over the next decade (see section 7.3.4.2). Rewi was also interested in conducting formal ceremonies of peace-making with and among other Māori communities. In 1870 and 1871, he was involved in discussions with Ngāti Tama over their return to Poutama lands and called a hui to symbolically recognise this development (though it is unclear if the hui eventuated).<sup>119</sup> Also in 1871, a hui was convened at Taumarānui, part of a series of meetings among hapū and iwi of the Whanganui River. Rewi was among the Kīngitanga leaders who participated in the hui.<sup>120</sup> Later, in 1875, he travelled with a party of 40 to the Bay of Plenty, remaining for several weeks. As Ms Marr explained it, this was a 'major . . . initiative' by a senior leader from the Kīngitanga. The focus was not directly on political issues, but on 'renewing friendships and kin links, seeking reconciliation and visiting places of importance with Maori of the area.'<sup>121</sup> Then, in 1878, Rewi organised a large-scale hui at Waitara with then-Premier Sir George Grey, in which he sought to conduct a ceremonial act of reconciliation at the place where conflict was seen to have begun.

---

116. Governor Bowen to Tawhiao, 8 January 1869, AJHR 1869, A-1, p 60; doc A78, p 168.

117. Document A78, p 96.

118. Document A78, p 168.

119. Document A78, p 211.

120. Document A78, p 213.

121. Document A78, pp 359–360.

In doing so, he emphasised those elements of the past (such as the confiscation of land at Taranaki) that still needed to be addressed in order for full reconciliation to occur (see section 7.4.2.3).

Tāwhiao initiated similar acts of formal peace-making throughout the 1870s and early 1880s, when he visited Māori and Pākehā communities outside of the aukati as signs of reconciliation and goodwill, emphasising the end of hostilities and the Kingitanga policies of maintaining peace, love, and law (see section 7.4.3.3). Such acts were designed to instill confidence in the idea that recognition of the Kingitanga's authority was not a cause for concern.

These policies augmented the peace-time approach to life in Te Rohe Pōtae. But adhering to peace, particularly a peace in which arms would be carried, was not without its challenges, no matter how clearly the Kingitanga had articulated its policies.

7.3.3.4 Challenges to peace: Taranaki and Mōkau

In June 1868, war broke out between colonial troops and Taranaki chief Titokowaru, south of the aukati, and lasted till late 1869.<sup>122</sup> Although the Kingitanga leaders undoubtedly paid close attention to the developments in that war, which included a series of victories for Titokowaru, they remained focused on the maintenance of peace. However, the situation thoroughly tested the policy of refusing to allow Kingitanga forces to be drawn into any conflicts outside the aukati. Ms Marr suggested individuals and groups may well have gone to Taranaki 'of their own accord', particularly if they were kin. Unlike the Taranaki war of the early 1860s, however, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori communities did not send military support, no matter how much they might have sympathised with Titokowaru. To do so would have been to violate Tāwhiao's proclamation in 1868 that they should leave Titokowaru to pursue the course he had chosen.<sup>123</sup>

Having debated their options, Kingitanga leaders had to encourage their communities to stay the course, no matter how tempting it may have been to join in a stand against confiscation that many would have viewed as justified. At the same time, those very leaders and communities wanted to maintain diplomatic relations with Titokowaru, and in this they seem to have been successful.<sup>124</sup> Finally, they were also concerned to assure the Crown, which was anxious that the Kingitanga might once again take up arms, that war was not on the Kingitanga agenda.

---

122. At the beginning of 1867, Titokowaru had begun a peaceful campaign of protest against the Taranaki confiscation. He resisted the confiscation, without resorting to violence. However, tensions between him and colonial authorities reached a tipping point, leading to the outbreak of war in June 1868. See James Belich, I Shall Not Die; Titokowaru's War New Zealand 1868-9 (Wellington: Allen & Unwin/Port Nicholson Press, 1989); James Belich, 'Riwha Titokowaru', in 1769-1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed WH Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), pp 541-545.

123. Document A78, p96.

124. According to Ms Marr, it appeared that Kingitanga leaders maintained 'close political contact' with Titokowaru. And, later, Titokowaru 'refused to join Te Kooti, partly on the request of King Tawhiao': doc A78, p 101.

Though resolute in their decision to maintain peace, the Kingitanga could not prevent a group of Ngāti Maniapoto from the Mōkau area from attacking the redoubt at Pukearuhe, which had been established in 1865 at the end of the Taranaki war. On 13 February 1869, the Mōkau rangatira Wetere Te Rerenga and a contingent of 15 or so men attacked the redoubt. Between them they killed eight people: two military settlers, John Milne and Edward Richards, Lieutenant Bamber Gascoigne, his wife Annie, and their three young children; and the Reverend John Whiteley. Their belongings were plundered. The Gascoigne family was 'placed in a whare' and 'lightly covered with earth'. The redoubt was set on fire. The taua returned to Mōkau.<sup>125</sup>

The attack on Pukearuhe shocked and angered the Pākehā community and generated much consternation among Kingitanga leaders. Three large Kingitanga contingents, each numbering about 200, had been despatched to intercept Wetere but did not reach him in time to prevent the attack.<sup>126</sup> Rewi had led one of these contingents, and he and other senior Kingitanga chiefs regretted and condemned the incident. As a Kingitanga leader with close ties to Mōkau, and someone who had also been educated by Wesleyan missionaries, Wahanui accepted responsibility for Whiteley's death. He reiterated the Kingitanga's peace policy: 'Here let it end, for the death of Whiteley is more than the death of many men.'<sup>127</sup>

Despite these assurances, many feared the attack signalled the Kingitanga was about to commence a general uprising against the Crown. Settlers took flight to the south and troops raced to Pukearuhe. Conversely, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori feared the Crown would retaliate and invade their territory. Kingitanga forces prepared, including by stationing more than 400 at Mōkau, an act wrongly rumoured to mean they planned to push towards New Plymouth.<sup>128</sup>

What were the possible reasons for the attack? Pukearuhe sat on the plateau above the famed Parininihi. It had been a key strategic location for Māori, and therefore contested historically. It was important to the hapū of Mōkau as a defence for Ngāti Maniapoto in the south.

Prior to the Waikato war, Wetere Te Rerenga and his father Tākerei Waitara were best known for their cooperative approach to Pākehā and the government. Initially, Tākerei and other Mōkau rangatira were reluctant to commit to the Kingitanga cause and opposed joining in the conflict at Taranaki. However, following Tākerei's death and the escalation of conflict, many Māori at Mōkau offered active support, including support for the Kingitanga (see chapter 6, section 6.4.2).

By 1865, the Crown had come to take up the position at Pukearuhe as the northernmost point of its defence of the Taranaki region, even though it formally enacted the confiscation to the north of the redoubt, running from Parininihi in a straight line 20 miles inland. For the Crown, the redoubt at Pukearuhe was a

125. Document A28, p162.

126. Searancke to Pollen, 4 March 1869, AJHR, 1869, A-10, p12; doc A28, p166.

127. William Morley, The History of Methodism in New Zealand (Wellington: McKee, 1900), p168; doc A110, p613.

128. Document A78, pp100-101; doc A28, p170.

position from which to monitor and control transport, communication, and movement both north and south.

However, practical problems had stemmed from the confiscations being so ill-defined on the ground. In the years immediately following the wars, the Crown neither surveyed nor obviously staked their ownership of the confiscated territory as far north as Parininihi. Locally, this situation created confusion around exactly what land was and was not confiscated. Mōkau Māori apparently thought the Pukearuhe redoubt signalled the northern edge of the Taranaki confiscation. They continued to make use of the Waipingao Valley, north of Pukearuhe, from time to time as they pleased, even though officially the Crown had confiscated the area.<sup>129</sup>

While Mōkau Māori resented the Crown's hold on their prized Pukearuhe, Pākehā settlers soon complained of the increasing ease with which Māori travelled back and forth in full view of the redoubt, free to sell their produce in Pākehā settlements, whereas Pākehā traders could not have similar access to the other side of the aukati. Indeed, rather than contain Te Rohe Pōtae Māori, the confiscation seemed to encourage them, as they sometimes traded with the soldiers stationed at Pukearuhe.<sup>130</sup> In practice, as Mr Thomas makes clear, '[i]t was difficult, although not impossible, for Te Rohe Pōtae Māori to go south of Pukearuhe. It was highly unwise for the Crown [and Pākehā settlers] to go north of it.'<sup>131</sup> Reflecting the uneasiness of the times, in 1868 the Taranaki Herald described Mōkau Māori as 'turbulent' and said that the Kīngitanga was not committed to peace.<sup>132</sup> Their response to the renewal of conflict in Taranaki, however, brought the Herald to the view that it would be preferable to allow a form of local Māori political authority while demonstrating the riches to be earned from land-based economic development. Te Rohe Pōtae Māori aspirations for independence would 'utterly break down' when faced with the choice between 'seclusion' and prosperity.<sup>133</sup>

What appeared to change the situation, at least so far as Mōkau Māori were concerned, were reports that the Crown was planning to resettle Ngāti Tama on the Poutama lands, between Pukearuhe and Mōkau. The process for initiating their return (from the Chatham Islands) began in 1866, when it was reported that Ngāti Tama and Ngāti Mutunga were 'making active preparations for a speedy return to their original settlement, Mokau.'<sup>134</sup> Initially, they resettled to the south of Pukearuhe at Mimi. However, as the Taranaki Civil Commissioner<sup>135</sup> Robert Parris put it, the problem was that Ngāti Tama 'have been very desirous for a long

129. Document A28, p 153.

130. Document A28, p 159.

131. Document A28, p 156.

132. 'White Cliffs', Taranaki Herald, 1 February 1868, p 3; Taranaki Herald, 7 March 1868, p 2; doc A28, pp 159–160.

133. Editorial, Taranaki Herald, 22 August 1868, p 2; doc A28, pp 160–161.

134. Document A28, p 167.

135. Document A28, pp 167–168. Governor Grey had established the office of civil commissioner in 1861. Civil commissioners and other Crown officials, as well as resident magistrates, worked alongside local rūnanga, and Māori assessors and constables, in a manner that was intended to introduce colonial law by working through existing Māori institutions: Waitangi Tribunal, The Taranaki Report: Kaupapa Tuatahi (Legislation Direct: Wellington, 1996), p 88.

time to repossess themselves of Poutama.<sup>136</sup> Local Mōkau chief, and Kīngitanga supporter, Tikaokao attempted to control the situation by initiating the marriage of his daughter to the Taranaki leader Rawiri Rauponga. Their intention was to offer support for the group returning to the area north of Pukearuhe in return for support from the group for the Kīngitanga. However, many other Mōkau chiefs, including Wetere, opposed their return.<sup>137</sup> Parris described the return of Ngāti Tama to settle in the area as crucial to preventing any future attacks on northern Taranaki. In response to reports of possible attacks on Pukearuhe in late 1868, Parris commented that reinforcements were not needed because ‘the Chatham Islanders are a great protection to us’.<sup>138</sup>

After the attack on Pukearuhe in early 1869, Parris conceded that the return of Ngāti Tama to the region may have in fact had the opposite effect. Reporting to the Government, he said that the only conclusion he could arrive at was that ‘the take or cause of it [the attack] is the return of the Ngatitamas from the Chatham Islands; and that the Pukearuhe massacre is intended by the Ngatimaniapotos as a declaration of their intention not to surrender Poutama to the Ngatitamas’. He added that it was ‘difficult to explain why they should murder Europeans as a warning to the Ngatitamas not to occupy any part of Poutama, but that is the decision of the whole of the Ngatiawa and Taranaki tribes’. Parris further acknowledged that while Ngāti Tama had yet to take up occupation of the land, they were intending to do so, which Ngāti Maniapoto had undoubtedly heard about.<sup>139</sup>

Two months after the attack the Crown made a perfunctory response: Colonel Whitmore ‘fired four token shots’ from a steam ship taken to the Mōkau Heads for that purpose. He returned to New Plymouth.<sup>140</sup> (One of the cannon balls Whitmore fired could still be viewed at Mōkau Museum at the time of the Tribunal’s hearings.) But the matter was not over yet, for either Te Rohe Pōtae Māori or the Crown. In Pākehā and official circles, discussions centred on identifying the individuals directly responsible for the killing of civilians – Mrs Gascoigne, the children, and the Reverend Whiteley. According to Mr Thomas, the inquest ruled that ‘unknown natives’ were responsible for the killings.<sup>141</sup> Some Pākehā commentators at the time expressed alarm that Wetere, with his reputation for friendliness towards Europeans, could be involved. Nonetheless, within a month of the incident, Waikato resident magistrate William Searancke officially reported that the ‘actual murderers’ were Henry Phillips, Herewini, Te Tana, and Wetere, and went on to name Wetere as the individual who shot Whiteley. While it is not entirely clear, Searancke appears to have obtained his information from Louis Hetet.<sup>142</sup>

The import of the Pukearuhe attack remains a live issue for the people of Mōkau

136. Document A28, p 168.

137. Document A28, p 168.

138. Document A28, p 169.

139. Parris to Richmond, 4 March 1869 (doc A28, p 169).

140. Belich, I Shall Not Die, p 274; doc A28, p 170.

141. Document A28, p 163.

142. Searancke to Pollen, 4 March 1869, AJHR, 1869, A–10, p 13; doc A28, p 163.

today. Yet even the claimants could not say with certainty who killed Whiteley or the Gascoigne family or the soldiers. In their evidence, Te Pare and Rangi Joseph described Wetere Te Rerenga as having ‘carried the blame’ for the attack ‘for years.’<sup>143</sup> Kōrero Tuku Iho and written accounts agree that Wetere had a pivotal role. Certainly, government officials and the press quickly identified Wetere as the leader of the attack.<sup>144</sup> Some oral accounts distinguish between his taking responsibility as chief and admitting to being personally responsible for the killings.<sup>145</sup>

Wetere never denied he led the attack. On the contrary, he portrayed it as a legitimate action, much like the usual policing of the aukati, sanctioned by the Kingitanga, and only carried out after repeated warnings to leave the redoubt went unheeded.<sup>146</sup> Other reports claimed it was Tāwhiao who ordered the attack.<sup>147</sup> But there is also good evidence that Tāwhiao and other Te Rohe Pōtae chiefs were as alarmed as their Pākehā counterparts and very uneasy about the whole affair. Searancke reported that Tāwhiao was angry and that the killings had been ‘committed in direct defiance of his wishes and authority.’<sup>148</sup> Wahanui, who some thought to have been involved in the killings, claimed responsibility for them as a rangatira with close ties to Mōkau. Tohe Rauputu said of this: ‘Ko te mahi o te rangatira, ahakoa, anā, nā tētehi mahi ka riro mai i te kupu mana. Ka riro mai hoki te hē, he hara rānei, māna, pēnā hoki te āhua o te rangatira. [Although it was someone else who committed the act, he steps forward to accept the consequences of that act.]’<sup>149</sup> Claimants also interpret Tāwhiao’s actions and utterances following the attack as expressions of remorse (see sidebar).

In the aftermath of the Pukearuhe attack, the area was soon deserted. Overland trade virtually dried up for the next few years. Mōkau Māori rarely passed through or stopped, and Taranaki Māori moved southwards. The Crown, too, moved on, relying on Taranaki Māori to patrol the area and only occasionally sending troops to visit. Through the 1870s Mōkau chiefs, including Wetere, turned their attention to repairing their now shattered relationship with the Crown. In doing so, they sought a return to the commercial relationships and enterprises they had enjoyed prior to the war. Though admirable, their cooperative approach would not relieve them of the challenges the aukati faced. And the question of Wetere’s culpability would be raised again in the early 1880s, at a time when he had made some progress in re-establishing friendlier relations with the Crown. At that time, in February 1883, Wetere was regarded as subject to the Government’s general amnesty (see section 8.3.1.3).

---

143. Document H2, p 3 (Te Pare Joseph and Rangi Joseph).

144. See, for example, doc A28, p 163.

145. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 168–169, 179–180 (Tohe Rauputu, Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 18 May 2010); doc A78, pp 634–635.

146. Document A28, p 163.

147. Parris to McLean, 5 January 1871, AJHR, 1871, F-6B, p 12; doc A28, p 166.

148. Searancke to Pollen, 27 February 1869 (doc A28, p 165).

149. Transcript 4.1.5, p 169 (Tohe Rauputu, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 18 May 2010); doc A110, p 614.

Claimant Evidence about the Pukearuhe Attack

‘Ka hinga i au te kau momōna o te tau, ko ngā toto a panea ki te pari ki Parenīnihi, hei hōroi i tōku tuhi marei-kura, ko Te Koharua te mutu a Tautahi.’ (‘I have slaughtered the fatted calf of the year and the blood I have daubed on the precipice at Parininihi to wash away my tuhi marei-kura and Te Koharua, the chief’s responsibility.’)<sup>1</sup>

Claimant kōrero regarding the attack on the Pukearuhe redoubt in 1869 indicated that there was tension between the Kīngitanga’s principles of peace and the necessity to protect the aukati line. The reasons for the attack are still not well understood. However, claimants emphasised the significance of the site’s location on the aukati line and the importance of protecting the lands within the boundary. Tohe Raupatu believes that the incident confirmed ‘the extent to which we were bound by the kupu mana of our obligations to protect our lands and the boundaries from the intrusions of those that did not respect our laws.’<sup>2</sup>

Haumoana White gave a number of motives for the attack. In his kōrero, it had been Whiteley who carried Te Tiriti from Mōkau to Kāwhia in 1840. After being turned away by the rangatira he had subsequently returned in 1869 ‘after transferring to New Plymouth as an honorary land commissioner and a spy with the military to effect compulsory purchase of the Poutama whenua.’<sup>3</sup> Mr White said that the attack upon the Pukearuhe redoubt was in response to the war crimes of the colonial military in Taranaki, and was intended to pre-empt a planned intrusion by the Crown into Poutama lands.<sup>4</sup> However, he did not suggest that the murder of Reverend Whiteley had been planned as part of the attack. Mr White and Tohe Raupatu told the Tribunal that Whiteley was shot at the border of the Poutama land block after refusing to turn back when repeatedly asked.<sup>5</sup>

That Wetere (Te Rerenga) is said to have warned the military settlers to leave Pukearuhe in late 1868 suggests that there was some attempt to align the removal of the militia with the peaceful principles of the Kīngitanga movement.<sup>6</sup> However, when the violent incident did occur, the various interpretations and versions of the whakataukī suggest that Wahanui and Tāwhiao took on responsibility (as leaders

1. Claimants gave several slightly different versions of this saying. Most attributed it to Wahanui but Ms Aranui attributed it to Tāwhiao: transcript 4.1.5, p 139 (Hinekahukura Aranui, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 17 May 2010); see also transcript 4.1.5, pp 169, 179 (Tohe Raupatu, Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa marae, 18 May 2010); doc A110, pp 631–632.

2. Document H13, p 6 (Raupatu and Tūwhangai).

3. Transcript 4.1.5, p 178 (Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 18 May 2010).

4. Transcript 4.1.5, p 179 (Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 18 May 2010).

5. Document H13, p 6, transcript 4.1.5, p 179 (Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 17 May 2010).

6. Document A78, p 99.

of their people) for the killing, even though in most accounts Te Wetera or his people were the perpetrators. According to Tohe Raupatu, Wahanui daubed the blood of the fattened calf on to the precipice of the cliffs at Parininihi so that he and the marae, Te Koharua, would have the responsibility for the act washed away.<sup>7</sup> Haumoana White said the whakataukī referred to two bags of gold sovereigns carried by Whiteley, which were intended to effect the purchase of the Poutama lands and were discarded into the sea at Te Ruataniwha after he was shot.<sup>8</sup> Hinekahukura Aranui said the whakataukī was Tāwhiao's message to Titokowaru. He was appealing to their common descent from the tūpuna wahine Ruapūtahanga and saying that he did not want Titokowaru to be held responsible for the killings, and wanted the killing to stop with Whiteley. According to Ms Aranui: 'Titokowaru understood . . . and he replied yes, me mutu ngā whāwhai [the fighting should stop], and it was at that stage that all the fighting started to be closed off.'<sup>9</sup>

7. Transcript 4.1.5, p 169 (Tohe Raupatu, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 18 May 2010).

8. Transcript 4.1.5, p 179 (Haumoana White, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 18 May 2010).

9. Transcript 4.1.5, pp 129–130 (Hinekahukura Aranui, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Maniaroa Marae, 17 May 2010). Translation by Waitangi Tribunal.

7.3.3.5 Challenges to peace: Te Kooti's arrival in the district

The challenges to the Kīngitanga's peace policy did not end with the attack on the Pukearuhe redoubt. Even before the attack, the spectre of Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Turuki – the spiritual leader and founder of the Ringatu faith – loomed large. By mid-1869, when Te Kooti arrived in the Taupō district, he had already been pursued by colonial forces for some months since his return to the mainland from Wharekauri. He had sought refuge with the iwi of Te Urewera, but since his departure from there he was now seeking a new sanctuary. Te Rohe Pōtae presented an obvious potential destination, and there were persistent reports that Kīngitanga groups might join him.

Upon leaving Te Urewera, Te Kooti was involved in a series of engagements with Crown forces in the Taupō, upper Whanganui, and Patetere areas that continued into 1870. His actions quickly drew the Kīngitanga into his ambit, even as they tried to remain detached. Te Kooti was openly disdainful of both Tāwhiao and the chiefs who had united under him. In his view, the Kīngitanga protected an older order of chiefly authority whereas what Māori needed was a new kind of leadership, one Te Kooti could provide, that could overcome the challenges of colonisation.<sup>150</sup>

150. Judith Binney, Redemption Songs: A Life of Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Turuki (Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1995), p 155; doc A78, p 103.

Concerned, Tāwhiao sent word to Horonuku Te Heuheu to be neutral and let Te Kooti pass if need be. But at Waihi, Te Kooti challenged Te Heuheu directly and demanded that the Taupō chiefs take him to Tokangamutu to see Tāwhiao. A group of them agreed to do so, but not before Te Rohe Pōtae leaders had warned he should only come to Tokangamutu if he came in peace. They were themselves prepared for any trouble that might arise, Tokangamutu being well-armed at that time. His escorts – rangatira from Ngāti Tūwharetoa and Ngāti Raukawa, including Te Heuheu and Hitiri Te Paerata – ensured he could cross the aukati without being sent back by aukati patrols.<sup>151</sup>

At Tokangamutu, Te Kooti did not get the audience with Tāwhiao that he sought, because Tāwhiao and some of his senior advisors declined to meet him. Those who did meet were diplomatic. They heard what Te Kooti had to say, but ultimately rejected his challenges and threats. The Kīngitanga would not unite with Te Kooti against the Government, but they would respect his commitment to leading Māori resistance. They made an offer that if he were to accept the authority of the Kīngitanga and refrain from any further armed conflict, he could live in peace in Te Rohe Pōtae. When Te Kooti declined the offer, he was escorted back across the aukati, beyond its western border.<sup>152</sup> Later that year Rewi told McLean he had seen Te Kooti ‘out of my district’ and would not protect him (Te Kooti) ‘when beyond my boundaries.’<sup>153</sup>

Following his visit to Tokangamutu, Te Kooti resumed his military attacks in the Taupō area, stirring up sympathies among communities still coming to terms with their post-raupatu existence, whether rebuilding – and often relocating – communities ravaged by war and confiscation, or withstanding new waves of Pākehā settlement. Though Te Kooti kept his activities away from the inner aukati, he did operate unnervingly close to its edges, at times ignoring it and taking temporary refuge in the upper Whanganui area. The pressure was intense. The Kīngitanga viewed Te Kooti as disruptive and disliked the military presence that had followed him into the district – government forces and their tribal allies whose goal was Te Kooti’s capture – though none of them breached the inner aukati.<sup>154</sup>

Their patience stretched to breaking point, Kīngitanga chiefs began to plan for Te Kooti’s capture. With Tāwhiao’s express support, they opted for an arrangement that – in keeping with Kīngitanga philosophy – placed authority with the Whanganui chiefs. It was a wise diplomatic move, one which encouraged neutrality among communities that may have otherwise sympathised with Te Kooti. Similarly, the earlier diplomacy extended to Titokowaru no doubt contributed to him acceding to Tāwhiao’s request that he not join Te Kooti.<sup>155</sup>

Some communities did back Te Kooti, threatening, but not displacing, the Kīngitanga line to hold fast to peace. Without the full support he needed to

151. Document A78, pp104–105.

152. Document A78, pp104–105.

153. ‘The Native Minister’s Interview with Leading Waikato Chiefs’, AJHR, 1870, A-12, p4; doc A78, p105.

154. Document A78, pp105–106.

155. Document A78, p106.

successfully continue his campaign, Te Kooti left the area in 1870 and made his way back to Te Urewera.<sup>156</sup> Thus, the Kingitanga had successfully maintained the peace and contained the possibility of a further outbreak of war.

Te Kooti did not return for another two years, in which time the Crown's pursuit of him had continued. He arrived in May 1872 and travelled to Te Kūiti to request sanctuary. There, a hui was convened to discuss Te Kooti's request. Once again, the chiefs repeated the condition that Te Kooti would have to respect the authority of them and King Tāwhiao, as well as the policies of the Kingitanga. In particular, he had to respect their policy of peace. Te Kooti accepted these terms, and Rewi took personal responsibility for his conduct.<sup>157</sup> On Te Kooti's own account, however, he did not adopt the peace policy until 1873. From this time, Te Kooti's teachings emphasised peace and a commitment to the rule of law. As a mark of his gratitude to the Kingitanga, he supervised the carving of the whare Tokanganui-ā-noho, which he gifted to Tāwhiao.<sup>158</sup>

Claimant Accounts of Te Kooti's Years of Refuge

Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Tūruki was a Māori spiritual leader who fought a resistance campaign against the Crown between 1868 and 1872. In June 1866, he was imprisoned without trial on the Chatham Islands on suspicion of spying. During his incarceration, Te Kooti had begun to experience premonitions that laid the foundation for the Ringatu faith. After seizing the schooner Rifleman, Te Kooti planned to travel to the Waikato and challenge Tāwhiao for the spiritual leadership of the Māori people. Following his escape, Te Kooti made his way down the east coast of the upper North Island, attacking Whakatāne, Ōpōtiki, and Mōhaka in early 1869 before reaching Lake Taupō on 8 June, where he set up camp on the south-eastern side for a time.<sup>1</sup> Claimants provided a number of traditions concerning Te Kooti's years of refuge in Te Rohe Pōtae.

According to Nigel Te Hiko of Ngāti Raukawa, Te Kooti and a group of armed supporters arrived at Tokangamutu (modern-day Te Kūiti) on 7 July 1869, demanding to be escorted to King Tāwhiao's residence. Here, Te Kooti had discussions with a number of people, including Rewi Maniapoto, but Tāwhiao refused to see him.<sup>2</sup> When leaving Tokangamutu several weeks later, Te Kooti was accompanied by Rewi

1. Document K24, pp 13–14 (Nigel Te Hiko).

2. Document K24, p 14.

156. Document A78, p107.

157. Document A78, pp179–180.

158. Judith Binney, 'Te Kooti Arikirangi Te Tūruki', in 1769–1869, vol 1 of The Dictionary of New Zealand Biography, ed WH Oliver (Wellington: Allen & Unwin and the Department of Internal Affairs, 1990), pp 462–466.

Maniapoto and Horonuku Te Heuheu. The decision of these two men to accompany him reflected a potential alliance forming between Te Rohe Pōtae rangatira and Te Kooti. As Piripi Crown explained, the potential for an alliance between Te Kooti and the two men was to be short lived:

Rewi went to assist and to observe the soldiers who were pursuing Te Kooti Rikirangi, and see whether the troops could fight . . . But on their arrival they could see the soldiers surrounding the pā where Te Kooti and his party were holed up and Rewi said: 'Let's go home, because he will probably be caught by the soldiers.'<sup>3</sup>

Following his defeat at Te Ponanga Pā, south of Lake Taupō, Te Kooti found himself with little option but to return north, having made enemies in every other direction.<sup>4</sup>

Following his loss, Te Kooti is said to have crossed the Waikato River into Ngāti Raukawa territory. Piripi Crown told the Tribunal that whilst resident in the Rohe Pōtae, Te Kooti had sought wisdom and understanding from the tohunga of Miringa Te Kākara and had learnt from them, an experience which may have guided his Ringatu faith.<sup>5</sup> He recounted a conversation which took place between Te Kooti and the Ngāti Raukawa tohunga, Te Rā Kārepe at Pārehareha Marae. 'Pārehana asked Te Kooti, "Why have you come here" He responded to Te Rā, "Ra I come here to take the mana of Miringa Te kakara."<sup>6</sup> This place was the whare wānanga of Ngāti Maniapoto, a marae renowned for the teachings of the Pao Miere faith,<sup>7</sup> astronomy, medicines, and ancestral knowledge.<sup>8</sup> 'Te Rā said to him, "Te Kooti, on my tongue you will find that mana. If you want this mana, come and fetch it."<sup>9</sup> After three days, Te Kooti is said to have accepted Te Rā Kārepe's offer of hospitality,

3. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 359–360 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho Marae, 11 June 2010).

4. Document K24, p 15.

5. Document L18(a), pp 20–21 (Crown).

6. Transcript 4.1.6, p 360 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 11 June 2010).

7. Pao Miere was a nineteenth century faith led by Te Rā Karepe and another tohunga Rangawhenua Tāwhaki of Ngāti Pahere and Ngāti Urunumia. It was based at the whare wānanga Te Miringa Te Kākara at Tiroa (near Pureora). The name Pao Miere (refuse honey) was a reference to the decision to remain aloof from the Native Land Court. Claimants referred to several Ngāti Maniapoto hapū following Pao Miere and to followers coming from throughout the country to study at Te Miringa Te Kākara: doc 12, pp 17–20 (Crown); doc L18(a), pp 18–20; doc R13, pp 24–25 (Tūwhangai); doc L1, pp 4–5 (Te Rā) .

8. Transcript 4.1.11, p 47 (Piripi Ngāwhira, hearing week 5, Te Ihingārangi marae, 6 May 2013); doc S40(d) p 2, (Peni).

9. Transcript 4.1.6, p 360 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 11 June 2010).

and to have sought asylum in these parts for 11 years.<sup>10</sup> Whilst there, Tāwhiao sent Rewi, Wahanui, and Taonui Hikaka (who had now assumed the leadership role of his father, also named Taonui Hikaka) to Wellington to request a pardon for Te Kooti, so that he could return to his own lands.

According to Nigel Te Hiko, Te Kooti was neither offered refuge by Ngāti Raukawa, nor did he stay at Pārehareha Marae for any significant amount of time. Te Kooti is said to have re-entered Raukawa territory on 16 December 1869 and then again on 10 January 1870. Te Hiko presented the letters of the Raukawa chief Hitiri Te Paerata to the Tribunal, in which the chief expressed his worry that the ‘whole of the tribes and hapū of Raukawa, on the other side of Waikato and extending to Tauranga, have joined Te Kooti.’<sup>11</sup> Te Hiko noted that this is likely to have been exaggerated. Te Kooti is said to have moved on to Tapapa, arriving on 14 January. Here, Government forces, including those of the Crown’s Māori allies, are said to have been closing in on Te Kooti.<sup>12</sup> At this stage, the rangatira of the Kīngitanga were warning Raukawa against associating themselves with Te Kooti. Tāwhiao is even said to have offered the iwi asylum in the Rohe Pōtae.<sup>13</sup> Te Kooti managed to escape his assailants, fleeing back to Te Urewera, but there was to be no safety of refuge there. In 1872 Te Kooti is said to have again entered Raukawa territory with a small party of followers, only to be told by the iwi that he was not welcome. From here, Te Hiko states, Te Kooti made his way into Te Rohe Pōtae, where he lived in exile for 11 years.<sup>14</sup>

Tame Tūwhangai of Ngāti Urunumia, also recalled Te Kooti’s presence in Te Rohe Pōtae prior to his seeking asylum. According to Tūwhangai, Te Kooti initially stayed at Papawaka, near the Taringamotu River.<sup>15</sup> Here, he was engaged in a tournament for mana against Rewi Maniapoto. According to Tūwhangai, two pou were erected, one to represent Rewi and one Te Kooti. Te Mangapakura told his warriors to fire bullets at the two poles to see who had the most mana. ‘All the bullets missed Rewi and when they fired at Te Kooti it blew him apart.’<sup>16</sup> Te Kooti then travelled to Ngāruawāhia to await an audience with Tāwhiao. This incident likely overlaps with the 7 July meeting with Rewi and other Kīngitanga rangatira mentioned by Te Hiko.<sup>17</sup> According to Tūwhangai, Te Kooti returned to Te Rohe Pōtae after the bat-

10. Transcript 4.1.6, p 360 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-Noho marae, 11 June 2010).

11. Document k24, p 15.

12. Document k24, p 16.

13. Document k24, p 17.

14. Document k24, p 19.

15. Transcript 4.1.17, p 749 (Tame Tūwhangai, hearing week 11, Wharauora marae, 2 April 2014).

16. Transcript 4.1.17, pp 775–776 (Tame Tūwhangai, hearing week 11, Wharauora marae, 2 April 2014).

17. Transcript 4.1.17, p 776 (Tame Tūwhangai, hearing week 11, Wharauora marae, 2 April 2014); doc k24, p 14.

tle at Te Pōrere in about 1869–70. He arrived at Te Horangapai, where, upon hearing him, the locals fled to the edge of a nearby forest. Te Kooti explained that he and his warriors came with peaceful intentions and bid the people come out from their hiding places. Tūwhangai stated that it was the Ngāti Hari iwi that shared their homes and resources with Te Kooti and his people in his years of asylum.<sup>18</sup>

One of Te Kooti's main legacies for the people of Te Rohe Pōtae was a carved whare at Te Kūiti, the carving of which he supervised. Piripi Crown recalled carved whare in Te Kūiti that Te Kooti gifted to Tāwhiao, which he named Tokanga-nui-ā-mutu, but which Tāwhiao subsequently renamed Tokanga-nui-ā-noho.<sup>19</sup> Benny Anderson told us at the Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, that the whare had been gifted to Ngāti Rōrā, and that it had been Taonui who was responsible for the name change. According to Mr Anderson, Te Kooti built the house and resided in it for his tenure in Te Rohe Pōtae, during which time he referred to it as Tokangamutu. Towards the end of his residence in the district, Te Kooti requested the service of a master carver from Ngāti Kahungunu who extended and enlarged the house. On 2 January 1883 Te Kooti opened the house up to the chiefs of Ngāti Rōrā. Te Kooti said 'Welcome my chiefs, come to our treasure that stands here and as you gather your thoughts and my thoughts, this house was erected as a token of love to the people.' To which Taonui responded that the house would be named, and that it would stand as a monument for the island (Te Rohe Pōtae), but that now the lands were being taken and the remnants of the tribes must have a place to gather. This house would be known as Tokanganui-ā-noho and would be a monument for all the land of Te Rohe Pōtae.<sup>20</sup>

18. Document A44, p 13 (Tame Tūwhangai).

19. Transcript 4.1.6, p 361 (Piripi Crown, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Te Tokanganui-ā-noho marae, 11 June 2010).

20. Transcript 4.1.6, pp 27–28 (Benny Anderson, Ngā Kōrero Tuku Iho hui, Tokanganui-ā-noho marae, 9 June 2010).

Titokowaru, Te Kooti, and the attack on Pukearuhe placed massive challenges before the Kingitanga and rigorously tested the political organisation of Te Rohe Pōtae, the strength of their peace policy, and the effectiveness of their diplomatic relations, both internally among their people and supporters and externally with other iwi and even the Crown and Pākehā. Those tests occurred during a period of post-war anxiety, in which Native Land Court hearings, the building of roads and telegraph lines, and gold prospecting all contributed to increased concern among Te Rohe Pōtae Māori. In their handling of the events discussed here, the Kingitanga leaders showed dedication to ensuring a genuine end to all conflict. And, in holding fast to peace, they also positioned themselves for constructive discussions with government officials, who shared their concerns about Te Kooti.

7.3.3.6 Policing the aukati in the context of a peace policy

Te Rohe Pōtae Māori had a territory to protect and an aukati to enforce. More often than not, their warning system successfully deterred trespassers from entering the aukati. This warning system developed over time and increased in severity for every breach. On a first attempt at crossing into the district, trespassers could expect to be stopped (puru) and warned verbally to leave the area. In 1876 and 1877, land and gold prospectors had put enough pressure on the aukati in the upper Whanganui region that it was decided to restrict entry into the region even further. In 1877, Resident Magistrate Woon and Major Nixon attempted to take two strangers on a canoe trip upriver into Te Rohe Pōtae. The party was turned back even though Woon and Nixon were on friendly terms with local Māori. Te Hai (Taumatamahoe), who stopped Woon and Nixon, is thought to have suspected the two strangers of surveying for gold.<sup>159</sup> The tightening of entry restrictions into the aukati during this period shows how flexible Te Rohe Pōtae Māori were in responding to external pressures without violence.

The warnings then progressed to the firing of warning shots, *mu*ru (confiscation of belongings), and physical eviction from the territory. These more extreme warnings were generally reserved for persistent offenders or gold prospectors, surveyors and land purchase agents who were perceived as a threat to the preservation of Te Rohe Pōtae land and natural resources. In 1868, a runholder named William Buckland attempted to move cattle through the aukati and was stopped by a Kīngitanga patrol. The patrol turned Buckland back and confiscated his cattle.<sup>160</sup> The evidence suggests that these rules were well-known and recognised by Pākehā in the region, and were generally only tested by gold prospectors or surveyors for whom the lure of gold or land proved too powerful to resist.

Death was the ultimate, but seldom dispensed, penalty for trespassing beyond the aukati. The Kīngitanga avoided promoting or encouraging its use, aware that use of the death penalty could provoke violent retaliation from Pākehā. Though regression to warfare was a risk, Te Rohe Pōtae Māori felt compelled to uphold the aukati and do 'what was right in Maori custom and law'.<sup>161</sup> The final sanction in enforcing the aukati appears to have been a last resort after all else had failed. Keepers of the aukati reserved death for extreme cases where offenders had ignored previous warnings against deliberately and repeatedly breaching the aukati. Only four were reported between 1870 and 1880: John Lyons, Richard Todd, Timothy Sullivan, and William Moffatt. The death penalty was imposed on individuals who had been involved in banned or restricted activities, such as gold prospecting or land speculation, and only followed multiple warnings to desist.<sup>162</sup>

The first, John Lyons (or Lyon) in January 1870, did not initially appear to be in defence of the aukati. Lyons was killed while building fences at the Pūniu River in

159. Document A78, pp120–121.

160. Document A78, p 77. King Tāwhiao later ordered the return of the cattle to Buckland.

161. Evening Post, 3 June 1873, p 2; doc A78, p 115.

162. Document A78, p 109. There was also one near-death.

the vicinity of Ōrākau. It was reported that he was killed after confronting an opportunistic thief whom he caught trying to steal his coat, and certainly this is what the coroner's inquest found.<sup>163</sup> However, two years later, the local correspondent for the Daily Southern Cross claimed that, in 1870, Lyons and a friend, John Cash, had been prospecting for gold in the area, at times crossing the aukati, and had been warned off by Māori. The person said to have killed Lyons was named as Tamati Kiharoa of Ngāti Maniapoto and Ngāti Raukawa. Both he and his father reportedly fled their village, Wharepapa, and were understood to be hiding within the aukati.<sup>164</sup>

The second followed only a few months later in November 1870, when government surveyor Richard Todd, also known as Manukau, was killed (by a group of Ngāti Taimanu men, according to one report) while surveying at Pirongia, having been previously warned off twice.<sup>165</sup> This and the Government's reaction further are discussed in section 7.3.5.1.

